"In my youth, Mrs. Roche, I was as fair as you—I was unhappily married. I looked lightly on the bonds that meant so much until they fettered me—held me down, as I then imagined. Between me and my husband the sentiment of camaraderie never existed. When I was not coquetting with him I was quarrelling. I tell you this because I shall never see you again. You do not know me—or care. I may be dead to-morrow—you would never hear. We are only just passing in life, and have paused to speak. The man I married was by necessity a preoccupied breadwinner, and during his daily absences in hot pursuit of the staff of life I met—well, we will say this man," taking up the photograph of Carol Quinton.

Eleanor snatches it from her.

"Ah! yes, just what I should have done then. I was hot-headed, and reckless, I had a good life in my hands and I ruined, spoiled, destroyed it! The cruel thongs of public opinion lashed my quivering flesh, the galling retribution broke my spirit, I cried to God, but He hid His face, I was an outcast, lost, I could only lie and moan for death which never came."

The stranger covers her face with her hands, and shudders visibly.

The wedding ring to which she has no right, is still on her wasted finger, hot tears, forced from her eyes through recollection, pour down her drawn cheeks, making little rivulets through some coarse powder of the cheaper kind.

Eleanor's ever-ready pity rises up to crush the anger previously felt, for she sees now the effort that this brief confession has cost her fellow traveller. She knows, too, the reason for which these words were spoken, and horror stops the beating of her heart, it checks her throbbing pulses.

Mrs. Roche leans forward, and takes the stranger's hands.

"Thank you," she murmurs simply.

The woman clasps the little fingers gratefully.

"You understand?" she asks.

Eleanor whispers: "Yes."

"Do you know what I saw in your eyes?"

"No."

"Three long words that kept repeating themselves. All the same words, and the worst, the most heartbreaking. 'To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow!' They will drive a soul to perdition quicker than any in the English language. I am going to have them engraved on my tombstone, because I can only conquer them in death."

"You are right. I was looking on, living in fancy the worthless days and hours."

"Crush that tendency, Mrs. Roche. Think of me when your life seems worthless, and remember all that I have lost. Your face is so sweet, so pure, so beautiful, it was made for the good love that crowns spotless womanhood. But this is my station, and I shall never know what you do with your future."

"Shall I show you?" says Eleanor hastily, for she is easily swayed, and the stranger has worked upon her emotion.

"Yes."

"See!" and the soft, enticing eyes of Carol Quinton are torn asunder—the photograph is reduced to a handful of scraps scattered on the carriage cushion.

"You are a good woman," says the other rising and looking down tenderly, lovingly at Eleanor.

Again they clasp hands, then a cloud of towzled hair under a black crape bonnet vanishes down the platform, and Mrs. Roche is left alone, with the pieces of torn cardboard and the scent of patchouli on the opposite seat.

CHAPTER XIV.

If need, to die—not live.—Chas. Kingsley.

"Have I changed, or has everything changed?" Eleanor asks herself, as the days slip by in the old farmhouse.

Mr. and Mrs. Grebby are just the same warm-hearted, genial couple as of yore; they crack the same jokes at their knife-and-fork tea, while Rover wags his tail as pleasantly as ever, and Black Bess trots to market.

The school children have not forgotten "Teacher," and greet her in demonstrative fashion, flinging their small arms round her neck when she stoops to kiss them.

Yet Mrs. Roche finds that their mouths are sticky, and the little hands she clasps in hers hot and unpleasant to the touch.

She rises early, and on churning morning helps her mother even more industriously than in past days, yet her heart is heavy, and the old songs never pass her lips without a stifled sob. She tries to hum the "Miller of Dee," as for the sake of happy recollections she polishes afresh the pewter service on the parlour table, yet all the while her eyes are scrutinising the inartistic arrangement of the room. Why should the horsehair sofa be placed straight against the wall, and those ghastly wax flowers under glass covers adorn the stiff chimneypiece, which might be made so pretty? The memorial cards, that are framed and hung on the wall—how gruesome they appear in the spring sunshine! She longs to pull them down, and burn them, but to do so would be to violate poor Mrs. Grebby's most sacred feelings.

Digitized by Google

Flinging their small arms round her neck.

She looks in the old family Bible, standing in its accustomed place on a table by the window. There are the births, deaths, and marriages of the Grebby family for generations. Oh, if her marriage could be blotted out, and a date of death mark her name. She envies the twins that died in their infancy, when she—Eleanor—was only two years old.

The pewter pots tire her arm, unaccustomed now to rubbing anything but diamond trinkets. The service she so admired once does not attract her now. She puts it away half clean, and longs for a novel.

Vegetating was not very soothing after all. The poisoned arrows had followed her even to Copthorne, and their wounds could not heal. The thoughts she struggled to suppress, here in the dead calm, proclaimed themselves more loudly, worked fiercer havoc. She longs, pines, sickens for a sight of one she must never see, for a voice it would be death to hear, the touch of a hand it were sin to clasp.

So she wanders about in her strange state of depression, pretending to enjoy the glorious green of the spring, and seeing only light and darkness, cold and desolation, in primrose banks and rippling streams.

Mr. Grebby is too preoccupied with his cattle and his land to notice the change in Eleanor, while Mrs. Grebby takes infinite pains to give her married daughter the best their house affords, and only remarks on her lack of appetite, at which she loudly laments.

"You 'aint eatin' anything, dearie," she says one morning at breakfast. "Try a tumbler of new milk to put some strength into you. It's them towns as makes you pale and spiritless. I knows 'em. We was that done up after our visit to you and cousin Harriett, it was quite surprisin'. But law, how Pa did make me walk in London. Up them Monument steps, and down again before I'd got my breath, with poor Rover in charge of a policeman below, and everyone a laughing 'cause I was puffing so."

Eleanor forces a smile. She was watching for the post.

The moment the man's tread is heard on the gravel she starts up and runs to the door, dreading every day that Giddy may divulge her address.

She longs to write to Carol Quinton, but dare not. She knows she is too weak to run the risk.

There are two letters for her, one from Philip, the other from Mrs. Mounteagle.

She reads Giddy's first.

It is amusing and frivolous as usual. The last half, however, amazes Eleanor.

"I am going to be married," it says in the middle of a description of a new bonnet. "My future husband is a wealthy man and a general. Congratulate me! It will not be a long engagement, as he is seventy-five to-morrow, but loves with the ardour of a seventeen year old! Talking of boys, I am asking Bertie to be best man. By this you will see all arrangements for the ceremony are being left entirely to my management. It will be costly and elaborate. My gown alone would have swallowed up dear Bertie's income. I have given him a splendid new watch to console him, as his was snatched last year at Epsom. I met my General at Lady MacDonald's. He moves in a very good set—gout permitting. Excuse my humour.—Your elated and strong-minded Giddy.

"P.S.—Don't you think I am a noble woman? He is one eye short, which is rather a recommendation, but has been one of the handsomest men about town."

"How strange," thinks Eleanor. Then she throws the letter aside in disgust. "And very loathsome!" she adds tearing open Philip's envelope.

She reads it slowly at the breakfast table.

"Philip is coming this evening," she says.

Mr. and Mrs. Grebby clap their hands.

"Well, now, I'm right glad," they exclaim together. "We could see 'ow you missed 'im, dearie."

Eleanor feels uncomfortably guilty. What if they knew that her every thought was wandering to another!

"'Cause I was puffing so."

Digitized by Google

Already she has begun to try and piece the photograph together again, regretting her hasty action in the railway carriage. Before reaching Copthorne she had hidden the fragments safely in a corner of her dressing-bag. She hardly knew whether to be glad or sorry that Philip is coming. It will break the dull monotony of the day. At any rate she will get herself up to look as much like the old Eleanor as possible, though the thought of wandering with him through the haunts of past days is distasteful.

She knows it will please him, however; so, crushing her own feelings, she dons an old dress made by the village dressmaker, one which has hung in her wardrobe ever since she left home, then proceeds to search for the long disused sun bonnet.

The day is almost bright enough to excuse the picturesque headgear, eventually unearthed from the bottom of a tin trunk, and ironed by Eleanor's own hands.

She feels as if she were dressed up for amateur theatricals, and even denies herself the fashionable manner in which her hair is now arranged, going back to the simple style, before she knew London or Giddy Mounteagle.

"It certainly is becoming," she says; "beauty unadorned," viewing her charms in this rustic guise before a cracked mirror. "Yet I wonder what the Richmond girls would think of me if I walked on the Terrace, Sunday morning after church, dressed like this?"

She looks so pretty that her heart sinks at the thought that it is Philip, not Carol, for whom she has prepared.

As she comes down the stairs Mrs. Grebby meets her pale and trembling.

"What is the matter, mammy?" asks Eleanor, seeing that her mother is trying to gain breath for speech.

Mrs. Grebby puts her hand to her heart.

"There, there, child!" she says, "don't be frightened," while her legs seem sinking under her, and she grasps Eleanor's arm for support. "But the man from the post-office, 'e—'e's brought a telegram for you."

"Anything wrong at home?" asks Mrs. Roche.

"Not that I know of—yet," continues the shaking woman; "it hasn't been opened."

Eleanor bursts out laughing, and the amused peal reassures Mrs. Grebby.

"Why, Ma, I get them nearly every day at Richmond, there is nothing to be alarmed at in a wire. Philip was going to let me know his train. I thought I told you."

She opens the message, and as she scans it her face falls.

"He is not coming," she says. "Too busy, and won't be able to manage it now. How like Philip! To let you get all ready for him and then fail."

It is more the annoyance of having dressed herself in vain than disappointment at not seeing him which vexes Eleanor.

"I dislike people throwing you over at the last moment; it is very inconsiderate and unkind. But I suppose he can't help it, poor fellow," with a touch of regret for her petulance. "I am very extravagant, Ma. I spend no end on clothes, though you wouldn't think it to look at me now. Philip just trots off to the City and makes the money, so it does not matter a bit."

Mr. Grebby expresses lavish sorrow at Mr. Roche's non-appearance, while Eleanor wanders out down the budding lanes towards the station, just as if Philip were coming after all, only there is neither tumult of sorrow or joy in her heart. She feels just indifferent to everything and everybody. The hedges are sprouting with young green. Surely the world is fair to all eyes but Eleanor's!

Her head is bent, she is gazing on the ground.

Suddenly a shadow crosses her path—the shadow of a man.

She looks up slowly, standing still, rooted to the spot.

A cold chill creeps through her veins, gradually changing to burning fire. She can neither speak nor move, the hedges seem to fly round, the trees spin, the twittering birds shriek!

"Carol!"

Eleanor bursts out laughing.

The word breaks from her lips at last like a cry.

Why has Philip failed her, why is he not here to save?

Someone is holding her hand in a passionate clasp, someone presses her cheeks, her lips! Is it a dream or reality, life or death?

The spring bursts suddenly into smiles, Nature laughs loudly, all the world is one wide pleasure field, a place to love, to die in for joy!

"Why did you run away?" he whispers, still holding her in his arms. "Why, did you hide yourself from me, shut out the light from my days? It was cruel, Eleanor. Surely you knew I would have gone to the end of the world to find you, and you thought to evade me here."

"Fate has willed it otherwise. How did you discover me?"

"Giddy Mounteagle gave me your address. I never gave her a moment's peace till she divulged it, poor woman."

A spark of anger flashes in Eleanor's love-laden eyes.

"The traitress!" she mutters under her breath.

"Ah! do not say that. She is happy herself, and I was so miserable, you were so miserable."

"How do you know?"

"I have read your heart like a book—it is mine and no other's. I mean to take it—cherish it—keep it—always!"

"You stole it from Philip—you stole it from me!" she cries, her voice shaken by fear and dread. "You see me as I am—weak, defenceless—loving you to my shame—my destruction. I am in your power body and soul—you have got my will as well—it is yours—all yours. Think for a moment, Carol, before you keep these stolen goods—what they cost—you and me. Pity me in this hopeless moment of surrender—make it less hard to part. Are we to lose everything? Think of your soul—and my soul. I believe that we both have them now in the palms of our hands—to cast into Hell—to lift up to Heaven! You should be the stronger. Remember what it is to be a man!"

"What is your ideal of poor mankind?" he asks hoarsely.

Digitized by Google

"To give—not take," replies Eleanor, in the words of Charles Kingsley, which rise suddenly as an inspiration to her tortured mind. "To serve—not rule. To nourish—not devour. To help—not crush. If need, to die—not live!"

"Then I will rise to your standard," he said boldly. "Eleanor, I will kill myself."

"How?" she asks.

"I care not; but to-day—this same hour—you will have driven me to my death!"

"Oh, Carol, you are cruel!" she sighs.

Then the words well into her brain, with fierce, upbraiding, horrible reality: "To-morrow and to-morrow, and to-morrow." She sees the faded touzled hair of the woman in the train, the dusty crape of her bonnet, the red upon her lips.

A cry escapes her, and sinking on the green bank by the roadside, Eleanor buries her face in the grass and sobs in uncontrollable anguish.

Carol cannot bear to watch her misery. He stoops down and gathers the little figure in his arms, straining her to his heart. He kisses dry the liquid eyes, and soothes the low deep sobs.

"I have decided," he says.

"And your choice, our fate, the end?" she asks breathlessly.

"To take," he replies, holding her fast, "not give back that which is mine, now and for ever. To rule (if that is the harsh name you give my love), to devour, to crush, to live, Eleanor, not die."

The words sound like a shout of victory on the still air. They kindle a mad delight in the woman's stricken heart.

"We will leave this miserable country, where you are a captive to a man who cannot hold your love, yet calls himself 'husband.' We will go away, no matter where, since we shall be together. We have only our two selves to live for now. The world was created for us alone, we need remember nothing else, an Eden to love in and be happy. Oh! my darling, how bright I will make your life, as it never was before."

"You are right," says Eleanor slowly. "I have never known true happiness. I was very fond of Philip when I married him—the lukewarm affection that grows cold instantly in the chill air of disagreement or mistrust. The love which you have kindled in me is something I did not know or dream of. It is worth all else!"

Carol takes her wedding finger, holds it to his lips a moment, then places an embossed gold ring below the knuckle, with "Kismet" engraved upon it.

Eleanor gazes on the ring wistfully. The words are full of meaning to her just now.

"'Kismet,'" she murmurs. "Only a true Mahommedan should use that expression."

She draws a cat's eye stone, that Philip gave her, from her hand, and offers it to Carol.

This is the last, the supreme act of surrender—that, more than all else, renounces for ever and ever Philip, honour, wifehood, and lays her low in the dust.

"I have never known true happiness."

They walk through the green fields hand in hand; they talk of things to be. The children coming home from school stare at Eleanor, and think how beautiful she is, wondering at the handsome stranger who gazes in her eyes, and whispers so low they cannot catch the words.

Yes, she looks just the same, as the evening tints fall with a rosy glow on her rich hair and simple sun-bonnet. How innocent she appears in the plain, homely attire, and that strange but glorious smile parting her lips. There are daisies under her feet, and blue sky over her head; love is in her heart, but hell is in her eyes.

Her eyes droop. The children cannot see—Hell!

(To be continued.)

WE WILL PAY YOUR TAILOR'S BILL FOR 5 YEARS,

Or rather you can send him the cheque yourself if you win the £100 Coupon Prize. All that is necessary is to collect more Pearson's Weekly, Short Stories, and Story Teller Coupons before the end of the year than anyone else. The task is not a difficult one. It is only necessary to recommend the papers to as many of your friends as possible and ask them to increase the circle of readers, and meanwhile collect all the coupons. Full particulars of the competition have already appeared and will appear again shortly.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"DELIGHTFUL" TREATMENT FOR CURING CORPULENCE.

The process of curing any physical disorder is so generally the converse of "delightful" that the use of this and similar terms in reference to Mr. F. C. Russell's now popular treatment for corpulency naturally attracts special attention. These terms are to be found in a large number of the letters included in the just issued 18th edition of Mr. Russell's little volume of 256 pages. "Corpulency, and the Cure" (Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.). These communications are from persons of both sexes, and it is apparent that their number is represented by thousands annually, who have found in this system of treatment a safe, rapid, and permanent cure for excessive fatness. This testimony forms in the aggregate, indeed, a wonderful record of the rapid reduction of excessive adipose tissue, and those who have personal reasons for being interested in the subject should send to the above address six penny stamps for a copy (post free) of Mr. Russell's notably suggestive little book. "I think the treatment most delightful," writes one out of a large number of equally enthusiastic correspondents. And the expressions "Admirable tonic," "Splendid stuff," "A delicious beverage, mixed with mineral waters," are of constant recurrence in this singularly interesting correspondence. The details given by many of the writers of these letters as to the results of the treatment fully justify the use of such eulogistic phrases. It must certainly be delightful to experience the sensation of losing unnecessary and dangerous fat by pounds per week, and frequently stones per month, and that by the aid of treatment which simultaneously increases the appetite and renders its reasonable indulgence innocuous. The experience, too, must be rendered still more delightful by the knowledge, which may be gained from a perusal of Mr. Russell's book, that his preparation is a pure vegetable product, without any admixture of the mineral poisons which are too frequently administered. With a candour which also is delightful, Mr. Russell prints in his book the recipe for the preparation.

A POSITIVE REMEDY FOR CORPULENCE

Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. We have recently received a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled, "Corpulency, and the Cure" (256 pages), and is a cheap issue (only 6d), published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. Our space will not do justice to this book; send for it yourself. It appears that Mr. Russell has submitted all kinds of proofs to the English Press. The editor of the Tablet, the Catholic organ, writes: "Mr. Russell does not give us the slightest loophole for a doubt as to the value of his cure, for in the most straightforward and matter-of-fact manner he submitted some hundreds of original and unsolicited testimonial letters for our perusal, and offered us plenty more if required. To assist him to make this remedy known, we think we cannot do better than publish quotations from some of the letters submitted. The first one, a marchioness, writes from Madrid: 'My son, Count ——, has reduced his weight in twenty-two days 16 kilos—i.e., 34lb.' Another writes: 'So far (six weeks from the commencement of following your system) I have lost fully two stone in weight.' The next (a lady) writes: 'I am just half the size.' A fourth: 'I find it is successful in my case. I have lost 8lb. in weight since I commenced (two weeks).' Another writes: 'A reduction of 18lb. in a month is a great success.' A lady from Bournemouth writes: 'I feel much better, have less difficulty in breathing, and can walk about.' Again, a lady says: 'It reduced me considerably, not only in the body, but all over.' The author is very positive. He says: 'Step on a weighing-machine on Monday morning and again on Tuesday, and I guarantee that you have lost 2lb. in weight without the slightest harm, and vast improvement in health through ridding the system of unhealthy accumulations.'"—Cork Herald.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lb.	30/-
No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 50lb.	37/6
No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 55lb.	41/3
No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lb.	48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

HAVE YOU A POST CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery.

The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents, And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post Cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

RED NOSES Caused by INDIGESTION, etc. All who suffer from this disfiguring complaint should write for DR. HOWELL'S RENOWNED REMEDY, 22, Glasshouse Street, London, W., who guarantees a cure in a few days. 2/6 a box.

KNOW THYSELF! YOUR CHARACTER, APTITUDES, and CAREER marvellously described from Handwriting by distinguished Graphologist. Business Guidance. Success ensured. Fee 2s. Professor CARONA, P.B.I.M.S. 126, Ledbury Road, Bayswater, W.

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free.—Address, H. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

THIN BUSTS

Quickly transformed and a good figure permanently obtained by a perfectly harmless, simple, and inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. For particulars, free, send stamped envelope in confidence to "Madame R. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 57, Strand, London.

NEW SERIAL JUST STARTED.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 377. FOR WEEK ENDING MARCH 21ST, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

RISING SUN STOVE POLISH
EASIEST, QUICKEST, CHEAPEST, & BEST BLACKLEAD IN THE WORLD

Risin' Sun METAL POLISH
Gives a beautiful soft brilliant polish to all kinds of Metal.

1 GREAT BOONS 3

A sample of any one post free 2 stamps.
Name this publication.
C. CHANCELLOR & CO.
London, E.C.

THREE MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH
COMPOUNDED IN PROPER PROPORTIONS
GLOSS, BORAX, GUM, WAX, & &c

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS
For the Immediate Production of
BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's
EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:
Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

"STRONGEST AND BEST."—Health.
FRY'S
Pure Concentrated COCOA

Awarded Highest Honours. | Over 130 Gold Medals and Diplomas.

Purchasers should ask specially for FRY'S PURE CONCENTRATED COCOA to distinguish it from other varieties manufactured by the Firm.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & Co's
CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

Digitized by Google

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lb.	30/-
No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 50lb.	37/6
No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 55lb.	41/3
No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lb.	48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

RUBBER STAMPS FREE BY POST. AGENTS WANTED. Liberal commissions.

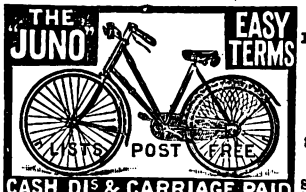
Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters, 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, and INK, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. IRETON & CO., Ltd., 92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

"JUNO" CYCLES

Are the very Best.



CASH OR CARRIAGE PAID

JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb. JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

WE GIVE AWAY

Free of all cost, Hosiery, Dress Skirts, Printed Blouses, and Complete Dress Lengths. Every woman should write for particulars and the most Marvellous Dress Guide, which are sent free on receipt of a Post Card. ADDRESS: Shakespeare Manufacturing Co. (Dept. 19), Milk St., Manchester.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 12

Mar. 21, 1896.

S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "AD" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 67, Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue, (250 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

GAY AND GRAVE

Short Stories

Edited by C. Arthur Pearson.

No. 377.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending March 21st, 1896.

THE FLAG OF PIERRE.

On the north-eastern shore of the Lake Champlain is a long, sandy beach. Inland from this stretches the dreary expanse of a tamarack swamp. One afternoon early in October, the only living things plainly in sight along this beach were several small sandpipers that daintily tiptoed over the sand, and the tall blue heron wading in shallow water. But when one looked closely, as did Plover Pierre, one noticed a bunch of bushes stuck into the sand so as to form what hunters term a "blind."

As Plover Pierre scanned the beach he discovered a man lying behind the bushes of the blind. This man was a stalwart, bronzed fellow, perhaps thirty years old; he had on the blue uniform of the United States army, and wore long leather boots, and as he lay stretched on his side a fowling-piece rested on his arm. Just now the lieutenant was yawning. The scene was a stupidly peaceful one, all things were quiet and sleepy—too much so to please the young officer. He longed for a flock of plover to flutter by and relieve the monotony.

"If something doesn't turn up pretty soon," he thought, "I'll stalk my friend, the blue heron—though I believe the old fellow keeps an eye on me, for all his marching along in such an unconscious and dignified manner. He's the only bird bigger than my thumb that I've seen for an hour. Why, so far as sport goes, I might better be at the barracks drilling recruits. But hello! there's a queer bird."

He had seen Plover Pierre. Pierre emerged from the shadow of the evergreens and stood upon the sand. The boy did not see many strangers, so he moved along the beach to investigate this one. As he passed by the little sandpipers tipuped as if making low courtesies to a friend, and the blue heron looked at him with less haughtiness than it usually assumed. Perhaps the bird believed that Pierre came to destroy the absurd structure called a blind.

But for once the heron was mistaken. Pierre did not disturb the blind, but crawled behind it to chat with the soldier. At first the boy was half afraid of this long fellow in blue clothes and brass buttons, though his face was kind and friendly. Pierre had once been in a law court at Quebec, where the high official was addressed as monseigneur. The boy decided to use this title in the present instance.

"Monseigneur, are you a Yankee?"

The soldier nodded, and Pierre resumed:

"So am I. We have moved, and now we live one mile south of the line between Canada and Vermont. You see, I am a Yankee by a whole mile."

The soldier laughed, got up, and made room for Pierre.

"Come, what'll you have? Here's some ale, and here's a cigar."

Plover Pierre shook his head. "Jules says liquor is only good to put out a cigar. I want neither."

"Why, this Jules must be a perfect stoic."

"Oh, no; Jules is my friend, and he lives quite near us. He, too, had moved to Vermont."

"And I imagine you're great playfellows," suggested the lieutenant.

"Well, not quite that, monseigneur. He teaches me and knows many stories. You see he is old. He was my father's clerk, and he has white hair standing up all over his head. My father," said Pierre proudly, "was a notary, and knew all things. Jules says my father was quite old when he married the mother. Then he died, and she married Jean Bourdo. He is strong and can work on the farm, but he likes better to be idle." The boy was rattling on, when he remembered that Jules said people should not talk too much of their own affairs. A dusky red crept into his swarthy face. "But it tires you to hear all this. Do you come from the barracks across the lake, where they teach new soldiers?"

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

His new acquaintance smiled assent.

"Jules says it is a shame for United States people to fight each other, but I like wars. I should go if it were not for that."

As Pierre said "that," he looked at something which should have matched the sturdy leg curled beneath him, but it was only a piece of wood fastened to a very short stump of leg. Besides the wooden leg, Pierre carried two yellow crutches. Perhaps it was these slender substitutes for legs which gave him the name of Plover Pierre. The soldier's eye searched the bosom of the lake as though much interested in watching a distant flock of plover.

Pierre's face brightened as he continued: "Although I can't walk well, I ride better than most boys. I might be a horse soldier, and so fight just as hard for my country as can other people. Will you drill me to be a soldier?"

The man in blue shifted his eyes from the imaginary flock of plover and looked at Pierre. "Why, you're too young. You can't be more than ten years old."

"I am twelve, and know well how to shoot."

The officer seemed to be pondering Pierre's soldierly advantages. He muttered to himself: "I wish those fellows I'm drilling had this boy's spirit."

But now the quiet bay was stirred into new life. A steam launch rounded one of the points and puffed towards the young officer's blind. The blue heron gave a cry of surprise, and then, recovering its dignity, swept away with graceful curves of its majestic wings.

The soldier got up and shook the sand from his clothes.

"Here's the government boat come to take me back to Plattsburg barracks."

A small skiff put out from the launch to bring him on board. He threw a few shore birds into the skiff, stepped in himself, and was rowed away.

The government boat flew two flags—a large one at the bow and a smaller one at the stern. When the lieutenant got on board he pulled down the one from the stern, and getting into the skiff again was rowed back to the shore. Pierre was still standing on the sand.

The officer gravely handed the colours to the boy. "Uncle Sam presents these to a valued citizen. Never forget that you are a Yankee"

Pierre, being such a new citizen, did not quite understand the reference to Uncle Sam. But his heart gave a throb of pride, and he reverently took the coloured silk into his grimy hands.

As he hopped back through the swamp road leading to the fields beyond, he thought: "Now I am really a Yankee. The tall man would not give me the flag if he had any doubts about it."

When he reached the log house it was growing dusk. The fat Twins, his half sisters, were rolling over the floor, and Mme. Bourdo busied herself in getting supper. The stout Canadian woman still showed some traces of her comely girlhood. Jean Bourdo's heavy figure lounged by the stove, a greivous obstacle both to his wife and the tumbling twins.

"Jean Bourdo," said Pierre, "would you not like to be a soldier?"

"A good question! And if I went to war, who would earn bread for you to eat?"

"Jules says that if any of my father's money had been well managed it would support all."

Jean turned angrily. "Jules is crazy! And as for your father, Pierre Beaudrie, he did so much burrowing into old books that he had no time to plough the land or collect the fees from the clients."

The woman stopped him. "The notary made a good husband, though he was old enough to be my father. In his time I lived like a lady."

Pierre had hidden the flag under his jacket, and now he climbed the ladder to the loft and put the silk beneath his pillow. He returned to the lower room, the family had supper, and Jean, lighting his pipe, said:

"Pierre, go to bed. I have company to-night, and to-morrow you must be up early to help the thrashers."

Plover Pierre kept nearly as early hours as the plovers themselves. To-night, moreover, he was willing to be alone, for he had plenty to think about. He pulled himself up the ladder as nimbly as could most boys who had two legs. After admiring the bright flag, he carefully laid it away among his few belongings and soon was in bed.

Visions of war and soldiers filled his excited brain. The friendly officer ceased to be an awe-inspiring monseigneur; now he was merely a good comrade, and they were fighting for the same beloved country. Pierre himself, bestride a gallant white charger and holding aloft the emblematic flag, led ranks of horsemen to victory.

The restless boy, tossed by such fancies, must have lain awake for a long time, when he was recalled to himself by hearing a door open and some one enter the room below. Again and again visitors arrived, until there must have been ten men assembled in the lonely cabin.

So many visitors were unusual, and Pierre, at first without meaning to turn eavesdropper, heard enough of their talk to rouse his suspicions. Getting quietly out of bed he put his ear to a crack in the floor and listened.

The men had arranged their business and were about to leave. When they had all risen, one of them spoke to Jean Bourdo:

"Remember, Bourdo, how it is settled. We have to meet here to-morrow afternoon at five—twenty men, armed and on good horses. You, in what disguise you please, are to ride with us, guide us to St. Albans by the shortest road and point out the village banks. We will do the rest. For doing this you are to receive £20. If there seems danger of your being implicated, you can cross the line into Canada, and we will make good all your losses."

Bourdo was satisfied and the men went out.

Plover Pierre, listening overhead, trembled with excitement. He felt sure this was a plot against his new Yankee land—a plot which might compel him to return to Canada. He comprehended that there was trouble ahead for St. Albans, and that the people must be warned. Indeed, he had heard the conspiring of those desperate and irresponsible men, who in 1864, under no authority from Richmond or any government, planned to sweep down from Canada, surprise the village of St. Albans, and robs its banks.

The boy crept noiselessly back to bed, but it was long before he slept. When he did, the flag, the officer, the conspirators and the fated banks pushed their benign and hateful influences into his dreams.

All the next morning Pierre was busy helping the thrashers. Jean would have kept him at work during the afternoon as well, but at four o'clock the boy contrived to escape from the barn. Slipping away to the house, he got his flag from the loft where he had left it.

Digitized by Google

He tried to think of some way of warning St. Albans before the men, who were to leave at five o'clock, could reach there. Lame as he was, it was impossible to walk the fifteen miles in time. Bourdo, he knew, would take the young brown mare, their only horse. Even now he was grooming her in the stable. Pierre was almost in despair, when he remembered that old Jules, their neighbour, had a horse. To be sure it was old and somewhat stiff, but it was better than nothing. He would at once go to Jules and ask for the horse. But moments were precious and there was no time for explanations. He knew where the animal was pastured and must take it without asking. Soon he had caught the old grey, slipped a bridle over its head, and, scorning a saddle, was bestride his steed.

Plover Pierre did not know the country well, but he was sure of the general direction in which St. Albans lay. As he galloped along, Pierre grew excited and was filled with joyous enthusiasm. The small figure of the gaunt grey horse was perhaps a travesty on his vision of the cavalry officer dashing at the head of his troops, but the boy was satisfied. His mission was a responsible one, and he was working for the cause in which he burned to distinguish himself.

He had pushed the flag under his jacket. Now he took it out, and tied it about him like an officer's sash. The people at the few farmhouses along the road stared at this apparition. After he had travelled what seemed to him a long distance, he got into a country where there were no farmhouses. The land was hilly, rough, and used for pasturage alone.

Pierre had no watch, but he thought it must be nearly six o'clock. This could not be the main road to St. Albans. He climbed high hills and looked about, but he could see no village spires. While watching from one of these hills he saw far to the westward a body of horsemen cantering alone on a smooth road.

Pierre's heart sank within him. These were the raiders, and he was too late. His opportunity had come, and he had failed! Discouraged and limp in body, he rode sadly down to the highway where he had seen the horsemen, and followed it back towards his home.

As the raiders dashed through the outskirts of St. Albans the people stared in astonishment at the cavalcade of wild-looking men carrying carbines, and with pistols stuck in their belts. Jean Bourdo dressed as an Indian chief, all his dull wits sharpened by excitement, led them on.

They rode into the midst of the town. The villagers, unconscious of danger, did not molest them. Bourdo pointed out the different banks; these had closed for the day to the public, but the book-keepers were still at their desks. The raiders overpowered them, broke open the safes, and took what money they could hastily gather.

In half-an-hour they were galloping away, firing their pistols as they went. One citizen who appeared at his doorstep was shot and killed. But most of the bullets were fired high in the air. They soon passed the last house, and rapidly moved northward over the same road which Pierre had taken on his return home.

Jules' old horse was growing more and more lame. It was unshod, and this long journey had made its feet tender. Pierre did not like to urge it too much, and so had to be satisfied with a slow trot. The night would now have been quite dark had not a crescent moon shed an uncertain light on the brown fields, and lingered about the bright silk which hung from the shoulder of a small boy perched on a tall, grey horse.

Dark patches of woodland bordered the road, and when Pierre was passing one of these, which he thought not far from home, he heard a clattering of hoofs behind him. He did not expect the raiders to return so soon, but he thought it must be them. The boy feared to let Bourdo see him.

A wood road led into the bushes, and Pierre, riding into this dark recess, halted some twenty yards from the road to let the horsemen pass. His horse was hidden by shadows; but the little moon slid down between the evergreens and lit up the gay colours of the flag.

The raiders were riding recklessly, singing and shouting. They were hilarious with success. Two young fellows brought up the rear of the galloping column. A startled owl flapped over their heads, and one aimed his carbine at the slowly moving bird.

"Jim, if we'd no orders not to fire I'd bring down that fellow."

"If I wanted to shoot," returned Jim. "I'd take orders from no man. Hello! look into this path. Don't that look like the thing they call a flag up here?" He stopped his horse, raised a rifle and fired.

The two resumed their gallop and caught up with the main body. The captain looked back angrily, but did not stop to remonstrate. Already the sharp ear of Jean Bourdo had caught the sound of pursuing horses. They were only two miles from Canada line, when a troop of horsemen appeared on the brow of a hill a short distance behind them.

The robbers put spurs to their horses; the better animals responded, but some could not, and their riders were overtaken, made prisoners and part of the money recovered. The better mounted men escaped into Canada. They, too, were finally captured and most of the booty returned to the banks.

Jean Bourdo left the raiders before they were overtaken, and no one suspected his connection with the "St. Albans raid."

The next morning Jules was surprised to find his grey horse, more lame than usual, waiting at the stable door. The old clerk went to the Bourdo house to ask Pierre if he knew anything about it. The boy was missing. Jules thought his absence and the travelworn condition of the horse were in some way connected. He returned to his stable, and with patient care followed back the track of shoeless hoofs.

Slowly he traced the horse's path till he was led to the swamp beside the road. Here he found flag and boy, equally cold, and both pierced with rifle bullet.

In the evening a friend strolled into the lieutenant's quarters at the recruiting station. "Here's news," he announced. "Roughs from Canada have robbed the St. Albans banks. One villager was killed, and this morning a boy cripple, wrapped in a flag and shot through the heart, was found near the road by which the raiders returned to Canada."

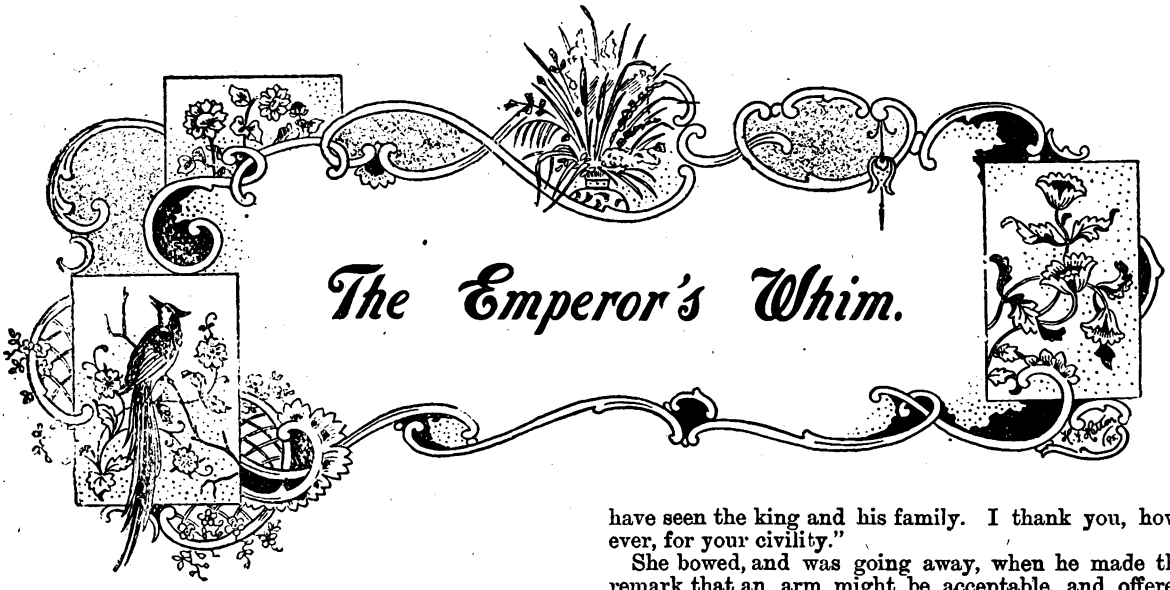
"A crippled boy with a flag!" cried the officer. He threw away his cigar, and the next day he was moody and took little interest in the drilling.

The evergreen bushes stuck into the sand of the bay near the tamarack swamp dried and wilted, the plover uttered mournful cries, as they circled over the deserted beach, and the blue heron, wading along with drooping wings, found the old time relish for frogs was gone.

Plover Pierre had left them.

FRANCIS S. PALMER.

Digitized by Google



The Emperor's Whim.

CHAPTER I.

The Stolen Handkerchief.

Frederick William, first King of Prussia, had come from Potsdam to Magdeburg to inspect the ramparts of that town. Everywhere the windows were filled with curious spectators.

"Did you notice how hard the king looked at you, Krabb?" said a prominent citizen, named Wilmson.

"You mistake," replied Krabb; "His Majesty's eyes fell on yourself."

The old soldier was disputing the point, when he discovered that Wilmson, carried away by the crowd, had suddenly left him. He half-turned to the right, when a handsome young man touched his arm. It was the son of Mr. Wilmson, who seemed also looking out for someone he had lost in the crowd.

"Is it you, Mr. Fritz. Have you seen the king? You should have come with us."

"One word," said young Wilmson; "have you met a young lady dressed in black—a slight figure, of moderate height?"

"No," said Krabb.

Fritz started in pursuit of the lost fair one, the acquaintance with whom had been made after the following fashion. Curiosity led him into the midst of the crowd. Thinking that he might meet some one of his acquaintances there, he looked around; his eyes fell upon a young girl, covered with a long black veil, which, however, did not conceal two large, soft, brown eyes and an alabaster skin. Being before her, he very politely offered to exchange places. This offer was accepted. Fritz was enchanted to render this small service to so fair a creature. In spite of the long veil, he could see the massive braids of fair hair, and his eye rested admiringly on the beautiful outline of her figure.

"Did you see him well?" asked the girl, smiling with graceful frankness.

Fritz Wilmson trembled, and turned red as a corn poppy. "Did you see him well yourself?" he faltered out.

"Oh!" was the answer, "this is not the first time I have seen the king and his family. I thank you, however, for your civility."

She bowed, and was going away, when he made the remark that an arm might be acceptable, and offered her his. Too simple to see any danger, the young girl accepted it. They walked together thus through the crowd without speaking.

"But I live very far from here," she said at last; "I should be sorry to trouble you."

"I am too happy to accompany you, fräulein; but," he added confusedly, "I am at your orders, and if you wish I will leave you."

Suddenly she cried out, looking uneasily round.

"What has happened?" Fritz eagerly inquired.

"Someone in the crowd has snatched from me a handkerchief; it was embroidered by my mother."

"Walk on slowly, fräulein, I will overtake the thief." He left her. At the exclamation of the young girl, he noticed a man darting through an open space in the crowd. Wilmson hastened after him. The thief, in his turn, saw Wilmson, and took to his heels. As Fritz was gaining ground, he turned short and confronted the enemy.

"What do you want? Why do you follow me?" he asked, with the pocket-handkerchief still in his hand, which his rapid flight had prevented him from stowing away. Fritz, eager to carry his prize to the beautiful unknown, sprang at the handkerchief, and snatched it away.

In one of the corners of the handkerchief a purse was tied up, which explained the reason of the attempt. Wilmson hastened back to the principal street, already clear of the crowd. But, alas! the fair girl was nowhere to be seen.

CHAPTER II.

The Interview with the King.

On his return home, tired and discomfited, Fritz began to examine the handkerchief, in hope of discovering some mark which might give a clue to its owner. In one of the corners were the letters "C. de. St——" embroidered in blue silk.

It was the custom of Mr. Wilmson to pass the fine summer evenings in the garden, where, amid shady trees and flowers, a tasteful pavilion had been erected. It was there that Mr. Wilmson, M. de Moss, his sister. and Fritz were collected after dinner.

Digitized by Google

Suddenly, in the midst of their conversation, a servant opened the garden gate, and ushered in an officer. At this apparition everyone took a respectful attitude. Mr. Wilmson, the father, uncovered his head, and advanced towards the stranger, who bowed.

"The commandant of the town desires to speak to the elder Mr. Wilmson and his son. He orders you to be at his house by nine."

"I shall not fail. May I ask you the reason, sir?"

"I do not know; he has told me nothing. Good-night. To-morrow at nine."

When Mr. Wilmson and his son went to pay their visit to the commandant, they were ushered into a large room, magnificently furnished. Two grenadiers stood at the door on guard—officers of different regiments were grouped here and there. Some moments after, an officer entered, and asked if Mr. Wilmson and his son were there.

"Follow me," he said, introducing them into a small cabinet. "You, sir, the elder, enter first! the young man will wait."

Fritz had forgotten for a moment his fair unknown, but he saw several ladies now crossing the street in a post-chaise; one of them raised her eyes—it was the beautiful young girl in black. Fritz rushed to the window; she bent forward, and appeared to look at him attentively till she was out of sight.

"Heavens!" cried Fritz, "it is she! Is it necessary that I should be here?" And, turning towards the footman at hand, he asked if he knew who the young lady was.

"Certainly, Fräulein de St——"

He was about to question further, when his father re-entered the room.

"I cannot stay longer," he said, in a low voice; "return as soon as possible."

The door re-opened, and an orderly signed to Fritz to enter. The cabinet was filled with generals, all standing, with heads uncovered. One man alone remained seated by a table with his hat on. Young Wilmson recognised the king, and bowed. Frederick looked at him for a moment in silence, with a marked expression of kindness; then he turned to those nearest, and said:

"Not more than twenty—four years before him!" Then, addressing Fritz, he said: "Young man, what would you wish to be?"

"My father intends me to succeed him in commerce, but my inclination is for literature—to study."

"Pooh! pooh! You shall enter my guard at Potsdam—do you understand? If you conduct yourself well, I shall keep you only six weeks in the ranks; some men of education are wanted in my guard. Have you a wife?"

"Your Majesty——" stammered Fritz.

"Ah! you are silent. Beware of choosing a wife without my permission; leave it to me. Have you a taste for a soldier's profession?"

"No, sire; I wish to remain free."

"You know my will—I want not free men, but obedience—prepare for your journey to Potsdam."

"I shall defend my rights against violence; I will die rather than take the oath of service."

"What!" exclaimed the king, seizing his cane and threatening Wilmson. "You dare resist a king!" Then, turning towards the commandant, he exclaimed:

"Take that fellow to the barracks, and let him be watched. He shall go to-morrow with the transport. If he makes the least resistance, put him in chains. Go."

The king pointed towards the door. The commandant seized Wilmson's arm, and dragged him out.

CHAPTER III.

The Project Abandoned.

With a heavy heart young Wilmson walked through the streets of Magdeburg, between two guards.

Next morning, at daybreak, the recruits defiled on the bridge of the Elbe. Fritz, not to attract attention, had changed his elegant dress of the day before for a travelling suit. Near the end of the bridge, some one called him:

"My good Fritz, who could have expected this thunderbolt, all from your being so fine and tall a man? Alas! our good king's mania for giants!"

It was old Krabb. He had come to bid farewell to young Wilmson, and to accompany him part of the way. Fritz embraced the aged soldier; but sorrow prevented words—tears were in his eyes. The old man, unwilling to show his own emotion, growled out huskily:

"Thunder and lightning! I did not expect you would show yourself such an old woman. Come, sir, be a soldier"—and Krabb himself here lost voice, and left him.

The recruits were but a few days on the road. Arrived at Potsdam, they were passed in review, and drafted into various regiments. Wilmson entered the foot-guards, and, without loss of time, was drilled and taught the use of his weapons. He entered zealously into his duties, and soon became proficient. This good-will gained him the captain's favour, together with his good looks and unmistakable gentlemanly bearing. His education and wealth enabled him in various ways to be useful to his captain and fellow-soldiers. His story spread abroad—it was no solitary instance—but none attracted such universal sympathy and interest. The colonel also conceived a great affection for him, and showed him signal favour; further, in three months' time, at the king's desire, they promoted him, and he became a sergeant. Meanwhile, Wilmson's deliverance seemed nigh. His father had arranged for his flight to Holland.

Everything was carefully planned. Krabb was to conduct Fritz from his lodgings to a neighbouring inn, where the disguises were to be in readiness. The same evening he hastened all joyful to Fritz's lodgings, and found him seated before a table, his head buried in his hands, dejected, and in a very taciturn mood.

The old man was astonished, and inquired the cause of the dejection.

"Krabb, my friend," said young Wilmson, "let me be; I am in an unfortunate position—I cannot go. I am bound here, and cannot break the chain. If I could I would not. Were the king himself to order my release I should still remain. Good-bye, my old friend. One day, perhaps, you will know all."

Krabb felt compelled to leave—Fritz was too firm for remonstrance.

Wilmson had his reasons for this sudden change. The night before he had kept midnight watch at the castle; afterwards the fancy seized him to take a walk. At the early hours of dawn he noticed a young woman dressed in black. The conviction flashed upon him that it was the beautiful unknown. On drawing nearer it was verified. He accosted her respectfully, and exclaimed:

Digitized by Google

"Can it be yourself, fräulein? Permit me to ask to what fortunate circumstances I owe the happiness of seeing you?"

"Sir, before answering your question, I must discharge my debt of thanks for the service you rendered me at Magdeburg."

"I greatly regretted my inability to restore the handkerchief of which I fortunately regained possession, but my researches were fruitless. I have it by me, together with the purse, which I shall be happy to leave at the address you may indicate. Might I further hope to learn from you whether you reside at Potsdam, or if this be but a casual visit?"

"My name is Clementine Sterne. Misfortunes have obliged me to accept a situation as companion in a nobleman's family in this town, where I have been residing within the last few days. But your own position seems equally changed—that uniform——"

"Alas! yes, fräulein, the king has made me a soldier, against my will."

Just then a general crossed the square on horseback; the soldiers turned out, and Fritz hastily left, to head the line. When the general had passed, Clementine, too, was gone.

It was this meeting that had caused Fritz's change of plan.

CHAPTER IV.

A Monarch's Whim.

One day the king was riding on horseback, with his generals, when he met on the road a very tall lady, who struck him by her height. He asked:

"Who is that giantess?"

"I remember to have seen," said one of his generals, "this beauty at Potsdam. She is governess in the family of a minister, whose name I forget. Of all the beauties of Potsdam she is head of the file."

"Parbleu!" exclaimed the king; "if she marries a man of her own size there will be the stock of a famous race."

Meanwhile the young lady came nearer. Her beauty was no less remarkable than her height. The king stopped his horse. She looked up and recognised the king.

"Young lady," said Frederick, "are you going to the town?"

Rather confused, she answered: "Yes."

"Do me the kindness to take a letter to the commandant."

The king asked for paper, and wrote a few lines whilst on horseback.

"You will give this note to the commandant. But tell me—are you married?"

She shook her head.

"Then you have a lover?"

The lady blushed.

"I understand—go. It is important this note be received immediately, and mark—ask for the commandant himself."

She bowed. Frederick galloped off, and the generals laughed at each other, guessing the contents of the letter. About half-an-hour after, an orderly went to Sergeant Wilmson with an order to present himself directly before the commandant. He was shown into a large room, where he found, besides the commandant, the colonel of the regiment and the captain of the battalion. All three wore a smile on their lips. This smile was a contrast to a woman's tears and sobs heard from a room adjoining.

"Wilmson," said the colonel, "I have agreeable news for you. It will make your comrades jealous. The king has found you a wife; nowhere, either at Potsdam, or at Berlin, could you find a lovelier."

"I will not marry her!" answered Wilmson.

"The king's order is plain. The girl is in the next room crying; it seems she has a lover. The chaplain is here; come, you must marry. Here is His Majesty's order, to the effect that Sergeant Wilmson be herewith, and without delay, united to the bearer of the order, in presence of the colonel; no attention to be paid to the objections of either party."

"Gentlemen, for the love of God, do not force me. You will cause the lifelong misery of two persons. Beware! for I am desperate. In spite of you and your king, I will be free!"

The commandant looked glum, went towards the door, and made a sign. Two under-officers of the guard entered—he whispered something, and they placed themselves on each side of the door. From the adjoining room were heard sobs.

"Confound it!" said the commandant, "this must end—chaplain, prepare."

He moved towards the adjoining room, and opened the door. A woman shrieked and cast herself at his feet. The colonel looked away. Wilmson saw and heard nothing.

"Come, my dear boy," the colonel said kindly, "resign yourself."

For the first time Wilmson noticed the chaplain, and, at his side, his destined bride, supported by two women. The two victims involuntarily glanced towards each other. Clementine—could Wilmson believe his eyes? Clementine herself, for one moment remained petrified; the next, a deep flush overspread her face, and then she fell down in a swoon.

"You have killed that poor girl," exclaimed Wilmson, "and now kill me."

Emotion overpowering him, he sank into a chair. No sooner did he open his eyes than the commandant called out:

"He will soon come to himself. Chaplain, unite them before Wilmson's senses quite return."

The chaplain obeyed. Paralysed, his eyes fixed on the still fainting Clementine, Wilmson no longer opposed the ceremony. The "yes" of either party was dispensed with, and the ring was passed for them. The commandant ordered a carriage to convey away the couple. The colonel drew Wilmson to him, who, still stunned, knew not what passed.

"Collect yourself, my son," he said; "the misfortune is great, but you were powerless to avoid it. This poor girl is now your wife; her position excites pity. Behave gently to her; her life hangs on a thread; a harsh word might kill her. Control yourself; promise me not to give way to despair."

Wilmson held out his hand to the good man, though he understood not a word.

The carriage drew up. At the commandant's order Clementine was conducted, or rather carried, to the carriage. Wilmson stepped in after her, and the coachman drove off.

"Is it, then, true?" he said at length, pressing Clementine's hand to his heart, and looking at her with fond delight. "Dear Clementine, if I dream, do not awaken me; if this be an illusion, oh! do not dispel it."

Digitized by Google

Clementine gently withdrew her hand. The carriage stopped. Wilmson handed his wife out, and led her into his home. After ascending a few steps, she stopped.

"Mr. Wilmson, where am I?"

"In my house, dear Clementine. They have married us without our consent. I am yours; but I do not know how the king has guessed my dearest, my most secret wish. I have been entirely null in this affair, but our fate is irrevocably fixed."

Clementine hesitated; she ascended, nevertheless, but very slowly, and Wilmson opened the door of his room. She advanced timidly, standing in the middle of a large room elegantly furnished. Books, papers, flowers, music, were scattered on the tables and chairs.

"Ah, Clementine," said Wilmson, "when I left this room a quarter of an hour since, I did not expect to receive in it such a guest."

"Did you, indeed, know nothing of what was going to happen?" inquired Clementine. "Did you never mention to the colonel, or even to the king——"

"I have no part, I assure you, in this affair; I have never breathed your name."

"Then you are as unfortunate as myself: for Fräulein B—— was the bride destined for you. She little knew the contents of the letter she gave me."

Then he related to her the strange story of the last few months. Clementine listened astonished. She told him how she had come there, at the request of this tall lady whom she had not long made the acquaintance of. Whether pressed for time, or for reasons of her own, she would not go to the commandant's house, and she begged Clementine to deliver the letter in her stead. The commandant told her that it was an order to unite her immediately to a man in the guards. Clementine affirmed there was some mistake; the letter had been given to her by a lady. They only laughed. The colonel and the chaplain were summoned, and she had fainted in her distress.

This gave the key to the enigma.

"Then it was not you," he said, "who were intended? You are my wife against the king's will! Never king was so well served."

Clementine made a step towards the door.

"Would you leave me—would you undo what Providence has so miraculously brought about?" said Fritz. "Potsdam already knows this strange adventure, and that you are my wife. Ah, Clementine, where will you go? Am I, then, so distasteful? Do I inspire no faith?"

She looked shyly at him, then held out her hand.

"I have faith in you," she said, "but not in our happiness. Oh, if you knew—you were my only friend on earth. I have always——" The words died on her lips.

Wilmson, in ecstasy, clasped her to his heart, exclaiming—"Mine for ever!" She murmured a very low assent. Suddenly a terrible thought struck her.

"The king's will," she said, "may as suddenly end our happiness."

"Do not fear, Clementine; the king is good; he will not separate us. If so, however, we can make our escape. Any hour my old friend Krabb will come and help our flight."

While they were talking, some one knocked at the door. It was a messenger with an order from the king. Wilmson was commanded to present himself at the castle with his bride. They both felt alarmed, but no time was allowed them for reflection.

Clementine trembled violently. Wilmson whispered courage, but his voice was ill-assured. Arrived at the castle, an ominous silence met them; at intervals broken, however, by the terrible tones of a voice in a distant apartment. The voice was Frederick's. Among the officers assembled in the waiting-room was the colonel. He went up immediately to Wilmson.

"Well, my son, your lot is fixed. The king is furious with the commandant. He had destined for you another bride, a tall and beautiful girl he met that very morning during his ride. A mistake has been made; the king pities you and wants to see you."

When the newly-married pair were ushered in, Frederick fixed a searching glance on Clementine. She looked ready to sink. Wilmson's anxiety was apparent.

"Did you not declare to the commandant," said the king, harshly addressing her, "that you had received that letter from another lady?"

"Sire, I repeated it a hundred times," faltered Clementine, collecting her remaining strength; "but no one listened."

The king paced up and down the apartment, then abruptly stopped short before Wilmson.

"I am very sorry, my poor fellow," he said kindly. "What shall I do for you now? My intention in giving you a wife was not to render you miserable. Listen. I wish you well; ask a favour, and it is granted. But I cannot break the tie which binds you—it would be contrary to the Divine law. What would you have?"

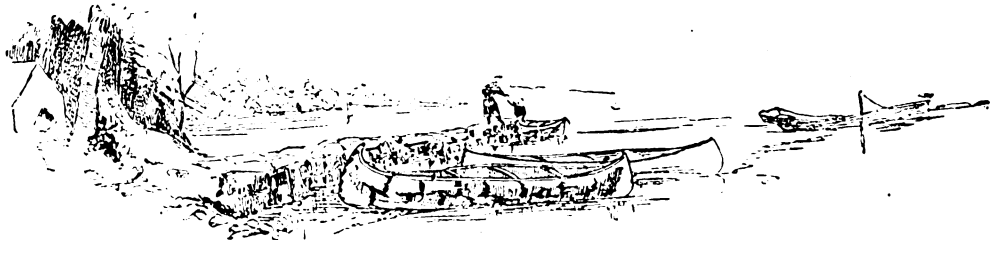
Wilmson did not hesitate.

"Sire, my freedom—my discharge!"

The king, who was unprepared for this, made a gesture of displeasure; but after a moment's silence, he said to Wilmson:

"A king cannot retract—you are free!"

GREGORY GALTON.



Digitized by Google

A Child of To-day.

My little neighbour, Bettina, came in one evening and said imperiously: "Tell me a story."

"Certainly," I said; "sit down and I will begin. 'Once upon a time, a long, long time ago——'"

"I don't like 'a long, long time ago,' that's the way grandma's stories always begin, and you're not as old as grandma, and can't know anything about 'a long, long time ago.' Tell me something else."

"Very well," I said submissively, "I know a very pretty story about a little girl who was one day out in the fields gathering flowers, and as she was sauntering along——"

"She met a little old woman, who said to her, 'little girl'—I know all that, the little girl and the little old woman always say the same things, and the little old woman always turns out to be a fairy and the little girl always marries the prince. I don't want to marry a prince; my papa says there isn't a prince living his papa couldn't buy up three times over——"

"Bettina," I gasped.

"And as for fairies I've been in the fields often, and I've never met any fairies, big or little."

"And what's more, Bettina," I said, shaking my head at her sadly, "you never will."

"No, and I don't want to; they always say such foolish things, like the stupid old giants. I'm sick of giants! I saw one once in a show, and he didn't eat up anybody or say 'fee, fo, fi, fum' down in his shoes like the books say: he just stood up there and let people look at him like a piece of wood. He wasn't worth paying sixpence to see. Tell me a story, please."

"But it is so hard to tell you a story; there are so many things you don't like. Let me see—shall I tell you about the man in the moon?"

"There isn't any man in the moon; there's nothing but dried up lakes and rocks there, and all sorts of dead things."

"Oh?"

"And I don't want to hear about Father Christmas, because I know who Father Christmas is, and anyhow he couldn't get down the chimney through the grate, because the grate's too little."

"Well, then, there is the rabbit that comes on Easter——"

Bettina's lip curled scornfully. "Why I get the dye for the eggs myself?"

"Red Ridinghood——"

"Pooh? Who ever heard a wolf talk? Did you?"

"No," I said feebly; "but they sometimes bite."

"Course they do."

"Then," I said desperately, "suppose you tell me a story."

This idea seemed to please her. She leant back complacently in her chair and folded her hands in her lap. Her hair fell on her shoulders like yellow silk, her skin was pink, her eyes blue, and her little form clad in costly clothes, made in the picturesquely simple fashion of long ago. An ideal looking child, aureoled by the setting sun.

"Well," she began, in a quick, monotonous tone, pitching her voice a key higher than usual, "there's a man lives next door to us named Smith—you've seen him?"

"He has a wife and she's named Smith."

"You've seen her?"

"Yes."

"And they've got five children—Anna Smith, Fanny Smith, Tommy Smith, Georgie Smith. You've seen them?"

"Yes."

"And a baby—you've seen it?"

"Yes."

"But the baby hasn't been christened yet; and when it cries it goes 'wha-an, wha-an, wha-an,' and it's got blue eyes and no hair, and they've got a dog—you've seen it?"

"No."

"Named Bruno, and every time the baby goes out the dog goes with it, and they always know when the baby's coming home, because the dog comes in first; and they've got a cow, and a cat that's too old to catch rats, and mamma says she doesn't know why they keep it because it costs something to feed it, but the children are very fond of it; and they've got a cook and a girl, but they haven't got a nurse, and they haven't got a carriage 'cause they're too poor to keep one, and mamma says they're not the kind of people she wants to lend ours to.

"I don't know why—'cause their shoes are clean and their clothes are nice, though they don't cost as much as mine—and they've got nice hats—Anna's hat's got pink flowers on it, and Fanny's hat's got blue flowers, and Georgie's hat's got red flowers, and the baby's got a lace cap all full of frills, and every one of them, 'cepting the baby, have had the measles, and croup, and mumps, and whooping cough, and earache, and toothache, and scarlet fever; and Tommy's cut his finger often, and Fanny once ran a needle in hers, and Georgie fell down and broke a tooth, and Anna hurt her foot so she couldn't walk for a week, and Mrs. Smith has headaches sometimes, and so does Mr. Smith, and this morning the girl broke a new dish they'd just bought, and Mrs. Smith said she was going to take it out of her wages, and Mr. Smith said she'd better not 'cause she might leave, and it's so hard to get good girls, so Mrs. Smith didn't do it, and Anna and Georgie say they're glad 'cause they like the girl. I think she's named Susan, and she's got a sister named Mary, and a brother named Bob. I've never seen them, but Anna says so, and—but it's getting late, I think I'd better be going."

"But the end of your story, Bettina?"

Bettina opened her eyes very wide and stared at me. "The end?" she exclaimed; "there isn't any end. The Smiths are still next door to us, and I expect they're going on living there as long as they pay their rent. Perhaps they'll die some day, but I suppose they won't 'less they catch something. There's Venus, the evening star, and Jupiter's the morning——"

"Good-night, Bettina," I interposed hastily; "good-night."

As I watch her little form vanishing across the lawn I sighed for the children that are no more, and for the good old fables that have been swallowed up by facts.

Horace S. Leftwich.

Digitized by Google

THE GREAT MIDDLEWICK BANK ROBBERY

SUMMARY.

Mr. Bryant, Manager of Middlewick Bank.
Mr. Herbert Stewart, Cashier.
Mr. Rutherford, Book-keeper.
Mr. Alfred Taylor, Detective.
John Warren, Old Watchman.
Jack Burton, New Watchman.
Miss Denton, Bryant's niece, and in love with Rutherford.

£20,000 is stolen from the Bank one night while John Warren is asleep. The only persons apparently aware of the key to the combination lock are Mr. Bryant and Mr. Stewart. Taylor interviews Mr. Bryant and the new watchman, Jack Burton, who, by his movements, appears to be a colleague of Taylor, unknown to Mr. Bryant.

CHAPTER III.

Mr. Taylor has to Run for it.

The night was balmy, with a gentle breeze blowing. It had been showery during the day so that the new moon was partially concealed by flying clouds which rendered its light treacherous and uncertain.

Alfred Taylor was in Middlewick in the character of a commercial traveller for a large clothing company. Indeed, it may be said that the character was not wholly assumed. A certain firm in the Metropolis had more than once experienced the benefit of his services in this direction. The head of the establishment was an old school friend of Taylor's, and when an order signed "A. Rollett" was received, he well knew from whom it came.

Taylor declined to receive the commission he thus well earned, but he could not always refuse the handsome suits sent to his residence by the wealthy clothing firm. In the course of the day, "Mr. Rollett" took three moderate orders in Middlewick and forwarded them to London. When night came, he resumed operations in another line. It has been intimated that Middlewick was not altogether unknown to him. Although few perhaps recalled the fact, only a couple of years previously he had spent a week there when engaged upon a counterfeiting case.

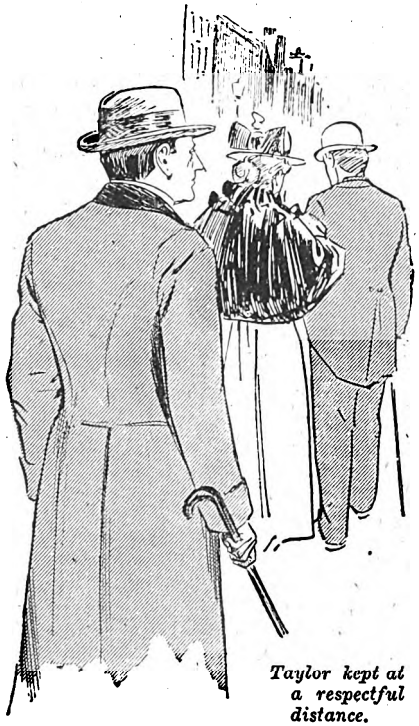
During the afternoon he strolled through the town, loitering on the outskirts for the purpose of ascertaining "how the land lay." He discovered the handsome residence of the bank manager and the more modest homes of the book-keeper and cashier. When night closed in, he was more familiar with the town than were a great many people who had spent their lives there.

Leaving the hotel, he sauntered along the High Street as though out for a stroll before turning in for the night. As was his custom, he carefully scrutinised every person he met, for a person following his profession must be observant at all times to save himself from going astray. There was little to excite interest, though hardly a face was lost upon him.

Suddenly he met a couple who at once arrested his attention.

They were Frank Rutherford, the book-keeper of the bank, and Mr. Bryant's niece, May Denton. So absorbed were they in each other, that he had no doubt of the lady's identity, and, confident of remaining unnoticed, he turned round and strolled after them.

The detective had no means of ascertaining whence they came, but judged that they had been spending the evening with a friend and that Mr. Rutherford was now escorting his betrothed to her home.



Taylor kept at a respectful distance.

Taylor managed to approach near enough to overhear some of their conversation, but they were talking in low tones, and most of what they said was lost. Turning into the quiet and more fashionable streets, they soon reached Mr. Bryant's residence. Few people were about at that hour, and he placed himself near the couple.

The detective of a story usually manages to get sufficiently close to the suspected parties to catch everything said without being observed, but, in real life, such an exploit is rarely accomplished, for the reason that a man or woman needs only to be on guard to frustrate the attempt.

If the couple had spoken in a little louder tones, or had their faces been turned towards instead of away from the officer, he might have kept the thread of their conversation, but had they faced him they would have immediately noticed his attempt to play the eavesdropper.

The lovers walked slowly while Taylor kept at a respectful distance intently listening and on the watch.

"Can it be possible, Frank?"

As the young lady asked this question, she turned her head sideways and looked up in the face of her companion. The words reached the detective distinctly, but the tones of Rutherford were lower and deeper.

Digitized by Google

He glanced away, as though he saw something . . . across the street.

Taylor did not catch his answer but was quite sure it was in the affirmative for the girl quickly used the feminine expression: "It is awful. I would rather die."

Again Rutherford's response was inaudible; then they walked on in silence until "Glenmora" was reached.

The depression evident on both their faces must have had another cause than their parting, which was for but a few hours. That cause, Taylor decided, could be but one—the bank robbery.

"They may have conspired to take the money for themselves and now that the deed is done are filled with alarm, and perhaps remorse. Consummated crime is not half as rosy as imagination paints it."

The moon came out from behind the clouds and showed Charles Bryant smoking on the verandah. He was evidently waiting for his niece.

Seeing him, and in view of the lateness of the hour, Rutherford parted with his fiancée at the gate, instead of accompanying her to the door. Mr. Bryant waved his hand in salutation to his employé, who returned it in a somewhat more subdued style, but neither spoke.

"I hope he doesn't recognise me," thought Taylor, who had made a few unimportant changes in his personal appearance. "Rutherford is more likely to identify me."

The halt of the young couple for a few seconds at the gate caused the detective to pass close by them. While doing so he glanced away, as though he saw something which interested him across the street. There was silence between them while he was nearest them, but just before he came up and immediately after they exchanged a few sentences.

"You haven't uttered a word, Frank, to anyone?"

"No, and shall not."

"Do you think he suspects?"

"I am sure he does not."

"You are certain there is nothing in your manner likely to arouse his suspicions?"

"I could not be more careful. Little does he think that I never slept a wink last night, and will not fare much better to-night."

"Be sure to rest in the day then. You must not let your health suffer, you——"

These were the last words that Taylor caught. He heard the murmur of voices, but nothing further intelligible. Still looking across the street, as though his interest centred there, he was able, over his shoulder, to watch the lovers.

Miss Denton, after bidding her escort an affectionate good-night, passed through the gate which he held open for her. He lifted his hat, turned round and walked rapidly towards his home. The detective would have been glad to follow him, for he was in the mood to believe that the least trifle might give him one of the clues that he was seeking. Such a course, however, would have been imprudent. Rutherford would notice the act, and it would arouse his suspicion. The first duty of the detective in shadowing a person is to make certain that he himself is neither shadowed nor an object of suspicion to the one under surveillance.

Taylor walked on until he arrived at Cross Street. A few minutes brought him within a stone's throw of Rutherford's abode. Sauntering along in the same aimless manner, Taylor remained upon the opposite side of the street with his whole attention fixed upon the cottage where lived the suspected young man.

Digitized by Google

No one was in sight. The lower part of the house was in darkness, but a light shone from the upper front room. A quick glance to right and left showed Taylor that he was still alone. Stepping back into the shadow of the doorway of a shop, where the glare of the street lamp could not reach him, the detective waited and watched. If the young man was in his room, the light would soon be extinguished; if it continued, he was not there. The blind was down so that even had the position of the watcher been more favourable, he could not have caught a glimpse of the interior.

Five, ten minutes passed, and there was no change. Then the shadow of a person suddenly appeared on the blind, passing across it like a figure on a magic-lantern slide, but it was a woman's form. Brief as was the glance he caught, the watcher recognised it as the outline of an elderly person.

"It's his mother," was the conclusion, "she is waiting for him."

As if in confirmation, the blind was now hastily drawn up and the figure of the old lady was seen for a minute as she looked out on the still, spring night. Her action was that of one expecting the coming of someone who came not.

Taylor shrank back, though he knew it was impossible for anyone in her position to see him. The woman waited but a moment, and then withdrew after pulling down the blind.

"He hasn't returned home. Where can he be?"

Manifestly nothing was to be gained by staying where he was in the shadow of the door, so Taylor decided to carry out the original purpose he had in view when he left the hotel. He took a step forward, but as he did so, someone approached and he drew back. It was a policeman not a dozen paces distant. The detective was annoyed for this boded trouble. His position was such that the officer was likely to call him to account and probably take him into custody. Nothing serious would result beyond inconvenience and delay. If he were compelled to give an account of himself, and it should not prove satisfactory, he had only to appeal to Mr. Bryant, whose word would secure his release, but to be locked up would interfere with several plans he had in mind.

The lumbering policeman rushed after him.

He therefore shrank back as far as he could in the shadow of the door, hoping the guardian of the peace would pass him unnoticed. So he did, in his slow swinging step, looking neither to the right nor to the left and probably seeing nothing. All would have gone well but for an unexpected occurrence. The officer had passed a little way when the window directly above Taylor's head was raised.

"Hi, there," called out a guarded voice to the policeman. He stopped short and looked in the direction whence the voice came.

"What is it?" he asked.

"He's in the doorway below."

"Who?"

"The burglar; he's been there half-an-hour trying to pick my lock. Quick, and you've got him!"

His eyes were fixed on the entrance to the bank.

Taylor was plainly in for it. He saw he must do one of two things. Wait and quietly surrender, with a night's incarceration as a certainty, or make a dash for liberty. On a spurt he could run a short distance with anyone, and so decided on the latter course. Darting out of the door, he sped down the street like a deer. A couple of shrill whistles, and the lumbering policeman rushed after him. The fugitive knew he could distance his pursuer in a fair race, but he dreaded being stopped by the other officers who were sure to be attracted by the whistling. His previous acquaintance with the town now served him well. After running a short way he darted across the street. As in a dream he noticed the raising of windows, the thrusting out of heads, and the excitement caused by the whistle, but he was fast gaining on his pursuer.

Darting round the first corner, he slowed down to a walk. He was in danger of meeting some other policeman who, if he saw him running, would certainly call him to account. A quick glance showed Taylor that his fears had been ungrounded, and he indulged in another run that quickly took him to the next corner which he passed at the same deliberate pace as before. It was well he did so, for within a yard or two he came face to face with a blue-coated officer.

The latter scrutinised him sharply, and to forestall any troublesome questions, the detective remarked:

"I think I heard a whistle. Did you notice it?"

"Where have you come from, young man?" asked the policeman in turn, not fully satisfied with his question.

"I came from round the corner."

"Well, what's your name then?"

"I'm Alfred Rollett, commercial traveller for the best clothing firm in the United Kingdom. If you can help me get the order for the suits of the Force in Middlewick, I'll make it all right with you. Do you think it worth your while?"

"Go on with you," replied the constable, hastening in the direction indicated.

Taylor resumed his walk and was soon beyond danger of further molestation.

A quarter of an hour later he passed slowly by the bank which had been the scene of so striking an occurrence less than forty-eight hours before. This was the objective point of his excursion.

Glancing up and down the street, he paused for a moment, but just then a pedestrian came in sight walking quickly. Taylor continued his stroll until the stranger disappeared, when he stood still for a minute, looking keenly up and down the street. The coast at last seemed clear and he again walked briskly towards the bank. When opposite, he glanced sharply to right and left, and gave a low whistle, to which the response was immediate and satisfactory.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER IV.

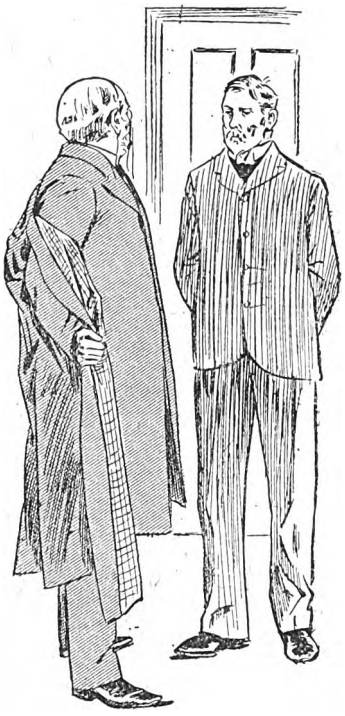
"Sh!"

The reply to the detective's guarded signal was a soft, creaking sound, as if made by the cautious opening of a door. His eyes were fixed on the entrance to the bank under the glare of the street lamp. He was not mistaken when he fancied he saw one half move gently inwards, as if drawn by the hand of a person standing behind it. Taylor whistled softly again, and the door moved back further, dimly showing the face of a man through the opening.

The detective stepped briskly up the stone steps, and into the bank as though he were the shadow of one of the drifting clouds overhead. Then the door once more closed behind him, and the key grated gently in the lock.

"It's all right," whispered the new watchman; "I've been on the look-out for you for some time, and I made sure no one saw you."

The man led the way to the manager's room, where, as in various other parts of the bank, a dim light was burning. The blinds were down, so that the sharpest eyes could detect nothing from the outside. Seating themselves by the table, the two men began to talk softly together. Not once did their voices reach the pitch that anyone attempting to listen from the street could have caught the faint hum and murmur of the speakers.



Commenced pulling off his overcoat.

For fully half-an-hour their conversation continued. Had Mr. Bryant known of it he would certainly have doubted the detective's singleness of purpose when he so heartily assured him he had done the right thing in accepting Burton on the mere strength of a written testimonial.

The couple were still talking when both were startled by someone fumbling at the outer lock, as if seeking admittance. As would have been natural, the two men, after the first shock, were as cool as before.

"That's the Manager," said Burton.

"It will hardly do for him to find me here," observed the detective, glancing round for some place of concealment; "I'll wait in there till he's gone," he added, pointing to the cupboard in which he had taken refuge that same afternoon.

He stepped inside and drew the door after him.

"He may take a fancy to look in there," remarked the watchman, turning, as he spoke, the key in the lock, and placing it in his pocket. Then he went to the front door, where the fumbling at the lock was still plainly audible. Whoever the visitor was he could not open the door, for the good reason that the watchman's key was on the inside.

"Who's there?" Burton demanded in a gruff tone.

"It is I, Mr. Bryant," was the reply.

"Step back from the door so that I can have a look at you," demanded Burton. "I must know it's you before you come in here at this time of night."

The Manager did as requested and the watchman recognised him—as, in fact, he had done the moment he spoke. The key was turned and once more the door was drawn inward.

"Have you anybody with you?" the watchman asked, peering out into the dimly-lighted street.

"I am alone."

The guardian of the building relocked the door and then faced his superior with a look and manner which plainly asked his business in coming to the bank at that unseemly hour.

"I am so disturbed over the robbery," Mr. Bryant explained, "that I cannot sleep. You will excuse me when I say that, despite the high recommendations you brought, I did not feel quite easy concerning you. I therefore decided to come down and see how things are for myself."

As he spoke, he walked to his room, and took the very chair that had been occupied a few minutes before by the detective who was now concealed within half-a-dozen feet of him.

"Well, and are you satisfied?" inquired the watchman with the assurance of a man who knows that there can be but one answer to his question.

"Quite," replied the Manager, leaning back in his chair with a weary air. "That was a good idea of yours making me step away so that you could see me before allowing me to enter."

"Yes, a good thing for you."

"What do you mean?"

"Had you not done as I requested, I would have opened the door about a couple of inches and put a bullet through you."

"But supposing there had been two or three of us?"

"Each of the five chambers of my revolver is loaded. I don't think I would have missed with them all."

The self-confidence with which this was said won the admiration of the manager.

"You'll do," was his comment. "If Warren had been half as watchful last night, the Middlewick Bank would be better off by twenty thousand pounds than it is at present."

As Mr. Bryant spoke, he commenced pulling off his overcoat. As was his custom, he stepped to the cupboard to hang it on one of the pegs within. He evidently intended to spend a considerable time at the bank.

"Bless me," he exclaimed, on finding the door locked; "that is too bad, but I have a key in my pocket." He drew out a bunch and tried one after another, while the detective on the inside prepared himself for the meeting. The watchman waited with a grim smile, carefully concocting the exclamation he intended giving at the presence of his visitor when he should be discovered.

But none of the keys fitted, and Mr. Bryant returned them to his pocket.

"It makes no difference," he remarked, proceeding to don his coat again, with the watchman's assistance. "There's no occasion for me to stop here.

"Come and lock the front door after me. I'm satisfied with you."

The watchman did as requested, bade his employer "good-night," locked the big front door behind him, and then returned and released the detective.

"Confound it," exclaimed the latter, as he stepped into view, with a flushed face. "If I'd been in there ten minutes longer it would have been a choice between kicking the door open or smothering to death. The old fellow would have been startled, but I think we could have satisfied him everything was all right."

Digitized by Google

"There would have been but little trouble about that. You could have pleaded the same errand as he, and that,

It was a letter.

on hearing me open the door to someone you slipped in there to note what might be said. But it would have been awkward to have explained how the key came to be lost and why you didn't come forth on finding who the caller was. On the whole, I am glad he didn't discover you."

"So am I," assented the detective.

Instead of departing, as it would seem Taylor might have done, now that his business with the watchman was finished, he resumed his former seat, and the two continued to smoke until past midnight. Finally, the detective arose, yawned, flung away his cigar, and said he would go back to the hotel where he had engaged quarters the night before.

The two strolled leisurely from the manager's room along the open space behind the counter and paused a few minutes in front of the heavy outer doors. It was profoundly still, and they spoke in even lower tones than they were accustomed to use.

"Sh!" suddenly exclaimed the watchman, raising his hand, "there's someone on the steps again." The noise was faint, but both heard the cautious footsteps of a person walking up the three steps that led to the bank entrance.

They were all attention, when an almost inaudible rustling caught their ears. Still listening intently, the watchman suddenly gripped the arm of his companion and pointed to the bottom of the door. Something white gleamed there, and was coming into plainer view each moment. It was a letter which someone was stealthily pushing under the door from outside.

"Quick! Be ready to follow him," whispered Burton.

The watchman quickly turned the big key and drew back the heavy door of the bank, but, despite long practice, there was necessarily a slight delay, for such heavy objects cannot be snatched to and fro like ordinary doors.

Without stopping to notice the letter at his feet, the detective rushed through the opening directly it was presented and was soon outside.

He expected to see the fleeing figure, but a hasty glance round showed no one in sight. He stood irresolute, undecided what to do.

Meanwhile the watchman had been more observant. Middlewick Bank stood at a corner. The party who pushed the letter under the door completed the action before the watchman turned the key. Indeed he must have been moving off even as the grating sound warned him of his danger. Instead of darting up, down or across the street, he whisked round the corner.

Fearful lest the detective should blunder, Burton thrust his head through the partly open door and called: "He's gone to the left. Quick and you'll catch him."

"Why didn't I think of that?" muttered Taylor, following the proffered advice.

The faint moonlight and the nearest lamp gave out slight illumination, but he caught a glimpse of a shadowy figure vanishing in the distance, and was after it like a deer. The detective had little doubt of his ability to run down any ordinary fugitive.

But the race had barely begun when it ended. Before the pursuer had well seen his man, he was out of sight. Thinking he might have darted into a doorway, or behind some object for concealment, the detective continued, though at a moderate pace. Suddenly he observed someone coming towards him sauntering slowly along. Taylor instantly slowed down to an ordinary walking pace, his purpose being not to alarm the other into a renewal of his flight.

The newcomer proved to be one of the town police, his height, looks and manner proving he was not the individual whom the detective was so anxious to meet.

"That tale won't do."

"Would you be kind enough to tell me whether you saw a man running just now?" asked Taylor courteously.

"Yes, sir, I did," was the gruff response.

"Where is he—which way did he go?"

"The chap I saw running is the one that I'm talking to,

Digitized by Google

and I want to know what's the meaning of it all? If I ain't mistaken, I've met you before, sir."

"Perhaps you did, but I saw a suspicious-looking fellow a few minutes ago who I think was after my watch."

"That tale won't do," warned the policeman. "I'll let you off this time, but if you don't go straight home, I'll run you in at once."

"You're rather down on a man," said the detective, assuming a meekness which he was far from feeling, "but I'll take your advice. Good-night."

"It's just as well for you," said the constable, walking on in the direction of the bank.

The detective saw that he had made a bad impression and he dared not return to the watchman until he was sure the way was clear. Evidently the policeman was only too anxious to carry out his threat if he only could find an excuse for doing so.

But it was easy for the detective to avoid another meeting with him. He turned into a by-street, going over the route he had traversed several times that evening, until, confident that the way was once more clear, he came back to the vicinity of the bank.

The watchman was on the look-out for him. Once more the signal was promptly answered by the opening of the door, and, as cleverly as before, he entered the building, where the couple again made their way to the room they had lately occupied.

"What a blunder," exclaimed Taylor, as he dropped into a chair. "Instead of darting round the corner, the instant I was outside, I stood staring like an idiot, until the fellow had time to get beyond my reach."

"Did you see nothing of him?"

"Only a parting glimpse, and the next minute I barely missed running into a policeman. Do you think he could have been the one who put the letter under the door?"

"Policemen have been known to be mixed up in all sorts of shady affairs, but the man whom I saw bolt round the corner was not an officer."

"Did you see him?"

"No, it wasn't necessary to do so to be sure of that. Those men wear heavy boots, and some few of them can run on a spurt, but this man, whoever he was, had on slippers. He may have darted into some opening door which was waiting for him, in case of danger."

"But what about the letter?"

The watchman had already broken the seal and read the missive. He passed it to the detective, who, turning up the light, read the following:

Mr. Manajer Brient or hum it mai consern.

Weeve got the twenti thowsand pounds, and you can wisel for it. Harf a lofe is beter than know bred, and if yule call orf yore dogs and akt squar, weel giv yu bak 3 parts of the swag. Thats leting you orf cheep, & the onli chans yule ever get of geting any of the chink bak agane. If you agree, mark a cross in chawk on the front of the bank dore after bizness ours. It need not be a bigg won too attrakt attenshun; weel see it and akt squar. If yu doant, yoov seene the larst of yer thowsands, and its know gude tri-ing enny trix on us.

WUN OF EM.

"That shows," remarked Taylor, "that in spite of the cleverness of the job, they're novices to this business."

"What makes you think that?" inquired the watchman.

"Why do they offer to return three parts of the plunder after saying that they have it all so secure that it cannot be taken from them? It shows that they are afraid of being caught and are anxious to compromise the matter."

"Perhaps in some way they have discovered that their friend, Detective Taylor, has taken charge of the business," replied the watchman with a smile.

"If that were the case, they would withdraw the offer after my performance this evening. No, it's a blind; but can you make anything of the handwriting?"

"It's disguised, of course, and the spelling is too bad to be genuine. Here, wait a second."

Taking out his penknife the watchman drew the keen blade along the crease made by folding the letter and handed one half to the detective.

"That'll be enough for you. I'll see what I can do with the rest."

Each carefully folded and put away his portion. The detective also appropriating the envelope.

"Time's getting on," said the latter, once more rising to his feet. "I'll go to the hotel. If anything turns up, you can come and see me there. Probably I'll be here to-morrow night."

"Wait a minute," said the watchman, walking to the front door with the detective. "It would be rather awkward for you to run into that policeman again. Let's reconnoitre a bit." Each approached a window, and moved the blinds so as to peep out without being observed.

"Alf," whispered Burton a minute later. "Look over at the other corner and tell me whether there is anyone there."

The detective did so, and a minute later answered: "There's a man standing there."

"And he's watching the bank. I shouldn't be surprised if he is the gentleman who beat you in the race a little while ago."

"If that's the case, I will try it again," remarked the detective, fixing his gaze upon the opposite corner.

(To be continued.)

RESULT OF PICTURE-PUZZLE.

The Puzzle Picture which appeared in Short Stories, dated February 22nd, appears to have been as difficult of solution as its predecessor was easy. The consequence is that no one has been successful in putting all the parts of the picture together in their correct places. The gentleman coming nearest the solution is Mr. H. S. Uhlrich, Bryntirion, Chelsfield, Kent, whose attempt has eleven squares in the wrong places, and a cheque for £10 has been forwarded to him. The competitors, whose names are appended, have succeeded in getting within eighteen squares, or fewer, of the correct solution, and to each of them a gold-plated pencil-case has been awarded as a consolation prize.

W. J. Eglinton, Esq., 2, Burtop Rd., Lower Tooting; Mrs. A. Heath, 203, Farrant Avenue, Noel Pk., Wood Gn.; A. Sproat, 17, Elm Grove, Eccles New Rd., Weaste, Manchester; V. Tudor, 29, Fordingley Rd., Paddington, W.; Mrs. Armstrong, 17, Elm Grove, Eccles New Rd., Weaste, Manchester; B. Green, 57, Albert Mansions, South Lambeth Rd., S.W.; J. Boyle, 15, Union Pl., Perth Rd., Dundee; C. H. Fisher, 127, Mornington Rd., Leytonstone; Miss E. Fisher, 127, Mornington Rd., Leytonstone; G. Smith, 39, Roseville Terrace, Roundhay Rd., Leeds; Miss B. Doyle, 9, Waverley Rd., Harrow Rd., Paddington; Miss M. A. Smith, 110, Palace Gar. Terr., W.; W. Elliot, 6, Greek St., Soho Sq., W.; F. W. Leurs, Oswald Rd., Oswestry, Salop; F. Hodge, 1, Springfield Gar., Upper Clapton; J. G. Moore, 5, London Grange, Princes Rd., Liverpool; Master F. Prichett, 44, Crozier St., Lambeth; D. Denholm, 153, West George St., Glasgow; R. Robertson, 167, Perth Rd., Dundee; J. R. Parker, 77, Brackenbury Rd., Preston, Lancashire; M. Parker, 77, Brackenbury Rd., Preston, Lancashire; J. A. Kennedy, 11, Blindgate St., Coleraine, Ireland; W. Davis, 41, Shankhill Rd., Belfast; T. Alexander, 2, Astbury Rd., S.E.; G. Stenlake, 9, Paradise Pl., Stoke, Devonport; W. G. Brown, 364, West Green Rd., Tottenham; Mrs. E. Brooks, 32, Claremont Rd., Alexandra Pk., Manchester; W. Matthes, 9, Regina Rd., Tollington Pk., London; J. King, 25, Belfast St., West Brighton; G. S. L. Gore, 23, Gay St., Bath.

84	56	42	20	26	59	38	45
12	32	64	22	86	40	29	67
27	60	52	21	31	19	4	14
69	34	63	82	9	62	64	47
28	3	37	76	23	7	87	85
36	53	50	17	30	2	79	70
73	55	24	38	6	57	16	81
8	46	44	25	42	77	39	66
13	1	51	43	18	88	10	24
71	48	41	5	58	61	80	74
15	11	68	83	33	78	54	62

Digitized by Google

LEGENDS OF WOLFVILLE.

BY "DAN QUINN."

Wolfville is a Cattleman's Settlement in Arizona, and the Characters in these Legends are Cowboys.

No. 8.—The Story of Wilkins.

"No; I don't reckon I ever cuts the trail of this yere Wilson you mentions once. If I does, the fact's done pulled its picket pin, an' strayed from my recollections."

I had recalled the name of a former friend, one Wilson, who, sore given to liquor, had drifted to Arizona many years before and disappeared. Suggesting the name to the old cattle-man, I had asked if he had met such a name and character in his Wolfville rambles, and received the above reply.

As often chanced, however, the question bore fruit in a story. It frequently needed but a slight blow from the rod of casual inquiry, and the fountains of my old friend's reminiscences gushed forth.

"No, I never crosses up with him," observed the old cattle-man; "but speakin' of Wilson puts in my mind a gent by the name of Wilkins, who, it's some likely, is as disrepootable as your old pard Wilson."

"What about Wilkins?" I asked. "Any story with him?"

"Nothin' thrillin'," answered the old gentleman; "nothin' you'd stay up nights to hear, I don't reckon. It's Wilkins' daughter who's the only redeemin' thing about the old Cimmarron; an' it's a heap likely right now it's her I remembers about instead of him.

"Not at all," he continued. "I don't mind onfoldin' as to Wilkins, nor yet of an' concernin' his daughter. You see, this Wilkins is herdin' round Wolfville when I first trails in. I never does know where he hails from. I don't reckon, though, that he ever does grade no ways high, an' at the crisis I'm mentionin' his speshul play is gettin' drunk mostly, an' not allowin' to hurt himself none with work.

"'Workin' with your fins,' says Wilkins, 'is low an' onendoorin' to a gent with pride to wound. It ain't no use, neither. I knows folks as works an' folks as don't, an' you can't tell one from which. They gets along entirely similar.'

"'But how you goin' to live?' says Dave Tutt, when he makes this remark once, an' who is fussin' with Wilkins for bein' so ridiculous and shiftless.

"'That's all right about my livin',' says Wilkins; 'don't you all pass restless nights on my account. Go read your Scriptures; read that bluff about feedin' the young ravens an' sparrows. Well, that's me this trip. I'm goin' to rap for a show down on them promises, an' see what's in 'em.'

"'The camp ain't long on Scripture, nohow,' says Dave Tutt, 'an' I'm short partic'lar. It's your game, though, an' your American jedgment goes soopreme as to how you plays it.'

"This yere Wilkins lives in a wickey-up out on the aidge of town, an' a girl, which she's his daughter, about nineteen years old, keeps camp for him. No one knows her well. She stays on her reservation mighty close, an' never seems to show much in town. I notices her in the Store once, buyin' some salt hoss, an' she ain't no dream of loveliness, neither, as to looks.

"Her face makes you feel she's a good people, though, with her big soft eyes. They has a tired, broke-down look, like somehow she's been packed more'n she can carry, an' has two or three notions about layin' down with the load.

"It's mebby two weeks after Cherokee Hall plugs the man from Red Dog one day when we're all in the Red Light takin' our forty drops. Sam Enrich brings up this subject of Wilkins.

"'It has been a question with me,' he says, 'how this old shorthorn and his girl manages for to make out, an' while I care none whatever for Wilkins, it ain't no credit to a live camp like this to permit a young female to suffer, an' I pauses here to add it ain't goin' to be so no more. Yesterday, allowing to bushwhack some truth about 'em, I waits till I sees old Wilkins start over to the corral, and then I goes projectin' round for the facts. I works it plenty cunnin', an' sorter happens up to the old man's tepee. I calls the girl out an' puts it up I wants to see her paw a heap on some business.

"'I wants to meet him speshul,' I says.

"'Well, he ain't here now,' says the girl, 'so whatever'l you do?'

"'I don't reckon you could prance round some an' find him for me, could you, Miss?' I says.

"'So the girl,' continued Enright, 'which her name is Susan, she says, puts on her shaker an' goes stampedin' off, an' while she's gone I injuns and spies round a whole lot, an' comin' down to the turn, Wilkins and that girl ain't got a blame thing to eat. The question now is, what action does Wolfville take at a juncture sech as this?'

"'What's the matter with takin' up a donation like they does for a preacher an' give it to the girl?' says Dan Boggs.

"'You couldn't open your game that away, nohow,' says Doc. Peets. 'That's all accordin' to Hoyle for sky pilots and missionary people, but a young female a holdin' of herse'f high would refuse your money. Thar's nothin' ketches me like a female of my species in distress, an' I minds offerin' to stake a lady who's lost her money somehow back in St. Louis once. This yere female was strange to me entire, but if she had knowed me from way back she couldn't a blazed up more frightful. The minute I pulls my money on her she goes cavortin' off too hostile to talk. It takes me ten minutes to get her back to the agency to apologise, an' even then she glares an' snorts like she's liable to stampede again. No, you don't want to try an' give this girl no money. What we needs is to hunt up something for her to work at an' pay her for it.'

Digitized by Google

"'The Doc.'s right,' says Enright; 'an' the thing is to find something for this yere lady to do. Any member with a notion on the subject can't speak too quick.'

"'No gent need take my remarks as personal,' says Burns, who runs the Red Light, 'as nothin' invidious is intended, but I rises to say that a heap of my business is on credit. A man comes in free an' sociable, names his sozodont, an' gets it. If he pays cash, all right.

"'"You names your day to drink, an' you names your day to pay," is my motto, as you all knows. This bein' true, under present exigencies what for a scheme would it be for me to get an outfit of books, day books, week books, ledgers, an' the rest of the lay-out, an' let this yere girl keep 'em a whole lot? I throws out this as a suggestion.'

"'I ain't a-meanin' nothin' against Burns' suggestion,' says Texas Thompson, 'but in my opinion this camp ain't ripe for keepin' books as yet. Things like that havin' to be lived up to by degrees. I've knowed a heap of trouble come from keepin' books, an' as long as we've a peaceful camp let's keep it that away.'

"'That settles it,' says Burns; 'thar's enough said, an' I don't keep no books.'

"'You alls present knows me,' says Cherokee Hall, who turns faro in the Red Light, 'an' most of you has met me frequent in a business way. Thar's my game goin' every night reg'lar. Thar's nothin' tin horn about it. It ain't no skin game neither. Any gent with doubts can step across the street an' test my box, which he'll find sittin' all comfortable on the layout a waitin' his convenience. It ain't been usual for me to blow my own bazoo to any extent, an' I only does it now as being preliminary to the statement that my game ain't no dead fall, an' is one as a respectable an' virchus female could set in on with perfect safetiood to her reputation. This yere lady in question needs light, reg'lar employment, an' I lets it fly that if she wants in on any sech deal I'll pay her fifty dollars a week to hold down the chair as lookout for my game.'

"'Cherokee's offer is all right,' says Enright; 'it's good talk from a square man. Women, however, is partic'lar, an', like horses, they shies at a heap of things thar ain't no danger in. You sees, a woman doesn't reason nothing. She jest feels, an' mighty likely this young person is loaded to the guard with notions against gamblin' an' sech as would send her flyin' at the bare mention. The fact is, I thinks of somethin' similar, but has to give it up. I figgers, first dash out of the box, that a safe, easy trail to high ground is to give her a table an' let her deal a little "stud" for the boys. This yere wouldn't be no risk, an' is a shore thing for nine or ten dollars a night. Bein' a benevolence, I know the boys would set in mighty free, an' the trouble would be corralled right thar. With this yere in my mind I tips her gently about our various game when I calls for her paw; an', to tell the truth, she takes it reluctant an' disgusted at the mere idee. Of course, we has to stand these things from women, so we might as well p'int up some other way. an' no time lost.'

"'Don't you all reckon for to make a special rake on all poker goin' same as about that Yaller House man might be an ondefeasible way to get at the neck of this business?' says Dave Tutt. 'I merely asks it as a question.'

"'That wouldn't do,' says Doc. Peets. 'But, anyhow, here comes Wilkins now, an' if, as Enright says, they're out of chuck up his way something ought to be done at once, an' I guess I'll jest lose a small bet to the old shorthorn until such time as we devises some scheme all reg'lar.'

"'Hello, Wilkins!' says Doc., mighty gay an' genial, 'how's things stackin' up?'

"'Mighty ornary,' says Wilkins.

"'Feel like makin' a bet?' says Doc.

"'What do you all want to bet at?' says Wilkins.

"'Oh,' says Doc. Peets, 'I'm feelin' a heap careless about what I do bet at. S'pose I goes you ten dollars' worth of grub the Lordsburg buckboard don't show up none to-day?'

"'If I had ten dollars I'd about call you a lot on that,' says Wilkins, 'but I'm a poor cuss, an' ain't got no Red Light whisky chips you ain't usin', be you? S'pose you all look in your bags and sees. I'm needin' of a drink mighty bad.'

"The man looks some queer about the eyes, an' more'n usual shaky, so we gives him a big drink, an' he sorter braces up.

"'I'll back Wilkins' end of that bet you offers, Doc.,' says Tutt, 'so consider it made, will you?'

"'You are offerin' to bet grub,' says the old man, powerful peevish and fretful, 'what for do you want to bet grub? Why don't you bet money, so I gets what I wants with it? It's my money when I wins. Mebby I don't want no grub. Mebby I wants clothes, tobacco, or whisky. You ain't no sport, Doc., to go for to tie up a bet with a string like that. Gimme another drink, someone. I'm most dyin' for some.'

"The old man 'pears like he's mighty sick that away, so thar's nothin' for it but to give him another hooker, which we does accordin'.

"'I'm feelin' like I was shot hard by something,' he says, 'an' I don't like for to go home till I'm better, an' scare Sue. I reckon I'll sorter camp down on this monte table for an hour till I comes round.' So Wilkins curls up on the table, an' no one notices him for twenty minutes, when along comes rattlin' up the Lordsburg mail.

"'You wins the bet, Wilkins,' says Peets. 'Come over to the store, and cut out your stuff.'

"The old man acts like he don't hear, so Doc. shakes him up some. No use; thar ain't no get up in him.

"'Looks like he's gone to sleep for good,' says Doc.

"Then he walks round him, shakes him, an' takes a look at his eye, a-openin' it with his finger. Finally he stands back, sticks his thumbs in his belt, an' whistles surprised like.

"'What's up?' says Cherokee Hall. 'He ain't tryin' to work us for another drink, I hopes?'

"'Well, this is a deal,' says Doc. 'Ain't no humbug neither. Gents, I'm blessed if this yere old prairie dog ain't shorely up an' died.'

"We all comes up an' takes a look at him, an' Doc. had called the turn. Shore enough, there the old man lay, too dead to skin.

"'This is a hoss on us, an' no doubt about it,' says Enright. 'I ain't worryin' for Wilkins, as he most likely is ahead on the deal, but what gets me is how to break the news to this yere maiden. It's goin' to be a mighty hair-play. I reckons, Doc., you an' me better see to it ourselves.'

Digitized by Google

"So they goes over to Wilkins' wickey-up an' calls the young girl out, an' Enright begins tellin' her mighty soft an' good as how her paw is took bad down to the Red Light, but the girl seems to get it as right as if she sets picket for it a month.

"'He's dead,' she says, an' then she cripples all down alongside of the door an' begins to sob.

"'Thar ain't no use denyin' it, Miss,' says Enright, 'your paw struck in on the big trail, where the hoof prints all p'int one way. But don't take it too hard, Miss, thar ain't a man of us don't give you sympathy. What you do now is to stay right yere, an' the camp'll tend to the funeral an' get it up right an' jest as you say, you bein' mourner-in-chief. You can trust us for the proper plung; since we buries Jack King, obsequies is our long suit.'

"The little woman struggles through somehow, an' has her nerve with her. The funeral you bet is right. We ropes in a preacher, this time belongin' to some deep-water outfit over in Tucson. He somehow gets strayed, an' happens along our way square on the call, an' he jumps in an' gives them ceremonies a scientific whirl as ain't possible nohow to amateurs. All 'round we couldn't put on more dog if we'd been plantin' Enright; all, of course, on the little girl's account. Next day the outfit goes over to see her, to find out whatever she allows to do.

"'You see, Miss,' says Enright, 'anything you say goes. Not waitin' to learn its name even, I'm directed to say as how the camp backs your play an' makes everything good.'

"'I'm allowin' to go to the States,' says the girl, 'an' I'm obliged to you.'

"'We was hopin',' says Enright, 'as how you'd stay here. We sorter figgers you'd teach us a school or somethin'. Of course, thar ain't no papooses here yet, but as a forced play we arranges to borrow a small herd from Tombstone, an' can do it, too, easy. Then agin, a night school would catch us right; say one night a week. Thar's a heap of ignorant men in this yere camp as needs a night school bad. It would pan for fifty dollars a week, Miss, an' you thinks of it.'

"No, the poor girl couldn't think of it, nohow.

"'Of course, Miss,' says Enright, 'we ain't expectin' you to open this yere academy the first card off the deck. You nacheral needs time to line up your affairs, an' am likewise wrung with grief. You takes your leisure as to that. Meanwhile, of course, your pay goes on from now.'

"But the girl couldn't listen. Her paw had died, an' now she was due in the States. She says things is all right thar. She has friends as her paw never likes, but who's friends of her all the same. She'll go to them.

"'Well, Miss,' says Enright, mighty regretful, 'if that's how it lays I reckons you'll go, so thar's nothing for us to do but settle up an' pay you some dust we owes your paw. He bein' gone, of course, you represents.'

"The girl couldn't see how anyone owes her paw 'cause he's been too sick to work,' she says.

"'We owes him, all the same,' says Enright, mighty brief and ferocious. 'We understands well enough how we comes to owe him, don't we, Doc.?'

"'You bet your life we do,' says Doc., plenty prompt an' cheerful. 'We owes it for his nailin' them hoss thiefs when they trys to clean out the corral.'

"'That's it,' says Enright, 'for ketchin' of some rustlers as lays for our stock. It's all right, Miss, you needn't look so doubtful, you wouldn't if you knows this camp. It's the last outfit on earth as would go an' give money to people. It's a good straight camp, Wolfville is, but business is business, an' it ain't givin' nothin' away, be we, Doc.?'

"'Not much,' says Doc. 'It's enough for people to pay their debts, without stampedin' round givin' things away.'

"'That's whatever,' says Enright. 'So, Miss, me an' Doc.'ll vamos over to the Red Light an' get the dust, an' I reckons we'll be back in an hour. I s'pose we owes Mr. Wilkins about 500 dollars, don't we, Doc.?'

"'Tain't so much,' says Doc., mighty guileful, as he sees the girl archin' for another buck, so he pulls out a paper an' makes a bluff. 'Here it is—493.74 dollars. I puts it down all ackerate 'cause I don't allow no one to come round an' beat me none.'

"We all comes 'round an' makes up the pot to come up to Doc.'s figgers (which I wants to say right here Doc. Peets is the best edicated man I ever sees), an' the girl has to take it.

"Of course, this money lets her out right, an' she cries an' thanks us, an' the next day she takes the stage for Tucson. We're all thar to say good-bye an' wish the little girl luck.

"'Adios,' says Peets, takin' off his hat to her; 'it ain't down on the bills, but if you could manage to kiss this yare outfit once apiece, Miss, it would be regarded. You needn't be afraid, none. Some of 'em looks a little off, but they're all right, an' b'ar huggin' is barred.'

"So the little girl begins with Enright an' kisses us all, a-sobbin' meantime some free. As the affection proceeds Cherokee hangs back an' allows he'll pass.

"'Not any pass,' says Enright. 'Any man who throws off on kissin' that thar girl, she willin', needn't look for any luck but lynchin'.'

"'That settles it,' says Cherokee, 'I kissen this yere lady.'

"So he ups an' kisses the girl sorter hasty, like she's a hot flat-iron, an' backs into the crowd.

"'Cherokee makes me weary,' says Peets, who's ridin' herd on the play. When it comes his turn he kisses her slow an' rapturus, an' then looks contemptuous at Cherokee.

"When she's in the stage a-startin' Cherokee walks up all respectful.

"'You've been away from the States some time, Miss,' he says, 'an it's some possible you won't find things the way you expects. Now, you remember, shore, whatever game's bein' turned back there, if it goes ag'in you raise the long yell for a sharp called Cherokee Hall, an' his bank's yours to go behind your play.'"

Digitized by Google

A Trial in Fiction

There is a time in the life of nearly every educated person when he feels that fierce, unconquerable desire to write—to put into words for the benefit of coming generations such thoughts and fancies as may occur to him or to her.

And, indeed, I believe one may wish to write without even possessing the thoughts to embody in one's effusions, so great is the fascination of seeing one's own writings in print.

To this curious malady I became an early victim. And the acceptance of an occasional poem by various weekly papers added fresh fuel to the unquenchable fire of literary ambition. At twenty-two I occupied a minor editorial position on a daily paper, and had had one or two stories accepted by one of the great magazines. Consequently, I began to feel rather important in a literary way, and this tendency was decidedly encouraged by compliments, sincere and otherwise, of those with whom I came in contact.

One of these, and one who from its beginning had taken a warm interest in my literary work, was a girl—Miss Katherine Merry. I had known Miss Merry almost from childhood and had always had considerable admiration for her. I looked upon her as entirely different from the other girls of my acquaintance. She was rather intellectual in her tastes, very fond of reading, and had even published some very creditable verses, although she was my junior by two years. She was not a girl to flirt with, and she absolutely disliked compliments. That is, she really did dislike them, differing in this respect from the majority of women, who may affect to despise flattery, but who are none the less susceptible to its influence. She and I were hail-fellow-well-met together to a more or less degree. We understood each other very well, were interested in each other's projects, and enjoyed comparing notes over our failures and successes.

One night, when it so happened that we were both dining at the same house, the conversation turned upon that much-mooted question as to whether such a thing as a platonic love were possible. Miss Merry and myself both argued warmly for the affirmative, and probably we each thought of our mutual friendship as an instance, although upon that point we kept silent, contenting ourselves with mentioning historic cases.

The other side, however, probably because those who constituted it were better informed and more able to express their ideas, had somewhat the best of the argument, and Miss Merry and I, although still unconvinced, were compelled to withdraw from the battle.

I walked home with the Merrys afterwards, and while her father and mother went ahead, Miss Merry and I strolled slowly after them, discussing the subject which had been under consideration at dinner.

"Why, of course it is possible," she said. "There are you and I."

"To be sure," I answered, "we are living flesh and blood evidence. By-the-way, I have a scheme. Why shouldn't we write a story together about a platonic friendship? I think we could work it up in great form."

"That's a capital idea," exclaimed Miss Merry. "You could furnish the man's ideas and I the woman's."

"Good! Already I behold the comfortable cheque for our labour."

"Oh, that is too bad. You are always putting a cash value on things. Remember, sir, that this is a story that is to show the world how plantonic friendships may and do exist."

"All right. When shall we commence work? You know we must talk our plot over first. To-morrow is my day off from the paper. Shall I call in the afternoon?"

"Yes, do, and we can take a walk and arrange the plot."

Thus it was arranged that we should collaborate in a story, and the following day, according to the engagement, I called at the Merry household.

Miss Merry came down ready for the walk, with her hat and gloves on. That was one of her characteristics—she never kept one waiting. It is little things like this that make you form a platonic friendship for a girl, if anything will.

"I've been thinking of a title for our story," she cried. "What shall we call it?"

"You must name it," I said, "that is part of your share of the labour."

"Very well, then, let us call it 'Two Friends.'"

"That's a capital idea. Now for the plot."

The plot was a hard thing to settle. The story must have some element to lend colour to it. Love of course, was barred out, and friendship must take its place; but how, and what incidents to make use of in order to portray it happily, was an extremely knotty and difficult question. One thing we fixed upon. There must be a noble sacrifice on the part of one or both of our characters. But of what nature and circumstances it should be we could not determine.

"Do you think," I inquired tentatively, "that such a friendship could rise superior even to love?"

"I don't know," hesitated Miss Merry.

"You see, I can't speak from experience, and novelists always set love on a pedestal above the other emotions."

Digitized by Google

"True! But this other story of ours must not be formed on the theories of other writers. We must originate it entirely."

"I don't see how. Neither of us is in love or has ever been to my knowledge."

"Nor to mine," I returned hastily, perhaps because on this point a shadow of a doubt had crept over me.

But on due reflection I determined that I had answered with perfect frankness. No, I was not in love with Elsie Harwood by any means. I admired her very much, it was true, and I fancied that she rather liked me. I had seen a good deal of her during the past summer, and once or twice the idea had entered my head that she was much nicer than most girls, and that I liked to be with her. That was all. Why, I had not seen her a dozen times since she returned to the town.

Having thus disposed of the trifling doubt which assailed my conscience, I turned to Katherine, who had been busy planning meanwhile.

"There is only one way to do it," she cried.

"And that?"

"One of us must fall in love."

I confess that the idea staggered me at first, and it was with difficulty that I recovered breath enough to ask:

"Which of us?"

"Well," said Katherine thoughtfully, "I think you had better. The consequences are so much less apt to be dangerous for a man."

"Here, I don't know about that. Suppose I were really to fall in love and get married?"

"Just so. What of it? You must get married some time."

"But marriage is a thing a fellow doesn't want to jump into out of hand, in the manner you suggest."

"You goose! You need not fall head over heels in love; a mild case of imaginary love will answer the purpose."

"Suppose it should cause our friendship to break up?"

"Oh, consistency, thou art a jewel. Then how about our theory of platonic affection?" said Katherine, with a twinkle in her blue eyes.

"True enough," I replied. "I'll try it. I'll fall in love with Miss Harwood immediately."

"Oh, no, not with her, surely. She is so insipid and foolish."

Now I did not think Miss Harwood insipid or foolish at all, and Katherine's criticism nettled me somewhat, so that I answered rather stiffly that I supposed a fellow might choose for himself whom he was to fall in love with.

"Certainly," said Katherine, "you are free to fall in love with a wooden Indian if you wish."

Whereupon we walked in silence for some time, while the plot of our story made very little progress.

Insipid and foolish, indeed! I tried to recall any instance of these qualities to Miss Harwood, but could not. I only remembered that she had very large eyes and a very pretty mouth with the whitest of teeth. She was a rather petite and clinging sort of girl. At least that was my mannish definition of a woman who drew forth the chivalric instincts of a man. I thought of the long drives we had had together during the summer and how much I had enjoyed talking to her. Although she seldom said much she seemed to grasp my ideas, looking up to me the while with her big eyes in a confiding and trustful manner. "Oh, no," I thought, "she is anything but insipid." Whereupon Katherine, who must have guessed my thoughts, said:

"When you have finished thinking about Elsie, perhaps you will condescend to return to our story."

"Of course, my dear Katherine, you must really pardon the absent-mindedness of one who is so deeply in love."

We both laughed at this, and the laugh made things a little better between us. We agreed that our plot must form itself naturally, and the chief incident must be the falling in love of the hero with another girl. As for the sacrifice we had determined must play an important part in the story, we could not very well determine what it should be.

Miss Merry suggested that the hero should give up his sweetheart so as to prolong his friendship with his platonic friend. I reminded her that she had just expressed the sentiment that love or marriage would not interfere with such a friendship.

"But then his wife would probably be jealous," said Katherine. "The chances are ten to one that she would be an ignorant, empty-headed little fool."

This reply of Katherine's angered me, I scarcely knew why. I felt in her description of our hero's imaginary lover she had a certain person in her mind, and that person Miss Harwood. It was the first time I had ever known Katherine to be spiteful or anything else resembling it, and it annoyed me particularly, as I knew that Miss Harwood was not at all foolish, although she was not what one would call an intellectual girl.

We walked in silence for some time, and finally I gave utterance to the opinion that I did not think a man would give up his lover under the circumstances.

"If there is such a thing as a friendship such as we have in mind it must survive all barriers. It must be far above any such petty considerations as jealousy."

"I am sure no one said anything about jealousy," Katherine said rather pettishly. "I'm afraid that you flatter yourself."

"Oh, no! I don't mean anything like that," I answered hastily; "but here we are at your door, and we have made very little progress. When shall we have our next séance?"

"Can you come to-morrow evening?"

"Yes, and we will begin the story then."

But the next evening came, and the story was not begun. I called, and found Williams, a man I Miss Merry came down ready.

Digitized by Google

never cared very much for, talking away gaily to Katherine.

Williams was determined to stay as long as I, and as our story was, of course, not mentioned, I had to leave without making another engagement.

I went away in rather an angry mood, disgusted with Williams, who had always seemed to me too familiar with Katherine, annoyed because I fancied that Katherine herself had treated me somewhat coldly.

Williams had called on Katherine pretty frequently of late. Suppose she were to marry him. Why not? I disliked him personally, but I found upon sober reflection that I knew of absolutely nothing against the man. Other people liked him, men as well as women. He was of good family, well off, and, I remembered with distinct dissatisfaction, he was remarkably good-looking.

There was no reason in the world why Katherine should not marry him if she chose, even though I did not like him. At all events I thought I would speak to her about him, and see what she thought of him.

I never doubted but she would tell me her sentiments in regard to him, so great had our confidence in each other been ever since childhood.

I called on Miss Harwood the next day. She received me very graciously, and I spent a very delightful half hour with her.

Unconsciously, however, I began to compare her with Katherine's description of "an empty-headed little fool." Certainly she was very pretty, and her manner and everything she said were very charming. Her words were few, but carefully chosen, and that which they expressed were simple and to the point. But I went away with a new idea born into my brain, which grew hour by hour until I arrived at the conclusion that I did not, nor could I ever, love Elsie Harwood as a man should love his wife.

Side by side with this thought a companion idea evolved itself unconsciously. Indistinct and insignificant at first, it gradually assumed a magnitude and importance until it mastered my whole being, and then I knew that I could love but one woman—she who shared with me our so-called plantonic friendship and my literary collaborator.

In the meantime our story had made no progress at all. I had only seen Katherine in various public places, and she was always with some one—frequently Williams. They seemed very friendly towards each other. Indeed, I thought at times that I could detect love glances exchanged between them. I sighed to myself as I thought of the old days of our friendship and the happy confidence we had reposed in each other. "Alas," I thought, "it is all over, and our poor little story will never be written, I fear."

At last one day I called and found her alone. Neither of us spoke of the story at first, but different things entirely foreign to it. Finally I asked her about Williams—whether she cared for him or not.

"I do not see why you should ask me that question."

I must have asked the question in an unpleasant manner, for I could see that she was hurt. For several minutes she made me no answer.

"I do not see why you should ask me that question," she said slowly, with her eyes fixed upon the floor.

"I have a perfect right," I answered. "I want to know whether or not our friendship is to come to an end."

"It need never come to an end, under any circumstances."

"I do not believe it," I cried. "Katherine, if you marry that man, we can never be friends again. Tell me, do you care for him?"

Katherine laughed, and as I hate to be laughed at I grew angry.

"What about our theory that we are going to express in our story?" she asked.

"Oh, hang the story! This is real life, and I am in earnest. Do you love Dick Williams?"

"I like him very much."

"Would you marry him, then?"

"I call that question rather impertinent. Do you love Elsie Harwood? And will she marry you?"

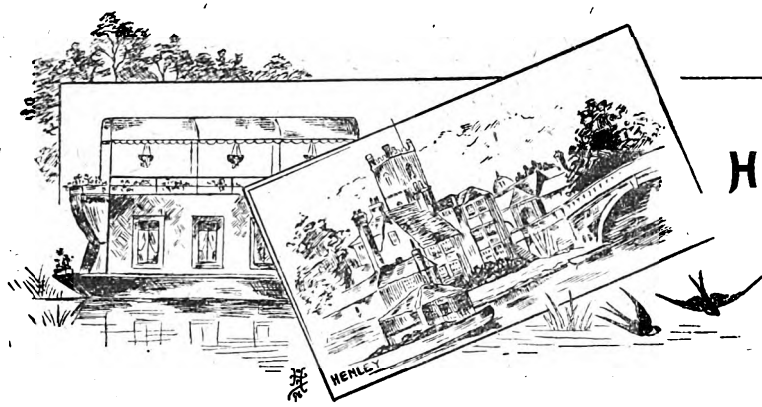
Katherine laughed again, and my anger vanished. I suddenly realised that she had been making game of me.

"Katherine," I said, "you know whom I love. There is only one way that we can ever finish our story. Shall we collaborate for good?"

And she said "Yes." And we did. And one sunshiny spring day we wrote out this little story together, which is to prove that platonic friendship does not exist. And when we had nearly arrived at the end Katherine said: "How shall we finish it?" And I said "Like this," brushing back as I spoke the brown hair from her forehead to kiss it.

Esther Noanes.

Digitized by Google



HOW I SAVED HIM.

I SHALL never forget that night.

The moon threw a pale, sickly light through the branches of the big trees that formed the forest of which we, in that out-of-the-way Virginian town, were so proud—that same moon by the light of which many a young couple were probably making love in all parts of the American continent.

It was no lovesick swain and sighing maid that the moon revealed to me. There upon the bit of turf where we had often enjoyed an impromptu picnic under the shadow of the trees on summer afternoons lay the body of a man who, but a few hours before, had held me in his arms in the garden at the back of father's house, and sworn to make me his wife, and called me "Sweetheart mine." Then he had said "Good-night," and started to walk across a corner of the forest to a farmhouse where he had recently taken up his abode as a summer visitor.

Who was he? I did not know. Yes, it may seem strange, but I was a young country girl ill-versed in the etiquette of introductions, or in the wickedness of mankind. All I knew was that he was just such a big, bronzed, bearded man as I had read of in books—not one of the uncouth Virginian farmers who formed the only male society that I had ever enjoyed. His beard was beautifully trimmed; he had a slight pointed moustache and curly hair, and he was dressed like one of the smart gentlemen I had seen in illustrations. I could not have dared ask him any inquisitive questions as to who he was, why he had to come to our little town, or why he seemed to know no one there, or to have any definite object in his visit.

I had met him casually one evening in the forest, when, after the heat of the day, I had let down my hair and scampered down the turf drive to enjoy the cool breeze and the stillness of the forest on the very spot where I now stood looking at him. On that evening as I stood still to take breath, and to wonder how girls in big cities could live without a forest, that man had stepped out from among the trees and asked me who I was, and where I got my pink cheeks and my beautiful locks. My cheeks had changed from pink to red, and he and I had sauntered back through the forest together until the sun had disappeared and the cold night air had warned me that I must be going home to father. And the man had kissed me. That was all the introduction we had, and I knew no other better form of introduction.

And now he lay there on the turf, looking so ghastly by moonlight, when I thought he had gone home long since, and I had only sought the spot for its association's sake—to recall the happy hour I had spent with him there on the first evening of our acquaintance.

Was he dead? Yes, it must be so. He looked so stiff and he hardly moved a muscle since the bullet had pierced his heart right before my eyes. I could not raise an alarm. Indeed, as I stood there I hardly noticed that the man who, unconscious of my presence, had fired the fatal shot, was nowhere to be seen.

I did not shriek. No. I only felt very, very cold, and my hands clasped one another so tightly that I felt as if they would never come apart. I had never seen death before, but I realised that I saw it now. Then I fell on my knees and crawled up to the man, and knelt over him and listened. But he did not breathe. Then I saw that his clothes were wet—oh, so wet—on one side, and blood was still trickling through the check tweed cloth which I had so admired at our first meeting.

I did not know the dead man's name; so could not call to him. It was all so wondrous strange that I did not seem even sorry—only overcome by the sight of a dead man by moonlight, a man who was to have been my husband, as I thought. But what was husband? What was lover? I know now; but I did not know then. To me he had only been a new kind of man, quite different to any I had known before. And, instead of treating me as an uncouth child, he had talked to me and made a companion of me—and kissed me.

And as I knelt and gazed at the stiff white face, so hard-looking now, with teeth firmly set, I saw in front of me a few yards on the other side of the body, a shadow suddenly cast on the ground, and a hand was gently placed on my shoulder.

Even then I was not frightened. I turned round and found the figure of a man bending over me. I sprang to my feet, and seizing him by the arms, turned him round so as to throw the light full on his face. A mere boy—at least I thought so, because he had no beard.

"Is he dead?" he asked.

"Quite dead."

"It is well."

"Well!" I almost shrieked. "What do you mean? Is it well that a man should be killed?"

"It is well," he repeated. "He was doomed——"

"To be murdered?" asked I.

"To be shot like a cur," said he.

"Who are you to dare speak of him like that?" I demanded as drops of perspiration came out upon my forehead.

"And may I ask what brought you to this spot at this time of night?"

Digitized by Google

"To find the body of a murdered man, but not to be cross-questioned by his murderer," was the reply. And then, as I saw the young fellow's handsome face looking so hurt at what I had said, I took one of his hands in both mine, and added: "I did not mean it. You do not look like a murderer. You look so kind and young and good. Tell me, what does this all mean?"

"You are right at first," he said; "I am a murderer. I shot that man partly for your sake, and partly for my own satisfaction. He deserved it."

"Oh, do not say that," I pleaded. "What do you know of him or me? Who are you?"

"I know too much of him. I followed him to this neighbourhood. He fled here from New York to escape his fate; but I was not to be deprived of all I have lived for since I left England three months ago. Two years ago he married my sister in London and brought her over to New York, where, by continual ill-treatment and depriving her of the bare necessaries of life at a critical time, he killed her by inches. Happily, a friend of hers cabled me to come from London, and I arrived just in time to see the last of my poor sister.

"'Algie,' she said, 'do not put yourself out about me, but make it the object of your life to see that no other girl ever falls into his clutches. I fear I am not his first victim!'

"Well, hardly was his girl-wife—she was only twenty when she died—laid in her grave than this brute here got engaged to the daughter of a man who owns a big shop in New York. I met him one night coming out of her father's house, and as he came out I went in and told father and daughter the story of my sister's married life. Three days later he was being anxiously inquired after by a big man—the father of a pretty girl who had mysteriously disappeared from St. Joseph, Missouri—who made no secret of a six-shooter that he carried in his pocket. New York saw the blackguard no more; but I did not lose touch with him. By a queer coincidence I was at the railway station when he drove up and hurriedly asked for a ticket to your town over there. Two days afterwards I was after him, and I overheard what passed between you and him in your father's garden this evening. I feared it might be useless to interfere between you two in the ordinary way, so, to fulfil my promise to my dead sister, I appealed to my friend here," and he callously drew a revolver from his pocket.

"See," he said, "it only required one barrel, but I had five more ready if needed."

"But you must not stay here," I said, with a shudder at the thought of being the only witness against the man who had done this dreadful deed for my sake. "You must go at once. A train passes through B—— at two o'clock in the morning; you have over two hours drive, and you can get a conveyance at Simeon Martin's, and I will show you the way."

"No!" he said firmly, "that will not do. I will give myself up."

"Oh, don't—don't do that!" I cried. "Anything rather than that. Here, I will help you carry the body away to a spot where it may not be found for years. Come, see," and I half raised the corpse, "we can easily manage it between us."

"I must give myself up, and trust to a jury not convicting me," he replied.

"You shall not! No. I will not let you. You must go now, quick!" and I threw my arms round his neck, and looked up into his bonnie face, and implored and coaxed. But he only smiled such a brave smile upon me, and patted my shoulder and stroked my hair as I clung to him. "I must give myself up," he repeated, "and you must bear witness against me."

"That I will never do. I will lie. I will run away myself. I will kill myself. Ah, good! I know. I will say I murdered that man—that you took the revolver from me, and swore you would confess to the murder to save me. They know me here, and will believe me rather than believe a stranger."

"It cannot—shall not—be. I can prove that I have been hunting the wretch down, and have sworn to do for him. It's no good, little woman. You must give in, and you must not mind if they do hang me. I don't, very much. I've no one to care for now that my sister is gone."

"Yes, you have; you must care for me."

I knew not what I was saying, or perhaps not the full purport. I only knew that he must be saved. Oh, how handsome and defiant he looked. And I took his arm and said:

"Come, you must go, and I must send the men out to fetch the body. Father won't think it strange that I should be out here at night. I often come out for a long walk before going to bed You see I am but a wild country girl." And he bent forward and gave me a kiss on the forehead, such a different one to what he—that dead man—had given me.

"Where does the mayor live?" he asked. "I will go straight there."

Suddenly, as by an inspiration, the mention of the mayor reminded me of a farmer who, a few years back, had given himself up for killing a farm-hand: the man had attacked him in a fit of drunken frenzy. The only witness to the deed was the farmer's wife, and the mayor told the farmer that the evidence of a wife would not be taken against the husband. And the accused was still at liberty.

We had nearly reached the edge of the forest. I turned to my companion and said: "I can save you. You must give yourself up, but not to-day."

His face brightened only for a moment. "You do not know what you say, child. It is impossible."

"Listen!" said I. "Will you grant me one favour? Do not think badly of me. You will think I am mad, but I am not. Will you be my husband? Will you drive me away with you now to Q——? If we drive slowly we shall not reach there till to morrow morning. We will go straight to the mayor and get married. Then we can drive back. You can give yourself up and I will offer evidence against you. They cannot take a wife's evidence against her husband."

And who shall say that the marriage laws of America are too lax since our happy-go-lucky mode of tying the marriage knot enabled me to save the deliverer!

After the strange man was discharged from custody I told him he must go away and never see me again; I told him I had married him that he might enjoy freedom—not bondage.

But still he was firm. "No!" he said, "I will not go. I will give myself up—to you, my darling, to make your life a happy one." And he has done so. L. P. N.

Digitized by Google

An Experiment in Psychology.

"What do you think of it, Tom?"

"Hanged if I know, old man; seems to me very like a hoax. What's your opinion?"

"No," said my chum, meditatively balancing the poker with which he had been stirring the fire. "I don't think it's that. You see these psychical research fellows are too jolly well in earnest to joke over the thing, and if an outsider meant to hoax anyone he'd practise on a believer, and not on a downright sceptic. Besides the address is all right," turning to a directory we had been consulting, "Dr. C. E. Manners, Ulverstone House, Brixton. Well, what are you going to do about it? To go or not to go, that is the question."

That was the question. A few days previously I had entered into a newspaper controversy on the subject of Pre-existence. It had always seemed to me a wild theory, and I had written a letter ridiculing the thing far more, perhaps, than the occasion warranted.

The immediate result was the following note:

Dear Sir,—I have read your letter in the Gazette of the 24th. I am aware I am taking a great liberty in asking you to call on me, but truth is desirable under any circumstances, and I can convince you that, far from being a mad dream, pre-existence is a reality. There seems something familiar to me in the style of your letter, but whether we have met before in another age or not I cannot tell—yet. But will you come and see me?—Yours,

C. E. Manners.

"You see, Bob," I said, continuing the conversation this invitation had caused, "it's such a curious affair. Why couldn't he come here? 'Met before in another age' sounds a bit like madness, eh? He's pretty sure of himself, too. He doesn't say he will discuss the matter—he's going to convince me."

"It'll take him a long time, if he only knew it," Bob jerked out, lighting his pipe, and speaking between the puffs. "Well, the only consideration is—is the game worth the candle? Of course, if you're not interested in the affair, don't go. There certainly doesn't seem to be much fun in it, but if he met you in a former age, you'll gain some useful knowledge of your own antecedents. I don't think I should care to rake up my last incarnation but one," he proceeded laughingly. "I might have too much on my conscience after it was all over. For all I know I might have been Nero, or Richard the Third, or Dick Turpin, and would perhaps recognise in the confounded tailor of mine one of my former victims, avenging his fifteenth century wrongs in the nineteenth century manner. But, of course, you're all right; you're a lawyer, and such matters wouldn't worry you."

"I think I'll go, if I've nothing else to do one evening. Here, let's toss for it. Heads I go."

"It's head," cried Bob, as I uncovered the coin.

Three evenings later, finding time very hard to kill (Bob had gone to the theatre with some of his friends, and I had no inclination for reading law), I decided to walk down to Brixton and try to find Ulverstone House.

I easily discovered the place, and it differed in no respect from the other detached villas, which formed the quiet road in which it stood. Three-storeyed, double-fronted, with a fairly large garden before it, it looked eminently respectable and orthodox.

I rang the bell, and a neat servant girl showed me into the doctor's study. While I waited I looked curiously round the room. There was nothing professional about it, and I certainly found no reason for believing the owner to be a man of remarkable character or eccentric ways and ideas. A table, filled with books and papers, stood in one corner, and, prominent among its contents, I noticed a recent treatise on re-incarnation, and a copy of the Gazette.

A large bookcase filled nearly the whole of one side of the room, and, from the further end, stretching across to the opposite wall, hung a heavy curtain, thus dividing the apartment. Before the door and windows hung other curtains. A few ornaments were on the mantelpiece, a few engravings on the walls, a luxurious armchair stood near the fire, and a cluster of incandescent lamps threw a brilliant light over the room.

I had scarcely time to notice my surroundings before the door opened again, and a gentleman entered and came towards me.

"'Mr. Scott, I am very pleased to see you," he said, "and must ask you to pardon me if my letter seemed strange. Won't you sit down? I think you will find this armchair more comfortable," crossing the room as he spoke and moving the chair slightly from the fire.

I sat down in silence, for there was something about him that effectually prevented me from using the commonplaces that spring to one's tongue on an introduction. Courtesy demands in most cases the polite expressions that mean so little and sound so graceful, but here it was different. It was no venerable form and face that made such phrases seem out of place. The doctor was of medium stature, well built, well dressed. His hair was grey—almost white. His face was clean shaven; by no means handsome, but the expression——!

Digitized by Google

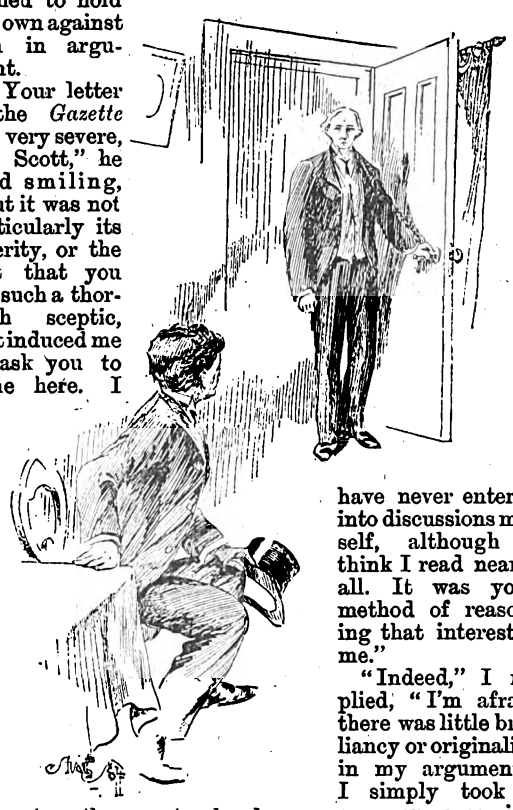
It was that that checked the words on my lips. It seemed to me that knowledge was written in the eyes, on the lips, and in every line of his face. Not that which comes from books and study, but the knowledge which belongs to genius—which knows all things in their naked truth, and surveys them from a standpoint far removed from that of ordinary men. He himself had used conventional phrases, yet to me it seemed only a concession to the usages of that society of which I was a member, and to which as his guest I was entitled. I thought of the Sphinx of Egypt, and of an author I had once read who called its features the ideal of serene power and omniscience. But here was the living face speaking of power and knowledge in every movement. It was a revelation, and I felt awed before it.

The doctor first broke the silence. At the sound of his voice I tried to shake off the impression he had made, conscious that I should need all my self-possession if I wished to hold my own against him in argument.

"Your letter in the Gazette was very severe, Mr. Scott," he said smiling, "but it was not particularly its severity, or the fact that you are such a thorough sceptic, that induced me to ask you to come here. I have never entered into discussions myself, although I think I read nearly all. It was your method of reasoning that interested me."



A gentleman entered and came towards me.

"Indeed," I replied, "I'm afraid there was little brilliancy or originality in my arguments. I simply took a common sense view of the question, and wrote accordingly."

"Common sense! Exactly—that is the point on which we differ. It is an un-common sense that opens up to us the great truth of Pre-existence—all other truths, indeed—but of this it is the essential."

"You would imply that minds capable of believing the theory must be possessed of some great faculty which is denied to the ordinary thinker?" I questioned, half sarcastically.

"Exactly," he replied, leaning back in his chair, with a smile. "And you think I am unfair in having taken a position from which it is impossible to drive me, and yet on which I have (to your mind) no reasonable grounds for standing."

"I certainly think it a most unsatisfactory position," I said. "For myself, belief must be the result of reasoning. No advance in Metaphysics—or any branch of Science, can be made unless the results are deduced logically from facts."

"I agree with your last observation, most decidedly, but are you sure all men have the same facts to reason from? Every man is an unknown quantity to his fellows who cannot tell what knowledge he has. Well, I have promised to convince you and I shall do so. Does not an action, or a spoken sentence sometimes give you the impression that you have been in the same position, or spoken the same words, before?"

"It's not an uncommon occurrence," I replied. "Most people have experienced it. It is the partial remembrance of an action, revived by its association with a slight link connecting the past and the present. But it is a memory of this life; there is no need to go back farther than a few years—to childhood, at any rate—for its solution."

"No need! That is hardly logical."

He suddenly broke off and rose from the chair, throwing up his arms, his whole face changing from its calm, meditative expression to one of eagerness and expectancy. His eyes gleamed, every feature grew thinner and sharper. The man had changed utterly, and with that change I lost the feeling of almost reverence with which he had inspired me. In place of him whose words had nearly carried conviction with them, and who had spoken calmly and deliberately, as if with a certain knowledge, there stood the seeker after truth—the uncertain, conjecturing man, knowing himself in the darkness and hoping for the light.

But his emotion died away, and leaning one arm on the mantelpiece, and resting his head on his hand, he said suddenly: "You have no recollection of Aristotle?"

"Of Aristotle? Oh, yes, I am fairly intimate with his works," I replied, wondering at the question put in such a negative form.

"I am speaking of the man. The works he left are but ghosts of his lectures. Ah! you recollect nothing," he said, slowly shaking his head, "and yet you were with him, too. But you shall remember." And again his manner changed to eager nervousness, and he walked across the room and dragged back the heavy curtain with a clatter of rings on their brass pole.

The change alarmed me; there was something strange in his behaviour, and something stranger in his voice even than in his words. Simultaneously with his movement I had risen and advanced a few steps, but as he flung aside the curtain and turned and looked me in the face I shrank back involuntarily. All the serenity had vanished from his features, his eyes were opened wildly, and there was a glare in them that put me on my guard at once. His nostrils were dilated, his lips parted, and his whole body trembled with excitement. My heart stopped beating, and then gave a bound that sent the blood rushing to my head—the man was mad!

Past the curtain I saw, beneath a white covering, the outline of a couch, with something rising and spreading on each side from the head. There was nothing more in the apartment, and I knew the object was in some way connected with the madness of the man before me. Of all horrors the indefinite is the worst, and, as I stood there—my eyes wandering from the face of the doctor to the object beyond—I felt powerless to speak or move. The suddenness of the discovery I had made numbed me, and my heart beat thickly and uncertainly.

Digitized by Google

"Come," he said, and turning from me he moved towards the couch and placed his hand on the sheet to drag it off.

But his movement had broken the spell and brought back all my power of speech and thought.

"Pray don't trouble, Dr. Manners," I said as calmly as I could, "I will call and see you again. It's getting late and I really haven't time now."

To say they sounded forced and false would give little idea of the effect both my words and voice had on me. Had the situation been less horrible I should have laughed at the incongruity of my words and feelings.

But whatever of my true state of mind my voice expressed was unnoticed by the doctor. One word alone caught his ear.

"Time!" he exclaimed, dropping the cloth, and suddenly swinging round with a contemptuous gesture. "What is time to one who has lived in the past, has seen nations rise and fall, man advance and retreat in the march of civilisation and knowledge—and who, through all, has seen the same sun rise and set—birth and death ever recurring in an eternal round—the soul passing on, never dying, through its earthly habitations, age after age? What is time to one who knows that your centuries—aye, and ages—are to eternity far less than a second is to millions of your years?"

While he was speaking I had summed up the state of affairs rather more accurately than the first alarm had allowed. I was alone with this madman, and any attempt to leave the place would most likely lead to violence on his part.

The curtains before the door and windows effectually prevented my making a dash and escaping before he could reach me. While I was drawing them aside he would be upon me—and behind me! That was not to be thought of—far better meet him face to face, if there must be a struggle; and I imagined I could hold my own if his madness did not give him greater strength than I should gain from my despair.

But before all I must try to bring him to his senses—at least to calm him. His strange language, his wish to convince me of the truth of his ideas, his abrupt gestures might mean nothing after all, and my idea of a horrible experiment, in which I should play the victim, was only conjecture. And so, endeavouring to reassure myself, I replied to him:

"Certainly it may not affect you, sir, but we unfortunate individuals, who are obliged to work amongst men who have not your deep insight into all ages, must deal with time and live in accordance with custom. I regret leaving you, but I really must do so."

"Well, first let me explain to you my discovery, and then you shall go," he said reluctantly. "I had hoped—— But there!" and he waved his hand impatiently, and withdrew the white covering. "Look!"

Drawing a few steps nearer, I surveyed the now uncovered contrivance with interest, in spite of my desire to be far away from it and its designer.

I saw a long, leather-padded, sloping table, at its higher end about three feet from the ground. At the upper end of the couch two springs rose from beneath the sides, and, curving over till within a few inches from each other, terminated in small concave brass plates. Over the centre of the head, slightly above these plates, hung a broad semi-circle of steel, supported by another spring. From either side of the table a wooden arm protruded. Round each arm covered wire was twisted, showing, as the light fell on the ends, half-an inch of shining metal. Three great straps were fastened to the couch at intervals, evidently intended to buckle across the legs, waist, and arms of a person lying on it, and two steel clasps fixed midway along this hideous invention seemed placed for the purpose of effectually handcuffing the victim. Beneath the table the carpet had been cut away, and thick wires ran downwards, passing through holes in the floor.

Dragged back the heavy curtain.

I could hardly fail to recognise the fact that electricity was a prominent agent in this experiment, and though I knew nothing of its nature, I shuddered as I pictured myself bound and helpless, with the mad doctor perhaps slowly torturing my life away. But my mind had not conceived, even in its greatest fear, the horrible thing his next words suggested.

"I told you it was principally your method of argument prompted me to ask you to come here. It recalled memories of old days, and I wished your first knowledge should be of the days when you and I were together in Athens.

"Why need I explain the means by which I discovered where the secret chambers of the brain lie, in which the record of past lives is hidden? Or the reasoning which proves beyond doubt that it can be awakened now? We will pass over all that. Listen! You will lie upon this table—your head here, with these small brass plates clasping your temples. I shall then cut away part of your skull, lay bare a portion of your brain, and apply to it these electrodes. Then you will receive a series of sudden shocks——"

"Great Heavens, man!" I cried hotly, forgetting caution and everything in my indignation at such a fiendish proposal, "it's certain death. Mad as you are you cannot think me fool enough to agree to this. Let me pass!" for by this time he had come round between me and the door. "You shall keep me here no longer."

"Let you go," he repeated, "now everything is ready! Let you go—no!"

He sprang at me, taking me by surprise, and catching me round the waist, lifted me from my feet and staggered towards the table. I knew that, once stretched on it, the handcuffs would clasp my wrists, the strong belts encircle my body, and then no power on earth could save me. I gripped him by the throat, forcing his head back till he reeled and gasped for breath. He strove to throw me to the ground, but I only tightened my grasp—I had him with both hands now—and he struggled in vain.

Digitized by Google

Suddenly he let his hands drop, and I found myself on my feet again. Before I knew it he had drawn back his right arm and struck me in the face with his clenched fist, following it up by another blow from his left. But I was too near him for it to take full effect, and my raised arms in some measure warded it off and prevented him hitting surely. I forced him to his knees, his head hung back, and he ceased to struggle. I saw blood on his lips, and, fearing he was dying, let go my hold. But the blood came from the lip he had bitten through in his mad rage—not from his lungs—and for the rest, he was only shamming, for, the moment I released him, he caught me by the wrists and drew himself to his feet.

Then he was on me again, this time pinning my arms to my side. We fought in silence. I did not cry for help, all my energies were centred in this fight for life, and I thought of nothing but preventing the madman from dragging me to the table and throwing me upon it. He seemed made of iron, and as I grew weaker his strength increased. His arms crushed the breath from my body. I could not release mine, and was slowly pressed backward and backward till I felt the edge of the couch touch my legs. I kicked and bit like a wild beast in my despair, but gradually I was borne back—helpless upon the table.

In as few words as possible I told the whole story.

But one chance now remained. To imprison me beneath those cursed straps he must release an arm, if only for a moment. Could I at that moment make a last effort and throw him off? Oh, to get my hands again round that throat on which the marks of my fingers now showed so plainly! Then nothing but death should release him from my grasp—no crafty acting—no sudden strength should avail him. I would make sure of him then.

Presently I felt his left hand stealthily moving beneath me, while with his elbow he still pressed my arm down tightly. I knew the moment had arrived, and as he suddenly released my right arm and seized the strap, I twisted round and planted a blow full between his eyes. Then I had him by the throat again.

Down to the floor we fell, he undermost, and rolled over and over, both fighting for dear life now, for he knew he could expect no mercy.

But of a sudden I felt his hands unclasp from my wrists, and his body fall limp and lifeless. Half fearing another ruse, I threw him off me, and knelt over him, one hand on his throat still, though with relaxed grasp. With the other hand I tore away his clothing, and felt his heart. It had ceased to beat.

Breathless, sick, almost blind, I rose and staggered to the door, but it was locked (automatically I afterwards learned). I turned to the window, but before I could reach it the room spun round, blood rushed to my eyes, and hummed in my ears, and I fell.

* * * * * *

When I awoke I looked round. The door hung on one hinge, the curtain was torn down, and through the gap I saw the familiar uniform of the police. By my side sat a gentleman in evening dress, and standing a few paces away was a squarely built, bearded inspector. Whatever happened now I was safe from the torture the maniac had designed for me.

"All right now, sir?" queried the burly official, speaking to the man by my side, and nodding at me.

"Yes, I think so. How do you feel, sir? Rather light-headed? Ah, yes, but you'll soon be as right as possible. There's nothing radically wrong. A black eye, and a few scratches and bruises; that's all. Still, you'd better let him get away as soon as possible, inspector."

"Right you are, doctor. Now, sir, can you explain the meaning of this?" and he jerked his head in the direction of the curtained apartment, where the table and the dead body were still visible.

In as few words as possible I told the whole story, and when I had finished the inspector said:

"You've had a narrow escape, sir. Luckily the servant got alarmed at the noise and fetched us, although it would have been as well if she'd called us sooner. Dr. Manners was well known round here as the 'mad doctor,' but we've never had any trouble with him before. Well, you'll be wanted at the inquest, of course, but I don't think I need detain you now. I'll take your name and address though, and one of my men will see you home in a cab."

I walked with uncertain steps from the room on the arm of the medical man, and, when we were out of hearing of the inspector, I put the question I had been thinking all the time I had been telling the story to them:

"Doctor, was—did I kill him?"

"No," he replied reassuringly. "Had I not been able to tell our friend in there the same thing, you would hardly be going home now. It was a close thing, and after all the matter of a few minutes only, but he died from heart disease, brought on by violent exertion and excitement."

Walter Rothwell.

Digitized by Google

A GRAND OFFER

TO THE READERS OF

Short Stories.

WE offer for a period extending from the time this number is published until April 4th next a Beautiful Three-quarter Life-size India Ink and Crayon Portrait to anyone who will bring or send us only 6s. and one coupon from Short Stories, one coupon from Pearson's Weekly, and one from The Story Teller. These are the £100 coupons to be found on the cover in each paper. (The 2nd page in the case of S. S.)

These portraits are of the finest artistic merit. They are absolutely permanent, being finished by the Air Brush, with Indelible India Ink, making them more permanent than any of the old styles of portraits, and they will last a lifetime.

Have you a photograph of a FATHER, MOTHER, SISTER, BROTHER, or CHILD that you wish enlarged—perhaps some dear one who has passed away, whose likeness is now fading, and should be preserved before it is too late! We will enlarge and copy it into a beautiful portrait for you.

SHALL WE MAKE YOURS?

You will get an unheard-of bargain by availing yourself of this grand offer, and we are glad to be able to give it to you. We can copy from any photos, large or small, tin-types, or any kind of glass picture. In sending in the latter case care should be taken that they are properly packed. All pictures are copied bust style—head and shoulders only.

Again we make this Offer,
PROBABLY FOR THE LAST TIME.

DO NOT NEGLECT IT!
IT IS THE CHANCE OF A LIFETIME.

These Pictures if ordered through Artists would cost you from 3 to 5 Guineas.

We made this same offer some months ago, and then 7,000 of our readers sent us photos to be enlarged. These enlargements have nearly all been executed and sent off, and everybody appears to have been satisfied.

WHEN SENDING AN ORDER, inclose the picture you want copied in an envelope, and place your name and address on the back of the picture, and send the 6s. and the three coupons to these offices and you will receive the portrait copied for you as soon as possible. Have no fear of losing your small picture. It will be returned in as good order as received.

AN EXAMPLE OF THE PORTRAIT WE OFFER TO GIVE YOU CAN BE SEEN AT THE OFFICES OF Pearson's Weekly and Short Stories.

DON'T PUT OFF SENDING. Obtain your coupons at once, and send in to us at once.

Address—PORTRAITS, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Have you a Brain?

ASSUMING you are equipped with one, we ask you: Does it not require pleasant exercise at times, in the shape of mental gymnastics?

Certainly.

THEN the finest thing possible is to join The Brain Gymnasium in The Story Teller.

There is no entrance fee.

The prizes are many, and their aggregate value £25.

Full particulars appear in The Story Teller, which also contains a complete novel and instalments of three or four serial stories.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY.—ONE PENNY.

MELODY.

THE NEW MUSICAL MAGAZINE.

The Contents of No. 1 include Compositions by Charles Gounod (posthumous work), Benjamin Godard, J. M. Coward, May Ostlere, Tito Mattei, A. G. Crowe, A. J. Caldicott, Gabriel Faure, etc., etc. Literary Contributions by Mr. R. S. Hichens and Mr. Joseph Bennett.

56 Pages. No. 1 Now on Sale. Price Sixpence.

Digitized by Google

When The Birds Begin To Sing.

By Winifred Graham. Author of "Through the Valley," "Six First-Class Passengers," etc.

CHAPTER XV.

In Clouds of Silence Folded Out of Sight.

While Eleanor is at Copthorne, Philip is staying in Trebovir Road with Mr. and Mrs. Lane.

"I cannot think why I have not heard from Eleanor," he says one morning to Erminie. "For three days not a word—no answer to my letters or the telegram."

"Really; it was a pity you were prevented running down that afternoon. I expect she was disappointed."

"I am not so sure about that," thinks Philip.

"It is just possible she may have written to Lyndhurst. Did she know you were staying on with us?"

"I told her so, but perhaps she forgot, or did not take it in. I shall go there to-morrow and see."

Philip is uneasy about Eleanor. Her silence hurts him, for he still loves her passionately, in spite of their quarrels and her deceptions. All that day he thinks constantly of his wife, picturing her image at every turn, wondering how she passes her quiet days in the old farmhouse, and whether she is happy at Copthorne. He has sent her some books and papers she asked for, but they have not been acknowledged.

He is not angry, but pained at her inconsideration, and the galling thought that he no longer holds even a corner in her heart is bitterest grief to him.

His friends notice his depression in the City, and remark about it. The hours are long, and the spring sunshine seems laughing at him. He pines for the country, the fresh green, the old love—Eleanor!

That evening the Lanes take him to the theatre. The play bores him to distraction, though they say that it is good. He remembers reading some excellent notices on it in the leading papers, and planning to take Eleanor the night after she returns. He is one of a gay, light-hearted party, and goes on with them to sup at the Savoy, feeling like a spectre at the feast. They sit at the same table where he once found his wife with that smiling hypocrite Mrs. Mounteagle, and the man he hates, loathes, fears.

These recollections render Philip but a poor companion.

Erminie, noticing his low spirits, planned the evening's entertainment to cheer him up.

She has a pretty little sister-in-law with her, who prattles merrily, and reminds Mr. Roche somewhat of Eleanor, in a tantalising manner, when she laughs and he catches her profile.

"I have never been to the celebrated Savoy before," she says. "Reggie declares it is a place where ladies go without their husbands when they want to be rakish and lively. It looks as if he were right, for I am certainly without my better half this evening. When I look at you and Nelson, and then think of Reggie and myself, I cannot imagine how it is all wives and husbands don't get on. I believe I have done a lot of harm since my wedding by advising everybody to marry, and throwing susceptible young people together in the most reckless manner."

"We have not given it a very long test," says Erminie, "but look at that startling beauty in yellow," changing the subject out of consideration for Philip.

"Oh! she is the leader of one of the fastest sets in town," Nelson vouchsafes, as Lady MacDonald, a mass of flashing diamonds and old gold brocade, enters into the restaurant.

The place sends Philip's flagging spirits down to zero, he is thankful to get home, and paces his room half that night thinking of Eleanor, and longing for the love of dear departed days.

"Perhaps when she comes back from Copthorne it will be different," he thinks. "I have been away too much in that miserable City, she has been dull, and thus fallen a prey to Mrs. Mounteagle's bad influence." He will give her more companions, keep his house full of guests, pleasant accommodating people who will not object to early breakfast, and dinner that invariably waits half-an-hour later than it should on account of his business.

He writes to Eleanor as the clock strikes two. His letter is full of promises for the future.

He paints a picture of delightful plans. They will have the house full until Easter, when he will take her abroad. She shall go wherever she pleases, and he will be her trusting, adoring slave. He will make it impossible for her not to love him.

For nearly an hour he pores over the sheet, telling Eleanor these good resolves.

"Dearest," he says in conclusion, "can't we begin our lives over again—love as we did in quiet Copthorne—before we drifted apart? I will try and be a better husband. Do come back to me soon, for I find I cannot get on without my little Eleanor. She is all the world to me."

Then he seals the envelope, and falls into a restless sleep, which is broken by haunting dreams of dimly suspected terrors.

Early in the morning Philip wakes, unrefreshed and heartsick. Still the question burns on his brain—Why has Eleanor not written?

He rises before the household is astir, and lets himself out into the mild air.

Hailing a hansom, he tells the man to drive him as quickly as possible to Richmond Terrace. Perhaps Erminie is right, and Eleanor has written to Lyndhurst after all.

Sarah starts as she sees Mr. Roche on the doorstep.

"Good-morning," he says, "are there any letters for me?"

He does not wait for the answer, but walks straight in, and takes up a pile of envelopes on the hall table.

A few circulars, a bill, and three letters addressed to Eleanor at Copthorne in his own handwriting, and forwarded back by Mrs. Grebby to Mrs. Roche at Lyndhurst.

He stares at them in mute amazement, as if in those white envelopes a horrible mystery lies unrolled.

He tears them slowly open one by one, reading what he knows so well already, the casual news, the fond farewells, penned only for Eleanor's eyes.

How is it she has never received them? How is it they have been sent back by Mrs. Grebby when Eleanor is there?

For the moment he is unnerved. Then pulls himself together, places the letters in his pocket, picks up his stick, and turns to go.

"Are you coming home to-day, sir?" asks Sarah.

"Coming home!" The words grate on him.

"No," he replies, "I am going to Mrs. Roche, at Copthorne."

Then he dashes out of the house, and reaches Trebovir Road just as Erminie and Nelson are at breakfast.

"We could not think what had become of you," cries Mrs. Lane, running out to meet him. "Why did you go out, and where have you been?"

Then she sees how pale he is, and the questions die on her lips.

Digitized by Google

"Come in," she says gently. "I have got some hot coffee for you, and your favourite dish. What! you won't eat anything?"

"No thank you, dear, I haven't time. I only flew back to tell you I am off to Copthorne. I am a little anxious about Eleanor, not having written you know. She was rather seedy and done up before she left, and those old people are bad correspondents."

"You think she is ill?"

"I fear something is wrong."

"But you must have something before you go, or you will be quite faint."

Philip is not in the mood to argue, he answers her abruptly, almost rudely, and guessing that something is wrong, she lets him go, watching him drive away with sorrowful compassionate eyes.

"I am afraid poor Phil is in some trouble again," she says to Nelson, mechanically cracking the shell of her boiled eggs. "He has gone."

"What?"

"Yes," shaking her head solemnly, "and without any breakfast."

"But you should not let him."

"I could not help it. He is going to see Eleanor."

"Has she been leading the poor fellow another dance? What a curse that woman is!"

"Don't talk like that! I am very fond of Eleanor, with all her faults—almost as fond as of Phil, and you know how I love him. I am not sure what it is about her, but you can't bring yourself not to care for her. It's that pretty little confiding way, I think, and those lovely wistful eyes. She is so easily led and swayed. It is a great pity."

"She will come to a bad end, depend upon it," replies Nelson, congratulating himself on the good woman who crowns his home.

Philip takes the morning train to Copthorne. Business goes to the wind. He thinks only of his wife, and the letters that have come back so strangely into his keeping.

The journey seems interminable. He flings a pile of papers unread on the opposite seat, puts a cigar between his teeth, and forgets to light it, closes his tired eyes, which only quickens and excites his overwrought imagination, till finally the train steams into the drowsy little station of Copthorne.

Philip walks at the fastest possible speed across the meadows. There is the gate on which Eleanor perched herself the night before their wedding, declaring she would dangle her feet whether she was to be Mrs. Roche or not.

Then the green lane, where she asked him to wait till the following spring. He remembers her words distinctly. She had said them so lightly in reference to their union: "When the birds begin to sing, then I will marry you, Philip."

But he had proved himself the stronger, and carried off his prize that same month.

Now the spring is here. The birds are singing—mocking, jeering. The old farmhouse is in sight—he pauses.

Oh, what a moment of suspense.

No Eleanor comes across the garden to greet him. It all looks dead—still.

He can hear Rover's feeble bark—the sound savours of decay.

Then Philip walks forward, and his shadow falls across the porch. The bell peals.

Mrs. Grebby starts at the ring, and brushes past the little farmhouse servant hurrying to the door.

"Why, it's never Mr. Roche!" she exclaims.

"Yes," he replies; "I have come for Eleanor. Where is she?"

Mrs. Grebby sinks on to the seat in the porch, and stares at him open-mouthed.

"What do yer mean?" she gasps at last. "There ain't no harm come to my dearie!"

She wrings her hands despairingly.

"Has Eleanor left you?" he asks in a voice so strangely unfamiliar that he hardly knows it for his own.

"Three days ago. She went 'ome, to be sure, as bright and as bonny as could be, looking that pretty, I says to my old man, 'it's well she's not travellin' alone.'"

"Who was with her?" questions Philip intently, mastering his intense emotion.

"A friend what came the day you telegraphed. He said 'e'd see 'er back safe and sound. I packed 'er clothes with my own hands, I did, she never touched a thing, and we drove them both behind Black Bess to the station, with Rover following at the wheel."

A low hiss breaks from Philip's lips.

"And this man," he asks fiercely, impatiently, biting his lips. "What was he like?"

"Oh! 'e was a beautiful gentleman, so well dressed and handsome, Mr., let me see, Mr. Quinton I think she called him."

Philip has heard enough, he turns away with a groan.

Mrs. Grebby watches the dark despair creep over his features in blank amazement.

"What does it mean?" she asks, detaining him with a trembling hand.

"It means," replies Philip in a choking voice, "that Eleanor has left me."

A cry escapes Mrs. Grebby, she buries her face in her apron, rocking herself to and fro, moaning pitifully.

"We, as always kep' ourselves respectable, and never knew what it was to blush for any of our stock, and she 'as lifted the family, and married a good, real gentleman like yourself, sir, to bring disgrace and ruin on 'er 'appy 'ome. Oh! my, oh! my, the poor misguided lass!"

Philip, in his own agony, finds himself comforting the weeping woman, and praying her to bear up. Then, as she dries her streaming eyes, clasping his hand with a hoarse "God bless you, Mr. Roche," he hastens away with bent head and throbbing brow back over the green grass.

No curse rises to his silent lips; he is as one who has just heard of the sudden death of his dearest upon earth. Everything seems slipping from him. There is a long stretch of blank life before his bloodshot eyes.

He waits in a state of nervous prostration on a wooden bench at Copthorne Station till the return train to town appears.

Then he staggers forward into the first empty carriage, buries his face on the cushions, and sobs.

His strong frame shakes like a reed with the violence of his grief. He is weak, too, from having fasted since the previous night, and does not attempt to control his sorrow.

The maddening thought of Eleanor and Quinton together adds gall and wormwood to the desolation in the deserted husband's heart.

"With Quinton!" He repeats the words, grinding his teeth. Quinton, the low scoundrel, the fast, fascinating man of bad reputation, the villain who has betrayed his wife, his angel, and dragged her to the lowest depths of degradation! She is beyond Philip's help now, and he knows it—beyond redemption!

The Rubicon has been crossed. Eleanor is among the lost—on the other side!

Erminie is sitting under the pale light of a yellow lamp, deep in a novel.

The heroine is wavering on the verge of an irredeemable error, and Erminie's kind heart is thoroughly in the book. She is a sympathetic reader, and her eyes moisten as they scan the pages.

She is guilty of serious skipping, and as steps are heard in the hall below, glances at the finish.

A sigh of relief escapes her.

"Oh, I am glad she didn't! I am glad she is saved!" exclaims Mrs. Lane involuntarily, rising, as she thinks, to meet Nelson, since this is his hour to return.

Instead, Philip stands before her, white as a corpse. His haggard features are accentuated by the mellow lamp light, his figure sways, tottering till he steadies himself by grasping the back of a chair.

Digitized by Google

He has not tasted food that day, and she fancies he looks shrunken, marvelling at his altered appearance.

She dares not ask him what has happened, but just gazes with wondering sympathy into his miserable eyes.

"It has come," he gasps, passing one hand over his brow.

"What?" murmurs Erminie, under her breath.

"Eleanor and Quinton—they have gone together."

His voice vibrates through the room. A gasp of horror escapes Mrs. Lane. She staggers back.

"What shall you do?" she asks.

"What will I do?" echoes Philip, his eyes flashing, and the colour rushing back in a flood to his ashen cheeks. "Find her—track her to the end of the earth. Everything in life has closed to me this day. I shall only exist for one motive—one unswerving aim. She thinks she has escaped me, but the world is small, and while Eleanor and I are both in the same hemisphere——"

He pauses, for the room swims round.

A look that Erminie can never forget crosses his face—a look of sublime love, checked by an expression of devilish rage and hatred. The two seem battling a moment for pre-eminence.

Then he draws himself up to his full height, as if fighting for breath, and falls heavily upon the floor at Erminie's feet. Nelson's voice is heard calling her without.

She rushes to the door with a wild cry:

"Help—help! Philip is DEAD!"

CHAPTER XVI.

Ah, for some retreat,
Deep in yonder shining Orient.—TENNYSON.

"HAVE you ever heard anything more of that poor Mr. Roche, whose wife deserted him?" asks Erminie's sister-in-law.

"No," replies Mrs. Lane sadly. "We had one awful night when he came and told us the news, and fainted. I am so weak-minded, I thought he was dead immediately, and shrieked and tore my hair, and made quite a scene. I always jump at conclusions, it is so stupid of me. Nelson had a bad time of it that night. We sent for a doctor, but it was ages before we got him round, and then he seemed so strange and reticent that it frightened me still more. I thought he would lose his reason, he had just that look on his face. The following day he left us without a word. He just held both my hands very tightly, and said thank you with his eyes. Of course I made a fool of myself, and kissed him and cried over him like a child, which only made matters worse. I asked him what he intended doing, and he gasped 'Eleanor' under his breath, and rushed out of the house. We have never seen him since."

Philip stands before her.

"How strange. Then he has entirely vanished out of your lives? I thought he seemed strangely depressed at the theatre, the evening we went to the Savoy."

"Ah! that was the night before."

"Yes, he disappointed me. I had heard so much of your charming cousin, but I suppose the poor fellow had some inkling of it then."

"I never expect to see him again. He was a very sensitive man, and the curious or condoling looks of acquaintances would have driven him mad. Nelson says he has left England, yet no one knows where he has gone. The nice home on Richmond Terrace is broken up, and I have practically lost a brother. It was a strange ending to his married career."

"That is what comes of marrying beneath you. These people with low minds——"

Erminie stops her sister-in-law with a deprecating gesture. She is staunch to Philip, and knows how it would pain him to hear these words.

"I was fond of her," she says simply. "Let us talk of something else."

* * *

"I wish we could go up to the source of the Irrawaddy River, where no white man has ever been," says Eleanor, laying her hand confidingly in Carol's. "I should not be afraid with you, dear—such a traveller, and knowing the country so well. How many years is it since you were last in India?"

"Over seven. How did I drag through them without you?" he replies tenderly.

"We had a glorious voyage, didn't we? and everybody was so nice to us. I remember, Carol, how frightened I felt when first you suggested this long journey, and promised to take me north of Burmah to this strange, uncivilised village, where I should have to eat nothing but rice, or shoot my own game. Of course you had been here before, and though it is so wild and out of the way, there are still some white people to remind us we are not all savages."

"My dear, you must not call them 'savages,'" he says smiling. "They are really very nice, though a trifle odd and original, but that is what you like, I believe."

"Oh! yes. I am quite in love with my black servants. I think they are ever so much more picturesque and pleasant than my Richmond acquaintances. They look on me as a white angel, which no one would have done at home," with a smile at her quiet humour.

Digitized by Google

Eleanor's feelings by now are blunted to a certain extent, and she frequently jests on the wholesome horror with which her English friends must now regard "that reckless Mrs. Roche!"

Falls heavily on the floor at Erminie's feet.

Yet there are times when the thought of her sin rises like a dark thundercloud over the sunshine of this life of love.

She is standing in the low verandah of her bamboo house, looking out over a network of gorges, rifts, and ravines, precipices in peaks, with villages crowning each crest. The houses are thatched with long grass, which grows over the hills, while below in the valley the rice is cultivated in terraces. The villages are stockaded with bamboo, and the water runs through them in troughs of split bamboo.

"The people are certainly very dirty," says Eleanor, watching an old woman with large amber earrings, pounding rice, and talking to a dusky man in a blue turban.

"Yes. They wear their clothes till they fall off, and never wash except when it rains. That man below is a noted warrior in these parts."

"How do you know?"

"You see the sword slung over his shoulder, with a bamboo hoop? Well, the tiger's hoop is a sign of distinction."

"I wish the old woman would stop pounding. She makes my back ache to look at her. She has been making linen on a loom all day, and must be dreadfully tired."

"Did you notice the bell on it?"

"Yes. What was that for?"

"So that her lord and master may know when she stops working."

"There was a funeral to-day," says Eleanor; "the guns have been going since morning in the jungle, to keep the spirits off. What a misery it must be to believe in 'Nâts.'* That old woman there gave me a charm. I am always to wear it to keep the devils off. Do you think it will, Carol?" with a low laugh. "Or am I theirs already?"

"Don't, Eleanor," he cries, drawing her to him. "I cannot bear to hear you say such things."

She wriggles herself free, determined to tease him.

"But there are heaps of devils about," she declares, shaking her head, "or else why do they put up arches especially to keep them off—propitiate them, and prevent their entrance into the village? They have little bamboo huts like dolls' houses, and place food inside, that the devils may lodge and eat. It seems that the corpse to-day had a good time of it. They gave him a month's food, new gong and gun, a complete set of new clothes, and two or three gourds of Zoo—they are always drunk with that stuff. It is an awfully strong drink, though made from rice, which sounds innocent, doesn't it? Rice always reminds me of my bib and tucker days."

"It is rather like English cider, with the strength of whisky. But what a lot of information you pick up, little woman, while I am out shooting!"

"It terrifies me when you are away all day," she declares. "Then I feel lonely—deserted—afraid. Tigers and bears are such alarming things to picture you chasing, though you are accompanied by a troop of negroes."

Eleanor leans back in a low chair, gazing wistfully across the wild country. She can see the course of the Irrawaddy river, with its numerous rapids and picturesque cascades. It seems only the other day that she and Carol steamed up it, past Mandalay, Bhanio, and Myitkyina. She wishes they could travel on overland through the jade, amber, and ruby mines, but Carol fears for her, and prefers to stay in these more quasi-civilised regions.

A group of women and girls strikes her eye, carrying loads supported by a strap encircling their foreheads, after the curious fashion of Dundee fisherwomen.

The unmarried girls wear square-cut fringes and their hair hanging loosely at the sides to the shoulders, while the married women have it done up decorously on the head.

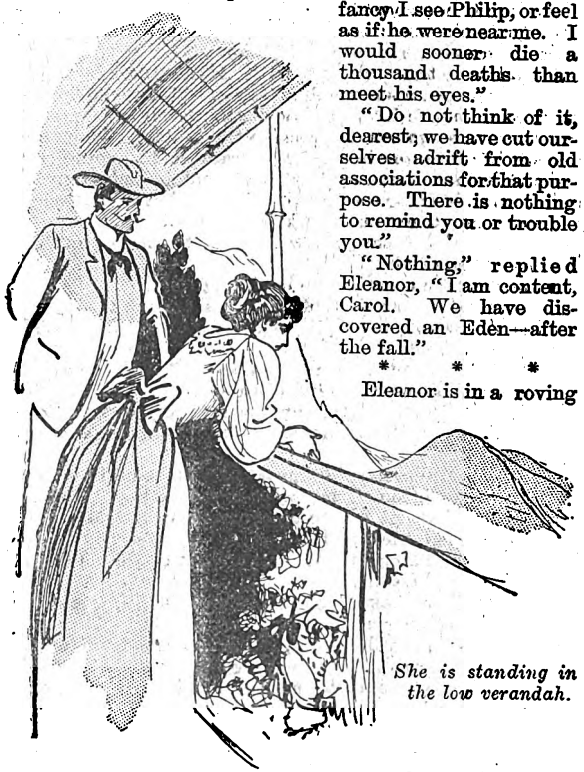
"I am glad I have not to carry loads like those poor creatures," says Eleanor softly, "yet perhaps an external load is better than an internal one. Sometimes Carol I remember that I once had a conscience. It just stirs and half wakes when I am quite alone. Often in the darkness I fancy I see Philip, or feel as if he were near me. I would sooner die a thousand deaths than meet his eyes."

"Do not think of it, dearest; we have cut ourselves adrift from old associations for that purpose. There is nothing to remind you or trouble you."

"Nothing," replied Eleanor, "I am content, Carol. We have discovered an Eden—after the fall."

* * *

Eleanor is in a roving



She is standing in the low verandah.

mood, and while Carol is engaged in the mild sport of pheasant shooting for a change, she wanders alone into the jungle to watch the children playing with large beans like marbles. Though she cannot understand what they say, she grasps the method of the game, watching it

*Spirits.

Digitized by Google

with amused interest. They are such queer little dusky creatures.

One boy among them especially attracts her attention. His face is strangely European, and his features noticeably different to those of his comrades. Yet his skin is dark and swarthy, there can be no mistaking the black blood in his veins.

Now and again Eleanor fancies she catches an English exclamation from his lips. She wishes she could join the children in their gambols, as in her girlhood at Copthorne. But they eye her suspiciously and sidle away when she approaches.

She wanders back disconsolately, wishing she knew more of the boy with the European face.

That very day her wish is satisfied. It is late in the afternoon, and Carol is still out. She is too blinded by love to resent his selfishness in leaving her so much alone, and wanders down to the river, singing from sheer lightness of heart.

She sees as she saunters along a trap set for a deer, and gives it a wide berth as she passes.

It consists of a noose fastened to the top of a pliant tree, which is bent down and pegged across a path leading down to the water. Thus it serves to entrap prey on the way to drink.

She has scarcely gone a hundred yards when a shriek rends the air, and turning simultaneously Eleanor sees a small boy trip over the noose, which released from the peg, flies back with the full force of the tree, carrying him into the air with it.

She rushes up terror-stricken at the horrible sight. The screaming child is suspended far above her head, the cruel thongs cutting deeply into his flesh.

The sight puts energy and cat-like agility into her limbs. She climbs the tree with all the daring of her orchard days, tearing great rents in her dress, spurred on by the cries of the helpless victim. She creeps on hands and knees along the willowy bow, upon which he hangs, till her weight combined with his, brings the inevitable result. A creak, a crash, and the two fall together to the ground. Unharmed herself save for a few bruises and scratches, Eleanor releases the unfortunate child, raising his bleeding body tenderly in her arms, binding up the wounds with her handkerchief, and soothing his groans with kisses.

"Oh! dear," she says, "I wish I knew where you lived, you poor little darling."

To her intense surprise the boy replies:

"Up there," pointing feebly with his injured arm.

Then she sees for the first time he is the child with the European features.

"Will it hurt you if I carry you back?" asks Eleanor.

"Best try," answers the boy abruptly.

He is heavy for his age, but she staggers forward manfully, while the little aching head drops confidingly on her shoulder.

"You're awful pretty," he gasps at last, "and I am dropping no end of blood off my arm on your bodice. Oh! how my leg hurts. Guess I have broken it clean in two."

At every step Eleanor fears she must give in, the perspiration is standing out on her forehead, while her own wounds smart and ache.

"I am afraid I shake you terribly up this hill, would you like me to rest a moment?"

Eleanor hopes he will say yes, for her strength is giving out.

"Sit on that stone, I'm just dying," moans the little lad.

Eleanor eagerly assents, and moves him into a more comfortable position.

"My mother is white like you," he says at last, raising his head.

"Is she dear? Are you better? Shall we go on?"

"Yes, please. We may meet father, he is ever so big and dark. I shall be big and dark too, all the good men are black."

"And the good women?" asks Eleanor, smiling in spite of her load.

"Oh! white of course, white all over like you and mother, hands, feet, everything."

Eleanor staggers on breathlessly up the hill, the boy seems to grow heavier at every step. She is nearly exhausted. He is like the weight of her sin, which increases with time.

Once or twice she stumbles, the boy clutches her round the neck, fearing she will fall upon him, and his hands half choke her. She gasps for breath.

"Is it much further?" she pants, turning sick and dizzy with the climb.

"No, there is my house, that hut ahead, see."

It has come in sight not a moment too soon, for Eleanor's arms are cramped and paralysed by supporting his body, her cheek pale with the heat, her heart fluttering spasmodically.

Only a few steps more, and she will have reached the haven of refuge. How foolish it would be to fail now.

Through sheer force of will she reaches the hut, and as the boy cries "Mother! mother!" she sinks exhausted in the entrance, still holding her suffering burden in her arms.

A woman rushes out, and takes her bleeding son from the stranger's embrace.

"He has been hurt," explains Eleanor faintly. "I carried him up the hill."

"Oh, you good soul!" cries the grateful mother, feeling her son's arms and legs; "and you're just as done up as can be. Come in, you poor young thing, and I'll give you a drink of Zoo to pull you round."

"No, thank you, I don't want anything. I am better now; but let me help you with the boy. We had better get his things off, and wash the wounds."

Together the two women tend the child. His leg is strained, not broken, and they put him to bed and watch him till he falls into a restless sleep.

Then their eyes meet, and the mother holds out her hand to Eleanor.

"God bless you!" she says; "if anything had happened to Tombo we should have broken our hearts. He is our only child."

Eleanor has recounted the history of the accident, leaving her share in the background, and making as light of it as possible.

She thinks as she looks at the white woman, with her fair hair and sandy eyelashes, that something in the face brings an indistinct memory to her mind.

She glances curiously round the hut, adorned by the heads of animals.

"I must go," she says; "it is getting late."

"The boy is sleeping. I will walk home with you."

"No, stay by him. I shall be all right alone."

"They have shot a tiger, and will all be drunk in the village for a week. You are different to me. I must come."

"Thank you," says Eleanor. "I shall enjoy your companionship. May I ask your name?"

"Elizabeth Kachin. And yours?"

"Eleanor—Eleanor Quinton."

Mrs. Roche's eyes droop as she turns them away from the sleeping face of that innocent child.

(To be continued.)

A New Serial by the author of the above delightful story commences in HOME NOTES next week.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

HAVE YOU A POST CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to the

PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

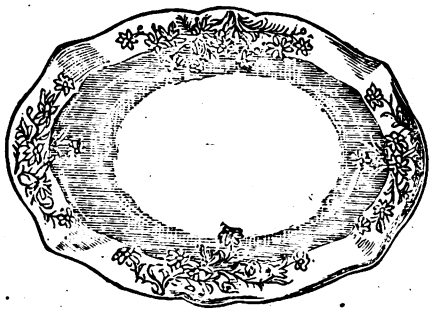
100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery.

The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley.

Thousands Sold All Over the World. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.



Hundreds of these packages are applied for as WEDDING or BIRTHDAY PRESENTS. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post Cards and Letters to be addressed to the PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY, STAFFS.

NOSE

A Radical Permanent Cure Medically approved for Red Noses, 3s. 9d. post free, under cover. Pamphlet "Red Noses, Cause and Prevention," 1s. Machines for Ugly Noses. Particulars for stamp. Lees Bay, Specialist, Wavertree, L'pool.

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free.—Address, H. Clifton, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

VIOLIN STRINGS.

4 Best "E's" (samples) 9d., post free.

S. S. CARY, NEWBURY.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

Profits Paid during 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 per cent. per month.

Profits Paid during 1896.

Jan. 2 ... £6 per cent. | Feb. 1 ... £7 per cent.
March 2 ... ... £6 per cent.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F.T. Holt. Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

THIN BUSTS

Quickly transformed and a good figure permanently obtained by a perfectly harmless, simple, and inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. For particulars, free, send stamped envelope in confidence to "Madame B.J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Caused by INDIGESTION, etc. All who suffer from this disfiguring complaint should write for DR. HOWELL'S RENOWNED REMEDY, 22, Glasshouse Street, London, W., who guarantees a cure in a few days. 2/6 a box.

KNOW THYSELF!

Your Character, Aptitudes, and Career marvellously described from Handwriting by distinguished Graphologist. Business Guidance. Success ensured. Fee 2s.

Professor CARONA, F.B.I.M.S., 126, Ledbury Road, Bayswater, W.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL JUST STARTED.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 378. FOR WEEK ENDING MARCH 28TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

HAVE YOU A POST CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery.

The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied, but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post Cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

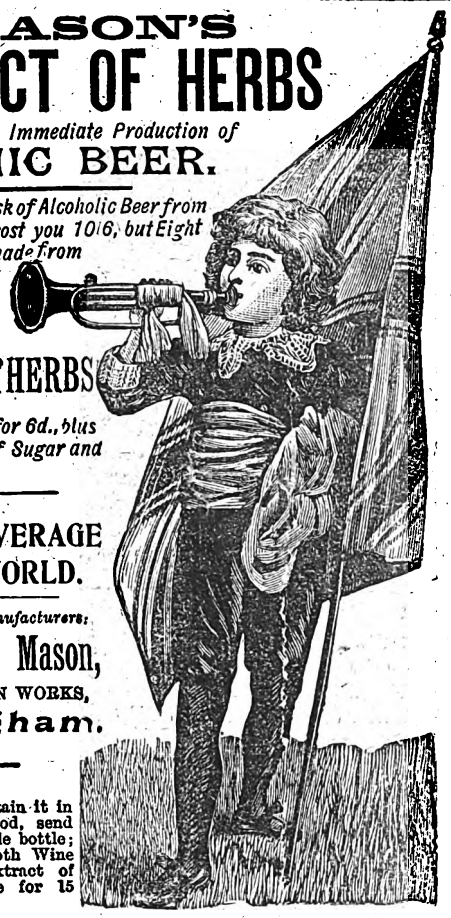
For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.



THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; 2lbs., 4s., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON

Digitized by Google

THE JOHN NOBLE

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Direct from the Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in the world, have secured beyond a doubt the ADMIRATION OF THE WORLD. Being Absolutely Without an Equal Anywhere for Stylish Appearance, Durability, and Actual Money Value. 10/6

TWO GOLD MEDALS AWARDED.

These Costumes have received the highest praise from the leading journals of the day, and are justly regarded by all purchasers as Even Better than Advertised.

Each Costume scientifically cut, tailor-made, and beautifully finished in an exceedingly smart mode, as illustration. The design consists of full wide Godet skirt with belt, also very neat bodice with full front and broad box-pleat down centre, trimmed bold silk cord and three large buttons. Collar and cuffs outlined silk cord; saddle and sleeves lined.

Price complete only 10/6, safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

Sizes in stock fit figures measuring 34, 36, or 38 in. round bust under arms, skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front; larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

THE JOHN NOBLE

COSTUMES FOR YOUNG MISSES are made in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, and trimmed military braid as illustration. A large box-pleat down the centre of the lined bodice, and a fancy pocket at each side of the skirt, complete a charming design at these prices: FROM 8/6

Lengths	35	38	42	46	50 inches.
Prices	8/6	9/6	10/9	12/-	13/6 each.

Each costume safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS are also supplied in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, with saddle top, long full sleeves, and pocket, at following prices: FROM 1/6

Lengths	21	24	27	30	33	36	39	42	45 ins.
Prices	1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-	5/6 ea.

Postage 1½d. extra. Lengths stated above are from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front.

COLOURS: Any of the above garments can be supplied in Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Bronze Green, Electric Blue, Ruby, Dark Cinnamon, Fawn, or Grey.

The JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE in which the above garments are made is a fabric of world-wide fame and durability, measuring 52ins. wide. The full Dress Length of Six Yards can be supplied for 7/6, or any length at 1/3 the yard. Colours as above. 7/6

PATTERNS, also FASHION SHEETS of numerous other designs in Ladies' and Children's Costumes, etc., sent Post Free on application. Please mention "Short Stories" when ordering.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

MRS. JACKSON

An artist's wife, residing at Norton, near Malton, states: "I am deeply grateful to you for the good received through taking your Wind Pills. I suffered severely from

INDIGESTION, SPASMS,

and LIVER COMPLAINT. The doctors gave me up as incurable, nor did I think it possible for me to recover. I scarcely dared to eat any food, fearing suffocation. Seeing an advertisement of

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills,

I resolved to try them. After taking a few small boxes I lost all the painful symptoms, and now enjoy good health. Publish my statement as you please."

All sufferers from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND on the STOMACH, SICK HEADACHE, BILIOUSNESS, etc., should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

☞ The Wind Pills being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, and Mild, and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

Of all Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for P.O. or Stamps from PAGE WOODCOCK, LINCOLN.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

RUBBER STAMPS FREE BY POST. AGENTS WANTED. Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters, 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, and Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. IRETON & CO., Ltd., 92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 13

Mar. 28, 1896.

S.S. S.S.

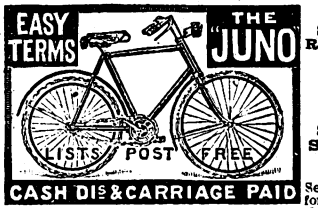
HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope Ad. Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "AD" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

"JUNO" CYCLES Are the Very Best



JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb. JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post-free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2 ... £6 per cent. | Feb. 1 ... £7 per cent.
March 2 ... ... £8 per cent.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

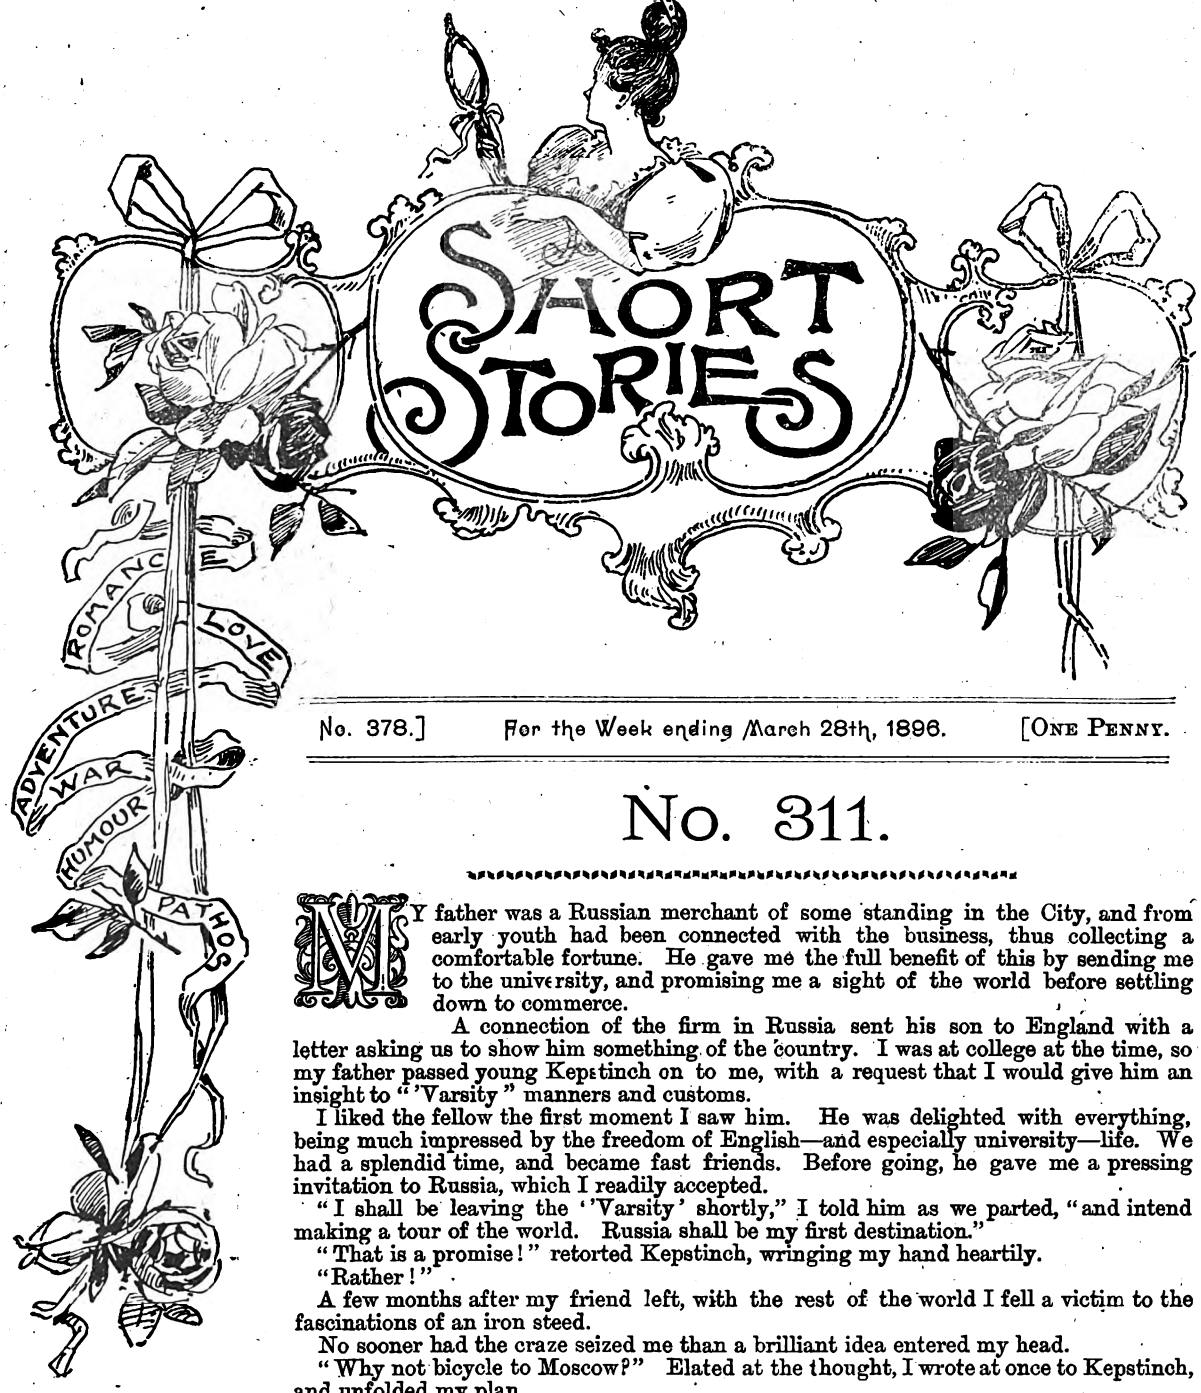
BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87 Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING. £20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (250 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.



No. 378.] For the Week ending March 28th, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

No. 311.

MY father was a Russian merchant of some standing in the City, and from early youth had been connected with the business, thus collecting a comfortable fortune. He gave me the full benefit of this by sending me to the university, and promising me a sight of the world before settling down to commerce.

A connection of the firm in Russia sent his son to England with a letter asking us to show him something of the country. I was at college at the time, so my father passed young Kepstinch on to me, with a request that I would give him an insight to "'Varsity" manners and customs.

I liked the fellow the first moment I saw him. He was delighted with everything, being much impressed by the freedom of English—and especially university—life. We had a splendid time, and became fast friends. Before going, he gave me a pressing invitation to Russia, which I readily accepted.

"I shall be leaving the 'Varsity' shortly," I told him as we parted, "and intend making a tour of the world. Russia shall be my first destination."

"That is a promise!" retorted Kepstinch, wringing my hand heartily.

"Rather!"

A few months after my friend left, with the rest of the world I fell a victim to the fascinations of an iron steed.

No sooner had the craze seized me than a brilliant idea entered my head.

"Why not bicycle to Moscow?" Elated at the thought, I wrote at once to Kepstinch, and unfolded my plan.

He replied that there were difficulties enough for a foreigner to get about Russia in the most approved style, and strongly advised me to stick to the railway.

I persisted, however, and Kepstinch, finding I was not to be persuaded out of it, arranged to procure me an exceptionally strong official pass, which would probably see me through any difficulties I might meet with.

I, like many of my fellow-countrymen, became far more enamoured of the idea when Kepstinch threw over it a slight halo of danger. He sent me a map of the roads, pointing out different places I could stop at, some of which were necessarily rather a long day's journey apart.

"Send me," he wrote, "the best photograph you have of yourself. I inclose a letter from an official which you must present at the frontier, where you will find yourself a person of some importance. They will have you examined by some magnificent myrmidons of the law, and identify you by the photograph, which will then be returned with several hieroglyphics on the back. Preserve this as your life, for wherever you go, you will find it a ready passport. It will come from a friend of mine who is head of the Secret Police."

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

I smiled as I read this epistle, glad at having determined to go by train to the Russian frontier, the quicker to enter upon the exciting part of my journey.

"No fun," I said, "cutting through Belgium and Germany; might as well be touring round Hyde Park for a month!"

So I went off with a light heart, having no fear for anything but the possible puncturing of my bicycle tyres.

At the Russian frontier I became veritably a notable person.

On producing my letter I was selected from the crowd of ordinary travellers, and marched off with a good deal of ceremony into a private room of the police.

Here they treated me with the greatest courtesy, and my identity being established, I was handed my own photograph, with sundry devices on the back.

The Chief of the Police, who spoke French, gave me every information and much advice.

I listened politely while he told me where to apply in case of trouble. I anticipated no evils beyond having to sleep under a hedge should my machine break down on one of the long stages.

He cautioned me to prepare for this contingency as well as my limited capacity would allow, and especially to take a good big flask of brandy.

After a night's rest, and having seen my luggage off to Moscow, I started on my way.

The country folk amused me; I was a source of great excitement to them. Some showed immense astonishment at my wheel, while others greeted me with what I instinctively felt to be ribald jests, and unmistakable hilarity.

My nights lodging was sometimes comfortable, more often not, but always interesting.

My tyres behaved bravely, so that the only anxiety gradually calmed and vanished, since the roads were even and the stones round.

On the fifth day I had to face a journey of eighty miles with apparently no inhabitants.

I supplied myself with as much food and drink as my machine would carry, taking the drink neat, and trusting for water to dilute it. So I rode off gaily, whistling one of the old college songs, and enjoying the wild, bleak scenery around.

The roads were fairly good, save for some white spa scattered about with dangerously sharp edges. They were, however, easily seen and avoided, until a spin down a delicious incline brought my stalwart tyre in direct contact with a sharp pointed edge of an embedded rock. Then, alas, were my worst fears realised. The tyre was not only punctured, but literally cut in half, beyond all amateur repairing.

I have been told I am level tempered, so I felt glad there was only the rock and the torn tyre to hear the hasty language that escaped my lips.

Having told these silent objects exactly what I thought of them, with my hands thrust in my pockets, and my forehead wrinkled into frowns, it struck me to look at my register. A groan greeted the intelligence: "Forty miles traversed. Forty more not only to walk, but to walk and push."

However, there was no help for it, and being about midday there was the chance I might get to a bed by midnight. I refreshed the inner man, lit a pipe, and started on my trudge.

Oh, how long the road seemed! What endless hours! What monotony and fatigue!

Ten o'clock found me enveloped in darkness, and according to my distance register, still eight miles from my destination.

A heavy sensation of intense weariness crept over me, taking the form of almost insupportable sleepiness.

I paused, my lamp burning brightly gave me a good view of my road for a few yards ahead.

If only I could find some sheltered spot in which to lie down and rest, but all was bare and bleak. I pulled myself together, and leaning heavily on my machine, dragged my aching feet along. A turning from the road caught my eye. Would that lead to some refuge? I peered through the gloom hopefully, and discovered by the aid of my lamp an uninhabited and dilapidated building. It might once have been a chapel, I could not tell, and cared less, the sight of any port in a storm is welcome. I tried the door, it opened on its rusty hinges. Nothing but bare walls greeted me, and empty window frames.

I crossed the floor to a doorway leading to a small inner room.

"This will do," I said, wheeling my wounded cycle through the doorless portal, round the corner of which I found myself slightly protected from draughts.

Congratulating myself on the discovery of even this lodging, I undid my light luggage, arranged a pillow, took a pull at my flask, extinguished the lamp, and threw myself down in a state of utter exhaustion.

In a few moments my troubles fled, and I sank into a deep dreamless sleep.

It seemed as if I had hardly closed my eyes, though it was probably many hours, when a dazzling light shone in my face, and I awoke with a start to find myself surrounded by about dozen men.

I sprang to my feet, but was instantly seized on either side. I stared at them bewildered, then pointed to my wrecked bicycle, hoping that would explain my peaceable presence there.

My gestures however had not the desired effect, and finding myself still in the grip of these burly strangers, I was marched into the next room.

The utmost excitement appeared to prevail, which I was utterly at a loss to comprehend. Two or three men quickly left the building with an evident purpose, while the others whispered among themselves, watching me as they did so with sharp glittering eyes. One of the band, a tall, handsome fellow, with thick eyebrows and broad forehead addressed me in an unknown tongue.

I shook my head vacantly, and replied: "I don't understand!"

"English," he said turning to his companions.

A look of satisfaction and relief passed round.

"Vous parlez Français!" suggested my spokesman.

I replied in the same tongue that I did.

"Why are you here?"

The question was asked in a solemn, sepulchral voice that re-echoed through the gloomy building.

I looked at the great strong fellow and thought what a warrior he would make.

My explanation was easily made. I detailed my adventure word for word, and apologised for sheltering in what was evidently their domain.

"You have heard what passed at our meeting?"

Their meeting! A vague suspicion crept into my heart. The mystery was clearing.

"Not one syllable," I replied quickly in my most convincing tones, and looking the spokesman straight in the eyes.

"How can we be sure of this," he said, half speaking to himself.

Digitized by Google

I glanced towards the door, as the other men returned. They had evidently been outside to see if I had any accomplices, and appeared to give satisfactory assurances.

The tall man continued in his low, bass voice.

"Had you been of any other nationality," he said, "we should have been obliged to pass sentence of instant death upon you, fearing you might have heard what took place at our meeting here to-night. As it is, our society incurs great risk in letting you go free. We feel, however, that no one of your countrymen would debase himself by spying into matters which are purely Russian. Show us your papers to prove what you say, and we will leave you after receiving your oath that you heard nothing."

I brightened at the thought of the talisman which I held safely in my pocket, and blessed Kepstinch for his forethought. I raised my hand to draw it forth, but was again seized, while they politely but firmly insisted upon emptying my pockets themselves.

"They are afraid I may be carrying a revolver," I thought, confidently awaiting their production of the magic photograph, which would make them receive me as a brother, with open arms.

My counterfeit presentment was taken out and compared with the original. The likeness was unmistakable, and nothing of an incriminating character was found.

"But where is your passport?" asked the spokesman.

Before I could reply a cry came from a burly, long-haired man who was examining my photograph. The loosened grasps on my arms tightened, excited faces crowded round my picture, contorted with sudden hatred, while groans of disapproval broke from their lips. Something evidently was very wrong.

The speaker approached, his mighty form drawn up to its full height, his breast swelling, and his voice quivering with rage.

Three words came in the sudden hush, and re-echoed round the bare walls with hideous meaning and intensity:

"Prepare for death!"

I started back, chilled to the bone, amazed, incredulous.

For the moment surprise overcame my fear, and I burst out with: "What the dickens is the matter?" in pure Saxon.

One of the number stepped forward, and in poor, but intelligible English informed me that the signs on the back of my photograph showed me to be an emissary of the most secret and dreaded police, whose rule their society was formed to crush.

In fact, to my horror and consternation, I found myself stamped in an incontrovertible manner as in close alliance with the deadly enemies of these men. If I had been awake, as they half imagined, I should be possessed of some vital secrets of the most advanced Nihilist society.

In our darkest hours vivid and peculiar thoughts burn themselves on the brain. My home with its peaceful and well loved circle flashed quickly across my memory, I felt my mother's farewell kiss linger tenderly upon my lips, while I grasped again my father's hand. They were like visions from another world, immeasurable distance stretched between us, the barking of the old dog as he fawned about my knee grew fainter and fainter, there was the scream of an engine, the rush of a train. One desire came upon me with intense longing. "Oh! that I were at Charing Cross station on my way home."

Then the sensation of powerful pulsating life in my veins, compared in that dread moment with the dust of death, the horror of annihilation!

A fight for freedom was out of the question, though I pulled myself together for one great effort when the time came.

At all events I determined to die resisting.

The men were talking eagerly among themselves, and I was quick to notice that the one who spoke some English seemed the most irate against me.

He was evidently taking the lead in the matter of my execution, for which palpable preparation was being made.

A numb, paralysing cold seemed clutching at my heart with iron fingers, followed by deadly sickness, as I watched him produce a gleaming dagger, vieing with his confrères for the honour of using it murderously.

He approached me with queer dilating eyes, informing me I should have ten minutes to make my peace with God.

I returned his look with loathing, regarding in horror and disgust the miserable wretch who had so evidently demanded and secured the office of my butcher. I shuddered at the bloodthirsty tendency of this foul fiend!

What was then my amazement on hearing him half whisper in English by my ear:

"Escape is impossible except through me. Do exactly what I tell you without fear. Trust in my wits; it is your only chance!"

With these words he passed into the room adjoining, while hope sprang swiftly to my breast. I asked myself a series of bewildering questions, but answered none.

Could this man indeed have good intentions, and if so—how was it possible for him to carry them out? Perhaps he was only making it easier for me to die, knowing that an Englishman would have a struggle for his life in the face of all odds.

He returned from the room after what seemed an interminable age. I scanned his features eagerly, anxious to read the truth in his expression. What strange change had come over the man? He looked pale, weak, ill. I fancied his movements were laboured; occasionally he winced as if in pain.

With the fatal dagger in his hand he addressed his friends in Russian. I did not know what he said, but could see they all assented. Then turning to me he spoke again in English, which was certainly quite unintelligible to the others:

"I am supposed," he began, "to be telling you to prepare for death. When I raise my voice, show signs of emotion. The men will release you at my command. As I stab you, fall forward on your face, and do not stir beyond a shudder."

My eyes lit up with sudden hope.

"Don't look like that!" he exclaimed, and as he spoke my expression relaxed to one of feigned terror and abject despair.

"Be careful," he continued, "when carried out to show no sign, no movement. You will be buried, but rely on me to find means for preserving your life."

This speech was delivered with great deflection of voice for the benefit of those assembled. Then he turned and gave some orders in Russian, whereupon several men went out.

A conflicting multitude of fears and hopes swayed my mind; one moment I felt almost reassured, the next, knowing what difficulties and dangers must arise, my heart sank afresh.

Lurking doubts as to my champion made themselves felt, while I scanned the company curiously.

Digitized by Google

What effect would the death of a fellow-creature have upon them? Could they witness it utterly unmoved?

Some turned pale, while their eyes shifted uneasily. One I noticed edged to the back, that he might look away without creating observation; others pushed forward gloatingly, a look of eager, almost hungry expectation on their faces, while their mouths gaped, and their bare red necks extended.

I could not analyse my own sensations, it all seemed like a ghastly nightmare, and I wondered if these blood-thirsty ruffians would fade before my eyes. Then tramping of feet outside, and the men returned, evidently having worked hard, for their sleeves were rolled up, their shirts open at the throat, and their boots clogged with moist earth.

I gathered from their appearance, they had been digging my grave.

I felt the cold beads of perspiration break out on my forehead, as I gazed at their soiled hands.

I believed my time had come!

My new-found friend advanced, and spoke again in measured tones:

"Are you nerved for what you have to go through?" he asked.

I bowed assent.

"I shall order the men to leave you, and trust to you to stand quiet and firm, apparently facing death without flinching. Any movement on your part may prove fatal."

A word from him in Russian, and I was free. Involuntarily I pulled myself together as if for a general scrimmage, but a moment's consideration, and I determined to place myself in the hands of this man, come what might.

Yet still the haunting thought returned. He might simply be acting a part to make my slaughter more easy.

My executioner approached, dagger in hand, and some of the strongest and fiercest men shrank back, showing some slight signs of emotion.

"I am going to feel under your shirt, to see, as they think, that there is nothing in the way of your heart," said my would-be saviour, "but in reality I shall place something to protect you."

I felt it touch my breast as he spoke, and drew myself up to tighten my clothes over whatever he had placed upon my heart.

My apparent bravery had a visible effect upon the audience. They muttered a smothered ejaculation.

"They are in a hurry," said the man with the dagger, "they could stand your shrieks, but are touched by your fortitude. Are you ready?"

My throat became dry and parched, a crimson mist rose before my eyes, my pulses quickened painfully. It was with difficulty I gasped the fatal word:

"Yes!"

A second that seemed like an hour—and the blow came! My head whirled, and a cry broke from my lips, just one gasp of mental agony, while a prick— a distinct prick warned me it was time to fall. One shudder—and I lay prostrate on the ground, uncertain still of my fate. Was I dead? No! my heart beat still, rapidly but surely. What was that red stream oozing from me on the floor? Blood! unmistakable blood, yet not from my veins. I felt no pain, no weakness. My supposed murderer bent down, and no doubt assured the others that I was dead, for the majority left the place hurriedly. I could hear them tramping away.

Quickly my friend's arms were round my chest, and others grasped my legs.

"Be very still," he whispered, as they raised me from the floor, and carried me out.

I could feel the cool air on my forehead, then a deep step down, and I was laid on the new turned soil in a shallow grave. But why so wide? The men dropped my legs and moved away.

"They have gone for your bicycle," quickly whispered the familiar voice. "I told them to bury that also to hide all trace. I shall lay it over you to keep off the weight of earth. The wheels lying flat fit on a ledge. Here is your broken indiarubber tyre. it will serve as a tube to introduce air, and keep you alive till I return."

He only just had time to say this, when the bicycle arrived. and was carefully placed over me, covered by a sack.

The end of the tube was in my mouth, concealed by the darkness of the night, while the earth was shovelled in, my friendly wheels carrying it bravely.

All was quiet, the stillness of death reigned, I lay consumed by horror in my gruesome grave, the tube working without interruption.

Every imaginable terror passed through my agonised mind, suffocation first, and then slow but sure starvation, should my rescuer fail. Every second I felt my breath must stop, I longed to move my cramped limbs, to raise myself, if but an inch.

How many hours—days—years were rolling over my head. Surely the earthy tomb had held me down through centuries of suffering.

I thought my heart was failing me, that insensibility was creeping on a-pace. The end that had only been postponed was coming, though I struggled to gasp on—on—just one more fleeting breath—and, then, oh! God——

What were those sounds above?

Fresh hope gave me fresh life. Someone was digging me out! Should I last till the blessed air fell on my fevered brow? How many spadefuls of earth before freedom—release! My mind began to wander. I fancied the accursed sod was in my mouth and eyes and ears! All the dead of many nations whispered hideous truths, and stretched out their skeleton arms to receive me. I pushed them back and shrieked aloud:

"Have mercy, God of Heaven! Spare! Spare!"

As if in answer, the cool breezes of night broke through this ghastly gloom. I opened my eyes, and the stars were shining down—the blessed stars, in the deep firmament above.

I stood on the green turf, trembling like an aspen leaf, white as a veritable corpse, clasping my deliverer's grimy hand.

"I am in the service of the police as a Nihilist," he explained in answer to my overwhelming gratitude. "I inform them when anything serious is about to occur. When I saw who had written your pass on the photograph, I determined to save you."

"And the blood?" I asked, feeling at my uninjured heart.

"That," he replied, "I got from my own body, and preserved it for the crucial moment in the tobacco pouch which I placed under your shirt."

I was speechless with wonder and thankfulness. He took me gently by the arm.

"No time to delay," he said. "Get at once to the town, and take the first train to the frontier. If you do this quickly, you will be safe."

Needless to say I took the hint at once, but before leaving, anxiously inquired how I could repay his marvellous service.

"Inform the signatory to your photograph how you were saved by No. 311." W. G.

Digitized by Google

ASHIK KERIB.

A Turkish Story.

From the Russian of Lermontov.

Once upon a time, in the town of Tiflis, dwelt a wealthy Turk. Much gold had Allah given him; but dearer than gold to him was his only daughter, Magool Megéri. Lovely stars are in the sky; but above the stars are angels, and they are fairer still; even so Magool Megéri was fairer than all the daughters of Tiflis.

There was also living in Tiflis a poor man, Ashik Kerib. To him the Prophet had given nothing, except a lofty soul and the gift of song. Playing on the guitar, and praising the ancient heroes of Turkestan, he used to frequent weddings, to make merry for the fortunate and the rich. At one wedding he saw Magool Megéri, and they fell in love with one another. Small hope had Ashik Kerib of winning her hand, and he grew sad as the winter sky.

Well, once he lay in a garden under a vine, and at last he fell asleep. At that moment came by Magool Megéri, with her friends, and one of them espying Ashik Kerib, stopped and went up to him.

"Why sleepest thou beneath the vine?" she sang. "Arise, foolish one, thy gazelle is passing by!"

He awoke; the girl flitted away like a bird. Magool Megéri heard her song, and began to chide her.

"If thou knewest," she replied, "to whom I sang my song, thou wouldst be grateful; that is thy Ashik Kerib."

"Take me to him!" said Magool Megéri.

Seeing his sorrowful countenance, Magool Megéri began to speak and give him comfort.

"How can I help my grief," said Ashik Kerib; "I love thee, and thou wilt be never mine!"

"Ask my father for my hand," quoth she, "and my father will celebrate our wedding at his own charges, and will give me dower enough for both."

"Good," said he, "suppose Ayak Aga will grudge nothing to his daughter; but who knows that hereafter thou wilt not reproach me, saying that I had nothing, and owed everything to thee? No, gentle Magool Megéri, I have sworn an oath in my own heart; I vow for seven years to wander about the world, and to earn riches for myself; or else to die far away in the desert. If thou consent to this, when the set time comes to an end, thou shalt be mine."

She consented, but added thereto, that if on the appointed day he should not return, she would become the wife of Kurshid Bey, who had long been wooing her.

Came Ashik Kerib to his mother, received her blessing on his path, kissed his little sister, slung a wallet across his shoulder, and, leaning upon his traveller's staff, went forth from Tiflis town. And behold, a horseman overtakes him; he looks—'tis Kurshid Bey!

"Good journey to thee!" cries the Bey. "Go where thou wilt, I am thy comrade!"

No happy man was Ashik Kerib for his companion; but there was no help for it. Long did they journey together, and at last before them they saw a river. No bridge, no ford.

"Swim across," said Kurshid Bey—"I follow." Ashik Kerib folded his cloke, and swam. Once across, a glance behind him—O pity! O Almighty Allah! Kurshid Bey, seizing the cloke, was in full course back to Tiflis; only the dust was to be seen behind him, winding like a snake over the level plain. Arrived in Tiflis, the Bey takes Ashik Kerib's cloke to his old mother.

"Thy son has been drowned in a deep river," quoth he; "here is his cloke."

In woe unspeakable the mother fell upon the garment of her beloved son, and began to bathe it in hot tears; then she carried it to her who should have been her daughter, Magool Megéri.

"My son is drowned," she said. "Kurshid Bey has brought back his cloke; thou art free."

Magool Megéri smiled, and answered: "Believe it not; that is all the invention of Kurshid Bey. Until the seven years are up, no man shall be my husband."

From the wall she took down her guitar, and sang the beloved song of poor Ashik Kerib.

Meanwhile the traveller, barefoot and bareback, arrived at a village. Good folks clothed him and fed him; in return he sang them wonderful songs. In this fashion he passed from village to village, from town to town, and the fame of him spread abroad everywhere. At last he came to Khalaf. As usual, he proceeded to the coffee-house, asked for a guitar, began to sing. At that time there dwelt in Khalaf a Pasha, who was a great patron of singers. Many more they brought to him; not one of them found favour in his sight. His men were a-weary with going on the road. On a sudden, in passing by the coffee-house, they hear a marvellous voice. In they go.

Digitized by Google

"Either come with us to the great Pasha," they cried, "or thou answerest for it with thy head!"

"A free man am I, a stranger from Tiflis town," quoth Ashik Kerib; "as I will, I go; as I will, I go not; I sing when it suits me, and your Pasha is no master of mine." But, notwithstanding, they seized him and took him before the Pasha.

"Sing!" said the Pasha, and he began to sing. And in that song he praised his dear Magool Megéri, and that song so pleased the proud Pasha, that he kept poor Ashik Kerib with him. Gold and silver showered upon him; he gleamed in richest finery. Merry and happy was the life of Ashik Kerib, and he won great wealth. Did he forget his Magool Megéri, or not? I know not; but the time glided by. The last year must soon come to an end, but he made no preparation for his journey. Beautiful Magool Megéri began to despair. At that time a certain merchant was starting with a caravan from Tiflis, having forty camels and twice forty slaves. She called the merchant to her, and gave him a golden dish.

"Take this dish," said she, "and into what town soever thou shalt come, put this dish upon thy stall, and proclaim that he who claims my dish as the owner, and proves it, shall receive the dish, and withal, its weight in gold."

Off went the merchant; everywhere he fulfilled the behest of Magool Megéri, but no one laid claim to the golden dish. At last he had sold nigh all his wares, and with the residue he came to Khalaf. He proclaimed everywhere the bidding of Magool Megéri. Hearing of this, Ashik Kerib repairs to the caravanserai, and there he sees the golden dish on the stall of the Tiflis merchant.

"That is mine!" said he, taking it up in his hand.

"Thine, truly," said the merchant, "I recognise thee, Ashik Kerib. Get thee at once to Tiflis; thy Magool Megéri bade say to thee that the time is running out, and if thou be not there on the appointed day, she will go to another." In despair, Ashik Kerib smote his head; of the time appointed but three days remained. Howbeit, he mounted upon his horse, taking with him a parcel of gold, and away he galloped, not sparing the horse. At last the tired steed fell lifeless on Arzinyan Hill, which is between Arzinyan and Erzeroom. What was he to do? From Arzin to Tiflis was two months' journey, and there remained but two days.

"Almighty Allah!" he cried, "if thou helpest me not now, there is nothing I can do in all the world!" And he made as though to cast himself over a high precipice. Suddenly he sees beneath a man on a white horse, hears a loud voice.

"Youth, what wouldst thou do?"

"I would die," says Ashik Kerib.

"If so, come down here, and I will kill thee." Ashik Kerib somehow got down the precipice.

"Follow behind me," sternly said the horseman.

"How can I follow thee?" said Ashik Kerib. "Thy steed flies like the wind, and I am burdened with my gold."

"True. Put thy gold upon my saddle, and follow." Ashik Kerib stood still, as though he did not mean to move. "Why standest still?" asked the rider.

"Because I cannot follow after thee; thy steed is quicker than thought, and I am weary."

"True. Sit behind me on the horse, and tell me the whole truth; whither wouldst thou go?"

"If I could only get as far as Erzeroom to-day," replied Ashik.

"Shut thy eyes, then."

He shut them.

"Now open."

Ashik looked: before him were the white walls and gleaming minarets of Erzeroom.

"Guilty, Aga!" quoth Ashik. "I have sinned! I would have said that I must to Kars."

"So, so," answered the horseman, "I warned thee to tell the whole truth. Shut thy eyes again! Now open."

Ashik can hardly believe his eyes, that this is Kars. He fell on his knees, and said: "Guilty, Aga! thrice guilty thy servant Ashik Kerib; but thou knowest that if a man makes up his mind to lie in the morning, lie he must till night. In every truth I must needs to Tiflis!"

"How little is thy faith!" said the horseman, much in wrath; "but there's nothing for it, I forgive thee. Shut thy eyes. Now open," after a minute.

Ashik cried aloud for joy; they stood at the gates of Tiflis. Offering the thanks of his heart, and taking his gold from the saddle, Ashik Kerib said to the horseman: "Aga, of a truth thy goodness is great; but grant me yet one other boon. If I now tell how in one day I came from Arzinyan to Tiflis, no man will believe me; do thou give me some sign."

"Stoop down," said the other smiling; "take from under my horse's hoof a clod of earth, and put it in thy bosom; if they will not believe the truth of thy words, bid them bring thee a blind woman that has been seven years without sight, smear it on her eyes, and she shall see."

Ashik took a clod of earth from under the hoof of the white horse; but when he raised his head, horse and man had vanished. Then he knew in his soul that his protector was none other than St. George.

It was late in the evening before Ashik Kerib found himself at his own home. He knocked at the door with trembling hand, saying: "Mother, mother, open! I am God's guest; I am cold and hungry; I pray for the sake of thy wandering son, let me in!" The weak voice of the old dame made answer: "For lodging there are the houses of the rich and mighty; there is a wedding now in the town, thither wend: there thou canst pass the night in merriment."

"Mother," quoth he, "here I have no acquaintance, and therefore I repeat my prayer: for the sake of thy wandering son, let me in!" Then said his sister to her mother: "Mother, I will rise and open the door to him."

Says the mother: "Worthless girl! thou art glad to receive young men, and show them hospitality, because it is now seven years since I went blind for weeping."

But the daughter, nought heeding her reproaches, opened the door and let in Ashik Kerib. With the usual greeting, he sat down, and began to look about him with secret emotion. And this is what he saw on the wall, in a dusty wrapper—his sweet-toned guitar; and he asked his mother: "What is that hanging upon the wall?"

Quoth she: "Inquisitive guest, be content if there is a piece of bread for thee, and to-morrow go with God's blessing."

"I have already told thee," said he, "thou art my own mother, and this my sister; and therefore I ask thee to declare what this should be hanging upon the wall."

"That is a guitar, a guitar," angrily answered the old dame, believing not a word.

Digitized by Google

"But what may that be, a guitar?"

"A guitar is that on which they play, and sing songs to it."

Then he begged her to bid his sister take down the guitar and show it to him.

"It cannot be," replied the old woman; "that is the guitar of my unhappy son, and now 'tis seven years it has been hanging there, and no living hand has touched it." But his sister arose and took down the guitar and gave it to him. Then uplifting his eyes to Heaven, he uttered this prayer.

"Oh, Almighty Allah! If I am to attain to my desire, then may my seven-stringed lute be in tune, as on that day when last I played upon it!" Then he smote upon the copper strings, and the strings rang out harmonious; and he began to sing:

"A poor wanderer I, and my words are poor; but the great St. George hath helpen me to climb down the steep precipice. Although I am poor, and poor my words, know me, mother, thy wandering son!"

After this his mother began to weep, and bespake him: "How do they name thee?"

"Trueheart," he answered.

"Speak once, listen oft, Trueheart," said she. "By thy speech thou hast torn my heart in pieces. This very night in my sleep I saw that on my head the hair is white. 'Tis now seven years since I went blind for weeping. Tell me, thou that hast his voice, when will my son return?"

And twice with tears she repeated her request. In vain he declared himself to be her son, she believed him not. And after some time he asked her:

"Thy leave, mother dear, to take the guitar and go out. I have heard that hard by they have a wedding; my sister will lead the way. I will play and sing, and all that I earn I will bring back here and share it with you."

"I will not grant thee leave," replied the dame. "Ever since my son is not, his guitar has not passed out of my house."

Then he began to swear that he would not hurt a single string. "But if even one string break," went on Ashik, "I will answer for it with all that I have."

The old woman felt his parcel of gold, and finding that it was full of coins, she let him go. Leading him to the rich house, where were the sounds of the wedding feast, his sister waited by the door to hear what should happen.

In that house lived Magool Megéri, and on that night she must become the wife of Kurshid Bey. Kurshid Bey was feasting with his kinsfolk; but Magool Megéri, seated behind a curtain with her companions, held in one hand a cup of poison, and in the other hand a keen dagger. She had sworn to die before she would stoop to become the wife of Kurshid Bey. And from amongst the group of girls, she heard how a stranger came in, who said:

"Salaam aleikam! Here ye are making merry and feasting, so grant to me, a poor stranger, to sit with you, and in return I will sing to you a song."

"Why not?" said Kurshid Bey. "Here should be open house for singers and dancers, for here is a wedding feast. Sing something, minstrel, and I will reward thee with a handful of gold."

Then Kurshid Bey asked him: "But how do they name thee, wayfarer?"

"Soon-will-ye-know."

"What kind of name is that?" asked the other with a laugh; "that name I never heard before."

Then he took his guitar, and began to sing:

"In the town of Khalaf I drank wine; but God gave me wings, and I flew hither in three days."

The brother of Kurshid Bey, a man of little wit, drew his sword, shouting: "Thou liest! How is it possible to travel from Khalaf hither in three days?"

"Why wouldst thou kill me?" said Ashik. "Minstrels are wont to foregather from all the four quarters of the earth; believe me, believe me not, I rob you of nothing."

Quoth the bridegroom: "Let him go on," and Ashik Kerib sang again.

"Morning prayer I said in the vale of Arzinyan, and midday prayer on the hill of Erzeroom; before the setting of the sun I said my prayer on the hill of Kars, and at evening I prayed in Tiflis. Allah gave me wings, and I flew hither; God grant that I might sacrifice my life for the white horse! He galloped swift, like a dancer on the rope, from hill to valley, from valley to hill; our Lord gave wings to Ashik, and he flew to the wedding of Magool Megéri."

Then Magool Megéri knew his voice: she threw poison one way, knife the other. "And that is how thou keepest thine oath!" said a friend to her; "is it so, that this night thou wilt be wife to Kurshid Bey?"

"Ye knew it not, but I knew the voice so sweet to me," replied Magool Megéri; and seizing a knife, she rent the curtain through. No sooner had she looked and recognised her Ashik Kerib, she cried aloud and threw herself on his neck, and both fell down in a swoon. At them with his sword leapt the brother of Kurshid Bey, to thrust them through; but Kurshid Bey stayed him, saying:

"Calm thyself, and know, that from a man's birth 'tis written in his forehead, that which he cannot avoid."

When she came to herself, Magool Megéri blushed for shame; she hid her face in her hands, and retired behind the curtain.

"Now it is truly clear that thou art Ashik Kerib," said the bridegroom; "but explain how in so short a time thou couldst accomplish such a journey?"

"In proof of my truthfulness," quoth Ashik, "my sabre will cut through a stone; if I lie, my neck shall be thinner than a hair. But best of all, bring me a blind woman, who for seven years has not seen God's world, and I will restore her sight." Ashik Kerib's sister, standing in the hall beside the door, heard this speech, and went for her mother.

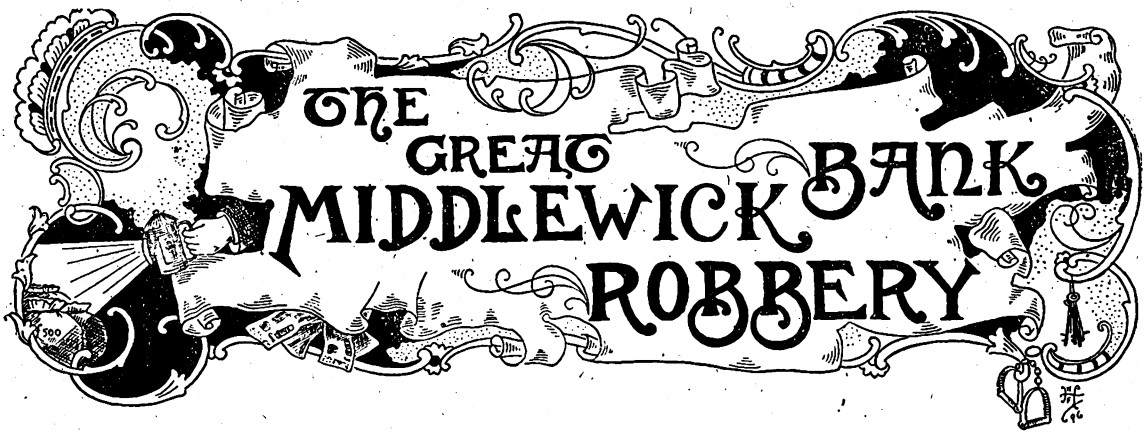
"Mother mine!" cried she, "that is truly my brother and truly thy son, Ashik Kerib!" and taking the old dame by the hand, she led her to the wedding-feast.

Then Ashik Kerib took out of his bosom the clod of earth, mixed it with water and anointed his mother's eyes, saying: "Know, all people, what is the might and greatness of St. George!" and his mother received her sight. After that durst no man doubt the truth of his report, and Kurshid Bey silently yielded him the beautiful Magool Megéri.

Then in his joy Ashik Kerib said to him: "Hearken, Kurshid Bey, I have a gift for thee. My sister is no less worthy than thy former bride; I am rich, and she will have silver and gold no less; so take her to thee, and be ye as happy together as I am with my beloved Magool Megéri."

W. H. D. Rouse.

Digitized by Google



SUMMARY.

Mr. Bryant, Manager of Middlewick Bank.
Herbert Stewart, Cashier.
Frank Rutherford, Book-keeper.
Alfred Taylor, Detective.
John Warren, Old Watchman.
Jack Burton, New Watchman—a detective in disguise.
Miss Denton, Bryant's niece, and in love with Rutherford.

£20,000 is stolen from the Bank one night while John Warren is asleep. The only persons apparently aware of the key to the combination lock are Mr. Bryant and Mr. Stewart. Taylor interviews Mr. Bryant and the new watchman, Jack Burton, who, by his movements, appears to be a colleague of Taylor, unknown to Mr. Bryant. Taylor is led to suspect Frank Rutherford of having obtained the key to the lock, and shadows him. He visits the Bank during the night to talk matters over with his colleague, Jack Burton, and while there Mr. Bryant comes in, and Taylor hides. After he has gone, and as Taylor is leaving, they see a figure watching the Bank.

CHAPTER V.

I must Do my Duty.

Five, ten, fifteen minutes passed, and the figure at the opposite corner did not leave his post of observation.

"We'll easily tire him out," said the detective; "he'll have to give in before morning."

"Hush! he is impatient already."

In the uncertain light of the lamp near the corner, the faint outline of a man could now and then be discerned, standing well back in the shadow of the building. As if tired of standing in one position so long, the stranger changed his pose, thus enabling the watchers to observe him in the gloom.

Suddenly he stepped plainly into view, and hurried round the corner, taking precisely the opposite course from that of the man whom the detective attempted to follow.

"Now, Alf," whispered the watchman, opening the door so rapidly that it moved without the slightest sound.

Without a word the detective slipped through and was after the individual who had so long tried their patience.

Taylor made no mistake this time, for the street was sufficiently well lighted to allow him to keep his man in sight. But though the hour was late, the couple were not the only ones abroad. Other pedestrians were astir, some going away from and some approaching the detective. Had the one whom he was shadowing known the fact, he could easily have eluded his pursuer by wheeling about and taking the reverse course; but evidently he was unaware of the figure behind him, and every minute lessened the possibility of his escaping him.

At the second turning, the one in advance turned to the left. Taylor immediately broke into a run, decreasing by at least one half the distance between them. When at last he turned the corner he was not more than fifty yards behind the other, who was so plainly in sight that the pursuer was sure of him.

Taylor had already recognised him as Mr. Frank Rutherford, whom he had shadowed earlier in the evening.

"Hulloa!" muttered the detective, as the the other made a second turn, which brought him in sight of Mr. Bryant's residence; "this has a queer look. Surely he can't intend making a late call?"

Taylor now thought it best to slip across the street, and he did so without being noticed. The other, so far as he could judge, did not look round—proof that he had no suspicion of the individual who was keeping so close to him.

Once again the pursuer increased the distance between them. Though there was little lamplight, the moon gave enough illumination for all purposes; and if the book-keeper discovered who was following him, the game would be up, at least so far as Taylor was concerned.

Slower and slower became the pace, until, when nearly opposite "Glenmora," the one in advance halted. He now looked round as if to make sure that no one was in sight; but the detective, no novice at his profession, had anticipated this act and shrank so close to the houses that he was in no danger of being seen.

"He is watching Mr. Bryant's house," was Taylor's conclusion; "he expects to see something, and he is expected, too."

Darkness reigned in the first floor of Mr. Bryant's residence, but a light was still burning in one of the upper rooms, the blind of one window of which had not been drawn down. That there was someone on the watch in that apartment was proved by the action of the young man, though the detective, with all his acuteness, could not discover what it was that guided the person standing near the gate.

Rutherford drew a match from his pocket and lit a cigar, at which he puffed vigorously until the end was aglow. Then, when certain that the crimson point could be seen, he raised it above his head, still facing the house, and circled it several times from left to right, the same number of times in reverse order, and then repeated the first gyration.

At the moment of completing the last circle, the light in the upper room of "Glenmora" was extinguished, and all became perfect darkness.

"That's a proof that the signal of the young gentleman was seen and understood," was Taylor's conclusion; "though the person on the look-out up there took good care to keep out of sight."

All his interest now centred in the young book-keeper on the opposite side of the street, who, having completed the errand which had taken him to "Glenmora," turned and leisurely retraced his steps.

The detective waited until he was secure from observation, and then followed the young man at a safe distance until he reached the home which Taylor had held under surveillance earlier in the evening, at the time he met with his adventure with the policeman who mistook him for a burglar.

Digitized by Google

While it was hardly natural for one to return so soon to the scene of his escape, the detective made sure that no one was on the watch for him before trusting himself near the shop from whose door he had darted in such haste.

As it was, he held aloof until he saw the young man enter the gate to his home. The light was still aglow in the upper room from the window of which he had seen the mother look out. A few minutes after the son's entrance it went out, and the whole house was in darkness.

"That disposes of Mr. Rutherford for to-night," said the watcher to himself.

Despite the lateness of the hour, the detective returned to his hotel by way of the bank, scrutinising the building closely as he passed.

If he meditated making another call upon the watchman, the detective changed his mind, at the sight of a policeman, and walked with as brisk a pace as was prudent to the hotel. He had been up the best part of the preceding night, and therefore determined to make the best use of his time by securing the opportunity to rest which now offered itself.

Taylor's first proceeding in the morning was to visit Mr. Bryant at his private residence. From the manager's own lips he had learned that it was seldom he was at the bank before eleven o'clock, but so thoroughly had the burglary roused him out of his usual routine that the caller found him ready to start. After greeting his visitor pleasantly, Mr. Bryant led the way to the library for a talk.

"I suppose it is too early for you to have discovered anything yet?" remarked the host.

"Yes. I was pretty tired and thought the best preparation for a good day's work was a refreshing night's rest, so I took it."

"That was wise. I can't say that I was as fortunate for this matter bears so heavily on my mind that my slumber is much broken. I went to the bank again last night, a little before midnight."

"May I inquire the cause of that?"

"I was nervous. What you said about the new watchman made me so distrustful that I decided to visit him unexpectedly."

"I thought," remarked Taylor with a smile, "that after reading Mr. Cartwright's letter I congratulated you on having so trustworthy a fellow."

"So you did; but it was the doubt in your face when I first told you what I had done that disturbed me."

"Well, how did you find things?"

"First class. The new man is a treasure. He made me show myself before he would admit me, and then coolly said that if I hadn't done as he requested he would have shot me."

"That's the kind of man you want, and Mr. Cartwright knew what he was doing when he recommended him to you."

"Yes, and I shall have no further apprehension on that score."

"But," said the detective, more gravely than he had yet spoken. "The reason for my visit this morning is, I wish to speak to you about your book-keeper—Rutherford, I believe is his name."

Taylor observed a dull flush overspread the banker's face as he asked:

"And what of him?"

"You must be aware he is one of the parties about whom—ah—it is my duty to make some inquiries."

"I should sooner suspect my niece upstairs than him."

This remark impressed the detective oddly in view of what he had witnessed the preceding night.

"You told me yesterday that you have never had occasion to distrust him."

"Never; he is the only child of a widowed mother, as I told you, and a more devoted son never breathed. It would break her heart if any ill befel him."

"I sincerely hope nothing of the kind will occur. But, in order to do my full duty, I must be thorough. Can you furnish me with a specimen of Mr. Rutherford's handwriting?"

Mr. Bryant looked fixedly in the face of his caller for some seconds without speaking. The detective calmly returned the gaze, each countenance motionless but expressive.

"Don't ask me any questions, please," added Taylor in a low voice; "but if you can, do as I request."

The host sat silent a minute longer, and then, without a word, rose and walked to his desk. He fumbled among some papers until he found the one for which he was searching. Then he walked towards the detective with the letter in his hand.

"Last Christmas the directors, on my recommendation, decided to make an advance in Mr. Rutherford's salary. As an appropiate Yuletide present I sent him this letter, and here is his acknowledgment, written in such good taste that I filed it away. I will lend it to you for a few days, if you wish."

"Many thanks. To make the matter complete," added Taylor, after glancing hastily over the missive, "yours ought to keep it company. I observe they are fastened together, and it is just as well not to separate them."

"Mr. Rutherford, of course, has the notification which I sent, and, I presume, treasures it highly. The one you have there is merely the rough draft of the letter I was instructed to write. Under the circumstances, I did something more than indite a formal communication. It seems to me the case called for it. What do you think?"

"Mr. Rutherford's reply is so grateful and well expressed, dwelling on the manner in which you have referred to his services, that I have some curiosity to peruse your own letter."

All men have their weak points. The detective had touched that of the banker, who plainly was pleased by the delicate flattery of his visitor. Truth to tell, Mr. Bryant had spent a good deal of labour on his letter and was proud of the result. With some protestations, therefore, he allowedhis visitor to retain both the documents after exacting a promise from him that he would return them in a few days.

A footstep in the room above suddenly recalled to the

"May I inquire the cause of that?"

Digitized by Google

Bade her an affectionate good-bye.

detective's mind another point on which he was in want of information. Mr. Bryant's library was immediately below the room in which the light had shone the night before when someone within awaited the signal of Mr. Rutherford's cigar.

"Have you children visiting in the house, Mr. Bryant?" he inquired.

"No; why do you ask?"

"I just now heard someone in your room overhead, and from the lightness of the footstep concluded it was a child."

"That is my niece. My room is at the back, where I am not so liable to be disturbed by the street traffic."

Mr. Taylor had gained the knowledge he sought.

The two rose to their feet, preparatory to leaving the house, when the same dainty footfall sounded on the stairs. Mr. Bryant stepped into the hall, where he kissed his ward and bade her an affectionate good-bye. The detective respectfully loitered behind, but as he followed his host through the front door he managed to obtain a glimpse of the girl, who, of course, was, the lady he had seen the night before.

"A woman's instinct is unerring," reflected Taylor, as he walked beside the banker down the winding gravelled path to the street. "Can it be that she has any suspicion of my purpose in paying such an early morning visit? I have learned that a tender feeling exists between her and the book-keeper of the bank, and that the proud uncle is not averse to it. He must think very highly of the young man thus to encourage their love. I hope it will not be my fate to bring sorrow upon the couple; but, if so, it will not be the first I have been compelled to strike, and I must do my duty—I must do my duty."

CHAPTER VI.

"What's to be Done?"

Mr. Taylor felt that he had secured a number of threads floating and drifting within his reach, which, if rightly handled, could be woven into something.

While he had not yet settled upon the one who was the guilty party, he had picked up several important clues. A man in his position needs to avoid the fatal mistake of jumping to conclusions without proper evidence. One of the pitfalls of the detective is to set out with a certain theory and then try to force his facts to fit his beliefs instead of following the opposite course in his investigations.

There should be no theory at all at the beginning of the case except a very general one. As the discoveries appear, they will of themselves suggest the proper line of thought. On the other hand, it is impossible not to form a suspicion with the first glimmer of truth.

Suspicion in this case pointed to Frank Rutherford, the book-keeper of the Middlewick Bank, and all that had been learned so far strengthened that suspicion. But the most lamentable part of the belief formed by the professional was that Miss Denton, the accomplished niece of the bank manager, was implicated with the wrong-doer, if indeed she were not an actual accomplice in the crime.

The words which Taylor had overheard, their manner

Digitized by Google

when together, and, above all, that singular signalling between them when the young man returned from his station opposite his bank, where he had been on the watch for more than an hour: all these pointed unerringly in a single direction.

True the partnership of a beautiful and accomplished young lady of the highest character in a bank burglary was was almost beyond credence. In all his experience the detective had never known anything of the kind. But the sagacious Taylor was ever ready with a charitable explanation which virtually absolved her from guilt.

It was he, Rutherford, her lover and admirer, who had planned and plotted the whole thing. He had taken her into his confidence, and through her affection for him, she had yielded. The deed being done, regret and repentance followed, when they promised to be too late.

The detective grimly closed his lips and resolved again that he would do his duty with no regard for the consequences to anyone.

From Mr. Bryant's residence he went to his hotel. He decided to meet Burton that they might compare notes and consult together. He expected to find him waiting at the hotel, but saw nothing of him. Taylor knew where he lodged, but preferred not to go there fearing to attract attention to the watchman.

"Mr. Rollett" made inquiries if any letters had come for him, but there were none. Disappointed, he ascended to his room on the second floor. Sitting down at the window which overlooked the street he immediately made a startling discovery.

He saw a man walking slowly on the opposite side, smoking a cigar and swinging a walking stick, something after the manner of the detective himself. He gave one the impression of being a person who had nothing special on hand and had only to dawdle away the hours. Just opposite the hote this individual met another person of ordinary appearancel also smoking, but, instead of carrying a stick, he kept both, hands in his trousers pockets.

They passed as though strangers, neither appearing to recognise the other. And yet, as the detective well knew, they were intimate associates, or rather confederates in crime. Those two were desperate criminals, and had been concerned in some of the most sensational burglaries in the country. It was they who were concerned in the robbery of a county bank in the North of England when the faithful cashier was shot and one of the clerks crippled for life. And yet the cunning miscreants managed the affair so skilfully that it was impossible to convict them. One was Joe Nash, and the other, Will King. Each travelled under half-a-dozen aliases, but those names were the ones by which they were best known to the authorities.

One quick glance, as he saw them in the sunlight, left no doubt of their identity. Taylor knew them as well as he did the watchman, but the question which overwhelmed the detective was as to the cause of the presence of these two criminals in Middlewick on this day in May.

Had it been several days earlier, the explanation would have been self-evident. They were there to plan and carry out the robbery of the bank, but that had already been accomplished. The whole thing was one of those mysterious phases of crime which often baffle the most expert detective. Only one conclusion seemed reasonable, that was that they were in collusion with the book-keeper and were staying in Middlewick to complete the division of the plunder. The entrance to the bank was so simple that they needed no help. Having the combination given to them by Rutherford, it was comparatively easy to do the rest.

This, it seemed, was the only explanation which could be formulated, but it was far from satisfactory. The principal objection was that if ever Nash and King succeeded in robbing a bank, they would never wait to divide with any partner. The theory pre-supposed that they had done the actual burglarising, and that being the case they would have wasted no time in Middlewick after completing the work.

But it was a waste of time thus to speculate. Taylor felt that Burton must be seen without delay. Enough has been told to show their joint interests in unearthing the guilty ones—an interest which was to continue to the end.

But the detective preserved his coolness. He didn't forget that while the two criminals were so well known to him, he also was known to them and sure of recognition in the event of meeting them undisguised.

With the facilities always at command, he made a number of changes in his appearance. Confident that the men, as yet, were unaware of his presence in the little country town, he retained the business suit he had worn from the first. The changes in his looks were comparatively slight. Taylor was a man who relied much upon his power of facial expression. He could do wonders in that line. Then, by assuming an altogether different bearing the contrast was more effective than that which could be made by dye, false hair, beard, and the ordinary contrivances used by the amateur. Besides, if he had the metamorphosis too marked it was liable to cause him trouble with the hotel proprietor.

But Taylor found no difficulty in mixing with the other guests without attracting attention. Sauntering to the desk, he glanced over the visitors' book; neither Nash nor King had subscribed under any name. It followed, therefore, that their headquarters were somewhere else, and as the Middlewick House was the only hotel in the place, they must have taken rooms. Since also the criminals took opposite directions, it would seem that it was easy for the detective to track one of them.

Confident in doing so, he sauntered forward, somewhat after his manner of the night before, but, at the end of an hour, hadn't caught sight of either. They had vanished as completely as if the earth had opened and swallowed them.

It was indispensable, for reasons which will duly appear, that he should see Burton without delay, so, despite the reluctance to go to his lodgings, Taylor hurried thither.

The new watchman made his home with a humble couple, an old man and his wife who had no other lodgers. Much to the detective's relief, he found his friend within and went up to his room unannounced. The watchman glanced up with a smile, when he noticed the changes Taylor had made in his looks. He further judged that something unusual had taken place.

"I was there."

"I expected you at the hotel," was the somewhat dissatisfied remark of the visitor.

"I was there."

"When?"

"About half-an-hour ago."

"Then you must have called after I left?"

"Well, it was not my fault that I did not see you."

"But why didn't you come earlier?"

"I did."

"When?"

"Rather over an hour ago."

"That was while I was at Mr. Bryant's house."

"It strikes me, Alf, that if you expect a friend to call at your place you ought to be in to receive him."

"I have nothing to say on that point. But Burton, what do you think?"

"A good many things when the necessity arises. You seem agitated over something."

Digitized by Google

"I have reason to be. Joe Nash and Will King are here."

"I knew it."

"You did? Why didn't you tell me?"

"My dear fellow, I have just explained that I called twice to give you the news, but didn't find you in. Then I came home to get ready for to-night; if I'm not mistaken things will be stirring."

"What do you make of it?"

Instead of replying Burton smiled and said:

"I will answer you after you have given me your explanation."

The detective gave the theory already stated, to the effect that the two criminals had had a hand in the burglary of a couple of nights before, and were staying in Middlewick to complete the business with their confederate, Frank Rutherford.

But Burton shook his head. "That won't do, Alf. You're altogether on the wrong track."

"Well, then, set me right."

"I don't know that I can. A little thought, however, will soon convince you that it is impossible for you to be correct."

"We won't argue the matter—I'll give in; but let me hear what you think of it."

Burton lit his pipe, and leant back in his chair.

"To my mind this business has taken the strangest turn of anything in which I was ever engaged."

"I formed that opinion before I met you to-day."

"I know, or at least suspect, to what you refer, but I believe that Nash and King are in Middlewick for the purpose of robbing the bank."

"The dickens! There must be mighty little left of which to rob it."

"Quite right, but that's where the joke comes in. They have looked over the ground before selecting this place for their attention. The sleepy watchman, the old-fashioned lock—all the conditions were so favourable that they naturally fixed upon the Middlewick Bank as one of the easiest in the country to be cracked. But that was days before the recent robbery."

"Then they have planned to rob a bank that has just been robbed?"

"Precisely."

"And, of course, do not suspect that they are a day too late for the fair?"

Burton lit his pipe.

"That's my belief. The secret has been better kept than one would have supposed, considering it is known to so many."

"There isn't a policeman in the town that suspects it. Neither Joe Nash, Will King, or Sam Birch dream of such a thing."

"Sam Birch; what has he to do with the business?"

"He's here too."

"Anybody else?"

"That's the lot; I've seen them all."

"And have they seen you?"

"No; I was lucky. You know before I left home I did all the disguising necessary, for it might be awkward to work up any changes after taking a situation as watchman. The manager might mistake me for a burglar."

"You're right. Your own mother would hardly know you now."

"For all that, however, I fought shy of these three gentlemen and am sure they have not the slightest idea of my being here."

"They're not staying at the hotel."

"No, I know that. They are stopping at a house in the town."

"Where is it?"

"I don't know. They're too sharp to give themselves away at this stage of the game. I tried to find out, but had to give it up. You're pretty well disguised, Alf, suppose you undertake that job."

"I'll try it, of course, but doubt if I'll succeed. You are sure they have no suspicion that you're playing watchman?"

"I don't think so. I should feel insulted if I thought they did."

"They will try the bank to-night—that is, if any reliance can be placed upon appearances."

"Undoubtedly."

"Well," remarked the amazed detective, "this is a joke. I have heard of a man trying to shoot with a gun, forgetting that it has already been discharged, but I never knew of a gang of burglars attempting to rob a bank which has already been robbed."

"Nor have I. We seem in a fair way to establish some precedents before we are fairly through with this business."

"What's to be done?"

"Why, nab them, of course."

"How?"

"What can be more simple when we know their plans? These gentry generally make their calls about midnight or one o'clock. We'll be ready for them, Alf."

The detective was silent for a minute or two.

"Do you think we ought to undertake it alone?"

"I have seriously considered that point. If there were but two, I wouldn't ask for any better amusement, but we shall find it difficult to handle three, that is so as to make sure of capturing them all. I don't want any to get away."

"But what is your plan?"

"We must take the police superintendent into our confidence. From what I've heard of him, I think he's a sensible fellow. We'll get him to let us have two of his best men. We'll place them inside the bank, or within reach; then, at the right minute, we'll close in. What's simpler?"

"The scheme seems a good one, as it should be coming from you; but we ought to have something in the nature of a rehearsal. You will take your place as usual to play the watchman?"

"No. I think I will put the old watchman, Warren, on duty again."

"And why?"

"You must remember that our three friends have founded their campaign on the belief that the sleepy old fellow is still in charge. If they see me go in instead they may postpone the business until they have time to investigate, and when they investigate, and find that the business has already been done for them, they'll decide not to waste any more time."

"Will you explain to Mr. Bryant?"

"Not until it's over. He'll ask too many questions, and is already so upset that he will be sure to 'bungle' matters, and, more than likely, give the whole show away. I'll go to Warren himself, and let him think the manager intends giving him another trial. The only trouble is, he will be pretty likely to keep awake when I specially want him to go to sleep. He will be so anxious to regain his character that he will be supernaturally vigilant. I shouldn't be surprised if he showed fight, thereby rendering it necessary for the visitors to give him a pretty good whack over the head to quiet him."

"It will serve him right—that is, if the crack isn't too hard, and those fellows wouldn't hesitate about giving him one."

Digitized by Google

"The power of habit is strong, so I think after all Warren will spend the night as he has been accustomed to spend it for the last twelve years. Anyhow, I'll take the chances."

"Well, since that's settled, let's fix the particulars. Shall I see the Police Superintendent?"

"Yes, arrange with him, and I'll manage about the watchman."

"What of placing the policemen inside the bank?"

"Easy enough to do that. The trio won't appear in the neighbourhood until the night is well advanced. One of them may take a walk past about ten o'clock, just to assure himself that everything is straight; but we'll get the men in before that."

"What will Warren think?"

"More than likely he'll be snoring by that time. If he isn't, he'll be told that suspicious characters have been seen about, and that we think it best he should have company. He won't object."

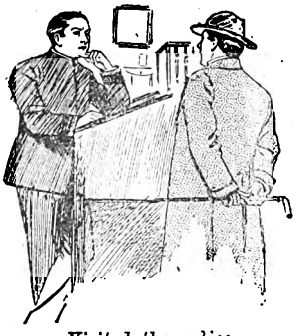
"Who generally keeps watch?"

"Sam Birch—that's his business. He's awfully good at it, too."

The plan outlined by Burton was followed as closely as possible. He and the detective divided the work between them, and each understood his own and the other's part.

Taylor, keeping a sharp look out for the burglars, visited the police superintendent and explained matters. The official proved to be an intelligent gentleman, who proffered all the assistance in his power. He called in two of his best men, before whom the matter was laid, and eagerly entered into.

They were to saunter by the bank precisely at nine o'clock that evening. Burton—whose appearance Taylor minutely described—would stroll past at the same moment on the other side of the street, returning as it were from a reconnaissance of the enemy's lines. If he took off his hat and wiped his forehead, it would mean that the coast was clear, and they were to enter the bank without hesitation. If, on the other hand, he did not remove his hat, they were to saunter past without giving any attention to the bank or seemingly to the watchman. This manœuvre was to be repeated precisely fifteen minutes later, and, if necessary, at similar intervals until the way should open.



Visited the police superintendent.

Warren within would be instructed to keep the door unlocked until the police entered. Once inside the building they were to place themselves as their judgment suggested best to make sure of capturing the criminals. Taylor and Burton would remain outside until they heard a prearranged signal from the policeman within. It was the wish of the couple to secure Sam Birch—one of the most notorious burglars of the day.

He would be on the watch outside, and the instant he suspected what was going on, would take good care to save himself, his position being such that he could easily do so.

Having duly arranged the preliminaries, Taylor and Burton sent out to put them in execution, neither dreaming of the astounding complications which were to ensue in the course of that eventful night.

(To be continued.)

A GRAND OFFER TO THE READERS OF SHORT STORIES.

WE offer for a period extending from the time this number is published until April 4th next a beautiful three-quarter Life-Size India Ink and Crayon Portrait to anyone who will bring or send us only 6s., and one coupon from Short Stories, one coupon from Pearson's Weekly, and one from the Story Teller. These are the £100 coupons to be found on the cover in each paper. The S.S. coupon is on the second page of cover.

The portraits are of the finest artistic merit. They are absolutely permanent, being finished by the Air Brush with indelible India Ink, making them more permanent than any of the old styles of portraits, and they will last a lifetime.

Have you FATHER, MOTHER, SISTER, BROTHER, or CHILD'S photo that you wish enlarged—perhaps some dear one who has passed away, whose likeness is now fading, and should be preserved before it is too late? We will enlarge and copy it into a beautiful portrait for you.

SHALL WE MAKE YOURS?

You will get an unheard-of bargain by availing yourself of this grand offer, and we are glad to be able to give it to you. We can copy from any photos, large or small, tin-types, or any kind of glass picture. In sending in the latter, care should be taken that they are properly packed. We copy all pictures bust style—head and shoulders only.

AGAIN WE MAKE THIS OFFER.
PROBABLY FOR THE LAST TIME.
DO NOT NEGLECT IT.
IT IS THE CHANCE OF A LIFETIME.
THESE PICTURES, IF ORDERED THROUGH ARTISTS, WOULD COST YOU FROM 3 TO 5 GUINEAS.

We made this same offer some months ago, and then 7,000 of our readers sent us photos to be enlarged. These enlargements have nearly all been executed and sent off, and everybody appears to have been satisfied.

WHEN SENDING AN ORDER let the picture you want copied be securely packed, and place your name and address on the back of the picture, and send the 6s. and the three coupons to Pearson's Weekly, and you will receive the portrait copied for you as soon as possible. Have no fear of losing your small picture. It will be returned in as good order as received. Therefore take care to protect photos on glass so that they will not break in the post.

An Example of the Portrait we offer to give you can be seen at the offices of Pearson's Weekly and Short Stories.

Don't put off sending. Obtain your coupons at once, and send in to us at once.

Address—PORTRAITS, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

If success in life is realising our dreams, as someone defines it, I may be permitted to boast of a certain measure of success, for my dearest dream when a boy was to make a tour through England on foot, and I was little more than twenty-one when I left London to carry out that project.

I was fresh from my books, had a splendid stock of money, and a large assortment of enthusiasm, good health, and small experience, and these combined with youth to make a very good imitation of happiness, especially when you are realising your dream all the while.

The time of my wanderings was not restricted by anything but my resources, so I loitered away whole weeks in pretty out-of-the-way spots and grey old historic towns, saturating myself with their feeling and refreshing my memory about their traditions, acting these out with my imagination in their proper settings before my bodily eyes in approved young tourist fashion.

I found abundant entertainment of my favourite sort in Coventry. Little Grayfriars' Hospital, untouched, unchanged since the Middle Ages, used to occupy a good deal of my attention, partly for its own sake, and partly for the sake of the cement and wood of which it is built, which vividly recalled Shakespeare's house to my mind.

I rummaged in the library, revelling particularly in an edition of "Fox's Martyrs," nine volumes, folio, with facsimiles of the original plates. "Fox's Martyrs" had been my Sunday reading when I was a small boy; the grim, creepy language used to give me a choice sensation of horror, to which I never became blasé, although here in Coventry the volumes only looked like kindly remembrancers of home. They burned people at the stake in Coventry as late as in any part of England. Godcake was the singular name of the place where the poor people were roasted, a place where they could look up to the church spires, the calm, senseless symbols of the faith they were dying for—and by.

The library was my favourite haunt, and there the fixed attention a queer little old man used to bestow upon me ended by attracting mine to him. We were soon on speaking terms, and found each other mutually amusing. My being an American seemed an endless source of wonder and curiosity to him, and his eccentricity, abruptness, and fund of odd information delighted me. One day he said to me, in his queer fashion:

"The last man gibbeted in England was gibbeted in Coventry."

"What is gibbeting?" I asked.

"Hanging a man to a tree till the birds eat him," he answered with a sort of ghastly relish.

I thought of Macbeth's threat to his messenger:

> Upon the next tree shalt thou hang alive
> Till famine cling thee, which my ear first caught: "Till famine clean thee," and this was so exhaustively graphic to my early imagination, that I had brought myself to give it up with great difficulty.

"I can tell you a very queer incident about this place, and one of its customs," he continued. "Have you ever heard of Lady Godiva?"

I blushed and bit my thumb, and coyly admitted so much sophistication.

"Perhaps you know, then," resumed the old man, "that here in Coventry, up to within a few years, it has been the custom to celebrate her famous ride by a procession, at the head of which rides a woman personating Lady Godiva, and imitating her costume as far as the police will permit. All guilds and societies used to take part in the procession, and there was the greatest amount of city pride and feeling about the whole matter. Any scepticism about the existence of Lady Godiva, or the historic truth of her ride, is to Coventry people what an insinuation that William Tell is a myth would be to a Swiss; she is an article of faith with them. This year that I speak of they had engaged a woman from a circus to personate Lady Godiva."

"Accustomed to the costume?" I suggested with mild jocosity; but the old man took it as seriously as possible.

"Quite so," he said, "that, and the riding, and all. She was a handsome woman—that is—perhaps I shouldn't think her so handsome now, but then the whole committee thought her so," and the old rogue's cheeks grew a diffident red.

"Ah, you were on the committee to select the heroine?" said I.

"Yes," he replied judicially, as if he was sorry he had admitted it, but was determined not to recede, "and now comes in the curious circumstance. The day after she was engaged she disappeared—disappeared from her lodgings, from the circus company, from Coventry itself. It was impossible to find her, and she attended none of the advertised rehearsals—for the whole affair used to be rehearsed as carefully as a Shakespeare revival, or any other spectacle.

Digitized by Google

"The weeks passed, the drills went on, and they almost gave her up for lost. I say almost, for there was always the chance that she might come back, which prevented them, from day to day, from engaging another Godiva, until the very day before the procession was to take place. They were at their wits' end, and did not know what to do. As I said, this was a matter to which the mayor and the town authorities gave their attention; they felt that a procession without any Lady Godiva was not only Hamlet with Hamlet left out—you've heard that expression, I suppose—but a disgrace to Coventry, and a blow to the dignity of England. In the midst of their distracted deliberation, another young woman from the circus volunteered to take the part of Godiva at this short notice, and calm was restored to the town council.

"The next morning at the appointed hour the procession organised in line, and the impromptu Lady Godiva took her place at the head of the troops, in long red wig and scanty attire. Something of the dilemma the authorities had been in had got rumoured about, and the excitement and the crowd were immense.

"The trumpet sounded for the start. There was a grand flourish, when suddenly a woman's scream brought everything to a standstill.

"There stood Lady Godiva Number One, her long red hair—she didn't have to wear a wig—floating about her scanty attire. She stormed up to Lady Godiva Number Two, and, before any one could interfere, had dragged her from her horse, and the two had engaged in a regular pitched battle. They fought and tore each other's faces and hair like two furies. They were both in love with the same man, which added animus to their caresses, as you may fancy When they were separated, though, which do you think carried the day?"

"Whichever fought the best," I suggested.

"Now, that's very well said, but as far as the fighting went there wasn't much choice," said the old man, rubbing his hands and shaking his head in retrospective enjoyment. "But the crowd and the authorities decided in favour of the second Lady Godiva, because, they said, the first had violated her contract by her disappearance immediately after her engagement. It was settled in very short order, the first Lady Godiva had to retire, much enraged, and the second put on her wig and rode away at the head of the procession, highly elated with her success. That was not the end of it, though, oh, no, not by any means. The first Lady Godiva appealed to the laws of her country."

"Indeed," said I.

"Yes, indeed," asseverated the old man, thinking, as usual, that I questioned his veracity. "I couldn't deceive you about the suit, because, don't you see, you could go and consult the records and find all the papers. It's true. She went to law and sued the mayor and the town authorities, for not letting her appear as Lady Godiva, after engaging her. There was nothing at all in her contract about rehearsals, or the disposal of her time between the day of her engagement and the day of the procession. She contracted to ride as Lady Godiva on such a day at such an hour, and she appeared to time. It was a clear case. She won her suit, and the town authorities had to pay a sum."

"To pay a——?" I queried.

"A sum, a sum of money—damages," he insisted querulously. "You can fancy how a layman's mind would work about the ride; she had exasperated them by keeping them in suspense about her appearance, so when she presented herself, and they had it in their power to humiliate her, as they thought, they declined in favour of her rival. They found out their mistake in court," and the old fellow chuckled anew.

"Did it ever come out why she disappeared, or where she was?" I asked.

"Now, the gossip was that a lawyer of the town secreted her until the final hour, foreseeing the course events would take," he replied, looking at me keenly.

"The damages must have been high to tempt the lawyer to take the risk," said I.

"It was a sum—a sum," he repeated. "It didn't do much more than cover the expenses of secreting the girl, but the money was not altogether what the lawyer had in mind. He was ambitious, and he wished to do what has since become more common, I understand—to begin his career with a sensation. He did it—he did it with a vengeance—he had all the sensation he wanted."

A swarm of questions came to my lips, but I had not sufficient confidence to ask them, and the next day I left Coventry. Other incidents drove the old man and his story from my memory, until one day in London both were brought vividly to mind by seeing the old fellow at a railway station, accompanied by a queer old woman as remarkable in her way as he in his.

They took the same train as I, but a different carriage. However, when I saw them get out I had the curiosity to follow them.

The old man saw to the sending of some luggage, and then, giving his arm to his companion, they set out on a brisk walk, threading the extremely new looking streets with the air of people who were familiar with the place. At last they turned in at the gates of a very pretentious villa, which looked immodestly apparent through the thin young trees on the grounds. I stood still, looking after the pair.

"Rum old gentleman, ain't he?" said a voice at my elbow. A rather well-dressed man was the speaker. He might have been the shopkeeper of the suburb.

"Who are they?" I asked.

"This mansion," he replied, with pride, "is the residence of Sir Samuel Boggs, formerly Lord Mayor of London; and the old people, his father and mother, come up from Coventry once a year to make him a visit. They never tell him just when they're coming, and people do say he ain't over anxious to have 'em come, for he's a great swell, and his father's terrible queer, and his mother she's queerer. They say she was a circus rider, and the old gent ran away with her and married her in Paris, while she was under engagement to ride Lady Godiva at the head of the Coventry procession. There was a great row about it, she——"

"Yes," said I, "I heard of the case when I was in Coventry."

Annie Townsend.

Digitized by Google

THE POWER OF LOVE.

A Story Found Among the Pompeian Papyri.

During the excavations made in the presence of the King of Naples, in 1815, a fresco of singular beauty was discovered, representing a group of nymphs with their eyes turned towards a central figure. Behind the latter a youthful Love, bending gracefully at her ear, appeared to be whispering some mystery.

The sprightly, eager pose of the little whisperer, the delightful drawing of the nymphs, and even the dazzling colours that seventeen centuries had left undimmed, attracted every artist and every connoisseur.

Of course, the Italian imagination hastened to discover an explanation and a history for the incomparable picture. Every day brought forth a new theory, but all lacked the essential character of probability.

The story of the mysterious fresco was not destined to everlasting secrecy, however. In 1836 one of the papyri, now so admirably deciphered by the system of Collini, on being opened, displayed to the astonished view the fresco in miniature at the top of the first part of the manuscript. The rest of the papyrus contained the present story, of which the fresco was undoubtedly an illustration—a story that we give with all the mutilations which the fragile nature of the half-calcined paper makes inevitable. The largest hiatus occurs just at the beginning; it still defies the erudition of all the Italian schools.

* * * * *

"Oh, Callias! I am weary of the world."

"You are mistaken, Sempronius; you are weary of everything except the world."

"I know what I am saying, Callias, and I am in earnest. But how can I make you believe anything—you, a sceptic by profession, an Athenian wit, a moth that flits from flower to flower through all the gardens of human folly—how can you believe in a profound distaste for all the earth contains? You are an epicurean animal."

"No, my melancholy philosopher, I am a true epicurean, tender in friendship and love for the pleasure there is in both. I am only cruel to my poor country-houses, and this hour my deepest perplexity is whether to go to-morrow to my villa on the Tiber, or pass my languid days in my grotto at Sunium, while this voluptuous, pestilential dog-star is in the ascendant."

The star Sirius flung its splendour along the Bay of Naples. The young Roman gazed passionately at the scene, and sighed, rather than said:

"Oh, that my mere wish could shake off the earth and send me soaring to the very empyrean!"

Here the slaves, coming to announce supper, cut short his comp'aint.

"I follow a different plan from you Romans," said the Greek, Callias, as they reclined at the table. As he spoke, he pointed with smiling satisfaction to the paintings that adorned the apartment. "You place your pictures in the strongest light and the most frequented room. I have mine in this place, never lighted except by the setting sun. I treat them like heart friends, only meeting them far from the day's tumult, and supping thus in their companionship."

Despite his soul-sickness, Sempronius looked and admired. His friend's fancy about lighting the paintings came out strangely as regarded one, a masterpiece by Alcamenes of Ionia. It was Olympus, the scene described by Homer where Venus in the assembly of the immortals comes to implore Jupiter to send victory to the Trojan arms. With the prodigality of luxury that sacrifices mounds of riches and treasures of genius to a moment's gratification, but that gratification supreme, the glorious work could be seen and comprehended just as the sun touched the horizon. The two friends prepared for the fleeting but supreme enjoyment as a pyramid of light slowly spread over the painting.

All the upper part was in darkness when the light first fell upon the rugged foot of the mountain. Then it crept up among the vines and olives of the slope. Then the region of the immortals was lapped in a golden air. The jewelled thrones of the different deities flashed. The moving ray seemed to impart life to the figures. In the centre was one last form seemingly veiled by a cloud, which appeared to melt under the glowing kiss of the growing light.

The form was Venus bending suppliant before the father of the gods. Her attitude was that of mingled nobility and meekness, but her face, her indescribable face, was love and nothing but love. Callias gave its charms the vain glance of a collector, but the young Sempronius gave a cry, buried his head in the folds of his robe, and flung himself down before the painting, panting with adoration.

When he rose day was done; the painting was enveloped in darkness, vanished as by enchantment.

* * * * *

"So you mean to wander over the world, chasing the nameless wonder of a dream? My young and ardent friend, take my advice, and leave such peregrinations to the geographers. Return to Rome; tell your excellent uncle that you are quite ready to marry his daughter's fortune; tell him that you are an obedient son, and have no idea of going counter to your worthy father's wishes. Then, having sacrificed to filial duty, and given a wedding that will be the talk of Rome for twenty-four hours, get on your helmet, if you still feel like travelling, and go and fight the Parthians, or eclipse the fame of Alexander—be buried in a mausoleum in India, in which later generations of barbarians will hang the crane above your illustrious bones."

Callias spoke mockingly, but a glance at his friend made him repent his jest.

Digitized by Google

"I have confided to you alone the hopeless misery of my soul," cried the excitable Roman. "I have told you that the barbarous resolution of my family to bind me in a matter that, of all the affairs of life calls for the greatest liberty of choice, inspired me with a precocious aversion for the being to whom I was to sacrifice my reason, my heart, and my will. Our insane betrothal in childhood gave us each such an invincible hatred for the other, that we separated at once never to meet again."

"The resolve of two spoilt children," said Callias, this time taking pains to speak seriously. "Why should it control maturer years? Your cousin is no longer a child. She may be as lovely as Hebe and joyous as Flora. Have you never felt any curiosity about her since your terrible nursery divorce?"

"She?" cried Sempronius; "the instrument of my parents' tyranny? None whatever. I was sent to Greece to be educated. My career in the army threw me upon the frontiers of Pannonia. Since then I have lived in Asia Minor. I have never seen Rome; but a word will explain all I have seen," here Sempronius paused; "I have seen the being who will fill the void in my soul for ever. It was at a banquet given to the officers of the legion by the pro-consul Septimius, on our arrival at Ephesus. A sumptuous gala-day ended with a play given in the palace gardens, and acted by those dedicated to the service of the temple.

"The drama was like some of Ovid's, a fable on the power of love. The little god appeared under a hundred different forms—warrior, poet, musician, king, or travelling merchant with stores of jewels and rich stuffs, all to conquer the heart of a beautiful girl. And what a conquest she would have been, the one upon whom the young enchanter practised all his arts.

"I have never seen any one, never imagined anyone so beautiful. There, before me, lived and moved incarnate the Venus of the waves, or Pandora, stooping from Olympus. My fate was sealed for ever. The conviction pierced my soul, vividly as only truth's own shafts. I trembled in every limb, as the great magician of our passions spread every net, showed every lure to entrap this lovely woman. She resisted them all.

"But one stratagem remained. In the last scene of all, the quiet of a luxurious garden, a youth, in the garb of an Ionian shepherd, offered her neither pomp nor worldly glory, but just a heart brimming with love, faith and honour. If she had resisted then, she would have been more or less than mortal. She was neither; she was a woman—true as Nature, touched by the sweet impulse of Nature. I had triumphed in her resistance, now I triumphed in her submission. I saw with joy that her beauty was not the beauty of a statue. My face flushed as the rosy colour stole into hers. A tear fell from her eyes, my own were wet.

"With a sigh and a smile she admitted the power of the heart over the heart, and with silent tears of joy let herself fall upon the breast of the Ionian. Then, in a thunder-clap, the whole scene lifted like a flying cloud, and instead of the simple garden we saw the immortal meads of Idalia. The Ionian shepherd was Love himself, back in his first form; delightful, powerful, sportive, and kingly. The young god, wafted on his purple wings, flew to the arms of the fair mortal, and crowned her with amaranths in the presence of the nymphs, as a symbol of her metamorphosis into an immortal dweller in the grove of Love's Isle."

"And so," said Callias, with cold eyes, his satirical temperament leaving him untouched by emotion, "you have fallen in love with one of the dancers of the temple. The heart's ice melts readily under those good Asiatic skies; I fancy she will take very kindly to a second rehearsal with you in the rôle of the Ionian shepherd."

Sempronius's hand flew to his dagger.

"Evil Greek!" he cried; "the stars above us are not farther removed than my idol from the unhallowed breath of suspicion. I never saw her again. All my researches were in vain. Only your hateful mockery could cause you to forget that those priestesses are as sacred as the vestals of the Capitol. She was one of the maidens of the altar."

Callias soothed his friend's indignation.

"Why have you not attempted to find this mirror of perfection?" he asked. "Have you never offered to marry her?"

"Find her!" cried the Roman; "this is the second year I have spent in searching through Asia, Greece, and Italy, impelled by unconquerable hope. She has left the temple. I could almost believe that she has floated up to heaven. But if I found her, what could I do? My father, on his deathbed, left me the choice of his blessing or his curse, according as I did or did not marry my cousin, Euphrosyne. Wealth I can disdain, and tyranny despise; but I cannot trample on the dying commands of a father. His voice from the tomb summons me to obey."

"Then forget this other girl," said his amiable adviser.

The Roman slowly lifted his large black eyes filled with scorn.

"Forget her!" he cried, "I have no more power to forget her than to lose consciousness that I am alive. Everything compels me to remember her—music, light, stars, soft evening sounds, roses, the clouds, all that touches my heart means her and her only. You saw my agitation that evening at your villa. The Venus of that Olympus was the living idol of my thoughts. I would have given all I possess to have that picture and die. But even as I gazed the spirit of my father seemed to speak from the gathering gloom, and I fell forward in terror and dismay."

At that moment a slave entered to announce that a trireme from Rome had touched at Piræus, and had brought letters for both friends.

Callias retired to read his precious documents from the queen of cities, Sempronius fell into a reverie, fanned by the airs of a Grecian twilight.

While he gave the reins to his exalted imagination, Callias, having read his letters, returned with an air of mingled pleasure and pain.

"You are free," he said abruptly; "read this letter from your relative, Catullus. He says that your cousin, Euphrosyne, is dead. In the delirium of a malarial fever she flung herself into the Tiber. Her body was found a week before this letter started. Catullus describes the funeral ceremony most minutely, and is evidently very proud of having been invited to it."

* * * * *

"And now," said Callias, "for Ephesus."

* * * * *

The night was gloriously beautiful; the trireme floated from the harbour, leaving a long furrow of light behind.

The two friends stood on the deck watching the shore-lights wane and the moon rise. The Parthenon stood out pale, solemn, and solitary against the sky. When a little temple on Sunium's marbled steep came in sight the sailors lighted up the shrine of Pallas Athene on the deck, and began their evening hymn to the tutelary goddess of Attica. This reminded Callias of supper, and he went below to order a repast worthy an imperial trireme, while Sempronius, wrapped in his military mantle, watched the flashing topaz constellation of Taurus overhead.

Digitized by Google

As the echoes of the hymn died away, a slender, rosy flame rose from the promontory, trembled a moment above the temple, and wavered up to heaven. The sailors fell upon their faces, and received the signal as the favourable response of the goddess. All felt that it was an auspicious augury for their voyage to Asiatic shores.

* * * * *

The priest of Diana resisted all the eloquence of the two friends who insisted upon seeing the priestess of the sanctuary. Callias offered him a purse filled with Thracian gold. The hierophant had no sooner touched it than he flung it upon the ground as if stung by an asp, turned and fled. Sempronius, dismayed at seeing his last hope leaving him, ran after the priest and clutched at his robe. The hand that had been laid upon the incorruptible minister of Diana was adorned with a magnificent emerald. His eyes fastened upon it, he turned. The gem mysteriously glided upon his finger. Without a word he drew a key from beneath his purple robe and opening a low door, almost invisible in the massive carvings, noiselessly ushered the two friends into the depths of the temple.

The temple of Diana of Ephesus was the most celebrated place of devotion in the world. Callias was thrilled to find himself within its famous walls, from which kings were barred and which contained more treasures than many empires. The day's worship was done. The colossal bronze doors were closed upon the populace. All was night, silence and solitude.

The Roman, wrapped in his own thoughts, heard only the harps and flutes whose accords swelled from the distant halls.

The priest now turned into a deeper and more secret passage. Sempronius followed, but Callias drew him back. The pale light of a lamp showed that he had half drawn his sword, with an unmistakable expression. The Greek was evidently familiar with Asiatic faith. The place might be a mere pit where strangers were killed and robbed; Sempronius smiled as if the present and future were alike indifferent to him, and plunged into the darkness. The Greek paused, then wholly drawing his sword, slowly followed his ardent companion. The passage was long and tortuous: at last it ended in a descent, and the light wholly failed. They reached a small door. The priest's voice was heard whispering:

"You must wait here till I come."

With these words he disappeared.

"Now," said Callias, "we have only what we deserve, and we can give the world the warning of our stupendous folly; for that priest will think we have had quite enough glory already, without the addition of relating the marvels of our escape. What a shame that we didn't follow my impulse and make daylight shine through the fellow before he led us here to die like dogs."

Sempronius vowed the priest was honest. An hour passed, then another, and he did not return. Callias endeavoured to find his way back, but after a few random steps he found the passage obstructed by huge blocks of stone.

"The treachery is patent," he cried. "These are catacombs, and we shall join the other phantoms, and walk here for ever. Exquisite imbecility! Not to know that the priest would no more dare to betray the secrets of his temple than face a naked sword! But he certainly got out of the difficulty in the most superior manner. At present our occupation is reduced to wandering around here till we fall into some pit, or quietly doubling up on some of these stones to die of hunger!"

His friend's mind was naturally more elevated, purer, and already mounted higher.

"Callias," he said, "your injurious philosophy makes you distrust everything, even yourself. As for me, I have not so much that is attractive to me in the world, as to be reduced to despair by this trap. Of course, the priest is a rogue. I might have known that a man that sells himself for a ring would not hesitate to betray his corrupters. He has left us here to die, but death is a brave man's last resource. Stand up, and at least let us not yield our lives without a struggle."

The Greek had a noble soul. The cant of the man of the world fell from him. He grasped his friend's hand with genuine feeling. "Forward!" he cried. Sempronius went first; but the way was beset with momentarily increasing obstacles. At last it was impossible to take another step.

"Now," cried the Greek, in a tone of mingled irony and despair, "the experiment is complete. What is the use of breaking our bones in climbing over rocks that only take us nearer to the bowels of the earth? Come, take and hold this sword, and do me the last service of a Roman can for his best friend."

Sempronius took the sword in silence and broke it under his heel. The blade striking the stones made a few sparks, and by their fleeting light they perceived that they were in the midst of a huge crypt, whence branched several corridors in different directions. They entered upon the one which seemed to lead the farthest and end in the outer air.

"I am not a patient man, my friend," said Callias. "I will follow you once more, but if this only leads to more tombs I insist upon being allowed to rest from my labours in my own fashion."

"I only ask for another instant," cried the Roman firmly. "Afterwards you may be my guide to the everlasting sleep where the wretched forget and are forgotten."

As he finished speaking, a faint cry, followed by hurried footsteps, fell upon their ears. They paused. A ray of light trembled in the far recesses of the labyrinth, and both rushed towards it. The light struggled through the cracks of a narrow door. Sempronius looked, gave a cry, and rushed into the hall. A woman stood with pinioned arms before a lighted altar, whereon lay a knife. The priest who had betrayed the two friends, regarded the human victim with the fixed eye of cruelty.

A group of spectres with melancholy gaze and long murky garments, looked on at the deed of blood. When Sempronius appeared, the woman raised her eyes and rushed towards him. The priest seized the knife and endeavoured to plunge it into her breast, but the terrible blow was destined never to fall. Callias still held the fragment of his sword, and plunged it to the hilt in the body of the murderer. He fell with a groan, and expired at their feet. All the spectres drew swords. In a flash all was conflict, uproar, carnage.

* * * * *

The trireme entered the Piræus, and Callias wished his friend to remain in Greece, but Sempronius, wounded in body, and broken-hearted, begged to be taken to Italy to die, and be buried with his ancestors. Callias forgot all his philosophy as he stood by the noble youth's bedside and heard him rave in the delirium of passion and despair.

Digitized by Google

"The victim stands by my couch each night," said the Roman, "addressing those monsters with compassionate words. I knew her at once in the labyrinth, changed and dishevelled as she was. She was the first, she will be the last love of my life. Tell me all you know about her; tell me once more, and yet again, that I may die hearing of her."

Callias would then spend an hour repeating that the fair priestess had chanced to see him at the pro-consul's banquet; had loved him with involuntary passion unknown to herself and to him; but finally her secret escaped her, and she was marked for the vengeance of the goddess as a recreant priestess. Her simple wish to leave the temple was an unpardonable crime. The vengeance of the divinity was considered incomplete unless the object of her love was also sacrificed; which explained the priest's willingness to introduce them to the shrine; he had trapped them to make them expiatory victims, and was reserving them for the sacred knife. After the combat in the sacrificial hall, they had been captured, thrown into a dungeon, delivered without knowing how, and seeking refuge in the palace of the pro-consul, the latter had hurried them out of Asia. The priestess had probably perished.

* * * * *

Sempronius lay on a couch of ivory set with pearls; his curtains were of Persian silk; the silver statue of a nymph poured a slender stream of perfumed water from a crystal urn into a Parian basin; the floor of the room was strewn with roses. But the delicate profusion of patrician luxury was lost upon him. His thoughts were in Ephesus, in the cavern where he had seen that exquisite form of beauty trembling before the destruction of a fanatic's knife.

Callias abruptly entered, and asked in his usual tone, how the invalid was doing under the care of the new physician who had come to save him from his obstinacy and firm intention of dying.

Sempronius smiled sadly, and taking his friend's hand, said, in a voice full of feeling:

"Callias, I think I am as free as any one from superstition, but there is something more than human in this strange leech. Outlandish as his accent and Ethiopian countenance are, he has the gift of reading human nature with a resistless skill. He knows my thoughts, and is master of the secrets of nature. I almost tremble in his presence at the thought that I am in the hands of a being superior to my mortal faculties."

"Oh, he dabbles in magic, does he?" said Callias with disdain.

"I have no secrets from you, Callias," said Sempronius. "I have implored him to show me the vision of Ephesus once more before I die."

* * * * *

Sempronius entered the hall first. All was dark; but Callias carried a little lamp under a fold of his robe, and murmured:

"This is rather like our old adventure in the labyrinth; but I confess I have some curiosity to see how your Ethiopian who is such a master of magic, will manage his spirits."

As he spoke, a pale blue flame rose and settled in the centre of the ceiling. They then saw that they were in a vast circular hall. Sounds of instruments were softly audible near them, and seemed to issue from the ground beneath their feet. A vapour rose suddenly before their eyes, floating from right to left, over the walls of the apartment, and finally rested above their heads.

A voice that seemed to come from the depths of the cloud, asked them what they most wished to see.

Sempronius, trembling, pronounced the words: "The priestess of Ephesus."

Luscious music rolled through the air. One wall of the chamber seemed to disappear, and open on the sea at sunset.

"The Piræus!" cried Callias, and pointed to the trireme outward bound.

The scene changed to Ionia and the burning skies of Asia. Two manly figures, a Greek and an Italian, appeared under the cypresses that ring the temple of Diana. A third figure joined them, led them away, and all were lost in darkness.

A line of light now crept along the ground, and the two spectators recognised the vaults where they had been deserted by the priest; soon a distant hall appeared, the victim, the priest, and the circle of attendants.

Sempronius gave a cry as the beautiful victim knelt for mercy. He tried to spring towards her, but was held back by his friend, and fell fainting in his arms.

When he opened his eyes the scene was changed; a green and flowery garden spread the luxuriance of Oriental vegetation before his eyes. The landscape was animated by living figures; a group of nymphs were dancing to the sound of instruments they held in their hands, and when the circle parted, a throne of moss and flowers were seen. On the throne sat a young queen in rustic garb, her eyes bent upon the ground, while a young Love whispered his enchantments in her ear; the scene at the pro-consul's banquet appeared a second time before the astonished eyes of Sempronius.

His impulse was irresistible; he sprang towards the vision; but this time it was not a sprite of air. A woman, a real woman, sighing, blushing, beautiful, fell into his arms, agitated and tearful! The prietess, the magician, and Euphrosyne were the same person!

* * * * *

"Gaze on my happiness, incredulous one!" said Sempronius, with an adoring look at his wife, who held their fair child in her arms.

"The event seems to argue that there is such a thing," said the Greek, "but I will say this: Find me a girl, cousin, whom I shall first hate without knowing; who shall love me with a romantic affection, as Euphrosyne loved you, without even knowing whether you were worth a sigh; who shall flee from her country and pass as dead in order to give me complete liberty to play the fool to my heart's content; who shall become a priestess, and after saving me from the claws of a villainous confederacy of murderous monks, shall open the doors of my prison, follow me across the sea, sacrifice for me her woman's vanity sufficiently to masquerade as a negress and a witch, in order to save me; who shall be a thousand times a greater witch by the power of her eyes, who shall throw herself into my arms, and then——"

"Then," said Sempronius, his eyes sparkling with joy, "then, like me, you will marry the idol of your heart."

"Yes, yes, charming, I'm sure," said Callias, setting his mouth with a comically grave air, "but as she was your betrothed in the first place, why, in the name of Love and Venus, put yourself to so much trouble?"

Peter Parr.

Digitized by Google

MARTHA.

"Sit down, ma'am," said the hotel-keeper's mother, placing a chair. "The 'bus will be here in a minute, and a couple is going to start from my house—a young married couple. You'll be surprised when you sees 'em, for as far as looks go—well, he's as handsome as he can be and she is as plain as a stone fence. He's educated—college graduate. She has a plain, country school education, that is all; but she's good. Yes, she is good. And now that she is so happy she has a sort of different expression.

"She was born here, Martha Hill was, and she got a sewing-machine when she was twelve years old. My husband kept his hotel then. He was a kind man, and he thought a good deal of Martha. So, seeing the girl so clever we had her come and live with us.

"So she came and had a little room that was handy to the dining-room. Martha was the most industrious young girl I ever saw. Plain girls somehow are apt to do more than pretty ones. Perhaps they don't look in the glass so much.

"Well, Martha grew up, and, as far as I know, she never had a sweetheart. Girls not half so good as she was got married, and she made their dresses, but Martha stayed single.

"She was neat and trim, and you'd have thought someone would have seen what a good wife she'd make; but the men think more of a pretty face than anything else. And I had made up my mind Martha would never marry, when in the middle of summer Mr. Willard, a young widower, brought his little boy here to board. He came out himself every Saturday, and stayed over a Sunday.

"Martha took to the little boy from the first. He was always with her, and I never knew how fond she was of children before, and I never heard her talk so much to anyone as she talked to Mr. Willard, mostly about the boy.

"Poor Martha! I used to think; if you were pretty he might take a fancy to you, but he's not the man to marry a plain woman, even if he would give up style and fashion.

"But I saw that Martha had a heart in her bosom, like other women, and mine ached for her. And so it went on for two or three years. Every June the little boy was brought down, and he wrote to Martha in the winter, and she was so pleased to get the letters.

"This summer he came as usual and stayed longer. The autumn was well over before his father spoke of taking him away, and old Mrs. Rapps, who finds out everything somehow, told us the child was likely to have a step-mother.

"Mr. Willard was paying attention to a pretty young heiress, and she seemed to fancy him.

"Martha heard the talk. Next morning her eyes were red. She said she sewed too late. I knew she'd been crying, but I said nothing. What good does it ever do to talk?

"Well, Martha was going to make Miss Potter's wedding-dress that day—to finish—and she said she might be late. But it wasn't far to the Potters, and their Jim would see her home, so she went off.

That night a stupid girl I had put the boy—Kenyon his name was—to bed, and it seems he asked for a candle, and she left one lighted.

"I suppose the wind blew the curtains into the flames; but, at all events, while Isaac was in the stable feeding the horses, he saw a queer light and looked up. The house was on fire.

"You know what a fright fire puts people into. We lost our heads entirely. I remembered the child first, but when I got upstairs the hall was in flames, and I, in a muslin dress, could do nothing. I ran down, calling for a ladder. We had lent all ours to a neighbour who was painting. And while one ran one way and one another, we heard a scream, and saw Martha Hill come running up the road.

"'The child!' she cried.

"'There!' I said. 'And the stairs are on fire, and the ladder's gone.'

"She screamed no more. In a minute she had her gown off and stood in her woollen skirt, and then up she went, up the big wisteria vine that my father had planted fifteen years before to shade the porch, and that had grown big and strong, with branches like a tree, in that time.

"The zinc wire was firm, and the vine held. Martha was a light weight. Up she went. Up! up! up! We heard the little engine coming from the village, and the neighbours shouting; but she was in at the window before they came in sight.

"'She's gone to her death,' said I, but the next instant she was out again.

"The child was on her back, its arms about her neck, its head covered with a woollen shawl, and as she went up so Martha came down again.

"We took her in our arms. The child was not hurt. The woollen wrap was scorched, that was all. But Martha's hair was singed, her woollen skirts in tinder, and her hands lacerated by the wires and splintered branches.

"'I've saved him,' she said, 'and I am willing to die.'

"And then she fainted.

"I put her into bed, and the doctor looked at her. He thought she would be very ill, but, somehow, she was not. Her burns were slight, and when they cut her hair, it curled up about her face, and looked prettier than the smooth bands she used to wear; and I sat down and wrote to Mr. Willard, telling him the story. He came down at once.

"She was sitting in the easy-chair in the parlour when he came, and he went in, holding little Kenyon by the hand. I did not follow. I sat here and went on knitting.

"I don't know what they said, but in about an hour Mr. Willard came out. He led the child straight up to me.

"'Tell Mrs. Ashton, Kenyon,' he said, and the little fellow threw his arms about my neck.

"'Martha is going to be my mamma,' he said.

"I looked at Mr. Willard, and he held out his hand.

"'I will try to make her happy,' he said.

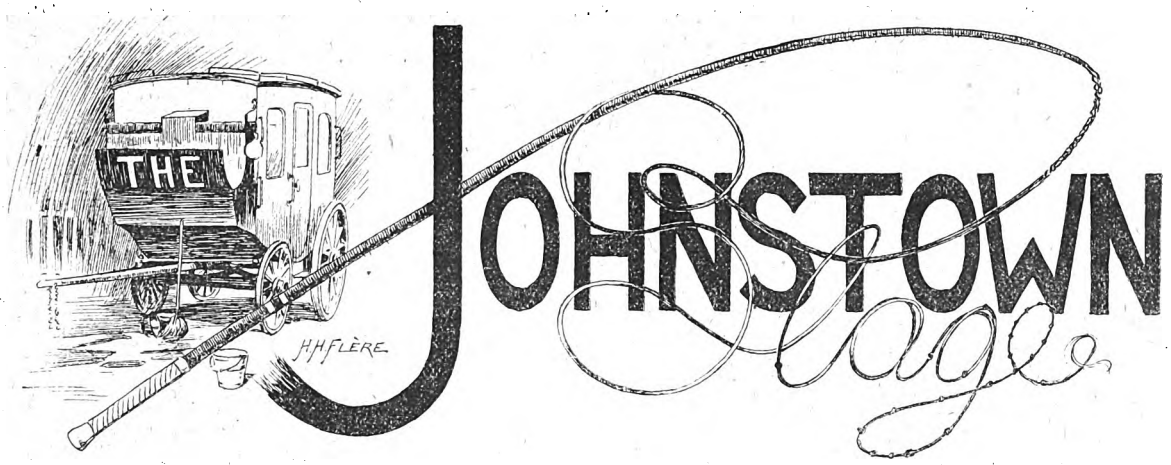
"They were married yesterday, and they are going away to-day. Here comes the 'bus."

The 'bus came. I sat opposite the young couple for many miles.

Such a happy face as Martha's could not look plain, and I am sure her husband loves her.

B. S. K.

Digitized by Google



THE Johnstown stage was due at City of Rocks at five o'clock. About that hour a man in a flannel shirt, dirty soldier-trousers tucked in his boots, and a slouch hat on the back of his bronzed, bearded, unkempt head, materialised in the obscurity of the doorway of the station-house, and shading his eyes with his hand, looked down the road. As he stood there, a cloud of dust became visible in the distance. It floated and wavered nearer and nearer, until the creaking and jingling of dry wood, leather, and metal, and the pounding of hoofs, were heard.

Then, as the cloud approached the station, an apparition of two horses and a stage-coach was seen within it. The cloud stopped in front of the house, the dust settled, and the coach, coated inside and out with the white powder, was disclosed. The driver, looking like a miller, laid his whip on the roof and prepared to descend. The station-keeper, who, meanwhile had stepped out into the road and silently commenced to unhook the traces, looked up for the first time.

The next moment he dropped the trace with an exclamation of wonder, while his hand slowly but instinctively sought the revolver which hung in a belt loosely about his hips. For a few seconds he scrutinised the face of the man who was swinging himself down from the box, and then his look of surprise changed to one of recognition, his hand relaxed its hold on the pistol, and he said heartily: "Well, I'll be durned! Lieutenant is that you? Why, what's come of Jim?"

"He was taken sick down by Shot-gun Creek, and had to lay off at the milk-ranch," said the man addressed, taking off his hat and beating out the dust against his leg. He was tall and broad-shouldered, but slender, and was dressed in the same manner as the station-keeper, even to the revolver which hung about his hips. His voice and bearing, however, the only characteristics unaffected by the dust, betrayed a difference between them.

"Sick, nothing!" exclaimed the ostler, in a tone of disgust, taking out the straw which he held between his teeth, and throwing it energetically on the ground. "That fellow's al'ays sick! I'm durned ef I don't believe he's weakened sence Whistling Dick jumped his stage last month! He's yeard that the paymaster's sending his money up by express this trip, to pay off the boys at the fort, and he's afeard he'll git jumped agin, durn him! That's w'at's the matter. It leaves me in a purty fix!" he continued. "Frank's out after stock, and there's no one yere but me. Who's goin' to take the stage on?"

"I'll take it on as far as Pack City, if you like," said the lieutenant. "The old man will find someone there to take Jim's place easy enough."

The station-keeper, without replying, mechanically resumed his duties of taking out the horses, and watched them meditatively as they walked off to the stables. Then, finally turning to the lieutenant, with the air of one whose mind is made up, he said: "By thunder, I guess that's the only thing we kin do. I can't leave yere. I wouldn't have a head of stock left by the time I got back. Them Injuns is gittin' worse and worse, not to mention the hoss-thieves and road-agents that's gittin' thicker'n fleas on a dog's back. It's sort o' crowdin' you, though, lieutenant, and I don't know what the old man'll say."

"He won't say thank you, at any rate," said the lieutenant.

"You kin gamble on that," said the ostler approvingly. "Who's this Johnny-come-lately?" he added, as a passenger from the inside of the coach strolled towards them.

"Jim said he was a stock-man," said the lieutenant "he's billed for Pack City."

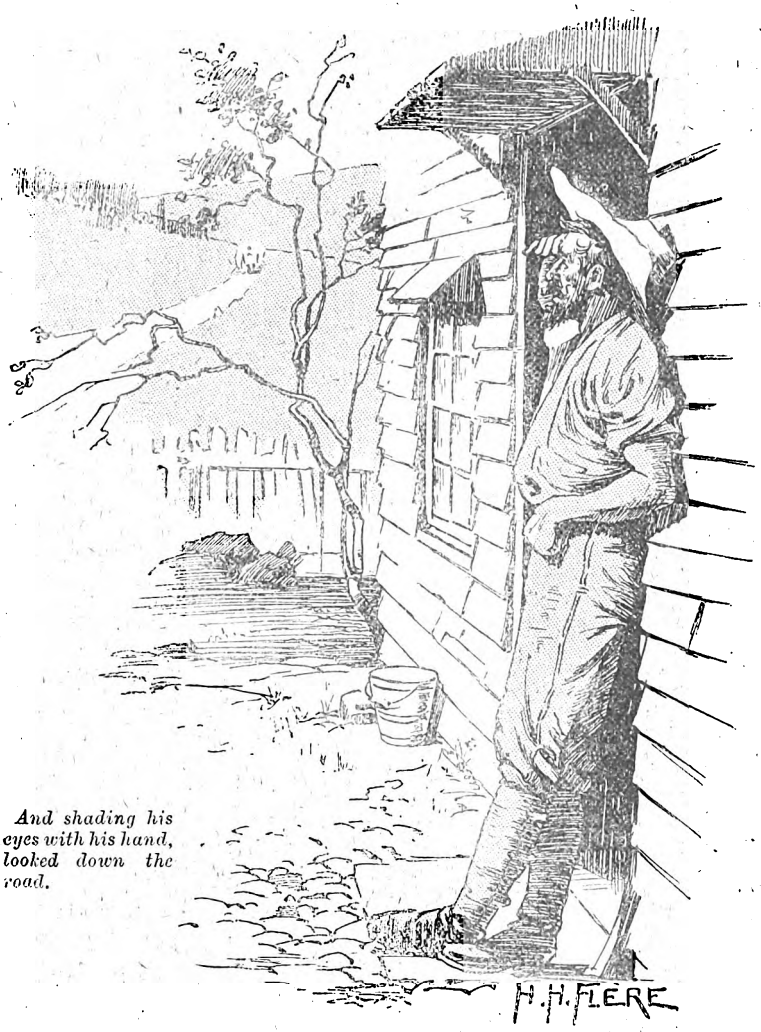
"Jim!" growled the ostler contemptuously. "Jim's a stranger himself in these parts. How should he know?"

And when the traveller, an elderly man, joined them with a sociable remark that "it was purty tol'able warm," the ostler vented his scorn for Jim by ignoring him altogether and continuing his talk with the lieutenant about way-bills, express, mail, and other stage matters. But the passenger appearing in nowise affected by this lack of cordiality held his ground, and if he did not join in the conversation, listened to it so persistently that the ostler finally turned to him, and said rather sarcastically: "Stranger, is there anything I can do for you?"

"Well, no, pard," replied the traveller good-humouredly, "there's nothin' you kin do fer me, but I reckon you kin do somethin' fer thet lady inside, she's petered plumb out, and the kid's yelling like all possessed."

At this the amateur driver walked over to the stage-door and looked in. There was the usual litter of mail-bags, and small bundles, and smell of dust and leather.

Digitized by Google



And shading his eyes with his hand, looked down the road.

Addressing the woman, who, in a long linen cloak, and with a veil over her face, reclined limply in one corner, half holding a crying baby, the lieutenant said: "Supper station, madam."

This announcement producing no reply, he repeated it in a louder tone. The only result was an added force to the baby's cries.

"I reckon she's fainted," said the other passenger, appearing at his elbow with a cup of water, "try this yere."

The lieutenant got inside, followed by the old man, to whom he unceremoniously handed the baby. Taking out his pocket-flask he mixed a little whisky and water, and pushing the veil up from the unconscious mouth, he succeeded in partially reviving the exhausted woman. "Now then," he said, in an authoritative tone, "you must come outside in the open air, and wash your face and hands; that will brace you up quicker than anything. Then when you have had some dinner you will be all right. We haven't much time," he added.

The woman obediently arose, but, cramped and worn out by the long day's ride, had to be assisted to the ground. She succeeded in walking over to the water-trough, and sitting down on its edge, silently took her baby. The lieutenant brought her a basin and towel and left her to her toilet. Presently he returned and, said: "Supper is ready."

"Thank you, I don't want any supper," was the reply.

As he heard her speak for the first time, the lieutenant looked at the shrouded form with surprise. The voice was low and trained, the voice of a gentlewoman. It startled him with a swift suggestion of perfumed lace and six-button kid gloves, of waltz music, yachting, and low murmured words in dim conservatories. The recollection of the fried pork and beans awaiting them in the station, however, brought his mind back to the subject.

"I beg your pardon," he said, "but you must eat something. You can't stage all day without eating."

Her back was turned towards him as she sat dabbling her hand in the water for the amusement of the baby, and he went round and stood in front of her to emphasise his remark. Her veil was still down, and she did not raise her head as she replied, in the even tones of a superior addressing an over-zealous inferior: "You are very kind, but I don't want anything."

The lieutenant was rather nettled at this, but, nevertheless, persisted. His interest was awakened. Besides, it would be very inconvenient to have her faint on the road. "I hope you won't think me obtrusive," he said, modulating his tone respectfully, "but you must have something. If you would prefer it, I will bring it out here."

Then she looked up half-resentfully, half-curiously, evidently thinking that this was a very odd stage-driver. At last she said: "You are giving yourself needless trouble, but as you insist upon it, I will take a cup of tea and a little milk for baby."

If her purpose was to rid herself of his importunities, her request was very effective. Tea! Milk! The lieutenant returned to the station-house thoughtfully pulling his moustache.

"Now," he said to himself, "that is like a woman! Why couldn't she ask for oysters and champagne or something reasonable—but tea! milk!"

"Nate," he said doubtfully to the ostler, "you don't happen to have such a thing as—as tea about the house, do you?"

"Why not?" replied the station-keeper promptly.

"Oh, I don't mean any sage-brush wash," rejoined the lieutenant impatiently, "I'm talking about shop tea."

"Well that's what I'm talking about," said Nate; "a Chinaman gave some to Frank the other day."

"Nate," said the lieutenant, drawing out his flask, "take a drink!"

And in a few minutes he was carrying out a cup of tea and some biscuits, unconscious of the elaborate wink with which Nate, restored somewhat to good humour by the unexpected drink, favoured the elderly passenger.

The lieutenant found the object of his solicitude as he had left her, enduring the discomfort of her condition with silent patience.

Digitized by Google

"You are very good," she said more gently, but in the same even tone of a superior. Evidently this woman was accustomed to being waited on.

"I suppose that condensed milk will do for the baby?" said the lieutenant. "Have you anything to put it in?"

Yes, certainly, the baby had a bottle. But, alas! a search for the bottle revealed the fact that it must have been jolted out of the stage while the mother was unconscious.

"What shall I do!" she exclaimed, her fortitude suddenly forsaking her. "He won't drink out of a cup, and I am afraid he is hungry now." Evidently tears were gathering behind the veil, tears that she never would have shed for herself.

"Oh, I can fix that easy enough," said the stage-driver consolingly.

Quickly entering the house once more, for time was getting precious, and the beans were getting cold, he seized an empty beer-bottle, washed it out, filled it with a hot mixture of condensed milk, drove the cork in tight, pared the cork down to a convenient size, and pierced it with a saddler's awl; then, tearing a piece of linen from his handkerchief, he padded the cork and tied it securely.

"There," he said to the disconsolate mother, "I think that will work. I once raised a litter of puppies on no better one."

The lady, who had smiled rather hopelessly at this cumbrous device, anxiously watched the infant's attempts to manage it. The lieutenant, notwithstanding that the beans were getting cold, looked on with almost as much interest. An expression of contentment gradually stole over the baby's face. Evidently the bottle met with its entire approval. Then the mother gave the child a quick, delighted hug, and with a little, low laugh of relief, turned her veiled face to the driver and said, but this time her voice trembled: "You are so kind! How can I thank you!"

But he only replied with an amused smile, and instinctively, though carelessly, lifting his hat, he went back to his supper of cold pork and beans, while the eyes behind the veil followed him with a look of increasing surprise and curiosity.

The stage, when it left City of Rocks, was twenty minutes late. But the jack-rabbits, which laid back their ears and scudded at its approach, found it no mean rival that afternoon.

"I'll bet ten dollars he makes it up afore he gets to Stoney Creek, and not turn a hair!" said the station-keeper to himself. Then, after a further contemplation of the fast receding cloud of dust, he added in a more reckless tone: "I'll bet ten dollars he makes it up afore he gets to Dick Day's ranche, and not turn a hair!" As no one accepted either of these generous propositions, he shook his head and remarked confidentially: "There ain't many kin copper the lieutenant, now, if you year me!" and, disappearing in the gloom of the interior of the house, City of Rocks was left once more to the hot silence of its fantastic stones.

* * * * *

The sun was setting behind Bald Butte as the Johnstown stage approached the five-mile grade which led down to Stoney Creek. The air was growing cool. The rabbits, looking like sage-bushes in motion, flitted about in the twilight. A colony of prairie owls, posing themselves at intervals along the road, accompanied the intruding vehicle through their territory, the head of the line rising as the stage drew near, and gravely flying down to the station at the foot until, the danger departed, they solemnly withdrew.

Down the grade the stage went, with the driver on the brake and the horses trotting loosely in their harness, until, with a final jolt and lurch, they fetched up on the bank of Stoney Creek. The driver swung himself off the box, and taking an iron pail out of the boot, proceeded to water his horses. The elderly passenger emerged from the stage with a tin cup, and scooping up some of the bright, cold water from the noisy mountain stream, gallantly took it to the lady inside. Then, helping himself, he said to the driver, with a laugh:

"I jedge you've been making up time. Ye herded 'em along pretty lively down that grade."

The lieutenant nodded his head. The position in which he found himself had responsibilities that discouraged sociability. Going to the other side of the stage he got out his overcoat and put it on. It was a garment made of rough, blue cloth, long and voluminous, with a cape that came to the waist. Quietly slipping his revolver from its holster, he put it in a narrow pocket in the lining of the coat. This pocket, apparently made for the purpose, dispensed with the ostentatious and cumbrous method of belting the pistol on outside. These preparations for the night completed, he mounted to his place, and made the usual, warning inquiry: "All set?"

"If you don't mind, pard," said the passenger, "I'll ride outside for a ways, and give the lady a chance to stretch."

Evidently the bottle met with its entire approval.

"I don't mind," said the lieutenant, and the elderly

Digitized by Google

stranger climbed laboriously to his side. The horses' hoofs splashed and the stage wheels crunched their way through the stream, while the water fretted and foamed noisily about the wet fetlocks and through the cleaned spokes. Then hoofs and wheels came out on the soft bank, and the stage sped silently along the damp bottom land. Dark forms shaped themselves into cottonwood trees and alder bushes, and dissolved again into the darkness, while the fresh odour of the earth and growing things scented the night air.

"Have a drink?" said the passenger sociably, drawing out a bottle.

"No, thank you," said the lieutenant, "I don't drink on the box."

"Right you are!" said his companion; "well, here's luck! You h'aint ben long on the line, I take it?"

"No," said the lieutenant.

"I was up in this section a couple o' years ago," continued the passenger, "and I kinder thought I didn't rec'lect your face. It's a fine country up yere, but it ain't as fine a country as some I've seen. Was you ever up round Sin-e-ah-qua-teen?"

No, the lieutenant had never been to Sin-e-ah-qua-teen.

"You don't happen to be married, do you?"

"No," said the lieutenant, beginning to be amused and entertained by his companion, "I am not married."

The stage had commenced to ascend the grade on the other side of Stoney Creek. The road wound up through a cañon, or gulch, in the bottom of which was the dry bed of a winter torrent. It was a long, tedious pull to the top of the mesa, and the horses had to take their time to do it. Notwithstanding that a thin line of light on the brow of a distant mountain signalled that the moon had risen, it was very dark in the cañon; so dark that although the lieutenant kept peering ahead of the horses, he could see but little more than a bend of the winding road faintly defined by the denser obscurity on each side of it. The passenger himself, notwithstanding his steady flow of talk, seemed affected by the surrounding gloom, and maintained an alert gaze on the side of the road.

"You see," he continued, "I had a wife myself once, so I know something about women. I picked her up in 'Frisco, and jest about six months after I lost 35,000 dollars in the Frazer River excitement. Then I came up yere, and laid out a ranch on Mud River. But my wife, she got sick, and I spent all the money I had left in taking her down again, and in doctoring. Well, sir, when she died, and I came back yere with the little fellows, I found my ranch gone plumb. Six inches of snow on the ground, and the little fellows barefoot, and not a dollar in my pocket, and nothing to eat. I was blue. I tell you, pard, if ever a man were blue I was that man! I jest tuk off my hat and throwed it on the ground, and looked all around. But I didn't throw up no sponge. I tuk to splitting rails, and inside of a month I sold 'em to the guv'ment at the Sahatlin Agency, and cleaned up a hundred dollars. I'm doin' tol'able well now, the country round my way's gittin' settled up. I got my eye on some of these yere immigrants, and I'll pick another wife some day, a young 'un about sixteen, that I kin larn. I'm purty good on the physiog. I don't want no widows, they're larnt all ready to yer hand, but they know too much."

"Hold up your hands, ieutenant.'

The lieutenant laughed, and spoke to his horses, which were showing a restive disinclination to proceed. They were almost at the top of the grade now. A clump of scrub-oaks at the head of the cañon was in sight. The shadows here were very dense by contrast with the moonlight, which lay in the open beyond. It was at these shadows that the horses were pricking their ears. The lieutenant cracked his whip over the unruly animals, but as he did so, he looked sharply in the direction of the oaks. Was not something moving there? Or was it the moonlight shadows playing their usual tricks on highly strung nerves?

Then he remembered that there was a spring under those oaks, and that cattle were always round it; or, perhaps a stray deer from the mountains might have come there to drink. His military training and frontier experience made him guard against unreasoning alarm.

At the same time, the station-keeper's open secret that the paymaster's funds were aboard, flashed across his mind. It would never do for him, an army officer, to hand down Wells-Fargo's box to the first road-agent who asked for it. Professional pride, if naught else, forbade it. He said nothing to the man at his side, but under cover of his cape he slipped the reins and whip into his left hand, and with his right cocked the revolver in his pocket. The elderly passenger, notwithstanding that his eyes were also fastened on the clump of oaks, seemed quite unsuspicious, and continued to talk.

Digitized by Google

"I reckon I can get another wife easy enough. I know a fellow that came in to that section only a little while ago, without a dollar, and he married a right purty girl, only sixteen, and he's older than——"

A shrill whistle suddenly startled the silence of the night. The passenger on the box, almost without a pause, leant over, and laying one hand on the reins with the other pointed a pistol at the driver's head, and said, but no longer in the accents of an uneducated person:

"Hold up your hands, lieutenant!" At the same instant a man with a masked face and holding a gun appeared in the middle of the road and stopped the horses.

They galloped out over the prairie.

The lieutenant turned pale and stared in amazement at the man by his side.

"It's no use," said the elderly passenger sternly. "We've got the drop on you! Be quick, or I'll——"

"Well," said the lieutenant defeatedly, "you have got the drop on me, for a fact!" And, drawing a long breath, he slowly raised his arms. But when his left elbow was as high as his shoulder, with his right hand he pressed the trigger of the revolver in his pocket.

There was a muffled report, a shriek, followed by another report, then another, and another, confused and intermingled, the sharp crack of the rifle ringing out over the duller noise of the pistols. When the sounds ceased the man in the road was crawling on his hands and knees towards the shadow of the oaks whence he had emerged. There was no one on the box but the lieutenant, and he was standing erect. The next moment he pitched head first over the dash-board on to the off-horse's back, and from there rolled on to the road. It needed but this to goad the frightened animals into a stampede, and with the reins under their heels, kicking and shying, they galloped out over the prairie.

It is not easy for two horses to run away with a Concord coach, especially after coming up Stoney Creek grade. And so, after the stage had lumbered and lurched at their heels for a half-mile or so, the horses came down to a trot, and then to a walk, and finally stood still, and gazed around, trembling, and ready for a second flight. The moment that the vehicle stopped, the veiled face of the lady passenger appeared at the door, and her terror-stricken voice cried, but almost inaudibly: "My God! what has happened?"

Digitized by Google

Aroused from a troubled sleep by the report of a pistol, followed by a man's shriek, more shots and groans, she had opened her eyes just in time to see a heavy body fall over the wheel and on to the ground.

Then the stage had started forward, the wheel going over the thing on the ground with a sickening jolt. As the stage bounded on she had been thrown violently to and fro, clinging convulsively to her baby, unable to realise what this grisly horror of the night might be. With shaking hands, she now unfastened the door, and stepping out, found herself alone in the awful silence and solitude of the night.

Hark! what was that? She tore her veil from her head, and with it came her hat. Great masses of black hair fell down her shoulders, and a white, young face shone out in the moonlight lovely even in its terror. The noise was but the piping of an insect, but it sounded like a distant shriek. Then the wind stirred the dry buffalo grass, and it seemed to the panic-stricken woman as though it was the voices of men pursuing. Her hair arose, and all the blood in her body rallied in her heart. She would have fainted had it not been for the wailing of the dependent baby in her arms. What should she do? Her first impulse was to run from what might be behind her. But her feeble limbs failed at the sight of the wide plains and obstructing sage-brush. If she could but get upon the stage and drive.

She went to the horses and spoke to them. One of them whinnied in reply, and that encouraged her. She crept between them, talking to them all the time in trembling, beseeching tones, and got the reins out from beneath their hoofs. Then holding the reins and the baby in one arm, she scrambled on to the wheel, and from there to the driver's seat. Everything was so big, the reins, the seat, the break, her little feet did not reach the dash-board, but rested on some sacks of barley that filled the forward boot. In this barley she made a nest for the baby. When she was ready to start, it was evident that she was not ignorant of driving. She held the reins and whip like the amateur drivers of the coaching clubs. The horses had been restive during these preparations, and started off freely at her word.

And now the distraction of driving and the sense of motion diminished her first ghastly horror, and replaced it with nervous excitement. She had no difficulty in finding the road, the horses took her back to it. When she reached it, however, she stopped to look round, and determine which way led to Pack City. It would be frightful to make a mistake, and drive back into that awful tragedy. She thought, with a shudder, of what might be there, dead or living, in the moonlit road or in the blackness of the bushes. She wondered what had become of the driver. Was it his body that she had seen fall from the stage? He must be either dead or wounded; perhaps he was only wounded. She would send back help instantly from Pack City.

But when she decided on the direction she still hesitated. The recollection of that tall, broad-shouldered young driver, who had been so kind and courteous to her, persisted in obtruding itself on her mind. Perhaps if he was only wounded he might be dying now for want of a little help. He had helped her in her need, he had helped her baby. In common humanity ought she not to go back to his assistance? Was it not cowardly to take the stage and desert him? Longing to go the other way, and weeping hysterically, she finally turned the reluctant horses towards the cañon.

The moon had lit up the vicinity of the scrub oaks by the time the stage moved slowly back on the scene. All was silent and deserted. Suddenly the horses snorted and shied at a mass of blue cloth lying in the road. The woman turned the team to one side and drove it against some trees. Then, taking her baby in her arms, she crept down from her perch and, starting at every sound, stole her way to the prostrate form. It was the driver's face which she uncovered, as ghastly white as her own and smirched with blood and dust. Then she slipped her hand under his coat and laid it over his heart. It was still beating. Hurriedly she searched his pockets for the flask that he had used in her service but a few hours before; it was her turn now. She lifted his head and poured the raw whisky generously down his throat. He responded with a groan and a gasp that frightened her anew, and then struggled to a sitting posture.

"Water!" he cried, "for God's sake, water!" Then, as she hesitated, he continued faintly: "My hat. There's a spring over there," and lay down with another groan.

Her fear was dispelled by the sound of his voice. She found the spring, and, filling his hat, let him drink, and bathed his face and head. He revived at this treatment, and, again sitting up, took out his knife and asked her to cut his sleeve off. "I am losing blood terribly from my arm," he explained. She bravely but tremblingly did as she was told. When she had cut away the soaked cloth, and bared the massive arm, he helped her to improvise a tourniquet with his handkerchief and a piece of stick, and the bleeding was stopped. After a second dose of whisky and water he commenced to improve rapidly. She bound another cloth round his head. "The fellow with the rifle did that," he said. "That is what knocked me off the box. It is only a graze, but it was a mighty close call." Then he struggled to his feet, and, looking round, saw the stage. "They didn't get the box, did they?" he cried eagerly.

"I don't know," she said, taking up her baby. "I don't think so. The horses ran away."

"The horses ran away!" he said, staring wonderingly for the first time at the pretty, white face that was raised to his. "Well, but—why—how did the stage get back here?"

"I brought it back," she replied, lowering her head under his persistent gaze.

"You brought it back!" he exclaimed, "you!"

For a few minutes the wounded lieutenant looked down at the slight form of the woman who stood before him in the moonlight, veiled in her own long black hair. Then, as he realised what she had done, he took off his hat and dropped it in the road, having but one available arm, and offered her his hand. She placed hers frankly within it, and he raised the little gauntlet respectfully to his lips. "You are very brave," he said, with considerable feeling; "I am glad to think that perhaps I owe you my life."

The Johnstown stage was later than ever that night when it drew up in front of Abe Goldstein's store, in Pack City. Simultaneously with its arrival the drinking and gambling saloons and other places of public resort suddenly became deserted. It was said that a woman had driven the stage in, and that a man with his head bandaged and his arm in a sling was sitting beside her, holding a baby. While Wells-Fargo's box and the mail-sacks were being taken out (for Goldstein's store was also the express and post-office), the story was briefly given to the crowd. Then a cheering, pistol-firing procession accompanied the stage down the street to the hotel. Here a dozen strong arms fairly lifted the woman from the box, while the baby was only rescued from its mob of volunteer bearded nurses by the energetic intervention of the muscular landlady. The lieutenant himself, after being enthusiastically asked to drink in the aggregate liquor enough to have stocked a wholesale whisky store, was put to bed, and a message dispatched for the surgeon at the fort.

Digitized by Google

Meantime a little party of horsemen swiftly and silently rode out of the town in the direction whence the stage had come. The next day the lieutenant was informed that Whistling Dick had been found dead in the road at the head of Stoney Creek grade. A false grey beard had been picked up near the body, and was thoughtfully offered to the lieutenant as a memento. "We struck the other fellow's trail in that clump of scrub-oak," said his informant. "He was wounded, and there wasn't any trouble in following it. We finally corraled him down in Stoney Creek. But he was game, and played that gun of his for all it was worth before we took him in. You never would have guessed, now, that it was Jim Gatesby himself, the company's new driver. But that's who it was, for a fact. I've heard since that the express folks kind of suspicioned him of standing in on that last robbery."

* * * * *

One year has passed. Again the silent City of Rocks has lost its sharp outlines in the shimmering heat of a July afternoon. On the bench outside of the stage-house door, Nate, the station-keeper, is sitting, reading a month-old newspaper. On the edge of the water-trough opposite him, Frank, the helper, is mending a horse-collar. Presently Nate threw down the paper and said: "Well, I'll be durned!" Frank looked up inquiringly. Nate, rolling a cigarette from a piece of brown wrapping-paper, continued: "Ye rec'lect the old gen'lman from the States wot went up the line about two months after Lieutenant Calverly laid out Whistling Dick and that smarty of a Jim Gatesby?"

Frank nodded his head. He was a man of few words.

"Ye rec'lect how many questions he asked about that little rumpus? Specially 'bout the lady with the kid who showed such a heap of sand? That old gen'lman was her father."

"I knowed that," said Frank, in a tone that resented having his interest excited to no purpose.

"Of course ye knowed it," replied Nate calmly. "Didn't he perk up his head like a grass-fed cayuse and tell ye so when he brought her down the line ag'n about two weeks afterwards? Of course ye knowed it. Didn't he tell every mother's son all along the line that it was his daughter? Why, when he went out to the Sahatlin Agency and got her to give up teachin' the Injuns' kids and go back with him, they tell me that he set up the drinks fer the whole durned town. But ye didn't year how it was that the lady ever come out into this country to teach siwashes, did ye? No! Well, then, the way of it was this. She bucked agin the old man in gittin' married. She 'lowed her jedgment laid over his, but it didn't pan out worth a durn. Her husband was no good, and when he found her father wasn't going to chip in to 'em along, he went back on her.

"But she didn't go nosin' round the old man to be tuk back. That warn't her style. She just got an appointment as school-teacher out yere, which was 'bout as fur away as she could git. But she hadn't no more'n gone when her husband passed his checks in a railway smash-up. Well, the old man didn't know where she were, till one day he came across a newspaper telling 'bout the stage bein' jumped out yere. Then he got on to her trail, and followed her up and tuk her home. P'raps ye rec'lect that about two months afterwards the lieutenant went back to the States. Nat'rally. Well, I'm a sluice-robber ef him and she ain't got married! Yes, sir, yere it is in the paper. They say the old man's richer than Blue Gulch, and give 'em a couple of hundred thousand to start on. And wot's more, among the wedding presents they got was a solid silver tea-set with a 'scription on it, as how it was presented to Lieutenant and Mrs. George W. Calverly, by Wells, Fargo, and Company's express, 'in grateful remembrance of their gallant defence of the Johnstown stage.'"

R. Fletcher.

Digitized by Google

By Winifred Graham. Author of "Through the Valley," "Six First-Class Passengers," etc.

CHAPTER XVII.

Oh, Love! in Such a Wilderness as This.

Eleanor grows very fond of Elizabeth Kachin and her dusky son. Since she rescued him that day from the trap Tombo thinks there is no one like the beautiful Mrs. Quinton.

Big Tombo, his father, an educated man who has spent many years of his life in England, also looks upon Eleanor with the same reverence and admiration as little Tombo.

Carol makes fun of the sandy-haired woman wedded to a native, and laughs at Eleanor for being friends with her.

"I have not so many friends that I can afford to pick or choose," she says simply to Quinton, who is smoking in the verandah, his legs crossed, and a graceful air of abandon in his attitude.

She looks lovingly at his long, slim foot, remembering how it attracted her in old days.

"No, darling; I am afraid you must be getting bored to death in this beastly slow place."

A look of alarm steals over Eleanor's features. The distress in her voice is evident as she replies:

"Oh, no, Carol—are you?"

"I have plenty of sport," he says, watching the smoke wreath upwards; "it is different for me."

"And I have you," she answers tenderly. "That is all I want."

"Sweetest Eleanor," he drawls, letting her take his hand. "How easily you are satisfied!"

"I don't quite see that," she answers, puckering her forehead. "I have the only man I love here at my side, glorious scenery all round, I do just as I please, I come and go unquestioned, you have given me a horse to ride, and a house to inhabit, a heart to treasure——"

"Why do you put the heart last?"

She laughs at his question.

"Oh! merely by chance."

"Perhaps it is the least valuable," says Quinton, playing with her fingers.

"Don't be silly."

"I wish you were fond of sport, I would teach you to shoot."

"I cannot bear killing things. I really believe I should suffer as much as my victims."

"That would be very weak-minded of you."

"Perhaps, but I have a weak mind, you know. I told you that at Copthorne, when you swallowed up my will."

"That sounds as if I were a devouring monster, darling."

She is gazing before her and takes no notice of his remark.

"Copthorne!" she says at last. "What a long way off it seems."

"Yes," replies Quinton, "rather fortunate under the circumstances. Your good parents were eminently virtuous; I doubt if they would give me such a friendly welcome now. I say, Eleanor, don't you wish we had Giddy out here. She would wake us up. I should like to see her come in now, with that terrible purple hat, and the white cock's feathers all awry. How full she would be of gossip and how funny!"

He laughs at the recollection of her odd sayings.

"But I don't want waking up," replies Eleanor. "It would be like a douche of cold water thrown rudely over you in a dream to see any face that reminded me of the past. I am sure we don't want Giddy in our paradise. It is far pleasanter without her!"

"You prefer Elizabeth Kachin and her black Tombo!" laughs Carol. "Do you know, Eleanor, you are the only white woman who would speak to her."

"I like them both; they do not bother me with questions."

"By the way, dear, I forgot to tell you Captain Stevenson and Major Short, two old pals of mine, are in these parts. They sent a mounted messenger to ask me to go and see them this afternoon. They don't know what I am doing here. Of course, I shall say 'sport,' that is only another word for 'love.'"

"The two make a bad combination, for some love is only sport to the fickle and untrue."

"How different to yours and mine, Eleanor," he murmurs tenderly. "I wish I could take you with me this afternoon, but it is a long, rough road, and—and——"

"You would rather your friends did not see me, Carol. Don't be afraid to say it. It is very natural. Besides," with a forced smile, "I am so wonderfully pretty, they might become madly enamoured, and kidnap me in these wilds."

There is no conceit in Eleanor's voice or manner as she speaks, but a spirit of cynicism which is new to her.

Quinton kisses her passionately.

"You are beautiful," he whispers.

"Yet you intend leaving me for several long hours! What are these men like?"

"Captain Stevenson is the dearest fellow on earth, and Major Short handsome enough to fascinate any woman. I assure you I am far too jealous to wish to introduce him. His eyes are soft and hazel, the sort that the feminine mind worships—adores! Hair dark and curling, with threads of grey. A smile that has worked destruction in the four quarters of the globe, and a heart so good and tender that he would not intentionally cause a fly a pang."

"I should like to meet him," sighs Eleanor.

Digitized by Google

"To quote your own sentiments, darling, it is pleasanter alone, we want no one in our paradise, neither Giddy Mounteagle, or the handsome Major Short."

"Now you are vindictive and cross," she declares, as he draws her head down on his shoulder.

"There is my horse. Good-bye, little woman. I shall be back before nightfall."

She watches him ride away, waving from the verandah; he turns several times to kiss his hand.

Then she sinks backs in a low chair, wondering how to kill time until he returns.

The sun sets when he is out of sight, and rises in all its glory at his presence. He is her idol. Her whole happiness and interest lies absorbed in Quinton.

She sends her black servant Quamina to beg Mrs. Kachin to come and sit with her.

It will pass the afternoon to have someone to talk to.

Elizabeth gladly obeys the summons, for she thinks a great deal of her new white friend.

"How is young Tombo?" asks Eleanor, running out to meet Elizabeth, whom she caresses in her affectionately demonstrative manner.

"Oh! so well again, his arm is as good as ever, and he hardly runs stiff at all now."

"My husband has gone to visit two men from Burmah, and I felt terribly deserted and lonely. It is good of you to come Mrs. Kachin."

"I am also glad of a companion," replies Elizabeth. "Big Tombo has gone to superintend the 'Jhooming,' and the boy is with him."

"What is Jhooming?" asks Eleanor.

"Oh! don't you know, they cut down the trees once a year, and burn them when they are quite dry. Then plough the ground, ploughing in all the ash, and sow when the rain comes, scattering the seeds broadcast."

"What busy lives the natives lead! It makes me feel so idle," says Eleanor, stretching her arms. "Yet I love this beautiful country, and enjoy to sit and dream. My days are one long siesta; I am never really awake."

"Ah! you don't work in your home as I do. All this morning I was making clothing for little Tombo on my loom, yet I, too, am happy, Mrs. Quinton. Perhaps you wonder how it is that I married big Tombo. We met in England when I was quite a girl. He was the only honest man it had been my fate to know. I was an unfortunate child, nameless from my birth, yet loved honour and virtue more than anything on earth. My mother was always lenient and kind, but when I grew old enough to realise the wrong she had done me I abhorred her! My marriage released me from a hateful and unwholesome home. I was glad to leave the country in which I first learnt to despise the woman I called by the sacred name of 'mother.'"

Eleanor is pale to the lips; she trembles all over as she listens to Elizabeth.

"I sometimes hear from her now, but she knows my feelings towards her."

"Poor woman!" cries Eleanor, speaking suddenly as if compelled against her will. "You, in your quiet life, with big Tombo, cannot guess the temptations she may have faced. You judge her very harshly. She was kind to you, and it is your duty to love her. You prize virtue and honour, yet do not hesitate to hate and abhor your own flesh and blood."

"It is easy to dictate to others. But if you were to meet that woman, and knew her history, you would pull your skirts aside, for fear they might brush her in passing."

Eleanor shakes her head.

"Oh, no," she says sorrowfully. "I would take her by the hand, and call her 'Sister.'"

"Then you are the right sort of Christian," replies Elizabeth. "I cannot feel that way, because I suffered for her sin—Heaven only knows how bitterly!"

As Eleanor listens to Mrs. Kachin, she feels involuntarily drawn towards her by force of contrast. Their natures are so widely different, for Eleanor was ever lenient, kind-hearted, and forgiving, while Elizabeth is hard, determined, not easily swerved from a purpose.

"Where does your mother live?"

"I hardly know; she is a roving spirit, with no settled home. But her loveless old age is the penalty she must pay for a misused youth. Once she wrote and told me she had enough money laid by to come here if I would receive her."

"And you refused?"

"Most certainly."

"Oh! how could you!" cries Eleanor, her eyes flashing with indignation.

"I consider the way I have acted since I came to years of discretion, is simply just retribution. There is a saying that justice begins next door. I have practised it on my nearest of kin."

"You must be very cruel."

Elizabeth smiles vaguely. Her smile is her only beauty. It lights up her stern face, and makes Eleanor forget that she has sandy eyelashes.

They talk together in the low verandah till long after Quinton should have been home.

"He promised not to stay more than an hour with his friends, and it is a two hours' ride," says Eleanor. "He left soon after one o'clock. It is nearly dark."

Elizabeth detects the anxiety in her tone.

"Oh! you know what men are, they are worse than women! The Major has probably a host of good stories, and the Captain is plying him with wine and some extra special cigars. Don't worry, my dear Mrs. Quinton, he is sure to be late."

She presses Eleanor's hand, and wishes her good-bye.

Then Mrs. Katchin hurries up the hill to her hut, where big Tombo is growling at her absence, and little Tombo getting into endless mischief, which only his mother's watchful eye can prevent.

Night has fallen, but still Eleanor waits on the verandah, with widely-opened eyes, staring along the zigzag path by which Carol rode away. She remembers he turned back to look at her three times, kissing his hand twice. What can have detained him? Surely he knows how nervous she is!

Eleanor rises and walks up and down distractedly, her face ashen pale, her figure trembling.

He has had an accident—she is certain of it. The road, he said, was lonely and rough; it winds near a precipice, the loose stones and boulders roll down the slope of the hill and fall into the abyss.

Perhaps his horse has fallen a victim to disease upon the way, or he has been attacked by a savage troop and speared to death.

These thoughts are too horrible to be borne with equanimity; the stillness of night appals her; she can stand it no longer.

Summoning Quamina, she orders her horse to be saddled immediately, with the idea of flying to his aid. She loves him too well to fear the night, the dangers of that lone road, or her indifferent horsemanship! She would die sooner than sit at home when he might need assistance.

Her horse is the handsomest animal that Carol could buy. She has named him "Braye du Valle."

The black men stare wondrously as she mounts and rides out bravely into the night.

"Braye du Valle," she whispers, "we must find him if it costs our lives!"

In the meanwhile Quinton has bidden his friends good-bye, having stayed far later than he intended, talking over old times, and airing his favourite tiger adventures.

It is dark, and he feels a pang of self-reproach at the thought of Eleanor.

Yet his heart is light, and he whistles as he turns his horse's head homewards.

He loses himself in thought, for Carol Quinton is an imaginative man. As far as his fancy is concerned, he is artist, author, poet and actor. He creates pictures in his brain, dreams of immortal verse, invents a thousand thrilling anecdotes, and quaint love histories. His train of ideas is more that of a woman than a man.

Digitized by Google

The moon rises, and he watches it floating above him

> Like one that had been led astray,
> Through the heaven's wide pathless way.

But the soul of the poet, soaring in the high reason of his fancies, is suddenly rudely shaken. His horse starts, throws up its head and snorts, then shies across the road, as a dark shadow blackens the white stretch of moonlit ground.

"Steady," murmurs Quinton, patting the animal's neck, which is damp with sudden terror.

A black figure comes out from the gloom as he speaks—a tall, masked man on horseback—and before Quinton realises his presence he is seized violently by the throat and dragged from his saddle. A hissing sound as of suppressed rage issues from the assassin's lips—he towers above Quinton, and is muscular and active. Carol is taken unawares, and therefore at a disadvantage. He is like a rat in the paws of a tiger; he can neither cry out nor speak, for the cruel fingers press with deadly force upon his windpipe, and he is flung backwards and forwards, shaken till his teeth rattle in his head and his eyes all but drop from their sockets.

The moon swims round in a sea of blood—he gasps, gurgles, struggles.

The savage man in whose clutches he suddenly finds himself seems glorying in his power.

Quinton feels himself face to face with death: he is a child in the hands of this dark highwayman.

The thought rises suddenly to his fading senses:

"By night an Atheist half believes in God."

The terror of judgment is upon him—hell threatens. Through the black slits of the mask he faintly discerns the eyes of his tormentor, whose face is in such close proximity to his own that the hot breath of passion brushes his brow. They are the eyes of a devil, burning as coals of fire—glowing, scintillating. The broad white teeth of the man glisten as they press his lower lip; then he loosens his hold on Quinton's throat, and gropes for his hand.

The two are fighting now like twin devils under the dark trees, through which the moonlight flits. They roll over in the dust, while Quinton breathes out curses, struggling for mastery. More than once he feels one finger of his left hand caught in the stranger's grasp, then, as with a cry of triumph which rends the air with hideous mirth, superhuman strength seems to possess the masked man. He picks up Quinton in his sinewy arms, whirls him once wildly above his head, and drops him over a rock, down a bank—a fall only of a few feet, on to thick undergrowth below. Then leaping back into his saddle, he gallops at full speed towards the jungle, while Quinton lies gasping and shaking, cut and bleeding from the fray.

He rises dizzily—strange!—there are no bones broken, only the uncomfortable feeling of those hot fingers at his throat, and the giddy sensation from the violent shaking. He feels for his watch; it is still there. Some money fallen from his pocket lies loose on the wayside. Nothing apparently is stolen.

Then he looks down suddenly at his finger, the one twice captured in their struggle.

His cat's-eye ring has gone!

CHAPTER XVIII.

> Where there ain't no Ten Commandments.
> The Road to Mandalay.—Rudyard Kipling.

As Carol goes on through the night, fear is in his heart.

How easily the dark, vindictive, savage creature could have cast him wantonly into eternity, yet he stayed his hand. Evidently he had not desired Quinton's life, since he took nothing but a little band of gold, with a cat's-eye. Such a worthless prize—a woman's ring.

The scene is a puzzle to Carol Quinton, the mystery of it haunts him. In every shadow he sees a black mask, at the slightest sound his blood runs cold, the creaking of the boughs above are to him the echo of pursuing hoofs, and the cry of the parrot, that sinister yell which accompanied his fall. Even the stars are flashing eyes, the moon an enemy, and the stones devils.

Quinton is not a brave man; truth to tell, he is a coward. His whole system is suffering from the shock, while the long tramp he has taken in search of his horse, which strayed from the road, increased his nervous agitation.

His hands tremble as they hold the reins, his knees knock against his frightened horse, who in sympathy with his master, starts at every step, appearing to find his route peopled with spirits.

"What did it all mean—what could it mean?" he asks himself again and again.

The beating of his heart seems to Quinton as thunder on the air, which is heavy and oppressive, a foul and pestilent congregation of vapours!

Surely this can be no fancy—the slow tread of a sure-footed beast on the path before him. Carol quails and whitens to the lips. The moon passes behind a cloud—a second figure is at his side. He spurs his horse, and the frantic swish of his crop lays a deep weal on the animal's withers. It breaks into a gallop, throwing up the dust around and flying down a steep descent. He hears the hoofs following closely in the rear, some one is nearly upon him, gaining inch by inch. His courage sinks—dies—he is white, perspiring, terrified, limp! His senses reel, he drops the reins, falling forward on his horse's neck. His fingers clutch the mane, while a woman's voice cries behind:

"Carol! Carol!"

The horse recognises Eleanor's soft tones, and halts, just in time for Quinton to fall unharmed, swooning to the earth.

Eleanor springs off "Braye du Valle," sinking on her knees in terror by the helpless form. She sees the bleeding scratches on his face and hands, but feels his heart beat, knowing that he still lives.

"Oh, Carol," she murmurs, pillowing his head on her breast, "what is the matter?"

He stirs faintly, a convulsive shudder runs through his limbs.

"I am here, Carol," she continues tenderly. "I, Eleanor!"

He starts up, staring at her in the moonlight.

"But the man," he gasps, "the masked man who followed me only a moment since. What has happened? What has become of him?"

"I followed you down the slope. I came out to find you, fearing you had met with some accident on the road. Just as I was approaching and about to speak, you dashed past me, and then——"

"What then?" interpolates Carol impatiently.

"I suppose you fainted, for I saw you roll from your saddle as the horse drew up at the sound of my voice."

"You ought not to have come," says Carol, somewhat harshly, but Eleanor's blinded senses, dulled under the influence of her love, heed not his ill-temper.

He rises surlily, brushing some blood off his forehead.

He mounts Eleanor upon her horse without a word.

"Why are you so late?" she asks.

"I was attacked on the road by a madman, and half killed," he replies between his teeth.

"Oh, Carol!" she exclaims, her face blanching, "how terrible!"

"Yes, it was rather bad."

Then he describes the scene graphically as they ride on side by side, till Eleanor is shivering with horror.

"Strangely enough," he says, "the only thing I lost in the struggle was that cat's-eye ring you gave me. I think the man imagined it was something of value."

"Is that so?" replies Eleanor slowly, staring before her into the moonlight. "I would rather anything had gone but that."

Digitized by Google

"I am sorry, too; I shall miss it."

There is a pause.

"You are ill, exhausted!" murmurs Eleanor sympathetically.

"Oh, no; don't worry. But I wish I knew who the devil that man was."

* * * * *

"Captain Stevenson wants to give me an Irish terrier," says Carol, a few mornings later. "I think it will be well to have a dog about the place, especially after what happened the other night."

"Yes, indeed; I should accept it by all means."

"I will ride over and see him early, and get back by daylight."

Eleanor picks up a book, leaning back wearily. She is growing accustomed to his absences. The Eleanor who was so difficult to please with Philip Roche will stand anything from Carol Quinton.

Her one idea is to yield to his every whim, regard his every wish. To live only to please.

He bends over her. She is reading Shakespeare for the first time.

"What is honour?—a word," she quotes aloud. "What is that word, honour?—air."

He kisses the curling hair on her forehead.

"Good-bye, my love. You shall not be alarmed this time."

"Come back soon, Carol."

She does not rise to kiss her hand or wave as he rides away.

She is beginning to see with a woman's shrewd instinct that he treats her with more deference when she feigns indifference.

She is dreaming over her book, and her idle fingers turn the pages till they come to Macbeth. By chance her eyes fall on five familiar words, of whose origin she was ignorant.

"To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow!"

A low laugh ripples from her lips, she rises and tosses the volume aside. They have no power to frighten her now, for the to-morrows mean Carol, life, love.

Here in this beautiful country she is passing a charmed existence. Nature in all its majesty around appeals to her senses, ravishes her eye, while she, lovely in her picturesque surroundings, feels like a goddess of the east.

She hears the sounds of hoofs below, and leans over the balustrade, a bright smile parting her lips, the sunlight streaming on her hair, looking quite childlike in her soft white gown, which clings around her girlish figure.

Two men ride up, one tall, fair, and emaciated in appearance, the other dark, and indescribably handsome.

"Does Mr. Quinton live here?" asks the fair man, raising his hat.

"Yes," replies Eleanor, "but he is out now; won't you come in?"

The men hesitate and exchange glances.

"Are you Captain Stevenson and Major Short?" looking at them through her long lashes, with half-veiled curiosity.

They reply in the affirmative, and Eleanor informs them that Carol is already on his way to their encampment at K——

"But I am all alone, and very dull," says Eleanor plaintively. "Do rest and refresh yourselves."

She sends for a man to take their horses, and receives them in the verandah with a gracious air.

"May I ask to whom we have the pleasure of speaking?" murmurs Captain Stevenson.

"Oh! didn't I introduce myself?" says Eleanor with a slight flush. "How stupid of me! I am Mrs. Quinton, you know, or rather you don't know," laughing spontaneously. "The fact is Carol and I made a runaway match against the wishes of my relations—very shocking, was it not? But I am not going to appal you with domestic details. A whisky and soda is more to the point. Is not this an ideal spot?"

The visitors hardly notice the surrounding scenery. They are looking at the lovely features of their blushing young hostess.

An Irish terrier has followed them hot and panting into the verandah.

"I have brought the dog I promised your husband," says Captain Stevenson. "He is a fine little fellow, and game for anything."

"It is extremely good of you," cries Eleanor, catching the dog up in her arms, and feeding him with biscuits.

She puts both the strangers at their ease at once. It is long since she has had anyone fresh to talk to, and the time flies, for they all three have much to say. Eleanor will not let them go.

"You must stay and lunch with me," she murmurs persuasively. "Carol will be so angry if I don't keep you, and the days are so long without him."

"I can't think how it was we did not meet if he rode our way," declares Major Short, when lunch is over, and Eleanor has begged them to smoke.

"Nor I; but he must be home early."

"Is that your guitar?" asks Major Short.

"Yes, but unfortunately I cannot play it. Carol has taught me a few chords, but I have no music."

"Short is the man to sing," Captain Stevenson vouchsafes.

Eleanor seizes the instrument, and holds it out to him with a winning smile.

"Do give us one little song!" she pleads.

He takes the guitar with a kind look from his exquisite brown eyes, and strokes the strings, it seems so gently, that they whisper like the wind in the trees.

"What will you have?"

Eleanor leans forward with her chin between her hands, gazing at him intently.

"Anything you like."

"This road," says Captain Stevenson, leaning over the verandah, "is the road to Mandalay. It seems impregnated with the spirit of Rudyard Kipling."

"That shall be the song," says Major Short.

Captain Stevenson half sits on the balustrade, with the terrier beside him gazing up wistfully into his eyes. Eleanor retains her intent attitude, as a voice more beautiful and mellow than any she has ever heard swells out on the hot air.

Eleanor is moved almost to tears by the magnetism of that wonderful sound, thrilling her very being, for she is highly emotional.

The tune is soft, and the well-known words to the familiar melody take pathos from their rough uncultured sentiment.

She remembers once hearing a man recite the words at a musical "At home."

People had cried then; they knew not why, save that his elocution was exquisite, and he breathed it in an undertone:

By the old Moulmein Pagoda, lookin' eastwards to the sea,
There's a Burmah girl a-setting, and I know she thinks o' me,
For the wind is in the palm trees, and the temple bells they say:
"Come you back, you British soldier, come you back to Mandalay."

Eleanor and Captain Stevenson join in the chorus softly. It is sung slowly, like a low wail, Major Short's clear notes rising above the rest.

Come you back to Mandalay,
Where the old Flotilla lay,
Can't you 'ear their paddles chunkin' from Rangoon to Mandalay?
On the road to Mandalay,
Where the flyin' fishes play,
And the dawn comes up like thunder out er China, 'crost the bay.

As they sing, Carol rides up the hill, and the music falls on his astonished ear. Singing in their verandah—how can that be?

Eleanor is the first to catch sight of him, but does not speak or move, though Quinton's presence always quickens her pulses.

The chords of the guitar take up the refrain, and Captain Stevenson, turning, espies Carol.

When the mist was on the rice fields, an' the sun was droppin' low, continues the rich voice.

Digitized by Google

"Why, there's Quinton!" exclaims Captain Stevenson, breaking into the melody. "My dear fellow, how was it we missed on the road?"

"I can't imagine," he replies; "I suppose I took a different path." His eyes shift uneasily, a flush rises to his brow.

"Your wife has been most kind and hospitable," declares Major Short, laying down the guitar.

"I am delighted she kept you."

"We brought the dog. He has already attached himself to Mrs. Quinton. I assure you at lunch his preference for her was most marked; he wouldn't look at us."

"Cupboard love, eh? I suppose she fed him."

"Well, yes, I should rather think so, he will not require anything more for some time."

"I am afraid," says Quinton, "that I interrupted a concert. You all looked most Bohemian and enjoying the dolce far niente stage of existence."

"It was too bad to break off in the middle of your song, Major Short," Eleanor murmurs, seating herself beside him and taking up the guitar. "I wish you could teach me the accompaniment, for I do know a few notes vaguely, and though I have never learned to sing I can croon a little."

"It really is not difficult," Major Short assures her. "I will send you the song if you like."

"Thanks, but I cannot read music, only I have rather a good ear."

So he strikes the chords one by one very slowly, while Eleanor repeats them.

"I should never have picked it out by myself. Now I shall be able to sing to Carol in the evenings."

"Are they not delightful?" says Eleanor, as the two men ride away. "I have quite enjoyed to-day, Carol."

"I believe," muttered Major Short as they turned out of sight, "I believe that fellow Quinton lied to his wife. Do you think for a moment he went our way? There is only one road that is fit to ride on, that he could have gone by, besides, it was written on his face when he saw us."

"You are too sharp, Short, my boy," laughed the good-natured Captain Stevenson. "But there is something wrong with Quinton undeniably. I wonder who the little woman is, and where she came from?"

Major Short rides on in silence, he is thinking of the little woman's smile.

That night, as Quinton smokes in his low cane chair, Eleanor brings the guitar, running her lithe fingers over the strings.

"I say, Eleanor," he begins, "you need not have let out you could not read music. It was awfully gauche of you. You don't want to advertise your farm origin."

"I am so sorry, darling," she answers penitently.

Again she strikes the chords, this time hesitatingly, for her hand trembles.

The spicy garlic smells are wafted on the night air.

Eleanor breaks suddenly into song, as if inspired by the oriental atmosphere.

When the mist was on the rice fields, an' the sun was droppin' low,
She'd git her little banjo, an' she'd sing "Kullalo-lo!"
With her arm upon my shoulder, an' 'er cheek agin my cheek,
We use ter watch the steamers, and the 'hathis "pilin'" teak.

Her voice travels far in the darkness; she feels as if singing to some unseen audience—perchance spirits peopling that road to Mandalay.

The dog at her feet starts up suddenly, bristling all over, growling, barking!

"Did you hear anything?" asks Carol nervously.

"I fancied a rustle came from the bushes."

"Perhaps danger is stalking abroad to-night," mutters Carol, throwing his cigar aside.

The dog refuses to be silenced, while Eleanor, holding him by the collar, tries to soothe his petulance.

But Carol goes indoors.

(To be continued.)

YOUR CHARACTER FROM HANDWRITING.

Up to the present I have steadfastly set my face against the delineation of character from handwriting through the medium of P.W. However, so many letters have reached me quite recently, asking that I should start this feature in P.W., that I have at length decided to do so.

I have secured the services of the most expert Graphologist, whose accuracy in past cases has been proved beyond a doubt.

WHAT TO DO.

Send a specimen of your handwriting on an unruled sheet of paper, and signed with your customary signature and full address. Inclose six penny stamps and an envelope stamped and addressed to yourself, to Graphologist, Short Stories Offices, Henrietta Street, London.

You Can't Think . . . How Easy It Is . . . To Make Money . . .

If you only know the right way to go to work.

WE WILL TELL YOU.

In each number of The Story Teller appear ten easy problems. The first batch of the Second Series was printed in the issue dated March 21st, the second appears in that dated March 28th, the third will appear on April 4th, and the fourth on April 11th.

Two Five-pound Notes and fifteen One Pound Prizes are given to those who succeed in getting the greatest number of these forty problems correct.

An EASY WAY to EARN £100.

At the left hand bottom corner of the second page of the cover of SHORT STORIES will be found a coupon. This coupon will appear every week during the whole of 1896. It will also appear every week in PEARSON'S WEEKLY and THE STORY TELLER during the same period.

WHAT TO DO.

Procure as many of these coupons as you possibly can. Once you get them keep them. A good way would be to paste them on to slips of paper. A better way would be to paste them neatly into a book. However, the main thing is to get and to keep them.

WHY YOU SHOULD DO IT?

Because we are going to give the person who collects the most coupons during the year 1896 the sum of One Hundred Pounds, and if you do not want this money for yourself you can nominate someone to whom it would be useful.

No coupons are to be sent to us until January 1st, 1897. Keep them safely till then. All coupons are of equal value.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lb.	30/-
No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 50lb.	37/6
No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 55lb.	41/3
No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lb.	48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

TO MAKE THE "HOUSE BEAUTIFUL" IT IS NECESSARY TO EMPLOY

ASPINALL'S ENAMEL

LOVELY COLOURS AND LATEST ART SHADES.

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free.—Address, H. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

VIOLIN STRINGS.

4 Best "E's" (samples) 9d., post free.

S. S. CARY, NEWBURY.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

NOSE

A RADICAL PERMANENT CURE Medically approved for Red Noses, 3s. 9d. post free, under cover. Pamphlet "Red Noses, Cause and Prevention," 1s. Machines for Ugly Noses. Particulars for stamp. LEES RAY, Specialist, Wavertree, Liverpool.

THIN BUSTS

Quickly transformed and a good figure permanently obtained by a perfectly harmless, simple, and inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. For particulars, free, send stamped envelope in confidence to "Madame B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Caused by INDIGESTION, etc. All who suffer from this disfiguring complaint should write for DR. HOWELL'S RENOWNED REMEDY, 22, Glasshouse Street, London, W., who guarantees a cure in a few days. 2/6 a box.

AJAX CYCLES FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN

ARE RICH VALUE. 25 to 30 per cent. saved and carriage paid.

IMMENSE STOCK, NEW AND SECOND HAND.

Easy Terms from 10s. per Month. Lists free.

Now Open.—LARGE CYCLING SCHOOLS, at 42, High Street, Camden Town, LONDON, and at Liverpool.

BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING COMPANY, 42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W., and 45, Everton Road, Liverpool.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

GIVEN AWAY £5,000!

GRAHAM & CO.'S

MONSTER GIFTS.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—Messrs. GRAHAM & CO. intend to present their Customers with a Monster Parcel as a means of advertising their celebrated

EGYPTIAN GOLD JEWELLERY.

For the small sum of 6s. 6d. we will send as follows:—

NOT A TOY

WE GIVE YOU A WATCH.

	Our Price.
One Gent's Egyptian Gold Albert, or one Lady's Egyptian Gold Albert	2s. 6d.	FOR
One Seal or Locket for Chain	1s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Ring, or one Lady's 5-stone Diamond Ring	3s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Scarfpin, or one Lady's Fashionable Brooch	2s. 6d.	6s. 6d.
One Pair of Cuff Links, or one Carbon Diamond Bracelet ...	2s. 6d.
Total	12s. 6d.

In addition to the above Every Purchaser will be Presented Free of Charge with one of our handsome

KEYLESS WATCHES.

USUALLY SOLD AT HALF-A-GUINEA.

Read what is said by those who have purchased.

WANTS A SECOND PARCEL.

Lowick-by-Neale, Northumberland, August 17.

Gentlemen,—Received to-day your second parcel of jewellery, with which we are immensely pleased. We really wonder how you can do it. The watch itself is worth more than the money charged for the whole. Many thanks for punctuality.—Very truly yours, WILLIAM McISAAC.

GOES BETTER THAN HIS £15 WATCH.

11, North Street, St. Peters, Tunbridge Wells.

Gentlemen,—Some few weeks ago I sent to your firm for the jewellery and advertised watch, of which I am surprised; the watch is a beautiful timist. I must admit, in fact, it goes better than my £15 gold watch; and for the jewellery it is astonishing value. I think you must lose money over such gifts, as I term it. The watch alone is worth double the 7s. I enclosed. I have shown it to several of my friends, and they were astonished. You can add this to your testimonials if it will be of any service.—I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully, LEWIS C. RHODES.

GUARANTEED TO KEEP CORRECT TIME.

Any Watch not received in going order will be exchanged.

Every Watch is Carefully Examined, Timed, and Guaranteed a Correct Timekeeper. Call and see them.

We do this to save the enormous cost of advertising, preferring to give our customers the benefit. As we lose money on each parcel we cannot supply more than two parcels to one person. If you cannot call get a P.O. at once, and send for this wonderful parcel. Orders will be executed in Rotation. MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

NOTE.—The entire parcel will be sent for 6s. 6d. (post free, registered, 7s.). Each customer will receive gratis one of our HANDSOMELY ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES. Be sure and call or send to-day for the

6s. 6d. Monster Presentation Parcel including the Handsome Keyless Watch.

S. S. GRAHAM & CO., 277, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL JUST STARTED.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 379. FOR WEEK ENDING APRIL 4TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

BE SURE TO KEEP IT WELL. THIS ADVERTISEMENT.

WONDERFUL BARGAINS!

IMMENSE REDUCTION IN PRICES OF OUR WORLD-RENOWNED

BRUSSELETTE CARPETS.

ADMITTEDLY THE CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD Seamless, Woven, and Reversible, Rich Turkey Patterns and Colourings, Superior Quality, with Handsome Border to match, a Marvel of Excellence and Beauty.

SIZES AND PRICES.

	ft. in.	ft. in.	Sale Price. s. d.	Former Price. s. d.
No. 1	9 0 by	6 0	5 6	9 0
„ 2	9 0 „	7 6	7 0	11 6
„ 3	9 0 „	9 0	8 6	13 6
„ 4	10 6 „	7 6	8 9	13 9
„ 5	10 6 „	9 0	10 0	15 6
„ 6	12 0 „	9 0	11 6	18 0
„ 7	10 6 „	10 6	12 0	18 6
„ 8	12 0 „	10 6	13 6	20 6
No. 9	15 0 by	9 0	14 3	22 6
„ 10	13 6 „	10 6	15 3	24 0
„ 11	12 0 „	12 0	15 3	24 0
„ 12	13 6 „	12 0	17 0	27 0
„ 13	15 0 „	12 0	19 0	32 6
„ 14	18 0 „	12 0	22 9	36 0
„ 15	21 0 „	12 0	26 0	42 0

These Carpets are splendid imitations of Real Brussels Carpets, the designs having been carefully copied from the originals, both as regards colourings and patterns, so that when in use it is almost impossible, except by close scrutiny, to detect the difference. They have gained a world-wide reputation for magnificence, cheapness, and utility, having no equal. All designs are registered and deservedly considered works of art.

GIVEN AWAY.

As an advertisement for the introduction of these goods to all readers of Short Stories, we have decided to give away to every purchaser of the above goods, enclosing cutting from this advertisement a very handsomely woven Hearthrug, 6ft. long and 3it. wide, to match carpets in colours etc.

Thousands of Repeat Orders and Unsolicited Testimonials have been received from our Customers.

Hurst Wood, near Maidstone.
Mrs. Thatcher writes: "Sir, please to send me two Carpets, etc. I had two from you three years ago, and they have given great satisfaction."

Police Station, Larkhill, Lanarkshire, N.B.
Mr. L. Annand writes: "Would you please forward me another Brusselette Square, same as one received on Friday last. I must say it far exceeds my expectations. I am simply delighted with it."

All goods despatched same day as order received. SATISFACTION GUARANTEED OR MONEY RETURNED. Cheques and Postal Orders to be made payable to J. HARGREAVES, Sec., and crossed "Union Bank." Established upwards of Twenty-five Years.

THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.,
31, OLD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PAY YOU WELL.

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS
For the Immediate Production of
BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's
EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:
Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; 2lb., 4s., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON

Digitized by Google

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

THE

REV. C. HAVERGAL

(Nephew of the late Miss Frances Ridley Havergal)

Writes from 14, Alroy Road, Ansfield, Liverpool: "I can thoroughly endorse the statement of 'A Clergyman,' whose testimony to the efficacy of your WIND PILLS for affections of the Stomach, Bowels, and Liver, appears in The News. I shall be happy to recommend your Pills as I have opportunity. By all means publish my communication."

All sufferers from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND ON THE STOMACH, COSTIVENESS, SICK HEADACHE, NERVOUS DEBILITY, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, BILIOUSNESS, etc., should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

☞ The WIND PILLS being Purely Vegetable, Tasteless and Mild, and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

Of all Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for price, from PAGE WOODCOCK, Lincoln.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

RUBBER STAMPS

FREE BY POST.

AGENTS WANTED.

Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters, 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, and Ink for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. IRETON & CO., Ltd., 92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

"JUNO" CYCLES

Are the Very Best.

JUNO Safeties. Roadsters. 28lb.; Racers. 22lb. JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world. Interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

THIN BUSTS

Quickly transformed and a good figure permanently obtained by a perfectly harmless, simple, and inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. For particulars, free, send stamped envelope in confidence to "Madame E. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 37, Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Caused by INDIGESTION, etc. All who suffer from this disfiguring complaint should write for DR. HOWELL'S RENOWNED REMEDY, 22, Glasshouse Street, London, W., who guarantees a cure in a few days. 2/9 a box.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2 ... £6 per cent. | Feb. 1 ... £7 per cent.
March 2 ... ... £6 per cent.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S £100 COUPON.

No. 14

April 4, 1896.

S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope addressed Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "AD" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 37, Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 57 Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

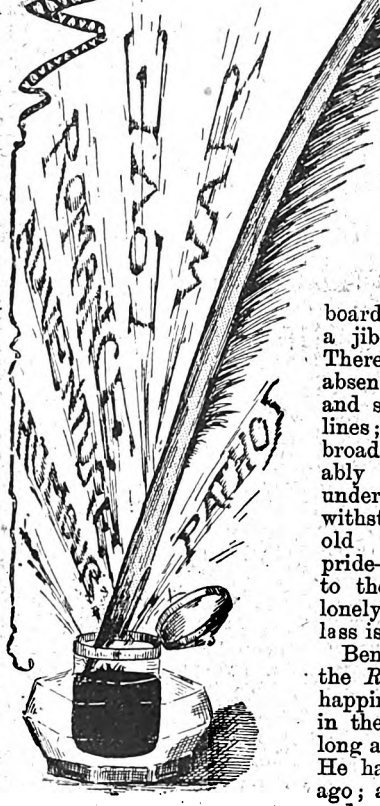
Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED by C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 379.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending April 4th, 1896.



Ben Boardman's Boat.

The Rescue was an unwieldy, centre-board craft carrying only a jib and a mainsail. There was a noticeable absence of the graceful and symmetrical in her lines; she was of a broad beam, and remarkably steady and slow under canvas. Yet, notwithstanding, she was old Ben Boardman's pride—something more to the aged, sea-worn, lonely man, than many a lass is to her lover.

Ben Boardman loved the Rescue; his whole happiness was centred in the boat, that is the long and the short of it. He had built her years ago; and he had patched and repatched her exceedingly tub-like sides with all the loving care of a creator restoring his own handiwork.

The tide was low, one afternoon in July, and the Rescue lay—unsupported by a single chock—high and dry, careening to starboard, upon the Worthing beach-shingle. And her proprietor leant against a weather-beaten capstan—ruminating.

Such men as Ben will pass nearly a whole day in this manner, in the profoundest meditation, thinking of days that have gone, and of deeds that have been long since forgotten save by themselves.

Many a quid of rum-soaked tobacco did the old man turn over between his toothless gums, ere the tide came in. But at the approach of the water, his thoughts winged themselves back to his craft in the background of the peaceful picture of which he himself formed the quaint centre-piece.

"There'll be a bit o' a westerly breeze 'fore long," he muttered to himself. Then, as though the Rescue was imbued with life, and could hear him, he added in a louder tone: "Old gal, may-be we'll earn a trifle i' the evening."

The water was smooth as a mill-pond, and the heat rose from the surface in a shimmering haze. The tide drew nearer and nearer, creating scarce a ripple. A sixty-ton yawl lay at anchor some three miles to seaward; she was trim and graceful, heavily sparred, and contrasted strangely with the old tub which Ben Boardman loved so well.

Suddenly a boat put off from the yawl, manned by one of the yachtsmen, a lady and gentleman being seated in the stern.

Ben, ever mindful of the opportunity of receiving a gratuity, made his way down the beach, crossed the thin strip of level sands, and stood knee-deep in the water, in readiness to run the boat well ashore, so that the dainty feet of the lady might alight upon a comparatively dry spot.

He scanned the yawl, as he stood there—she had only arrived at her anchorage that morning—and his keen and practised eye took in and fully appreciated the beauty of her lines. But not for a fleet of such vessels would the old man have exchanged his Rescue, the work of his own hands.

Meanwhile, the boat—urged through the smooth waters by the muscular arms of the yachtsman—shot shorewards at a rapid rate.

In the course of a not uneventful life, Ben Boardman had visited many places, and had seen many beautiful women of almost all nationalities, but never had his eyes rested upon a more lovely face than that of the fair occupant of the boat's stern.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Beatrice Douglas—for such was her name—was, indeed, beautiful. Her brilliant blue eyes shone like stars; her hair—of a hue betwixt black and brown—waved in graceful carelessness above her smooth, white forehead, above her little, shell-pink ears, and protruded in delicious, natural curls from beneath her red, stocking-shaped cap. She had, perhaps, too little colour in her cheeks; but her lips made amends, for they were of a rich carmine, and, when parted, displayed an even row of little, pearl-white teeth. She was attired in a white yachting blouse of some dainty material, which—cut somewhat low—displayed her graceful white neck and throat, and gave but a glimpse of the smooth whiteness of her bosom. The be-ringed, taper fingers of her right hand hung over the boat's side, and allowed the water to touch their tips, causing a little ripple. It seemed to Ben Boardman that she was thus conferring a kindness upon the very sea.

And the man beside her, Ronald Douglas, her husband, also possessed features most striking to all who beheld him. Had Ben Boardman been an educated man, he would have compared the proprietor of the yawl to a Greek god, but the classics were complete strangers to the old boatman.

Nevertheless. Ronald Douglas did not appear like a man upon whom the world was smiling. There was a look of mental torture, of pain immeasurable, in his dark eyes. But his wife did not appear to notice anything amiss. She continued to chat, making use of a wondrous flow of small-talk, as was her wont, whilst her husband answered only in monosyllables, or not at all.

The boat grounded noiselessly, and Ben Boardman, touching his grizzled forelock, seized the gunwale and with a mighty shove succeeded in forcing the keel half a-boat's length farther in land.

A moment later he was holding one of Beatrice Douglas' little hands, whilst her husband stood beside him, holding the other. Poising herself for one second upon the boat's side, she sprang lightly between them upon the glistening sand. She smiled her thanks to the old man, such a smile as lived in his memory for many a day afterwards. In his roughly poetic way, he mentally compared it to the breaking dawn in summer, to the sunlight dancing on the waters, to something not of the earth earthly, but proceeding direct from Heaven.

Ronald Douglas carelessly tossed half-a-crown towards Ben, which the latter picked up, too astonished to mutter his guttural thanks. So the old man stood winking and blinking, in perplexity watching the two lithe and graceful receding forms, wondering if it were possible that they were those of anything less than a prince and princess incognito.

But he envied their lot not one whit; for did he not possess a certain old centre-board boat called the Rescue, and was she not worth all the gold in the mint, to him?

And he determined to put the lightly-earned piece of silver in the cracked tea-pot upon the mantelpiece in his tiny cabin, where all his extra pence were placed, in preparation for the day when the Rescue might require a thorough overhauling and repatching.

* * * * *

Ronald Douglas and his wife wended their way up the beach and along the esplanade; he, moody and taciturn; and she, with the gaiety that was a part of her very nature, carelessly chattering, chattering, chattering.

She was in the middle of a trivial remark concerning the occupant of a bath-chair, when he cut short her sentence, unfinished.

"Trixy," he said—he always called her by that name, no one else did so, and it seemed one more link in the chain of his great love for her, which bound her so closely to him—"Trixy, supposing that I was a poor man. Could you bear to be a poor man's wife?"

She pouted slightly, then looked up at him, smiling. "What an absurd idea to get into that very sensible head," she said banteringly. "You are not poor. So what does it matter?"

"But supposing——" he persisted.

"There are no grounds for the supposition. Why suppose absurdities?" and she brushed aside a stray curl from her forehead.

"But if——"

"But me no buts," she broke in, placing her hand chidingly before his mouth.

He tugged at his moustache, half viciously. The gloom in his eyes deepened. Could she not be serious, and take him seriously, for one minute?

"Listen," he said, halting, and taking her by the wrist. "I have a reason for asking you this. Tell me honestly. Could you bear a life of poverty?"

"Why, what do you mean, Ronald? Are you going to endow the church with all your worldly goods?"

She was still bantering. She could not conceive that his question had any serious meaning. She thought, perhaps, that he was merely testing the depth of her love for him.

"Could you bear it?" he repeated doggedly. A fever of anxiety, a world of eagerness, lay in his eyes.

"Certainly not," she replied decisively. "I would sooner die than be poverty-stricken. I think that I was made for riches, and that riches were made for me. Could a butterfly exist without sunlight, eh, mon cher!"

"You mean that?"

"Decidedly," she made answer, with perhaps more earnestness than she had ever made use of in her life.

Ronald Douglas dropped her wrist. He half turned, and continued his walk. A deathly-chill shudder swept through him. Yet his brain seemed to be on fire. He knew that she had spoken truly. He knew that she could never mate with poverty, knew that life would be a living death to her without its pleasures, its delicacies, its luxuries, obtainable only by those with a long banking account.

"I would sooner die than be poverty-stricken." These words kept surging with fearful significance again and again through his brain.

He cast a look seaward. His yacht lay in the offing. But morally, to-day, it was his no longer. In another week he would legally have no claim upon it. He was a ruined man.

And she—the woman whom he loved more than riches, fame, aye, even life itself—knew nothing of the blow about to fall upon them both.

She had resumed her careless small-talk, but he heard not a word. An echo of her voice seemed to hail him from the sky, and sea, and land. "I would sooner die than be poverty-stricken," it was dinning in his ears.

* * * * *

The evening shadows drew across the skies; the tide was at the full. A few occasional gusts of westerly wind stirred the surface of the Channel waters. Many styles of craft were lying lazily to their anchorage east and west of the pier. Slowly, imperceptibly, their outlines dimmed, and nothing but ghostly, shadowy objects rose and fell upon the black, heaving bosom o

Digitized by Google

the sea. Suddenly, almost simultaneously, the anchor lights were hoisted, looking like so many twinkling stars, the reflection of which twinkled yet more upon the surface of the sea. The only sound that broke upon Ben Boardman's ears was the sough, sough, of the waters as they lapped the esplanade beneath his feet, a fitting accompaniment to the silence of peace and contentment that stretch like a gauzy cloak about the waterside.

Ben Boardman's eyes dwelt upon the Rescue as she now rode to her anchor, and—his imagination playing strange tricks with his eyesight—he fancied he saw the same beautiful face, which had so deeply impressed him in the afternoon, gazing mournfully upon him from the stern of his old tub.

He had put aside all hopes of earning a few shillings by taking holiday-makers for a sail, for he had appealed to them in vain. But he sat upon a public seat, loath to go home, loath to leave his cherished Rescue for the night. Something impelled him to remain. Perhaps it was the face of Beatrice Douglas, which fancy had conjured up and had located in his own boat.

Suddenly, he felt a hand laid upon his shoulder. He turned round. The vision passed from his sight, only to give place to the smiling face of Beatrice Douglas in the flesh.

She smiled upon him as she had smiled at their former meeting. To Ben Boardman she appeared to illumine the very darkness.

He rose to his feet and touched his forelock. What could she want with such as him? he mentally questioned.

"Here he is, Ronald! Here is our old friend!" she cried gleefully, in a voice of surpassing sweetness.

Yes! Ronald Douglas could see him. He looked upon the old man as a condemned felon might look upon his executioner. He met the boatman's glance, and shuddered. Despair had entered into his soul. He was suffering the torture of the damned. He would have given up even then, at the eleventh hour, he would have turned aside from the purpose that seemed to goad him on with such relentless force and cruelty, had not he known that his wife's answer would have still been: "I would sooner die than be poverty-stricken."

His eyes roved restlessly around. Suddenly he perceived the Rescue, bobbing up and down, a few fathoms distant.

"My wife and I wish to go for a moonlight sail," he said, in an unnaturally calm voice. "Alone, you understand. What deposit shall I leave upon your old cask? What is her value to you?" And he pointed to the pride of Ben Boardman's heart.

"Cask!" the boatman muttered in indignation. "She's the tightest craft on the beach!"

"Yes. I dare say she is. That is what we want. Something tight and trim," Ronald Douglas replied reassuringly. Neither his wife nor Ben Boardman appeared to note the irony underlying his words.

"Fifty poun' is her value to me," said Ben.

Perhaps he would have disdained to carry on further conversation with one who had thus insulted him on his own hearth, as it were, had it not been for the beautiful, smiling face, and the lustrous eyes that gazed down upon him. Perhaps, but for Beatrice Douglas, he would have bidden the young man go his way.

The breeze freshened. The stars, which had already peeped forth, became ever and anon obscured by dark, fleeting clouds.

Ronald Douglas knew the value of such a boat as the Rescue. A ten-pound note should have purchased her at any time.

But what mattered her value to him? If the old man honestly thought her worth fifty pounds, he was entitled to the amount. This was no case for shilly-shallying.

He took a role of bank-notes out of his pocket-book, and counted out eleven.

"Here are fifty pounds as security for your boat," he said, "and a fiver for her hire."

Ben Boardman fairly gasped in his astonishment. Was the world coming to an end? or had an angel come upon him unawares?

Mechanically he put out his wrinkled hand, and took the proffered paper. Then he laid the little bundle on his knee, and counted the notes with trembling fingers, and great, wide-open staring eyes.

What would not this money buy? He thought of the mainsail that he was laying up his pence for; and he looked at the five-pound note with a feeling of unholy joy. He felt as though he was doing something wrong in taking so large a sum for a midnight sail, and his second impulse was to return the money to his patron.

Beatrice Douglas apparently read his thoughts, for she placed her warm little hand upon that of the old man, checking any movement.

"No, no," she said. "Keep it. You may want it to mend your boat. My husband is very rich, and you are quite welcome. The rest of the money is only in trust, you know. We might lose your boat and both be drowned, then you would have no one to repay you for your loss."

And she laughed merrily at the bare idea of such a contingency.

So the old man put one note in his pocket, and stowed the rest away in the bosom of his jersey.

It was a long time since he had had so large a sum in his possession, but he would not have exchanged his Rescue for fifty times fifty pounds.

Borrowing a dinghy from one of the neighbouring boatmen, old Ben Boardman sculled his customers alongside the tub-like craft, and put them aboard her.

He slipped the cable, knowing that the tide would have receded considerably, leaving it high and dry before she returned. Then he hoisted the jib and mainsail, hauled aft the sheet, and placed it in the hands of Ronald Douglas.

"What is the name of your boat?" Beatrice Douglas asked, as Ben Boardman hauled the dinghy up to the stern.

"The Rescue, lady," he replied, as he stepped over the side.

She smiled and nodded to him, as he slowly pulled away to the shore. And the old man mentally swore to change the name from "Rescue" to whatsoever name this angel lady bore.

But Ronald Douglas groaned in spirit. The Rescue! Well, it was the only means of rescue which he found to hand. He saw no other opportunity of saving his loved one from the poverty which—through rash and hazardous speculation—he had brought upon her.

"I would sooner die than be poverty-stricken." The words kept dinning in his ears, to the swish, swash, of the water lapping round the stem of the Rescue, with maddening persistency. Yes, he must follow the line of action which he had already mentally mapped out. There must be no divergence from the scheme. And she—she should never know how near she had been to that pauperism that she dreaded more than death. She should remain happy, the gay, thoughtless, babbling, butterfly-like creature she had ever been, until—until the scheme should reach accomplishment.

Digitized by Google

He set his teeth hard, steadied the helm, and sailed the Rescue to the southward.

And Beatrice Douglas chatted incessantly, speculating upon the success of a naval ball, to which they had been invited, which was to take place at Portsmouth in the following week.

* * * * *

They had been out somewhat over an hour, and had run before the wind, up channel, for a distance of four or five knots.

"I think we had better bring her round now," said Ronald Douglas, and he raised his great, sad eyes to his wife's brilliant bewitching ones, half questioningly.

"By all means, Ronald, let us go back," she replied, shivering slightly. "You are not yourself this evening. Your companionship is as delightful as that of any well-conducted bear, excepting that you do not indulge in hugging."

He put the helm down, the Rescue answered quickly, and he steadied her, hauling in the slack of the sheets, so that she shot along on the starboard tack.

The moon's light broke between the ever passing clouds, and played upon the dazzling beauty of the woman beside him.

He looked upon her, hungrily, despairingly. Then he drew her to him, and imprinted kiss after kiss upon her lovely mouth.

"Why did you wish so particularly to sail this boat?" she asked later. "It is much pleasanter on board the Freak of Fortune."

"Because—because I wanted something that I could sail myself, unassisted. That is why I took yon old man's ewe-lamb."

She shuddered. The light died out of her eyes, giving place to a look of alarm. Some subtle note in her husband's tones had terrified her. She had never known him to speak in a voice so pregnant with restrained pain. It was as the voice of one mentally tortured. She could not understand it. She merely sat silent, shivering, watching him, not daring to take her eyes from his.

The wind had increased in strength, and the Rescue sped along in a south-westerly direction towards the coast of France.

Directing his wife to take the helm and keep the vessel upon her course, Ronald Douglas sprang forward and hauled up the centre-board. The time of Beatrice Douglas' deliverance had come.

Instantly the Rescue heeled to port. Her gunwale went under; the water rushed in like an avalanche.

"Hard over! hard over!" the wretched man shrieked. His wife would never have to face poverty. She was already facing death. Her face was white as marble; her lips were blue; her beautiful eyes were starting from their sockets.

But she did his bidding bravely.

At the same time, knowing something of seamanship, she attempted to let go the main sheet. A shriek broke from her parted lips, another, and another. Her husband had made it fast, so that she could not cast it adrift. The death-trap was complete. In a frenzy of terror she tore her dainty fingers, till the blood spurted from them, in futilely attempting to wrench the bolt out. Now, when it was too late, Ronald Douglas would have bartered away his soul to save the life of the woman he loved.

All this took scarcely five seconds, but it seemed a life-time to the man clinging to the ring of the centre-board, with those agonised shrieks ringing in his ears.

The Rescue answered to her helm. The jib fluttered for a moment, then the breeze struck the mainsail with a resounding thud. The boom swung from port to starboard, crashing against the head of Ronald Douglas. He was visible, alive, a man in his full strength, an instant before; then for a moment his tall form swayed in the dimness of the night, and it splashed inertly into the sea. Then the Rescue turned over like a top. She capsized as the moon once again shone out in all her brilliancy. And before another cloud obscured the light, it shone down upon the slight keel of a flat-bottomed sailing boat, of which the centre-board had been drawn up.

* * * * *

The following afternoon the tide washed the Rescue ashore not far from the Worthing pier. Old Ben Boardman, who had watched for her, almost heart-broken, throughout the night, was the first to espy the wreckage floating in on the blue waters. And a dire foreboding—a memory of the phantom face which he had seen, seemingly smiling from her stern on the night previous—told him that this was what remained to him of that which had been his pride.

When they hauled her high and dry, they discovered the body of a woman whose skirts were twisted tightly in and out of the main sheet.

Ben Boardman staggered back with a hard, dry sob. The face was pressed close against the stern sheets, but it was no longer looking towards him, the eyes no longer shone, and the lips were not now red, as he had seen them. For the eyes were wide open, staring, glassy, sightless, and the lips were black as night.

He bent forward and reverently kissed the bruised fingers, as the knot of fishermen raised the still form and carried it up the beach.

Then he staggered to his little cabin in the side street, and, taking a roll of bank-notes from an old, spoutless tea-pot, he calmly struck a lucifer and applied the light to them, watching the flame intently until every vestige of the paper had been consumed.

Afterwards he made his way to a tub at the back of his shanty and washed his wrinkled hands—honest hands they were, but he felt as though there was blood upon them.

* * * * *

The Rescue lay moored upon the beach. Her work was done. Never again would Ben Boardman sail her. He used to potter down to the beach day after day and sit there gazing seaward; and he watched the pride of his heart gradually breaking up, falling asunder, under the fierce beat of the rays of the summer sun and the wearing lash of the waves and the ruthless hand of time.

One morning, after a storm, the Rescue was nowhere to be seen. Only a few planks, rotten to the core, bestrewed the beach.

Ben Boardman hobbled down to his accustomed resting place and perceived what had befallen the boat.

He found a rusty ring-bolt beneath the breakwater. This he took home with him.

A neighbour found him the next day, stretched cold and stiff, with the ring-bolt clasped tightly in his hand, and a smile, as of glad recognition, upon his wrinkled face.

W. Keppel Honnywill.

Digitized by Google

MY LAST GAME OF CHESS.

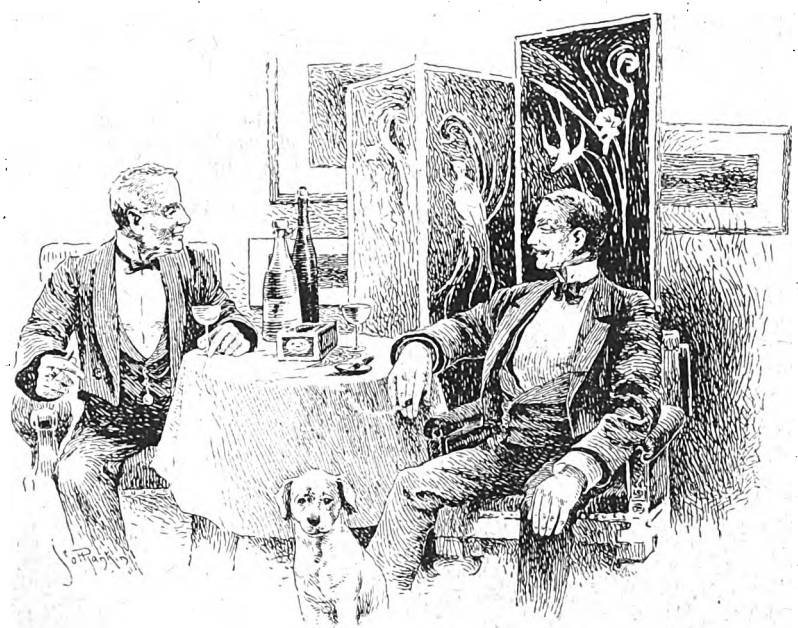
"DO you mean to say, Doctor, that you have introduced chess among your patients?"

"Yes. Why not? Some of these poor creatures, although they suffer from various forms of madness, are able at times to exercise certain faculties of mind with a brilliancy that is really remarkable."

"But surely they are not capable of playing a rational and sustained game?"

"Oh, yes! I have myself, though you know me to be a fairly good player, been beaten by a mad patient. Of course, at times, their play is whimsical and erratic; but even then, if I may say so, there is often a good deal of method in their madness. It is rather curious that at the present time I have under my charge a poor fellow whose mental derangement is almost entirely the result of excessive chess-playing. He indulged in his favourite pastime to such an extent that it ultimately affected his mind.

"We do not allow him even the sight of a chessboard, because anything to do with the game seems to rouse in him the worst form of his madness. Sometimes he will sit for hours playing with an imaginary opponent, and whenever he has these fits he always ends by exclaiming: 'Mate in six moves!' He then deliberately counts the six moves aloud, and when in his disordered imagination he has made the final move, he becomes very violent, and is then dangerous to himself and other people. He was a remarkably brilliant blindfold player, but whether he actually retains the power of mentally working out a game I am unable to say."



We were spending the evening very pleasantly.

The speakers were myself and Dr. Chorley, the famous "mad doctor," whose private asylum was generally recognised as one of the best institutions of the kind in Europe. My friend, the expert in insanity, I should here interpolate, is not really called Chorley, but for the purpose of this little story I have so chosen to style him. I was staying a few days with the Doctor, and we had been spending the evening very pleasantly over a game or two of chess. We had finished our play, and the Doctor was telling me a few things concerning his patients, in the course of which he narrated an anecdote about a game of chess played by two of the inmates of his asylum, which led to the conversation above recorded.

Shortly afterwards the Doctor retired for the night, leaving me alone to write a few letters which I was anxious to get off the first thing the next morning. For several minutes I went on smoking my cigar, turning over in my mind the idea of mad people playing chess, and then settled down to my letters.

I had not been writing long when I heard the handle of the door turn and someone come in.

I looked up, expecting to see Dr. Chorley, but to my surprise a complete stranger stood before me. "Oh!" I thought, "one of the Doctor's assistants whom I have not happened to meet before;" but it certainly struck me as rather strange that he should have entered my host's private study at the time when the rest of the household were in bed, for the Doctor, on bidding me good-night, had told me I was the last up.

I naturally waited a moment for my visitor to speak, expecting he would apologise for the intrusion, or at any rate explain his presence. To my utter surprise, however, he stood perfectly motionless, fixed his eyes upon me, and remained silent.

"Whoever you are," I thought, "you are a pretty cool customer," and feeling annoyed at what seemed to me the fellow's insolence, I said, with some dignity: "I don't understand——"

"You play chess?" he interrupted, without apparently noticing that I had attempted to speak, and all the time keeping his eyes fixed upon me.

This was certainly extraordinary, and as I looked at my strange visitor the truth all at once seemed to dawn upon me—the man was mad!

I am not naturally nervous, but I must confess to feeling something akin to fear when I realised that I was face to face with a man who, for all I knew, might be a dangerous lunatic.

Digitized by Google

My worst anticipations were soon realised. Without taking his eyes off me he walked to the mantelpiece and deliberately took up the large revolver which the Doctor always kept at hand in case of a surprise, and which I knew to be loaded.

My unwelcome guest had certainly now the best of the position. What was I to do? To make a bolt of it would be to offer myself a target to this homicidal madman; to shout for help might equally be the signal for him to send a bullet through me; and yet I would not stand still and be shot like a rat in a hole.

"I must humour him," I thought, "and so gain time, as his absence must soon be discovered."

My mind, however, was somewhat relieved when he repeated, in the same quiet tone of voice:

"You play chess?"

It was something, at any rate, to know that I was not to be instantly shot.

"Yes," I replied in my most winning manner. "Would you like a game?"

Without speaking, he sat down in front of me, carefully placing the pistol on the table, near his right hand.

When the pieces were arranged, he looked at me with a most diabolical expression on his face, and said:

"You will play for your life. If I win, I shall shoot you on the spot; if I lose, I shall kill myself," and he deliberately examined the revolver, as if to assure himself that it was loaded.

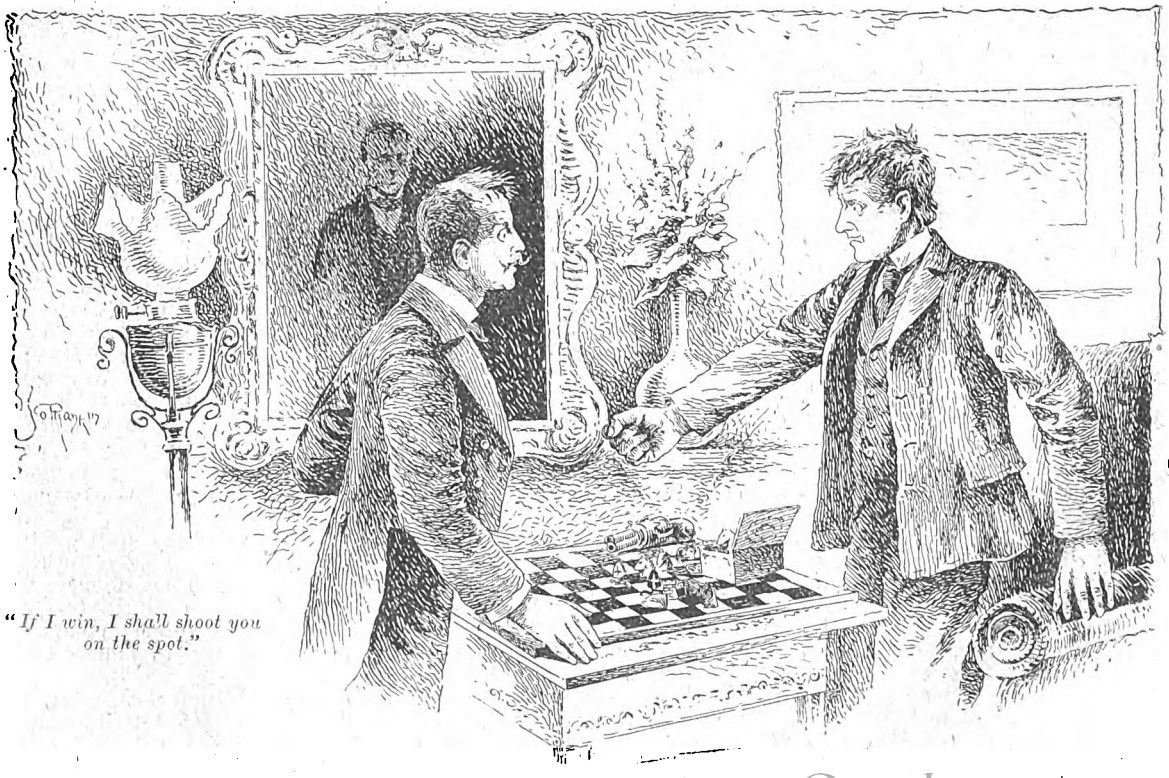
The reader will imagine what my feelings were on hearing this ultimatum. Imagine sitting down at a chess table at midnight with an armed lunatic, who tells you in terrible earnest that he will murder you if he beats you. What a fiendish whim! Under ordinary circumstances, I knew I was liable to make mistakes, and lose a game against an inferior player, but it is difficult to describe what I felt at being obliged to play, when a false move might cost me my life.

A hundred thoughts flashed through my brain. Could my grim and terrible opponent really play an accurate game? If he could, should I be able to make a stand against him till some one came to my rescue? Even if I could beat him, what guarantee had I that my life would not still be in danger? And, besides, I was morally bound to prevent, if possible, the man taking his own life.

I looked up at him. His eyes were fixed upon the board with a terrible stare, and there appeared to be no escape from the awful ordeal of being forced to stake my life on a game of chess.

Without consulting me he selected the white pieces and moved first. He played what chess players call an irregular opening, but there was nothing very remarkable or fantastic about it. I tried to keep cool, but as I lifted the pieces my hand trembled and my head felt on fire.

I soon discovered that my opponent knew perfectly well what he was doing, and that whatever the particular form his madness might take, it did not prevent him from playing the game accurately and in earnest. He quickly forced an exchange of pieces to his own advantage, and secured a vigorous attack upon my king. The position, no doubt, was a simple one to defend, but my feelings had been wrought up to such a state of excite-



"If I win, I shall shoot you on the spot."

Digitized by Google

ment that I seemed incapable of analysing the most ordinary combinations.

Suddenly I was startled by my opponent almost hissing between his teeth:

"Mate in six moves!"

Good heavens! This, then, was the man of whom my host had been talking. A cold shiver ran through me. The terrible words: "Mate in six moves," sounded in my ears like a death-knell.

"What did they mean?" I asked myself. "Did the demented wretch see his way clear to force a mate in six moves, in spite of anything I could do? Or was he only uttering an expression he was in the habit of using, which had no significance for the game we were engaged in?"

Just in time to knock the would-be assassin's arm in an upward direction.

I tried to calm myself in order to examine the position on the board. So far as I could make out, it was impossible to force a mate in six moves, and except that my opponent had some advantage in the matter of attack, our positions seemed to me about equal.

After uttering the ominous words: "Mate in six moves," my opponent leant back in his chair and indulged in a series of horrible chuckles which seemed to make my blood run cold. Then resuming his former attitude, he slowly lifted his queen.

"One," he cried, as he brought the piece down with a bang which shook the table.

By making this move, he offered me a piece, which I promptly took, thinking he had made a blunder which would give me the game.

"Two," said my opponent, without a moment's hesitation, as he replaced one of my knights with his own, while I, thinking to be a piece to the good, accepted the exchange, and took his knight off the board.

The moment I had done so I realised that I had fallen into a fatal trap. It was plain that I must be mated in four moves, and without doubt this cunning madman had foreseen the mate six moves ahead.

"Three," he cried, the white queen giving check to my king.

Great beads of perspiration now began to break out on my forehead. I had lost the game, and unless someone came to my rescue, I thought I should most assuredly be killed. I pretended to be studying the position, but my head was busy trying to concoct some scheme for my escape from this terrible dilemma. Seeing, however, that my opponent was getting excited, I moved my king to the only available square.

"Four—check!" he almost shouted, as he moved his queen one square back.

My position was now desperate. I could only prolong the game by interposing my rook, and as I reluctantly pushed the piece forward, I saw with horror my opponent pick up the pistol.

"Five—check!" and away went my rook.

My king had now only one move to be followed by a checkmate. Never shall I forget what my feelings were at that moment, and now that the time for action had come I felt powerless to move hand or foot. My head seemed to reel, and almost mechanically I made my last move.

"Six—mate!" he literally shrieked, and I saw him raise the revolver on a level with my head. Instinctively I closed my eyes, and the next instant there was a loud report, and I fell to the floor unconscious.

* * * * *

"How do you feel now? You had a narrow escape."

I opened my eyes and saw Dr. Chorley bending over me.

"Is that you, Doctor?" I murmured. "Am I really alive? I thought I was dead."

"You are not only alive, but uninjured," was the comforting reply; and then my host told me that at the very moment the madman raised the revolver to fire at me he had noiselessly entered the room, and was just in time to knock the would-be assassin's arm in an upward direction, so that the weapon went off without doing more harm than a little damage to the wall. I had simply been overcome and fallen down in a dead faint, owing to the mental strain I had undergone. My opponent had been immediately overpowered by the keepers, who were waiting in readiness.

It seems that, after bidding me good-night, the Doctor had had occasion to open the sliding-door arrangement, which when closed effectually shut off the house from the asylum. By some means my mad opponent had slipped through unobserved, and made his way to the study. His absence had been discovered, and the Doctor and his assistants had instituted a quiet and careful search, until at length, hearing a noise in the study, they made all haste there, and arrived just in time, as I believe, to save my life.

When I said good-bye to the Doctor next day I made up my mind that it would be a long time before I paid him another visit, and to this day I never sit down to a game of chess.

J. Powell Ellis.

Digitized by Google

A Miraculous Cure.

From the French of Jean Rameau.

Dr. Guichemerre was not in a cheerful mood; fortune had frowned upon him of late and the prospect was gloomy. For forty years he had been the village doctor at Saint-Leon. Although not very learned, he had cured as many patients as most village doctors; and if there were some whom he had not cured, it was not because he had not tried. He was a worthy, conscientious man, and the inhabitants of Saint-Leon had something to thank him for, taking one thing with another. Things had gone pretty smoothly with him, and his supreme ambition, which was to become Maire of the district, had seemed very near realisation, when fortune changed her demeanour towards him.

Guichemerre was the chemist as well as the doctor of Saint-Leon. But a few months prior to the opening of this story a second-rate chemist had come and set up a shop quite close to his; and in order to impress the people whom he hoped to secure as customers, he had made a fine display of drugs, patent medicines, hair-washes and numerous other articles.

The villagers began to patronise him and took some of Guichemerre's prescriptions to be made up; the chemist at once seized the opportunity to laugh at these prescriptions—they certainly were not up-to-date, although just as efficacious as many of the modern ones—and as a consequence of this ridicule Guichemerre lost most of his profitable trade in drugs.

That was bad enough, but worse followed. A young doctor, a friend of the rival chemist, settled in Saint-Leon, and was, of course, warmly recommended to the customers of the latter. That was the finishing stroke. Guichemerre found his connection gradually going, and finally we see him moodily warming himself by the fire and wondering what was to be done.

On this particular winter morning his sadness was several degrees deeper than it had been at any time previously; and for this reason:

Among the few of his customers who had remained faithful to their old doctor was the policeman. This official had a little boy of three, who was the playmate of Guichemerre's grandson, and had become such a favourite with the doctor that the old man had treated him almost like a grandchild. Well, this child had been ill for four days, and Guichemerre had not been summoned to attend Robert. Was even the policeman going to throw him over for this Doctor Preville, in spite of all the kindness which he had shown to him and his little boy?

For three days Guichemerre had not had a patient, and during all that time he had been constantly on the watch and the listen for the policeman. And this, the fourth, day promised to be a repetition of the preceding three.

Guichemerre arose from his chair and paced up and down, stopping occasionally to look out of the window to see if the policeman was coming. Suddenly he heard the thud of a horse's hoofs on the hard ground; he hurried to the window just in time to see Dr. Preville dash past on a prancing horse in the direction of the policeman's house.

So it was true! Little Robert was being attended by his successful rival! It was too hard to bear; the old man sat down heavily in his chair, covered his face with his hands and wept. It was good-bye to his dream of becoming Maire, good-bye to Saint Leon; he could no longer earn a living there, and must go away with his widowed daughter and her boy to some place where they could manage to live on what little money he had been able to save.

Four days afterwards Guichemerre returned to Saint-Leon from a journey he had undertaken. He had found a little cottage in a hamlet some miles distant, and he and his daughter were preparing to pack their things ready for removal. He had not been in the house an hour when there came a ring at the bell, and his daughter ushered in the policeman.

"Doctor," exclaimed the man, his eyes filling with tears, "we're very sorry, me and the missus. You've been very good to little Bob and we didn't ought to ha' gone to Dr. Preville. I don't know why we did go, I'm sure. But, Doctor, poor Bob's worse" (sob) "and Dr. Preville don't seem to do him no good—says as the little chap has got some dreadful complaint with a long name——we've never heard it before in these parts. Looks as if it's all up with him, poor chap" (sob) "though the doctor won't say anything. And Bob's been asking for you. Won't you come? Just to please him! Perhaps you can cure him!"

He tried to keep a stern face and make excuses; he knew nothing of the case, Dr. Preville would take it as a slight and so on; but the sorrowing father had an answer for all. Dr. Preville knew that he was going to call Dr. Guichemerre; he now felt that he had done wrong in not having the older doctor, who must know more than a young one; and much more to the same effect. So Guichemerre, who was secretly overjoyed, set off with the village constable for the sick-room.

There was no doubt that little Bob was very ill, that was quite clear; but what on earth was the matter with him? Guichemerre felt the boy's pulse, looked at his tongue, sounded him, tapped his thin body in different parts, but could arrive at no decision. He was dreadfully perplexed; there was no disease that he could perceive, yet the boy was evidently wasting away and would undoubtedly die if something were not done to rouse him and make him eat. His mother was crying and his father doing his best to keep back the tears; this naturally had a depressing effect upon the child, who had brightened up a little on the appearance of the doctor, but was now lying in a listless condition and occasionally whimpering. Something must be done to drive away those gloomy faces.

"We'll soon set him right!" said the old man cheerily. He uttered a few long medical terms so as to reassure the parents, and soon afterwards left the house to make up some medicine which would do the boy a lot of good.

"God forgive me!" murmured the doctor as he walked home. "I would give something to save him, but I don't know what ails him and I am afraid he will not recover!"

Digitized by Google

Actuated by a desire to save the boy for the parents' sake, Guichmerre, whose preparations for removal were suspended, did all he possibly could. He went two or three times each day, he changed the medicine, and he offered up earnest prayers on the child's behalf; but neither the one nor the other made any apparent difference; at the end of three days there was no improvement and the doctor was at his wits' end.

In the meantime some of his former patients came back to him. The fact that Dr. Preville no longer attended Bob and that Dr. Guichemerre was curing him—so the rumour ran—operated in favour of the latter. It was a terribly anxious time for Guichemerre. If the boy recovered, what happiness for the parents, what honour for himself! If he died—the doctor shuddered at the thought!

On the fourth day the doctor would not allow the parents to be in the room while he was examining the child. The fact was, he wished to hide from them that he could do nothing; he was afraid that they would see through his ruses, and would give way to grief when they learnt the truth, and thus, perhaps, spoil what little chance still remained of saving the boy. He must be alone, he said; he was going to treat the boy in a special manner—an invention of his own.

He shut the door and locked it. Then he sat down by the child's bedside and began to talk to him in an aimless way; he did not know what else to do. He had a box with him. A friend had sent a present—a toy—for his grandson, and he had been to the railway station to fetch it.

He thought he might as well open the box and see what it contained. It would serve to while away the fifteen minutes or so which he usually stayed in the room, and Bob might like to see the toy.

It was a splendid toy engine, going by clockwork, and, (according to a card in the box) at certain intervals it would give a shrill little whistle. It was so beautifully made, that Guichemerre held it up to admire it, and forgot his patient until reminded of his presence by an exclamation of delight. Turning to the boy, he saw that his face was animated with excitement, the first real sign of life since he had first attended the child. The doctor started as an idea flashed across his mind.

"Isn't it pretty?" he asked, holding it in front of the child, whose eyes were lighted up by a pleased expression. Little Bob looked at it and touched it.

"Does it go along by itself?" he inquired.

"Of course it does!" replied Guichemerre. "You just watch!"

There was a long bench-like table under the window. The doctor quickly cleared it and dragged it across the uncarpeted floor to the bedside. A few turns of the key, and the engine ran along the table, a piping whistle coming from it every few seconds. The boy shrieked with delight and tried to raise himself in the bed; Guichemerre propped him up and started the engine again.

This continued for about ten minutes, when the doctor felt that he must desist or the little patient would be over-excited. The difference in Bob's appearance was astounding, and when the worthy medico left the room (after having put everythin g straight, and wrapped up the toy) he was able to say, with perfect truth, in answer to the perplexed inquiries of the parents: "He's much better this morning."

He hurried home and made up a tonic; then he wrote a letter to the friend in Paris, who had sent the toy-engine.

When Guichemerre paid his second visit, towards evening, he found the policeman and his wife delighted and astonished at the change in the child's condition. He was so much brighter, and had begun to eat his food as though he wanted it. They were, however, anxious about one thing: Bob had been talking a great deal about something they could not understand. "It goes round." "It whistles," and several other things. They hoped his brain was not affected.

"He's all right in the head," returned the doctor. "Take no notice of what he says, only see that he takes the tonic. I will not see him again to-day, in case my new treatment excites him." He was glad that they had not guessed the truth.

The next day the same thing took place. The parents got no nearer the truth, probably because Bob, being more accustomed to the toy, did not say so much. The policeman and his wife did not worry themselves much about what little he did say; they saw that he was getting slowly better, and they had the doctor's assurance that Bob's head was all right.

The following day Guichemerre had a new toy, and afterwards he took them alternately. This went on for some days, Bob's condition improving daily. At last, one morning the doctor made such a noise amusing his patient—who was by that time almost convalescent—that the perplexed father and mother tried the door and, finding it unlocked, came hurrying into the room.

Guichemerre uttered an exclamation of fright, scrambled the engine into the box and, giving a confused reply to the question as to whether anything was wrong, simply bolted from the house.

For the first time he realised the ridiculous position he was in. Everybody in the place believed that he was treating Bob according to some new system of medicine—he had said "an invention of his own"—and he had simply been playing with a toy. He could never face his patients again; he would be the laughing stock of Saint-Leon.

But that evening he was set at rest by a visit from the schoolmaster.

"I am an occasional contributor to a scientific journal in Paris, Dr. Guichemerre," said the schoolmaster, "and I have come to ask you if you will be so good as to let me examine that wonderful invention which has enabled you to cure the policeman's son. I am convinced that a description of such an apparatus, accompanied by the details of your mode of treatment which I hope you will give me, will be read with the greatest interest."

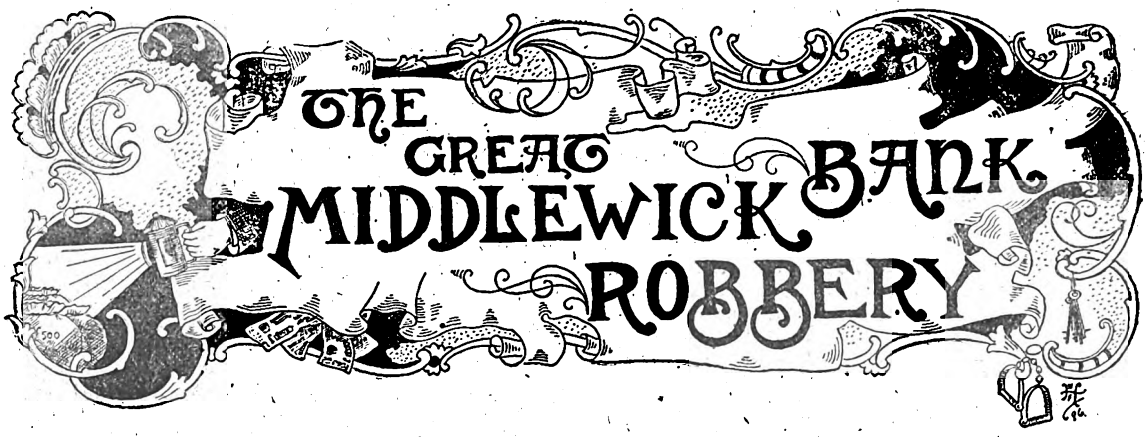
He bowed. Dr. Guichemerre had hard work to preserve his gravity. But he was relieved of all anxiety; it was clear that the parents of little Bob had not seen enough of the toy to distinguish it, and were of opinion that it was some surgical or similar apparatus.

"I am exceedingly sorry that I cannot oblige you," replied the doctor, "but I am unable, for important reasons, to make the invention public just now. I hope to explain all that is new in my treatment at a meeting of the College of Surgeons in due course."

* * * * *

I have just heard from Saint-Leon that Dr. Guichemerre, the Maire, will be the popular candidate at the next Parliamentary election, and that he will certainly be elected.

Digitized by Google



SUMMARY.

Mr. Bryant, Manager of Middlewick Bank.
Herbert Stewart, Cashier.
Frank Rutherford, Book-keeper.
Alfred Taylor, Detective.
John Warren, Old Watchman.
Jack Burton, New Watchman—a detective in disguise.
Miss Denton, Bryant's niece, and in love with Rutherford.

£20,000 is stolen from the Bank one night while John Warren is asleep. The only persons apparently aware of the key to the combination lock are Mr. Bryant and Mr. Stewart. Taylor is led to suspect Frank Rutherford of having obtained the key to the lock, and shadows him. It appears that an attempt is to be made on the strong room by three notorious burglars—Nash, King, and Birch—who know nothing about the previous robbery. Arrangements are made to capture them, and two constables—Bates and Morton—are to be placed in the building, while Taylor and Burton watch outside.

CHAPTER VII.

They have Come at Last.

The police superintendent of Middlewick not only knew when to hold his peace but made no mistake when he selected the police officers, Bates and Morton, to assist in capturing the criminals who had plotted to rob the town bank. The chosen men were big, strong, courageous fellows, possessing good judgment.

Precisely at nine o'clock they walked slowly past the institution in which they were to spend the night. Their acquaintances whom they met nodded in friendly recognition, but observed nothing in the manner of the couple to suggest that anything unusual was on their minds.

When in front of the building, Bates, who was walking on the outside edge of the pavement, said in a low tone, referring to Burton:

"He's there."

"I won't turn my head. Is he looking this way?"

"He doesn't seem to be, but we can't tell at this distance."

"It's time he raised his hat, if he's going to."

"He isn't; something's wrong."

Bates was right; the new watchman strolled past, as though in a brown study, and, turning the first corner, disappeared. It was evident he had discovered something suspicious. What it was none but he could say, but it must have been unmistakable, else he would have made the signal agreed upon.

Neither of the officers knew the suspected parties, though both had fixed upon a couple of strangers in the town as likely to be members of the trio.

Without any change of pace or manner, Bates and Morton strolled down the street and out towards the outskirts of the town.

"Here comes one of them," remarked Morton in an undertone.

He referred to a tall, well-dressed man, approaching on the same side of the street at a leisurely pace.

"Thank goodness here's another day nearly over," said Bates, "I shall be only too thankful to get home to-night. I'm dead beat. What do you mean to do to-night?"

"As soon as we're off duty I must stay at the station awhile, and then I, too, shall turn in for the night."

The brief conversation was apparently without point or interest, but really it was intended for the benefit of the approaching man, whom both believed to be one of the criminals. The words were so timed that the stranger must have heard them all, and doubtless gained the impression they meant him to gain.

As soon as they were beyond earshot Bates remarked:

"I bet you what you like that's Sam Birch."

"What makes you think that?"

"That new watchman said he's cross-eyed; didn't you notice it?"

"Yes."

"That settles it."

"You're right, I expect, for he's certainly a stranger to Middlewick. Pretty bright fellow that new watchman, Bates."

"Yes; he must be getting good wages to take old Warren's place."

"Wonder if he'll stop long," Morton added.

"Perhaps a week or so—that is, until this job is finished."

They laughed again. Evidently they had their own theories as to the personality of Jack Burton.

Their leisurely walk had brought the policemen out opposite to Mr. Bryant's private residence. The lower part was lighted up, and at the moment of passing Frank Rutherford entered the gate and walked briskly up the gravelled walk which led to the door.

"He's rather late calling," remarked Bates.

"He'll remedy that by taking longer," observed his companion, and no other reference was made to the matter. The words showed the general view in which the young couple were regarded in Middlewick.

Time was getting on, and the officers once more turned in the direction of the bank. Before coming in sight of it they encountered the cross-eyed man again, but this time he was on the opposite side of the street. They gave him no apparent attention, nor did he manifest any interest in them.

"He's been to see if everything's all right," hazarded Bates, a view in which his companion agreed.

"Hulloa!" whispered Morton, "what's the meaning of this?"

A few yards in front of them, walking in the same direction, was the watchman from whom they had taken their final directions. Where he came from neither could say. Though he did not look round, nor seem to be aware of the proximity of the policemen, the latter knew there was no mistake in the matter. He was certain they were behind him and his presence was no accident.

Digitized by Google

"He's been shadowing Birch," observed Bates.

"Risky business, for Birch might turn the tables."

"The new watchman knows a thing or two."

If Burton wished to be joined by the policeman he would slacken his pace. If he desired to increase the distance between him and themselves, he would walk faster. He did neither, therefore they knew he wished things to remain as they were. In the same aimless fashion the watchman strolled on, turning several times before he reached the street leading to the bank.

Bates glanced at his watch.

"Twelve minutes past nine," he said; "he'll reach the corner punctually at the quarter."

"Yes, and we'll get the signal this time for certain."

"I expect so, as Birch is out of the way, unless," added Bates, "my gentleman takes it into his head to have another look round."

Morton glanced over his shoulder. Nothing was to be seen of the burly criminal with whom they expected soon to have a struggle.

Bates was right. As the town clock was chiming the quarter past the hour, Jack Burton walked past the bank on the opposite side of the street. While the eyes of both the men were on him he raised his hand and wiped his forehead with his handkerchief.

It was the pre-arranged signal.

Without glancing either to the right or to the left, to make sure everything was right, Bates, in the most natural manner, turned slightly to the right, and, in the most natural manner, ascended the steps to the bank. His companion did the same, and was at his elbow when the former grasped the brass knob of the outer door. The next instant an impatient exclamation escaped him.

The door was locked.

For some cause old Warren had secured the fastening against any unexpected intrusion. Thus the first step in the drama was a slip. Nothing of the kind had been counted on, for the watchman had instructions to leave the door unlocked from half-past eight until ten o'clock. He had understood it, and his blunder was unintelligible.

The situation was trying in the extreme. To stand there rattling the door was sure to attract the attention of passers-by and disarrange the programme, while to go away would be every inch as bad, since the same difficulty would still confront them.

"What's to be done?" asked the perplexed Bates, his hand still on the knob.

"I'm blessed if I know, unless——"

"Kick at the door till you wake him! He's in there asleep!"

The words were uttered by some one passing the building. The person did not look at them while making the suggestion, but the men recognised him at a glance as Burton.

Bates followed instruction. He rattled the door harder than ever, and, raising his heavy boot, delivered a kick that threatened to carry the structure off its hinges.

Immediate results followed. The key turned in the lock, and the door opened and the scared face of the old watchman peered out at them.

"Bless me! what's the matter, officers?" he asked in a shaking voice.

The policemen stepped quickly inside, and locked the door behind them.

"You idiot!" said Morton angrily; "what do you mean by having that door locked?"

"Why, gentlemen, them's my instructions," was the wondering reply, as the old man stood before them, plainly revealed in the dim light of the several gas jets that were kept burning all night.

"Weren't you told to leave it unlocked until we came?"

The watchman scratched his head meditatively.

"Bless me, so I was; but really it slipped my mind. I hope you will excuse me, gentlemen."

"Why didn't you open the door before? We've been trying to get in for the last five minutes or more."

"I heard you, gentlemen, but you see my rheumatiz makes me move so slow that——"

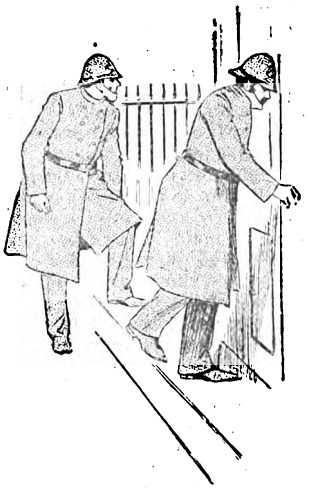
"Oh! be quiet; go and finish your sleep if you want to, but don't bother us any more."

The watchman apparently thought it best to obey the instructions of the officer of the law, especially as they were given in so decided a tone. He walked to the settee where he had been reclining and sat down with folded arms, his gaze following the figures of the two policemen. He wondered what they intended to do. They had not offered any explanation, nor did he dare ask for any, but he determined to find out.

He sat for several minutes bolt upright. That position, however, soon became tiresome, and he assumed an easier one. By-and-bye, he shifted again, and then—the natural consequences followed—he sank into a deep sleep.

Meanwhile the two policemen lost no time. Although the visitors were not expected for several hours, the couple arranged matters as though they were liable to drop in at any moment, which indeed may be said to have been the fact.

The vault was at the back of the large business-room of the building, being let into the solid wall, so that when the door was closed a comparatively even surface was presented. It was secured by the new combination, known only to the manager and cashier.



He rattled the door harder than ever.

The only other room used by the institution was reached, as has already been explained, by passing along the side of the business portion still further to the rear. All the blinds were down, so that no one could overlook the building at night from the street.

Bates and Morton spent several minutes familiarising themselves with the building. With the more public portion of the bank they were comparatively familiar, but the manager's room was, of course, new ground to them.

"Here is the place to wait," remarked Bates, as they reached this apartment, and turning the manager's chair round from the desk he proceeded to make himself as comfortable as possible.

His companion likewise assumed an easy posture near him, for they had nothing to do now but await the arrival of their visitors. That they would certainly present themselves before morning neither felt the least doubt.

Excepting the large clock fastened against the wall, the two men were quite alone, but the very ticking which at first had given them such a sense of companionship at last became a source of irritation. It seemed as though its hands would never move, and they could easily have cheated themselves into believing it had suspended business for the evening, had it not been for the monotonous sound it gave forth.

Outside the footsteps of the passers-by echoed loudly as they passed the corner, the numbers gradually growing fewer as the night progressed.

Bates, half in earnest, insisted now and then that he recognised certain persons by the peculiarity in the noise made by their feet.

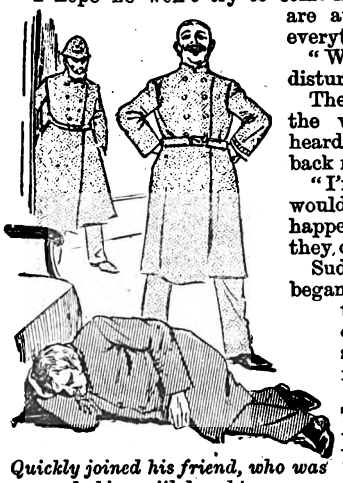
Digitized by Google

"That's the guv'nor," he suddenly whispered; "I'm certain I've not made a mistake about him!"

The doubting Morton softly rose and peered round the edge of the curtain.

"You're right," he said, coming back to his seat; "he's interested in this affair."

"I hope he won't try to come inside to see whether we are awake. It might spoil everything."



Quickly joined his friend, who was shaking with laughter.

"Worse than that, it would disturb Warren."

The regular breathing of the watchman was plainly heard by the couple in the back room.

"I'm glad he's asleep; he would kick up a row if he happened to be awake when they came."

Suddenly the town clock began striking eleven. Morton looked up at the face of the office clock, and saw that it was exactly right.

"I hoped it was later. This is tiresome. I wish those fellows would keep better hours."

The policeman rose, yawned, stretched his massive limbs, and then sat down again.

"They'll make up for lost time when they do arrive," was the comment of his comrade.

"I shouldn't be at all surprised if they pay their visit a little earlier than the new watchman anticipates. This is a sleepy town, and eleven o'clock here counts the same as a couple of hours later in London, or up North."

"Yes, and they'll need a considerable time to finish the work. Not knowing the combination, they must use powder or dynamite."

"Not necessarily, I think. The safe you must remember is an old-fashioned one, and they'll probably bore through the outer door as though it were made of wood, for such adepts as they must be from what Warren told us are sure to be up to every dodge, and won't make any mistake."

"Except in not counting on our being here."

Both started from their chairs and stared questionably at each other. At that moment a heavy fall was heard in the outer room.

"H'sh!" whispered Bates, rising softly and gently opening the door. He went out on tiptoe, while Morton stationed himself by the partly-opened inner door so as to be ready to go to his companion's assistance the instant he was needed.

"Come here, Morton," Bates called in an undertone.

The other quickly joined his friend, who was shaking with laughter.

Warren's sleep could not have been dreamless, for he had rolled from the settee to the floor, where he mutteringly adjusted himself and resumed his slumber.

"We may as well let him lie where he is," said Bates, "though I meant at first to lift him back again."

"You might stand him on his head and he would continue to sleep. Leave him alone—H'sh!"

Someone had paused outside the building, as if about to enter. The policemen quietly hastened back to their former positions, on the alert for their visitors.

But it was a false alarm. The halt by the one outside meant nothing. He resumed his walk and passed on.

It was now half-past eleven, and the crisis could not be far off. Bates believed the criminals would not wait many minutes longer, for the streets were as deserted as they were likely to be for a full hour or more. Morton was inclined to think the superintendent was poking about, and had made a move to learn whether the officers were prepared; but Bates thought different. Such a course on his part would not be in keeping with his usual good sense.

But the long minute hand of the clock slowly climbed round the face until it reached the last quarter, where it seemed to stop. Then it struggled free and worked slowly upwards. But still the visitors came not.

Someone walked rapidly past the window, and all again became silent outside. The voice of a person calling to another, probably across the street, was heard, followed by the reply of the second one. The watchers might well have imagined they were in some deserted residence, miles out in the country, beyond the reach of any friendly or unfriendly callers.

The ticking of the clock grew louder than before. The men had ceased conversing and were listening. All at once the town clock began booming forth the hour of midnight, each stroke ringing out loud and clear on the still air. At the same moment a slight noise was heard in the outer room. Between the strokes it was so distinct that the watchers recognised its meaning.

Someone was working at the lock of the door.

The noise continued after the booming of the clock had ceased. It was so well defined that no mistake could be made as to its meaning.

"It's the burglars," whispered Morton; "they have come at last."

He spoke the truth.

CHAPTER VIII.

Two Shadowy Figures Passed up the Steps.

Strange as it may seem, both the detective and the watchman were more afraid of several other persons than of the men who they were certain had planned to rob the Middlewick Bank that evening. Not afraid in the usual sense of the term, but the two dreaded that their own friends, through over zeal, would disarrange the plans formed with so much care.

The one who caused the most misgiving was the bank manager, Mr. Bryant. He had visited the bank the previous evening at an unseasonable hour, and was liable to repeat the act. If he did so before the appearance of the criminals, they would keep out of the way and probably give up the job. If he called while they were at their work, he ran the risk of being murdered. How to prevent his repeating his visit was a delicate and difficult question.

"You must look out for him during the first half of the night, so that if he appears you can turn him back."

"On what pretext?" asked Taylor.

"On what pretext?" asked Taylor.

"He expressed himself satisfied last night with his inspection. You can manage to meet him while he is yet a good distance from the building, and say that if his new watchman finds himself under suspicion of incompetence after having received assurance to the contrary, he will be offended and leave his employ."

"Perhaps he will not care if he does."

"He will not want me to go in the night time, as you can assure him I will do if interfered with by him again."

Digitized by Google

"Suppose he takes a walk abroad and happens to meet you?"

"I will take good care that he doesn't do that, if you will only keep him away from the bank."

"What will he think when he learns that Warren is back at his old place?"

"He can't learn it before to-morrow, and then it will be easy to explain matters to him."

The other individuals who caused misgiving to Taylor and Burton were the police Superintendent and his policemen.

Respecting the latter, the question was as to their fitness to face the burglars; but, as that question must arise regarding whoever took their places, it caused less concern than the fear about the manager.

The Superintendent was certain to remain on the alert all night. He had informed the couple of his intention in that respect. Indeed, it would have been strange considering his position, if he had gone home to sleep knowing the town was to be racked by such an unprecedented earthquake within a few hours.

Whether he knew it or not the policeman spoke truly when he laughingly said he recognised the Superintendent's footsteps among those of the passers-by. It was not until he had passed the building for the third time that Burton met him at a safe distance and begged him to refrain, since, if he did not, the whole scheme would fall through. Superintendent Dixon was sensible enough to accept the protest, and did as requested.

It now began to look as if matters would be carried out according to programme. Mr. Bryant, as Burton believed, was under the eye of the detective, who would keep him at a distance. As it was still early, the new watchman had considerable leisure on his hands, so he concluded to visit the vicinity of Mr. Bryant's residence. The precise point where Taylor had agreed to keep his beat until half-past eleven had been settled, so that Burton knew where to look for him.

The locality was so retired that the friends could meet and compare notes without attracting attention. The watchman was especially desirous of seeing Taylor, as, since they had parted company, he had made a discovery with which the detective should be made acquainted at the earliest possible moment.

This was nothing less than the presence of a fourth member of the law-breakers, in the person of Bobby Roberts, who Burton supposed doing time in Portland to which he had been sentenced several years before. But here he was in Middlewick, and had therefore served out his imprisonment, and had been pardoned, or made his escape from gaol.

But a most unpleasant surprise awaited Burton at the lonely corner where the detective ought to have been idling his time. Neither he, nor anyone else was in sight, and though the watchman went over the entire beat he met only three strangers.

"This is extraordinary," he thought, with a thrill of misgiving.

It struck him as probable that his friend, in order to make sure the Manager did not escape him, had called at his house. It would never have done for Burton to show himself at "Glenmora" at an hour when duty required him to be at the bank. There was nothing, however, to prevent a reconnaissance by him.

Accordingly, he strolled past the handsome residence, scrutinising it from the opposite side of the street. It was wrapped in darkness; not a glimmer came from any portion. The owner was asleep, and Alfred Taylor was somewhere else.

Trying not to believe anything was amiss until he received proof of it, Burton now went back over the ground where his friend should have been. Not a glimpse of him was to be seen.

"It maybe he has made the same discovery as I and is looking for me," was the next thought of the watchman. "He knows where to find me."

All in vain. The detective was gone for the time, and the new watchman was at loss to understand it.

Burton's beat was a little way down the street at the opposite side of the corner of which the bank stood. No position could be more favourable, for by the aid of the moonlight and the street lamps, he not only had the front of the bank under his eye but could detect the approach of anyone, no matter from what direction he came.

He passed near the doorway where Burton stood.

A convenient doorway gave him all the shelter he needed, and the distance was so short that he could reach the bank within a few seconds after being summoned.

His first purpose was to locate Mr. Sam Birch, whom he was confident was to stand guard outside. If both he and Burton should happen to take the same vantage ground, an awkward complication was likely to follow; but he would not be likely to do that, for it would have been contrary to custom. He needed to be much nearer the bank, to give warning of the approach of danger and afford his confederates time to escape, or at least to cease their operations until the peril of discovery passed.

The town clock had just finished striking eleven when a figure came in sight which the watchman recognised as Sam Birch. He passed so near the doorway where Burton stood in the shadow that discovery seemed certain. Had it taken place it must have exerted a marked influence over what followed.

Had the criminal done his whole duty, he assuredly must have observed that shadowy form which once was within a few feet of him; but as he passed by, at a deliberate pace, his gaze remained fixed on the corner where stood the building to be plundered.

If any danger threatened, he expected it much nearer to the bank than was the watchman. So he went on, and that peril was over.

Never pausing to look back, Birch walked on, finally disappearing round the corner.

"He has found everything favourable," was the conclusion of the watchman, who was so well convinced that the burglary would not be attempted before midnight that he did not hesitate to leave his post.

Despite his certainty that a stirring encounter was imminent, Jack Burton was more disturbed at that moment because of the unaccountable absence of his friend Taylor than he was by the presence of the criminal quartette. Somehow he could not help associating the disappearance of the detective with the discovery of Roberts, the fourth member of the company.

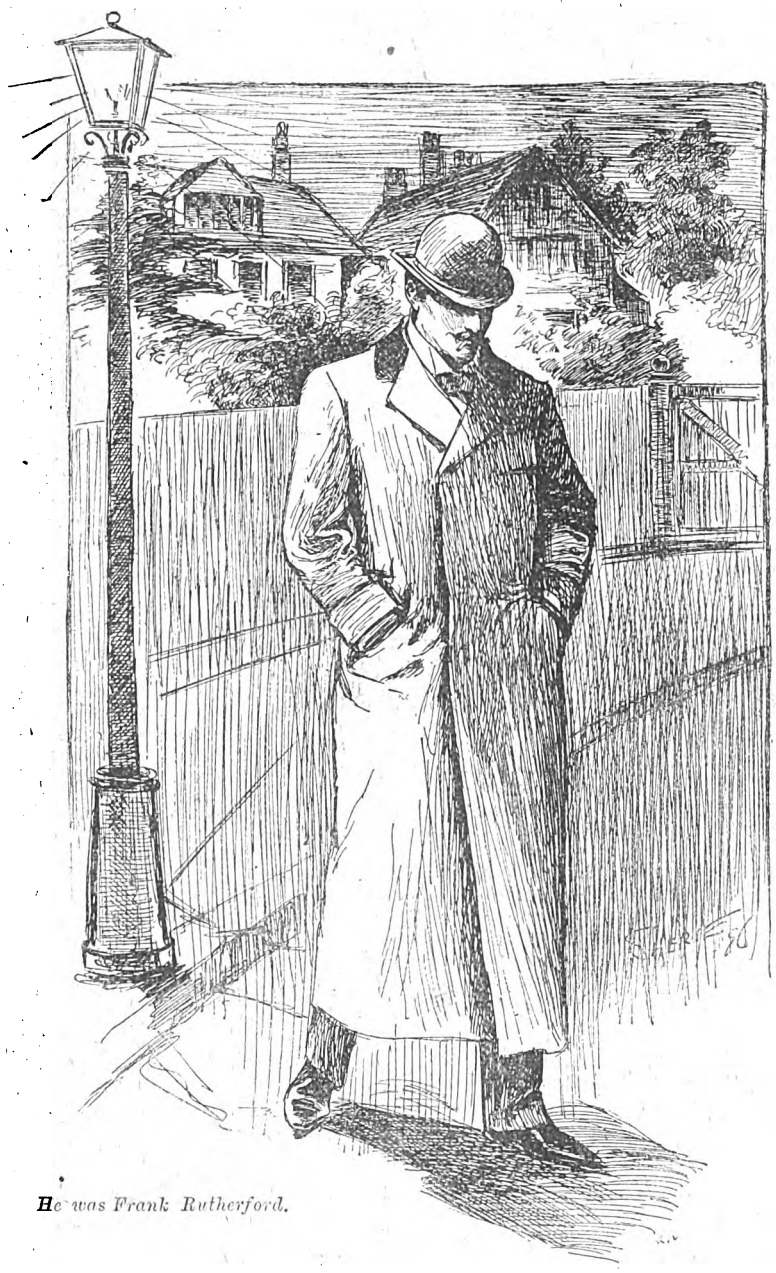
Moving out, therefore, from his hiding-place, the watchman walked quickly to the corner where Taylor had agreed to look out for Mr. Bryant. He was to remain there until half-past eleven, before it would be considered safe to leave the manager to himself.

It would be hard to picture the increased misgiving of the watchman when he learnt that his friend was still absent. Unquestionably he had not been at his post that evening.

"The pitcher can go to the well once too often," was Burton's melancholy conclusion; "but I hope it won't prove so in this case. One man more or less doesn't make much difference in the world, but Alf is too good a fellow to be spared. Where the deuce can he and Roberts be?"

Upon his return to his own station, Burton went over the

Digitized by Google



He was Frank Rutherford.

same ground as before, so that he passed Mr. Bryant's residence. It was still shrouded in darkness, as it had been for the last two hours.

The watchman had not been given as favourable an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the little town of Middlewick as had the detective. When, therefore, he observed a light shining from the upper room of a small building standing a little way back from the street he had no suspicion to whom it belonged.

The fact was noticeable because it was the only house in the immediate neighbourhood which showed that anyone was astir within. To one of Burton's observant nature the trifling fact had a meaning at this time which he would have liked to determine.

"Someone may be ill," he reflected, "but I believe that gas turned up to the highest point has something to do with the Middlewick Bank burglary or with the absence of Alfred Taylor."

Time was precious but he could not forbear lingering and watching for a few minutes.

The little street was so retired that the glare of the lamp and the light of the moon failed to show any person stirring; save for the presence of the watchman, the street was deserted.

But the conditions changed the next minute. Someone came round the corner from the direction of Mr. Bryant's home, walking quickly. The watchman resumed his progress, but so slowly that he was sure of being overtaken before going more than a few rods beyond the cottage in which the light was burning.

His hearing enabled him to locate the other person without looking round. The better to conceal his identity, Burton assumed a limp and raised one shoulder, taking care to do so before the other had a chance of noting the change.

Suddenly the sound of the footfalls on the pavement stopped. A backward glance instantly explained the cause. The man had left the flagstones, and was crossing the street diagonally. The soft earth failed to give back any sound.

He was the occupant of the house where the light was burning, and was making haste to reach his home.

The moonlight, and the glow of the lamp beneath which he passed, revealed the young man to the watchman. He was Frank Rutherford, the book-keeper of the Middlewick Bank.

"He doesn't keep good hours," was the natural thought of Burton; "but though it looks as if he was in the affair of the other night, I don't believe he's in this."

Rutherford hurriedly entered the house, ascended the stairs, and then, as his mother had done the preceding night, raised the curtain and looked out. He, too, seemed to be expecting someone who came not; but, in his case, he was looking for one whom he did not wish to see, while she had yearned for him.

The light fell so fully upon him that his face, shoulders, and the upper part of his body were clearly revealed. The watchman had made himself acquainted with the appearance of all the employés of the bank, so that the first glance identified the book-keeper.

"I don't wonder Bryant's niece is infatuated with him; he's handsome enough to turn the head of any girl."

Rutherford waited but a few minutes, little dreaming that anyone was observing him from the street below. Then down went the curtain, and in a brief while the light was turned out.

Burton glanced at his watch.

"Ten minutes to twelve!" he exclaimed. "I have no business here, but if I knew of any way to help poor Alf I would let the bank go, if the gang carried off the building itself."

There was no risk in walking quickly, and he hurried on until he reached the position he had vacated nearly half-an-hour before.

The most careful scrutiny of his surroundings failed to show anything out of the usual course. But the change came quickly.

Digitized by Google

The people in the street were so few that it was easy to distinguish each as he came in sight. The figure of a tall man strolled past the bank, just as it had done earlier in the evening.

Sam Birch was taking his last survey, preparatory to signalling to his companions that the coast was clear.

To the astonishment of the watchman, the man, instead of turning to one side, as he had done before, came directly towards him.

"Confound it!" muttered Burton; "this means detection, without fail."

He would have slipped away had the chance been given, but to emerge from his shelter and hurry off would be the worst possible move he could have made. The suspicious criminal would know like a flash what it meant. All that Burton could do was to stay where he was and meet the crisis, as he had met many others.

The act of Birch puzzled the watchman, for it was contrary to the rules of procedure under such circumstances. His place was near the bank, where he could give timely notice to his confederates. While, as has already been shown, Burton's situation afforded this view, yet there was one direction from which he could not see a party approaching until he arrived within a few paces of the steps.

The professional detective and burglar take no chances that can be avoided by shrewdness and vigilance.

But, at the culmination of Burton's chagrin and exasperation, the wished-for change took place. Sam Birch was still several feet away when, like Frank Rutherford, he turned and crossed the street diagonally. Why this crossing of the street was made it would be difficult to explain, except upon the theory that the criminal detected something on the other side which he concluded to investigate.

The fact that he moved over a small space several times, where his actions were only dimly visible to the man shrinking in the shadows, favoured this explanation. He probably observed a likeness among the shadows which suggested a person, and Birch speedily discovered his error.

He gave a low, guarded whistle.

His next movement was more startling than any yet made.

Without the least warning, he came across the street, again making for the spot where Burton was striving to keep out of sight. Strange as it seemed to the watchman, his presence was still undiscovered. But the the miscreant was not expecting him, and therefore was not looking out for Burton.

Upon reaching the outer edge of the pavement, Birch turned on his heel and stood with his back to the watchman. Then he gave a low, guarded whistle.

At that moment the clock in the town hall began sounding the hour of midnight. The watchful Burton saw two shadowy figures pass up the steps of the bank and apply the key which they had ready. The door quickly opened, and they passed inside.

(To be continued.)

GRAND OFFER TO THE READERS OF SHORT STORIES.

WE offer for a period extending from the time this number is published until April 4th next a Beautiful Three-quarter Life-size India Ink and Crayon Portrait to anyone who will bring or send us only 6s. and one coupon from Short Stories, one coupon from Pearson's Weekly, and one from The Story Teller. These are the £100 coupons to be found on the cover in each paper. (The 2nd page in the case of S. S.)

These portraits are of the finest artistic merit. They are absolutely permanent, being finished by the Air Brush, with Indelible India Ink, making them more permanent than any of the old styles of portraits, and they will last a lifetime.

SHALL WE MAKE YOURS?

You will get an unheard-of bargain by availing yourself of this grand offer, and we are glad to be able to give it to you. We can copy from any photos, large or small, tin-types, or any kind of glass picture. In sending in the latter case care should be taken that they are properly packed. All pictures are copied bust style—head and shoulders only.

Again we make this Offer,
PROBABLY FOR THE LAST TIME.

DO NOT NEGLECT IT!
IT IS THE CHANCE OF A LIFETIME.

These Pictures if ordered through Artists would cost you from 3 to 5 Guineas.

We made this same offer some months ago, and then 7,000 of our readers sent us photos to be enlarged. These enlargements have all been executed, and everybody appears to have been satisfied.

WHEN SENDING AN ORDER, inclose the picture you want copied in an envelope, and place your name and address on the back of the picture, and send the 6s. and the three coupons to these offices and you will receive the portrait copied for you as soon as possible. Have no fear of losing your small picture. It will be returned in as good order as received.

An Example of the Portrait we offer to give you can be seen at the offices of Pearson's Weekly & Short Stories.

DON'T PUT OFF SENDING. Obtain your coupons at once, and send in to us at once.
Address—PORTRAITS, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ON HER TWENTY-FIRST BIRTHDAY.

THEY were sitting in the parlour of Hope's home, and for about the twentieth time he had asked her to be his wife, and had been answered "No." Proposing had become a sort of habit with Fred, so instead of running away after being rejected, he stopped to talk the matter over. Hope's attempts at consolation were now part of the regular programme.

"I am awfully sorry, Fred," she said, "but you must not be unreasonable. I feel it would be sinful for me to give up the career that lies before me. I have looked forward to the day on which I shall be of age, and mean to exercise every prerogative it brings to me." (Fred groaned.) "But I don't want this unfortunate love of yours to make us any the less friends, for I really like you very much, and we have been chums so long."

She laid her hand on his shoulder and looked down at him kindly. The touch thrilled him, and he caught her hand tenderly.

"Why do you feel that you should have a career? Why not leave that sort of thing to women who have a grievance against the world?"

"I would rather do good work myself. But why am I arguing with you? You talk just like mamma about these things."

"Do you think that your mother's life has been thrown away?"

"Our cases are altogether different. She belongs to another phase of social development. The more advanced and emancipated woman, however, does not wish to be loved; she wishes to be appreciated."

"But I appreciate you."

"Nonsense. I have never done anything to be appreciated. Some day, perhaps, you will have a chance to appreciate me."

"Will you be my wife then?"

"Dear me," she said petulantly, "I object to being proposed to twice in the same evening."

"Well, then, what are you going to do? Going to join the Woman's Suffragists?"

"No. I believe in preserving one's individuality, and the field is so wide I know I can work without trespassing on the ground of any other woman. I have mapped out my lifework. If you will call to-morrow evening, I'll tell you. I shall be a free agent then, and privileged to speak and act for myself, for I shall be twenty-one years old."

"I would rather be coming to dance at a birthday party."

"You are unkind," she said; "but I must expect unkindness as I go on with my work," and a look of firmness settled on her face. It had taken her some time to decide whether or not a slight frown was necessary to a look of firmness, but she had come to the conclusion finally, that that virtue is best expressed by closely drawn lips and a placid brow. "I refused to let them give me one, for I did not wish to begin the first day of my new and broader life with frivolity. Instead, I may perhaps get some letters from a number of earnest women to whom I sent a little circular to-day outlining the work I propose to take up."

As Fred left the house, Hope's mother said: "I do believe that he proposed again to-night, and Hope rejected him."

"Isn't that the second time you have made that observation this week?" asked her husband.

"Well, it is a shame! He is such a splendid fellow."

"Tut! Tut! The child is just a little bit flighty now, and her talk of having a 'career' is amusing rather than serious. What great work does she intend doing?"

"She will not tell me, and I am afraid she may get into trouble."

"Never fear. I enjoy seeing her assert her rights, and I prophesy that a month of freedom from the parental potestas will satisfy her and make her the meekest girl in London. She has too much of her mother's goodness of heart to keep up her folly long."

The look he got in response spoke volumes—volumes of a kind not found in the libraries of emancipated women.

Hope rose early the next morning She felt that she was entering upon a new era, and her heart bounded at the thought of all that being of age must mean. Her parents had always been very kind, but they had kept her from taking part in any of the women's movements with which the city was seething—from making a fool of herself they said—but now she was of age, and could gently but firmly insist on getting the few rights that law and custom allow to women.

At breakfast Hope bore her father's teasing with a stately equanimity that amused him immensely. No, she would not tell them what her work was to be; but she probably would be able to do so in the evening, after getting some letters that she expected.

There was the suggestion of a sob in her mother's voice as she said:

"My little girl never had a secret from me before."

"Now don't look at it in that way, dear," said her father. "Let Hope choose her own course, and if she gets into trouble she can blame no one but herself."

Digitized by Google

Hope went to her room, and, opening her dainty escritoire, tried to get her ideas into form on cream-laid paper.

Presently a maid brought up several cards. Hope read a couple:

MR. I. ROAST PERCOLLUM.
MR. S. JEROME SCORCH.

"Why," she exclaimed, "I don't know any of these people. What do they want? Where is Mamma?"

"They said it was you they wanted to see."

Then Hope remembered she was of age and decided to see them.

When she entered the drawing-room she found a group of young men looking at a painting on the wall.

"Magnificent," one of them was saying. "Notice the chiaroscuro. What an atmosphere! What——"

Her entry was noticed, and as the speaker turned to her she said:

"You wished to see me?"

The young men looked at the girl blankly.

"It is Miss Hope Ferd we wish to see," said the one who had been acting as art critic.

"That is my name."

"Perhaps there is a mistake," he said helplessly. "Haven't you a maiden aunt of the same name?"

"No."

He could hardly believe it possible. He expected to meet a severe old maid and this vision of girlish beauty staggered him, but he proceeded:

"I am Mr. Percollum of the Evening Eclipse, and my friends here——"

"Reporters!" gasped Hope, as she dropped into a convenient chair.

"Yes. We were calling on a prominent Woman's Suffragist this morning, and she told us she had received a letter from Miss Hope Ferd, who is organising a 'Society for the Purification of the Press.'"

"But," exclaimed Hope, "I didn't intend it to get into the papers."

"Yet a reform of that magnitude and character could hardly be achieved without the papers hearing of it sooner or later," he said, as he stole a sidelong look at Mr. Scorch of the Evening Planet.

Scorch fluttered his left eyelid encouragingly.

"That's so," said Hope. "I hadn't thought of that."

"We feel sure the public will be interested to know how you propose to accomplish this much-needed reform."

"Oh, horrors! I don't want to be interviewed."

"Many members of the press," interposed Scorch in terms as smooth as oil on the troubled waters, "will undoubtedly sympathise with you."

"Do you think so?"

"I am sure of it. The way the papers are now conducted is a source of sincere regret to many of us."

She looked at the young men a little dubiously, but they were such good-natured, respectable-looking fellows, she felt reassured.

"May I inquire what made you decide to undertake this work?"

"Well, to tell the truth," she said, "papa always cut out of the papers all that he thought unfit for a young lady to read, and I made up my mind that if so much was unfit, a reform was needed. Why, some days all he left for me was the editorial page."

"That was a hardship, indeed," said Percollum with a look of concern; "I don't wonder that you felt it necessary to do something. What is your plan of campaign? Will you lecture before the Press Club?"

"Dear me! That will not be necessary, will it?"

"Not absolutely necessary; but it is the usual way of proceeding in such matters."

"Oh, I couldn't think of that!"

"Well, will you direct your attention towards reforming the managing editors or the reporters? I think a great deal might be accomplished by individual work among the reporters."

"O, I don't know yet what I shall do. My plans are not fully matured."

Finding that no definite information could be got, Percollum and Scorch began to offer suggestions, to which she listened eagerly. When the interview was ended she felt very much encouraged, and was sure that reporters were a much maligned class.

Mrs. Ferd was horrified on hearing who her daughter's callers were, for she is one of those old-fashioned women who think a woman's name should never appear in the papers except at her birth, marriage and death. But Hope soothed her fears and assured her nothing would appear in the papers about it. And the reporters were really such nice young men, there could be no harm in having a chat with them.

Nothing further happened until about five o'clock, when there was a furious ring at the door-bell. A moment later Mr. Ferd was heard roaring:

"Where is that little idiot? Hope! Hope! Where are you? Hope!"

"What is the matter, papa?" she said in alarm, as she ran to him.

"Oh, that I should be the father of such an idiot! What did you mean by talking yards of drivelling lunacy to reporters?"

"Why, they haven't put anything in the papers, have they?"

"Haven't, eh? Look here! Columns of it! You have made us the laughing stock of the town."

"And they seemed such nice young men!" she murmured, sobbing.

"Reporters nice! Aw!" and flinging the bundle of evening papers to the floor, he rushed away to commune with his brandy bottle.

Picking up the papers, Hope fled to her room. The first she looked into contained this attractive heading to a two-column article:

HOPE IN THEIR HEARTS.

PRETTY MISS FERD ORGANISES A REFORM.

DEATH TO SENSATIONALISM.

THE HYDRA-HEADED PRESS TO BE GIVEN A HAIR-CUT AND SHAMPOO.

That was enough. She threw herself on the bed and cried as if her heart was broken. She wanted to die. When her mother came up a little later and put her arms about her, Hope hid her face in her bosom and they cried together. When the culprit grew quieter, Mrs. Ferd went away feeling almost happy. The bond that bound her daughter to her was stronger than ever. She was now prepared to act as Hope's champion, and protect her from the unrighteous indignation of her father.

Finally Hope's tears were exhausted, and she began to read what the papers said about her. As she read of paragraph after paragraph of ridicule and merciless sarcasm, her shame was only equalled by her rage.

Digitized by Google

She did not go down to dinner that evening, but when Fred's card was brought to her she hurried to the drawing-room. She did her best to look like an injured queen, yet when she saw that he was not going to laugh at her she felt a longing to hide her face on his shoulder and cry.

"You have often said that you love me," she began.

"You do not doubt that I meant it, do you?"

"Prove that you mean it by thrashing those reporters!"

"Thrashing them!"

"Yes, thrashing them!" and her rage returned. "I don't want to purify the press now! I want to annihilate it!"

"What are their names?"

"Here are their cards," and she sorted them from those on the card tray.

He took them in his hand and then hesitated. "But, what right have I to thrash them?"

"Have you not protested that you love me?"

"And you have always objected."

"I don't object now!" she murmured, half audibly.

A moment later she was sobbing on his shoulder.

The castigation of Percollum and Scorch was postponed for a couple of hours, during which the parental blessing was secured, and it was decided that Hope's twenty-first birthday should be remembered by her engagement rather than her folly. Fred finally remembered his commission, and said he must go and attend to it.

"No, no!" she cried. "You must not go and get into danger on account of my foolishness."

"Danger, nothing. You forget," he said expanding his chest, "that I was a half-back in our college football team! Danger? Nonsense!"

He looked so fine and manly and insisted so strongly that those reporters really deserved to have something done to them, she finally consented.

When he reached the street, after a peculiarly lingering farewell, he took the reporters' cards from his pocket and examined them carefully under a street lamp.

"Thrash them!" he chuckled. "Well, I guess not."

Two of the offenders were old college chums, so he sent a message to Percollum asking him to get together the fellows who were on the "Purification of the Press" assignment and join him at a Strand café. An hour later they met and set their faces resolutely towards the bar.

"Do you know her?" asked Percollum, as they fell in line.

"Sh-h-h-h! Name your poison."

Shortly after midnight the following note was posted to Hope:

My Darling.—Two of those reporters already used up. Several others badly disabled. May be exhausted myself, but hope to be sufficiently recovered by the afternoon to take you out for a drive.—Your devoted, Fred.

P. McArthur.

A STRANGE RESCUE.

Gun in hand I made my way through the tangled forest, eagerly searching for some specimens of a rare bird which I required to complete the collection I had formed of the feathered tribe since my arrival in Natal.

I had advanced a distance of a hundred or a hundred and twenty yards when I came upon a patch of "open," through which a narrow track led down to the edge of a small stream, which rippled musically over its pebbly bed. As I emerged from the thick undergrowth, an agonised moan reached my ear, and at the same instant my eye fell upon a magnificent full-grown male leopard, beautifully marked, which lay doubled up in the track, in an attitude unmistakably suggestive of acute pain.

The instinct of the sportsman instantly prompted me to raise my gun to my shoulder—to lower it again, however, the next instant. It was loaded with small shot only—too small, indeed, to penetrate the hide of the splendid creature before me; and it seemed, too, a cowardly act to take advantage of him in his helpless and suffering condition.

His eyes looked glazed and dim; his tongue, white furred and dry, hung out of his mouth, and his sides heaved painfully at every inspiration.

As I emerged from the bush, he lifted up his head and regarded me with an expression as distinctly appealing as anything I have ever yet seen, while, slightly raising his forepaw, he uttered another groan. This action attracted my attention, as I at once observed that the foot was frightfully swollen.

I can scarcely even now account for the impulse which caused me to walk quietly up to the suffering animal. It was evident the moment I approached him that part of his sufferings proceeded from thirst, aggravated intensely, no doubt, by the sight of the water which he had striven unavailingly to reach. Seeing this, I went down to the brook, and filled my pith helmet with the cool, sparkling liquid, and offered it him.

He lapped it greedily, and seemed so plainly to ask for more that I at once fetched it, and this, too, disappeared.

He now seemed much better and attempted to rise, but sank upon the ground again with a horrid howl, the moment his swollen foot touched the earth.

I allowed him to remain undisturbed for a minute or two, and then gently took his paw in my hand, to examine it: my patient, as I may now call him, offering me no resistance beyond a faint whine. I saw at once that the poor brute was suffering from a very large and painful gathering in the ball of the foot, and that it would afford him immediate relief to have it opened.

Digitized by Google

But how would he be inclined to behave under the operation? I asked myself. The chances were that the pain would arouse him to a pitch of ungovernable fury, in which case I should stand but a poor chance in a struggle with him.

While I was hesitating as to whether I should run the risk or not, he again looked up into my face with such a pitiful beseeching expression that it was simply irresistible.

I drew out my knife—which I always kept as keen as a razor—and, without further ado, drove the point into the skin, making at the same moment, by a quick jerk of the hand, an incision about three inches long.

The splendid fellow never so much as winced. Beyond a deep moan, he showed no sign of having felt the slightest pain; and I shall always feel fully convinced that he knew I was doing him a service.

Matter and blood flowed copiously from the opening I had made in the skin, and in the course of two or three minutes it became evident that the poor brute had experienced very great relief.

I made another incision across the first one, and then very gently pressed the swollen part until the discharge had entirely ceased.

I then got more water, and fortunately provided with abundance of soft linen (which I used to wrap my birds in after I had shot them, to preserve their plumage unruffled) set to work to bathe and wash the foot thoroughly, after which I made a poultice of some healing leaves, and bound it securely over the puncture, the poor creature affectionately licking my hands all the while.

I then gave him a little more water to drink, and left him.

A few days later I was making my way to the patch of "open" where I had played the part of surgeon, with a leopard for my patient.

I spent a considerable amount of time in pinning and adjusting the plumage of my birds, when—I did not know why—I felt irresistibly constrained to turn my eyes towards the stump of a fallen tree. Obeying the impulse I took a good look at it, and, as I did so, became conscious of two bright, sparkling objects, glittering in the deep shadow of one of its projections.

Vaguely wondering what these could be, I remained steadfastly regarding them; and, as I did so, a very peculiar sensation stole over me. A slight and intermittent shivering seized my frame, accompanied by a momentary feeling of giddiness and nausea; all surrounding objects appeared to reel and swim out of my range of vision, leaving nothing but those two glittering points, which now appeared to expand into orbs of brilliant light.

A singing in the ears became perceptible, and, blending with the sighing of the wind through the foliage—which sounded faint and distant—quickly assumed a tone of dulcet, soothing, and delicious harmony of a distinctly rhythmical character, following the cadences of which the dazzling orbs appeared to sway gracefully before me, growing larger and more intensely brilliant every moment; and now they appeared to be surrounded with waving lines of delicate green and creamy pink, which interlaced in endless confusion of graceful flowing curves with a rapidity which made my brain reel.

More and more rapid became the movement of brilliant colour before me, more and more dazzling the shining orbs upon which I looked, until it seemed to me that I was a mere point in infinity; that heaven and earth had passed away, and that nothing remained, but those two brilliant suns, surrounded by a universe of waving green and pink lines.

Then came a sudden darkness—a shock as of electricity—a confused buzzing noise in my brain, which commenced to throb as though it would burst my skull—and a sensation of extreme giddiness which passed away as rapidly as it had come; and I found myself staring stupidly at a magnificent leopard—my former patient, as I saw at once by the remains of the bandage on his foot—who was standing growling savagely over an immense green mamba (a deadly venomous snake) who lay writhing with a broken back upon the grass, vainly trying to strike his poison fangs into the paw which, with extended talons, was dashing the reptile, more maimed and mutilated at every stroke, into the earth.

The tragedy was soon over: but I have no idea how long I might have remained seated there, staring vacantly and confusedly at my preserver, had I not at length been aroused by his approach. Then it suddenly dawned upon me that I might be his next victim; but he speedily set that fear at rest by rubbing himself against me, thrusting his head under my hand, and walking his whole length backwards and forwards, causing my hand to traverse his back until it reached his perpendicularly elevated tail and purring loudly with pleasure all the while, like an immense cat—as, of course, he was.

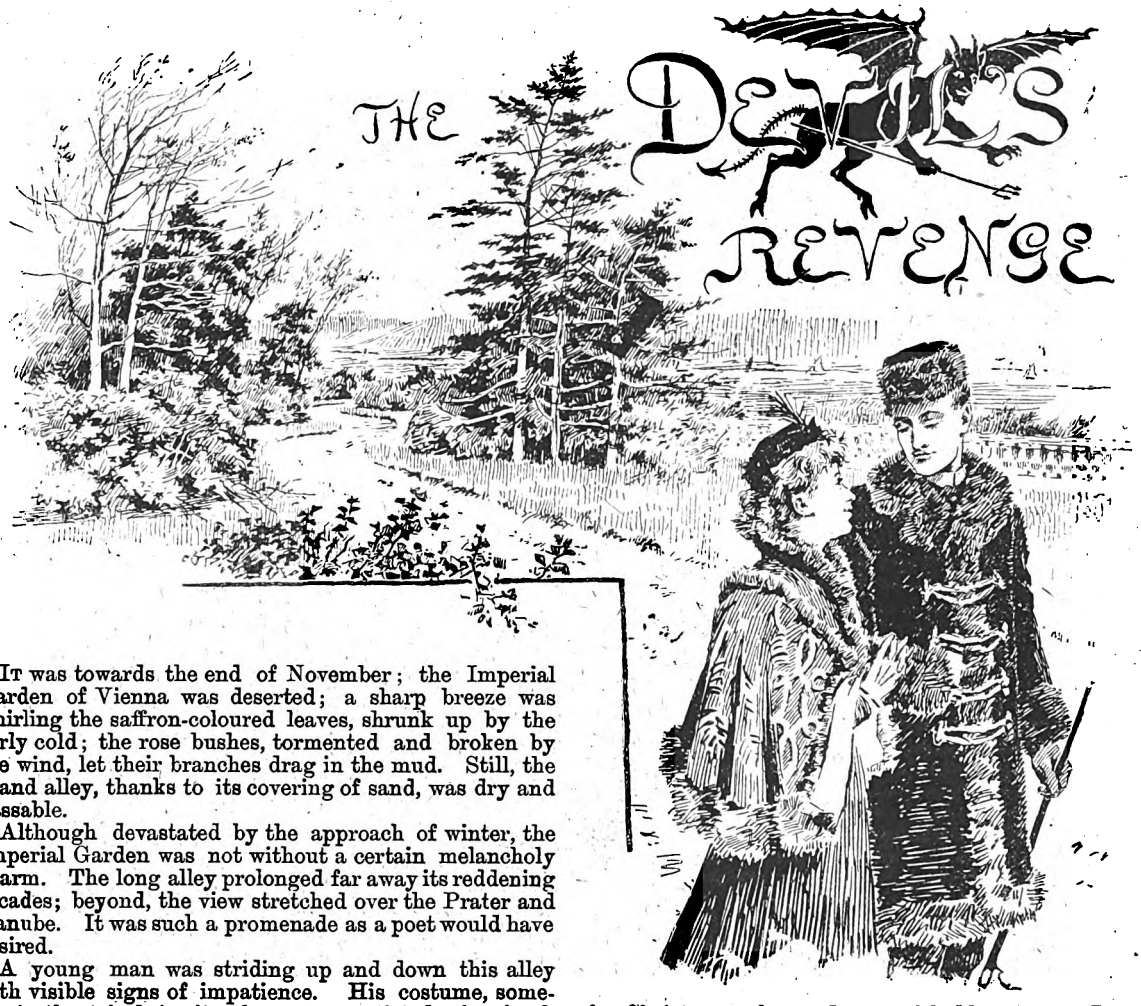
When the first eager manifestation of his delight had somewhat subsided, and I had soothed him into a state of tranquility, I examined his foot once more, washed it again—he followed me to the river when I walked down to its margin for water—and put a fresh dressing upon it.

Then I packed up my birds, examined the body of the snake, whose powers of fascination I had so fully, though unwillingly proved, and took my way homeward, accompanied to the extreme edge of the bush by my strange friend, who then for a minute or two followed me with his eyes, his tail waving gently to and fro the while, until he apparently realised the fact that I was actually leaving him, when he crouched low down on the ground, placed his head between his forepaws, raised a dismal howl, and finally started up and bounded back into the bush.

I never saw him again. H. Rogers.

Digitized by Google

THE DEVIL'S REVENGE



It was towards the end of November; the Imperial Garden of Vienna was deserted; a sharp breeze was whirling the saffron-coloured leaves, shrunk up by the early cold; the rose bushes, tormented and broken by the wind, let their branches drag in the mud. Still, the grand alley, thanks to its covering of sand, was dry and passable.

Although devastated by the approach of winter, the Imperial Garden was not without a certain melancholy charm. The long alley prolonged far away its reddening arcades; beyond, the view stretched over the Prater and Danube. It was such a promenade as a poet would have desired.

A young man was striding up and down this alley with visible signs of impatience. His costume, somewhat theatrical in its elegance, consisted of a frock coat of black velvet, with gold facings and bordered with fur, grey woollen pantaloons, top boots, with tassels, coming half way up his legs. He might have been twenty-seven or twenty-eight years of age. His pale and regular features were full of finesse, and irony lurked in the creases round his eyes and the corners of his mouth.

The narrow limits within which he circumscribed his walk showed that he was waiting for someone—probably a lady, for the Imperial Garden of Vienna in the month of November is hardly propitious to business rendezvous. Soon a young girl appeared at the end of the avenue. A turban of black silk covered her rich blonde hair, whose ringlets had been slightly uncurled by the dampness of the evening; her complexion, ordinarily of waxen whiteness, had taken a rosy tint from the bite of the cold. Grouped and wrapped, she was in a mantle trimmed with marten skin; a little terrier accompanied her—a convenient chaperon, on whose indulgence and discretion you could count.

"Imagine, Heinrich," said the pretty Viennese, taking the young man's arm. "I have been dressed and ready to go out for more than an hour, and my aunt kept on with her sermons on the dangers of waltzing, on recipes for Christmas cakes and carp with blue sauce. I went out on the pretext of buying some grey boots, of which I have no need whatever. It is for you, Heinrich, that I tell all these little lies which I am constantly regretting and constantly beginning over again. What an idea it was of yours to take to the stage! What was the good of studying theology so long at Heidelberg? My parents liked you, and we might have been married to-day but for that. Instead of meeting on the sly under the bare trees of the Imperial Garden, we should be seated side by side before a fine porcelain stove in a nice, warm room, talking of the future. Would not that be a happy lot, Heinrich?"

"Yes, Katie, very happy," replied the young man, as he pressed, under the satin and fur, the dimpled arm of the pretty Viennese; "but I cannot help it. The theatre attracts me invincibly; I dream of it by day, I think of it by night; I feel the desire to live in the creation of the poets. I seem to have twenty existences. Every rôle that I play makes me a new life; all those passions that I express I feel. I am Hamlet, Othello, Romeo. When one is all that he can with difficulty resign himself to the humble condition of a village pastor."

"That is very noble. But you know that my parents never will have an actor for a son-in-law."

Digitized by Google

"No, certainly not an obscure actor; a poor, ambulant artist, the puppet of managers and the public. But a great actor, covered with glory and applause, who earns more money than a minister, they will not refuse, however scrupulous they may be. When I shall come to ask your hand in a handsome coach, the varnish of which will be able to serve as a looking-glass for the astonished neighbours, and a tall lackey with gold lace will let down the steps for me, do you think they will refuse me?"

"I do not think they will. But who says, Heinrich, that you will ever come to that? You have talent, but talent is not sufficient; you must have good luck besides. By the time that you shall have become the grand actor of whom you speak, the best of your youth will have passed, and then will you be ready to marry Katie, grown old, when you have at your disposal the loves of all those princesses of the theatre, who are so joyous and so gaily decked?"

"That future," replied Heinrich, "is nearer than you think. I have an advantageous engagement at the theatre of the Corinthian Gate, and the manager is so satisfied with the manner in which I played my last rôle that he has made me a present of two thousand thalers."

"Yes," replied the young girl with a serious air, "that rôle of a demon in the new piece. I confess to you, Heinrich, that I do not like to see a Christian assume the mask of the enemy of the human race, and pronounce words of blasphemy. The other day I went to see you at the Corinthian Theatre, and at every moment I was afraid that a veritable fire would issue from one of the traps where you were swallowed up in flames of spirits of wine. I returned home all confused, and I dreamed horrible dreams."

"My good Katie, that is all imagination; to-morrow, too, will take place the last performance, and I shall no longer put on the black and red costume which so much displeases you."

While they were talking thus the two lovers had arrived at the Thaborstrasse, in the Leopoldstadt, in front of the shoemaker who was famous for the perfection of his grey boots. After chatting some time at the door, Katie entered, followed by her terrier, but not without having abandoned her pretty, slender fingers to the pressure of Heinrich's hand.

* * *

That night there was a numerous company at the Two-headed Eagle, the guests were of the most mixed description. The Two-headed Eagle was one of those blessed cellars celebrated by Hoffman, with steps so worn, so greasy, so slippery, that you cannot put your foot upon the first one without at once finding yourself at the bottom, with your elbows on the table, a pipe in your mouth, between a pot of beer and a measure of new wine.

Everybody was eating and drinking; the drink consisted of strong beer and a mixture of new red wine with old white wine; the food, of slices of cold veal, ham, or pastry.

Round the tables couples turned unceasingly one of those long German waltzes, which produce upon northern imaginations the same effect as hashish and opium on the Orientals; the couples passed and repassed rapidly; the women, almost fainting with pleasure on the arms of their cavaliers to the sounds of a waltz, swept away with their skirts the clouds of smoke and refreshed the faces of the drinkers.

Heinrich went to the end of the cellar, and sat on a table where were already seated three or four personages of joyous mien and merry humour.

"Ah, Heinrich!" cried the eldest of the band. "You know you had a truly diabolical look the other night; you almost frightened me. Who would think that Heinrich, who drinks beer as we do, and who does not draw back before a slice of cold ham, could put on such venomous, wicked, and sardonic airs, and that with a single gesture he can make a whole theatre shudder?"

"Eh! why that is the reason Heinrich is a great artist, a sublime comedian. There is no glory in playing a rôle that is in your character; the triumph, for a coquette, is to excel in playing ingénues. Don't you agree with me?"

Heinrich sat down modestly, called for a large glass

Pushed him by main force through the floor.

Digitized by Google

of mixed wine, and the conversation continued on the same subject. On all sides it was admiration and compliments.

"Ah, if the great Wolfgang Goethe had seen you!" said one.

"Show us your feet," said another. "I am sure you have a forked hoof."

The other drinkers, attracted by these exclamations, looked at Heinrich seriously, all happy to have the opportunity of examining closely so remarkable a man. The young man who had formerly known Heinrich at the university, and whose names he hardly knew, came up to him and shook him cordially by the hand, as if they had been his intimate friends.

One man only, seated at a neighbouring table, seemed to take no part in the general enthusiasm. His head thrown backward, he was thrumming distractedly with his fingers on the crown of his hat a military march, and from time to time he uttered a sort of humph, singularly dubious.

The aspect of this man was of the strangest, although he was dressed like an honest burgher of Vienna, enjoying a modest fortune; his grey eyes were shaded with green tints, and shot out phosphoric lights like the eyes of a cat. When his pale, flat lips parted, they showed two rows of teeth very white, very sharp, and very wide apart, of the most cannibal and ferocious aspect; his long nails, shining and curved, took a vague appearance of claws; but that physiognomy appeared only by rapid flashes; to the eye that watched him fixedly, his face resumed the bourgeois and débonnaire appearance of a retired Viennese merchant, and you felt astonished that you could have suspected of villainy a face so vulgar and trivial.

Internally Heinrich was shocked at the indifference of the man. That disdainful silence took away their value from the panegyrics which his noisy companions lavished upon him. It was the silence of an old and experienced connoisseur, who does not allow himself to be deceived by appearances.

Atmayer, the youngest of the company, the warmest admirer of Heinrich, could not endure this coldness, and addressing the strange man, as if taking him to bear witness to an assertion that he advanced, he said:

"Is it not so, sir, no actor has ever played the rôle of Mephistopheles better than my comrade here!"

"Humph!" said the stranger, flashing his green eye and cracking his sharp teeth. "Mr. Heinrich is a young man of talent, whom I esteem very highly; but he is wanting in many things necessary to play the rôle of the devil."

And suddenly drawing himself up: "Have you ever seen the devil, Mr. Heinrich?"

He put this question in such a strange and mocking tone that all the company felt a shudder run down their backs.

"That, however, would be necessary for the truthfulness of your play. The other evening I was at the theatre of the Corinthian Gate, and I was not satisfied with your laugh; it was, at the utmost, a sly laugh. My dear Mr. Heinrich, this is the way you ought to laugh."

And thereupon, as if to give him the example, he burst into a laugh, so sharp, so strident, so sardonic, that the orchestra and the dancers stopped at that very instant, and the glass in the windows trembled. The stranger continued this pitiless and convulsive laughter for several minutes, and Heinrich and his companions, in spite of their terror, could not help imitating it.

When Heinrich had recovered himself, the vaults of the tavern were repeating, like a feeble echo, the last notes of that broken and terrible laugh, and the stranger was no longer there.

* * * *

Some days after this strange incident, which he had almost forgotten, or which he remembered only as a joke of an ironical burgher, Heinrich was playing his part of the demon in the new piece. On the first row of seats in the orchestra was seated the stranger of the tavern, and at every word pronounced he shook his head, winked

Then he entered upon the scene . . . like a perfect actor.

Digitized by Google

his eyes, smacked his tongue against his palate, and showed signs of the liveliest impatience.

"Bad, bad!" he murmured to himself.

His neighbours, astonished and shocked at his manners, applauded, and thought to themselves that the old gentleman was very hard to please.

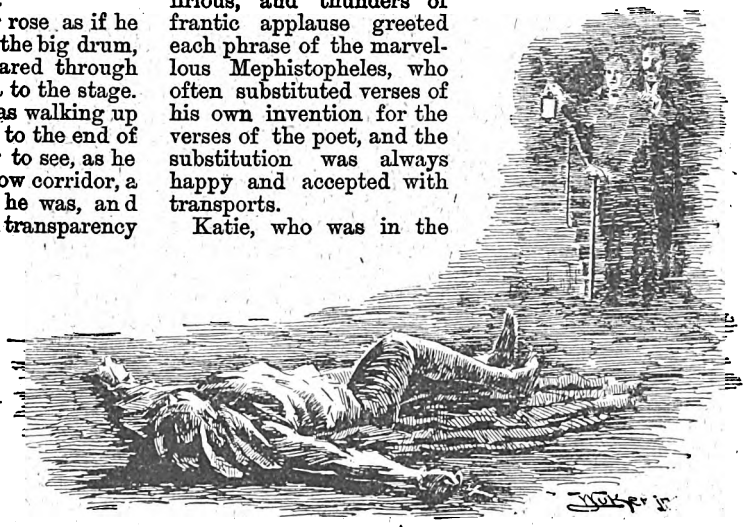
At the end of the first act the stranger rose as if he had taken a sudden resolution, strode over the big drum, the cymbals, and trombone, and disappeared through the little door that leads from the orchestra to the stage. Heinrich, waiting until the curtain rose, was walking up and down in the wings, and when he came to the end of his short promenade, what was his terror to see, as he turned, standing in the middle of the narrow corridor, a mysterious personage clothed exactly as he was, and who looked at him with eyes whose greenish transparency had a strange profoundity in the darkness; the white, wide-set teeth gave something ferocious to the sardonic smile.

Heinrich could not fail to recognise the stranger whom he had seen at the Two-headed Eagle, or rather the devil in person, for it was he.

"Ah, ah, my young friend! You wish to play the devil? You were very middling in the first act, and you would decidedly give a very poor idea of me to the good citizens of Vienna. You will allow me to replace you this evening; and, as you might interfere with me, I will send you to the cellar below the stage."

Heinrich recognised the Prince of Darkness, and felt himself lost. Putting his hand mechanically to the little cross that Katie had given him, he tried to call for help, and to murmur his formula of exorcism; but terror choked him; he could only utter a feeble rattle. The devil seized Heinrich with his hooked hand by the shoulders, and pushed him by main force through the floor. Then he entered upon the scene, when his cue came, like a perfect actor.

His incisive, biting, venomous and truly diabolic acting at first surprised the spectators. What especially produced a great effect was that sharp titter like the grating of a saw—that laugh of the lost blaspheming the joys of paradise. Never had an actor attained such power of sarcasm, such a depth of villainy; the audience laughed, but they trembled. All the audience was panting with emotion, phosphoric sparks glinted from the fingers of the terrible actor, trains of sparkling flame ran from his feet, the footlights shot out reddish and greenish flashes, a sort of sulphurous smell reigned in the theatre, the spectators were, as it were, delirious, and thunders of frantic applause greeted each phrase of the marvellous Mephistopheles, who often substituted verses of his own invention for the verses of the poet, and the substitution was always happy and accepted with transports.



Heinrich Falkenstein was dead.

Katie, who was in the theatre, was in a state of extraordinary alarm; she did not recognise her dear Heinrich, she presaged some misfortune with that spirit of divination which love gives.

The performance ended amidst indescribable enthusiasm. When the curtain fell the public called for Mephistopheles with loud cries. He was sought for in vain, but at last a scene-shifter came and told the manager that Heinrich had been found in the cellar, where he had probably fallen through a trap.

The hapless actor was taken up. His clothing was burned in places, and on his shoulders were deep scratches. They spoke to him, but he did not answer.

Heinrich Falkenstein was dead.

LE VIER.

No. 2 of "Melody"

AND

"Pearson's Magazine" No. 4

ARE NOW ON SALE. PRICE 6d. EACH.

"Melody" provides Songs, Dances, Pianoforte Compositions at ½d. each.

"The Magazine" provides delightful Stories and Articles and Plentiful Illustrations at the rate of ½d. for Ten Pages.

Digitized by Google

Diamond ✣ Cut ✣ Diamond.

My house at Kensington had twice been robbed to a small extent.

The first time the burglars only got a few silver-plated spoons, that had been used by the servants. The second time the linen and half a cold turkey were taken from the kitchen. On hearing of this depredation I made the following mental note: "The next time my house is burgled I am going to try a little experiment—whether I can catch the burglar."

One night, in the dead of winter, I walked home from the theatre. I was a bachelor, and had no servants sleeping in the house, but my mind was cheered as I approached the dwelling by the thought that its time of lonesomeness and my bachelor days were soon to be brought to an end and by the best girl in the world.

I sat down before the fire which my caretaker had built up before leaving, removed my shoes, put on my slippers, and picked up a novel. After half-an-hour's reading I became aware that I was quite hungry, so I laid my book aside and marched downstairs. I remembered that I was singing an air from a once popular opera:

> When the energetic burglar's not a-burgling,
> When the cut-throat isn't occupied in crime,
> He loves to hear the little brook a-gurgling,
> And to listen to the merry village chime.

II.

It was not because I had any thought of housebreakers that I sang that song, but it had always given me a sense of restfulness from the turmoils of life. I had, on finishing the verse, reached the end of the hall, and opened the dining-room door very abruptly, when I started to find myself in the glare of a bull's-eye lantern held by an invisible hand, and to hear a gruff voice say:

"Show us yer hands!"

Just at my left on the wall was a little metallic knob which I had only to press to flood the room with light from incandescent burners. Now I am of a peculiarly perverse temperament. From childhood I have felt an irresistible inclination to do the very opposite from what I have been told, regardless of consequences, and I therefore claim no credit for nerve for disobeying the command to show my hands, though I knew I was confronted by a desperate man, who probably had a revolver in his hand. I deliberately pressed the little knob. Instantly the bull's-eye grew red and sullen in the bright electric glow.

Across the table, standing by the sideboard, was the most repulsive looking ruffian I ever saw. His thick, bushy hair almost covered his receding forehead, and a few locks fell over his small black eyes. His neck was very thick and his complexion very bad. But the most alarming feature was his mouth. In all my twenty-nine years I had never seen such a cavern in a human face. It seemed to yawn like an abyss when he opened it.

"Hold up your hands, young feller," he repeated, "an' no monkeyin'."

"Heavens! what a mouth!" I exclaimed.

This irrelevant remark seemed to surprise him, for he only stared in silence for a moment.

"Come now," he again said, "no foolin'. Put up yer dukes over your head, or I'll bore ye through."

"Pardon me for refusing your request," I replied, "but my position would be a very uncomfortable one. Besides, I think your tone is impertinent."

This maddened the fellow. He placed his lantern on the sideboard and came round the table.

"See here, young feller," he said, grasping me by the wrist and staring into my face, while he clutched the revolver in the other hand, "I told ye I didn't want no monkeyin'."

"If I had a mouth like yours," I replied, "and if I could supply it with plenty of bread and bacon I would live 200 years—certain."

The burglar replied to this with a profane remark, and at once examined all my pockets to see that I had no revolver. "Thunder!" he said on finding that I had not. "You hain't got no arms. I could eat a dozen like you."

"I've no doubt of it," I replied.

He took my watch and purse from me and put them in his own pocket.

"You'll find that a good watch," I said, "and the cash in that book is legal tender anywhere."

"Be careful you don't make no noise," he said. "Us poor fellows has got to make our livin' off blokes like you, an' we don' get nabbed any more'n we kin help, you betcher life, not even if we has to plug somebody; so keep mum an' don't say a word."

III.

"Now see here," said I in a very business-like manner, "let us understand each other. You are robbing my house. That's all right. I'm used to it. Only I determined that the next time one of your calling invaded my premises I would try a little experiment."

"Huh?" he asked.

"I determined," I repeated, "to try a little experiment."

"Swag is what I want, not experiments," replied my guest.

"That is all right," I replied, "you may have the swag. I will have the experiment. In fact, it is a part of my experiment that you shall have the swag."

"Good enough," said he. "An' what's the rest of it?"

"I will explain that to you later," I replied. "I see you have been investigating the sideboard. Well, there is plenty of solid silver there. It won't be quite so valuable melted down, but then I won't be able to recognise it at your uncle's or elsewhere. Get to work now. Put it all out on the table, wrap it in napkins, and the whole in a tablecloth."

Mr. Burglar looked on me with the most marked surprise. He evidently concluded that I was a lunatic.

I drew a big chair up to the grate, stirred up the dying fire, put on more coal, and with my feet on the fender prepared to enjoy my ease. Mr. Burglar spent more time watching me than in ransacking the sideboard. He seemed to think that I would suddenly seize a pistol from some hiding place and pepper him. But I didn't. I only sat still and talked to him in a facetious manner about various matters, particularly politics and burglary.

Digitized by Google

We passed many pleasantries, and he was now coming to think me a very interesting lunatic.

"I reckon I've got it all," he said at length, lifting the heavy burden; "an' I must say you're the queerest cove I ever seen."

IV.

"Well," I said, "I know of nothing else in the house that I should be willing for you to take away, and I will proceed to do what I came down here for—that is, to take supper. If I had not been hungry I should not have the pleasure of making your acquaintance. Do you like cold turkey? Come along with me."

I went into the kitchen, turned on the incandescent lights and entered the pantry, Mr. Burglar watching me closely and nervously, ready to shoot me if I picked up a weapon in any unexpected place. I took no notice of his actions, and, perfectly unconcerned, I found some cold turkey, some celery, a few slices of bread, and some butter. I put them all on a tray and went back to the dining-room table with them, Mr. Burglar following as vigilant as ever.

"Help yourself," I said, giving him a plate, knife and fork. "Have some turkey. That celery is very fine. And this bread is unsurpassed. Now make yourself at home." We did not sit down but stood together by the table.

My guest was somewhat embarrassed to know how to eat his turkey and at the same time hold his revolver. He compromised by transferring the latter to his left hand and taking up a slice of fowl with his right, "I don't belong to the haristocracy," he said, "an' I reckon I'll eat with my fingers."

We ate in silence for a few moments, when I said in a tone of chiding for my forgetfulness: "Well I have forgotten the wine. You'll say it is the best you ever drunk."

"You hain't got no gin, I reckon?" said the burglar, with his mouth full of turkey.

"No," I replied, reaching a large decanter full of ruby liquid down from the sideboard; "I don't keep it, but try this."

I placed the decanter by him and set out two ordinary tumblers. He looked at me very straight for a moment, then poured the glass nearly full and raised it to his cavern mouth. It pleased him. He almost closed his eyes in his contentment.

My time had come. With a movement like lightning I gave him a stunning blow just under the ear with a fist that had felled more than one man in the gymnasium. His head struck the fender as he fell and I was on him in a second. I wrenched the revolver from his hand, arose, laid it on the table, and calmly finished my luncheon. When the burglar sat up and rubbed his head in a dazed way, I had resumed my seat by the fire. But the tables were turned—I had the revolver.

"Now," I said, "I am going to show you the other part of that experiment. First, you untie that tablecloth and put the silver and napkins back in the sideboard as you found them." He eyed me sullenly and obeyed.

V.

When he had finished I said: "Lest your curiosity as to the nature of my experiment be devouring you I will tell you at once that it is this: Instead of letting you go away with my valuables, I am going to take all yours. Do you see? I am going to burgle the burglar. Take off your coat and throw it to me." The burglar obeyed. His face was black as a thundercloud.

"Now your vest," I commanded.

He hesitated.

"Be quick," I said, tapping the revolver, and he sullenly complied.

"Now your trousers," I continued.

He looked at me with an expression almost piteous. I raised the revolver to the level of his head and said: "Off with them," and off they came.

Mr. Burglar now stood before me in rather meagre undergarments, the very picture of helpless rage. He gritted his teeth and clenched his hands in the most savage manner, and the expression of his cave-like mouth was something terrible.

"Don't be unduly agitated," I said in soft tones. "This is all of my experiment. I will now let you go out by the kitchen door, and remember that I am satisfied with having robbed you of your clothing and whatever may be in your pockets. I will not appear against you in court under any circumstances. You are free."

I found the kitchen door unlocked when we reached it. He had come in that way. I sent the despoiled burglar out into the wintry air shivering, locked the house more securely, took his clothes, and went away to my room.

VI.

In addition to my watch and money, I found in the burglar's pockets some gold and notes. "Surely my experiment has been a success," I said aloud. "How Ida will laugh when I tell her my adventure. Bless her heart!" And, thinking of the dear girl, I took from a drawer in my dressing-room a beautiful plush case. It contained a set of diamonds I had bought for Ida for a wedding present. They had cost me £400, and I looked at them every night as they glistened beautifully. I opened the case and held it under the light.

Never in all my life had I such feelings as I had that moment. The case was empty—the stones were gone.

I understood it all. The burglar had been wandering over the house before I came home. He had been to my room. Had even lit the gas. Yes, he had taken Ida's diamonds. I searched the clothes again. They did not contain the missing jewels. Could he have carried them off in his hands or in his socks? I rushed downstairs, out of the kitchen door, and searched the adjacent yards, streets, and alleys in vain. I met a policeman. No, he had seen nothing of a man with a big mouth, walking abroad in his underclothes.

I returned home at daybreak, baffled, sick at heart. Under the door I found a note written by an untrained hand. It read thus:

Dear sir i take my pen to Let you no i didnt kech cold I had already throw a suit of yore close out of the kitchen dore they was a little small but bettern mine i reckon you found yore Dimons missin i put them in my heavens what a mouth when you made me take of my dudds i aint afeard youl ketch me. You said you woudn prosecut me under no circumstanses and i reckon a gent like you will keep yore word, you aint so smart tho as you can think you are.

And that is what I have been thinking ever since.

Agnes Jewly.

Digitized by Google

A MUTE REPLY.

Reginald (very much in love, and having manœuvred for this opportunity): "We need not walk so fast, Miss Ethel, there will be plenty of time to reach the station, and the road is so delightful, don't you think?"

Ethel (brightly): "Oh, delightful, really!"

Reginald (anxiously): "Perhaps you would have preferred to ride with the others?"

Ethel: "No, indeed. I am fonder of walking than riding, aren't you?"

Reginald (enthusiastically): "Oh, yes, especially with—with a person who enjoys it. If I could only stay longer, we might plan some glorious walks about here—that is, if you would care to share them with me."

Ethel (sweetly): "It would delight me—and I am sure auntie would love to go with us! She is a famous pedestrian."

Reginald: "Yes (with a sigh). It does seem hard that I am compelled to leave just now, but father being ill makes it imperative. I simply must go. And these last few weeks have been to me a glimpse of Paradise!"

Ethel (smiling dreamily): "You feel like a banished Adam, I suppose?"

Reginald (softly): "A good deal worse. Eve went with him, you know."

Ethel: "Yes, poor Eve! Imagine how he must have scolded her along the way."

Reginald: "Oh, I imagine they walked out quite hopefully, hand in hand, to seek their fortune."

Ethel: "Poor girl. It is bad enough to seek one's fortune now. But in those days there could not possibly have been any fortunes to be found."

Reginald: "Oh, they got along. So do lots of couples that—that love each other (glancing down at her tenderly). I know I would not be afraid to take long odds against Fate, if I could have the woman of my heart beside me always."

Ethel: "Perhaps not, but she might be afraid."

Reginald (rather disconcerted): "Well, I don't know. She would not be—er—ah—if she returned my affection. (Bravely) Shall you be coming up to town soon, do you think?"

Ethel: "To town? Oh, no."

(A long silence. Reginald switches viciously with his stick at the inoffensive wayside growths, and stares gloomily along the road.)

Ethel: "Of course I won't forget—but how many things we learn that we never have any use for! The mind has room for all sorts of odds and ends—Oh, there they are, on the platform—and they're waving. Oh, your train is in—look there——"

Reginald: "Yes, I see. (Desperately) Ethel, I love you so—I adore you—I could die for you this minute."

Ethel: "Oh, how can you say such things? And they're frantic for you to hurry. Please run."

Reginald: "You believe it, don't you, don't you dear!"

Ethel: "Oh, you'll miss your train! They'll blame me for it. Do hurry!"

Reginald: "But you must tell me—if I may hope? I beg of you, Ethel. Say you care——"

Ethel: "Oh, good-bye, and run for pity's sake. Run, run!"

Reginald (wildly): "Answer quick. Yes—or no?"

Ethel (also wildly): "No! No—I mean, I can't answer—there isn't time!"

Reginald (straightening himself up with sudden manliness): "Very well, Ethel. I understand. Yes, it is a little word. There would be time to say it—if you cared! Good-bye—God bless you!" (Rushes from her and enters the train. Ethel hurries forward, as near as possible to the line of windows. As the train moves off their eyes meet. Ethel spells plainly in deaf and dumb show an emphatic "YES!" Reginald kisses his hand in a wordless rapture of recognition and gratitude as the train recedes.)

Ethel (pensively retracing her steps along the quiet country road): "And to think of the important uses we can make of useless knowledge. If Reginald had not taught me that silly alphabet, what could I have done? I'd rather die than say 'Yes' in a hurry, even to the dearest fellow in the world; but somehow I didn't mind spelling it—a bit."

Madeline Bridges.

A TEN-POUND PRIZE.

(See Next Page.)

On the next page is a puzzle picture composed of 88 squares. If these squares be rearranged in a certain order they will form a real picture.

We offer a prize of £10 to the first person who sends the correct solution. In order to give readers in all parts of the United Kingdom as equal a chance as possible, none of the solutions received will be opened until Thursday, April 16th, when all those received will be considered together. In the event of two or more correct solutions being included in one day's post, the prize will be given to the sender of the neatest one. Consolation Prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

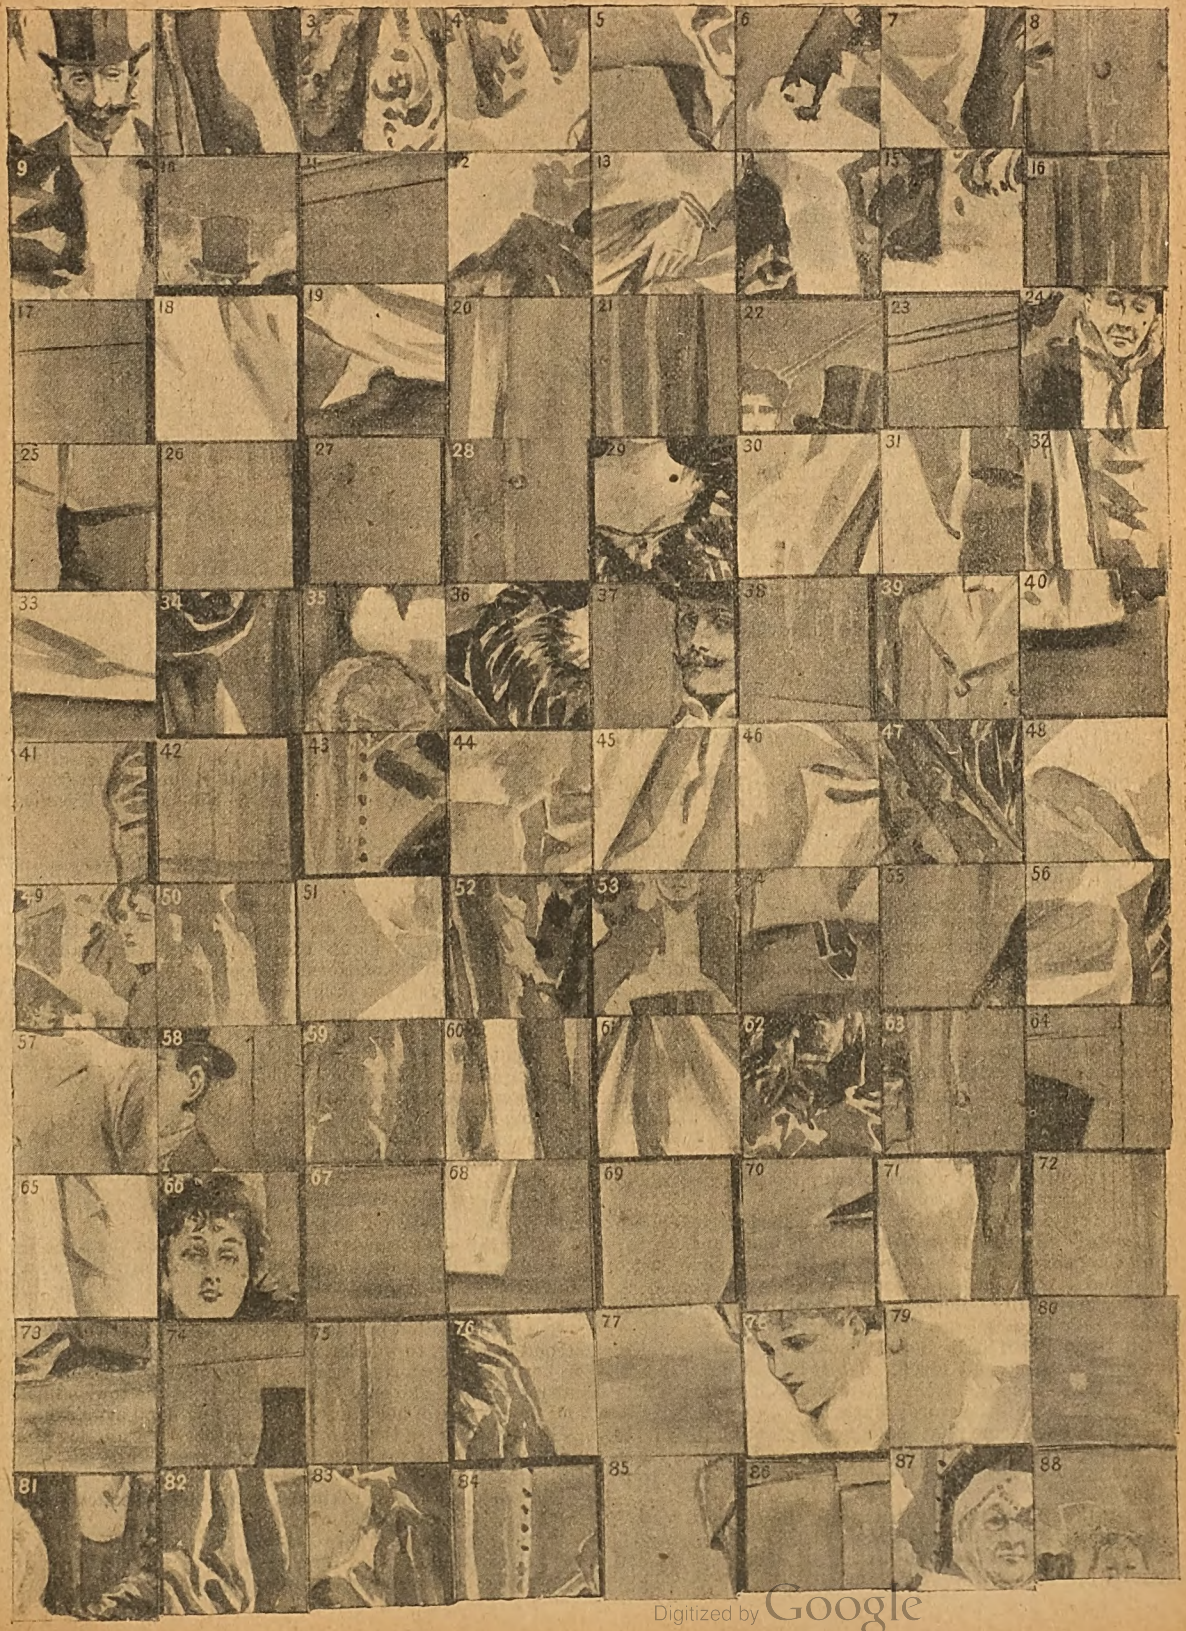
If no correct solution be received on or before Tuesday, April 21st, 1896, the Ten-Pound Prize will be given to the sender of the solution then to hand which is most nearly correct.

Pictures should be packed flat or folded, not rolled, and the outside wrapper must be marked "May."

N.B.—To make the puzzle more difficult some of the squares have been turned upside down.

Key to the last Picture Puzzle and names of winners will be found on page 320.

Digitized by Google



Digitized by Google

By WINIFRED GRAHAM. Author of "Through the Valley," "Six First-Class Passengers," etc.

CHAPTER XIX.

LET US BE OPEN AS THE DAY.

ELEANOR notices after that night Carol becomes nervous and irritable.

His absences are more frequent, but wherever he goes he takes the dog with him for protection.

Though only a rough-haired terrier, it seems to guard him; yet the constant recurrence of apparently reasonless growls and barks startles and annoys him.

Eleanor often sits with Elizabeth Kachin when Quinton is out, and wonders what she would do without the companionship of this one white woman.

That day she is walking up the hill towards her friend's hut, when she meets young Tombo, who rushes up and seizes her skirts.

"Oh, do come!" he cries, dragging her along; "something awful bad is going on at home. There is a stranger at our door crying just dreadful; and mother's red in the face, sayin' no end of angry words, stampin', fumin', and wringing her hands. The stranger wanted to see me and speak; but mother just hustled me out at the back, and tells me to go and play beans in the jungle. But the boys are not there. Quartey M'Ba is takin' care of his father, who's dead drunk with Zoo, and little Rangusaw Mymoodelayer is workin' with his uncle. It's sure to be all right if you come, Mrs. Quinton. Mother 'll calm down when she sees who I've brought."

He runs eagerly before her, while Eleanor, utterly at a loss to comprehend the nature of the trouble, approaches Elizabeth's homestead in some trepidation.

"I'll have none of you," Mrs. Kachin's hard voice is heard exclaiming. "Did I not write it plain in black and white? Didn't I repeat it three times over on the same page, twice underlined? Am I not old enough to judge for myself, to know my own will? Begone, or I'll tell you some home truths which were best not uttered from my lips."

"Oh, little Beth, little Beth!" moans a pleading voice, "the child I nursed and loved. Can it be you that speaks so hard, that turns me from the door? Let me see the child before I go—the sturdy dark boy who was born to you. Beth, have some pity, some mercy on my misery! It has cost me nearly my little all to come out to you, for I thought your heart would soften when you saw your mother's face."

She breaks off into bitter sobbing and sinks on the step.

Eleanor stands like one paralysed listening to the quarrel, while Tombo hides behind her skirts, clinging to her fearfully.

Her face flushes with shame for Elizabeth, and pity for this stricken woman. Her eyes flash scorn on Mrs. Kachin, as she turns and raises the stranger from her attitude of humility and degradation.

"Your daughter's virtue and pride are things to be despised, accursed," she says, "when bound in such an armour of harshness and cruelty."

The weeping woman lifts her head, and her eyes meet Eleanor's.

The two start involuntarily. The scene of a railway carriage rushes suddenly before their vision, the fragments of a torn photograph, the name on the label of Eleanor's dressing-bag.

"Mrs. Roche!" gasps the stranger.

That word here! It stuns, petrifies her. The very sound of it is as a blow.

A flock of four or five horn-bills fly above their heads, making their noises like an express train through the air. As they fade from sight Eleanor fancies the train has stopped at the little platform of Copthorne.

The shrill cry of the jungle fowl, crowing like bantams on the old farmland at home, seem to repeat the word, "Roche, Roche!"

"What can I do?" asks the woman wildly, grasping Eleanor's arm. "I am here, and Beth has cast me out, I have nowhere to lay my head."

"Come with me," says Eleanor slowly, deliberately, looking from the faded features of the withered woman to Mrs. Kachin's contracted mouth. "I will give you rest and shelter."

"You will regret it if you take her under your roof!" cries Elizabeth, slamming the door.

"May the good Samaritans of this world do the same for you, Mrs. Roche, when you are in trouble," says the weary wanderer, as Eleanor leads her faltering footsteps down the hill.

She is too excited by the strange coincidence of this, their second meeting, to wonder whether she is binding a burden on her back, or offering a refuge thoughtlessly without consulting Carol. She only looks pityingly at the towzled hair and drawn face of her guest, pressing her hand sympathetically as they enter the verandah together. "I am not Mrs. Roche here," falters Eleanor, "you must call me Mrs. Quinton."

The woman looks searchingly, sadly, into Eleanor's eyes.

"I see," she answers slowly.

"And your name?" asks Eleanor.

"Palfrey Blum. I am Mrs. Blum."

What an odd introduction, what a puzzling fate.

Digitized by Google

Carol is deeply annoyed at his return to discover the guest.

"What on earth you want to bring that hideous creature with a head of hay here for I can't imagine," he exclaims. "You must shunt her as soon as possible, Eleanor, I can't have you picking up waifs and strays, and turning our home into a sort of infirmary."

"I don't know what to do, it is a most pitiable story."

"Oh! dash the story!" interpolates Carol. "I shouldn't mind if she were not so confoundedly ugly."

"I could not help it, darling," says Eleanor tearfully. "I did not think you would object."

"Well, now she is here, what are you going to do with her?"

"I don't know."

Carol stalks up and down the room with his hands in his pockets.

Eleanor's spirits sink.

"I will see what I can do, dearest," she says at last.

Carol turns, seeing her beautiful eyes moist and sorrowful.

He gathers her into his arms and kisses her suddenly.

"Get rid of the old ghost," he whispers. "I can't endure to see a relic of faded beauty standing decayed before my eyes. A woman has no right to grow old, it is an unpardonable offence, and takes away one's appetite having to look at her at meals."

"How unchristian you are, Carol!" she says, smiling under his caress.

The following morning Mrs. Blum seems refreshed, and looks less careworn after her night's sleep.

"There is one thing I desire more than all else on earth," she confides to Eleanor, "and that is to hold my grandson in my arms, to kiss him once."

"I have been again to Elizabeth, but she will not listen to me. Perhaps I might get the boy to you without her knowledge, or big Tombo may possibly bring him. There were tears in his eyes to-day when I was pleading with Elizabeth."

"Ah! Big Tombo is not so bitter against me as his wife. He is a good man, and charitable."

So Eleanor watches for Mr. Kachin to pass down the path to the valley below, where the rice is cultivated.

When she sees him she runs out. He stops and bows. Eleanor gives him her hand.

"Ah, Mrs. Quinton," he says, "we are deeply indebted to you for your kindness to poor Mrs. Blum. Even my wife in her righteous indignation owns that. I should personally be very glad to do anything I could for her, only Elizabeth is so determined. Can you advise me?"

Eleanor thinks a moment.

"She must be sent back again, I suppose. She regrets bitterly having come."

"Has she any money?"

"Oh, yes, but hardly enough to take her home; she relied on living with you and Elizabeth. I shall help her all I can, and perhaps you will also."

Big Tombo works hard, and he has a good store of hoardings laid by. He is an intensely generous man, and but for his wife's watchfulness would give away all that he has to others.

Eleanor inspires him to make an offer.

"I will pay her fare to England," he says. "It will save Elizabeth the pain of coming in contact with her. After all, she is my mother-in-law. It is the least that I can do."

"You are most good and kind," replies Eleanor, "and she would be deeply grateful if you came in now and told her this yourself. She feels her daughter's slight acutely."

Big Tombo bows assent.

The beautiful Mrs. Quinton's word is law.

Mrs. Blum trembles with emotion as her eyes fall upon him. She listens to what he says with tears in her eyes and a blessing in her heart.

"You are a good son," she says, taking his great brown hands between her withered palms, and pressing them to her lips. "I love you for your care of Elizabeth—for the happy home in which she lives. When she speaks of me harshly tell her to think of me as one dead. We reverence the names of those who are underground, even though we despise them during their lives. I shall never forget what you have done for me."

Her voice is choked with emotion.

"If—if you don't mind," she falters, "I should like to look once on your child before I go."

Tombo bends his head. He has not the heart to refuse her.

That afternoon he sends the boy, without Elizabeth's knowledge, to carry some bananas to Eleanor.

"Come in, my dear," she says kindly, as the little boy presents the fruit. "There is a lady who wishes to see you."

She takes his small hand and leads him into the room.

Mrs. Blum rushes forward with a cry, and flinging her arms round the child's neck, kisses him again and again.

Then perching him on her knee, she looks at him intently, murmuring: "Beth's boy! Beth's son!"

"You are the lady who got scolded," says Tombo gravely. "Why was my mother so angry with you?"

"It is not polite to ask questions," puts in Eleanor hastily.

"But she ought not to be cross," continues Tombo, "because you must be good, you're white, like Mrs. Quinton, and mother never rows her. Who are you?" placing his tiny fingers against her cheek, and stroking it gently.

"I am your granny, dear, and you will never see me again. But you must think of me sometimes, and remember that I loved you."

She strains him to her heart passionately.

"You're crying!" says Tombo. "That's naughty. Oh! don't cry," shaking her in a sudden frenzy of fear. "Granny, Granny!"

Children always dread to see their elders give way to any emotion, and the little fellow's terror brings back Mrs. Blum's composure.

"There, darling, see, I am smiling," she says, her faded eyes lighting up through a mist of tears.

"I think it is very nice to have a Granny, and I want to keep her always."

"That is impossible, dearest. You must be a good boy, and not ask mother questions."

Eleanor brings him sweets and cakes, which he readily devours, sharing them with the dog, who jumps up, startling Mrs. Blum, on whose knees young Tombo is seated.

"You must trot home soon," says Eleanor, glancing nervously at the time, and fearing every moment lest Elizabeth should sweep in like a tragedy queen, and snatch her offspring from Mrs. Blum's arms.

"Yes, soon," sighs his grandmother, holding him as if she will never let him go. She detaches a small gold locket from her chain, in which is a lock of Elizabeth's hair.

"You may keep this, darling," she murmurs, "to remember Granny by."

She looks tenderly at the pale, flaxen lock of hair, which grew on little Beth's baby forehead.

"Don't lose it, Tombo, for it is very precious—one of Granny's dearest treasures. Mother will recognise it and know the hair inside. Tell her you must keep it always, because she played with it as a little girl."

The boy gazes in awe at the locket.

"Didn't it cost a lot of money?" he asks.

Mrs. Blum smiles at the remark.

"You are an odd child," she says, placing him on the ground.

"Have you nothing you can give Granny?" whispers Eleanor in his ear.

Tombo draws a small whistle from his pocket and carries it with an air of triumph to Mrs. Blum.

Digitized by Google

"This is for you, Granny. It is all my own, so don't be afraid. Quartey M'Ba gave it to me for a dead 'minah' I found in the jungle."

She takes the little whistle tremblingly.

"Granny will wear it on her chain," she says, "in the place of her locket; she will keep it quite as carefully."

Then she kisses the child, and pushes him from her, covering her face with her hands that she may not see him go.

Eleanor leads Tombo away, and watches him run down the hill—he is clasping the gold locket safely in both hands.

* * * * * *

Mrs. Blum has departed blessing Eleanor, and pouring such overwhelming gratitude into her ears that solitude is a welcome relief.

"Poor soul," she thinks. "Shall I ever come to that?"

A step is heard on the verandah, the rustle of a dress, and Elizabeth Kachin stands before her.

She is paler than of yore, her eyes a trifle softer. The hard lips part in greeting; she takes Eleanor by both hands.

"You are a good woman," she says, with an admiring glance. "I cannot tell you how high your great charity has placed you in my esteem and regard. To think you actually laid aside all your natural feelings of repulsion and harboured such a woman out of charity."

"Merely an act of plain humanity," replies Eleanor.

"Nevertheless, I could not do it, even to my own mother. To be in contact with what is sinful is abhorrent to me. Still, I am not blind to your great kindness and self-sacrifice. Tombo and I both wish to thank you."

Eleanor's heart swells at the words—to be thought good, noble, charitable. What a blessed thing it is! She realises how deeply she still values public opinion, which she has cast to the winds in her reckless love for Carol. Elizabeth, by her words of praise, endears herself to Eleanor, in spite of her late behaviour to the poor outcast. It is well to be looked up to and to be believed in. Then the galling thought creeps into her elated brain:

"You have no right to this approbation. Elizabeth is a just woman, clothed in that pitiless virtue which tramples down the weak. You are deceiving her and accepting what is not your due. You may be foolish, wild, mistaken, Eleanor; you may have ruined your husband and yourself; but you are not a hypocrite."

She realises in a moment all it will cost her to lose her friend's respect, to see the look of scorn in Elizabeth's eye, and watch her turn away as from one polluted.

For the moment it seems too hard, but Eleanor pulls herself together and sets her teeth.

She walks across to the door with a steady step, her slim young figure drawn up to its full height, her head tossed back, her cheeks aflame.

Elizabeth watches in mute surprise. Then Eleanor breaks the silence, flings open the door, and cries with outstretched hand pointing to the hill:

"Go! I, too, am a wicked woman!"

CHAPTER XX.

The ideal! Dim vanities of dreams by night.

From the moment those fatal words were uttered: "Go! I, too, am a wicked woman!" the scales fall from Elizabeth's eyes.

How natural it seems to her now, the so-called Mrs. Quinton's act of sympathy.

But what she does not know, nor can ever guess, is the supreme effort that confession costs Eleanor. It is wrung from her lips through sheer force of will, and as Mrs. Kachin obeys the command, and with head held proudly aloft, passes out into the blinding sunlight, Eleanor receives her first slight since leaving England.

The cup is bitter, it takes away her breath. She stands in the doorway gasping, blinded by the glaring light of day. A victim at the shrine of truth, self condemned, self accused.

It is thus that Carol finds her, gazing tragically at the departing figure of Elizabeth Kachin.

"What's up?" he asks, seeing her distress.

"I have told Elizabeth," she says slowly, "what I am."

Quinton bites his lip with annoyance.

"I should not have thought even you could have committed such an egregious act of folly!"

"I could not help myself. Elizabeth thought me so good, so different, and her words seared my conscience. Ah! you smile, no wonder. It ought to be dead by rights, long ago."

"You poor little thing," he says more tenderly. "But it was very silly, and another time do not let a few miserable scruples overrule your better judgment. After all, Elizabeth is no great loss, but it is always unwise and unnecessary to give yourself away. There! I have done my lecture, come and kiss me."

She flies into his arms.

"It is terrible when you are annoyed with me, Carol. I should like you to think everything I do or say perfection. But then we cannot have all we want in life, and especially such a delightful life as ours. Do you know, however deeply you love, however constant you may prove, you can never realise your ideal. It exists alone in the realms of fancy; it is as unsubstantial as a dream—in fact, it is a dream!"

"Have I disappointed you then?" he asks, with a wounded look.

"Oh, no," raising her eyebrows at the bare idea. "I meant it just the other way—that I have failed to please you in everything. An ideal has no fault, and I appear full of errors. An ideal is something good, holy, perfect. I am bad, unreasonable, foolish."

"You certainly have a way of making a fellow feel a cur without meaning it."

"Have I?" says Eleanor simply.

"Do you ever long to be back in London?" asks Quinton suddenly.

"No—a thousand times no! It is a city of destruction a hell of iniquity, Satan and the Savoy, his satellites Giddy Mounteagle, and——"

"Me!"

"Carol," with deep reproach in her tone, "though my life here with you is one which the 'Elizabeths' of Society shun and condemn, I believe in the peaceful atmosphere, the blessed quiet, and sweet unfretful days, I have been a better woman. When I think of the daily quarrels in Richmond, the frivolous worldly conversations of Giddy and her set, it soothes all suspicion of regret in my heart. Love is my only law, and that is described as chief among virtues."

"Then you are happy. I have brought some solace and light into your days, Eleanor? If I died to-morrow, or was lost from sight, you would look back and say: 'He gave me my dearest hours, my most treasured memories. He brought me from the slough of despond to the sunshine of the east.'"

"Yes," she murmurs, quoting her favourite song:

"If you've heard the East a-callin',
You won't never 'eed naught else."

She snatches up her guitar with the light laugh of a girl.

"No, you won't 'eed nothin' else, but them spicy garlic smells,
An' the sunshine an' the palm-trees, an' the tinkly temple bells."

"Come out for a ride," says Carol, "now it is cooler."

Eleanor's face brightens, her eyes glow. He goes so frequently alone, never even telling her the direction he has taken, and answering shortly when questioned. His suggestion meets with her highest approval.

"We will go by the jungle," she says. "You know my favourite road; not past Elizabeth's hut, since her doors will be closed to me henceforth. I shall miss her friendship when I am alone, but you must not leave me so often now, and we will ask that nice Major Short and Captain Stevenson to come and see us again."

Digitized by Google

"So you are fond of society still," says Quinton smiling, "though you denied it just now."

"Two congenial spirits are not 'society,'" she replies. "That word comprises people in a bulk. But here are the horses. Doesn't Braye du Valle look splendid? I hope if I died you would let him drag me to my grave."

"Don't be gruesome," says Carol.

"Oh! we must take the dog. Where is he? Do go and find him, dear."

"He is such a bothering little beast, we shall be better without him," protests Quinton. "Yesterday he nearly frightened my horse over a precipice, flying into the bushes and fighting with some wild animal. I don't know what it was, but he came out bitten and bleeding. He limped home, leaving a track behind him. Something big rushed away, I shot at it but did not hit it. I don't know how the dog escaped with his life."

"But he is all right to-day, and I want to take him, he is always so busy and amusing," Eleanor persists. "Besides, such a plucky little beggar ought not to be coddled. I think you will find him in my room."

Quinton goes unwillingly. The dog and its vagaries have got on his nerves, though he does not care to own it.

As Eleanor is waiting without she hears the sound of a horse behind, and, turning quickly, is surprised to see a stranger riding up the hill. A tall, handsome woman, well developed, with portly shoulders and large hands. She is riding an immense charger, and whistling gaily. At a second glance Eleanor sees that this masculine young woman is strikingly attractive, her style distinctly original, her figure, though large, splendidly proportioned. She has shiningly white teeth under her curling lips—full, red, and smiling. Her eyes are large, dark, and brilliant, flashing like twin stars under a level brow, with black, almost bushy, eyebrows.

Her complexion is rich and clear, her hair braided in masses under a man's hat. A gun slung over her shoulder gives her a sporting appearance.

She looks curiously at Eleanor's fragile beauty—the contrast between them is marked.

The whistle dies on the stranger's lips, she sets her mouth, averts her head, lashes her steed, and gallops by—never halting till out of sight of the slim woman on Braye du Valle.

"I wonder who she can be?" thinks Eleanor, watching the departing figure so intently that she never notices Carol return with the dog till he speaks:

"What are you looking at?"

His eyes follow the direction of her gaze, but discern only a cloud of dust in the distance.

"A stranger," cries Eleanor excitingly, "a white woman riding alone."

"Really! What was she like?"

"Big, and bold, and handsome. The sort of 'knock you down' woman who balances weights at music-halls in tights. Giddy and Bertie took me once to a box at the Empire; she reminded me of the strong lady in spangles. A magnificent creature, like a splendid animal."

"Oh!" ejaculates Quinton.

"Couldn't you find out who she is, Carol, I would love to know? She gave me such an odd look from her great brave eyes, then, to my astonishment, galloped madly away as if I were going to eat her. She was armed, too, so need not have been afraid, though I don't look much like a savage, do I?"

"I can't see that we need trouble about her."

"She raised my curiosity."

"Simply because of her good looks."

"She was the strangest woman I ever saw. I should like to know more of her."

Quinton jags his horse's mouth angrily, and, calling the dog, rides forward to stop the discussion.

"He has no thought for any woman but me," mentally ejaculates Eleanor, as she follows on Braye du Valle.

She is perfectly satisfied with her lot as she rides beside him, gazing at his handsome profile.

Some sombre-hued birds on the ground fly into the air as they approach. The transformation from dark feathers to brilliant yellow plumage as they spread their wings in flight is pleasing to the eye.

"I love the golden oriole," says Eleanor; "they look like a flash of sunlight. The Eastern birds are very beautiful."

As she speaks there is a low growl from behind.

Simultaneously Eleanor and Carol turn in their saddles, looking sharply at the dog, and then to the thick growth towards which he is stealing, his tail between his legs and his head down.

"I believe that dog is cracked," says Eleanor, calling him back sharply. "I always feel as if some evil spirit were near us when he behaves like that."

"I told you how it would be if we brought him."

"Let us see what he will do."

The dog has taken no heed of her call, but crouches nearer the bushes, bristling all over. Then suddenly he makes a dive into their midst, disappearing from view.

This is followed by a series of shrill barks—the sound as of a dog fighting for its life—a skirmish—a hideous yell—and then—silence.

"Something has killed him!" whispers Eleanor under her breath.

"We had better get on," replies Quinton, "it may be some dangerous beast."

"What! ride off, and perhaps leave the wretched dog mangled and maimed to crawl away and starve? Carol! what are you thinking of?"

She springs to the ground, flings him her reins, and before he realises what she is going to do, rushed into the bushes after her pet.

"Eleanor, are you mad?" he thunders, already picturing her devoured by some fierce beast.

It is a moment of horrible suspense. When she emerges, her face scratched by the low boughs, bearing tenderly the limp body of the terrier, torn and bleeding.

"He is quite dead," she says sorrowfully, tears standing in her eyes. "I can see the marks of teeth on his throat."

"Poor little beggar! Do you know you too might be dead at this moment for the sake of recovering the lifeless body of a dog? You must be off your head, Eleanor, to do such an utterly insane thing. Whatever were you thinking of?"

"I was excited—my blood was up. I am like that," she answers apologetically.

They ride silently home.

"We shall miss him," sighs Eleanor at last.

"Who? The dog?"

"Yes. We must let Captain Stevenson know."

"I wonder what animal killed him?"

"I saw nothing, only I fancy I heard a rustle in the trees to my right, and the sound of a horse's hoofs scampering towards the jungle. It may have been only imagination, or perhaps the stalwart lady with the fine eyes was hovering near us."

Quinton's face blanches. He turns to her sharply:

"If you did imagine it, I wish you would not romance."

Eleanor is sorry she has told him, since he appears anxious and uncomfortable. He has never been quite the same since his wrestle with the masked man. He is easily startled and alarmed. She blames herself inwardly for want of discretion, and reassures him with a smile.

"Oh! it was nothing, dearest; if anyone had been riding I must have seen him—I mean—her."

Eleanor knows this is not the case, but seeing Carol's relief at the words, does not regret them.

"We must expect adventures now and again," she continues cheerfully, trying to throw off her depression.

"I shall never forget that night," says Carol, "when I rode away from you in the dark. I did wish I was on Charing Cross Station."

Digitized by Google

"It was too bad of me; I might have had the sense not to pursue you, sheer idiotcy on my part."

"Has it ever struck you, Eleanor, to wonder how long we shall go on living in this out-of-the way hole?"

She catches her breath.

"No, Carol. I am quite contented to be here, though I suppose in time you will weary of the place, and we shall move elsewhere. Yours is rather a roving spirit, I fear, never happy for long in one spot. I feel rooted to this restful retreat, but directly you tire of it, only say the word, and I will follow you to the end of the world. We have our home here, and there is plenty of sport for you, so I expect we shall jog along for a while!" with a feeble attempt at a laugh. Any signs of discontent on Carol's part fill her with vague dread and suspense.

"Would it not seem strange," he continues, "to go back to England and be respectable? Imagine yourself in a prim little village, posing as a good young widow, playing Lady Bountiful to the poor, and being called on by the county magnates, while I lived a virtuous bachelor life in the dreary precincts of Clifford's Inn."

"Apart! Us apart!" gasps Eleanor.

"My love, I was only 'supposing.' But isn't the idea ludicrous, quite too funny and absurd? You romanced first, I am only following your lead. I have heard respectability termed 'the curse of pleasure.' It kills enjoyment, breeds hypocrisy, fosters discontent, revolutionises Bohemia!"

Eleanor dislikes his flippancy. The picture he has drawn bewilders her. The thought of life without Carol is hideous, impossible. Her usual spirits flag.

"Why are you so dull and down, darling?"

"You make me so!"

"It seems, Eleanor, you can never take a joke."

All the glamour of her present happiness has faded under the saddening influence of Carol's "joke!" But she will not own it is that which distresses her.

"I do not see an animal I know and care for bitten to death every day, and that poor little dog was so attached to me. I wish I had given him the extra biscuit he begged for this morning. I told him he was greedy, and hid it away."

She goes sadly into the house and dresses for dinner in a dainty robe of white muslin cut low at the neck, for Quinton's benefit.

The sudden necessity for looking beautiful, and making herself pleasant and fascinating, comes over her like a nightmare. Her throat is parched. Her temples burn.

The gown is soft and clinging, the effect fairylike and picturesque. Quinton never sees her in this simple garb without an exclamation of approval.

She creeps behind him in the verandah, twining her bare arms round his neck.

He looks at her admiringly, as he would at a picture which gladdens the eye for a moment.

"How late it is," she whispers, kneeling beside him. "Cook is frantic, for all our dinner is spoiled; we were out a long while."

Quamina, who only talks a smattering of English, rushes into the verandah, wringing her hands. Her black lips tremble, her eyes start from her head.

"Oh! Sahib! Sahib!" she cries, "the big black devil that tracks the Sahib, he rode up the hill, there!" pointing with outstretched fingers.

Quinton starts to his feet.

"Where?" he asks, looking out but seeing nothing. "What do you mean?"

But Quamina continues to shake and cry, moaning: "The devil, he has come for the Sahib!"

(To be continued.)

RESULT of PICTURE PUZZLE.

The Puzzle Picture Competition, announced in Short Stories, dated March 14th, has been very successful. All those attempts received up till March 12th were examined together, and the neatest of those correct was sent in by Mr. W. T. Wilson, 84, Warner Road, St. James's Street, Walthamstow, to whom a cheque for £10 has been forwarded. The fifty competitors whose names are appended sent in correct solutions, and have each been awarded a gold plated pencil-case for the neatness of their attempts.

J. E. Miller, 18, Melford Street, Barry, near Cardiff; W. H. Power, 67, Vauxhall Bridge Road, S.W.; Miss B. Perrett, 4, The Cedars, Clapham Common; S. E. Burt, 1, Springfield Gardens, Upper Clapton; G. W. Banks, Wright's Row, Walkington, Surrey; S. E. Webb, 126, Ashford Street, Shelton, Stoke-on-Trent; Miss S. J. Booth, 24, George Street, Bolton, Lancashire; R. Thomson, 20, Glen Street, Edinburgh; M. F. Gandy, 59, Langley Road, Luton; Mrs. W. Unwin, 13, Cathcart Street, Hall Park, Paddington; Mrs. M. de Mattos, Steamshall, Highgate; Miss E. Blogg, Marsh House, Newbury, Bucks.; W. Richardson, 42, East Road, Egremont, via Carnforth; Miss A. Greenwood, 80, Sewerby Street, Moss Side, Manchester; J. Coulter, 38, Balfour Street, Leith Walk, Edinburgh; P. L. Goddard, 1, Lenobia Mansions, Queen's Club Gardens, North Kensington; George Thomson, 20, Glen Street, Edinburgh; G. T. Somerville, 17A, Great George Street, Westminster; O. L. Lacour, 2, Chester Villas, Bridgeman Road, Teddington; T. Bonell, Pengwern, Glynfield Road, Harlesden; Mrs. Calder, 9, Bowhill Terrace, Goldenacre, Edinburgh; J. Thornton, 79, Dashwood Road, Stewart's Road; W. C. Houghton, 75, Highbury Quadrant, N.; Mrs. Le Hedchins, 27, Ecclesbourne Road, Thornton Heath, Surrey; H. Powell, Southill Park, Biggleswade, Beds.; A. E. Bowles, 35, Weston Street, Bradford; C. Walters, 2, Frederick Place, Hereson Road, Ramsgate; W. Gill, 78, Salisbury Road, Cathays, Cardiff; Miss B. C. Smythe, St. Ann's House, Lewes; Miss M. Harney, 15, Lorwayne Road, St. John's Hill, S.W.; F. B. Herring, 20, Birchin Lane, Cornhill; A. Laing, 212, Queen's Road, Dalston; A. Hook, 9, Canterbury Place, Lambeth Road, S.E.; Mrs. E. Smith, The Rectory, Carr Hill, Gateshead; Professor Michael, 48, High Street, Ramsgate; Miss C. M. V. Morris, St. Clare's Cottage, Pauhsaph, near Holywell, N. Wales; J. Wallace, Garrick Club, 132, Prince's Street, Edinburgh; G. D. Strachan, 39, Clifton Place, Shipley Yorks; G. K. Stubbs, 29, Park Street, Macclesfield; T. Somers, 39, Queen's Square, Bloomsbury, W.C.; W. J. Young, Beetham, Milnthorpe, Westmoreland; F. J. Gill, 49, King William Street, London Bridge; J. W. Lewis, Oswald Road, Oswestry, Salop; H. Jones, 74, Victoria Dock Road, E.; W. C. Sellin, 196, Cheltenham Road, Bristol; W. Robinson, 3, Landseer Street, Battersea Park Road; H. J. Payne, 9, Eastbourne Road, Trowbridge, Wiltshire; Mrs. F. T. Townsend, Thirlwell Mount, Sheffield; Mrs. Doherty, 12, Moss Street, Garston, near Liverpool.

Here is the key:

37	48	26	8	15	33	46	17
81	66	51	31	22	71	57	4
13	54	63	69	42	19	6	73
35	2	67	24	9	39	45	59
20	30	27	87	83	50	85	76
88	16	43	86	65	79	61	7
53	55	78	1	10	52	23	18
64	38	74	11	56	84	34	12
58	40	28	47	72	3	21	29
25	70	82	60	75	62	80	44
5	32	77	98	68	14	64	41

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 9d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SEWING MACHINES.

A £3 3s. Lockstitch Machine for £1 1s.

SPECIAL SALE FOR 21 DAYS.

How is it done? By buying in immense quantities for cash. By selling in immense quantities. By getting recommendations from everyone. How many Machines does an ordinary shop keep or sell in a week? Perhaps three or four. How many do we sell in a day? In one day alone we sold 2,700; and we have got the orders and will prove it to anyone. There is an enormous profit on Sewing Machines. There must be. A man cannot keep a shop and give credit, take monthly instalments and risk, unless there is. Owing to the enormous quantity we buy we get Machines for next to nothing, and if we can sell on an average 500 Machines a day at 1/- each profit, it pays us. You can go to a shop and pay £3 3s. for a Machine, or you can come to us and get one just as good for 21/-. Come and see them and prove it for yourselves, or send for one of our lists and read the hundreds of testimonials sent to us. No one can do what we are doing. Your neighbours will tell you it is impossible. Well, write to any of the hundreds of customers we give the names and addresses of. Don't take our word for it. Prove it true or false. We offer for the next 21 days to send to anyone who cuts out the coupon below and sends it to us with 21/- one of our SUPERB FAMILY LOCKSTITCH SEWING MACHINES, very best quality and fully guaranteed, with best boat-shaped shuttle, patent winder, stop feed, large fly-wheel on handsome stand. These Machines can be used either by hand or treadle. Every Machine tested and sent out packed free of charge for 21/-. Can you get such an offer anywhere else? No. Don't miss this grand opportunity, which is only offered for 21 days, during our Special Sale. No reduction on quantity, as we do not see more than 1/- clear profit on each Machine. Extra Needles, 1/- dozen; extra Spools, 3 for 6d.; Can of Special Oil, 6d.; extra Cotton, 1/- dozen reels. Remember what we offer. A full-size Family Lockstitch Sewing Machine, perfect and packed free of charge for 21/- if ordered within 21 days. Coupon as below to be cut out and sent with order. Don't buy a Machine anywhere else till you have see our list. Specimen of work, full particulars, and testimonials sent on receipt of 1d. for postage.

THEOBALD'S SPECIAL SALE COUPON.

SHORT STORIES.

This Coupon entitles holder to One Machine as above for 21/-.

(Signed) J. THEOBALD & Co.

MESSRS. J. THEOBALD & CO.,

Wholesale Manufacturers,

19, Farringdon Road, LONDON, E.C.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free.—Address, H. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

HAVE YOU A POST CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,

HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery.

The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied, but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post Cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

WHERE DOES IT COME FROM?

Where does strength come from? Where does energy come from? The word "strength" is derived from the Saxon, the word "energy" from the Greek. But that isn't the main point. It is not words we want to talk about now, it is the thing itself. We all know what we mean by it. Where does it come from? What makes it? Let us try to get at that. Right under my hand are two letters, with fifty more within reach, all complaining of a want of strength and energy. Why, what's coming to ail people? Was this the form things were in when England was some generations younger?

"I felt," says one, "no life or energy for anything. This was in July, 1892. I was below par and wasting away. My appetite was poor, and I had a loathing and disgust for food of every sort. No matter how simple the meal was, I had heaviness and pain in the chest after eating it. With this was pain at the pit of the stomach, which nothing that I took relieved. My hands and feet were cold and clammy; the blood in my veins seemed to have no heat in it.

"Then I began to lose flesh rapidly, and got so weak I could hardly walk. One day in May, 1893, whilst visiting a relative at Everton, I vomited over a pint of blackish blood. In great alarm I saw a doctor, who said it was an accumulation of blood in the stomach. In this condition I remained until February last, when I read in the Gymrcig, a Welsh newspaper, about the efficacy of Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup in cases like mine. I got the medicine from Mr. Williams, chemist, Westminster Road, and after taking it a few days was greatly relieved. I felt like eating, and what I ate sat upon my stomach easily. It digested, and gave me no trouble or distress. I can now eat anything, and am well and strong as ever. (Signed) R. M. Davies, 31, St. Hilda Street, Westminster Road, Liverpool, July 25th, 1894."

Here is the second letter. "In the early part of 1884," it runs, "I was so heavy, languid, and weak that I couldn't imagine what ailed me. My mouth tasted bad. I was often sick, vomiting a dark, bitter fluid, and my teeth and gums were covered with phlegm, so thick it nearly choked me. I couldn't eat, and my stomach was puffed and swollen, and there was a horrible gnawing pain in it. My kidneys troubled me, too, and I had difficulty in voiding the secretion from them. Sometimes the pain low down in my back was so cruel I couldn't straighten myself out. I dared not eat. I loathed the very sight of food, and for days together I never took a bite. I got so weak I could scarcely stand, and so thin that my clothes ceased to fit me—they merely hung on me.

"I took all sorts of drugs and had medical treatment without benefit.

"In March, 1889, after having suffered five years, a book was left at my shop telling about Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. I had no faith in advertised medicines, but I got a bottle at Mr. Thompson's Drug Stores, Manchester Road, and after taking it a few days my appetite revived, and my food agreed with me. I kept on taking it, and soon all symptoms of disease left me, and I got back my strength. I will answer any inquiries about my case. (Signed) R. Adams, 24, West Street, Oldham, Lancs., September 11th, 1894."

What ailed these men on their own showing? What ails millions more, whether they understand it or not? Indigestion, dyspepsia, and the ailments that grow out of it—that and nothing else. Hence weakness, loss of strength and energy, of course. For where does strength come from? It comes from digested food. And what enables one to digest his food? Mother Seigel's Syrup. A host of witnesses testify to that. So you have the question and the right answer.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL JUST STARTED.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 380. FOR WEEK ENDING APRIL 11TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

WHAT NEXT?

M-E-grants 0 2 C B-4 leaving for 4-n lands that they R 40-fied with ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.

If your N-R-G and vigour R D-K-ing Y not try the F-E-K-C of ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.

It is S-N-tial when U R feeling X, X-I-ted, and P-vish, that you keep your I on ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.

A sick headache 12-nt X-10 d over many minutes if 5 my box of ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.

If F-8 is not smiling B-9-ly on your L-th, there's 0 can 20 like a dose of BEECHAM'S PILLS.

U can't S-tim-8 the good F-ects that M-N-8 from a regular use of ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.

It is X-asper-8-ting in the L-M-N-tary stage of indigestion 2 find U R without ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.

When stomachic pains W up, there's 0 can X-L an M-E-D-8 course of BEECHAM'S PILLS.

If I C P-ple J-ded and nervous I soon make them C-rene and G-nial with ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.

If U R troubled with an X-S of Bile, there's no Rem-E-D so X-P-D-ent or cer-10 as... ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.

If U R a Y-T-brown colour O-N to liver complaint, U 0 2 S-A to take a course of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.

E-rad-E-K-8 Biliousness and O-D-S Flat-U-os-E-T by Y-s courses of BEECHAM'S PILLS.

In keeping up an X-U-B-rance of spirits U can't B Y Y, there-4 U R asked to take ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.

If U don't wish to D-V-8 from Lth U 0 cer-10-ly, B-4 an X-E-jen-C occurs, 2 try ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.

By O-B-D-ence 2 instructions, your ailments will B taken B-4 by the op-R-A-tions of... ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.

U-ll find this U-lo-G no M-T talk, B-gin 2-day 2 C U R benefited by that X-L-C-R Rem-E-Dy ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.

Digitized by Google

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Direct from the Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in the world, have secured beyond a doubt the ADMIRATION OF THE WORLD. Being Absolutely Without an Equal Anywhere for Stylish Appearance, Durability, and Actual Money Value. 10/6

TWO GOLD MEDALS AWARDED.

These Costumes have received the highest praise from the leading journals of the day, and are justly regarded by all purchasers as Even Better than Advertised.

Each Costume scientifically cut, tailor-made, and beautifully finished in an exceedingly smart mode, as illustration. The design consists of full wide Godet skirt with belt, also very neat bodice with full front and broad box-pleat down centre, trimmed bold silk cord and three large buttons. Collar and cuffs outlined silk cord; saddle and sleeves lined.

Price complete only 10/6, safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

Sizes in stock fit figures measuring 34, 36, or 38 in. round bust under arms, skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front; larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

THE JOHN NOBLE

COSTUMES FOR YOUNG MISSES

are made in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, and trimmed military braid as illustration. A large box-pleat down the centre of the linen bodice, and a fancy pocket at each side of the skirt, complete a charming design at FROM 8/6 these prices:

Lengths	35	38	42	46	50 inches.
Prices	8/6	9/6	10/9	12/-	13/6 each.

Each costume safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra

KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS

are also supplied in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, with saddle top, long full sleeves, and pocket, at following prices: FROM 1/6

Lengths	21	24	27	30	33	36	39	42	45 in.
Prices	1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-	5/6 ea.

Postage 1½d. extra. Lengths stated above are from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front.

COLOURS: Any of the above garments can be supplied in Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Bronze Green, Electric Blue, Ruby, Dark Cinnamon, Fawn, or Grey.

The JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE in which the above garments are made is a fabric of world-wide fame and durability, measuring 52in. wide. The full Dress Length of Six Yards can be supplied for 7/6, or any length at 1/3 the yard. Colours as above. 7/6

PATTERNS, also FASHION SHEETS of numerous other designs in Ladies' and Children's Costumes, etc., sent Post Free on application. Please mention "Short Stories" when ordering.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

MRS. LAWRENCE

A Farmer's Wife, writes from Mid-Rasen, Lincolnshire: "For a long time I suffered severely from

INDIGESTION

And WIND IN THE STOMACH, and had to call in the doctor. Having prescribed for me some time he said, 'I can do nothing more for you.' My husband urged me to try your WIND PILLS; he brought me a box and I took them. In a few days I was quite well and able to get up, and now enjoy excellent health. Publish my name and address."

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills

Being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, Mild, and Tonic, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

ALL SUFFERERS from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND ON THE STOMACH, BILIOUSNESS, SICK HEADACHE, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, etc.,

should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

Of all Chemists, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for Price from PAGE WOODCOCK, LINCOLN.

TRILENE REGD. TABLETS. THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20

See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Store, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 15

April 11, 1896.

S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A.D." Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2 ... £6 per cent. | Feb. 1 ... £7 per cent.
March 2 ... ... £6 per cent.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS,
5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

THIN BUSTS

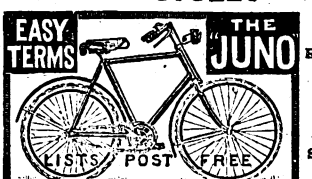
Quickly transformed and a good figure permanently obtained by a perfectly harmless, simple, and inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. For particulars, free, send stamped envelope in confidence to "Madame B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

"JUNO" CYCLES

Are the very Best.



JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb. JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

BLUSHING

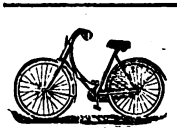
Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87 Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.



AJAX CYCLES FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN

ARE RICH VALUE. 25 to 30 per cent. saved and carriage paid.

IMMENSE STOCK, NEW AND SECOND HAND.

Easy Terms from 10s. per Month. Lists free.

Now Open.—LARGE CYCLING SCHOOLS, at 42, High Street, Camden Town, LONDON, and at Liverpool.

BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W., and 45, Everton Road, Liverpool.

No. 380.—One Penny. April 11, 1896.

S S SHORT STORIES

DIANA.

Straight as an Indian arrow, large-limbed and tall, with that peculiar white skin which does not tan nor grow sallow: the first Diana was not more superbly made than this one. A combination of masculine strength and feminine beauty—not feminine enough to be wholly woman, nor masculine enough to be wholly man. Her dress was half one and half the other. A man's black slouch hat covered her head, and a man's black coat protected her shoulders; a petticoat of thick, dark stuff hid the rest of her graceful form down to the ankles of her boot-shod feet.

She rode a huge black stallion, a creature as splendid and fiery and scornful as the woman that fearlessly bestrode his back.

She was Diana; the horse's name was "Satan." Diana loved Satan and Satan loved Diana. It was said that neither of them loved any other living thing, and certainly no other living thing loved either of them.

Diana pulled the rein and Satan stopped with one forefoot uplifted. They looked like an ebony-statued Centaur. Before them the sun was setting—sinking—sliding down a little and a little into the farthermost edge of the plain.

The halo of the sky slipped down to the earth and spread over the hot ground and the brown dead clover. It crept to the feet of the Centaur, and over its black glossy hide, and stole into the face of the woman. The scorn, the defiance faded out of it and softened the hard lines of masculine force, the Centaur was transfigured.

A broad-branched oak—the only tree for miles round—stood near; a man, close followed by a sheep dog, stepped from behind. He made no noise and was not seen. He was sunburnt, and unshorn, and roughly dressed. There was an odd twitching of the muscles about his mouth, and as he watched the process of transformation in the woman's face, its spirit leapt into his own.

He reached forth his hands and cried out, "Diana."

Was it the reflection of the sunset in her cheeks, or simply returning animation, or did she hear?

She touched the rein and Satan bounded forward, the ebony Centaur was a passive transfiguration no longer. It was again the splendid, scornful defiant creature, hating humanity and smiting the earth with contemptuous feet.

The man with the sheep dog looked after her a little while, then walked slowly away, taking an opposite direction.

A voice, both jest and jeer, struck his ears.

"See, Bill, looks as if he was walkin' home in the shadow of his coffin, and Shep sneeks along as though he had been stealing sheep."

The man to whom the words were addressed looked out, then dropped his eyes and answered in a lower tone and softer voice than the other: "Don't joke him to-night, Brassy, he's in one of his bad ways. I wouldn't wonder if he'd seen that woman again. It's enough to make one think she's a ghost haunting him the way he looks after he's seen her."

An hour later the moon was full, and the men sat outside the cabin, two of them taking their after-supper smoke. The mysterious calm of the breezeless night had put upon them its spell of silence. Bill sat with bowed head, and whittled mechanically on a small piece of wood, while Dainty held a cigarette caressingly between his thumb and forefinger, and blew contented little puffs of smoke away from his mouth. Brassy tugged and puffed at an old pipe, and watched Bill from under the rim of his hat.

Suddenly, Dainty jumped up and threw away his cigarette. "Boys," said he, "let's take the dogs over to the river and tree a wild-cat."

Brassy pocketed his pipe immediately. "Right, me lord, I'm yours, when it's wild-cats you talk. And if Bill wants to go, the triumvirate's agreed; if he don't—

"He may sigh to the winds, to the Goddess Dinna,
But his days they will end on the isle of St. Helena!"

He sang the lines of the old-fashioned, long-out-of-date song in harsh, unmusical voice, and it might have been the melody that made Bill start so suddenly that he overturned the stool on which he sat; it might have been the moonlight that made him pale.

An hour, two hours, three, of tramping, and not a wild cat was amiable enough to tree and be killed. Tired out, they started home.

"Listen, don't you hear a curious sound?" said Dainty. They stopped and listened, but only for a moment.

"Merciful God!" shouted Brassy, "run for your lives, it's King's River overflowing!"

They sprang forward and ran swiftly in spite of brush, and briars, and many stumblings. "If we could only get to the slough first," panted Brassy.

The dry bed of the slough was only a few hundred feet beyond, but a wall of water higher than their heads was rolling down with terrible swiftness upon them. The water from the river overtook them and lapped round their feet and up to their waists. It was useless now to try to reach the slough, impossible to cross it if they could; that crackling muffled roar was too near. They were between two floods; it was a moment to act without deciding. With one accord Bill and Brassy caught Dainty and hoisted him into the forks of a large sapling, by the side of which they had stopped, and scudded up after him. A minute later they were in the midst of a mile-wide waste of fast-rising water. Behind them was the terrible, swift, rolling river, whose head was in the heart of eternal snows; before them the slough, over which they had walked dry-footed three hours before, rolled another river, swift flowing, muddy, ice-cold, and deadly deep. The sapling swayed and bent with their weight, sometimes dipping them into the chilling water, and shook and shivered to its topmost twig when some floating object struck against it.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Higher rose the flood and swathed their soaked garments about them; it was cold—bitingly cold—and the night was so balmy and warm, and the moonlight soft and beautiful.

"Partners," said Dainty very gently, "if I don't get out of this, and you do, divide my sheep between you. There's none akin to me, nobody in the world to shed for me if I die.

"I feel, somehow, that it will be that way—you two will get out, and I won't."

"And I feel, somehow, that nary one of us ever did sich a mean trick, and we ain't going to commence now."

Dainty smiled a faint little smile, like a pleased child. The moon went down at last and left them in the twilight of the dawn.

Still the water rose, and still they clung closer to the sapling, Bill holding on as tightly as either of the others.

In sheer weariness of living we may cry out for death to come, but when it comes to us and looks square in our faces, we would rather it waited a little longer; not much longer, maybe—perhaps only until we have accomplished one other thing that we would not leave undone—but surely a little longer.

When the first red streak of day shot down into the mountain mists and glowed through the clear atmosphere of the plains, only from shoulders up were the men above the water.

And then everything on the plains before them was lighted up and transformed by the peculiar mirage which was one of the characteristics of the region. Objects, which a moment before would have been indiscernible with magnifying aid, stood out clear and distinct to the naked eye and with a nearness that was startling. The huts of the scattering sheep camps were a city of palaces in air, streeted like Venice, with water, and surrounded with gardens and trees.

The hut, which stood half a mile directly beyond their camp, was standing on the top of theirs with inverted roof. The sheep walked on stilts, and the legs of the cattle and horses were twenty feet long at least. Bill watched it with an interested, studying expression in his eyes. "I doubt," said he, "if there is another place where these peculiar phenomena of mirage appear." It was the first that either of them had spoken for more than an hour.

"I've been figuring a little, mentally," he went on, "on the water question, and, according to my reckoning, we have about thirty-five minutes before the muddy stuff gets into our nostrils."

Brassy made a grimace at this information, and Dainty closed his eyes and whispered: "Dear God, Thy will be done." His face was purple—spotted with cold.

For another five minutes there was silence; then Brassy started so perceptibly that the sapling trembled and made ripples about their necks.

In a terrified whisper, he repeated the words from Revelations: "'And when he had opened the third seal I heard the third voice say, Come and see. And I beheld, and lo! a black horse, and he that sat upon him had a pair of balances in his hand.' And I see the black horse and the rider with the balances; look straight ahead of your eyes, and see them yourself."

They both looked as directed, and beheld a most singular phenomenon. Fifteen or twenty feet above the ground, like a black cameo set in air, startlingly distinct was a giant black horse and a black rider, with something in his hand. It was headed towards the river and in the attitude of a long swinging lope.

As instantly as the mirage had appeared as instantly it vanished. Quicker than the wink of an eye the city of palaces dissolved into the huts of the scattering sheep-camps, the sheep were brown ants running over the plain, and the colossal phantom of the air a moving black dot on the earth. The faces of both Bill and Dainty suddenly paled. One thought he had seen into the unseen world, the other knew he had not.

Brassy and Dainty kept their eyes strained upon the horse; Bill kept his as resolutely away; yet he knew as surely as they, that it was coming towards them, and very fast. Once the horse stopped, and the rider swept the river border with a field-glass, pocketed it again, and came on faster than before. Above the roar of the water they could hear the clattering ring of the hoofs as they sent the dust and clods flying from the brown earth.

At last, with sweat-wet flanks and foam-speckled mouth, Satan stopped short on the high bank of the slough, and Diana, shading her eyes with her right hand was looking straight at the faces in the water.

Brassy tried to wave his hand and give a shout, but only succeeded in making a little gurgling noise in the water, Dainty murmured: "Thank God!" Bill's face turned a chalky grey. He made no other sign. Diana took in with one swift, surveying glance, the terrible situation of the men—the dangerous, floating débris lodging against the tops of the undergrowth beneath the water, and the treacherous slough at her feet—then dashed away up the stream.

Dainty looked at her with a sort of helpless resignation. Brassy heaved a great sigh. "I wish she hadn't gone; it's no use, she never can get help here in time to do us any good. By Heavens! she's coming to us, God bless her!"

"God save her," said Dainty.

A hundred yards or so above them, Diana was hastily throwing off her boots and heaviest outer garments; taking the bridle from the horse's ears, she slipped it down over his nose and flung it on the ground by the garments, and, sticking her heels into his flanks with the abandon of a vaquero, tried to rush him over the river bank. He snorted and reared up on his hind feet, standing so straight that Diana had to clasp her arms round his neck to keep from sliding off behind. He was a wonderfully trained animal, and he never before refused to obey Diana—the river terrified him out of his training and loyalty. Again she tried to rush him over, and again he plunged and reared; snorting with terror, he whirled his huge body round and headed away from the river.

Diana wore a large silk handkerchief round her neck; this she untied and twisted about his nose for a rein; then whirled round and came dashing back at full speed. Just at the river bank she leant forward and shouted to him something in a foreign tongue, and over they went horse and woman into the flood, and sank in it out of sight. The men watching forgot their own peril.

Digitized by Google

"Father in Heaven, save her!" whispered Dainty. It was but a moment until they rose to the surface, and struck out diagonally across the current, straight towards the heads in the water. The long black hair of the woman had tumbled down to her waist, and made a black cloak for her wet white shoulders. Her arms, reached forward to guide the horse, shone ivory white in the new-born sunbeams; a Nereid guiding her sea-horse back to the sea.

Diana guided Satan by patting the sides of his face, first with one hand, then with the other, caressing his neck with her bare, perfect arms, and talking coaxingly, encouragingly to him, all the time keeping his nose pointed directly towards the heads.

Nearer and nearer—she is within speaking distance—"Billy," the voice was strangely sweet, and soft, and rich, commingling like a prayer and a command, "when we get even with you pull yourself on behind me." He caught the back of the saddle, and with much difficulty pulled himself upon the horse as the strangely sweet voice had bidden him; no other word was spoken. The horse sank a little deeper and struggled a little harder to swim with his doubled burden.

At a point considerably below them the high bank flattened out and the water ran over, making a sort of swamp; to this Diana steered. The moment they touched land Bill slipped to the ground as quickly as his numbed limbs would let him. Diana handed him a small flask of brandy, which she took from a pocket in her queerly fashioned toilet. Their hands touched as he took it, and one instant their eyes looked into each other's.

A momentary blush spread over both faces, leaving them whiter by contrast.

She started Satan back up the slough, and Bill stood grasping the litttle silver flask, with hands too shaky to get it to his mouth. Was it the cold numbness that made him tremble so? He was a very steady-nerved man, but he was very cold. The numbness and the trembling got into his brain now, and a ringing in his ears, and from some far-off land, in some far-off time he heard a voice—his or some other's—saying: "We will neither speak to the other, nor of the other, till one of us is dead."

This time the horse made no resistance, but leapt over the bank and struck bravely out into the current. Diana guided him carefully as before, and her face was as pale and as set, but the illumination of a heroic resolve had faded out of it, leaving only the patience of self-imposed duty. Relieved of Bill's weight the sapling slightly raised, and the shoulders of Brassy and Dainty were above water. Eagerly they watched the approaching Nereid; she was bringing them deliverance or more sudden death. Once the horse swerved in his course, and once the brush of a floating limb left a long red scratch on Diana's arm, when she pushed it out of their way.

"Brassy will come next; the tree will hold up the lighter man the longest," the voice might have come from the mouth of a sphinx so hard and lifelessly calm it was.

Thus it was in spite of Brassy's assertions that both of Dainty's partners went out and left him.

Brassy was landed safely by the side of Bill, who apparently had not moved a step. He still held the silver flask, but he did not look into Diana's face, nor did she into his. When she started back on the third perilous venture, he heard again, in the ringing of his ears, the voice from that far-away time: "We will neither of us speak to the other, nor of the other, till one of us is dead."

Again the brave horse leapt over into the cold, stilli-rising flood, and horse and rider again went out of sight. They were longer coming up this time, and made the way slower and with much greater effort. Satan was tired and Diana too. She did not speak when nearing Dainty, to tell him to get on behind her, only motioned that he should, with a wave of her hand. When they were safely started homewards Brassy could not forbear a glad shout, and flung out his draggle-sleeved arms with a joyous "Hooray!"

In the swiftest current, not more than thirty yards from the shore, all at once the horse stopped swimming and they went down, so suddenly that Bill and Brassy rubbed their eyes, thinking their senses must have cheated them. Drowning people rise three times to the surface; these did not come up at all. Once Dainty's hand pushed through the water. Bill started to it, Brassy held him back.

"Don't, Bill, it's no use," he said.

Bill fought to get free, and in the scuffle both came near falling into the slough.

Presently Bill's hands dragged limply to his sides. "You're right, it's no use; go for help, I'll stay and watch for them."

Many hours afterwards, men came with a boat, and grappling-hooks, but not until the flood abated were the bodies found.

Dainty was hauled out first; when Brassy saw him a queer little cry escaped him. He took his partner's head in his hands, and the tears ran streaming down his cheeks; it was the first time in his life that he could not speak. Diana was brought out next, and laid on the hot sand by the side of Dainty. The water had washed her hair down on each side of her head, crossed it under her chin, and swathed it round her neck, making a dripping black frame for her face. Thou art a mighty artist, Death!

Bill stood silently looking down upon her; suddenly a trembling seized him, like a dumb animal that has struck a blow over its brain.

Out of that far-off life he heard his own voice saying: "We will neither of us speak to the other, nor of the other, till one of us is dead."

"Diana, Diana!" the words were a pitying cry, hoarse and full of pain; perhaps none but the dead heard. The men were very busy.

The bodies were buried on a large knoll, not far from the spot, where they were dragged from the river. At the head of Diana's grave Bill put up a redwood cross on which he carved with his knife, and stained the letters red, "Diana." And under the lonely name these lines:

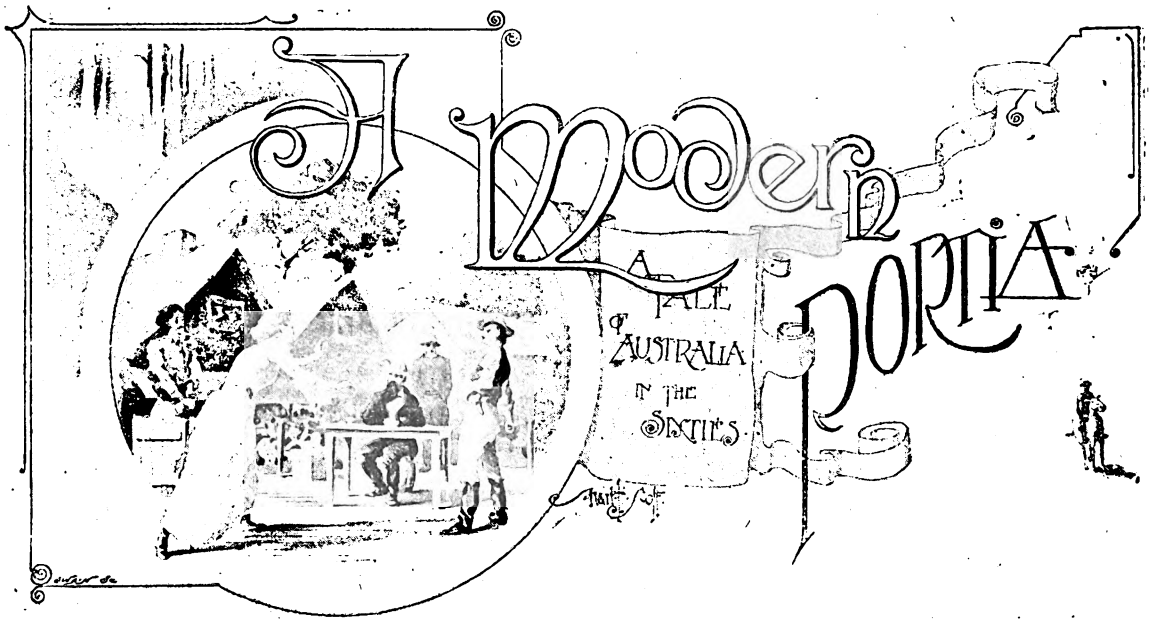
> In every form of the human
> Some hint of the highest dwells.

It was all over at last, except the nightmare horror of it; and Bill and Brassy again sat out in the moonlight by their cabin. Bill leant against the wall. Brassy wrestled with the old pipe until he could not any longer endure the silence, and blurted out his thought. "I wonder what made her do it."

Slowly Bill answered: "She used to be my wife."

Madge Morris.

Digitized by Google



It fell upon him as a bolt from the blue. Never had such a contingency entered his mind. So remote was the probability of comparative poverty, that the knowledge of his father's failure to avert long-impending ruin, and of that father's cowardice, fear to face the future, inability to cope with his enormous financial difficulties, and want of the stamina and courage necessary to undertake the rebuilding of the wreck of his shattered fortune, came upon young Harry Sanderson with a crash. For a little while he was as one dazed. The thunder of the revelation dinned in his ears, shutting out the power of thought. And scarcely had he understood its full import to himself and his own future career, before the second bolt struck him—his father, knowing that the ultimate result would inevitably be irretrievable ruin, had shot himself.

The son of the once great London merchant found himself professionless, untrained for any work suitable to his refined tastes, a poor man! As a boy he had been brought up amidst luxurious surroundings. He had ever been a dutiful son to his parents, but no work had ever been expected of him, and his frank, genial nature had won him many friends. Nevertheless, he was not the sort of man to ask assistance of the latter. Nothing lay open to him save emigration; and, but for his mother, who merely retained a paltry sum of eight hundred pounds, and whom he felt bound—although he knew not how—to support, he would have taken this step, shipped to Australia, and sought a living there.

But a week after his father's death, that mother whom he loved so well lay on her death-bed. After bidding him fight his way in the world, never despairing, never fainting by the way, but always looking forward to the goal of success, she smiled up at him through her tears. He imprinted a long kiss upon the already chill forehead, and her gentle spirit passed away from its earthly tenement. The third bolt had struck him.

He fell upon his knees beside the bed, in mute agony. He was alone in very truth now.

After seeing her laid to rest in a laurel-covered grave, in the churchyard at Brocklau, the country seat which once he expected to inherit, he realised his effects—bringing him in a sum of between eight and nine hundred pounds—and booked a passage to Australia, the country where gold and sunshine were reported to be equally plentiful; and a few weeks later he sailed in a crowded ship.

* * * * *

Harry Sanderson arrived in Melbourne after an uneventful voyage. For a fortnight he knocked about the then rising township, undecided as to where to proceed. The gold boom was at its height, and upon falling in with an old miner who had made his "pile," he soon decided upon his course of action. From this man he purchased a complete turn-out, consisting of a cart, a couple of horses, tents, tools, cooking utensils, and all that comprises a miner's swag, at a very low price—in addition to a considerable quantity of excellent advice, which the good-natured miner threw in—and started upon his tedious journey, along the rough, beaten track, to the goldfields.

The first night he camped at a creek, where he saw two tents had already been erected. He was surprised, later, to see that they were occupied by a man and a little girl, apparently father and daughter. He saw the pair casting glances of envy upon his comfortable turn-out, and noted how hungrily their eyes wandered towards the fire that he had kindled, whereon he was grilling a steak, the aroma from which was borne in their direction upon the warm evening air. Partly out of compassion, and partly from a sense of loneliness, he stepped forward and asked them to join him in his meal.

They readily accepted the invitation. After the viands had been discussed, the stranger acquainted Harry Sanderson with the last chapter of his life. He was in very low water, he said, at the present time; he was a well-connected man, and had been in a large way of business in Sydney, when a ship in which he had placed the bulk of his capital, went down; and his creditors, pouncing down upon him, had turned him out with but a few shillings in his possession. His wife was dead, and he had not a friend in the world with whom he could leave his child, consequently he was forced to take the little one with him. They had walked from Melbourne, his last coin going in passage money from Sydney, and they had to subsequently depend for food upon the generosity of the travellers they met.

Digitized by Google

Harry Sanderson never doubted the plausibility of this story; but sat, with his legs crossed, puffing the smoke from his briarwood pipe, listening with the deepest attention. The man, whose name was Wilson, had certainly interested him not a little by the recital of his troubles, but the girl—whose age could not have been more than twelve years—with her sunburnt, pretty face, surrounded by a wealth of clustering curls, and her large, blue, beautiful eyes, and red, parted lips, revealing a row of little teeth, most regular and of pearly whiteness, attracted him in some subtle manner which he could not explain satisfactorily even to himself.

At the conclusion of her father's story she spoke out, without a trace of nervousness, and also without a trace of affectation.

"You see, sir," said she, "father is not very strong; and, as I am strong and able, I came with him, in order to help him and look after him. I know, because I am only a girl, I shall be laughed at up at the diggings," she shook her curls, and her eyes danced as she went on, "but I don't care, I'm going to stick to my father."

"You're a very plucky little girl," said Sanderson. But his heart grew cold at the thought of all the evil that this sweet, innocent child would see and hear at the goldfields. She was far too pure and sweet a flower to blossom in such a devilish atmosphere.

She looked up into Sanderson's face in such an appealing manner that his heart went out to her on the spot, and he determined to watch over her with a brother's care.

"You — you will look after my father, sometimes?" she asked. "You are well and strong, and I can see by your face that you are kind."

Something suspiciously like a tear shone in either eye, as, nodding to the child, Sanderson turned to her father. "Mr. Wilson, I can sympathise with you; I too have gone through some trouble, but—as regards money—I am not quite so badly off as you are, and if you'll just allow me to offer you and your daughter a lift and food for the remainder of your journey, I shall be delighted," he said, in his genial way.

David Wilson protested in a half-hearted manner, but consented eventually, as he said, for his daughter's sake. He sprang to his feet and striking his fist upon the stump of a felled tree, he swore that one day he would repay the kindness of the "new chum."

But Sanderson considered himself amply repaid by the company of the child. Her bright eyes were ever shining, her light laugh was ever rippling, and her merry tongue was ever going; so that the journey to the diggings was no longer a jolting drive over a rough, scarce discernable track, but was as a pleasure party, too soon to be broken up, in the estimation of Harry Sanderson.

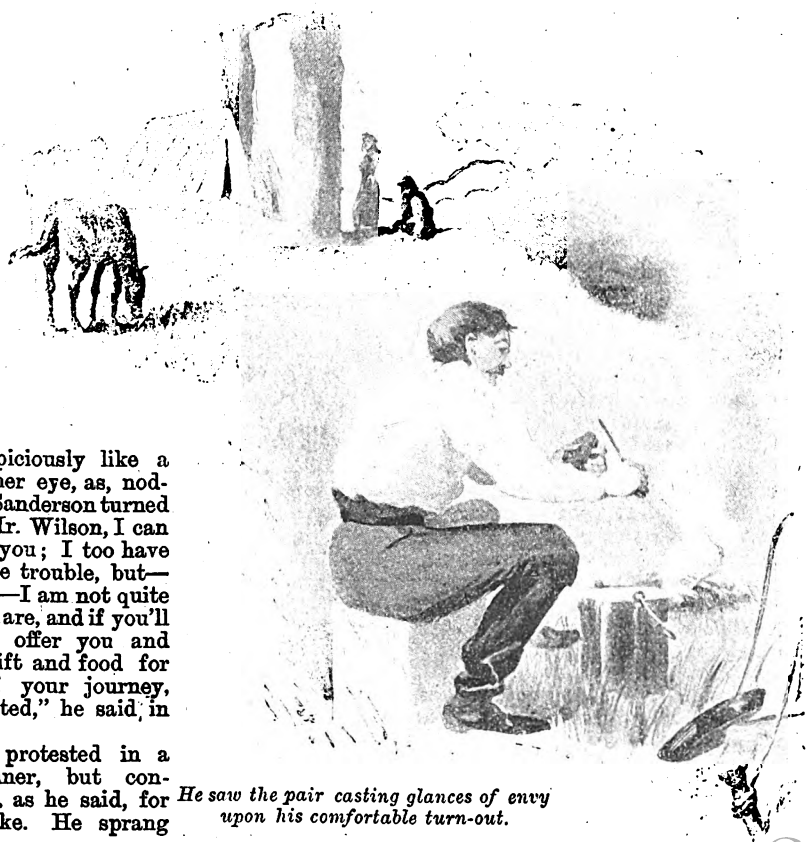
Whilst journeying, Wilson told his companion that he had had considerable experience in gold mining, and to equalise matters and show some return, he suggested that they should enter into partnership, a suggestion that was readily agreed to by Sanderson, and on their arrival at Chamber's Flat, their destination, they pegged out adjoining claims, and erected their tents side by side.

* * * * *

For two years they worked their claims with varying results, but they never found the rich reefs for which they so sanguinely hoped. So by Wilson's advice it was resolved that they should strike their tents and travel farther, and for yet another two years they worked with the same results, in different fields. Then they took to prospecting and exploring a thick belt of country, and eventually discovered the gully, now known as Wilson's Gully.

There was much jubilation at this long awaited turn of affairs. Eva, Wilson's daughter, now grown to womanhood, was especially delighted and enthusiastic, and Harry Sanderson gazed with a vague, indescribable longing upon her beautiful, radiant face; but somehow he dared not look into those great blue eyes, for fear that he might not read the answer which he longed for in them.

Gold! Gold! Gold! They had found it in quantities at last. But the feverish desire for gold, for the gold's sake, no longer held possession of Harry Sanderson. It was solely in the hope of winning this daughter of the Australian plains, this flower of the wild, uncultivated country, that he now longed for the possession of golden nuggets.



He saw the pair casting glances of envy upon his comfortable turn-out.

Digitized by Google

Leaving his partner in charge of their valuable discoveries, Wilson rode to the nearest township to register his claim and obtain the necessary papers from the warden of the goldfields.

Gold! Gold! Gold! The word seemed to ring out bravely to each step of his cantering horse. Untold gold was in his possession now. All that was needed was work to dig it up. And would he not labour to increase, and ever increase, the wealth that awaited the handling? Gold! Gold! Gold! His brain reeled at the thought. The fever, the terrible thirst for gold, had always been upon him, sapping almost every drop of his better nature; but now his avarice governed him, drove him, held him in a fearful grip that there was no fleeing from. Before, he had possessed some mastery over himself, over this lust of gold; but now his power had gone. He was like a puppet in the hands of this terrible greed; his conscience lay in a death-like slumber, he could no longer attempt to struggle against this overwhelming desire for gold, gold, gold.

Great beads of sweat broke out upon his brow as he cantered onwards. Something impelled him to commit a crime for the sake of this gold. He gazed this way and that with hunted, terror-stricken eyes when he drew rein and sought the warden's office.

Instead of taking out the papers in the joint names of himself and Sanderson, as he had agreed to do, he took them out and registered the claim under his own name alone.

It was accomplished. He had committed the crime—and he was safe.

The terror died out of his eyes; his hand scarcely trembled as he thrust the papers into his belt.

He swung himself into the saddle. He could hardly restrain a guffaw of triumph, ere he dug his heavy spurs into his animal's flanks. He started off at a gallop, and raising his long, unkempt beard with one hand, he held before his mouth and laughed into it, loud and long.

Gold! Gold! Gold! Ha, ha! He had got it, got it all now, and the young English swell had no title to the smallest nugget. It was his, his, his! Wilson's Gully, only Wilson's!

Sanderson—honest as the broad light of day himself, never suspected treachery in another, and did not ask to see the papers, being fully contented that he was half owner of what was likely to prove a rich mine.

* * * * *

The news of the find soon spread, and a week later a rush had set in, the surrounding country was eagerly pegged out; and, as several other rich claims had been discovered, a township was formed in the gully, and the usual traces of population became apparent.

As some machinery was required to work the mine, Wilson suggested that Sanderson should purchase it with the remainder of his capital. The latter readily consented—it was such a sound investment—and spent the whole of his money in plant and in getting the mine into a fit condition to work it on a large scale.

One night—the machinery being ready, and every prospect of the mine turning out a rich property being assured—Wilson returned from the grog store, which had already found its way into the township, in a semi-drunken condition. His daughter had not prepared his supper, not knowing how late he might be. With an oath he raised his hand as though to strike her. She looked at her father with her large, troubled eyes, and shrank back in fear. In an instant, Harry Sanderson, who was present, sprang to his feet and seized Wilson by the wrist in a vice-like grip.

It was accomplished. He had committed the crime.

"You coward!" he shouted.

"Coward, eh? You dare to call me a coward?" sneered Wilson. "Leave my claim. Leave the gully at once. Go, you upstart, go! Do you hear me? Edge out of it. Do you think that I am going to keep you here always?"

Eva gazed at him in astonishment, her lips parted, her hand pressed tightly to her bosom. "Mr. Sanderson! oh, what does he mean?" she panted.

"He has been drinking," Harry Sanderson made answer reassuringly.

Then he turned to Wilson and looked him full in the face. "You forget that half the claim is mine," he said coolly, "and that I paid for the whole of the machinery."

"You lie!" roared Wilson. "You lie, you dog!"

He strode across the hut and unlocked a small trunk in the corner. Snatching up the copy of the register he thrust it into the astonished young man's hands. "Read that! read it! you scoundrel!" he shouted.

Sanderson took it and held it in the flickering lamplight. He read it incredulously. But as he read, the truth dawned upon him. This man had broken faith with him, had lied, had rendered contemptible the name of friend, had returned evil—the blackest, foulest treachery—for good, had robbed him of his share in the claim. His lower jaw fell, he paled to the lips, his eyes filled with wonder and reproach.

"And I was your friend!" he said slowly.

"I don't require your friendship," Wilson retorted.

"No. You no longer need it. You have bartered it away." He looked dazedly at Eva, standing trembling, scarce believing the evidence of her own eyes and ears; then he turned to the half-drunken man before him. "But what a price to sell it for," he said bitterly.

Then he moved towards Eva, took the tips of her fingers in his strong hand, raised them to his lips, and, turning, strode through the door of the hut, without uttering another word.

Digitized by Google

He dived into the forest and, coming to a fallen tree, sat down upon the trunk and strove to collect his thoughts, to reason it all out mentally; but his mind seemed to have become a blank, his very memory seemed to have dimmed. So he sat in the dusk, looking vacantly before him, like one who has received a terrific blow upon the temples, stunned, helpless, a mere cypher.

A little later a white figure crossed his line of sight. It was Eva. She was looking for him.

Then the whole truth broke in upon his brain. He had lost his claim; and in losing that, he had lost all hopes of winning her.

He started when he perceived the deathly whiteness of her face as she drew near.

"Mr. Sanderson," she faltered. She essayed to speak further, but a great sob choked her utterance; she dropped her face in her hands and burst into tears.

"Eva, don't cry like that! It makes it all the harder for me to bear." He sprang to his feet and took her by the hand. "I will go away. I will go away. I will not dispute his claim." And, with fast beating heart, he strove to look into the face of the woman he loved better than a world of gold.

"You—you must not go—go—away," she said between her sobs.

"Why should I stay? I am a poor man, poorer than when I first knew you," he retorted in a voice of pain.

"Harry!" she said reproachfully.

He tilted up her chin and looked into her crimsoning face. "Eva, my darling, my love, my life, tell me to stay and ——"

"Stay, Harry," she whispered.

And then the love that had lain smouldering for over five years burst forth at the first sign of trouble, and in the silence of the woods the words were spoken which bound them together for ever, for theirs was the love of a life-time and of eternity.

Later, Sanderson returned again to the mine, and to the hut he helped to build.

Wilson met him, armed with a revolver.

"Are you going to clear out?" he asked, as he fingered the weapon with studied carelessness.

Sanderson looked at him fearlessly. "Yes," he replied, "I'll take my few belongings with me, and go. Since you are the owner of the mine, according to law, I shall not dispute it."

His tones showed neither hatred nor malice. They cut Wilson to the quick and lashed him to fury. He had expected his partner to threaten him or to offer fight, but this reply was quite unlooked for on his part.

He scarcely realised that his daughter—because she was his daughter—had unwittingly saved him from the soundest thrashing a man could have administered to him.

He glared at the man he had wronged. "And another thing, Sanderson, I don't wish your acquaintance with my daughter to continue. You understand what I mean," he said fiercely.

Sanderson made no answer. He gathered together his few belongings and set off for the town in the gully.

Eva watched him departing. Then she turned to her father.

"Have you no conscience? no spark of honour?" she asked in a tone of restrained pain. "How could you be so wicked? He kept us alive—yes, kept us from starvation!—for years. He trusted you, and you have betrayed the trust. Have you no heart at all?"

He strode towards her, an oath upon his lips.

She made no movement, but still faced him, white to the lips, her eyes condemning him.

"To think—only to think—that you are my father—that my father is worse, infinitely worse, than a common thief; for he has taken the part of Judas Iscariot, has betrayed the man who befriended him," she said in bitter irony.

Her words goaded him to fury. "If ever you mention that fellow again in my house, I'll strangle you!" he shouted. "He has put all those —— superfine ideas in your head. Damn him! I say, and damn him! and damn him!"

"He has taught me all I know. He has taught me to look upon all meanness and lying and theft with contempt," she answered.

"And I will teach you that I am master of my own," he shouted brutally, and in another instant his hand was upraised—it fell upon her pale cheek with terrific force!

A woman's scream rent the night air. Eva Wilson lay prone, unconscious, upon the floor of the hut.

A moment later, her father, struck by remorse and terror at what he had done in his ungovernable fury, knelt beside her, calling upon her name.

* * * * *

The surprise in the township was intense, when it became known that young Sanderson, instead of being a partner in the Wilson Hill mine, had only been engaged as a workman; and there was plenty of rough sympathy forthcoming, for Sanderson was popular in his own quiet way. Wilson ridiculed the idea of Sanderson being a partner, and the latter said not a word upon the subject either way. He would have liked to bid the place farewell as he did England when misfortune befel him there, but he had promised Eva that he would stay, and on that account he took a position as assistant in O'Calligan's store.

* * * * *

That hushed stillness so characteristic of the Australian bush was just setting in the fierce, red sun was disappearing, like a ball of fire, below the horizon. It cast its magenta rays upon Wilson's Gully, lighting up the rudely-built houses and huts, the scores of white tents scattered about, and the surrounding forest-covered, rugged hills, into a red, glowing hell.

The township, although far from large in comparison with towns of to-day, had grown considerably since Wilson founded it a year ago. It had come to be considered an important place, both by reason of its gold and its bloodshed, and its gangs of desperadoes.

As was customary, towards evening Wilson's Gully became a species of earthly pandemonium. The drinking shanties and gambling hells were crowded by men of all nations and classes, which, taken as a body, were as debased a set as ever could be found in a township of the size. Scarcely a night passed without some drunken brawl, in which blood was shed, taking place; for law and justice did not yet prevail.

A young man dressed in rough, bush garb, might have been seen hastily leaving a large building, which bore the roughly-painted sign: "J. O'Calligan, Storekeeper." He slammed the door behind him and hurried along the uneven, badly constructed street, until he passed beyond the knot of human habitations.

He directed his steps towards a house of better build than those in the town. It was situated beside Wilson's Hill Mine, on the shoulder of the hill, and surrounded by a dense belt of trees. As he drew near, he left the road leading to the house, and plunging into the forest, made his way to a fallen tree, where he halted.

Digitized by Google

That he was expecting some one was apparent by the eager way in which he scanned a zigzag bridle-path leading from the house.

The man was Harry Sanderson. He had been employed at O'Calligan's store for the past twelve months. He was waiting for Eva Wilson. Her father's mine had even exceeded his expectations, and he was now a wealthy man. He had obtained, and was still obtaining, that gold for which he had sacrificed all honour. He was now looked up to as being the leading man in the township, and his word was law. The hatred which a man invariably displays towards one whom he has wronged burnt like a furnace in his breast towards Harry Sanderson; and he left no stone unturned to throw the cloak of infamy about the shoulders of the latter. Thus it was that his daughter was forced to meet her lover clandestinely, if she met him at all.

The silver rays of the moon shot, spirit-like, upon the tall trees, the network of undergrowth, and the dead twigs upon the ground; and a faint breeze causing the leaves overhead to undulate in ghostly silence, gave the forest the appearance of a moving, glittering panorama, not of the earth, earthly. It was as though Sanderson had stepped out of a red and glowing hell into a pale, trembling one.

The kangaroos hopped by, opossums capered amidst the overhanging branches, the squirrels darted across his very feet, all eyeing him without a trace of fear. They had learned to know him. For this spot, night after night, had been the lover's trysting place, for months past. Here had they vowed their vows of mutual faith and patience and endurance. Here had they met with smiles, and parted in sorrow, not devoid of hope—that parting which is such sweet pain.

Suddenly Sanderson's eyes lighted. He stepped forward with outstretched hands. He saw her coming down the bridle-path, clad in white, her great, blue eyes aglow, a faint flush about her face, rising no higher than the lashes of her eyes, her lovely hair touched with palest gold. She seemed like some beauteous forest sprite, a fairy of the tree-belted hillside.

He took her hands in his, and drew her to him, kissing her red, tempting lips with a certain desperate tenderness, as though he feared that he might never so kiss her again.

Then they sat, side by side, hand clasping hand, upon the fallen tree trunk, and she whispered to him of her fears, of how her father had sworn to ruin him, beyond the ruin which he had already wrought him; had even sworn to bring about his death.

And he reassured her, allaying the dread, the horrible haunting fear for his safety, that ever nestled, snake-like, in her bosom. He told her of how he progressed at O'Calligan's store, of how the old man spoke of taking him into partnership now that he—O'Calligan—was growing old and feeble.

But when he had ceased speaking the old dread, the haunting fear, came back and gripped her with a strength that there was no resisting. And she told him of the terror and revulsion with which Johnson, the nephew of O'Calligan, inspired her

"Why should you fear him, dearest?" he asked, running his fingers through her locks of wavy hair. "Why should you fear him?"

"It is for your safety that I fear," she answered.

"Pshaw! I am not afraid of him. He is certainly a loose, dissipated scoundrel, who would not stick at anything; but I am stronger than he is, so he could not injure me much, bodily; and O'Calligan has helped him monetarily so often to no purpose, that he has now refused to do so again, and this afternoon he ordered him out of the store—I must say I did not much like the look on Johnson's face, as he shuffled out, it was fiendish; but I am thought well of by O'Calligan, so Johnson could not injure me much in my business."

And thus he once again allayed her fears.

A little later a red, glowing spot shone from the township through the trees.

"It is a bush fire," said Eva.

Sanderson scanned it curiously for a minute or two, and then turned to his companion.

"It is a fire in the township," he said, "in the direction of O'Calligan's store. See how the sky is lighting up. God! it is the store!"

One clasp of her hand, one hurried embrace, and he was dashing through the forest to the scene of the conflagration.

He had judged rightly. The flames were bursting from the store.

The building was of wood, as dry as tinder, and the contents were of a light, inflammable nature. The tongues of fire burst through the chinks and windows, they lapped the roof with hunger and ravening, they twined about the chimney stack, they leapt upwards towards the sky. It was a lurid spectacle. The valley was lit up from end to end, and the rough faces in the

"It is the store!"

Digitized by Google

quickly gathering crowd of miners shone red; they looked like an assembly of fiends.

"Is O'Calligan inside?" that was the question which Harry Sanderson kept mentally asking, as he rushed upon the scene.

He made at top speed for the back entrance, and despite the ferocity of the fire, shook the door again and again, flung himself against it, strove to kick it in, and——

A terrible blow from a pistol butt laid him low. He dropped like a log.

Johnson, for he it was who brought Sanderson down, senseless, dragged him away from the doomed store.

A horrible grin played about his repulsive features.

"Here he is, lads!" he shouted. "Here is the murderer! Here is the dog, who burnt his master to death in his bed! I collared him. He was clearing away through the back door; he had a lighted firebrand in his hand."

A hoarse murmur from the crowd greeted this intelligence. A murmur that grew in force until it broke into a roar of excitement.

They pressed round O'Calligan's prostrate assistant. They bound him hands and feet, and set a guard over him, for the remainder of the night.

Such an occurrence was meat and drink to their vitiated, brutal tastes.

In the meantime, the store was reduced to a heap of smouldering ashes.

* * * * *

The sun broke away from his concealment behind the hills, to light up an animated scene the next morning. All was bustle and excitement, an event was about to happen that always proved highly interesting to the more too refined miners. A man was to be tried for his life. Rough and ready were the trials in those days; if the public judged the prisoner guilty he was strung up to the nearest tree in the course of the next few minutes. It was camp law.

All the town came and gazed on Sanderson, who, recovered from his blow, stood bound to a massive tree trunk, facing the scene of the over-night fire, and each made an audible remark concerning his appearance, passing on to a shanty, or joining one of the many groups of miners, who were eagerly discussing the situation. Everyone intended making a day of it. Bets and wagers were made freely upon the result of the trial.

A stout man with bloodshot eyes and a blotched countenance stood not twenty yards from the prisoner. He was betting upon the event.

"Three to one! Three to one! I'll lay three to one it's a hanging job!" he was shouting, as he thumped his fist upon an upturned tub.

"Take fives," said another; and the bet was booked.

Wilson, who—as leading man in the township—was to act as judge, and also to conduct the prosecution (an honourable and just method of putting a man upon trial), had been early astir, and had had frequent interviews with Johnson, the principal witness.

A gang of miners had searched the débris of the store, and had discovered a few charred bones, which were handed over to Wilson.

The trial was held in the main street in order that the proceedings might be as public as possible. A rough stage had been erected, upon one end of which stood a box—the dock; and the centre was reserved for witnesses, the other end being occupied by Wilson. A bell attached to the roof of a shanty rang out an intimation that the proceedings were about to commence.

Wilson, looking grave, upright, one who keenly felt the responsibility of his position, gave the order "Bring forward the prisoner," and Harry Sanderson looking pale and troubled, yet with an expression of determination upon his face, was led to the stage and placed in the rudely carpentered box.

Came and gazed on Sanderson.

His arrival was greeted by cheers, groans, and blasphemous oaths, and the wagering started in right earnest.

After a time, Wilson succeeded in restoring something approaching order, and he read out the charge of incendiarism and murder. "How do you plead, guilty, or not guilty?"

The prisoner raised his fearless grey eyes, and looked at Wilson. The crowd became still as death, breathlessly listening.

"Not guilty," came the confident reply, followed by a burst of cheers and counter cheers.

"Where were you last night when the fire broke out?" asked Wilson, when order was restored.

"I refuse to answer," the prisoner said.

"I'll bet ten to one he swings," roared a big digger.

"Done, I'll take it, for all you're worth," said another. The prisoner looked towards the man and smiled his thanks. He knew that the judgment of the public depended a good deal upon the drift of the betting.

Wilson waited for the amount of the wager to be settled, then he called the first witness, Johnson.

The appearance of this man upon the platform was greeted by his friends with loud cheering and considerable banter.

Never was more open enthusiasm at a Spanish bullfight. They had their human bull in the arena, the matador was there, they merely wished to see him goaded and gored to madness before they held their thumbs down for the signal of death.

Johnson began his story:

Digitized by Google

"Jim O'Calligan was my uncle," said he. "We had, as the whole township knows, an occasional row; but we were fond of each other."

"Did you quarrel with him yesterday?" asked Wilson.

"No, we were very friendly. I went into the store and found the prisoner and my uncle having a row, and I told the prisoner not to try and bully an old man. I stopped the row."

"You lie, Johnson," said the prisoner.

The crowd crushed eagerly forward.

"What happened then?"

"I asked the prisoner what he was carrying on about. He said that O'Calligan had refused to give him his wages."

"Another lie," said Sanderson.

"Did you hear him make any threats?" Wilson made the leading question.

"He said that he had a good mind to roast the old Jew alive."

"You lying scoundrel," shouted Sanderson as he strove to free himself.

The crowd shouted in excitement.

Johnson cast a sneering glance at the prisoner, during the interruption; and taking a piece of hard tobacco from his pocket, bit off a piece, and commenced to chew it nonchalantly.

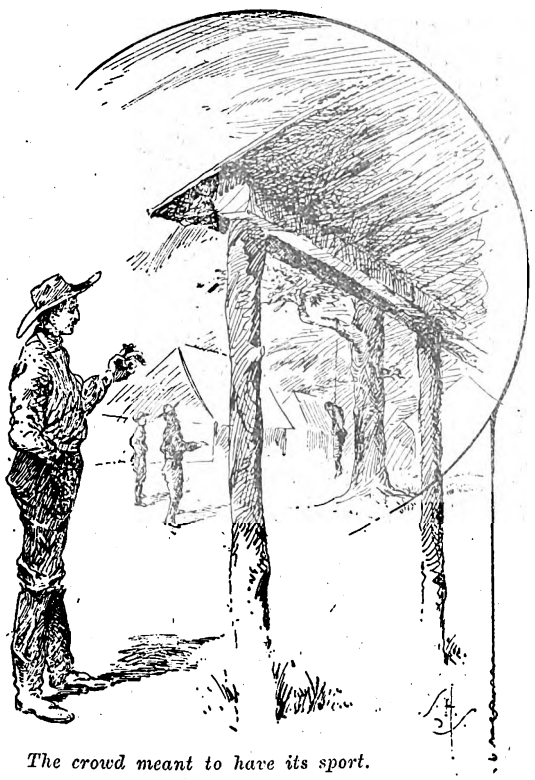
When silence was restored, Wilson continued his examination of the witness.

"Did you see him come out of the burning store?"

"Yes. He rushed out with his clothes singed as you see them; he had a lighted brand in his hand."

"Another villainous lie," said the prisoner. His face was white as death, when the crowd turned towards him, and shook clenched fists, and hooted in his face.

He knew that his life was worth but little more than a minute's purchase.



The crowd meant to have its sport.

"What have you to say to that, prisoner?" Wilson asked when order was restored. "The witness says that he caught you red-handed."

"I say it is a lie. I was trying to break open the door, to enter; for I feared O'Calligan was in the building. That is how my clothes became singed. Suddenly I felt a heavy blow on the head. I knew nothing after that, until I came to, to find myself bound with these." He held his corded wrists up as he spoke. Great beads of sweet stood upon his brow. He turned to the assembled throng, looking for one glance of belief in the eyes of only one; but Johnson's words had taken effect.

Not one friendly look was cast upon him.

"To the tree! To the tree! Give him the murderer's dancing ground!" they shouted.

"Stop!" It was a woman's voice, shrill, terror-stricken, but commanding, that rang out through the clamour.

In another instant, Eva Wilson, pushing her way through the miners, clambered on to the platform.

"Stop!" she cried again, throwing back her pale, beautiful face, and raising her slender hand, in the grandeur of terror, of fear for the life of the man whom she loved.

Surprised into silence the crowd watched her.

"Stand down," said her father sternly.

She threw him a look of defiance. "Not until the prisoner, Harry Sanderson, stands down also," she said in clear tones.

The miners, coarse, low, brutal, as many of them were, nevertheless had their ideas of fair play. They cheered themselves hoarse, as the girlish form stood there, in the full light of the sun, upon that raised platform, ready to defend, it might be to lay down her life for the life of her sweetheart. She looked like a beautiful tigress deprived of her whelps, a woman whose child was at the mercy of one more powerful than herself, but yet one whom she defied. In a frenzy of excitement the miners demanded that she should be heard; and Wilson had no course open to him, save that of submitting.

Then, amidst utter silence, she spoke again.

"Harry Sanderson was in my presence in the forest, close to our house, father, when the fire broke out; and we had been together for more than two hours. When he saw the fire, Harry Sanderson ran to the store to try and save his master and his master's goods. More, he told me only a few minutes before that that man"—she pointed one taper finger at Johnson—"had been turned out of the store that afternoon by his uncle!"

A volley of cheers greeted her. She stepped towards the prisoner and laid one hand upon his shoulder. They should defy this bearer of false witness together.

"What do you say to that, Johnson?" Wilson asked.

"I say it is a lie," said the witness, shifting uneasily.

"And I endorse that, Johnson," Wilson said, "for the girl is my daughter, and she was in my house all the evening."

"You lie, sir," the prisoner said firmly, "I was with your daughter. We have been in the habit of meeting ever since you robbed me of my share in the mine."

"Two and two," shouted the crowd excitedly. "More evidence," came a voice from a neighbouring window.

Wilson tugged at his beard. "They are lovers," he said, "and will naturally swear to the same lie. But we have more evidence. We have these charred bones to prove the death of O'Calligan. We know that the prisoner has lied, for he says that I have robbed him of a share in my mine. The property always was mine. I have the copy of the register here. Who likes may read it."

Digitized by Google

"The bones, are they a proof?" The voice of Eva broke upon their ears again.

"Decidedly. It shows that the prisoner is not only an incendiary, but also a murderer," her father replied.

"How do you know that they are Jim O'Calligan's bones? How do you know that they are human bones at all?"

"What other bones could they be?" Wilson asked, shrugging his shoulders, as though to prolong the argument was waste of time.

"Ham bones or bacon bones, they might easily have been," she replied. "Hams were sold at the store."

"These bones were all lying together. I found them myself, lying as though O'Calligan had fallen, stifled, in a heap."

A groan ran through the crowd. Once again they cast menacing glances at the prisoner.

"If that is so—" Eva began.

"Encugh, the evidence is damning. I pronounce—"

"Stop!" she shrieked, holding up her hand.

"If these bones are the bones of O'Calligan, how is it his skull is not there? It would be curious if the skull was completely burned, and the bones, bits of them, remained."

Once more the crowd wavered, and greeted her with cheers.

"Let someone search until he finds the skull. If that"— she pointed to the heap of burnt bones—"is what remains of O'Calligan, the skull will be in the spot on which you found those bones. If the skull is not there, then set the prisoner free."

Then she turned about and faced the crowd. "Gentlemen," she said, in spite of the president's evident desire to prove the prisoner guilty, "I ask you, as lovers of fair play, to order the court to be adjourned until the missing skull is found."

"An adjournment! An adjournment!" the crowd yelled with one voice, and Wilson had no alternative save that of obeying the will of the men gathered round about him.

Several miners instantly went in quest of the missing skull, but no trace of it did they find in the ash-covered débris.

Suddenly the prisoner lifted up his bowed head. The shout: "Stand aside! Gangway! Gangway!" fell upon his ear. Had they found the skull? So much depended on that skull. He shook like a leaf in his terrible excitement.

It was a horseman who picked his way through the onlookers. It was old Jim O'Calligan in the flesh.

"Lads," he shouted heartily. "I've been over to Warmgardie; I made up my mind to go directly Harry Sanderson left the store. I've got a deed of partnership for him to sign, in my pocket. Harry Sanderson left the store before me. Understand? He is as innocent as I am. He is one of the finest fellows I have ever met. But if you want to know who threatened to fire the store and fizzle my bones—it was that man!"

He pointed one accusing finger at Johnson, and looked him squarely in the face.

The crowd meant to have its anticipated sport, and without consulting Wilson, or waiting for further developments, they sprang upon the wretched man, Johnson, and dragged him to the tree. In less than five minutes his body swung in the air, riddled with bullets.

Wilson spread out his arms. His features contorted. He fell forward upon his face, in a fit of epilepsy.

When he came to his senses again, he stretched out his hand to Sanderson, who had been liberated, and begged his forgiveness.

Harry Sanderson gripped the hand and wrung it heartily.

"If it hadn't been for the delay you procured," he later whispered to Eva, "I should——"

She laughed and cried as she looked at him.

"You—you are safe now, darling," she whispered.

"Yes, saved by a modern Portia," he retorted, kissing away her tears.

W. Keppel Honnywill.

READY ON APRIL 1ST. . . . . NO. 4 OF Pearson's Magazine.

CONTENTS:

Gates and Pillars of the Empire. Robert Machray.
No. 1.—Liverpool, Illustrated.

The Mountain of Valour. Sir Evelyn Wood.
Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood.

A Photograph of the Invisible. George Griffith.
Illustrated by G. G. Manton.

What a Bank Holiday Costs. Joseph Mason.
Illustrated by George Ashton.

Soldier an' Sailor too. Rudyard Kipling.
Illustrated by Georges Montbard.
One of Mr. Kipling's most brilliant poems.

The Men who will Lead if War Comes. Archibald Forbes.
Illustrated with photographs.
An interesting statement by one of the greatest living authorities upon this subject.

The Retiring of Domsie. Ian Maclaren.
Illustrated by R. Sauber, R.B.A.

Animal Actors. H. J. Milton.
Illustrated by H. Piffard.

A Wizard of To-Day. H. J. W. Dam.
Illustrated with photographs.

Wisdom Let Loose. W. L. Alden.
Illustrated by Charles May.

Secrets of the Courts of Europe. Allen Upward.
No. IV.—The True Story of Prince Bismarck's Fall.
Illustrated by Hal Hurst, R.B.A.

The Bravest Deed I ever Saw. Marquis of Lorne, K.T.
Illustrated by Sydney Cowell.

The Front Parlour Window. James Scott.
Illustrated by the Author.

Strangers at the "Stag." Nellie K. Blissett.
Illustrated by A. Kemp Tebby.

The Great Water Joke. J. F. Sullivan
Illustrated by the Author.

A Heroine in Bib and Tucker. Winifred Graham.
Illustrated by A. Ludovici.

How the Frontiers of Europe are Kept. Levin Carnac.
Illustrated by H. Piffard.

Loved I not Honour More. Sir Walter Besant and W. H. Pollock.
Illustrated by Chris Hammond.

Verse { A Retrospect. George Chetwynd. / A Waking Dream. Clarence Hope.

Editorial Mind.

Digitized by Google

HOW THE MAN IN LIVERY WON AN HEIRESS.

Translated from the French of Mme. Care.

I was Eliane du Rocher's guardian. At the age of eight she had lost both her parents. Her health was delicate, and I thought the best thing to do for her was to put her to a convent school in the country.

I myself had three sons. Eliane, when of age, would come into possession of £50, and, as I did not want to be accused of paternal covetousness, I desisted from taking her to my home. Consequently she spent all her vacations at school, grew up beautiful, and thereby caused me to redouble my precautions.

She showed religious proclivities, and professed a vocation for convent life. I remonstrated against her becoming a nun, but she urged that she was happy, and wanted nothing better than to pass her existence at the convent. When of age, she for two years devoted her whole income to feeding and clothing the poor of Juilly.

One morning, however, I received the following astonishing letter:

My dear Guardian,—I am bored. After mature reflection, I find that I am not cut out for a religious career. Kindly find me a husband as soon as possible. Your grateful and devoted Eliane.

I hurried to the convent. "So you are bored?"

"To death, my dear guardian."

"And you wish to marry simply for lack of something better to do?"

"Exactly."

"Have you considered?"

"Not very much—only enough to know that since I am bored at the convent, I can have no religious vocation. I won't be an old maid. There is nothing left then, except marriage—or death."

"How you jump at conclusions!"

"Have you, in your infinite wisdom, anything else to suggest?"

"Hum! And what do you require for the happy mortal, your future husband?"

"Nothing—except that he pleases me."

"Very well. But what does please you? You must have some ideal—all girls have."

"Not I," she answered quietly. "Remember, my kind friend, that I know only three men; you, our father confessor, and the convent gardener, and——"

"And?"

She slightly tossed her head.

"Well, they are not at all what I want."

I was fully aware that I, stout, bald, and near-sighted, could not be the fancy of a handsome girl of twenty, still, I felt a little provoked at being told it so plainly.

"Very well," I said, rather gruffly.

She kissed me. Probably she would have been more circumspect had I been her ideal; anyhow, her kiss calmed me.

"I shall seek and find."

She dropped me a nice little courtesy, and we parted.

It does not seem hard to find a candidate for the hand of a young and charming heiress. I presented quite a number of men to her—nice fellows, too; but none suited her. Summer was passing, and each week Eliane sent me a card with the words: "I am bored."

"Don't be so hard to please, then; make a choice," I answered, in exasperation.

Things were at this point, when my old friend, the curate of Redon, spoke to me of the Marquise de Pen-Valloët and her two sons. Old family, distinguished name, good connections, respectable fortune. I proposed to Eliane to spend a few weeks with my wife at Trouville, and she joyfully accepted.

"On the way," said I, "we will stop at one of my clients, the Marquise de Pen-Valloët."

"I wager your client has a son."

"Two, in fact."

"So much the easier to choose."

The Marquise resided on a large estate some miles from Redon. I had been told of her strictly economical way of living, so I was not surprised to find awaiting us at the station an old rattletrap of a carriage, which smelt so musty that, as we started to get in, Eliane recoiled.

"Suppose we ride outside; I should enjoy the fresh air."

"I don't see any ladder," said I, dismayed at the steep climb.

"Bah! one foot on the wheel, another near the coachman, and there you are."

"You want to break my neck."

"Don't be afraid, sir," said the coachman, offering me his strong hand, and helping me to mount quite easily.

"Evidently an ex-soldier," thought I, looking admiringly at the robust, handsome figure of the man.

Digitized by Google

Eliane seemed no more than a feather in his strong grasp. Before I was seated she was beside me, radiant and happy as a lark.

"You will be afraid," said I, measuring the distance from our perch to the ground.

"Afraid! You don't know me. You will cry quarter before I do. Now, driver, quick, quick!"

The man smiled rather sarcastically, I thought.

"Not too fast, my boy," I said. "Don't listen to that featherbrain."

He gathered up his reins and started his team. Heavens, what a race! My blood curdles at the thought of it. Eliane clapped her hands and incited the pleased coachman to redoubled efforts. I held on with might and main, prepared to jump at the expected crash.

My torture lasted thirty-five minutes, during which I must have grown ten years older. The carriage turned sharply to the right, we raced up a narrow road, and stopped short in a paved court. The precision with which the ponies halted at the door would have done honour to circus-horses, but I was too vexed to admire.

"You came near killing us," I said to the coachman.

"Everyone knows his own business, sir; I know mine," he answered phlegmatically.

A handsome, refined-looking young man of medium height met us and assisted us to alight.

Mme. de Pen-Valloët received us in the large, gloomy drawing-room, hung with ancestral pictures more or less hideous. She herself, in her old-fashioned, faded gown, looked like an old family portrait descended from its frame. She greeted us graciously, and herself led us to our apartments.

"My son, René," she said, designating the handsome young man who had first received us, "has awaited your coming with great impatience, the curate's description of you and Mlle. Eliane was so flattering. And then we lead such a retired life, have few calls, fewer neighbours, only some friends of my own age. Your visit is a perfect godsend, and I hope you will make it a long one."

I thought the old lady's severe grey eyes rested with pleasure on my little ward.

Dinner was ready. We had just time to change our travelling attire. When Eliane reappeared, in her simple white gown, she looked queenly beautiful. René met her at the door with some compliment which did not seem to displease her.

Covers were laid for five. We were only four, however, and the plate opposite our hostess remained vacant. Nobody seemed to notice it, and dinner was served.

The cuisine was good, the wines choice. The service might have been better. The little servant who waited on us seemed a novice at his task. He broke a plate, and his mistress gave him a severe look.

Just then another guest entered—a man of about thirty, tall and with a strong face. Saluting us, he took the empty place opposite Mme. de Pen-Valloët.

"My first son, Marquis Horace de Pen-Valloët," she said, presenting him, adding: "Late as usual."

"You know why, mother," he answered coldly.

I could not take my eyes off the new-comer. Where had I met him? His voice awoke some disagreeable memory, yet I could not place him.

The conversation became livelier. I understood that the Marquis had lived in India, and asked whether it was so.

"I have travelled a great deal," he answered laconically.

"Too much," added his mother.

"Are not the Eastern climates rather trying to Europeans?" I asked, not knowing exactly what to say.

He shook his head. "I never was better than when travelling. Only I spent my fortune—a thing my mother cannot forget."

"Your fortune and a part of mine," added the Marquise, rather bitterly.

We turned the conversation, and when dinner was over, I feared the long evening yet to come.

Mme. de Pen-Valloët proposed a game of bezique to me, while René sat down to the piano, and, with a pretty tenor voice, sang German and Breton songs.

At last came the time for retiring. I signalled to Eliane, who was in languid conversation with the elder Pen Valloët, while the younger was still warbling away.

"Well," said I, when we were alone.

She stifled a yawn. "Let us go to bed. I am tired to death."

"Not before you have told me your impression of the two candidates."

"The younger is handsome, he has a pretty voice, and dresses well. That is all I know so far"

"And the other?"

She laughed. "The other? Why, he hasn't a cent. He doesn't count as a match, guardie, dear."

"True. I always thought you were a sensible girl."

Next morning it was late when I awoke.

I had hardly finished my toilet before Eliane, fresh and bright as the morning, knocked for admittance.

"What! up already?"

"Already! Why, I have had a long walk through the dewy woods. It was exquisite."

"Alone?"

"Oh, no. I made sure of an escort last night."

"Ah! ha! So things are working?"

"Spendidly, my dear guardian. Open your ears. I have decided to marry——"

"Handsome René?" said I, rubbing my hands.

"No; I am going to marry—the coachman who drove so well yesterday As soon as I placed my hand in his, I knew he was a man a woman could trust. But here he is to tell you that you are not dreaming."

She opened the door, and Horace de Pen-Velloët entered.

"Myself!" he said, smiling at my astonishment. "My story is not long, but rather unusual. I wanted to be a soldier. My mother objected. I obeyed her, but the spirit of adventure possessed me. As soon as I was of age I started on a trip round the world. My mother told you I spent my fortune and part of hers. I dare say I committed my share of follies. When my means were exhausted I returned home. The fatted calf was not killed in my honour. On the contrary, I had to put up with reproaches, complaints and taunts. What was I to do? Incapable of earning my living, exasperated at hearing myself reproached for eating the bread of idleness, I offered to take the place of my mother's coachman, who had died. I loved horses—and you know I can drive."

"I still feel it," said I, shaking myself.

"When I offered my services to my mother I was half joking, but she accepted in earnest, so I became the coachman. I take care of my animals, and, when it is necessary, put on the livery. At night I resume my dress-suit, my title, and my rights, as eldest son. And this might have gone on for ever, but for the coming of this liberating fairy, my charming fiancée, who, I think, understands me, and will try to love me a little."

Digitized by Google

THE GREAT MIDDLEWICK BANK ROBBERY

SUMMARY.

MR. BRYANT, Manager of Middlewick Bank.
HERBERT STEWART, Cashier.
FRANK RUTHERFORD, Book-keeper.
ALFRED TAYLOR, Detective.
JOHN WARREN, Old Watchman.
JACK BURTON, New Watchman—a detective in disguise.
MISS DENTON, Bryant's niece, and in love with Rutherford.

£20,000 is stolen from the Bank one night while John Warren is asleep. The only persons apparently aware of the key to the combination lock are Mr. Bryant and Mr. Stewart. Taylor is led to suspect Frank Rutherford of having obtained the key to the lock, and shadows him. It appears that an attempt is to be made on the strong room by three notorious burglars—Nash, King, and Birch—who know nothing about the previous robbery. Arrangements are made to capture them, and two constables—Bates and Morton—are to be placed in the building, while Taylor and Burton watch outside.

CHAPTER IX.

A Stiff Chase.

It would not do for Sam Birch to retain his present position. As explained, he was too far from the bank to give prompt notice of the approach of danger. Accordingly, waiting only a moment after the door had closed behind his confederates, he sauntered to the corner and took position within a few steps of the building. There, instead of assuming a fixed posture, he walked slowly past for a dozen paces, and then returned, beginning a regular tramp, which would give him the scope of vision he needed.

Burton was alert. Instead of following him immediately, he remained in the shadow of the doorway for fully five minutes. He wished to wait until matters were moving within the bank itself. Then he stepped out from his concealment and imitated the action of the other watcher.

At that late hour not another person was in sight. Before, however, Burton reached the corner, a pedestrian came at a pace from the opposite direction, his course taking him in front of the steps and past the sentinel. The latter coughed in the most natural manner in the world, while the stranger, with no thought of what was going on so near him, hurried by and vanished from sight.

Burton had not checked his own moderate pace, and was now within a short distance of where Birch was slowly walking to and fro. The criminal had his eye on him, and seeing that he would pass near him, he again coughed. There could be no mistake as to the meaning of the simple signal.

An advantage presented itself to Burton, who was moving in the same direction as the other and only a few steps behind him. It was evident to the new watchman that Sam Birch had no more suspicion regarding him than he had of the stranger who had just passed out of sight. Yielding to impulse, Burton paused in front of the steps, as though he had caught some suspicious sound.

Birch instantly stopped in his beat, looked round and came back to where Burton stood.

"What's the matter with you?" he gruffly asked.

"I wonder if there's anything wrong in there," was the innocent reply of Burton.

"Look here, young man, you had better move on. I've been hired to watch that bank, and I'll run you in if you hang about here. If you want to save your skin, hurry home and go to bed."

Birch advanced angrily, with hand outstretched to seize the throat of the innocent-looking person. Burton retreated a single step. Then his right fist shot out like lightning, landing with crashing force upon the jaw of the astounded criminal, who staggered backwards and would have fallen to the ground had he not collided with the lamp-post behind him.

His right fist shot out.

Burton's blood was up, and he had dashed forward intending to fell his man to the earth and then slip the handcuffs upon him, but he was checkmated by the unexpected course of the ruffian.

Without uttering the signal to his friends within the bank to apprise them of what was going on, and without the faintest attempt to resent the assault, he turned and sped up the street like a deer.

For the moment Burton was disconcerted, for he had not dreamed of any such display of cowardice. The next instant, however, he was after the fugitive with the fleetness of a greyhound.

Burton was as good at running as was his friend Taylor, and it need not be said that he did not let grass grow under his feet. Birch kept in the middle of the street, where the way was open and there was no danger of running into any obstructions. This suited the pursuer, who ran as if his own life was at stake. He steadily gained, and, if no unexpected obstacle interposed, was sure to overtake his man in a very little while.

Digitized by Google

Sam Birch had proved himself a coward, but even a coward will fight viciously when driven into a corner. At the first corner the fugitive darted to the right with undiminished speed. Had he caught sight of any shelter he would have whisked into it; but hardly a second was at his command in which to search for one, and he kept on. Thus, when Burton shot round the same corner, he saw his man running in front of him, with the interval between them sensibly diminished and fast diminishing.

It was at this juncture that the pursuer became aware that he was not the only one chasing the burglar. Some person was running after him, and was close behind. Burton concluded a stranger had joined in the pursuit on general principles and with no knowledge of what it all meant.

But the watchman had no time to give the matter any thought. His hands were full with the fellow in front. Middlewick, it will be remembered, was a small town, and the race had not lasted long when all parties were dashing through the outskirts. At the next corner Burton had approached so close to his man that the latter would not have dared to drop out of sight had an opening appeared before him. He had not a spare second at his disposal.

"Stop, or I'll fire! I know you, Sam Birch!"

The answer was startling. The panting fugitive turned like a flash and let fly with two chambers of his revolver straight at his pursuer, who was almost upon him. Burton instinctively ducked his head and the shots sped harmlessly past, though it is not to be supposed that this action caused his escape. The fugitive was too flurried and in too great a haste to secure a good aim. The angered watchman fired one charge at the fellow, who had turned at bay, but with no more effect than the other shots. The next instant the two came together like a couple of tigers. The fierce struggle lasted but a few seconds, when a blow felled Birch to the ground, and Burton sprang upon him. There the contest continued with the same ferocity. Both were powerful men, and each realised what was at stake.

Let go! . . . with his revolver.

With the exception of the command shouted a few minutes before by the watchman, not a word was spoken by the antagonists. Words, like laughter, draw upon one's strength, and neither had an ounce to spare. It was useless to try to slip the cuffs on the wrist of Birch. He was fighting too furiously. Burton therefore concentrated his strength in the single effort to conquer him.

He probably would have succeeded, for, after all, he was the equal of the other in muscular power and his superior in science, but fate played more than one queer freak with the actors in the drama of that evening.

It has been stated that a third party had joined in the chase. The delay caused by the collision between the principals gave this person time to arrive on the scene.

It was the police Superintendent, whose withdrawal from the immediate neighbourhood of the bank did not signify

"Confound you! Why did you strike me?"

the withdrawal of his interest in the expected events. Following the watchman's request, he waited in one of the side streets, from which he could quickly reach the bank, should it become necessary.

Catching sight of a man running with another in hot pursuit, the Superintendent felt that duty required him to take part. Not the equal of either in point of speed, he still made such good progress that he soon reached them after they came together for the second time. The Superintendent had armed himself for this business. Besides the revolver in his pocket he carried a policeman's truncheon. This he drew while he ran, concluding to leave the deadlier weapon for a more serious emergency.

Although Supt. Dixon was usually a cool man, this was the first time he had ever been engaged in an affair of this nature, and he became a trifle excited. He ought to have kept away altogether or have delegated his functions to one of his officers.

He saw two men struggling on the ground, the one underneath striving desperately to exchange positions with the other and almost succeeding, despite the determined resistance of the upper man. One of the parties was the new watchman and the other a stranger. There was no saying, so far as Dixon saw, which was getting the better of the struggle, so he interfered at the critical moment.

Time was so precious that he could not pause to take aim but when the truncheon came down the blow did its work. One of the contestants toppled over, stunned for the instant, while the other, struggling to his feet, was off again at the top of his speed.

"Confound you! Why did you strike me?" demanded the irate Burton, quickly recovering himself.

"I — really — beg a thousand pardons — but it looks as if I had made a mistake, Mr. Burton! I hope you'll excuse me."

Digitized by Google

"Go home and to bed," was the angry response of the watchman, who, seeing that not a second was to be lost, dashed off a second time in pursuit of the fugitive.

The latter was using his slight advantage to the utmost. Had the delay of the watchman lasted half a minute longer, the criminal must have effected his escape.

The firing of pistols naturally attracted attention in that part of the town, even though the hour was late. Making no reply to the numerous questions of the excited onlookers, the chagrined Superintendent hastened after the flying couple.

The new watchman's head was ringing from the effects of the blow, but he concentrated all his energy upon the task before him and ran at the highest speed, determined to have his man at all costs.

Birch vaulted over a low railing in front of a house, sped across the garden and darted round a building to the rear. Burton did the same, a few yards behind him. The instant the fugitive was out of sight he looked round for something in the nature of a refuge. It was useless to run in this fashion when he was certain of being overtaken. If he could dart into some cover possibly he might throw his pursuer off the track, but there must not be a moment's delay in finding the refuge.

Glancing to the right and left in his frantic search, he saw in the shadows the open door of a small building, and made for it. At the moment he was about to plunge through the opening, a huge dog bounded out, almost into his face. Birch wheeled and leapt the fence at the rear and continued his flight.

The mastiff started to follow, but just then Jack Burton, at full speed, came upon the scene. The dog concluded that he would serve his purpose, as well as the other, and went for him. He was a formidable brute, and the watchman did not mean to give him the chance of grasping either his leg or throat. Besides, he was tired of being interfered with while performing his duty: it was becoming monotonous.

The canine was in earnest, and with a threatening growl came bounding towards the watchman.

"I'll settle your hash for you," muttered Burton, aiming with such care that the single bullet bored its way through the skull of the dog and stretched him lifeless.

The interruption had caused a slight delay but not enough to defeat the purpose of the pursuit. Burton had kept the fugitive well in sight and sped after him with redoubled energy. Sam Birch made the fatal mistake of not keeping in the rear of the dwellings on the outskirts, among which he might have found some chance of temporary shelter. Instead of doing that, however, he began making his way back to the street from which he had fled.

He quickly clambered out of sight.

The long chase was beginning to tell upon both pursuer and pursued; much more, however, upon the latter, for a life of dissipation saps the strength of anyone. Birch must quickly discover some refuge or turn about and have it out with Burton, who was now fresher and stronger than he.

At the rear of a handsome house was a small wooden structure, one of several others that were used for domestic fowls, pigeons, and pet animals. It was two storeys high, but the swinging open door was so near the ground that a moderate leap on the part of the fugitive carried the upper half of his body through, and he quickly clambered out of sight.

Burton had no objection to this, for he knew the man had no knowledge of what the issue would be. The watchman quickly walked round the building, to learn what means of egress it possessed, in order to prevent his man stealing a march upon him.

There was a door on the opposite side, facing the back of the residence, but that was even with the ground. The ends of the little building were without any opening. By keeping the back and front under his eye, he could hold Birch securely caged. It will be admitted, however, that it is no easy matter for anyone to watch the front and back of a building at the same time, with an alert foe inside on the look-out for a chance to elude him.

As the best that could be done, Burton drew off as far as his surroundings would permit, and took up his position opposite one of the ends of the structure. By doing this he could detect the fugitive before he could run far. Birch, having found the refuge, made the best possible use of it, though he must have seen it could not serve him long. He did not show himself, but gave his attention for some time to regaining his breath and strength. He also kept an eye on the upper and lower door. He had landed on his feet in the structure without mishap.

After a few minutes' rest, he began groping about to make sure of his location. This was not satisfactory. The sides of the building showed so few streaks of moonlight through the crevices that he struck a match and held it over his head. The house was about a dozen feet square and high and was evidently used for the storage of hay, though there were only a few handfuls of dried grass on the floor. He blew out the match and waited.

The watchman had been in that neighbourhood twice before, and that, too, within the last couple of hours. His keen perception enabled him to recognise the spot, even though his point of view was not favourable. It was curious that the fleeing burglar should have taken refuge on the property of the bank manager, but such was the fact.

Burton's greatest fear, while waiting for Birch, was that of another dog precipitating himself upon the scene. That the thing did not occur within the first few minutes made him come to the conclusion that Mr. Bryant was not the owner of a canine. The watchman felt that he had his man caged but he dreaded the enforced waiting it compelled. It was easy to follow Sam Birch and have it out with him, but no bravery could excuse such an action. It was like hunting a burglar with a lighted candle; the advantage is all with the criminal who has the best possible chance to pick off the other without risk to himself.

But Burton was anxious to learn what was going on at the bank. Matters there must have reached and passed a crisis by this time. It was a pity that he should be compelled to stand idle waiting for his victim to venture out and try it again or to surrender. If the latter was to be the issue it was not likely to take place for a number of hours.

The trees and outbuildings were in alternate moonlight and shadow. The watchman was on the alert and listening, when the outlines of a man appeared approaching the rear of the grounds from the front. He was either someone belonging to "Glenmora" or he had come through the front gate.

When the moonlight fell upon the individual, Burton, with strange emotion, recognised him as his old acquaintance the Superintendent.

"He has his truncheon in hand, too," muttered the watchman. "I wonder whether he's dissatisfied with that blow and wants to try it over again?"

Dixon was anxious to do all he could to repair his blunder. He had striven hard to keep up with the procession and managed to gain enough knowledge of the whereabouts of the two men to believe they were not far from the rear of Mr. Bryant's residence, so he looked for them there and thus met Jack Burton.

Digitized by Google

It took but a minute to explain the situation.

"He's in there," added the watchman, pointing to the small whitewashed building, "and we shall have to wait until he is ready to surrender."

"I see no need of that."

"What can we do?"

"I will bring some of my men and fetch him out."

"'A stag at bay is a dangerous foe,' but that is the best thing to do after all."

"Can you keep him here till we come back?"

"I'll guarantee to do that. I only wish he would come out here, where I can have a chance at him."

The fact that Supt. Dixon was the head of the police of the enterprising town of Middlewick suddenly broke upon that official with all its weight. It was not to be supposed that the fugitive crouching in the barn was aware of the overwhelming fact.

"Wait till I speak to him," he said, walking towards the hay-shed.

"Don't go too close, or he'll fire at you," warned the watchman.

"He will not after I tell him who I am."

The Superintendent had no intention of entering the building, but pausing just below the open door, he called: "Hulloa, you in there!"

"I hear you," came from within.

"I am the Superintendent of the Middlewick Police, and I demand your surrender."

"Why don't you come and take me?"

"If you refuse to give yourself up, I will bring those here who will compel you."

Recognised him as his old acquaintance, the Superintendent.

"What will you do with me if I give in?"

"That remains to be seen; all I can promise is that you shall have justice done you."

"That's what I'm afraid of," was the grim response; "but what is your charge against me? I haven't done anything."

The Superintendent was about to attempt an impressive reply when Burton whispered:

"Tell him you do not know of any charge. The fellow really hasn't done anything this time other than give me a pretty good tussle."

"All you will have to do is to prove your innocence of complicity in the robbery of the bank."

This must have startled the burglar, for, added to what had already taken place, it proved that the intentions of his gang had become known to the authorities. Doubtless he held more than one uncomfortable thought concerning the man who had thus run him down, but unmistakably he was in a tight fix.

"I think it's you that will have to do the proving business, but I'll give myself up," was the unexpected response.

The Superintendent must have felt flattered by this deference to his exalted position.

That Sam Birch was in earnest was proved the next minute by his action.

"Meet me at the front door of my residence," he said, and the couple came round to the front, as requested. Then he came out.

"As a guarantee of good faith," said the watchman, "you will hand over that pistol to Mr. Dixon."

Digitized by Google

The fellow complied. As he did so, the three were standing in the full moonlight. Birch turned and looked so keenly at Jack Burton that the latter smiled and asked: "Do you know me, Sam?"

Birch muttered something, and replied louder:

"Yes, and I'll get even with you for this."

"All right; it's a fair warning, but just at present you'll do as you're told."

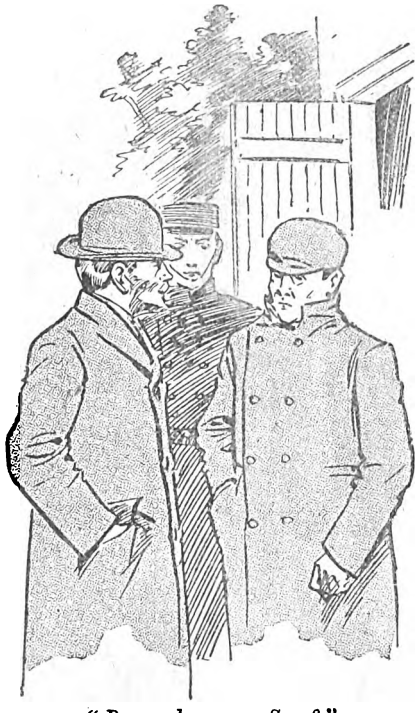
At the request of the Superintendent, Burton walked on one side of the prisoner so as to help guard against any attempt at escape on his part. Shortly after Sam Birch was safely under lock and key.

CHAPTER X.

He was Hard Hit.

Meanwhile a lively scene was going on within the Middlewick Bank. The two policemen heard the parties at the lock of the outer door, while the town clock was striking midnight, and they quietly rose to their feet. It will be remembered that they were at the rear of the building, in the manager's room where they had decided to remain for the present.

Though they had discussed the expected visit over and over again and tried to fix upon their own line of action, it was impossible to do so except in a general way, for a great deal, if not everything, depended upon the course taken by the visitors. If the latter should investigate the interior before beginning their work and so enter the manager's apartment, it would precipitate matters.



"Do you know me, Sam?"

The door connecting it with the outer room was slightly ajar, and the officers stood side by side waiting and listening.

That the burglars were experts could not be doubted. It took them but a few seconds to open the door with one of their skeleton keys, then they found themselves inside with the door shut behind them but not locked.

Naturally, they gave their first attention to the watchman. Old Mr. Warren was stretched out on the floor in the condition of the seven sleepers.

"Well, I'll be hanged," exclaimed Nash, "he's a model watchman. I wish we could always have one like him to deal with."

"Better gag him," suggested the other.

"I don't see the need of that."

He emphasised the last remark by giving the watchman a push with his foot.

The latter showed not the very slightest sensibility to the disturbance.

"Let him alone then," added King; "no need of wasting any time on him."

The couple stood for a minute or two listening intently. Nothing to cause misgiving was heard. The gas was turned up, and by its light the eyes moving hither and thither detected nothing suspicious.

"Let's take a look in there," said King, moving towards the manager's room.

"Hold on," interposed his confederate, "remember we've got plenty to do. It isn't likely any of the bank men are lodging here."

King accepted the suggestion, and the two lightly climbed over the counter and began their preparations.

From the bundle Nash carried he produced several pieces of cloth; these were to deaden the force of the explosion necessary to open the safe. In addition, the bundle contained a quantity of fuse, putty, and a valuable outfit of burglars' implements of the finest make.

These were for active operations. They did not know the combination, nor had they any means of obtaining it. It would not take them long with their admirable tools and their own expertness to bore through the door of the vault, insert the powder, packing the space around the fuse with putty so as to render the explosion complete. The cloth carefully spread over the safe would so muffle the sound that it was not likely to attract the attention of passers-by.

Before operations could be commenced, the cough of the sentinel outside was heard. The couple were doing nothing to make a noise, but they paused and listened. King vaulted lightly over the counter again and turned the key in the lock. Should they find it necessary to leave hurriedly the key could be readily turned, while they were naturally averse to having anyone intrude upon them.

Birch coughed again and, for the first time, the burglars were alarmed. Could it be that their scheme was discovered? They hurriedly re-tied the bundle, ready to fly the moment they were warned to do so.

The understanding with Birch was that the cough meant someone was passing in front of the building. It did not of necessity signify peril to his confederates. If he whistled sharply, it meant "Run at once."

But the whistle was not given. It will be recalled that Mr. Birch was so engaged just then in a controversy with Jack Burton that he forgot about his friends in the building.

"It's all right," whispered Will King. "I thought everybody in this town was asleep by this time."

Justice must be done old Warren while he lies slumbering on the floor. In his remorse over the occurrences of a couple of nights before, he had condemned himself too severely. Besides, there was a reason for his sleeping through those hours, which had not yet come to light.

After his discharge he had slumbered at night like the majority of mankind. Having been awake all day and then summoned to his old duties again just when he was ready to go to bed, he was in sore need of sleep. He had now been unconscious a couple of hours or more, and was liable to awaken at any moment and make trouble.

Appreciating the value of the moments, and believing everything favourable, Nash and King again took out their paraphernalia and made ready for the serious business before them. The first thing was to drill a hole through the front of the vault, just above the combination lock. Nash was on the point of beginning the operation when the door of the manager's room creaked. Bates had accidentally moved it an inch or so.

"Joe," whispered King, straightening himself and looking to the rear. "Did you hear that?"

"It was only the creaking of a door."

"But it wouldn't creak unless someone moved it. I'm going to look in there."

"All right, go ahead."

Digitized by Google

Will King again bounded over the counter and walked towards the director's room. He had noticed through the crack of it that the gas beyond was burning. That, however, did not of necessity signify anything, nor was he apprehensive, but he wished the full assurance that could only come with the absolute knowledge that no person was in the inner apartment.

The door opened inwardly and without any hesitation King pushed it back and stepped across the threshold. In the act of doing so he received a blow from a policeman's truncheon which sent him rolling backwards. Before he could recover, Bates, who had delivered the stroke, was upon him.

Morton bounded past his friend, and, leaving him to attend to his man, gave his attention to Joe Nash.

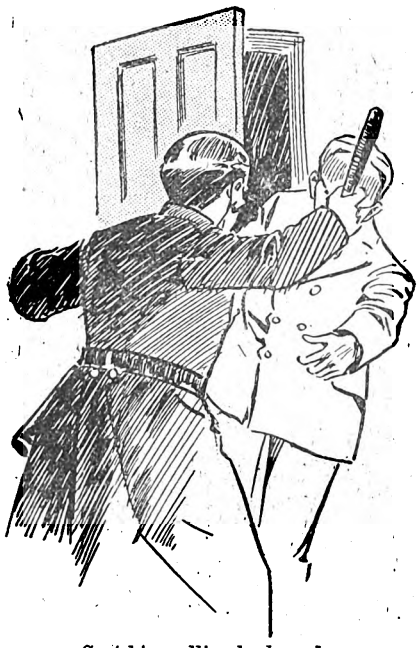
"You'd better come quietly," suggested the officer to the man within the inclosure who was on the point of beginning operations upon the safe. No one could have been more courageous than Constable Morton who went over the counter at a single bound. The daring act was unexpected by Nash and so caught him at a disadvantage.

A sharp struggle ensued, in which the constable appeared to have the advantage until a smart blow between the eyes stunned him completely.

Bates meanwhile had fared better, for, before the half-stunned King could recover himself, a heavier stroke descended, followed by another, which laid him low. Then the constable slipped on the handcuffs.

The sound of his comrade's fall told of the desperate nature of the contest between the other couple, but Bates dare not abandon his man until he had him secure. Just before this was affected, King partially recovered and commenced to resist. Ultimately he was brought into subjection, but it took longer than was anticipated.

During those precious seconds it was a struggle for life on the part of Constable Morton, for consciousness was rapidly leaving him. Quick to see his advantage, Nash put forth every atom of strength he possessed. By a fierce wrench he flung the officer off his chest, and so completely gained the mastery.



Sent him rolling backwards.

The case was one of those in which the burglars threw all restraint to the winds. They were caught and could escape only by putting their assailants out of the way. They had no intention of showing mercy, knowing as they did that none awaited them. Morton bravely did his best but was unequal to the occasion.

Before the burglar—who had become the assailant—could follow up his advantage, an awkward form scrambled over the counter, caught him by the nape of his coat, and held him sideways against the door of the safe.

"Hang you, ain't you ashamed of yourself! Stay there, or I'll pay you."

It was John Warren, the old watchman, who acted and spoke thus. His nap having ended, he was striving to do his duty, still he would have been no match for the younger and more wiry antagonist had he not received help in turn.

Bates, having secured his man, also sprang over the counter, into the inclosure, to learn how Morton was getting on. There was enough light for him to grasp the situation at a glance. The motionless figure of his comrade stretched full length upon the floor led him to believe that he had been killed. It will be understood, therefore, that when Bates brought down his truncheon on the head of Joe Nash, a second blow would have been superfluous. An instant sufficed to secure him against doing any further harm, then Bates gave attention to Morton. He speedily saw that he was badly hurt, though to what extent he could not determine.

"Go and fetch help, Warren, as quickly as you can," said Bates to the watchman.

"Yes, sir. Gracious! If I'd ha' been a second later, it 'ud ha' been all over with him, wouldn't it?"

"Yes, yes. Off with you."

Warren lost no time in obeying commands. He was astonished when he found a strange key in the door.

"How'd that got there?" he asked himself, drawing it out and inspecting it by the gaslight. "It ain't mine, for that's in my pocket."

He thought he did a clever thing when he used his own key to fasten the door, and flung the other one away upon reaching the street.

"That put's an end to any ugly remarks about that," was the satisfied conclusion, though had he thought a little quicker, he must have seen that it could not have mended matters.

The Superintendent and Burton were in another part of the town, but of the half-dozen policemen doing night-duty in Middlewick one was speedily found by the watchman, who, upon hearing what had happened, quickly went to his comrades' assistance. A doctor was secured and taken to the bank. It was strange that the encounter within the building had not become generally known. The only persons found there were the policemen and the two prisoners.

An examination of the wounded constable showed that he had been hard hit, but the doctor pronounced the wound not necessarily dangerous. Morton had rallied and was sitting up, coolly talking over the occurrence.

"I tell you," he said, with a faint smile, as he looked at the watchman, "if it hadn't have been for you, Warren, I should have resigned for good this evening."

They were sweet words to the old man and were heard by all. They were certain to be repeated to Mr. Bryant and, if not too much explanation was demanded by him, were likely to restore his old situation to Warren.

A conveyance was secured and Morton was taken home, where, it may as well be said, he eventually recovered and received a handsome reward, as did his companion, for his bravery in defending the Middlewick bank against the burglars.

The latter, sullen and refusing to speak, were safely lodged in the station about ten minutes before Sam Birch was placed in durance by the Superintendent and Burton.

(To be continued.)

Read the Great War Story in Pearson's Weekly.

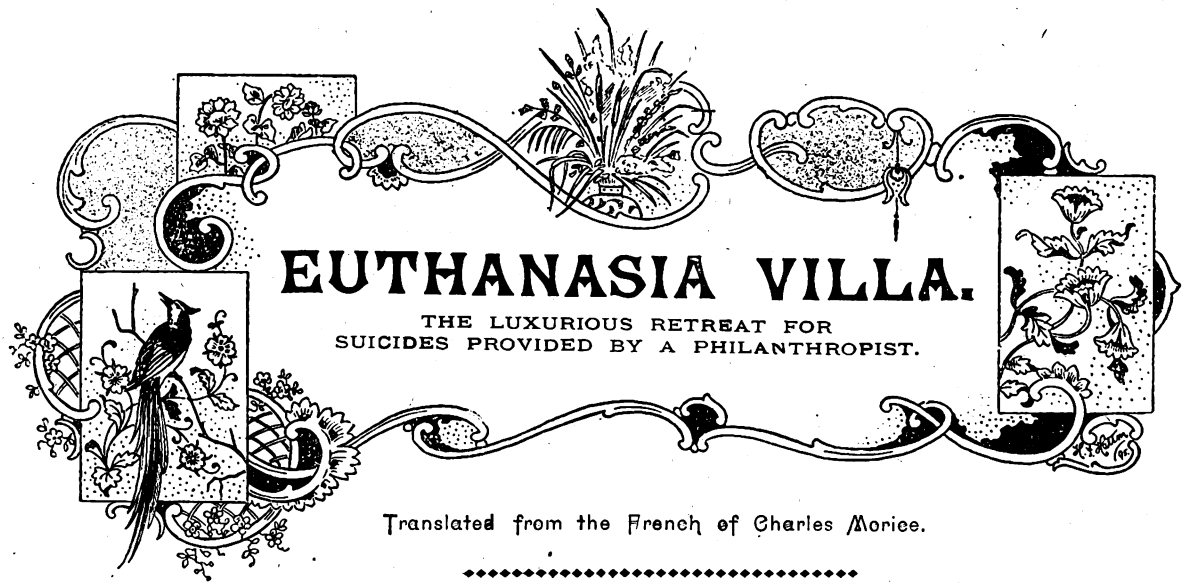
Digitized by Google



EUTHANASIA VILLA.

THE LUXURIOUS RETREAT FOR SUICIDES PROVIDED BY A PHILANTHROPIST.

Translated from the French of Charles Moriee.

In one of the principal squares of the city stood the great philanthropic establishment founded by Mr. Richard Utterex. Its majestic front was no less than two hundred feet long; there were six rows of balcony windows, and over the principal entrance a sign in gilt letters announced that this splendid building was "Euthanasia Villa."

It was to this institution that those who were disgusted with existence came to seek euthanasia; of course it was intended exclusively for the disgusted ones with money, for those who were not blessed with this world's goods could carry out their sinister designs without the assistance offered to the guests of Euthanasia Villa. But, for the unhappy possessors of millions, Mr. Richard Utterex was really a benefactor.

Each day at least three disheartened mortals came and knocked at his door; this is only a figurative way of speaking, for the door remained continually open. This is how the business was conducted.

One day a young man entered the office. Two clerks at once rose to meet him. The stranger advanced three steps. Naturally he was very pale and tottering. An easy-chair was pushed towards him; he dropped into it, and caressed, from time to time, the small carved death's-heads that ornamented the end of the arms. He threw a glance around the office, which was hung in black cloth.

The clerks made the young man a low bow in an automatic fashion; then, without giving him time to reply to their polite salutation or to explain the object of his visit, one of them asked him, in an obsequious voice:

"What manner of death have you chosen?"

Prepared as he must have been for some such question, the desperate young man could not repress an involuntary shudder. The clerks appeared to be much surprised, and, as the guest did not become calm at once, they went up to him with the same automatic step, and, without saying a word, looked at him. This proceeding had the desired effect. The young man felt that he was in a well-conducted establishment, and this reassured him.

One of the clerks said: "Do you wish to see the prospectus?"

"I beg your pardon," said the young man; but he quickly continued: "The prospectus? Oh, yes, certainly, the prospectus."

Then, with the discreet manner of a waiter in a fashionable restaurant who seeks to learn the guest's preference—Pomard or Sauterne—the clerk handed the young man a richly-bound album, wherein were described the different modes of death furnished by the house. The enumeration of these various methods plunged the reader into a shuddering astonishment. At first he ran over them with his finger rather than with his eye, stopping here and there, amused by the marginal illustrations; then he began again, reading seriously this time, without, however, coming to a decision.

Certainly, hanging had its charms; but what poetry there was about asphyxia with flowers! The soul departs with the breath of the tube-rose! And the poisons, rooms Nos. 4 to 10—a vast choice!

But here are the lost diseases! Ah, the lost diseases! To contract by artificial means leprosy or the black death, to offer to the practitioners of the present day, whom the disappearance of those "affections" renders inconsolable, the occasion of studying them "from the life," to carry away in dying the consolation that you leave in your remains a whole field of delicate experiences! That is without doubt incomparably more noble than death by laughter, the simple idea of which gives you a nausea, and dishonours the ingenious enumeration of Mr. Richard Utterex. But there are ill-natured persons who would be offended at this prospect, however glorious it may be, of having these verses written on their bodies; they prefer a sort of aristocracy of silence. What could be better than the lancing of veins in a warm bath?

"Have you made your choice?" insinuated the clerk in a low voice, without changing his attitude.

"But there is such a variety!" replied the desperate young man.

The clerk accepted the compliment with a polite smile.

Digitized by Google

"You must yourself admit," continued the stranger, "that hesitation is excusable under the circumstances."

"Perhaps it would be well to visit the establishment?"

"That will suit me exactly."

"Whenever it will please you to do so."

For the first time the two clerks broke off their work; one opened the office door and stepped aside to allow the guest to pass, and the other indicated the way with an almost affectionate wave of the hand. The young man's first impulse was to obey; but at the second step he changed his mind, and said timidly:

"I should first like to know how much—in short, the terms."

"The price, sir," replied from the end of the room the voice of Mr. Richard Utterex himself, who had just come in, "varies with the class of accommodation desired, and guests pay only on leaving the house."

The young stranger, seeming still undecided, his conductor gently placed his hand upon his arm and invited him to follow. Giving up all thought of resistance he obeyed, and began his tour of Euthanasia Villa.

In the large vestibule of a spacious staircase the visitor was shown, with a reverential bow, which he involuntarily imitated, a large statue of the great Schopenhauer, the patron of the institution. Then they proceeded upstairs.

A door opened; it was the chamber called the Pistol Shot. Like all the other rooms in the house, this was light and elegantly furnished in modern style. As in all the others, too, its principal ornament was a handsome coffin in carved ebony; the cover was placed crosswise on the box, as though awaiting its occupant. There were several divans and reclining chairs about the room; the bed was in rosewood.

"Everything is conducted here with the most perfect discretion," said the guide: "A system of electrical currents, moved by the report, divides in two, lengthwise, whatever piece of furniture the guest has chosen to commit suicide on; a long basket receives the body before it has had time to stain the furniture or the floor with a single spot. Kindly observe that the walls are upholstered with a thickness of four mattresses, so that it is impossible for anyone on the other side of the partition to hear the faintest sound, however powerful the firearm used, even though it were a small Krupp cannon, such as you see there in the corner. Guests have all the time they wish; we never hurry them. Each room is provided with a library abundantly furnished with the most melancholy works. Schopenhauer has been translated for us into all the languages of the old and new worlds.

"Those ten shelves are full of novels that end badly. Upon the eleventh preachers of various religions sound the praises of death. Some serious philosophers and a few poets, Lucretius and Leopardi, occupy the twelfth shelf. As for the conveniences of life (before departing), they leave nothing to be desired. A telephone in each chamber communicates with the office. Orders for meals or whatever else is wanted are executed with the utmost promptness by faceless automatons; we keep a whole company of them here. This delicate attention on Mr. Utterex's part is generally very highly appreciated, for people who are so disgusted with life that they are ready to commit suicide wish to see the human face no more. Finally, will you kindly examine the racks? there you will find either terrible, elegant, or brutal instruments of sudden death."

The visitor took down a pistol and examined it.

"Be careful; they are all loaded."

One by one the stranger saw all the philanthropic ideas imagined by Mr. Richard Utterex. In the Asphyxia chamber, after having explained the perfect obstructions that prevent air from entering when once the door is closed, the clerk proposed to the visitor a brief experience, so that he might judge for himself of its efficiency. This offer, which is rarely accepted, was declined, as charcoal and laughing-gas have but little attraction except as a last resort. Tube-roses tempt more, most of the suicide neophytes being afflicted with sentimentalism. Large masses of fresh flowers were everywhere about the chamber, harmonising with the designs of the carpet and the hangings.

"If you would like a special essence you can have it, for we cultivate all kinds of plants in the large conservatory adjoining the hotel."

"No; it is very complete as it is."

And the inspection was resumed.

The stranger stopped with some curiosity on the third floor, at a landing where there were three doors, each one bearing a sign: "For Science."

The guide pretended to pass by, at the same time watching the astonished young man out of the corner of his eye.

"Well?" queried the stranger.

"Those rooms are occupied, and they are often taken, I must say, to the credit of humanity."

"How so? What takes place within?"

"Mr. Utterex here offers an opportunity of rendering by one's death a great service to human kind. Here in the Experimental Chamber magnanimous individuals, who care nothing about their lives, experiment on substances, to prove to Science whether they are harmless or toxical; others submit themselves to cruel surgical operations and successive mutilations that give the exact measurement of human sensibility. Some days ago a young Russian had a quarter of his cranium sawed off; he survived exactly three hours and fifty minutes. The house doctor, Mr. O'Neil, was wild with joy. 'What a splendid experiment!' he cried."

The stranger tried to share Mr. O'Neil's enthusiasm, but his teeth chattered.

"The Stake Chamber—the death of Hercules! The walls and the ceiling are in precious paste, and are fireproof. The quartering—all you have to do is to place your ankles and wrists in these collars, held to the walls by electric bands. This stool, upon which the person sits, rests upon a button, the pressure on which starts four equal and contrary currents. Submitted to the action of forces rigorously symmetrical, the limbs are at once torn apart. The Decapitation Chamber——"

The visitor remained stupefied at the sight of a marvellous guillotine, in cedar wood, with a keen and gleaming knife. The guide, with the half-smiling manner that he would use to beg you to excuse the trick of a child, opened a wardrobe.

"We reserve here, for the use of imaginative persons, the costume of Louis the Sixteenth. Besides, the blade, in falling, touches a music-box, which at once imitates the historical rolling of Santeree's drums. The Strangulation Chamber—two bow-strings fixed to a small board at the height of the bed, fly to the ceiling and remain there if one puts the weight of his feet upon it. Electricity also plays the principal rôle in 'death by laughter.' This is a concealed method; a bed that looks comfortable and invites you to sleep, but as soon as a living person is stretched upon it he is riveted by irresistible grapnels, while the illusive couch is instantly decomposed into a multitude of minute brushes, very soft and yet very stiff, which run over the patient's body imitating the pricklings of millions of insects, stopping by preference on the joints, and never ceasing to play strange and skipping marches upon the soles of the feet—but what is the matter, sir?"

Digitized by Google

The young visitor's face was white; he had slowly tottered back to the wall and was leaning against it for support. Suddenly it seemed to him—pure hallucination, of course—that the artificial insects just described by his guide were making wild excursions from his head to his feet.

"What manner of death have you chosen?"

The stranger was feverishly agitated. "I cannot—I shall prefer——"

"To visit the establishment again, perhaps?"

"No, no!"

"However, you must choose some——"

"Yes, of course, I must; it is evident——"

He gradually regained his self-possession, and at the same time his love of life. He assumed not without effort an easy air, and an appearance of indifference to the physical terrors at which in reality he still inwardly trembled. Suddenly, as though illumined with an idea he said:

"Let us go downstairs."

When they reached the third floor he pointed to the Experimental Chamber, and said:

"You say it is occupied?"

"Yes, it is occupied."

"What a pity! Well," and the stranger affected to contemplate longingly the forbidden threshold—"well, I will wait. Let us descend."

In passing before Schopenhauer's statue he could not help looking it straight in the face, with a sort of defiance.

At the office he was received by Mr. Utterex himself, who welcomed him with a gentle smile.

"The room that I have selected," began the young man, with an easy air——

"The Experimental Chamber?"

"Yes."

"It is occupied," said Mr. Utterex, still smiling, and at the same time offering the visitor a thin sheet of bristol board with gilt edges, on which was written:

Mr. X. to Richard Utterex. Dr.:

To restoring love of life.....£1,000.

LOST:

A Strange Story of a Mysterious Disappearance.

How beautiful she was in her superb calmness; so graceful, so mild, and yet so majestic! Ah, I was a younger man then, of course, than I am now, and possibly more impressionable; but I thought her the most perfect creature I had ever beheld. And, even now, looking back through the gathering mists of time and the chilling frosts of advancing age, and recalling what she was, I endorse that earlier sentiment—she lives in my memory now, as she lived in my presence then, as the most perfect creature ever beheld.

I had gone the round of all the best boarding-houses in town, when at last I went to Mrs. Honeywold's, and there, in her small, unpretending establishment, I, General Leslie Anchester, having been subdued, I trust to a humble and proper state of mind by my past experiences, agreed to take up my abode.

And it was there I first met her! Here was the early maturity of loveliness, perfect in repose, with mild, thoughtful eyes, intelligent and tender, a trifle sad at times, but lighting up with quick brilliancy as some new object met her view, or some vivid thought darted its lightning flash through her brain—for she was wonderfully quick of perception—with an exquisite figure. She spent little on dress (I was sure she was not wealthy); but though there was little variety, her dress was exquisitely neat and in perfect good taste of some soft glossy fabric, smooth as silk and lustrous as satin, and of the softest shade of silver-grey, that colour so beautiful in itself, and so becoming to beautiful wearers; simply made, but fitting with a nicety, more like the work of nature than of art, to every curve and outline of that full and stately figure, and finished off round her white throat with something scarcely whiter. She never wore ornaments of any kind—no chain, no brooch, no ring, or pin.

She had twins—two beautiful, blue-eyed young things, wonderfully like herself—little shy, graceful creatures, always playful. She never spoke of her own affairs, and affable as she was, and gentle in manner, there was something about her which repelled intrusion.

When, after some weeks' residence there, I had gained the goodwill of my simple-minded but kindly little landlady, I cautiously ventured to ask her to gratify my not, I think, unnatural curiosity; but I found, to my surprise, she knew but little more than I did myself.

"She came to me," she said, "just at the end of the evening, one cold, rainy night, and I could not refuse to give her shelter—at least for the night, or till she could do better. I did not think of her remaining; but she is so pretty, and gentle, and innocent-looking, I could not turn her out of my house: could I now? I know I am a silly in such ways; but what could I do?"

"But is it possible," I said, "that she has remained here ever since, and you know nothing more about her?"

"No more than you do yourself, General," said Mrs. Honeywold. "I do not even know where she lived before she came here. I cannot question her, and now, indeed, I have become so fond of her I should not be willing to part with her; and I would not turn her and her little ones out of the house for the world!"

Digitized by Google

Further conversation elicited the fact that she was not a boarder, but that she and her little ones were dependent upon Mrs. Honeywold's charity.

One fine summer day I had made an appointment with a friend to drive out to his place in the suburbs and dine with him, returning in the evening. When I came down in the afternoon, dressed for my excursion, I went into the dining-room to tell Mrs. Honeywold she need not wait for me. As I came through the parlour she was there alone. She was sitting on the sofa. A book lay near her, but I do not think she had been reading. She was sitting perfectly still, as if lost in reverie, and her eyes looked heavy with sleep or thought. But as I passed out of the room I looked back. I saw she had risen to her feet, and standing with her graceful figure drawn up to its full height, she was looking after me, with a look which I flatter myself was a look of interest. Ah, how well I remembered that look!

The day had been a beautiful one, though sultry; but in the early evening we had a heavy thunder-shower, the violence of the summer rain delaying my return to town for an hour or two; and when the rain ceased, the evening was still starless, cloudy, and damp; and as I drove back to town I remembered that the night air, although somewhat freshened by the rain, was warm and heavy with the scent of unseen flowers.

It was late when I reached the quiet street where I had taked up my abode, and as I mounted the steps I involuntarily felt for my latchkey, but to my surprise I found the hall-door not only unfastened, but a little way opened.

"Why, how is this, Mrs. Honeywold?" I said, as my landlady met me in the hall. "Do you know that your street door was left open?"

"Yes," she said quietly, "I know it."

"But is it safe?" I asked, as I turned to lock the door; "and so late, too."

"I do not think there is any danger," she said. "I was on the watch; I was in the hall waiting myself."

"Not waiting for me, I hope?" said I; "that was surely unnecessary."

"No, not for you," she answered, "I presume you can take care of yourself; but," she added, in a low voice, "she is out, and I was waiting to let her in."

"Out at this time of night!—that seems strange. Where has she gone?"

"I do not know."

"And how long as she been gone?" I asked, as I hung up my hat.

"I cannot tell just what time she went out," she said; "I know she was in the garden with the little ones, and came in just before tea. After they had had their suppers and gone to bed, I saw her in the parlour alone, and when I came into the room again, she was gone, and she has not returned, and I——"

"Oh, then, she went out before the rain, did she?"

"Yes, sir, sometime before the rain."

"Oh, then, that explains it; she was probably caught out by the rain, and took shelter somewhere and has been persuaded to stay. There is nothing to be alarmed at; you had better not wait up another minute."

"But I don't like to shut her out, General; I should not sleep a wink."

"Nonsense, nonsense!" I said. "Go to bed, you silly woman; you will hear her when she comes, of course, and can come down and let her in." And so saying, I retired to my own room.

The next morning at breakfast, I noticed that my landlady was looking pale and troubled.

"Well, Mrs. Honeywold," I said, with assumed cheerfulness, as she handed my coffee to me, "how long did you have to sit up? What time did she come in?"

"She did not come in all night, General," said my landlady, in a troubled voice. "She has not come home yet, and I am very anxious about it."

"No need of that, I trust," I said reassuringly; "she will come this morning, no doubt."

"I don't know. I wish I was sure of that. I don't know what to make of it. I don't understand it. She never did so before. How she could have stayed out, and left those two blessed little things all night; and she always seemed such a tender, loving mother, too; I don't understand it."

When I returned at dinner-time, I found matters still worse. She had not been seen. My poor landlady was almost in hysterics, though she tried hard to control herself.

To satisfy her, I went off to consult the police. My mission was not encouraging. They promised to do their best, but gave slight hopes of a successful result.

So sad, weary, and discouraged, I returned home, only to learn there were no tidings of the missing one.

"I give her up now," said my weeping landlady; "I shall never see her again. She is lost for ever, and these two poor, pretty little creatures——"

"By-the-way," I said, "if she never does return, what will you do with them?"

"Keep them!" said the generous and impulsive little woman.

"I wanted to say, if she does not return, I will, if you like, relieve you of them. My sister, who lives with me, and keeps my house, is a very tender-hearted woman."

"No! no!" sobbed the poor woman. "I cannot part with them. I am a poor woman, it is true, but not too poor to give them a home: and while I have a bit and a sup for myself they shall have one too. Their poor mother left them here, and if she ever does return she shall find them here. If she never returns, then——"

And she never did return, and no tidings of her fate ever reached us. If she was enticed away by artful blandishments, or kidnapped by cruel violence, we know not. But I honestly believe the latter. Either way, it was her fatal beauty that led her to destruction; for, as I have said before, she was the most perfect creature, the most beautiful Maltese cat that I ever beheld in my life. I am sure she never deserted her two pretty little kittens of her own accord. And if, poor dumb thing, she was stolen and killed for her beautiful fur, still I say, as I said at first, she was "more sinned against than sinning."

Edith Summers.

Digitized by Google

LEGENDS OF WOLFVILLE.

BY "DAN QUINN."

Wolfville is a Cattleman's Settlement in Arizona, and the Characters in these Legends are Cowboys.

No. 8.—Short Creek Dave Gets Religion.

Short Creek Dave was a leading citizen of the little camp of Wolfville. In fact his friends would not have scrupled at the claim that Short Creek Dave was a leading citizen of Arizona. So when the news came over from Tucson that Short Creek, who had been paying that metropole a breezy visit, had in an inadvertent moment strolled within the confines of a Gospel meeting then and there being waged, and suffered conversion, Wolfville became a prey to some excitement.

"I tells him," says Tutt, who brought back the tidings, "not to go tamperin' 'round this ere meetin'. But he have done it. He jeest keeps pervadin' about the goin' place, and looks like as I can't get him away. Says I: 'Dave, you don't understand this ere game they're turnin' inside, so you jeest keep out a whole lot; you'll be safer.' But warnin's ain't no good; Short Creek Dave don't regard 'em a little bit."

"This yere Short Creek is allers speshul obstinate that away," said the driver of the Tucson stage, "and he gets them moods frequent, when he jest won't stay where he is, nor go anywhere else. I don't wonder you don't do nuthin' with him."

"Well," said Cherokee Hall, "I reckon Short Creek knows his business. I ain't myself none astonished much by these yere news. I knows him to do some mighty funny things; sech as breakin' a pair of jacks to draw to a three-flush, and it seems like he's just a pursooin' of his usual system in this here religious break. However, he'll be at Wolfville to-morrow, and then we'll know a mighty sight more about it; pending which, let's licker, Mr. Barkeep; please inquire out the nose colour for the band."

The people of Wolfville there present saw no reason to pursue the discussion so pleasantly ended, and drew near the bar. The debate took place in the Gold Mine Saloon; so, as one observed on the issuance of Cherokee's invitation, "They were not far from centres." Cherokee himself was a suave courtier of fortune, who presided behind his own faro game, and, reputed to possess a straight deal box, held high place in the Wolfville breast.

The next day came, and Wolfville began to suffer increased excitement. This feeling grew as the time for the coming of the Tucson stage approached. An outsider might not have detected this warmth. It found its evidences in the unusual activity of monte, high ball, stud, and kindred relaxations; while faro, too, showed a boom spirit, and white chips, which were a commodity ordinarily disposed of at the rate of two bits per white chip, had, under the heightened pulse of the public, gone, in some games, to the dizzy pinnacle of 25 dollars a stack. At last, out of the grey and heated plain, a cloud of dust announced the coming of the stage. Stacks were cashed and games cleaned up, and presently the male population of Wolfville was in the street, to catch as early a glimpse as might be of the newly converted one.

"I don't reckon now he's goin' to look sech a whole lot different neither," said Faro Nell, as she stood near Cherokee Hall, awaiting the coming coach.

"I wonder would it do to ask Dave for a drink?" said Tutt, in a tone of vague inquiry.

"Shore," said Old Monte, "an' why not?"

"Oh, nuthin', why not?" replied Tutt, as he watched the stage come up. "Only he's nacherally a mighty peevish man, that away, an' I don't suppose how his enterin' the fold has reduced the restlessness of that six-shooter of hes'n none whatever."

"All the same," said Cherokee Hall, "politeness among gentlemen should allers be observed; an' I asks this yere Short Creek to drink as soon as ever he comes; an' I ain't lookin' to see him take it none invidious, neither."

With a rattle of chains and a creaking of straps, the stage and its six high-headed horses pulled up at the post-office door. The mail bags were kicked off, the Wells-Fargo boxes were tumbled into the street, and, in the general rattle and crush, the eagerly-expected Short Creek Dave stepped off. There was possibly a more eager scanning of his person in the thought that the great inward change might have its outward evidences; a more vigorous shaking of his hand, perhaps; but beyond those, curious interest did not go. Not a word nor a look touching Short Creek's religious exploits betrayed the question which was tugging at the Wolfville heart. Wolfville was too polite, and then, again, Wolfville was too courteous. Next to horse-stealing, curiosity is the greatest crime of the frontier, and the one most ferociously resented. Wolfville just expressed its polite satisfaction in Short Creek Dave's return, and took it out in hand-shaking. The only incident worth a record was when Cherokee Hall said in a tone of bland friendship:

"I don't reckon now, Dave, you're objectin' to whisky after your ride?"

"I ain't done so usual," said Dave cheerfully, "but this yere time, Cherokee, I'll leave to pass. Jest confidin' the truth to you all, I'm a little bit off on them beverages jest now, an' I'm allowin' to tell you the win an' lose thereof a little later on. An' now if you all will excuse me, I'll canter over to the O. K. House an' feed myself some."

Digitized by Google

"I shore reckon he's converted," said Tutt, as he shook his head gloomily. "I wouldn't care none, only it's me as gets Dave to go over to Tucson this yere time; an' so I feels responsible."

"Well, what of it?" said Old Monte, with a sudden burst of energy. "I don't see no kick comin' to anyone, nor why this yere's to be regarded. If Dave wants to be religious and sing them hymns a heap you bet that's his American right. I'll jest gamble a hundred dollars Dave comes out all even an' protects his game clear through."

The next day the excitement had begun to subside, when a notice posted on the post-office door caused it to rise again. The notice announced that Short Creek Dave would preach that evening in the big warehouse of the New York Store.

"I reckon we better all go," said Cherokee Hall. "I'm goin' to turn my box an' close the game at 7.30 sharp; seeing as how several ladies is due to sing a lot in the choir. We might jest as well turn out and give Short Creek the best turn in the wheel, jest to start him along the new trail."

"That's whatever," said Tutt who had recovered from his first gloom, and now entered into the affair with spirit.

That evening the New York warehouse was as brilliantly lighted as a wild abundance of candles could make it. All Wolfville was there. As a result of a discussion held in private with Short Creek Dave, and by that convert's own request, Cherokee Hall took a seat at the dry-good's box which was to serve as a pulpit, to assist in the conduct of the meeting. The congregation disposed itself about on the improvised benches which the ardour of Tutt had provided. At eight o'clock Short Dave walked up the space in the centre reserved as an aisle in company with Cherokee Hall, this latter gentleman carrying a gigantic Bible, which he placed on the dry goods box. Rapping gently on the box for order, Cherokee addressed the meeting briefly:

"This yere is a prayer meeting of the camp," said Cherokee, "and I am asked by Dave to preside, which I accordin' do. No one need make any mistake about this yere gatherin' on account of my presence. This yere is a religious meetin'. I'm not myself given that way, but I'm allers glad to meet people what is, and see that they have a chance in for their ante, and their game is protected. I am one of those, too, who believes a little religion wouldn't hurt this camp much. Next to a lynchin' I don't know of a more excellent influence in a Western camp than these yere meetin's. I ain't expectin' to be in on this play none myse'f, an' jest set here in the name of order an' for the purpose of a square deal. I now introduce to you a gentleman who is liable to be as good a preacher as ever banged a Bible — your townsman, Short Creek Dave."

"Mr. President," said Short Creek Dave, turning to Cherokee.

"Short Creek Dave," said Cherokee sententiously, at the same time bowing gravely in recognition.

"And, ladies and gentlemen of Wolfville," continued Dave, "I shall open this yere play with a prayer."

The prayer proceeded. It was fervent and earnest, and replete with unique expressions and personal allusions. In these last, the congregation took a breathless interest. Towards the close Dave bent his energies in supplication for the regeneration of Texas Thompson, whom he represented in his orisons as a good man, but living a misguided and vicious life. The audience was listening with grave and approving attention when there came an interruption. It was Texas Thompson who rose to address the chair.

"Mr. President," said Texas Thompson, drawing a long breath, "I object to Dave a-tacklin' of the Redeemer for me, and a-makin' of statements which aim to show I'm nothin' more'n a felon. This yere talk is liable to queer me up on high, an I objects to it."

"Prayer is a free-for-all game, and thar ain't no limit on to it," said Cherokee. "The chair, therefore, decided agin' the p'int of order."

"Well, then," rejoined Texas Thompson, "a-waivin' of the usual appeal to the house, all I have got to say is this: I'm a peaceful man, an' have allers been the friend of Short Creek Dave, and I even assists at an' promotes this yere meetin'. But I gives notice yere now, if Short Creek Dave keeps on a-malignin' of me to the Great White throne as heretofore, I'll shore call on him to make them statements good with his gun as soon as the contreebution box is passed."

"The chair informs the gent," said Cherokee, with vast dignity, "that Dave, bein' now an evangelist, can't make no gun plays nor go canterin' out to shoot as of a former day. However, the chair recognises the rights of the gent, an' standin' as the chair does, in the position of look-out to this yere game, the chair will be ready to back his play with a 'Colt's 45' as soon as ever church is out, in person."

"Mr. President," said Dave, "jest let me have a word in yere. I've looked up things a little, an' I finds that the Apostle Peter, who was a main guy of them days, scrupled not to fight. Now, I follers Peter's lead in this. I might add, too, that while it gives me pain to be obliged to shoot up Deacon Thompson in the first half of the meetin' we holds in Wolfville, still the path of duty is cl'ar, an' I shall shorely walk therein, fearin' nothin'. I therefore moves we adjourn ten minutes, an' there is plenty of moon outside, if the chair will lend me its gun—I not packin' of sech frivolities no more, a-regardin' of 'em in the light of sinful bluffs—I shall trust to Providence to convince Texas Thompson that he's away off in this matter. You bet I knows my business."

"Unless objection is heard, this yere meetin' will stand adjourned for fifteen minutes," said Cherokee, at the same time passing over his six-shooter.

Thirty paces were stepped off, and the men stood up in the moonlight street, while the congregation made a line of admiration on the sidewalk.

"I counts one, two, three, and drops the contribution box," said Cherokee, "wharupon you all fires and advances at will. Be you all ready?"

The shooting began on the word, and when the smoke cleared away, Texas Thompson had a bullet in his shoulder.

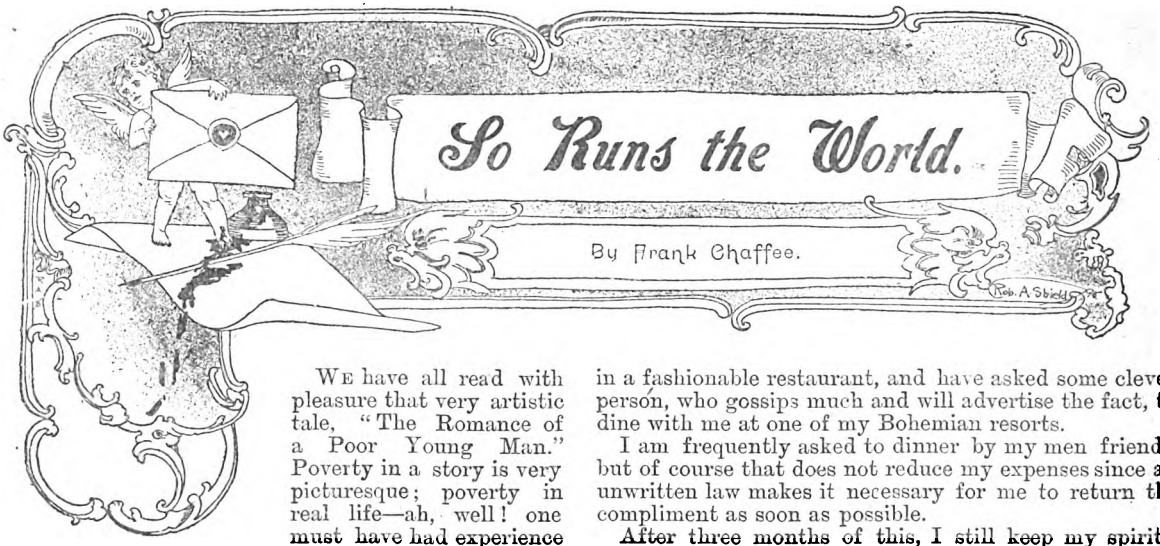
"The congregation will now take its seats in the store," said Cherokee, "and the deal will be resoomed. Two of you'll carry Texas over to the hotel, and fix him up all right. This yere shows concloosive that Short Creek Dave is licensed from above to pray for whoever he pleases, and I'm mighty glad it occurs. It's shorely goin' to promote confidence in his ministrations."

The concourse was duly in its seats when Dave reached the pulpit.

"I will now resoome my intercessions for our fortunate brother, Texas Thompson," said he.

"I knowed he would," said Cherokee, as two dollars came over from the wounded man to the contribution box. "Texas Thompson is an honourable man, an' you can gamble religious truths always assert themselves."

Digitized by Google



We have all read with pleasure that very artistic tale, "The Romance of a Poor Young Man." Poverty in a story is very picturesque; poverty in real life—ah, well! one must have had experience of it to know what it really is.

I write this as the first realising sense comes upon me of what it means to be poor. It is now three months since I lost my position. I had lived up to the last penny of my salary—lived luxuriously, in fact. My rooms were as smart and as artistic as any in town. I was very much in the cultivated Bohemian set, and one might always meet at my apartments, not the greatest, perhaps, but those on the road to greatness, in the field of art and letters. I was known to dabble in literary work myself, and my small achievements, having some glitter about them, were much overrated by everyone except the editors to whom I tried to sell them, generally without success.

I look back on all this as I write, and do not regret it. It was an education, this meeting and being surrounded by witty, brainy people; and as for the money—ye gods! What is money for if not to buy us the things we want? The prudent ones will say my course was foolish and improvident; those wiser ones, wise with the wisdom of simplicity, will say I did well; in any case it is in the past.

The firm by which I had been employed went out of business, and I found myself stranded. A man of thirty, who has held his head high, may not go out and look for a position, like an office boy. He may let it be known that he is available, and then wait to be sought. I waited, times were hard, and so few firms were looking for experienced men, or willing to pay such a salary as I could accept.

I have managed to keep my rooms, by selling some valuable scarf pins and other jewellery owned. My friends generally suppose me to have an income, or at least to be making a good deal with my pen; and since I do not visibly curtail my expenses, it is a reasonable supposition. My economies have been in the things which people have not seen. I have risen late, made coffee in my rooms, and with it I have taken a roll or a biscuit or two. Having breakfasted so late and so plentifully, I naturally take no luncheon. At night I urge my Bohemian tastes as an excuse for dining at the cheapest of the table d'hôte resorts.

The stipend that I do obtain from some paltry newspaper work serves to pay these expenses. Occasionally I have been fortunate enough to sell a story or a sketch, and then I have allowed myself to be seen at breakfast in a fashionable restaurant, and have asked some clever person, who gossips much and will advertise the fact, to dine with me at one of my Bohemian resorts.

I am frequently asked to dinner by my men friends, but of course that does not reduce my expenses since an unwritten law makes it necessary for me to return the compliment as soon as possible.

After three months of this, I still keep my spirits, outwardly; still am able to say laughingly, when questioned:

"I don't know whether I shall go back to a commercial life or not; Bohemia is very fascinating."

Three months! It is becoming a strain physical and mental. How can I keep my rooms? I have no more jewellery to sell. I fear to sell anything else, lest it should be noticed—and my position is almost entirely dependent upon my rooms.

* * * * *

I have sold an old etching for enough to pay my rent for another month. One of my newspaper outlets was closed to-day. The editor, who is a good friend of mine said: "To tell you the truth, old chap, I have given your column to a poor devil who really needs the money."

I went away and called at another newspaper office. I boldly told the editor I wanted a position. He laughed as he said:

"Oh, your pen is too clever for hack work—you would better stick to special articles."

"Can you use some specials?" I asked.

"Well, not just at present," he replied, "but do us something in your fresh, breezy style, and we will use it as soon as we can."

I have tried to write to-night, tried to be fresh and breezy. One might as well try to fly with a mill-stone tied to one's neck. Who was it said a man could do his best literary work with the wolf howling at the door? Whoever it was, I'll wager he had dined well when he had said it.

* * * * *

Hurrah! I have received a cheque for a story I sold a month ago. I had quite forgotten it. To be sure it is only a small amount. A few months ago I should have spent it for a box of cigars, and have thought no more about it; now I must stretch it to the utmost, but, at least, I will ask Carlos to dine with me once. Good, true-hearted Carlos, he wonders why he sees so little of me nowadays. I tell him I am writing, that I am doing some serious work. Carlos, old chap, did you but know the truth, did you but know that your friend whose lighter vein so entertains you is sometimes hungry, how your heart would ache, and how you would open your purse and insist upon sharing your plenty!

Why is it I may not take the money I so much need from Carlos, who has plenty, and who loves me better than any brother? A man may not take money that he does not earn. I would like to take money from Carlos, and yet there is something within me that will not let me.

Digitized by Google

* * * * *

I took Carlos to dinner last night. We had a nice little dinner and a bottle of wine. It made a sad hole in my little capital; but Carlos was so happy, and said it seemed so like old times, and then we came up to my rooms and smoked and chatted. Carlos smoked his college pipe, a great meerschaum, which he had spent his four college years in colouring. When he got up to go home, he looked at the pipe tenderly, and, turning to me, said:

"Old chap, I want to give you this pipe. I know you like it, and I want you to have it."

Dear old Carlos, he loves that pipe better than anything he owns; and so he gives it to me, whom he loves even better. Ah, me! and even to him I may not tell the truth about myself. I must arrange that Carlos shall one day have his pipe back again, and if things do not shape themselves soon in a better way for me, I shall—well, I don't know what I shall do.

* * * * *

To-night I am dazed. I have to-day been searching for a position—for something to do, for anything by which a gentleman may earn his bread. I have urged my ability, have offered to do anything that a gentleman may. I have called on every one of influence in the commercial and literary world. They decline to see that I need what I ask for; I cannot impress them with my seriousness. Great Heavens! Is it only the creatures who wear their hearts on their sleeves, and who shed tears in public, that can be taken seriously? Is sympathy given only to noisy anguish? Is a helping hand held out only to him who whimpers about his troubles and whines for help?

* * * * *

I find that I can give up sugar and cream with my coffee in the morning. It saves quite a little, and as the coffee is less palatable, one does not drink so much, so that also is a saving. I take my dinner in my rooms now. There is rather a sameness in each day's bill of fare, but I dare say it is healthful; and after all, one should eat to live, not live to eat. I wonder how long a man can live on such fare?

* * * * *

I am getting deplorably thin. I fancy it is having so much uncertainty on my mind. My clothes are really absurd, they hang so loosely on me. Carlos came back from a yatching trip to-day, looking brown as a berry. He looked at me a minute, and then said:

"Jove, old man, you've grown thin. I suppose you are working like a slave, and I dare say you have ruined your appetite. I don't believe you eat enough."

Good Carlos, I could not tell him how right he was, nor why.

"Look here, old chap, come away and dine with me. I'll bet I'll order a dinner you can eat," said Carlos.

A man who has not the price of a dinner for himself may not accept a dinner from his friend, so I could only say:

"Thank you, no, Carlos. I have some work to do. I'll get a bite later;" and Carlos was hurt and left me.

* * * * *

Being very poor was harder than I thought, and I was getting so desperately weak that I seemed to be losing my grip—but I don't think that any one guesses how poor I am. My stock of clothes holds out well, and I think they will last as long as I—as long as usual. I seem to be drifting towards something, I don't know what.

* * * * *

Another month has gone, and my rent is far overdue. The landlord is very considerate, and had given me ten day's grace. I do not seem to have any spirit left. I was severely criticised to-day at one newspaper office where I still have a little work—they say that my work has lost its snap and brilliancy. I could not tell them that a hungry man could not be brilliant, and I promised to get back to the old vein.

* * * * *

I wonder what men do who are as poor as I, and have others dependent upon them. Thank God, I have no one—no one to whom I am everything. If anything should happen to me, a lot of people would be madly sorry for a few days, and say:

"Clever chap, but lacked force." "Brilliant, perhaps but oh, so ill-balanced!" Then they would forget me. Carlos? Well, Carlos would care, yes, and grieve truly for the friend that he loved, without even understanding.

* * * * *

My ten days' grace with the rent is up. I must give up my rooms, but I will give them up in my own way. I have been reading in something of Kipling's how the chaps in India speak of dying as "going out." I think I will "go out." I think I will "go out."

I don't like the idea of suicide. I have always held it cowardly and weak. I have said that a man who took his own life was a fool—well, I was right, he is a fool, therefore he should die.

I wonder if I have strength enough to carry me to the river that will be kind to me and tell no tales. I must destroy this journal first, or all my efforts to keep my secret will be lost, and they will know I have been hungry.

I don't understand this peculiar faintness that comes over me now and then. It must be because I have not eaten anything to-day. Ah, well, many better men have fared worse.

"Going out." I like that phrase; and yet, going out into what? Going out into what? Going where? Oh, I do not know! I will not go out into an unknown country. Better bear the ills we have than to fly to those——

* * * * *

The papers of the next morning contained the following notice:

Suddenly, of heart failure, John Carlisle, aged thirty years. Mr. Carlisle, whose death occurred yesterday, will be much missed in literary and artistic circles, where he was a great favourite. He has been a contributor to most of our periodicals, and wielded a brilliant pen. Mr. Carlisle was a man of wealth and good social position. He has been failing in health for some time.

It was Carlos who came in late that night to find his friend lying, with the pen still in his fingers, pointing towards the unfinished sentence. No one but Carlos has ever seen that journal, and it is Carlos now who writes it here, that those who run may read, and learn the lesson.

Digitized by Google

By Winifred Graham. Author of "Through the Valley," "Six First-Class Passengers," etc.

CHAPTER XXI.

Life is Thorny, and Youth is Vain.

When Quamina can be quieted and her fears calmed, the truth is gradually drawn from her. She has seen a man in a black mask prowling on his hands and knees in the bushes round the house. She leant out of her window and screamed, whereupon he sprang on to a horse, and galloped up the hill like a madman.

Quamina cannot be persuaded it is not the devil himself haunting their domain, and is petrified with terror for the rest of the evening.

"I should feel inclined to put the masked man down to Quamina's vivid imagination," declares Eleanor, "if you had not personally encountered him, Carol. He is like a sort of 'troll,' one of Ibsen's 'helpers and servers.'"

Quinton has given Eleanor "The Master Builder" to read, himself being a believer in the strange theory of will power. He is much upset by Quamina's story, bewildered at the mystery shrouding this evil demon. His life is becoming a purgatory on earth; he goes in daily dread of some fresh disaster. He says little to Eleanor, but she notices he does not sit out in the verandah, preferring the shelter of four walls, as if in mortal fear of something.

"Does he picture a phantom shooting in the dark?" she wonders.

She offers to sing, but he silences her with a petulant movement and gruff word. He is not in the mood for music. The loaded revolver he always keeps in his room is brought down and laid beside him as he smokes and reads.

Eleanor is grieved to see him so unhinged. It is a pitiable thing when a man loses his pluck, and the woman must play the part of consoler and encourager.

The following morning, to her surprise, Quinton seems no less frightened than the previous night. He refuses to go out, and sits in moody silence or paces the room—both equally trying to the patient Eleanor. At last the idea seizes her that if she shows daring and goes out alone, leaving him to brood in solitude, it may spur Quinton to rouse himself and cast off his apprehensions. Surely he will not be outdone by a woman!

"I am going for a stroll," she announces calmly.

"Oh! Are you?"

His lips twitch nervously. He does not volunteer to accompany her.

She takes up a large shady hat, and winds a long white veil over her face.

"Won't you come, too?" she asks mildly.

"No, certainly not, and I think you are very foolhardy to go."

She stares at him in amazement.

"My dear boy, are we to stay in for ever because of old Quamina and her ugly sayings? If the devil is coming for me, he'll come in whether I hide or not; besides, I do not believe in devils!"

"No, but living assassins, modern highwaymen, who scour the country to shed blood, seeking whom they may devour. If you take my advice you will stay safely indoors."

But, for the sake of example, Eleanor shakes her head. If she gives in to him now their life will be one of cowering seclusion. There is something convincing in the light of day that drives from her heart all qualms and misgivings.

"I see no reason why we should not walk abroad just the same as Elizabeth or any other person. You were only attacked once, and that was at night. Look, for instance, at the white woman on the charger. She was alone. I don't think even a highwayman, though, would tackle her," with a low laugh.

"She'd be a pretty good handful for anybody. I could imagine her mesmerising a lion with those eyes. I have no doubt she is a crack shot, too, from the bold way she carried her gun. She was a regular amazon."

"You forget I have never seen the white stranger you allude to."

"Of course not. She passed when you were looking for the dog on that unfortunate day. Well, good-bye for the present, dear. Take care of yourself, and if you like to come and meet me I shall be delighted."

She leaves the house singing, hoping her bravado will have the effect of re-assuring Carol.

As she goes he flings his book on the ground, stretching out his arms like a caged bird beating its wings against the bars.

"It can't last much longer," he hisses between his teeth; "it won't last much longer. Thank goodness I can see the end."

Eleanor's mind is so full of thought that she does not heed the direction in which her steps turn. She walks like one in a dream, busy with her own thoughts. A thousand ideas flit through her brain. She lives over her miserable past. Even the early days at Copthorne return vividly. She is a merry child swinging on a gate; a lazy girl lolling on a hayrick; a frivolous wife, sporting her gay attire in the Brussels Bois; a weary woman sighing at her lot in the house on Richmond Terrace; and then the realisation of the present rushes over her, and she starts as if suddenly awaking from sleep.

Digitized by Google

There are steps at her side; she turns, remembering Carol's warning.

Elizabeth Kachin stands before her, they are face to face.

From sheer force of habit Eleanor stretches out her hand in greeting, but draws it back sharply, gathering her scattered wits together. There is a cold look in Elizabeth's eyes. Eleanor shivers though the sun scorches, for the frosts of sin are very bitter. Mrs. Kachin averts her head, and passes her without a word. Little Tombo, who is following in the rear, runs up and raises his face for a kiss; but his mother calls to him quickly, while Eleanor pushes him away. "Why is she angry with me?" he asks Elizabeth; "why doesn't she come and see us now?"

Eleanor hears the words. They cut deeper than an assassin's knife. Carol was right. Retribution is on the road, waiting to devour her body and soul. She paces on with bent head, the hot blood in her cheeks, and a lump in her throat.

A third shadow crosses her path, this time it is Big Tombo. Her eyes meet his fearlessly. He bares his head, bows low, and Eleanor smiles sadly.

"Men are kinder than women," she thinks, as she wanders on. "They judge less harshly. When their companions sin they do not cast them out to sink lower in the mire, they give them a hand, instead of a kick! But women take upon themselves to dash their sisters with cruel force upon the stones."

It was good to be alone with her sorrow, her shame.

She breathed a prayer from the depths of her soul—a wordless invocation. She is close to the jungle now, and the pleasant shade of the foliage cool her feverish brain.

She steps fearlessly into the thick undergrowth. Then pauses, for the sound of a horse attracts her attention. It is the heavy tread of the huge charger, on which that handsome white stranger, gun in hand, is seeking prey.

Eleanor watches the flash of those wonderful eyes, there is something unholy, devilish, in their unusual splendour. Her full red lips are drawn in and compressed.

She raises her gun, and before Eleanor can cry out, the woman has fired!

The bullet whizzes past her head, for a moment her heart stops beating, the narrow escape fills her with horror!

She fancies the stranger saw her before she pulled the trigger, and let off her gun out of sheer devilment, to show her accuracy.

But scarcely has she recovered from the fright than a second report is heard from the bushes close by, and the great charger, on which this reckless sportswoman is seated, falls dead beneath her. She rolls off the saddle, and stands like a fury over the body.

"What villain has killed my horse?" she cries aloud, in a deep voice, which even in its anger sounds strangely fascinating, despite the masculine slang.

Eleanor rushes forward.

"The unseen hand!" she exclaims, hardly knowing what she says.

"How do you mean?" asks the tall woman.

"Some one shot from the bushes; didn't you see? First of all you nearly hit me; it was the closest shave I ever had, and immediately your horse fell——"

"I'll soon find out who has been making a target of me," muttered the stranger.

So saying, she fires recklessly into the bushes; but there is no sound, no cry.

Eleanor watches this wild creature curiously. Surely she will apologise for nearly killing her through inexcusable carelessness.

But she says no word; only watches the smoke rise, and anathematises the fate that has slain a useful beast.

Eleanor forgets her own grievance, and sympathises with the stranger's loss.

"It could not have been done intentionally," she declares.

"I don't believe in chance; it was a dead aim, depend upon it."

Eleanor's eyes expand at this remark.

"Who are you?" she asks. "What is your name?"

"I am a woman," replies the other, with a mocking smile; "my name is Paulina."

She shows no wish to be acquainted with Eleanor's identity.

"What will you do without your horse?"

"Get another, of course."

"But now?"

"Walk."

"Then you live in these parts? I hope in the future you will be more careful how you shoot at random. It would not have been very pleasant for either of us if you had hit me."

"What are you doing walking about by yourself?"

Eleanor looks up and laughs.

"Not risking other people's lives, at any rate."

"I wish I could unravel the mystery of my unknown assailant! Have you any idea who watches your movements and revenges himself on my carelessness?"

A new light flashes across Eleanor at these words. This weird adventure becomes more interesting and amazing at Paulina's suggestion.

"I don't understand you."

"All the better, perhaps."

The abrupt answer startles Eleanor, a puzzled look creeps over her face.

"Why can't you say what you mean?" she asks hotly, looking at Paulina with sudden dislike and repugnance.

The stranger laughs, shoulders her gun, and turns away.

"Where would you have been now," she cries in parting, "if I had shot you down by mistake like a jungle fowl?"

There is a taunting sneer in the words.

A hateful thought steals into Eleanor's mind. This woman, who swears and treats her with such abominable coolness, knows something of her past or present, possibly from Elizabeth, with whom she may be acquainted. This last remark is an insinuation of her unfitness to die, and that her soul is ripe for perdition. The implied slur gradually increases and exaggerates itself in Eleanor's brain, sensitive to a degree. She sees in it a deliberate insult, and following Paulina, she demands:

"Before you go, please apologise for your carelessness. I am not accustomed to be made a mark of, either for bullets or jests."

Paulina stops, and looks her up and down in a manner that makes Eleanor feel like a pigmy facing a giant.

She takes out a cigarette, places it between her teeth, and hands her case to Eleanor.

"Have one?" she asks, with insouciance. Eleanor is staggered. She does not know whether to take this as a fresh slight or a very lame apology.

Faint pulses of quivering sunbeams glance through the trees, playing round the dead body of Paulina's horse. The old oaks rear their heads to a sky of purest turquoise, but Eleanor has no heart to notice the beautiful aerial effects. She is wondering if the proffered cigarette is meant as an olive branch or otherwise.

She gazes in mute disgust.

"Have you never seen a weed before?" asks Paulina vivaciously. "You are the type of woman, I suppose, who sits at home and arranges flowers, very artistically no doubt. You would pose in limp gowns of gauzy drapery, like a pictured saint, and expect your husband or your lovers to grovel and worship. But you are dangerously near to the borderland separating the sublime from the ridiculous. You expect me to apologise for a shot at random, which cost a valuable horse its life. Some savage black who worships your fair form at a distance, most likely paid it back with interest."

"You are a very vulgar woman," exclaimed Eleanor. "I hope I shall never see you again."

"Don't use that word 'vulgar,'" she replies, "it's so low class."

Digitized by Google

"You don't mind what you say to me because I am alone and unprotected," cries Eleanor with almost childish petulance, the tears glistening in her angry eyes. "If Carol was here, he would defend me."

"Carol," she laughs, "who is the staunch and gallant Carol?"

But Eleanor will not answer; she feels desperately affronted, and turns away.

The women walk in opposite directions; the day is dying.

"Well! you are back safely; any adventures?" asks Quinton, as she enters the house pale and weary.

Eleanor sinks into a chair, slowly unwinds her veil, and flings her hat impatiently upon the sofa. She is so seriously put out, that for the moment she dares not trust herself to speak.

"Anything the matter, eh?"

Eleanor clears her throat.

"Yes."

Quinton sits bolt upright from his lounging attitude.

"What?" he says, staring at her intently.

Then she recounts her scene with Paulina, word for word, while Quinton listens breathlessly.

"Her horse shot from under her?" he cries, as if that is of far more importance than Eleanor's narrow escape.

"Yes, dear, wasn't it awful? It might have been you or me! I do believe the masked man is on the warpath, only he went for her this time instead. It may be a lunatic, for every act seems so perfectly motiveless."

"I told you not to venture out," he says, his face reddening with annoyance. "You would go against my wishes, and suffered for it accordingly. The idea of getting into conversation, and actually deigning to quarrel with a stranger. It was most humiliating and lowering. Another time if you meet this 'Paulina,' as you call the white amazon, kindly avoid her. This merely confirms me in the conviction which has grown upon me lately, that this place is no longer fit for us to dwell in. I, for one, am sick of it, and long for a taste of clubdom and life again."

"Oh! Carol!" she exclaims, and the words are wrung from her like a sharp cry.

"Don't look so absurdly miserable, my dear," he says hastily, dreading a scene with all the shrinking of his cowardly nature. "I won't say anything to vex you again. I was only cross; forgive me."

Eleanor's heart goes out to him with all the old yearning tenderness.

Forgive him! Why, she would forgive Carol anything—he is her all. She falls on her knees at his side, and draws down his face for a kiss.

As she does so, the sound of a loud, rich, stirring voice, swelling out on the evening air, reaches them. They exchange hurried glances, start to their feet, and look cautiously out.

It is "Paulina," swaggering down the hill with a devil-may-care mien, her gun still over her shoulder, her hands in her pockets.

They catch the words, which ring full and clear:

"And constancy lives in realms above,
And life is thorny and youth is vain;
And to be wroth with one we love
Doth work like madness in the brain."

"She is like a 'troll,'" murmurs Eleanor, "shrieking in the night."

"A magnificent creature," says Carol. "Quite a picture!"

His eyes are riveted on the retreating form!

CHAPTER XXII.

By a route obscure and lonely,
Haunted by ill angels only.—E. A. Poe.

Eleanor is taking her siesta, wrapt in dreams of Carol and love. No thought of evil disturbs her rest, for to-day the clouds seem to have blown over. Carol has been tender and adoring as of old, he speaks no more of the dreaded uprooting, but is peaceful and content. Yet while she lies in fancy-land—asleep—she cannot see him in the room below, a look of excitement on his face while he writes with feverish haste on a large sheet of flimsy paper.

The words reel rapidly off his quill, he never pauses, and his eyes are aglow with the fire of energy.

Quamina, who has been in the verandah, enters with a tray of cooling drinks and places them by his elbow. She has never seen the Sahib writing before, she did not know he could hold a pen, and his engrossed attitude awakes her curiosity and suspicion. He does not hear her come in till she puts the glasses beside him, then he pushes them away and tells her to go.

Quamina steals across the room.

Why is the Sahib writing? It is not his way. His quill flies like a thing possessed across the paper, and when he pauses it is to wipe the drops of perspiration from his heated brow.

"This is the Sahib's hour for sleep," thinks Quamina. "It is a secret message that he writes at such a time, when his wife is absent, dreaming in the other room." She steals into the verandah and watches. A sudden idea comes to her ignorant mind, which, as she turns it over in her brain, amounts to a firm conviction.

"The Sahib is making a compact with the devil. He is frightened of that tall spirit in the black mask, and is coming to terms with him. Maybe he will offer his house and his servants, his wife even, to be himself released from the terror of that grim presence."

Quamina shakes from head to foot. Her white teeth rattle. Surely the Sahib's face is taking the likeness of the Evil one, as he sits alone, or why does a sinister smile flit across his lips, while he perpetually pauses to listen, and look nervously towards the door? Once he rises, opens it, standing a moment, looking towards Eleanor's room. But there is no sound, and he returns to his desk reassured.

Finally the letter ends. He folds it carefully, looking at the dashing signature with some pride. He takes up a red seal, strikes a light, and drops a huge round of burning wax upon the envelope.

"The deed is done," thinks trembling Quamina; "the devil has been written to. He will scan those hasty words in his unholy abode, and bargain with the Sahib, till an arrangement shall be made."

Her suspicions increase as Quinton, listening once more at the door, snatches up a hat with a guilty air, creeping out into the broiling sun.

Quamina by this time is wild with curiosity, and as Carol hastens down the hill, the letter in his hand, she follows stealthily at a discreet distance.

"Perhaps he will give it himself to the devil. Ah, the poor Sahib!" she mutters.

Quinton never pauses till he is out of sight of the bungalow; then turning to his right he places the sealed envelope in a crevice of a rock, hidden from sight.

Quamina watches wonderingly the post-box of the devil.

She marks the spot in her mind's eye, and fearing detection hurries back unobserved.

For the rest of the day she thinks of nothing but the Sahib's letter, and its strange hiding place. She pictures the "Nats" surrounding the spot, and bearing it in triumph to their chief.

She watches her master curiously, but by no sign does he reveal that anything unusual has occurred, save that he laughs more frequently, and seems as light-hearted and high-spirited as a boy.

"Maybe he has paid the devil off," Quamina surmises.

Captain Stevenson and Major Short ride over, much to Eleanor's delight, who enjoys a chat with the outer world as keenly as Carol.

She longs once again to hear Major Short's melodious voice, and bringing her guitar, begs for "Mandalay."

But he shakes his head.

"I shall tire you of the one song," he declares.

"Not when it is the favourite," she protests. "Only four lines, if you will, or a single bar of the tune. I love the sad refrain."

Digitized by Google

He follows her on to the verandah. Quinton and Captain Stevenson are talking and smoking within.

They catch the words between the pauses in their conversation.

"Ship me somewhere east of Suez, where the best is like the worst,
Where there ain't no ten Commandments, and a man can raise a thirst.
For the temple bells are callin', and it's there that I would be,
By the old Moulmein Pagoda, lookin' lazy at the sea."

"Dreadful morals!" laughs Captain Stevenson.

"Do you love the East?" asks Eleanor, as Major Short lays aside the guitar.

"Yes, well enough, but I get terribly homesick at times. I long to draw round a huge log fire in the old hall at home on a still winter's evening, with the shutters shut and the curtains drawn, and my feet on the fender. No one has any conception of the bliss of those long, luxurious hours over the flame and the coal. Those who have it don't appreciate it. Imagine yourself nipped by a biting frost coming suddenly in to such a scene of warmth and ease, to lose yourself in the depths of an enormous spring chair, and gaze in that wilderness of red, while the wood crackles, and blue flickers up like a phantom light in the blazing scarlet. It is many years since I passed a good old English Christmas, with plum-pudding and bells chiming over the snow. Bah! I cannot endure to think of it—I get so green with envy."

"I am afraid I never cared for the winter. The sun is better than artificial warmth—the East is rosier than the fireside."

"But you must yearn sometimes to get home to your family and friends. Have you no mother you long to kiss—no father who is pining for a sight of his daughter's smile, and old chums waiting to greet you with a hearty handshake and cheery welcome."

Eleanor shakes her head mournfully—her large, soft eyes look sad and wistful—she is no hypocrite—she never could pretend.

"No; England is all a blank. My whole interest in life is centred in my husband."

Involuntarily a pang of pity shoots through the man's heart. He hardly knows why, since she is so happy in Quinton's love.

He mistrusts him, for men are quicker in reading each other than a woman blinded by skin-deep fascination.

Many a trusting heart has been won by the pink light from a lamp falling on a handsome profile, by the faultless cut of a frock coat, or by a good seat on horseback.

Poor little Eleanor! Poor humanity!

"It is a mistake to rely too much on love," says Major Short. "It sometimes fails us, and then——"

He pauses, seeing the look of pain upon Eleanor's face.

"I was speaking of myself," he adds half apologetically. "Look for instance, at my parents, at home in the old country. What good is their affection now? What use am I to them, stuck here in India? True, we correspond, but letters give us no sight of the familiar face, no kiss from the lips that may be dead and cold before we meet again. But love, Mrs. Quinton, is over for ever in my life, it is a memory alone, a dream of the silent past."

Eleanor's eyes are deeply sympathetic; she is a woman to inspire confidence.

Major Short continues, though he is surprised at himself for so doing:

"Yes, I was in love once, it was the one sincere and overruling passion of my life." He lowers his voice as he speaks. "You brought it back to me when you said that all your interests were centred in your husband."

He holds out a little case to Eleanor.

"I alway carry this about with me; it is her portrait. Look at it."

Eleanor opens the case reverently, and gazes with a certain awe at the beautiful face within. She fancies there is a mystery in the far-away expression of the woman's eyes. But, after all, it is only the mystery of death.

"That picture was taken after she knew she must die,' he says. "They would not let me marry her then."

His eyes are lowered; Eleanor fancies they are moist.

"Fate is very cruel," she murmurs.

"Yes, when the poetry of existence turns to prose, all the light dies out. I can never love again. Sentiment to me now is as a shallow stream."

Quamina appears with the tray of drinks again. Her eyes looks wild; she shambles along; her knees knock together.

"What is the matter with that woman?" asks Major Short, as she staggers away.

"She is frightfully superstitious, and some nights ago she thought the devil had come for Carol, and she has never been the same since. She crouches about like a creature demented. Sometimes I fancy she must be insane."

Major Short quotes from Pope with a dry smile:

"Lo! the poor Indian, whose untutored mind, Sees God in clouds, or hears Him in the wind."

"But there is sense in that," Eleanor declares. "God is in all Nature; every blade of grass manifests Him."

Then she remembers she is still clasping that small case, and looks down once more on the expressive features of the beautiful woman.

"Talking of death—and love," she says slowly, harping back to the old subject, "I often wonder what I should do if anything happened to Carol. Imagine me here, in a strange country, alone, friendless! What if he sickened with fever, or was wounded by an enemy, or if he died?" A shudder of apprehension runs over.

"I hope you will never call yourself friendless while we—while I am within your reach. I have suffered myself; I know what sorrow is. Should you ever be in any trouble, Mrs. Quinton, or need a helping hand, remember you can rely on me."

Eleanor looks at him with that serious and admiring glance of hers, expressive of greater gratitude and deeper wonder than any words.

"You are very good," she says at length. "If all men were so kind, I think women would be better and place surer trust in them."

Two large trees in front of the verandah, with bending boughs, meet and make an archway of feathery foliage, in which the birds lodge. Eleanor's eyes turn to the drooping green, and then to the distant hills. She has a vague foreshadowing of coming evil. She sees the oxen yoked together, dragging their loads; she wonders if they are happier after all than mortals like Major Short and herself. Two of these patient animals are drawing a Burmese public carriage, with a black boy looking out of the quaint covering, like a little house on two wheels. They pause to drink in the Irrawaddy; she sighs to think how sadly they need refreshment. In the thatched huts and tall palms, Eleanor pictures Copthorne—it rises as a mirage—till Major Short dispels it by some casual remark. He notices her listlessness, for she starts as he speaks.

"Forgive me," she says, smiling wanly, "but I was miles away."

"How interesting. May I not follow you? What did you see?"

"I conjured up a farm-house and green English lanes, gold cornfields, rustic reapers, and honest workers. They were getting in the harvest."

Captain Stevenson's cheery voice, and Quinton's musical laugh interrupts the conversation as they join Eleanor and Major Short.

"It is time we were making tracks. What do you say, Short?"

"I suppose so, but it is always hard to tear oneself away from pleasant companions."

"When shall we meet again?" asks Eleanor gaily. "Can't we arrange a day next week? Ride over in the cool of the morning to breakfast."

"Thanks—delighted. There is a peculiar fascination in your charming home and hearty welcome."

Digitized by Google

Quinton smiles enigmatically, as he watches them ride away.

Eleanor slips her hand in his.

"You seemed very merry to-day," she says. "They quite enlivened us, didn't they, Carol?"

"Yes; it certainly makes a difference having somebody to speak to. Don't you notice it, dear?"

He looks down at her steadfastly, and for the moment Eleanor's expression turns the unscrupulous man dizzy with a vague sensation nearly approaching regret.

He sees in her eyes the overflowing of a heart whose passionate adoration amounts to idolatry.

He is touched and softened. He presses her lips, though they no longer thrill him, and she in her mute worship cannot define the change.

Her love, he thinks, so freely given, so utterly beyond control, is after all a pitiable spectacle.

He scrutinises her fair face critically; it seems insipid to him now. Its pale spirituality, which once set his brain on fire, appears characterless. The classical features, exquisitely moulded, lack power. The sweet mouth has a wan droop, as if sighing for ungranted kisses.

"Sometimes, Carol," she says at last, "I fancy you are tiring of me." She only speaks for him to contradict.

"My darling, what an absurd notion to get into that pretty little head of yours! Occasionally it is a little slow here for us both."

"That is only since you grew nervous. Of course, the days are long if you will stay indoors doing nothing."

"Yes, you are quite right," he answers, somewhat to Eleanor's surprise. "It is foolish, and unnecessary. Now you won't grumble, my pet, if I go for a long day's sport to-morrow. It will do me all the good in the world, some excitement and exercise. I have been getting dreadfully grumpy and cross."

"How early shall you start?"

"Oh, first thing. I assure you, Eleanor, I am quite looking forward to it. I can't have been very well lately, and that accounts for my apparent prostration and uncalled-for nervousness. There is nothing really to fear, and you can make your mind quite easy about me."

These reassuring words delight Eleanor, for as long as Carol is happy and satisfied, her joy is intense.

As they talk Quamina is crouching under the broad steps that lead down from the verandah; her eyes gaze in the direction of that mysterious rock hidden from sight.

She wonders if the devil has yet come for the Sahib's message. Her soul is torn by curiosity and fear. She longs to know, and if the strange letter still lies in the crevice untouched, herself to break the seal and try to decipher the words.

It is a tremendous temptation, yet as she rises with a bold resolve and creeps along the moonlit path, she suffers mortal dread, momentarily expecting to encounter some supernatural apparition. She turns out of sight of the bungalow, with its cheerful lights, and reaches the rock, on which the moonbeams play. A ray of light lies across the crevice in which the Sahib deposited his epistle.

With set teeth, and frantically beating heart, Quamina forces her skinny arm into the hole, murmuring prayers as she gropes and fumbles.

Then staggers back with a low moan, and flees from the unholy spot. The devil has been! The letter is gone!

(To be continued.)

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

READY ON APRIL 1ST,

NO. 2 OF

Melody.

THE NEW MUSICAL MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS:

Song ... ... "The Hour of Love" ... Benjamin Godard.
Written by R. H. Elkin.

Violin Solo ... ... "Serenade" ... ... C. Saint Saens.

Song ... ... "Your Voice" ... ... L. Denza.
With Violin Obligato. Written by F. E. Weatherly.

Song ... ... "June Roses" ... ... Georges Bizet.
With Flute, Oboe, or Violin Obligato. Written by Mary Chater.

Piano Solo ... "March of the Little Tin Soldiers" ... G. Pierné.

Vocal Duet ... ... "Awake Sweet Love" ... ... F. L. Moir.
Written by E. Teschemacher.

Offertoire for the Organ ... ... Ch. Gounod.
(Posthumous Work.)

Song .. .. "Mary Dundas" ... Charles Deacon.
Written by Annette Baker.

Piano Solo ... ... "Fan Dance" ... Caroline Lowthian.

Song ... ... "Shepherd of Souls" ... Edward Jones.
From the "Sign of the Cross." Written by Wilson Barrett.

Pianoforte Duet ... "Im Freien" ... ...O. Heinke.

Spanish Song ... ... "Carmen" Arranged by A. J. Caldicott
With Mandoline Obligato. Written by A. O' D. Bartholeyns.

ISOBEL'S
HOME COOKERY.

Our latest publication is one which is proving most useful to the housewife. Please order your copies of your newsagent at once. It is published every Tuesday.

Price One Penny.

ISOBEL'S
DRESSMAKING AT HOME

PUBLISHED ON THE 1st OF EACH MONTH.

Price 1½d., Post Free 2½d.

"HOME NOTES" PATTERN DEPARTMENT

is open from nine till six during the week (till one on Saturday). Ladies residing in London or its suburbs, or visiting the metropolis, are invited to call and examine patterns.

Digitized by Google

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

ALCOHOLISM AND OBESITY.

It is often rashly asserted that drunkenness is uncommon on the European Continent, and that, in particular, it is a rare vice in France. Certain medical therapeutists and specialistic scientists have, however, recently furnished some suggestive statistics which flatly contradict the cherished beliefs of those who have persistently proclaimed the sobriety of the French people. Dr. Lancereaux, at the French Academy of Medicine, having made a special study of the subject, declares that in his extensive hospital practice out of twenty patients ten are, on an average, suffering from some form of alcoholic poisoning—women being responsible for a large proportion of the enormous consumption of alcohol thus indicated. The learned doctor sums up the results on the population at large as representing a mortality greater than that caused by the greatest epidemics, the ruin of labour, and—what is already startlingly evident in France—the steady diminution of the very population of the country. Other authorities, again, assert that with the annual increase in the consumption of spirits, to the extent of nearly 500,000 gallons in various liquors, there has been a corresponding increase of corpulence. This appears to make alcohol responsible for the troublesome and sometimes dangerous increase of unhealthy adipose tissue on the strength of the somewhat slipshod theory of the affinity of alcohol for oxygen in the system. It is certainly worthy of note that some of the most eminent authorities on the Continent and in America absolutely debar the corpulent from drinking alcohol in any shape or form, while on the other hand one of the most prominent and successful specialists in England boldly and flatly contradicts, on this point, his professional brethren. He permits those undergoing his treatment to drink the spirits of their choice—although he does not advocate the use of these beverages. The result of his experiments is that he can reduce a person's weight from 3lb. to 6lb. in a week, although the patient may drink alcohol even to excess; nor will any extra decrease in weight be experienced by a restriction of the amount of drink consumed. His aim is to attack corpulence at its very root, and to achieve this he does not approve of such a drastic measure as the sudden and indiscriminate stoppage of a person's accustomed spirituous drink; for there are many who have so habitually used themselves to their "dram" that its prohibition is unquestionably a great hardship, if not actually dangerous. Again, he takes exception to the action of the majority of specialists in dealing with obesity, in prescribing a limited diet. To this he takes exception on the very reasonable ground (to quote from his clever 256-paged book, entitled "Corpulency, and the Cure," by F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.), that with the reduction of fat by his process, the most unhealthy portion of this excess tissue, such as those which clog the vital organs, begin to waste first, and, as a consequence, the entire system becomes healthier within the first twenty-four hours of the treatment. Then immediately the patient begins to be exhilarated by such symptoms as the freedom of breathing, the stronger and steadier action of the heart, the feeling of lightness, the absence of the sense of oppression—each organ performing its duty with increased regularity. He finds himself aroused suddenly from a lethargic heaviness and morbid drowsiness which have probably lasted for years; he feels, as it were, born anew, and instantly becomes more active and buoyant, both in body and mind—all of which pleasurable sensations are naturally accompanied by an increase of appetite. It is not necessary to be a scientist or a medical expert to adopt the common sense view of these matters. "Would you, then," argues Mr. Russell, "in the case of a person who for years, perhaps, has never known what a healthy appetite means, deprive him of food when Nature appealingly holds forth her hands, literally begging for it? No! those who reduce fat by starvation pay for their folly at usurers' interest when meeting the bills drawn against them on the Bank of Longevity. Let other specialists prescribe this; I will not countenance it," says Mr. Russell. Notwithstanding the increased amount of food taken daily, the weight, under the operation of his system, is steadily reduced, to which unerring testimony is given by the weighing-machine. The painstaking research and the marvellous success of the author of the above-named work justify us in arriving at the conclusion that his system may be followed with absolute confidence. His success is all the more remarkable because the whole secret consists in the use of a few herbal roots and a simple vegetable acid. We believe it is the only system of reducing obesity—and it is a very pleasant system—which is certain in its results and brings no after-penalties. We commend his book to our readers. It may be obtained post free by sending six penny stamps to Mr. Russell at the address already given.—Brighton Examiner.

Digitized by Google

1896 PROCLAMATION.

Grand Pioneer Reduction Sale

By Messrs. F. HODGSON & SON, The Well-known Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds, will take effect on sight of this advertisement.

SUPER-EMINENT.—The Queen's Royal Household Prudential, Eclipse, and Alarm Carpets and Hearthrugs, etc. (Regd.). Amazingly interesting, instructive, and detailed Grand Reduction Catalogue post free, if, when writing, you mention this paper.

REMARKS.—A lady customer writes complaining that we send out too large a Carpet for the money. Be this so or not, we send out no Carpet measuring less than 6ft. by 9ft.—even for 2/11. TEST THEM. THEY WILL SURPRISE YOU.

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ALARM" CARPETS

(Registered). GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Sale Price 2/11 EACH.

This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. We will forward direct from the looms to any address on receipt of amount, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, the largest ever sold at the Price.

Suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. A Rug sent with Carpet, 10d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER. 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs ... ... 7s. 2d.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly Examine and Compare these Carpets.

Satisfaction Guaranteed. DO NOT MISS THIS OPPORTUNITY. IT MAY NOT OCCUR AGAIN.

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON, 11/4/96.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

F. HODGSON AND SON,

Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants,

WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Telegraphic Address—"Eclipse, Leeds." Telephone No. 948.

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lb. 30/-

No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 50lb. 37/6

No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 55lb. 41/3

No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lb. 48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery.

The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents, And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 381. FOR WEEK ENDING APRIL 18TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

RISING SUN STOVE POLISH
EASIEST, QUICKEST, CHEAPEST & BEST BLACKLEAD IN THE WORLD

Risin' Sun METAL POLISH
Gives a beautiful soft brilliant polish to all kinds of Metal.

1 GREAT BOONS

A sample of any one post free 2 stamps.
Name this publication
C. CHANCELLOR & CO.
London, E.C.

THREE 3

MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH
CONTAINS IN PROPER PROPORTIONS
GLOSS, BORAX, GUM, WAX, & &c

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS
For the Immediate Production of
BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from
Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS
Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:
Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, Hanley

Are Selling Fast the most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 PIECES

FOR £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. The Secret of the Success.—THE PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful. The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. App y at once. Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & Cos CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

THE
REV. C. HAVERGAL

(Nephew of the late Miss Frances Ridley Havergal)

Writes from 14, Alroy Road, Ansfield, Liverpool: "I can thoroughly endorse the statement of 'A Clergyman,' whose testimony to the efficacy of your WIND PILLS for affections of the Stomach, Bowels, and Liver, appears in The News. I shall be happy to recommend your Pills as I have opportunity. By all means publish my communication."

All sufferers from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND ON THE STOMACH, COSTIVENESS, SICK HEADACHE, NERVOUS DEBILITY, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, BILIOUSNESS, etc., should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

☞ The WIND PILLS being Purely Vegetable, Tasteless and Mild, and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

Of all Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for price, from

PAGE WOODCOCK, Lincoln.

"JUNO" CYCLES Are the Very Best.

JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb. JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

CASH DISCOUNT & CARRIAGE PAID

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

THIN BUSTS

Quickly transformed and a good figure permanently obtained by a perfectly harmless, simple, and inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. For particulars, free, send stamped envelope in confidence to "Madame B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 16
April 18, 1896.
S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 8 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

RUBBER STAMPS

FREE BY POST.

AGENTS WANTED.

Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters, 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, and Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. IRETON & CO., Ltd., 92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2 ... £6 per cent. | Feb. 1 ... £7 per cent.
Mar. 2 ... £6 per cent. | Apl. 1 ... £6 per cent.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

TRILENE REG'D TABLETS
THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

EDITED BY ARTHUR PEARSON OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY

SHORT STORIES

No. 381.] For the Week ending April 18th, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

THE SORCERESS.

THE calzada principal in La Barca runs a meandering course easterly through the town to the garita. The houses on each side are the usual Mexican type, the more pretentious of some others of adobe, with barred windows and heavily doored zaguan, where the idle porter sits lazily, incessantly rolling and smoking his cigarillo, arousing himself sufficiently at times to salute a passer-by or to answer a question, and relapsing at once into his former dreary condition. Children imperfectly clothed play solemnly in the gutter; their dark-brown bodies, shining dully through the incrusting dirt, are proof against the darkening effect of the sun's rays; a solitary lagartija clings lizard-like to the kerb and feebly resists a boy's effort to goad him into action. The sereno leans sleepily against a corner in the shade, loosely holding his carbine, and muses on the unhappy lot of a policeman forced to keep up a semblance of watchfulness.

Suddenly, as a woman's figure appears in the street, there is a chorus of childish feet as they disappear panting with fright, in a dozen different directions. The porters, stirred into action, hurriedly close the doors and piously whisper an ave, the sereno draws himself erect, furtively crosses himself, and murmurs "La bruja! Dois me guarde!" as the woman passes. She moves quickly down the street, looking neither to the right nor to the left passing the garita where the solitary customs official likewise crosses himself and asks divine protection from the wiles of the sorceress.

Nevertheless, he follows the sinuous, graceful movement of the young woman and notes the perfection of face and figure, which appeals to him in spite of his persuasion that her beauty is of origin diabolic, and lent by Lucifer himself to snare men's souls. She wore a piece of dark green stuff, folded around her hips, and falling to the ankle; a jacket of red gauze clothed the upper part of her person, veiling her bosom, upon which lay a chain of gold in the form of a serpent. Her black hair, parted at the forehead and drawn back in two splendid tresses, intensified the pure white of her brow; her eyes, shaded by long lashes, were the greenish-black of obsidian. Continuing her walk to a small adobe house some hundred yards beyond the gate, she disappeared within the doorway. The customs official gave a sigh of relief and returned to his desk.

All rights reserved.]

Once within the house, she lost her firmness of bearing, tottered to the centre of the room, and sank in a heap on the rush mat. Her form suddenly grew rigid, her face took on the grey pallor of death; the eyes became set, and stared fixedly at the wall opposite; the golden serpent on her bosom seemed in the half light of the dying fire to writhe and twist, instinct with life.

At the fire sat a little shrivelled-up old man, brown and wrinkled, stirring with skinny claw the contents of an olla. Of her entrance he had taken no notice, continuing his employment as if waiting for her to speak. At length he looked round and sprang to his feet; a pallor almost as deep as her own overspread his face. "Maria!" he whispered; "Maria!" Meeting with no response, he hastily moved to the door, barred it, and, returning to his place by the fire, crouched down and shrouded his face in his arms.

Soon the woman's body lost its rigidity, her eyes turned towards the doubled-up figure of the old man and shone with such a basilisk glare that he moved uneasily; the eyelids drooped, and she sank back upon the floor apparently asleep: her respiration at first harsh and laboured, became quiet and regular.

The old man now raised his head for the first time, and fixed his bright, beady eyes on the woman's face.

"A prophecy," he said, "a prophecy! Let the high priest of the gods know their will!"

As if in response, the woman began an inarticulate murmur. Soon her voice rose to distinctness:

"The darkness of earth is in the temple; the altar of the fire-god is black with ashes, the serpent lies dead before Quetzalcoatl; the grinning skulls at the feet of Xipetotec mock the power that is gone forever; the snake-skin drum is beat in vain; the victim is slain; the sound of thunder fills the temple, the priests fall dead, and the foot of the white man desecrates the house of the gods."

Her voice fell, and, with a fluttering sigh, she awoke. The light of expectancy which had illuminated the old man's face gradually died out as the woman's words fell on his ears, and, at their conclusion, he seemed shrunken to half his size.

"'Tis false!" he said—"false! The power of the gods can never fail. For seven years have we awaited the sign, and to-morrow Xipe-totec, gladdened once more by the sight of blood on the sacrificial stone, will make answer to his children's prayers. Did you see the white stranger again to-day, Maria?" he asked.

Digitized by Google

"Yes; I have but now left him."

"And he will be in the barranquilla to-morrow at sunset?"

The woman's voice faltered as she answered: "Yes; if——"

"If!" hastily returned the old man; "if? What does this mean?"

"He will come if I send him word, but—but I cannot—oh, papa mio, don't ask it. Forego the sacrifice to Xipe-totec, and content the people with the sacred mask-dances."

He looked at her with astonishment: "Seven years have we waited, and the daughter of El Viejito, the high priest, asks that the sacrifice be omitted! What woman's whim is this?" he said fiercely. "Why should the god, upon whose awful power we must depend, be denied his due?"

"He loves me, father."

"Loves you! And if he did not, could he ever be lured within the reach of the Nagual priesthood? Suppose he does, he will pay the penalty of his folly."

The woman rose to her feet. "He shall not," she said firmly; "for I love him, and no priestly knife shall ever harm him. At first, I believed all you had taught me; believed that my duty to the gods made all things good, no matter how cruel and horrible they otherwise seem. But now I know better. The ancient religion shall die out and the worshippers perish from off the face of the earth ere harm shall come to him I love."

The fierce glitter in the old man's eyes gave way to a look of crafty cunning. "Well, well! so be it," he said; "the sacred dances must answer."

* * * * *

When the "Golden Ass"—as his La Barca neighbours unpleasantly called him—developed a taste for mural decorations, his case was a most serious one; the casa pintada was the result, and a most marvellous one it is. His zeal in the cause of art was intense, but not discriminating: primary colours alone seemed to fill the requirements; minor details of perspective, truth to nature, and the like, were absorbed in a wild hunger for colour, and plenty of it. Impossible landscapes and oddly constructed animals ran riot on the walls.

He is long since dead; but his house remains and made very comfortable engineering headquarters. In one of the least violent rooms, overlooking the miniature fountain in the patio, the engineer in charge, Vincent Colby, had his office. He was a good type of the English engineer; tall and well-built, he gave the impression of staying qualities rather than of muscular power. The warmth of a tropical sun had but slightly deepened a naturally fair complexion; his dark hair and good eyes, with a softness of intonation and engaging manner, stamped him at once with the Mexicans as muy simpatico, and revealed to them the possibility that all might not be barbaros, an impression unfortunately yet not unnaturally prevalent.

Just now Vincent was in an unpleasant frame of mind, and his musings ran somewhat as follows: "I may be an idiot, but I can't help it. Idiocy may be congenital or acquired—mine must be acquired, for, up-to-date, I've been reasonably conventional. The mater will rave, I know, when I take home a native wife; the sisters will make matters unpleasant for a day or two; and the governor will probably cut up rather rough. But I'm suited, they will have to be; if a man can't make his own choice when it comes to marrying, when can he? I've made mine—if she'll give me an answer on the seventh—why not the sixth or eighth, I don't know. I've asked her a dozen times in the last ten days, but it is always the same: she neither says yes nor no. It can't be coquetry, for she smiles sadly, yet with a wistful look which can mean but one thing."

Here a rattle of hoofs in the patio interrupted him, and he looked out to see the company's doctor dismount.

"Hello, doctor," he called out, "come in here; I want to talk to you. There's not a soul about the place, and I'm too lazy or nervous to work. Throw your saddle-bags over there on the table and have a drop of toddy. No? You don't usually let a good thing go by. What's up? Patients dying or getting well, or have you been rowing it again with the padre at Penjamo, because you differ as to the use of water? You're all wrong. Be satisfied to cure the poor beggars without lecturing them on the advantages of an occasional bath. To clean them is so radical a measure that you'll be run out of the country as a pernicious foreigner attempting to demolish a most cherished idea."

The doctor made no reply.

"Well, out with it. You needn't look at me like that."

"Vince, we've known each other as boys and men for a good many years——"

"All right; you always begin with gentle boyhood days when you've anything particularly unpleasant to say. But I suppose I must submit. I don't know what's up, but if it's serious as you look, old man, it's pretty bad."

"It's serious or not, as you choose to make it," answered the doctor. "An ambition to acquire the Mixe language may be a laudable one; folklore, ancient religion, and all that sort of rubbish learned on the spot are a kind of relief in this hot, dusty hole, though I don't care for it myself. Even Nagualism and other high-class sorcery may be amusing to you, if not to me. But when you get spoony on the sorceress herself, it's time for some one to open your eyes."

"Sorceress!" responded the other. "What rot you are talking. That sort of thing is played out in these days."

"I tell you it isn't played out," rejoined the doctor; "the natives keep it dark and say there's nothing in it, but half the Indians in this town hold to the old faith, and every time a child is baptised, they set up a little incantation business on the sly, and do the trick over again in their own way, with an extra curse or two on the white man and his god. I scared the story out of old Sebastiano, and got the whole programme. The Eleusinian mysteries aren't in it with this accursed Nagualism, which includes human sacrifices and other pleasant little ceremonies which, though no doubt highly gratifying to the worshippers, must be somewhat unpleasant to the victim, I fancy. El Viejito is the high priest, and Maria Condelaria is his daughter. They are a dangerous, fanatical lot, and if you'll take my advice, you'll leave them alone. They bitterly hate the whole white race, and an offering from it is not only an act distinctly pleasant in itself, but is a religious duty as well. The government has only been partly successful in keeping it down. They practise their devilish rites once too often, and some one disappears."

To hear one's best beloved spoken of as a sorceress, and as one to whom wading in human gore was a usual and agreeable employment, was, to say the least, irritating; but the doctor's earnestness and evident belief in what he had said roused in Vincent a strong desire to laugh.

Digitized by Google

"You've been imposed upon, old man," he said. "Haven't you learned yet that the one delight of the native is to impose on the credulous with creepy stories? Moreover, you have allowed yourself to listen to gossip about the woman whom I intend to marry."

"Marry! My God!"

"Yes, marry—if she'll have me. I intended speaking of it when you commenced with your infernal nonsense. It's my affair anyhow, and if I'm satisfied, you can't complain."

To be told, even indirectly, to mind one's own business is particularly hard when one has tried to do a friend a kindness, so the doctor left the room offended at the manner in which his efforts had been received.

* * * * *

The sun was low in the west on the following afternoon when the doctor rode into the patio of the casa pintada. His progress through the town had been delayed.

A nameless fear had oppressed him and could not be shaken off. He went hastily to Vincent's room, but found it vacant. He was about to call a servant and inquire as to the whereabouts of his friend, when he saw a small scrap of paper on the floor. Idly picking it up, he read what aroused again his fears of the previous evening. In green ink, on paper none too clean, with v's and b's used interchangeably and double ll doing service for y, was written:

"Meet me in the Barranquilla de Hornos at sunset.—Maria."

Hastily calling for Julio, he was told Vincent had left at five. Julio had been ordered to unsaddle his own horse as his services would not be required. Returning to his room, the doctor consoled himself with the idea that although a tryst ten miles away was unusual, danger was not necessarily impending; the roads were fairly free from bad characters, and a lonesome ride was probably the worst to be expected.

He had brought himself to this state of mind when a woman staggered into the room.

"Save him! Save him, doctor!" she cried! "save him!"

Her hair fell in a tangled mass about her face, her clothing was torn and disarranged, and her wrists cut and bleeding. He recognised Maria, but her presence made the meaning of what he had read unintelligible.

"I refused to send for him," she continued hastily, "so they bound me in the casita and sent him a message in my name. They left me powerless, as they supposed, but I escaped."

"They? Who are they?"

"The priests of the Nagual; they who cling to the old faith, and who would sacrifice on their altar the man I love. Ah! doctor, make haste or we shall be too late; an hour at most is all we have."

Ordering Julio to follow him with the horses, the doctor made his way to the barracks.

Don Juan Gomez, captain in the Fourth, was a model cavalry officer and a warm friend of the engineer. The doctor had scarcely commenced his story, when Don Juan gave a brief order to his orderly at the door. A bugle call rang out, a clatter of hoofs on the pavement and the rattle of sabre and carbine in answer gave proof of the discipline of the troop. A sergeant entered and saluted.

"Listo, señor. A caballo, doctor!"

With Maria as guide, they dashed out into the night. In the service of a friend, Juan Gomez spared neither man nor beast. The breath of the horses came hard and fast, and spur was freely used before Maria said: "The entrance is between the two boulders to the right of the stunted pine."

* * * * *

Sunset found Vincent in the barranquilla. He had given no thought to the strangeness of such a place of meeting; he was to see again the woman he loved, and that was sufficient. No idea of danger had presented itself. Strong and well armed, he was confident of his ability to take care of himself. The place was dark and dismal, and he was too absorbed in his own fancies to note even casually his surroundings.

The trail had narrowed to barely a sufficient width for his horse, when he saw three men approaching on foot. They stood aside as he came up, and, as he attempted to pass, one seized him by the foot and threw him out of the saddle. Before he recovered from the shock, he was pinioned, blindfolded and helpless. He felt himself lifted up, carried some little distance, and placed on the ground again.

He remained thus for an hour or more, when the bandage was removed from his eyes. He had felt no especial fear at his treatment, believing it to be a question of a small ransom and liberty as soon as he could communicate with his friends. He opened his eyes, and with the first glance round, all idea of liberty by purchase departed at once. As his eyes became accustomed to the semi-darkness, he saw he was in a cave-temple. On his right was a wooden idol, standing on a low stool. It was black and shining, as if charred and polished; its look was grim, and it had a wrinkled forehead, and broad, staring eyes. He had read of the Black King, but now saw himself face to face with him. On the left was a coiled serpent, with head erect, shining eyes of jet, and fancifully painted scales, which he knew represented Quetzalcoatl. Immediately before him stood Xipe-totec, "the flayer of men," the representative of all that was vile and horrible in the hideous cult whose victim he was. In front of the idol stood the sacrificial stone, humped in the centre, the better to present to the knife the chest of the victim.

His heart sank within him as he read his awful position in the signs around him. The wealth of the world would not save his life from the fanatical faithful of the Nagual sect. But last night he had declared the practice of their rites obsolete; now he had full proof of his error, and was about to pay the penalty.

By this time the cavern had filled with people. Half-naked priests began a low chant in a minor key, circling in front of the idols and swinging terra-cotta censers, from which were emitted the pungent fumes of copal.

The movement became faster, their voices rose in their excitement, while, in their frenzy, they gashed themselves with knives until the blood flowed freely. Seizing Vincent, they placed him, face upward, on the sacrificial stone.

The high priest stepped forward to the side of the victim. Raising his knife of green obsidian above his head, he began: "Xipe-totec, the all powerful——"

A woman's shriek rang out, a flying form reached the altar as the knife descended, and a roar of musketry reverberated through the cavern.

A woman lay dead at the side of the sacrificial stone, on which rested the body of a man, an obsidian knife driven home in his heart.

Edwin Hall Warner.

Digitized by Google

The Wooing of Madeleine

Lucien Barthelemy was what the world commonly calls an eccentric man. While he didn't affect to despise ordinary people, yet he seemed to have no desire to mingle with them, no doubt considering himself better company. Said one of his friends of him:

"I can't exactly say that his presence among us is depressing, yet the truth is we don't amuse ourselves so much when he is with us. He weighs upon our spirits. Not that he says anything unpleasant, far from it; but still, in spite of efforts to the contrary, we are not quite ourselves when Lucien is with us. His wine is always two-thirds water, he orders only one dish, he doesn't use tobacco in any form, he has an aversion to sport—doesn't want to kill anything, he says.

"Nevertheless, he is not a bad fellow. He can laugh when he chooses, especially when there are any children about. He prefers their society; he puts himself on their level.

"Lack of confidence in himself? Oh, no, he has passed his medical examination, he has a wonderful knowledge of books, and always has a book thrust into some one of his pockets; but he never reads when in company, for he is a deep student of human nature, so much so that he seems to have been acquainted with everyone in the world when he came into it, and be merely meeting you again when you are first presented to him, for without any useless preliminaries he at once chooses a topic of conversation which is interesting to you.

"I can't tell you," continued this friend, "what Lucien's religion is. He never goes to church, and yet he and the parson are the best of friends. Only once was he ever at church. It was a mournful occasion, the death of his mother. Everyone was in tears excepting Lucien, yet he loved his mother dearly. In the last year of her life she had not been able to walk. Lucien had carried her about in the open air for hours every day.

"You know he is superbly built, and has the strength of a giant, and had amused her as she lay in his arms like a child by telling her fairy and other stories with a grace and delicate pathos that would have made a publisher's fortune if the stories could have been taken down by a stenographer. At times she would fall asleep. Then he would lay her down on a bench, sit down beside her, and draw forth the ever present-book.

"His mother was a woman of strong character, and at her request her son gave her due notice of approaching death. The entire night preceding her dissolution Lucien sat alone by her bedside. This was as she desired. Everyone else was sent to bed.

"I have often asked myself what they talked about on that last night, which must have been a long one, and at the end of which Mrs. Barthelemy passed away gently, quietly, peacefully, without a pain or a pang, her son's hand clasped in hers. No; the parson was not called in, but he had dined with Lucien the day previous at the bedside of the sick woman. When, a few weeks later, I spoke to Lucien in admiration of this beautiful passing away of his mother, he replied in a low voice:

"'Everyone can die in the same way; all that is necessary is to give five minutes' thought to death every day of one's life.'

"'And do you think that we shall meet again?' I asked.

"'There can be no doubt of it,' he replied.

"'Where? How? In what form?' I queried.

"'I don't know,' was his answer, 'and the reason why I don't know is because it is no affair of mine.'

"'Then why do you affirm that we shall meet again?'

"'Because I know we shall,' he said calmly."

Lucien was one of those men who, while not arguing to the point, are none the less convincing.

"Was it at all surprising then," continued this friend of Barthelemy's, "that Lucien should have peculiar notions on the subject of marriage? I think not. Anyhow, he did have such notions. I have it from his own lips. Said he to me one day:

"'I want to impress upon your mind firmly that I am not one of those who think that in a civilisation like ours perpetual bonds should be laid upon a human being; no matter with what solemnity the contract may have been entered into. Fate has not the power to modify the past, and man has no right to speak for the future.

"'Let signatures support what they are set under in commercial transactions; but this cannot be so in moral compacts, subject as they are both to the variability of our ideas and our feelings. These compacts must be purely voluntary, and it is the soul's inalienable right to take possession of itself again when it discovers that either under duress or undue influence it surrendered unwisely.

Digitized by Google

"'Marriage is purely a moral compact into which the man, generally speaking, goes knowingly, with full knowledge of what he is doing, but the woman gropingly, blindly. In my opinion, the man alone is entitled to be called a contracting party.

"'When once the marriage has been solemnised,' continued Lucien, 'it devolves upon the man by every possible means to win over to him and incorporate into his existence this outside party of whom he often gets possession by surprise, by ruse, by deceit; and his own fault is it if he fails to accomplish this, for, having had perfect liberty to do so, he should, before asking her to become his wife, have made a close study of the young girl and given her up if he deemed her unfit for or unworthy of him.

"'Let us hope that the time is close at hand when fathers and mothers will prepare their children differently for marriage, so that the contracting parties will know beforehand what a magnificent partnership they have it in their power to enter into by simply pronouncing the word "Yes."

"'Civilisation, I grieve to say, has not gone as far as this. It will be necessary for women to learn many things which will be kept from them a long time yet. There will be no true marriages until choice on the part of both shall be absolutely free, and there shall be full and complete knowledge in both of reciprocal rights and duties. Until that day comes there is but one court competent to pass upon this question, and that is conscience.'"

Surely no one will wonder at it when told that Lucien Barthelemy's forty-fifth birthday found him still unmarried. Physically, Lucien was in the very bloom of manhood, his broad shoulders carrying a magnificent head, with a great wealth of curly brown hair thrown boldly back, while a full beard of a lighter tone ill concealed the placidity and sweetness of his smile.

His forehead indicated spirituality as his straight eyebrows denoted firmness, energy, obduracy, if necessary, in opinions as in actions; while his clear blue eyes beamed with mingled intelligence and kindness. This handsome face was set upon a chin of great beauty, which, like a pedestal, imparted an air of dignity and self-control to it, and held it up, so to speak, for the admiring and sympathetic glances of the looker-on to rest upon.

In spite of the few grey hairs which diligent search might have found in that thick fleece of brown, Lucien still looked the young man.

In studying his hands the skilled palm-reader would have discovered unmistakable signs pointing to that union of imagination and will of faith and reason, of love of the ideal and need of independence which is found in all men whose minds, whose consciences, whose souls are in open conflict with the world.

While yet in his forty-fifth year Lucien fell in love.

Largely from a sense of devotion to his mother's memory, Lucien had been accustomed from time to time to pay a visit to various old friends of hers, among them the Duclos, people in good circumstances and of considerable refinement. The daughter, Madeleine, when a mere child felt the personal charm of the "big gentleman," as she called Lucien, and play was abandoned and dolls hastily laid aside to enjoy the privilege of sitting at his feet.

Barthelemy had the power of holding enchained the attention of any listener. It was marvellous. His words had colouring, suppleness, strength, elasticity; they could be sombre, gay, luminous, solemn; as his voice delivered them they affected the audience like a Beethoven's symphony.

Lucien knew his power and delighted to exercise it. Upon no one was he more successful than upon Madeleine. The moment he opened his mouth she yielded to the fascination of his voice, sitting at his feet, with her glorious dark eyes riveted upon his face, as if a spell were upon her. There was manifestly a counter influence upon him, for his eyes never quitted her.

Madeleine felt the personal charm.

It was old Duclos' custom to adjourn to the garden when the weather was fair, in order to enjoy coffee and dessert in the open air, and here, with his magnificent head reaching almost to the roses above him, with the dark green of the bower sharpening the noble outlines of his face and heightening the almost womanlike delicacy of his colouring, Lucien, at Madeleine's request, was always ready to show the fertility of his fancy by inventing some quaint story in which everyday maidens and youths, fairy mothers, and obedient spirits were brought into delightful contingency. Madeleine never failed to reward the story-teller by setting half-a-dozen kisses upon his bearded cheek.

One evening as he wrapped his arm round this child and drew her towards him, he suddenly felt a deep blush mantling his face, and a strange clogging of his heart's action. Madeleine was no longer a child, she was a woman. Lucien's arm dropped by his side, and he drew away from her. He could not tell why, he only knew that he was all in a tremble, and for the first time in his life his mind grew dim and shadowy, and his words slipped away from him.

Digitized by Google

In a few moments he rose and hurried away on some pretence or other, slinking out of his friend's house with a feeling of shame that both bewildered and terrified him. But she was beside him, her soft voice was murmuring in his ear, her arm was about his neck, he could not escape her. No book was obstruse enough, no author profound enough, to stay her steps, to stop her at the threshold of his library.

She crossed it, she smiled upon him, she spoke to him in a voice of entrancing sweetness; she sat down; she made herself at home. He watched her, listened to her with mingled bliss and wonder. She was but the Madeleine of his imagination, but she was just as soft and gentle and lovable as the real Madeleine whom he had quitted in the bower of Duclos garden a few hours before.

Madeleine's parents were delighted with the discovery of Lucien's affection for the daughter. True, she was yet too young to marry; just verging, as she was, towards sixteen; but her beauty was unfolding like a flower, and while its steady increase carried joy to Lucien's heart it kept Madeleine's mother busy lengthening skirts and enlarging sleeves and corsages.

"But," laughed the mother, "Lucien is such a sensible man, so unlike other men. He can easily wait a year for our dear child."

Madeleine was not tall. At first glance one might have been inclined to use that vulgar but really technical term, dumpy. Very small and shapely hands and feet, black hair, naturally wavy, black eyebrows, almost meeting above the nose, which had the gentlest of upwards tilts; large eyes, gloriously deep and dark, with the bistre tone above them, and the pearl-tint below; cheeks rosy red and teeth as white as almonds—such was this child-woman.

Place some red roses in these black tresses, wrap a lace mantilla about that face, set a fan in motion in one of those hands, and drape that round but flexible form with a shortened skirt, and you would have an Andalusian.

Madeleine was the daughter of her mother. If you had gone far enough back, you would have found one of her ancestors among the builders of the Alhambra, possibly even breathing beneath its roof. It was rich blood, therefore, of the colour of the melted coral, which coursed through her veins. And yet a close observer would have noted the changes which the loss of the Southern sun had wrought in this transplanted type.

You would have an Andalusian.

The wedding-day came on apace. It so happened that a few weeks before the appointed day an Italian opera troupe began a series of performances in the town. Madeleine was passionately fond of music, and with her intended's knowledge and consent, in fact, sometimes in his company, she attended every representation.

Lucien noted how the singing stirred her very soul, and was gratified by the keen enjoyment she drew from it. The tenor singer, Angelo Liverino, a strikingly handsome young man, who walked the stage like an Apollo and sang with the deep feeling of an Orphéus, soon became the rage of the town.

Petted and féted by everyone, and entertained by the best families, he set a hundred hearts aflame on his triumphal course, but seemed to take no hurt himself until he met Madeleine. In an instant the warm souls flashed together, the two people of the south land met after long years of separation.

One evening, when Lucien entered the home of his affianced, he found Mrs. Duclos lying senseless on the floor and her husband kneeling beside her, himself but little this side of dementia. Madeleine had eloped with Angelo Liverino.

It had only struck nine when Lucien parted with Mr. and Mrs. Duclos, and yet it was past midnight when he presented himself at his apartments. Here were three whole hours absolutely cut out of his lifetime. During this time he had been dead to himself, and he only came back to life when his servant, in response to his knock, opened the door and called him by name. Then he remembered who he was and what had happened to him.

He staggered to a chair, and asked for water. He was burning up with thirst.

His servant begged for permission to summon a physician, but Lucien shook his head and directed him to go to bed. The man reluctantly obeyed after he had vainly tried to persuade his master to remove his clothes and go to rest first himself.

Nature is more merciful than men give her credit for. Like murderous blows, great agonies so dull sensibility that little pain is felt. The terrible hurt mercifully brings unconsciousness with it. Some sorrows are so heavy that the sufferer is crushed beneath the load. He cannot even cry out; a chill almost of death steals over him. He is dead, for real death could not be so horrible.

Digitized by Google

When Lucien's servant re-entered his room the next morning, he was startled to find his master sitting with his clothes on, just as he had left him. He had not stirred from the chair into which he had fallen upon his return home after those three hours of mad pursuit, and then, as the man drew the curtain aside and let the sun's rays into the room, he uttered a stifled cry of horror, for great flecks of grey streaked that glorious head of hair.

In a single night grief had wrought this devastation. In a few brief hours a speechless woe had set its ghastly finger-marks upon this bright page of humanity. Nor did despair stop there. In a few weeks the change was complete; that luxuriant growth of hair—crown of perfect manhood—was silvered to its very roots.

But gradually the paroxysm spent its force, and like came to cure like when Lucien looked upon the terrible woe now nested in that little home, and listened to the lamentations of that old couple so cruelly deserted.

In a few days letters come from Madeleine, both to her parents and to Lucien, announcing her marriage to Angelo, and promising to return home in a few months, when they had quieted down and had come to look upon her action in a calm and reasonable way, which, of course, was now impossible.

To Lucien she wrote as follows:

Oh, Lucien, dear master, will you ever be able to forgive your poor slave for thus deserting you? Ah, yes, I loved you; but I feared you, for, thought I, if his power is so great over me now, what will it be when I am his wife?

You know what a wild and wilful child I am. I could not bear to think of chains, even though my love for my master was so great. I trembled when I pictured myself your wife. My woman's soul longed to try its wings, not to have them tied. Dear master, you are not weak and mortal, you would not be led by a woman.

The world is so beautiful, and I have not seen it yet. Great and generous soul, bear with me. I could not be satisfied with being a listener to the wonderful things that happen to the maidens of your stories—I wanted to be one of the maidens myself.

I tired of watching others dancing and feasting. I wanted to dance and feast myself. Comfort dear mother and father, oh, beloved master, with the music of your voice and the look of your noble countenance, and grieve not for the loss of one who was not worthy of you.

Lucien read and re-read this strange letter hour after hour, day after day. It had a twofold influence upon him, alternately depressing and exciting him, but in the end the feeling that took possession of his soul was a deep and indescribable indignation.

To think that the woman whom he had loved with a devotion that went beyond thought should have been so ready to abandon him for such a vain and soulless creature, puffed up with the senseless admiration showered upon him by morbid-minded women. To think that this jack-a-dandy should have been so easily able to lead her away.

Even by his friends, Liverino was admitted to be stupid and vulgar, and yet she had found him sublime; she had fallen in love with this singing machine like a child with the soft tinkle of a music-box. She had found her ideal in this pretty-faced minstrel; she had given up all the world for him, relinquishing all other love for the love that an opera queen gets from the leading man. Faugh!

And yet, strange to say, resolve as Lucien might to curse this pretty child, he could not bring himself to it. The words died on his lips so softly that they seemed more like a blessing than a curse.

A hundred times he sat down and took up his pen to write, but the hot hate cooled ere it reached the quill's point. He could distil the venom of despised love, but he could not make it flow out in black and bitter lines.

Had she ever pledged herself to him? In spite of her seeming willingness, in spite of the solemn compact entered into for her by her parents, had she really been transferred to him? Had any ear heard the divine acquiescence when God's blessing had been invoked upon the betrothal?

"I was a man of forty-five," argued Lucien, "when I swore to cherish and protect her. For many years I had been a man of the world; I had complete knowledge of its social and moral responsibilities. I knew what I was doing. I was the only one betrothed."

But willing in the end as Lucien was to extend a full pardon to Madeleine, he could not bring himself to forgive Liverino, who had lured Madeleine away by making her believe that she should be his Juliet, his Rosina, his Desdemona, not in mimic show, not in pleasing counterfeit, but in glorious reality.

"I shall follow him and kill him!" exclaimed Barthelemy through his clenched teeth. "To let such a thief get away with his plunder would make me accessory after the fact."

A few weeks sufficed Lucien to put his affairs in order, to take the daughter's place and walk beside Mr. Duclos, as the old father, bowed in sorrow and despair, followed his wife's remains to their last resting place—for Mrs. Duclos had never raised her head after Madeleine's flight—and to execute his last will and testament, for Lucien realised to its fullest extent the risk he would take when he entered the land of the stiletto, bent upon executing a vengeance that must betray itself in every motion, in every glance.

It would be very possible that Angelo should know quite as well how to guard his plunder as he did to remove it from under the very eyes of the lover. And yet, how would he ever know that Lucien Barthelemy was standing in front of him, about to raise an avenging arm to strike him down with all the force of a thunderbolt?

His own mother would have had difficulty to see in this pale, smooth-faced, white-haired man, the specimen of glorious manhood she had left behind her. So long as Madeleine did not hear his voice, she, too, would never dream that this was the man she had so deeply wronged, so lightly abandoned.

She had only known the bearded face; she had no knowledge of the countenance that lay beneath the beard. His plan was, therefore, to follow boldly after the fugitives without meditating any further disguise than that which nature had provided for him.

But it proved to be no easy task to come upon a trace of them. Upon returning to Italy, Liverino had travelled under an assumed name, and a month had elapsed before Lucien was enabled to discover his whereabouts, but his zeal and intelligence triumphed at last.

Angelo and Madeleine were traced from Venice to Florence, from Florence to Rome, and from Rome to Naples. Here they disappeared so completely that Lucien was quite persuaded that they had left the city by water, probably taking passage for America.

By this time the new scenes and new faces, the glory of Italian skies, and the melody of the Italian tongue had begun to work a change in Lucien. Strange fate had led him into a land that was serving to aggravate rather than cure his malady, for at times, with a love that knew no bounds, he yearned for the dark-eyed child who had been snatched away from him, and who, now in his pilgrimage through this south land, would fit so delightfully in his poet's and scholar's heart.

Digitized by Google

While wandering about the streets one evening, peering into every face, measuring every form that passed him, he strolled into a wine shop and sat down at one of the tables, when suddenly a smothered cry of rage escaped his lips.

Angelo Liverino had entered the place in company with several friends and taken seats at another table. The hour was late. Angelo and his companions, although already inflamed with liquor, summoned the keeper of the wine shop and noisily demanded to be served at once. The man, apparently afraid lest the good name of his place should suffer from the outbreak of a midnight brawl, vainly endeavoured to quiet them, and consented at last to furnish them with wines.

In spite of the intreaties of the proprietor, the revellers went from bad to worse, and it seemed as if their wrangling must soon bring about a descent of the police agents. One Pietro, with inflamed visage and wild tongue, summoned Angelo to sing. Angelo refused, whereupon Pietro fell foul of him like a fiend.

In an instant the polished blade of Angelo's stiletto flashed in the light. The tumult was deafening. The roar of angry voices and the shuffling and stamping of feet mingled with the crash and rattle of overturned furniture. The tallest and sturdiest of the group, one Stephano, now threw himself upon Angelo, and after a brief struggle succeeded in wrenching the stiletto from his hand.

Fearing that blood was about to be shed, and being unwilling to be called as a witness to a midnight brawl, Lucien hastily retreated to a side-door with intent to escape, but a new outburst of violence from the brawlers caused him to look back.

Pietro had flung himself like a madman upon Stephano, who, to save himself from a blow of a heavy cane, struck out with the stiletto, and Pietro staggered back with a groan. The next instant the police burst into the place and made prisoners of the brawlers.

While glancing listlessly over the columns of a morning journal a suppressed cry of amazement escaped from Lucien's lips as his eyes fell upon the heading: "A Midnight Brawl ends Disastrously—Angelo Liverino Slays One of his Companions."

Like a flash of lightning the truth burst upon Lucien; Pietro had been killed by Angelo's dagger, and the singer's companions had charged him with the killing of Stephano.

For a moment or so Barthelemy was as if suddenly stricken blind and speechless, but as the light came back to him again and he found that he could use his tongue, he started up and whispered to himself: "Great Heavens! Madeleine is mine again!"

But as he uttered these words he felt the blood rush into his face, so that it seemed as if it must burn its way out. It was the blush of shame. For how could Madeleine be his again unless he stood by and allowed an innocent man to be convicted of another's crime and to be thrust into a felon's cell on perjured evidence?

No; he had been dazed, bewildered for a moment by a vision as lovely as that which Mephisto has conjured up for Faust; but it had faded the very next instant, and in its stead he saw the figure of a young woman in mean attire, bowed in grief, abandoned by the whole world, crushed by misfortune as dire as it was undeserved—the wife of a felon.

No; Angelo must be saved, if not for his own sake, at least for Madeleine's. Lucien was not long in reaching this conclusion, and that very day he visited the criminal court, and ascertained when Angelo would be brought to trial.

At the end of the week the singer, more dead than alive, in dread of the terrible fate hanging over him, was called upon to prove his innocence of the crime of slaying Pietro.

As Lucien entered the court-room, his eyes fell upon Madeleine seated on one of the benches, and he shuddered at the sight—so pale, so ill-clad, so utterly wretched and forlorn she looked, sitting there alone, with the gaze of the idle crowd fixed upon her.

The hearing was brief, for the public prosecutor, with the perjured evidence of Angelo's companions, had little difficulty in making out his case. Even the proprietor of the wine shop was quite positive that it was Angelo who had dealt the fatal blow.

The man was willing to swear that he had seen Angelo draw the stiletto from his breast and raise it in the air to strike Pietro.

Suddenly there was a commotion in the crowd of idlers and beggars which filled the wooden bench. A tall, well-formed man, with his thick white hair thrown back from his broad brow, and his clean-shaven face wearing the pallor of a sedulous scholar, approached the railing and conferred in a whisper with the attorney of the accused.

"One moment, your Honour," cried the lawyer, turning hastily about, "we have another witness for the accused."

A deathlike silence came upon the room.

"A gentleman, your Honour," continued the lawyer, "who happened to be present in the wine-shop when the murder took place will now give his evidence."

"Your name," asked the attorney, as the stranger was conducted into the witness-box.

"Lucien Barthelemy."

At these words a pallor as ashen as death's hue came over Angelo's face, and Madeleine, stark and speechless with mingled wonder and shame, sat with a stare almost of mania in her eyes.

"Let the witness be sworn upon the Holy Gospels," said the magistrate calmly, but Lucien pushed the book gently aside and shook his head. "Do you wish to make oath before God simply with uplifted hands?" inquired the magistrate.

"I am unwilling to make oath either before God or man," replied Lucien. "But I solemnly affirm that I will speak the truth."

Digitized by Google

"Proceed," said the magistrate; "the jury may accept or reject the testimony as they see fit."

In a few words Lucien described the brawl and explained how Angelo's dagger had been wrenched from his hand by Stephano, and by him turned against Pietro: but the public prosecutor cautioned the jury that they should be careful how they allowed the testimony of an infidel to outweigh the overwhelming evidence already adduced, to say nothing of the previous ill-repute of the accused, who had on another occasion wounded a friend in a quarrel over some trivial subject.

It required but a few moments for the jury to bring in a verdict of guilty, upon hearing which Madeleine uttered a piercing cry of horror, and, throwing herself upon her knees, stretched out her hands towards the magistrate.

"Mercy, oh, mercy for him!" she pleaded, in tones that brought tears to the men's eyes, and caused the women to break out into convulsive sobbing.

"Ten years' penal servitude is the lowest penalty the law permits," said the magistrate solemnly, "but the prisoner may by good behaviour reduce the term to six years and a half."

Calling the prisoner's lawyer to him, Lucien handed him a sum of money, and, having requested him to look after Madeleine, who had been borne senseless from the court-room, he walked away.

Ten times he halted and asked himself why he should not go to Madeleine, why he should not act as her friend, her protector, her comforter. But suppose that beautiful child of the south land, now more beautiful than ever in her grief and loneliness, should throw her fair form into his arms, ask him to forgive, forget, and take her back, would he be able to withstand the terrible temptation?

True, 'Angelo was as good as dead to her, and a strange fate with an almost playful cruelty had again brought the beautiful creature within his grasp. Why should he not reach out for her?

But no. Had Angelo been a convicted criminal it might have been different. As it was, he had been wrongly convicted, and it was Lucien's duty to look after his rights as a man and a brother.

As Mr. Duclos announced his willingness to receive his daughter back under his roof again, Lucien dispatched his servant to conduct her thither, and then, with a sigh that came from the depth of his noble soul, he turned his face towards the home of his childhood, a delightful spot hallowed by the memory of his mother, with whose love fate seemed firmly resolved that Lucien must content himself.

"Human happiness," he murmured, "is like the scant supply of loaves and fishes. Nothing short of a miracle can make it go round and reach every hungry heart."

More than two years has gone by and no word, no sign of life, had come from the outer world to disturb this sweet serenity, Lucien felt that he had been forgotten, and rejoiced that it was so.

"Was it not all a mere carousal of the soul?" he asked himself. "Am I not slowly recovering my strength after a mad and senseless dissipation?"

Most of Lucien's visitors came to the back door; rare indeed was it that any hand was bold enough to lift the great knocker at the front door and disturb the stillness of the house. Hence it was that the figure of a woman approaching the front steps startled him one morning.

She was closely veiled. Upon reaching the steps she hesitated, turned away, and took the path leading round the house to the back door. Lucien, who had been watching her, gave a sigh of relief. But the next instant the servant threw open the door of the dining-room and the woman stood face to face with the master of the house.

"Well, madame, what may I do for you?"

For her only answer the woman lifted her veil.

"Great Heavens! Madeleine, is it you?"

"My dear master, it is I," cried the woman, throwing herself on her knees and reaching up for his hand.

"Lucien, oh Lucien," pleaded Madeleine, "father is dead. I'm all but beggared. My friends have closed their doors against me. Where should I go but to you?"

"But Angelo?" stammered Lucien.

"Is worse than dead to me," was the reply. "In a few months the truth of the murder became known, and he was pardoned, and returned to me, only to confess that he had another wife living; but I did not repulse him until the little fortune left me by my father was almost gone—thrown away by him in wild debauchery. Then I left him, and now I come to you, dear Lucien."

"Yes, yes," whispered Lucien, as he retraced a step or two and sank into a chair, "you did well, Madeleine. I'll care for you and your child—protect you——"

"No, no," exclaimed Madeleine, who, with little Alice, had followed Lucien up. "That will not be enough; that will not keep me alive. I must have more than that!" And then, as the master bountiful felt those beautiful arms once more entwined around his neck, his brain reeled for a moment, and it seemed as if joy must kill him.

When he came fully to himself that sweet erring child of the south land lay upon his breast. That autumn, when the air was sweet with the perfume of ripening fruit, Lucien and Madeleine were declared man and wife before the altar in the quaint old church across whose portal he had not passed since his mother's death.

Hundreds of hearts beat in joyful accord with theirs, and at last he felt the tide turning and saw the bread which he had cast upon the waters coming back to him again.

As the choir took up the glorious chant, "Veni Sanctus Spiritus," a voice of strange power and sweetness rang above all the others, so clear, so pure, so sweet, that gradually the other singers were hushed.

* * * *

Come, thou the soul's delicious guest.

Madeleine turned pale as she looked up to Lucien's face, but the smile met there chased every fear away and her great dark eyes filled with tears as she listened:

* * * *

Grant us in death to see Thy face.

And then the singer's voice trembled and died away, and he sank down gently into his chair. He was dead. Nor did the villagers think strange of it when Lucien and Madeleine made it a custom to visit his grave on the anniversaries of their wedding day and lay flowers upon it.

JULIUS RUTHERFORD.

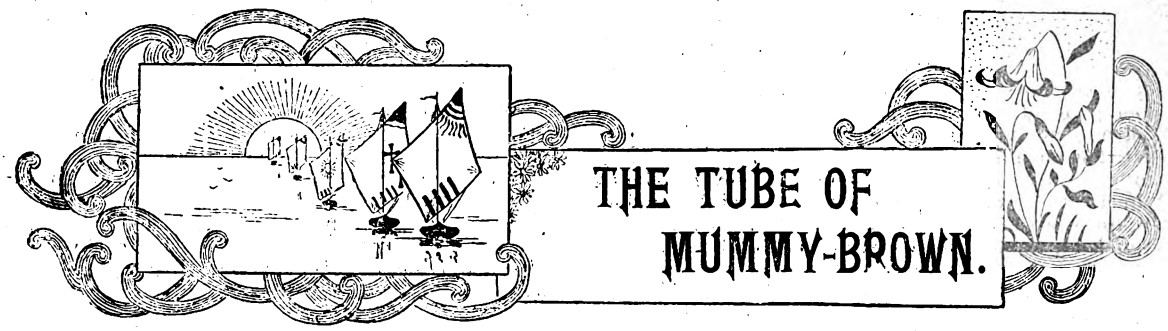
NEXT week a new serial story commences, entitled,

"THE WINNING OF GUNHILD;"

Or, The Vengeance of the Vikings.

BY GEORGE C. WALLIS, Author of "Behind the Barrier," etc.

Digitized by Google



THE TUBE OF MUMMY-BROWN.

Richardson picked up the soft little cylinder and looked at it again.

"What did you call it?" he asked.

"Mummy-brown," replied Knowlton, taking a brush from between his lips to speak, and touching the canvas before him with it.

"Brown it undoubtedly is," remarked his friend; "but where does the mummy come in?"

"In the tube, my boy," returned the painter, half-closing his eyes, and putting his head on one side to observe the effect of his last stroke; "because it is made of pulverised Egyptian mummies, and it is one of the best colours we have."

Richardson put the tube back upon the much littered studio table, and whistled softly.

"Well," said he, "you may count me out if ever I become a painter, when it comes to using dead men's bodies to make pictures with. I'd be afraid they would come back again!"

"Nonsense," said Knowlton, laughing; "they are entirely too dead for anything of that sort, you may be sure, and if they are sensitive to feelings they never show it. Observe how I am using this tube, for instance, upon this Frenchman's coat; do you suppose any well-meaning Egyptian would like to have himself clothing a foreigner in any such manner if he knew it?"

"No, I suppose not. The colouring is rich, too," remarked Richardson, thrusting his hands deep into his pockets and surveying his friend's work with the eye of an uneducated critic, "though the same can't be said of the models, judging from appearances. And by the powers that be, Francis," he added suddenly, "you've made that tall fellow a very good likeness of yourself! Did you know it?"

Knowlton shrugged his shoulders. "I had an idea his face was something like mine," he answered; "but as that is a common trick of ours, I have not given it a second thought. What I am striving for is a good picture, not portraits, and I must realise something from it, too. By heavens, Richardson, it has come to be a case of dire necessity, and that's all there is to it!"

"Rent not paid?" asked his friend. "That's too bad—I've been there myself, and then it is a very uncomfortable thing to have hanging over one. As long as one can climb up and down the water-pipes, and thus avoid meeting the landlord on the stairs, life is made endurable, but with you, I suppose——"

"There isn't a water-pipe within twenty feet of my window. No, I must sell, or get out, so—the mummy-brown again, if you please!"

Richardson handed the paint to him once more, somewhat gingerly. "I can't help feeling, I'm dealing with a piece of a dead body," he said, colouring at Knowlton's pitying look; "and I should think you would do the same, believing, as you say you do, in transmigration, and re-incarnation, and all that sort of thing. Suppose, for instance, that you were painting this picture with a piece of your own father's body, when he was an Egyptian, ten thousand years ago!"

"Or, better still," returned Knowlton, squeezing a fresh supply of the paint out upon his palette, "my own old-time body, say!" As he spoke, he touched the paint with the tip of one finger, and a shiver, at the same time, passed over him, leaving him strangely pale and shaken.

"Yes, but —— hello, what's wrong?" exclaimed Richardson, noticing the change in his friend's face.

"Nothing—I don't know—a touch of vertigo, that's all," returned the painter confusedly; "I—what were you saying?"

"Only that if your supposition were so, the contact of two bodies—the new and the old—would make itself felt in the new."

"Yes," said Knowlton, smiling again and returning to his work; "but I do not believe in transmigration to that extent, my dear fellow. There is a line, you know, that even we fanatics have to draw, and I rather imagine it is somewhere near that point in this case. But to change the subject will you be at the club to-night as usual? If Mrs. McGwiginn should happen to take it into her good old head to ask me to pay or skip out, I'll have to realise on some of my personal property, and as I don't know the best places in town, I want you to steer me round. Won't object, will you?"

"Not in the least. My services are always at your disposal, and I'll be at the club about seven or eight. And now I must tear myself away; so until then——" and the end of the sentence was lost in the slight slam of the door as he went off. The artist listened until the echo of his friend's retreating footsteps had died into the murmurous silence of the great tenement in which he lived, and then going softly to the door himself, he turned the key in it. Coming back to the table, he drew his chair close up to it, and cast a furtive glance about the unhome-like room and into the deep shadows that lurked in the cobwebby corners. Then, with compressed lips and trembling hands, he drew the palette to him and gently pressed a finger into the little daub of mummy-brown still upon it.

A cold thrill shot up his arm, shaking the very nerve-centres of his body as it did so, and making him shudder again and again, even as he sank back into the chair half-unconscious. In another moment a sudden dusk filled the room, through which the familiar pieces of furniture and draperies seemed to lose their familiarity and to take new shapes and colours unto themselves. With staring eyes he strove to pierce the mist that half obscured his vision, and to shake off the weird feeling that had seized upon him; but gradually the lids drooped and closed, and to his distended nostrils there came, as he lost consciousness, a faint, sweet odour which even then he recognised—the smell of cedar-pitch and myrrh.

Digitized by Google

How long the terrible dream which followed lasted he could not know; but at last he woke to life again, and, struggling to his feet, he staggered to the window, threw it open, and let the faint breath of air stirring in the courtyard far below sweep up past him and into the dark room behind. The dusk was just falling over the city, and far, far below him he could hear the tenement's inhabitants of the first and second floors preparing their evening meal, singing and cursing by turn as the preparation pleased or displeased them. The night air cooled his fevered face and refreshed him, however, and the great beads of perspiration that had gathered on his forehead were gone, as he turned back to the room again.

"I am a fool!" he exclaimed impatiently, "and hungry, I dare say. No wonder I imagine things!" and catching up the worn soft hat that lay beside his tumbled bed, he hurried out into the hall and down the weary length of stairs to the street.

But as he closed the door, a small, heavy-bladed dirk upon the shelf directly over the spot where he had hastily placed the unfinished picture and its easel, jarred by his haste, whirled slowly round until it rested upon the very edge of the shelf, where it balanced to and fro and trembled in the little breeze that still puffed in at the open window.

* * * * *

Morgan, the favourite story-teller of the Bohemian Club, was talking as Richardson and the painter came in from their journey to the pawnshop, and the usual audience of interested listeners was collected about him.

"It may or may not have been humbug," he was saying, with a shrug of his shabby genteel shoulders, "but it was queer anyway you take it. I saw the man do it five times, too, and he failed but once."

"What do you call it—hypnotism?" asked a newcomer.

"I don't know; he simply says he sensitises the water and lets you call it what you like. First he puts the tumbler of plain hydrant water into one room, and he and the subject go into another. He makes a few passes—that is where the hypnotism comes in, I suppose—and once the man is under his control, the professor walks into the other room and stands with his hands over that tumbler of water for, perhaps, a minute, not uttering a sound. Then he sends some of us into the room with the sleeping subject, and he stays with the rest of the witnesses. When everything is ready, he tells one of them to take his penknife and thrust the blade carefully into the water. He does so, and we hear a muffled scream from the other room, as if the hypnotised man had felt the stab. This was repeated three times, and every time the subject screamed and twisted about in his chair as if in agony, while the knife remained in the water. As soon as it was removed, the pain apparently ceased, and he rested quietly again. I was sceptical, of course," concluded the talkative Morgan, "and said it was all chicanery; but after seeing the thing half-a-dozen times, I felt differently, and I must say that it is extremely peculiar, if not mysterious."

"What had the subject to say for himself when he came to?" asked Richardson, who had joined the group.

"Very little, except that some one had tried to stab him, and he succeeded three times in sticking a knife into his back, he thought."

"And did he know of the tumbler of water and its bearing on his hallucination?"

"No, he had been kept in still another room when first brought to the house, and had not seen or heard of the water."

"That is rather peculiar," said Richardson, thoughtfully. "I should like to have seen it myself." As he spoke, Knowlton, who had been talking with a fellow-painter at the other side of the smoke-filled room, started across it in answer to a beckoning nod of Richardson's. He had taken only a few steps, however, before he stopped suddenly and clutched convulsively at his breast, while an inhuman shriek, shrill and piercingly loud, burst from his lips. For a second he swayed there in the silence that followed—for every man in the room had heard the scream, above the talk and laughter, and had turned to see what it meant—and then his knees bent, and he fell heavily upon the roughly carpeted floor, an insensible mass. A young physician, who had been chatting near the fireplace, hurried forward as Richardson did the same, and, kneeling at the stricken man's feet, he tore open the shirt and put his hand over the heart.

"He is quiet dead, gentlemen," he said in a moment, in answer to the inquiring looks of those collected about them. Then he got to his feet and picked the lifeless artist carefully up, not one among the number saw the queer, white mark, just over the heart that came and went again like a very old scar.

The next morning, after hurried arrangements had been made for the funeral by Knowlton's Bohemian friends, Richardson had occasion to return to the studio.

The door was locked, but with a key of his own, he let himself in without disturbing the awe-stricken Mrs. McGwiginn. The body lay upon the bed, beneath a sheet, and the early morning light drifted in with an uncanny effect. The visitor went quietly to the bed, and, turning the sheet back from the face, looked down into the still features of his dead friend. Then he covered them again and moved away. As he passed the easel, which still stood where Knowlton had last placed it in his haste, he turned deadly pale, and caught the mantel for support.

"My God!" he cried, recoiling from the painting as if it were alive, and staring down at it with horror-filled eyes. Then he hurried past it, and threw open the shutters, letting a flood of light into the room. A stray bit of early sunshine fought its way through the grime-covered window and crept along the door to where the easel stood; and doing so it lighted upon a bright bit of metal that caught and reflected the light into Richardson's face.

Beneath the easel, as if hiding like a common murderer from justice, was the heavy dirk, driven into the uncarpeted floor an inch. Some night wind, more boisterous than the rest, had shaken it from the shelf, and, plunging downward to the floor, it had passed directly through the painting, not an eighth of an inch from the heart of the largest figure on the canvas—the man in the brown coat.

H. P. D.

Digitized by Google

The Great Middlewick Bank Robbery.

SUMMARY.

Mr. Bryant, Manager of Middlewick Bank.	John Warren, Old Watchman.
Herbert Stewart, Cashier.	Jack Burton, New Watchman—a detective in disguise.
Frank Rutherford, Book-keeper.	Miss Denton, Bryant's niece, and in love with Rutherford.
Alfred Taylor, Detective.

£20,000 is stolen from the Bank one night while John Warren is asleep. The only persons apparently aware of the key to the combination lock are Mr. Bryant and Mr. Stewart. Taylor is led to suspect Frank Rutherford of having obtained the key to the lock, and shadows him. An attempt is made on the strong room by three notorious burglars—Nash, King, and Birch—who know nothing about the previous robbery. The men are all captured, and Warren saves the life of one of the policemen.

CHAPTER XI.

The Two-Ounce Bottle.

MR. BRYANT had just finished breakfast, and comfortably settled himself in his easy-chair with his paper and cigar, when the door bell rang and the servant announced that a gentleman wished to see him.

The banker was surprised when the caller was shown in to find that he was Jack Burton, his "new watchman."

"I hardly expected you. Nothing wrong, I hope, at the bank?"

"No; but I've called to give you notice that I wish to leave."

The matter was not sufficiently serious to cause the banker much anxiety, but he inquired:

"But you have only been with me as watchman for a couple of nights?"

"Yes, but I've come to the conclusion I was never intended for a watchman in a bank. I can't tempt fate any longer."

This was a curious remark, and Mr. Bryant said:

"I do not understand you."

"You remember that row I had with a gang of burglars at the last place I was at?"

"Yes; and the manner in which you acquitted yourself there was your strongest recommendation to me."

"That would have been well enough if it had been the end of the confounded business, but the burglars were after me again last night."

"What!" demanded the astounded banker.

"Your bank was broken into again last night, and we had a high time with the gang; but they made a hash of it, for once."

"Great Heavens! Tell me all about it."

Burton gave the account. He adhered in the main to the facts which have already been related, but indulged in several variations in the course of the narrative. It was necessary to do this in order to gain the end which he had in view when calling upon Mr. Bryant.

The chief difference lay in the description of the part taken by the old watchman, John Warren. This was represented as most credible. Indeed, had that individual heard what Mr. Burton said about him he would have blushed to the top of his bald head.

"You see," said the visitor, "I have picked up several hints during the evening which satisfied me that something was wrong, so I got Warren to take his old place inside the bank while I watched outside."

"You had previously told Superintendent Dixon, you say?"

"Yes; it was he who helped me to catch the third burglar who was stationed on the outside—captured here on your own premises."

"Bless me! I never heard anything of it."

"Warren did his duty like a man. Constable Morton will tell you that if it had not been for Warren the criminal with whom he struggled would have finished him."

"And Warren kept awake did he?"

"He was about the most wide-awake man those burglars ever ran against," was the hearty reply of Burton.

"I am glad to hear that. Perhaps I was a little hasty with him. Perhaps, now you have decided to leave, I will try him again."

"I really think, sir, it would be the wisest possible step under the circumstances," observed the caller, who thus secured the object of his visit. "I will tell him, if you wish, so that he may rest to-day and be fresh for this evening."

"Thank you, and at the same time you might say that I wish to see him some time to-day. So you think these safe-breakers have taken a fancy to follow you round the country?"

"What better proof could I ask than what they have given?"

"Nonsense; but if your mind is made up, I'll not try to dissuade you. I'll pay you for the time you have served, and take care that your bravery of last night is not forgotten."

"I'm obliged to you, sir, but I can't accept anything. You see, it was really only one night, as Warren, and not I, watched the bank last night."

"But what are you going to do? Do you think of returning to London at once?"

"No, sir; I wish to keep away from there until I get over my trouble a bit—you understand," said Burton dejectedly. "I think I'll stay out my week at my lodgings, while I look out for some other work."

Over and over again Mr. Bryant kept asking about the occurrence of the night before. His caller gave the minutest particulars, even to the appearance of the tools and paraphernalia left by the visitors in the bank, which had been turned over to the authorities. He took good care that Warren's interests were not forgotten in these repeated narratives.

Finally nothing remained to be told. It was not more than half-past nine when Mr. Bryant announced his intention of at once starting for the bank.

"It's strange these men should make the attempt immediately after we had suffered so serious a loss, don't you think?"

"Yes, in a way I suppose it is," replied Burton, whose manner and conversation impressed his late employer as being considerably above his station in life. "I've never known such a thing happen before, but that's no reason why it shouldn't be done."

"You think these parties had heard nothing about the robbery the other night?"

Digitized by Google

"I should say, sir, that the attempt itself shows they had not. You could ask for no better proof than that."

Mr. Bryant had risen to go, but sat down again, his face slightly flushed.

"How many men were concerned in this?"

"Three; and we have them all."

Burton had reasons of his own for making no reference to Roberts, whom he had not seen after he had first missed Taylor.

"That's fortunate; they will get good long sentences, I hope. How will this affect the investigation of the first robbery?"

Had the caller been Mr. Taylor, the bank manager would have plied him with numerous other questions, but he cut his inquiries short as he remembered that this man was only his new watchman.

"As the two affairs have evidently nothing to do with each other, this cannot affect that in any way."

Burton purposely spoke in a louder voice than usual. He was sure he was not mistaken in believing that a faint rustle on the stairs, as of a woman's dress, was made by someone attracted by his words.

"I should hope not," said Mr. Bryant, rising, "for there, after all, is the real task before us. As you will be staying in Middlewick for a bit, I shall see you again, but now I should like to get to the bank at once."

Twenty minutes later Burton presented himself at the door of the most highly praised man in Middlewick, for the story of old Warren's pluck and bravery of the night before was now in everyone's mouth. Constable Morton's compliments, if not wholly deserved, were yet partly true, for, as he had said, nothing but Warren's interference at the critical moment had saved his life. Bates, equally good-hearted, saw a chance of benefiting the old man, and was glad to do it, especially when Burton suggested that such a course was likely to secure his old situation again. So the heavy somnolence earlier in the evening was not made known to any outsiders.

For his own part, Burton was convinced that there was something about the strange drowsiness of the old man which had not yet been explained, and it was his desire to get to the bottom of the mystery which brought him to the watchman's house.

Opening the way for what he wished to say by a number of compliments on his bravery, Burton quickly came to the point.

"Warren, only three people know that when the burglars entered the bank last night—I mean only three people besides them—you were sound asleep, and had been for a long time. Those three are Bates, Morton, and myself."

"Who told you anything about it?" asked the watchman sullenly.

"Bates and Morton. But you needn't worry, we shall keep it to ourselves; we've agreed on that. What's more I'll get your place back for you, provided you do me a favour or two."

"Mr. Burton, there isn't anything I won't do for you if you'll do that," said Warren, in a trembling voice.

"I want you to tell me how it was you went to sleep last night, almost as soon as you entered the building."

"I'm sure I don't know," was the puzzled reply.

"And then on the night of the robbery you did the same thing."

"Yes, and that's what gits over me."

"And you have never done anything like it before."

"Well now, not exactly. I can't deny that now and then, when everything was quiet and looked all right, I have dozed for a few minutes in my chair, but never anything like on them two nights."

"But you told Mr. Bryant that that had been your custom for years."

"I shouldn't have said that," remarked the watchman like a schoolboy detected in a falsehood. "I was sort of dispirited, and disgusted and——"

"And what?"

"I was afeard if I owned that that was the only night I'd slept so sound some folks would think there was an understanding between the burglars and me. That's why I made out it was a common thing with me."

"Ah! the idea wasn't a bad one; but we haven't yet got at the reason why you slept so heavily. One thing you were awake all yesterday, but surely you were not so tired that you went off to sleep almost the moment you sat down."

Presented himself at the door.

"That puzzles me, but I can't explain it."

"Warren, has anybody forbidden you to talk about the robbery the other night?"

The abrupt question served to put the old watchman on his guard. He had lost sight of Mr. Bryant's injunction that he should not allow any one to talk to him about the burglary.

"Bless my soul!" he exclaimed in dismay. "I forgot all about that."

He then told what the banker had said to him.

Burton laughed and replied:

"Oh, that's all right. I had a talk with Mr. Bryant this morning. You need have no fear on that point."

The old watchman was only partly satisfied. If he was to regain his former place he could not be too careful about offending his employer. At the same time he was grateful to his visitor.

"Do you drink, Warren?"

"Never have in all my life."

"How long have you suffered from rheumatism?"

"It has been getting worse for more'n two years."

"What do you do for it?"

"Nothing very much. It's old age and can't be helped, I always think."

"Have you taken any medicine?"

"Yes," was the prompt response.

"Have you tried anything new lately?"

"On the afternoon of the robbery I took a new remedy."

"Did you apply it externally or internally?"

The old man was not quite clear as to the meaning of these terms. Burton explained them.

"I took it infernally; that is, I swallered it."

"How often—that is, on the day of the robbery?"

"Once, I think it was."

"When did you take the dose?"

"During the night of the robbery, after I had gone on watch."

"Why?—was the pain worse?"

"Then was the order."

"Whose? the doctor's?"

The old watchman was growing uneasy over this sharp questioning. He did not reply. His silence was of itself

Digitized by Google

The old man was not quite clear as to the meaning of these terms.

an answer to Burton's inquiry, who held his curiosity well in hand.

"It's all right. You have gone so far, you need not fear telling me all."

"I would really rather say nothing more about it, Mr. Burton, for it's against rules, you know."

"But you've already broken those. Remember I'm to get your place back for you."

"Well, you do that first, and then I'll tell you the rest."

"I have already done it, my friend."

The watchman looked at his caller in wondering doubt.

"I arranged it all this morning before coming here. Mr. Bryant told me I might tell you, and also that he wants to see you some time to-day."

At that moment a knock sounded at the street door. Warren had told his wife to tell anyone who called to see him that he was busy.

The murmur of voices was heard in the hall. Then his wife dismissed the visitor, and came smiling into the room where the couple were sitting.

"Mr. Bryant has just sent word that he wants you to go back to work this evening, and will see you this afternoon."

It was a lucky interruption for Burton. He quietly smiled as the pleased face of the old man was turned towards him.

"Don't you believe me now, Warren?"

"Yes, there ain't any getting over that."

"If it was so easy for me to persuade Mr. Bryant to give you another trial, it will be just as easy for me to convince him he had better not. All I've got to do is to let him know the truth about last night, and to tell him what you have already said to me about the robbery."

Digitized by Google

It was a cruel advantage to take of the old man, but Jack Burton believed the end justified the means.

"But are you going to stop on with me?" asked Warren perplexedly.

"No. I called on Mr. Bryant, as I told you, this morning, said I wished to leave, and asked him to take you back. But never mind about that. Was it the doctor who ordered you to take that medicine for the rheumatism?"

"No."

"Who was it?"

"The man who gave the bottle to me."

"Of course; he took the place of a doctor. Where is the bottle?"

"I have it in the cupboard in the other room," replied Warren hesitatingly.

"Bring it to me; if you don't, Warren, I shall have you discharged again within half-an-hour."

The host, with a helpless air, left the room. He was gone but a minute when he came back with a two-ounce bottle in his hand, but Burton noticed it was empty.

"What's become of the medicine that was in it?"

"I took it all."

"When!"

"Last night, after going into the bank. I oughter took it before that, but forgot it."

"What directions did you receive when your friend prescribed for you?"

"I was to take a good dose of it that night, about ten o'clock, and so I did."

"Did it help your rheumatism?"

"I can't say as to that, for I don't 'spose I've give it a fair trial; you see, there wasn't much of it."

Jack Burton, while continuing his questioning, twisted out the cork and applied his nose to the neck of the bottle. He was not a chemist, but he knew enough about medicine to instantly detect the odour of laudanum.

There could be no doubt but that on the night of the robbery the old watchman had been deliberately drugged, and that later the thing had been repeated, though in the latter instance Warren himself was wholly responsible.

"Since you've finished the medicine, I will keep this bottle."

The old man made a weak protest, but his visitor quieted him and put the phial in his pocket.

"Did a certain person call at the bank on the night of the robbery and give you this medicine, with orders to take a big dose and tell no one about it."

"Yes, sir."

"Very well; now who was the person?"

The host looked his visitor straight in the face and said:

"I won't tell you his name, if I had to lose my situation again for it, Mr. Burton; I've already told you more than I oughter."

Jack Burton respected the old man's scruples too much to press him.

"Only one thing more, Warren, and I'll leave you in peace. Is this man connected with the bank?"

After a moment's pause the answer came:

"Yes; he has something to do with the bank."

"Thanks. And now good-bye and don't bother yourself about the affair. It will be all right."

The watchman seemed reassured by the words of his visitor, supplementing as they did the official notice of his restoration to his old post.

Disappointed in more than one respect, Burton went on his way thinking deeply, the only satisfaction he seemed to have gained from the interview being expressed in the muttered sentence:

"At any rate I have picked up a valuable clue from him."

And yet the wisest man may be mistaken.

CHAPTER XII.

What Happened at the Hotel.

Jack Burton was still confronted by the most puzzling problem that he had ever undertaken to solve.

Alfred Taylor, who had come to Middlewick to unravel the mystery of the bank robbery, was unaccountably missing. He and Burton had parted late on the previous afternoon with a full understanding of what each was to do in the impending attempt upon the institution, but, with that parting the detective had vanished as utterly as if the earth had opened and swallowed him.

Bobby Roberts, a well-known criminal from London and a member of the company engaged in the plot, was, or had been, in Middlewick on the preceding afternoon. He, too, was missing, and had never once appeared during the exciting events already recorded.

What was his part in that affair? Why had he remained in the background when he might have rendered material assistance to his confederates?

These were questions that remained to be answered.

The most discomforting conviction was that the absences of the two men were directly connected in some way, Burton could not free himself from the belief which necessarily implied the gravest peril to his friend. Though he had not an hour to spare in investigating the extraordinary proceeding was self-evident, but on the threshold he was confronted by the dread that he was powerless. The tracing out of the guilty abstractor or abstractors of the funds could wait; his province was to help the detective, or, if it should prove too late to do that, to bring home the crime of his murder to the right parties.

Uncertain of what he ought to do, Jack Burton resorted to a trifling artifice, from which he expected little, but which, as is often the case in this life, was the means of bringing about momentous results.

First, going to his lodgings, he told the old couple that he would remain with them a few days longer. He had brought a small box to Middlewick, but left the house with a commercial travelling bag. He made his way to the only hotel in the town and was assigned a room on the second floor, adjoining that which had been occupied by his friend, Taylor.

A few inquiries disclosed the fact that that gentleman's luggage was still in his room, but that he had not been there since six o'clock the night before.

Applied his nose to the neck of the bottle.

Within the past twenty-four hours, but one new entry had been made in the visitors' book — "John O'Cane, London." Burton would have liked to have made inquiries regarding him but concluded it was imprudent to do so; opportunity was likely to present itself for seeing the individual without drawing attention to the inquiry.

Digitized by Google

Burton had been in his room only a short time when he gained the chance for a brief stolen visit to his friend's apartment. A quick searching glance satisfied him that nothing was to be learned there and he withdrew to his own quarters.

The town, as it was to be expected, was in a ferment over the occurrences of the night before. They could not be kept from the public nor was there any reason to do so. The reporters were very keen on the matter, a number speedily arriving from town. Burton had to submit to any number of interviews, all of which he accepted good-naturedly; but after he had told the story some dozen times, skilfully keeping back a number of the most important points, he shook himself free and went directly to the Governor's office at the County Gaol whither the three prisoners had been removed.

He made his way to the only hotel in the town.

"Have they had any visitors?" he inquired.

"The whole town is eager to see them if I would permit it," replied the Governor. "Do you want to see them?"

"No. Time enough for me when I have to."

"You caught them neatly," remarked the Governor approvingly. "Who put you on their track?"

"Sometimes a word heard by chance gives an unexpected clue," replied the caller. "Good luck has much more to do with success in matters like that, than skill. So they have had no visitors?"

"Only one—a lawyer."

"Who is he? Anyone in Middlewick?"

"No, a stranger, at least to me. He is from London."

"Do you know his name?"

The custodian of the county prisoners turned to the visitors' book on the desk near him, and, after a glance, replied:

"John O'Cane."

"What time did he go?"

"He hasn't left yet. He came about an hour ago and introduced himself as a lawyer and friend of the parties. I had no reason to disbelieve him, so I called one of the warders to show him to their cells. Do you know the man?"

"I have never met a person of that name."

"I think he is off now," remarked the Governor, as the noise made by the opening and closing of the outer door penetrated his room.

Burton rose to his feet and walked to the front window of the room. The iron bars stretched across the panes on the outside did not interfere with his view of the yard and the path down which visitors walked in coming to and from the gaol.

A tall, well-dressed man was walking briskly towards the gate. Something in his figure and walk struck Burton familiarly, but he waited to gain a view of his face. This came when he reached the street. In the clear sunlight the man's countenance was fully revealed.

It was, as Burton suspected, John O'Cane was one of Mr. Roberts' numerous aliases, as indeed was the surname by which he was best known. He was the individual who had just held a consultation with the prisoners and the man who beyond question had to do with the disappearance of Mr. Taylor.

Excusing himself, Burton hurried out and reached the street while the man was yet in sight. It was not difficult, therefore, to follow him.

Up the High Street went Mr. Roberts straight to the office of the principal solicitor in Middlewick, where he remained until noon. When he came out he proceeded to the hotel and to his room.

A quarter of an hour later, Burton was in his apartment, which was upon the same floor.

Burton had undertaken a most difficult task in thus shadowing this man. While ordinarily such a duty is not ranked among the highest arts that the professional detective must master, yet circumstances often arise which place it almost beyond achievement. It will readily be seen that the present case was such a one, for the man he was shadowing was one of the shrewdest criminals of the day, who was always on the alert for his mortal enemies, the officers of the law. A single slip on Burton's part, and the whole scheme would fall to the ground.

It has been stated that before accepting the position of watchman at the Middlewick Bank, Burton had effected a number of changes in his personal appearance; indeed, few of his friends meeting him in the little country town would have suspected his identity.

But while a change of costume is easy, the transformation of one's personality is a far different matter. It can be done so as to deceive the most watchful where the light is poor and the circumstances favourable, but it may well be questioned whether the most skilful detective can conceal his identity from a pair of bright inquiring eyes under the glare of the electric light or the rays of the noonday sun.

At any rate, Jack Burton was so certain that if he met Roberts face to face during the daytime that the criminal would identify him, that he took every precaution to prevent such a meeting. He lunched privately in his own room to avoid meeting Roberts in the public dining-room. He closed and locked his door. His compartment being next to that of his friend commanded a view of the main street. He did not mean to let Roberts escape him again.

There was every prospect of a long watch, and Burton assumed a comfortable position and lighted his cigar. He was badly in need of sleep, but so overwrought that he had no fear of dropping into unconsciousness. Half-an-hour passed when his keen sense of hearing caught the sound of a cautious footstep outside in the corridor. Someone was creeping about and trying to avoid detection.

"It's Roberts," concluded the watcher. "He's up to mischief."

The catlike footsteps halted opposite his own door. Then Burton saw the handle silently turned. It went round far enough to draw the catch out of the lock. A gentle pressure followed, but the door being fastened did not yield.

A second time the effort was made with the same result, then the would-be intruder ceased. The key was in the lock, the door could not be opened without pushing it out and inserting another instrument.

Holding his handkerchief, as if by accident, so as to conceal his features, Burton watched the door. He knew it was Roberts who was trying the lock and he did not mean that he should gain a view of his face by any chance.

Digitized by Google

A few seconds later Roberts withdrew from the door, without perceptible noise, and while Burton was still idly wondering what his next move would be, he heard a faint sound in his friend's room.

The noise was slight, but it was as if a chair had been gently stirred.

Burton's face lighted up. He understood now what it all meant. Roberts was looking for Taylor's room and had mistaken Burton's for it. Earlier in the day the detective had taken the precaution of locking Taylor's door and taking out the key so the intruder must have opened it with a false one. Burton stepped to the wall and pressed his ear against it. He could readily hear the man stealthily moving about. The listener was indignant and felt a strong impulse to burst into the room and thrust out the intruder.

But that would have been impolitic to the last degree. It would bring the couple face to face—the very catastrophe which Burton was so anxious to avoid. Besides, Roberts could easily plead that he had made a mistake, and in justice demand what right Burton had to interfere.

Whatever the intruder's errand, it was quickly over and he withdrew. Softly opening his own door, Burton listened. The next minute the man was heard descending the stairs. There being no cause for a secrecy in this movement, it was easy to hear his footsteps.

Burton darted to his window, holding himself ready to follow the other, but minute after minute passed without anything being seen of him.

A man in Burton's position cannot restrain himself from forming theories without number respecting the one great subject in his mind. It would be useless to attempt to give those which came to him, most of them being dismissed as soon as they assumed shape. It is only necessary to say that, for the first time since he had undertaken the singular task before him, Burton began to consider the possibility that his first supposition was wrong, and that strange as was his friend's disappearance, Roberts after all had nothing to do with it. The probabilities, however, still pointed the other way, and he was determined to keep the man under supervision.

At the end of half-an-hour Burton descended the stairs, resolved to find out what had become of Roberts. He found him enjoying an after-dinner smoke, having finished which, he settled his hotel bill as though with the intention of leaving the town. He then walked leisurely to the railway station, where he purchased a ticket for London, and a quarter of an hour later saw him on his way to the Metropolis. This might be a blind, but Burton believed the man intended really going there; indeed, nothing seemed more natural than that he should do so. Instead, therefore, of following him, Burton decided to remain in Middlewick.

Burton stepped to the wall.

So critical did he consider the situation that he decided upon a step which under other circumstances nothing could have induced him to take. He went to the office of the attorney with whom Roberts had had an interview earlier in the day.

"I expected to meet my old friend, Mr. O'Cane, here," was his explanation, when he found himself in the presence of that dignitary; "but I'm afraid I've missed him."

"You must have mistaken the appointment if you had one," was the attorney's reply, as he scrutinised his visitor as though he recollected seeing him before.

"I am afraid I must have. Can you tell me where I am likely to find him?"

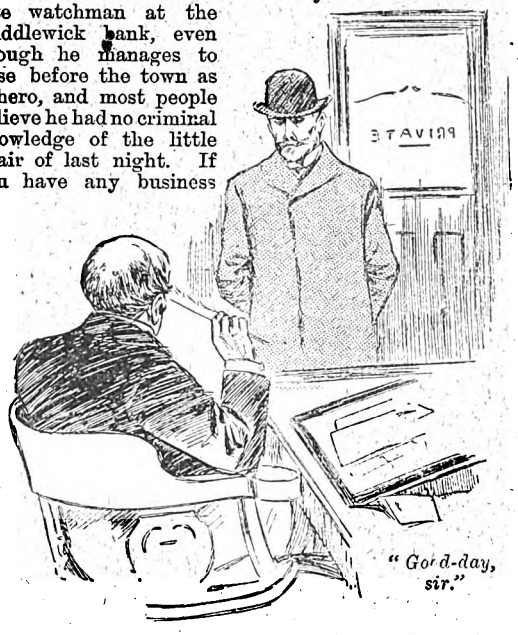
"Isn't he at the hotel?"

"No. I left there a few minutes ago and they told me he had returned to London."

"Then how do you expect to see him here?"

"I thought he might have left some message for me as to his whereabouts."

"If he had done so I would hardly communicate it to the late watchman at the Middlewick bank, even though he manages to pose before the town as a hero, and most people believe he had no criminal knowledge of the little affair of last night. If you have any business with me, sir, I refuse to listen to it, and the sooner you leave this office the better."



"Good-day, sir."

"I shall go when I wish to. A man in your position has too hard work to earn his bread-and-butter to give any consideration to the character of his clients or the justice of their cases."

"That remark is warranted by your own presence in my office, but I decline to take your case."

"It's easy to decline that which has not been offered. I have not yet fallen so low as to appeal to you for help."

"Nor I so low as to give it."

"Well?" added Burton, rising from his chair, "I wish you good luck in defending a lot of the worst criminals that ever afflicted this country. I have no doubt the task is a congenial one."

"Far better than defending one who assaults so important a person as the police superintendent."

"No doubt you will earn your fee, but your clients have less money to waste upon legal advice than they would have had had I not helped to bring their schemes to nought."

"It is not difficult for an honest man to obtain defence, while a dishonest person needs twice as much to clear himself, a fact which you would do well to bear in mind. But I must really decline to waste any more time upon you."

"And I am sorry that I have already wasted more valuable time than yours."

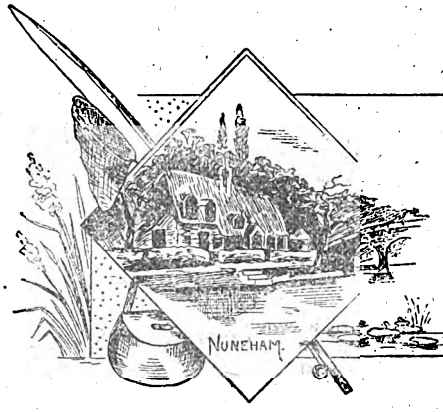
"Oblige me, then, by leaving."

"Good-day, sir."

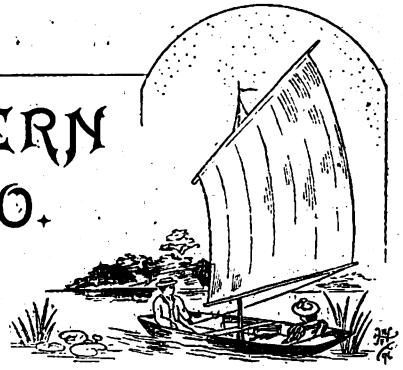
The attorney made no response and Burton withdrew, feeling that in this after view at least, he had got the best of it.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google



A MODERN SAPPHO.



Covent Garden Theatre was in a blaze of light, and the gaily-attired figures were gracefully keeping time to the sweet strains of Glover's magnificent band, while others were idly "sitting out" the dances, and conversing on the fashionable topics of the season.

Amongst these we see two figures partly hidden by the large palms, one, that of Rosa Bellafonce, who is admirably attired as "Sappho," her long black satin mantle lined throughout with scarlet showed off her magnificently modelled figure to perfection, her beautifully shaped head crowned with a rich wealth of golden curls, on which was daintily placed her black satin Sappho hat.

Miss Rosa Bellafonce was (so the critics said) "the queen of burlesque;" her dancing eyes and graceful easy movements—to say nothing of her beautiful figure—had taken the hearts of the general public. The second person was Lord Dewhurst—a charming boy with an effeminate face, limited vocabulary, and a magnificent banking account, which was without doubt the charm he held for Miss Bellafonce. His age (judging from his boyish countenance) might have been seventeen at most.

In reality, however, young Lord Dewhurst was just twenty. He was an awkward, blushing youth, on whose shoulders Society manners might have rested a trifle more comfortably had not his fair companion robbed him of his very limited senses.

"Shall we—ah, take a turn, Miss Rosa?" he is asking, adjusting his eyeglass, and gazing at Rosa in rapture.

"No, Dewhurst—believe me, I am far more comfortable where I am," she answered sweetly, placing her hand on his arm. Poor Bertie blushes scarlet, and endeavours to stammer a pretty speech, in which he fails hopelessly.

"By Jove, Miss Rosa," he says at last, with a great effort, "you look stunning to-night—what—ah—ripping idea to have—chosen that—costume."

"Do you think so?" laughed Rosa, rising, and glancing at herself in a long mirror, and holding out her mantle for the benefit of the bewildered Bertie, who could not find words to express his admiration.

"Come, Lord Dewhurst, let us take a turn now, my favourite waltz has just commenced."

Rosa takes the proffered arm with a playful squeeze, and they join the merry throng.

Many envious glances are cast in their direction as they glide over the polished floor, and thus run the whispers:

"Great Scot! old chappie—why, it's Rosa from the Frivolity—the queen of principal boys—and, by Jove! it's Dewhurst who is with her; he'll make a fool of himself over her. But only wait until the Earl, his grandfather, sees him. The old fellow won't like being cut out by his heir; she is a great pet of his."

"Is the old boy here to-night?" asked a blasé-looking fellow, with a bored, languid air.

"Yes, he is never out of an affair of this kind—a sad old dog is Earl Dewhurst."

Thus ran the chatter round the theatre as the fair actress and her youthful admirer glided through the crowd.

Bertie Dewhurst perhaps was not aware that his aristocratic grandfather was watching him keenly all the evening. There was a curious expression on his florid countenance—one of amusement and yet envy.

"Foolish boy," he mutters incessantly to himself, "I must have a word with Rosa to-night."

* * * * *

The following morning Rosa Bellafonce is fully equipped. She is admiring herself in a glass, being quite satisfied with her appearance, she seats herself in her dainty boudoir, and anxiously watches the progress of the clock.

It is nearly twelve.

The Earl Dewhurst is expected at twelve forty-five, and his grandson at twelve. Rosa fears that they should meet, if so her game would be up. "I wonder if Bertie will come?" she asks herself with a doubtful smile. "Suppose they should meet;" she gives vent to a harsh, musical laugh at the idea.

It was only a few weeks since she had been introduced to Lord Dewhurst, and on their first interview she made up her mind that she should be Lady Dewhurst.

The fact was Miss Bellafonce had already tired of the glamour of the footlights, and seated thus in a luxury of indolence she discovered that the bouquets and the chappies' admiration hardly repaid her in her efforts to please. This was evidently her opportunity. "Dolly Drinkwater married the Duke of Brentford, and Gracie Jellingham the grandson of an earl, and why not I—I'm equally good-looking as either, and a greater favourite."

Her only fear was, as she sat thinking over her well laid plans, would the blushing, awkward Bertie be as enchanted by the light of day as he had been by the glare of the footlights?

Yes, she thought he would now she had taken her boy in hand and was determined to bring him to the point.

Her meditations were disturbed by the clock chiming out the hour of twelve, to be almost immediately followed by a sharp ring of the electric bell at the hall door.

Posing herself gracefully with studied abandon on the satin couch, Rosa awaited the entrance of Bertie.

A neat little French maid announced the visitor, and Rosa, feigning sleepiness, closed her large blue eyes.

Digitized by Google

Bertie stood motionless, his face aflame, nervously plucking at a huge bouquet he held clumsily in his trembling hands.

"Go—good-morning, Miss Rosa," he stammered.

"Good gracious, Lord Dewhurst! you here?"

"Yes, I told you I'd call," he answered, thrusting his presentation forward and planting it in Rosa's lap.

"Did you?—oh yes, I remember; but I naturally thought you would forget all about me—I mean by this morning."

"Forget you, Rosa, do—ah—you think—that possible?"

"Yes, of course. I think it not only possible but very probable—but how did you enjoy the ball?" she asked.

"Really—awfully jolly—'pon honour, Miss Rosa, I—ah—should have been—awfully—bored if you'd not been there though."

"Now you are joking, Lord Dewhurst; what earthly difference did I make to your enjoyment?"

"Really," continued Bertie, gaining courage, "I mean it—you know, Miss Rosa, I have done nothing but think of you"—he paused for breath—"ever since I first saw you."

"Really?"

"Ye—as, but Rosa—" slipping his arm round her waist. He was undoubtedly gaining courage, and after coughing carefully into his elaborate silk handkerchief, he continued:

"Miss Rosa—do—ah—you know what I came to say to you?"

"Can't say, dear boy," she answered sweetly.

"Don't you think that—" again he paused, and removed his arm and gazed at his turned-in toes.

"Don't I think what?" asked Rosa.

"That—eh—ah awfully jolly hop, wasn't it. By Jove!"

Rosa could hardly suppress laughing in his face.

It seemed a lame beginning but he was progressing favourably she thought.

"I believe," he continued, regaining his composure a little, "that I enjoyed the ball because you were there, Rosa."

Rosa only laughed, fearing to say anything, in case of putting a stop to his utterance altogether.

"Rosa—can't you see that I think you the cleverest girl in the world?"

She hung her head modestly for a moment, and then lifting her eyes gazed fondly at him.

That look was too much for him, he was at her feet.

"Rosa, will you be my wife!"

His nervousness had flown to the four winds, he seemed to see nothing but the lovely actress before him.

"But Bertie—your grandfather," she said archly.

"He will be all right—he won't mind—if he does, it will only be envy that will make him angry—but Rosa, you have not answered me."

"Do you really mean it? Are you serious?" asks Rosa.

"I swear I am, Rosa."

In another moment she was in his arms.

Rosa's brain was still working hard.

Was it worth consideration? Had Bertie spoken truly about his grandfather's adoration? The old dotard was just seventy-four, with his coffers well filled. One thing she must do—probe deeper into Bertie's monetary affairs, and see what should be her next best move. She had not mentioned to Bertie that there had been many a quiet little flirtation between Earl Dewhurst and herself in the wings at the Frivolity.

No, she thought, "a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush," so the old adage had it. She would accept the offer which lay open to her and await further developments. Should the Earl turn up trumps, all would be well, if not—then the boy must suffer.

"Suppose, Bertie," she said, turning her face to his, "your grandfather should disinherit you. I cannot let you lose your fortune through me."

"He cannot leave me penniless, Rosa, and we could live on five hundred a year."

"Could we, though?" thought Rosa.

"Besides, Rosa, we might manage to keep this little affair quiet until I come of age, and then ——"

Just at this moment the clock struck the half hour, and Rosa started; she must rid herself of Bertie at any cost, to receive his grandfather. Turning to him she said:

"Bertie, this is so unexpected, you must give me time. Leave me now and come to-morrow for your answer."

Bertie was beside himself with excitement, and proudly left the room, overturning several small articles in his hurry.

* * * * *

Rosa Bellafonce is waiting to receive her second visitor, and busies herself in seeing that all is ready for his reception.

"Good-morning, my dear; you see I am punctual."

It is the Earl who speaks; his manner is easy, and he makes himself at home, taking the nearest seat he can find to the fascinating actress.

"I suppose you know why I asked you for this interview?" he says, gazing at Rosa.

"No, I do not," she replied with dignity.

"Well, I have heard that my grandson is about to make an ass of himself—but I know a trick worth two of that—and I am going to put a stop to this silly colt's gallop. Now my coffers are well filled and I am at liberty to do what I like with most of their contents—leave it to him or keep it myself. I went to the ball last night in hopes of seeing you—I mean to speak to you."

"Yes," said Rosa, "but I did see you—only for a moment."

"Well, my dear, I will cut it short. Don't you think that you would like to handle the Dewhurst fortune with those pretty little fingers?"

He took her shapely jewelled hand in his while Rosa's merry laughter rang out blithely.

"Be the Countess and let's be married to-morrow."

"Agreed," answered Rosa, and in her triumph all her pretty shyness and graceful reserve had flown.

Throwing her shapely arms round the old man's neck, she whispered:

"You dear old darling, be it as you wish. Call for me to-morrow at ten; but, dearest, only our two selves, if you love me."

"Be it as you wish, little woman; I will be punctual, don't keep me waiting," and with a hurried embrace he left her.

Again she was left alone: she hastened to scribble a note to Bertie, which ran as follows:

STUPID BOY,—By the time you receive this we shall be far away. I have changed my mind, and I think I prefer the old hand at matrimony to the new one. You see, I shall still be something to you,—Your Grandmother, ROSA DEWHURST.

Punctually at twelve Bertie Dewhurst bounded up the steps of —— Vila and rang the bell with trembling hand. The neat handed Phyllis laughed outright as she opened the door, and handed him Rosa's note.

Hastily he tore open the dainty little envelope. His face blanched, looked blankly at the trim servant girl, and at last he managed to gasp out: "Scratched! Great Scot!—scratched!"

B. MAITLAND.

Digitized by Google

A FINE HAUL OF FISH

From the Spanish of Don Pedro de Alarcon.

Covered with glory and with wounds in the War of the Succession and without a penny in his purse, as in those days was the case with most warriors and heroes, the noble scion of Mequinenza returned one day to his dismantled castle, to rest from the harsh fatigues of the camp and eat in peace the lentils that came with his title.

Two words let us give to the soldier and another two to his birthplace. Don Jaime de Mequinenza, baron of that name, who had fought as a captain for the interests of Louis the Fourteenth, was at that time a man of five-and-thirty years, tall, handsome, rough, brave and energetic; little lettered, but jovial and gallant to the last degree with women—particularly fond, indeed, of pretty peasants.

At the foot of this rock were a dozen cots and hovels, tenanted by the vassals of the baron, or it might rather be said by the husbandmen who tilled the few fields left to his possession. From the hamlet to the castle the road climbed by fourteen or fifteen steep terraces, above which was a moat, with its drawbridge; the moat filled by a canal or wide ditch that tapped the Ebro a league to the northward and then fell, below the fortress, in a noisy torrent back into the swelling river.

Perched on an almost inaccessible flank of the mountain, separated by this channel from the castle, and, like it, hanging above the Ebro, there was another rocky spur, crowned by a cabin and a little garden, which in that spot suggested the hanging gardens of Babylon. A heavy beam of walnut wood spanned the foaming current between the castle and the cabin, connecting these, as the drawbridge afforded communication between the castle and the hamlet.

On the lordly crag dwelt Don Jaime de Mequinenza, and on the feudal rock an eel-fisher, who had won a rich revenue from the daring thought of building his hut in that lonely and menacing spot. It had occurred to Damain, for such was the name of the fisherman, to swing from the little bridge two vast nets, through whose meshes swept the torrent, so that the teeming eels that rushed through the cutting, towards the mother waters of the Ebro, were caught here on their course back to their birthplace, and held for the land of the fisherman, who, although he had sold them at a low enough price, yet derived from this slippery source a very respectable income.

Yet for all his labour and enterprise the poor fellow could never save a cuarto. He was not a drinker, for all the cold and wet character of his business; he was not a player; his cigarros were of the commonest sort, and cost him the merest trifle; and for the womankind he had not so much as a passing glance, save only for Carmen.

Save only! But then, that was sufficient exception. For—oh, Carmen, Carmela, Carmelita! Here was enough to squander the revenues of an alcalde, a regidor, a prince, let alone a fisherman. For Carmen was a beauty—a Spanish blonde, think of that, ye connoisseurs!—who would have tempted Saint Anthony himself, if the grace of God should have been withdrawn from him for a moment. Such a waist! such a neck! such ankles! And Carmen knew her own good points—none better! and women of such merit as hers fall in love with themselves when they have not lovers—or when they have, for that matter—and so Carmen spent the price of all the eels in the Ebro on aprons, kerchiefs, earrings, and fallals in general, though there was not a soul to see them but her own dear self.

Damain, her husband? Oh, but he counted for nothing. What was this wretched fisher of eels?—a lout, a clown, a clod. Oh, that is quite apparent! Convinced, no doubt, of her high mission in this poor world of sorrows, Carmen every day dressed herself as if she were going to a ball or a function, and sat herself down at the door of the cabin, where she was seen by the birds, the rock-thyme, and the skies—and by naught else. Still she awaited tranquilly the moment of her destiny.

It is true that if the poor fisherman was ill-dressed, this was to give finer, better raiment to Carmen; that if the husband should labour less, to the end of sparing his hands, the wife would have worked far harder, with the result of spoiling her white ones; true, also, that those eels, which were indeed ill-smelling, paid for the sweet-scented soaps in which Carmen delighted. But who makes such observations to a woman? above all, if that woman is nineteen years old and pretty, airy, and graceful as the rainbow with its seven colours. Ah, yes! gratitude may well be a sentiment too sober for a young woman, and justice—fairness—an uncomfortable idea for a joyous imagination. These virtues are born of suffering, and Carmen was almost quite happy.

Digitized by Google

Given these conditions, it was not at all inconsistent that the thoughts and interest of the fisherman's wife should turn to Don Jaime de Mequinenza, from the day that the news of his return to his baronial halls came to the village at the cliff's foot.

And in effect, when she set eyes upon his worship, Carmen's butterfly brain and her unloyal heart alike sung to her that this was a lord, a fine gentleman, and a hero—here was a man worthy of beauty and charm like hers.

As for the lord of the manor he was already in love with her species, and as the greater includes the less, he was undoubtedly smitten with Carmen. It was not long before they told each other, by the telegraphic code of looks and signals, their mutual and respective sentiments, but this platonic system became to both alike insupportable.

In the meantime Damain went on fishing.

Now, whether it came to pass that the people of the hamlet, failing to realise and appreciate their abject contemptibility, came to criticise the doings of the feudal master, or whether the fisherman chanced to remember that his wife was a pretty woman and Don Jaime a hot-blooded gallant, and that the castle and the cabin were not so wildly separated—there came a time when this worthy husband displayed less than his usual eagerness to make his frequent rounds of his eel-traps. He developed, also, certain rheumatic twinges in his left knee, that impaired his agility in walking, and so he hired a strapping lad whom he made his substitute in conveying the eel-baskets among the purchasers of the vicinity. This procedure of the fisherman was far from meeting with the approval of Carmen and Don Jaime.

One beautiful May evening the two spouses sat at the door of their cabin and watched the sinking sun—the same sun in those days of a century and a half since that we see now above us. That evening it was sinking as slowly and majestically as if it expected never to rise again.

Carmen and Damain, regarding that sun, whose rays dyed the horizon with a strange prophetic light, felt their very souls stirred within them. Uncultured and rude of Nature as they were, they could but feel that this was a critical hour, full of doom, of mystery, of fatality.

When the sun had set entirely, both breathed heavily as those who have completed a long and severe task.

Damain lifted his eyes to the castle, on whose topmost terrace stood the Baron of Mequinenza, whom he saluted. The lord had his eyes fixed on Carmen, who also saluted him easily. Damain stretched his rheumatic leg, and, turning to his wife, said drily: "I think my leg is well again. I feel the pangs no longer. I think I will go down to the village and stay the night there. There is a fellow owes me some money; he will be in with his pay near midnight, and I will catch him before he spends it. I will come up in the morning in time to take out the fish of to-night's fish. Ea, Carmelita, God be with thee."

"Good-bye, Damain," said Carmela mechanically.

They had never before parted in this way, but to both it seemed quite natural. Damain took his hat and his staff and crossed the walnut-wood bridge-way and the fosses of the castle. The sun was still gliding the peak of a distant mountain.

Twelve hours later the sun once more shone over the cabin. All the sadness and foreboding of the day before had been pure farce. There was the sun again, red and joyous as ever, climbing up the heavens as blithely as if this was his first journey there, and shedding life and movement wherever his rays reached.

As to Damain, he, like the sun, seemed in better humour than on the preceding evening, if he might be judged by the lively and frolicsome manner with which he ascended the terraces of the castle, followed by some other fishers, all singing the most villainous jota that had been produced in their country. They reached the drawbridge, crossed the courts of the castle, still lying in silence, and reached the plane fronting Damain's cabin.

"How loud the cascade roars!" said one of the men.

"But what has become of the bridge?" cried another.

"True for you! Look! look! it has slipped from each end! it has sunken into the cutting—it has broken!"

"But how can that be? Such a beam—so long, so well supported by its length! so heavy! and of walnut—a wood as strong as iron!"

"I shall have to buy another," said Damain, shrugging his shoulders; "but come, boys, let the bridge be, and help me with the seines before it grows later." And, taking up the thread of his interrupted song, he began with the others to draw up the eel-nets.

"The dickens! how it weighs them!" cried one of his comrades; "thou hast done well with this haul, Damaincito!"

"At the least it is ten arrobas," said another; "oh, a fine catch! unheard of!"

"I believe you!" shouted a third; "it is more likely he has caught, not eels, but the bridge of walnut wood!"

Damain only smiled without speaking.

"Do you say that net is heavy?" called one of the men, pulling on the second seine; "well, this one is not behind it. This weighs not less than twelve arrobas—all of three hundred weight."

"Oh! it's a couple of big rocks that have fallen in," said an envious-minded fellow.

Damain was gloomy, trembling, covered with a cold sweat. "So one seine weighs heavy as the other," he muttered; "oh! but it cannot be!" He stepped out of the water and slowly took his way to the cabin.

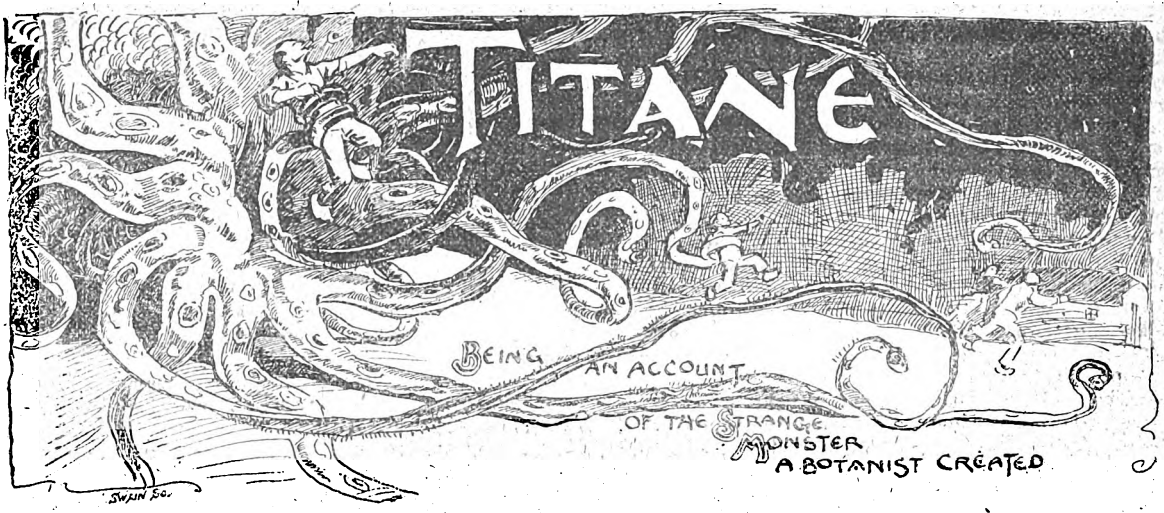
By this time the first seine was coming up to the bank, and in it appeared, truly enough, the bridge of walnut wood. Not all of it, but the half. It was not doubted that during the night the bridge had been sawed across the middle. The men who dragged it out were staring with surprise and terror; they started back with horror-stricken faces, shrieking.

At the same moment Damain appeared in the door of his cabin, with his hair on end, his eyes fixed and starting, and a look of utter stupidity, yet screaming with laughter—a laughter like a voice from Bedlam. He had found his home deserted and the couch of Carmen untouched by her since the day before. And the fishermen had seen in the net with the walnut timber the pallid face of Don Jaime.

A moment after, their frightened mates drew out the second seine, with the other half of the bridge and the body of Carmen.

"She, also?" Damain shouted; "oh! I did not look for that, though! I thought she would wait for him in the house; I never dreamt she would run to meet him! But she did, you see! She was impatient to meet her lover, and she went on the bridge to meet him. But I had been there before them. I sawed it! sawed it! sawed it! Oh! what a fine haul we have made to-day, boys. A good catch of fish is this we have made, boys!" And, shrieking, he ran and shut himself in the cabin.

Digitized by Google



Translated from the French of Jules Lermina.

I HAD never seen her handwriting before; and yet, the instant the letter was brought to me, I knew it was from Paula, whom I had not seen for three long years, not since she had become the wife of Frederick Wertheim, the brilliant botanist whose researches had won the plaudits of the whole scientific world. Paula and I had been friends from childhood, and I had naturally expected to see her handwriting embellished with all manner of capricious little twists and curls; but I knew it was from her as soon as I saw my name on the envelope, despite the hurried, nervous letters, and I felt instinctively that something was amiss.

I broke the seal hurriedly—the sheet bore but two words "come" and her name, "Paula."

Such a request from her was to me an order. I did not hesitate a moment. Paula and her husband lived on a large estate about six miles distant from the city. But my strolls had never led me in that direction; it would have brought up dreams of my childhood that were best forgotten—but there, it does no good to sentimentalise in this fashion.

It was early autumn, and I had to urge my horse through a heavy fog. The château in which Paula lived was situated at the extremity of an avenue of chestnut trees whose boughs interlaced to form a long, dark tunnel. As I entered this avenue, it seemed to me that far in the black circle, which looked like the cave of some terrible beast, I could see the vague features of a horrid, grinning mask, shadowy as mist, which menaced me and dared me to come on. The sinister impression of this hallucination was so strong that I drew rein and half stopped, leaning forward on my horse's neck to peer into the profound darkness. Then, driving the spurs into my horse's flanks, I dashed into the unknown.

I was almost thrown by the abruptness with which the horse stopped, for just before me was an iron gate, surmounted by a curiously carved head, a masterpiece of the ironworker's skill, which accounted for my strange illusion of the night before. And behind the twisted bars of the gate stood Paula, awaiting me, her rosy baby in her arms. Even in the darkness I could see that she was very pale and that her face showed signs of suffering. I jumped from the saddle, and in an instant was raising to my lips the hand she extended to me.

Arrived at the porch she stopped a moment as if listening. She could have heard nothing, for she slowly opened the heavy door, which swung silently to disclose a heavily carpeted hall. And a moment later we were in a small reception room, lighted by candles which threw a fitful gleam upon our faces.

"Listen."

They were the first words she had pronounced, and the sad tones of her voice told me she had suffered deeply.

"I have summoned you," she went on; "you are the friend of my childhood. The bond between us has been strained, but it is not broken. Three years ago I became Frederick's wife. As a child I had thought of him, whom they already called professor, as a being whom none might disobey; he won me with a word, his glance held me, and I felt myself conquered by his will. My weakness leant upon his strength. I was proud to bow before this will that seemed to dominate all things. I speak of these matters because it is necessary that you should understand all, for I have sore need of your help."

"Why, what is the matter? Does Frederick dare——"

"Frederick is goodness itself, he loves me—but, I am afraid, I fear—I fear him above all things. Why? Oh, if I could but tell you! if I could but know myself! But this fear which torments me every day, and every night still more, is the more poignant because it is inexplicable!"

"Bah! Terror, fear—these are mere words," said I lightly, though I was far from feeling at ease.

"Words which sound in our brains, nevertheless, which are intelligible to our reason, which awake dread echoes. Why do you smile? Do you not know that mystery is stronger than reason, that from it arises the anguish of the unknown?"

In spite of myself, in spite of my wish to appear sceptical, I felt most unpleasantly disturbed. Lowering my voice, I interrogated her in a gentler tone. This is what she told me: For six months past, that is to say since the birth of her child, Frederick, who, until then had held his head high, like a soldier who feels his victory near, had all at once grown nervous. Of what problem was he seeking the solution? What combat had he dared to undertake? He became morbidly silent, and replied to his wife's questions only with haggard looks, as if he begged her not to arouse some distressing memory. For days and nights he remained shut up in a hot-house which he had had constructed at great expense in the park.

Digitized by Google

Weeks passed without his appearing at the château. Sometimes, in the night, he would creep silently into his wife's chamber. She had watched him while he believed her to be sleeping. She had seen him seated on a lounge, with fixed eyes staring at some fearful object. There was in his contracted face an expression of indescribable horror. His face shook, and his hands, agitated in a convulsive movement, seemed to repulse some invisible enemy. Then—oh, she had studied him carefully in those brief moments—he had looked up with an imperious triumphant resolution. Springing up suddenly, he had fled. Paula had flown to the window, she had seen him hurry towards the hot-house, where the lights flared always from dusk to dawn like a light-house.

Frankly and boldly she had questioned him. What was going on down there in the park? Why did he so obstinately refuse to let anyone enter the hot-house?

With a shudder he had coldly put her aside unanswered.

Then, brave hypocrite that she was, she had tried to fathom the truth. And she had learned a strange thing. Each day Frederick made the gardener buy many pounds of fresh meat, and himself carried them in the evening to the hot-house. What could he be nourishing there? Was it some dangerous, unknown animal that he was compelled to feed, a creature with which he was resigned to live alone for some scientific purpose? And what was that struggle, to which his rebellions in the night bore witness.

Was he mad? That thought had pierced the stricken heart of Paula like a dagger. She dared not question him more, as she saw anguish bring wrinkles to his face; and, too, he avoided her. He came no more, as had been his wont, to chat with her in the intervals of his work. Sometimes, however, she saw him, haggard and bare-headed, striding up and down the paths, wringing his hands, and ever and anon casting nervous glances towards the hot-house.

At last—and this was the last torment—one night, while she slept, he had come, with his noiseless tread into her chamber. She had felt that he was there, and she had suddenly opened her eyes. Frederick, standing there motionless, glared at his child's cradle with the hungry eyes of a madman, and his hands contracted as in supplication.

"Frederick! Frederick! What are you doing here at this hour!"

He had muttered a brutal imprecation, and again had fled!

This is what Paula told me, as she spoke, I felt a reassuring sense of relief descend upon my heart. What was it, after all—a mere state of morbidness brought on by excessive work. I had been Frederick's pupil and friend for years, and I had often listened with wonder at the boldness of the hypotheses he launched into when warmed up on one of his favourite topics. Was I not a physician, and did I not recognise the madness of fever when I was brought face to face with it? So thinking, I reasoned with myself, and, sure of my eloquence and the power of reason, I went out into the park in search of Frederick.

Night had fallen, and the pathways were but dimly lighted by the stars. Presently I saw the hot-house of which Paula had spoken. It was large and well-built, surmounted with a Mauresque dome. The lights inside were not yet lit, but the stars glinted brightly on the curved glass panes.

So therein lay the mystery. I almost laughed aloud as I thought of Paula's childish fears.

As I stood taking in the details of the structure, a hurried step grated on the gravelled path. Turning sharply about, I saw, or rather divined, in the deep shadow of the trees, Frederick Wertheim.

Haggard and bare-headed, striding up and down the paths.

"Frederick," said I boldly, "do you not recognise me?"

He stopped abruptly.

"Frederick," I continued, "it is I," and I held out my hand, surprised not to feel his own.

Then guided, as it seemed to me, rather by the sound of my voice than by his eyes, he leant forward, and, in a harsh, cracked voice, which sounded like the breaking of a branch, he said:

"You! What do you want? Leave me!"

"What! Is this the way you receive me after so long a separation? Have you forgotten our old friendship?"

He was undecided, wavering where he stood. I noticed, for the first time, that he carried on his arm a basket, which seemed to be quite heavy.

"I cannot stop," he said, "let me pass."

"Why, certainly you can pass," I replied; "but you will not prevent me, I suppose, from following you. I want to have an old-time chat with you."

He chuckled in an uncanny fashion.

"You would follow me? Bah!"

"On my soul, professor, this glass palace must conceal some treasure of which you are very jealous."

With his free hand he seized my arm, and, as I kept silent, he leant forward as one who listens. I seemed to make out some faint, singular sound, something like the gliding of a reptile through the grass.

"She is waiting for me!" he cried, in a tone in which I could detect an ill-suppressed terror; "I must go."

"Well, if you must go, let us go together."

He seemed to hesitate still. Then, with a determined gesture, he muttered: "Come, then; even you could defend me, if by any chance——"

He did not complete the sentence. But as his hand glided over mine, I felt that it was cold as ice.

He led me now. We arrived before the door of the hot-house. He drew a key from his pocket, and turned it in the lock; and, as I stepped forward, seeing nothing about me in the darkness, he drew me back with sudden violence.

Digitized by Google

"On your life," he whispered, "do not move."

In spite of my assurance, I felt a vague, unreasoning dread seize upon me. Again I heard that strange rustling which had struck me before, it was a gentle, gliding sound, such as is made by a paper slipping across a marble floor.

All at once, I knew not how, Frederick caused a glaring, blinding light to illuminate the hot-house, and—horrified, my hair standing upon my head, I fell back against the door, my hands clutching its iron bars!

In the centre of the room, in the midst of an endless variety of fantastically formed plants, a being, a nightmare, a horror arose before my eyes; a hydra, a polyp—a thing no man could name.

It had the shape of a colossal gourd, and from its surface innumerable arms reached out, with glaucous bulbs, like eyes, at the end of each. The inner body seemed green, the arms were of reddish purple, and, as they spread out to those ghoulish eyes, the blood-red seemed to blend and mingle to the greenness of a putrescent corpse.

My eyes closed involuntarily, and I felt a terrible griping at my heart; and still I heard that gliding sound, which I divined came from those arms as they reached forth and contracted within themselves again incessantly.

"Assassin! You have killed Titane!"

At last, surprised that I had not been seized by this hideous and monstrous thing, I mustered up strength to look at it. Frederick, who was now as pale as death, had taken from the basket a piece of meat, and, with infinite precautions, balancing gingerly on the tips of his toes, as if he feared lest his hand be touched by those horrible tentacles, he placed the raw morsel on the extremity of a cluster of those waving arms. And suddenly, as if they were of elastic, the arms drew in upon themselves, dragging the meat, which was thus brought to the shorter arms, which I now saw composed an inner circle. And all the arms bent towards the centre, till I could no longer see the meat.

Shuddering and sick at heart, I glanced at Frederick. His forehead was covered with perspiration, his teeth chattered—the demoniac brute was motionless now, ravenous over its monstrous deglutition.

"She eats, Titane eats!" he whispered.

"Titane?" I repeated after him stupidly.

"You do not know, you do not understand! Do you not recognise her? Now, look, she is tamed—" and all at once I comprehended; I saw that "Titane" was this monstrous beast.

"For nearly an hour she will be this way," said Frederick; "ah, I know why you have come! They think me mad! But it is not true—mad, I—I, who by a miracle of perseverance, by a master-work of selection, have developed the insectivorous plant Drosera to this formidable size. You will see it, this monster, hold out its tentacles to me in an instant empty—and I must nourish it, I must feed it, or—" He glanced about him apprehensively.

"Or?" I repeated.

"Listen," said he; "you shall know my secret. You know with what ardour I followed the discoveries of Nitschke, Warming and Darwin in the study of those strange plants that are intermediate between the vegetable and animal worlds, which entrap insects, seize them, and feed upon them, slowly absorbing and sucking nourishment from them. I was sure of the results of these strange studies, I did not doubt the end for an instant, and I said to myself that the Droscra, the Dionœa, the Drosophyllum are—listen to me well now—the degenerate posterity of monstrous animals, whose terrible forms have remained to us in the legends of the most primitive peoples. Hydras, chimeras, krakens, dragons—all have existed, the human imagination has created nothing.

"But by climatic adaptations, because of geological transplantation, and through the thousand-and-one modifying forces of nature, these formidable beings, deprived of the nourishment that was necessary to them, have retrogressed, by a kind of inverted atavism, into the vegetable form, have become immovable, attached to the soil by roots. They were compelled to seek their chief nourishment directly from the earth itself, and they have become plants again, preserving only the supreme aptitude, sole vestige of their lost life, the faculty of animal nutrition.

Digitized by Google

"I determined to reconstitute this atropic genus; I determined that I would change the plant back into the beast. Ah, how many attempts have failed. At length chance—all our science is but the child of chance—placed in my hands a Drosera of exceptional size. I have nourished her, and I have developed within her the remnants of the animal juices. Little by little she has evolved and grown, until at last, the acme of deduction, the hydra, the dragon, lives again! Behold my Titane—enormous and sublime! Behold her, ferocious in the hunger that I cannot sate!"

And as two tentacles separated themselves from the mass and waved softly in the air, with a hideous, ceaseless motion, he gently laid upon them a fresh piece of flesh.

"But you do not know all," he continued, in a low tone; "if Titane should be very hungry—I did not foresee this—in her present condition of ferocious power, she would tear herself from the place to which her now enfeebled roots bind her; and then, a terrible and all-powerful brute, she would drag her slimy and enormous bulk out into the world where there are men and women, and little children—and what has been my triumph would be my crime.

"I fear that she may escape some day, and lest she become hungry, I watch her every hour, night and day. Were I once but a few minutes late, and I know that she would hurl herself upon the world, menacing my wife and child, whom she would first encounter. Let her eat, let her eat, for she must not wish to move from here."

And again he tossed down great masses of meat. And through the fibres of this horrible plant passed purple tides of the extracted blood.

At this moment, as I stood speechless, overwhelmed with the intensity of my revulsion, the barred door, which I had not securely shut, swung softly open, and Paula appeared.

Her courage had been stronger than her fear. Now that she knew I was there, she had had the boldness to violate the secrecy of this chamber of horrors.

"Frederick!" she cried.

But to her call a blood-curdling shriek responded. In his surprise at her sudden appearance, Frederick had recoiled a step, and forgetful of his danger, touched with his hand the monster's tentacles. With lightning rapidity all the hideous trumpet-mouths had seized upon the hand, grasping the wrist, the forearm! Oh, horror! I saw it drawn down by that resistless suction. I seized him about the body, straining every muscle to draw him from the embrace of the terrible Titane—but the brute was stronger than I.

Then my eyes fell upon an axe in the corner.

"The trunk! the trunk!" I cried to Paula; "cut it, hack it!"

Weak as she was from fright, she seized the axe and swung its shining blade and struck one blow that cut through the very roots of the plant. It seemed to make an effort to rise, to hurl itself at us, and then, powerless, suddenly collapsed with a flaccid sound like wet linen, and at the same time I pulled the unfortunate Frederick loose from the relaxed tentacles.

Paula caught him in her arms. He opened his eyes, and, in a last spasm, fixed them on me as he said: "Assassin! you have killed Titane!"

And he fell back dead.

GLANCE AT THIS.

The following is a list of some of the authors and artists who have contributed to PEARSON'S MAGAZINE for April:

THE MARQUIS OF LORNE, K.T.
SIR EVELYN WOOD.
RUDYARD KIPLING.
SIR WALTER BESANT.
ARCHIBALD FORBES.
IAN MACLAREN.
STANLEY L. WOOD.
G. G. MANTON.
GEORGE ASHTON.
GEORGES MONTBARD.
R. SAUBER, R.B.A.
HAL HURST, R.B.A.

This powerful combination of art and literature has resulted in one of the most magnificent productions in the way of magazines ever published.

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE.
PRICE SIXPENCE (NETT).

MELODY

PRICE SIXPENCE ONLY.

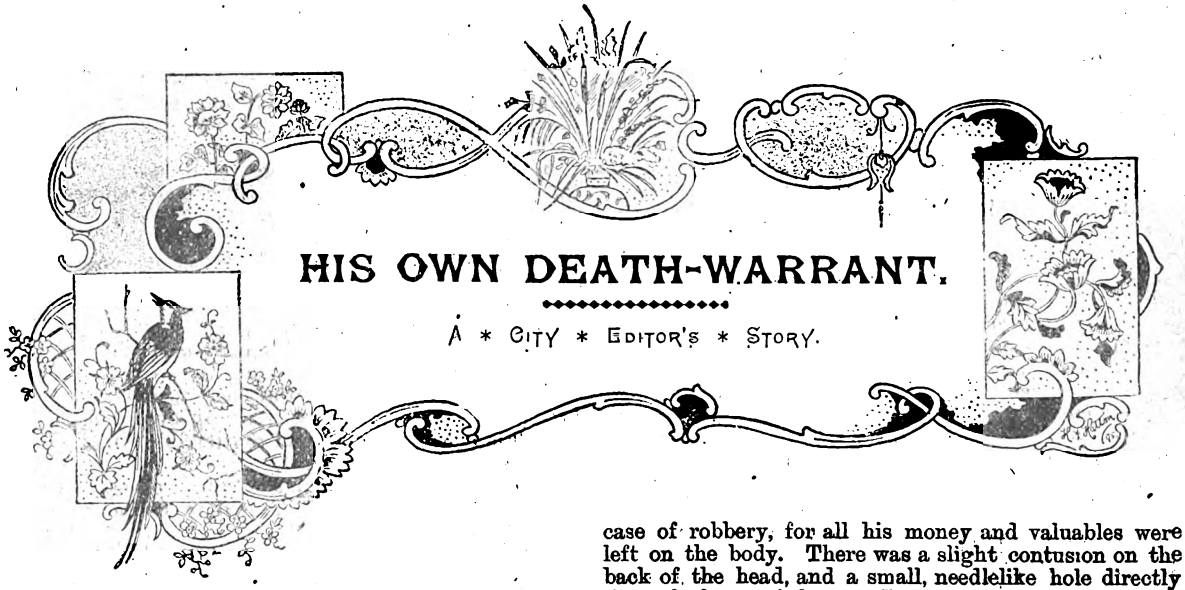
A MUSICAL MAGAZINE.

THE BEST POPULAR, AND MOST POPULAR MUSIC

CLEARLY PRINTED ON - - FULL-SIZE SHEETS

Published Monthly.

Digitized by Google



HIS OWN DEATH-WARRANT.

A * City * Editor's * Story.

"It was in a provincial town, some years ago," remarked the City editor, "that I was on the staff of a morning paper. We had a man on the paper who was simply a crank on homicides; and he was more than a mere reporter, for he had detective talent of the highest order. He didn't care much for the common crimes—burglaries, larcenies and the like—but give him a startling, mysterious murder, and he was splendid. Not only did he have the history of all the famous murders at his fingers' ends, but he delighted in ferreting out the most mysterious crimes that came within our province. In every case, except the one I am telling about, he traced the murderer before the detectives ever dreamt of his identity.

"I have since thought the secret of his success was that he put himself mentally in the place of the murderer, and reasoned it out from motives rather than from the clue of the ordinary detective.

"'There is seldom much method,' he once said to me, when in a communicative mood; 'most men would commit it in about the same way under the same circumstances. It is only when a murderer goes about it systematically, as do the Thugs of India, that a murder becomes truly mysterious.'

"I once asked him why he did not become a regular detective.

"'I was born and bred a newspaper man,' he said, 'and habit is too strong to break.' That was literally true in his case, otherwise I might not have to tell this story.

"One morning, the body of a fine-looking man was found in an alley adjoining some electric-light works, in the very heart of the town. The evening papers had a few words on it, but didn't make much out of it, so I at once assigned it to Jones—as we will call him. Although he did not turn up at the usual hour, I had no doubt that he was already at work on it, as it was as mysterious a case as even he could desire.

"The victim was identified as a commercial traveller, who had just arrived, and, as far as was known, he had no friends or acquaintances in the town. It was not a case of robbery, for all his money and valuables were left on the body. There was a slight contusion on the back of the head, and a small, needlelike hole directly through the man's heart. It was especially strange that such a crime should have been committed in a public thoroughfare, while there was absolutely no clue to the murderer or his motive.

"But these difficulties were only such as would ordinarily put Jones on his mettle, so I did not doubt that he would have a good account of the affair. I was therefore somewhat surprised when he came in about six o'clock in the evening to hear that he knew nothing about it. He looked worn and haggard, but denied that he was ill, so I gave him an account of the murder. I thought I saw a startled look in his eyes, but he maintained his outward composure and went out without a word.

"I did not see him again that evening. About midnight I began to wonder why I had not heard from him, but only speculated on the possibility of something having happened to him, for the idea that he could possibly fail never occurred to me. Finally, after an hour had gone by, I sent a message to the police station. Word came back that there were no new developments in the case, and that Jones had not been there. Sending two men out to hunt him up, I set to work myself to make up a story of the murder from the evening papers. Just then Jones came in. His step was unsteady and his face flushed. He had evidently been drinking heavily—something I never knew him to do before—but he was quite sober; he seemed at a high nervous tension, although outwardly as calm as ever.

"I decided to let this breach of discipline pass, and merely asked him for his story of the murder. He replied that he hadn't written it.

"'Well, get to work at once,' I said, rather sharply.

"Then he surprised me by saying that he had nothing to write beyond the bare facts already known. The police had developed nothing new, and he supposed that I had worked up the story from the evening papers.

"'And has it come to pass that you wait for the police to develop a murder case for you?' I exclaimed angrily. 'As for the reports in the evening papers, you can make up a better story than they had!'

"He sat down, in apparent despair, at his desk.

Digitized by Google

Then I relented and cajoled him a little, begging him not to spoil his great record by falling down on such a case as this. 'There's a starter for you,' said I, throwing him the article I had commenced. 'Now go ahead and fill that out with a column description of the scene.'

"'I haven't even visited it,' he replied. Nevertheless, he picked up the pages and read them as if impelled by some hateful fascination. Then he took up his pen to make a few minor corrections. For some time he sat quite still, thinking deeply. Then as if totally oblivious of my presence, he began to write.

"As sheet after sheet fell from under his fingers, I snatched them up, read them hurriedly, and shot them into the 'copy' tube to the composing room. I read rapidly, as an editor will, taking but small account of the matter so long as it ran smoothly, while I had too much confidence in him to question the accuracy of his statements. I only realised that he was writing a great story—the greatest he had ever done. He seemed inspired with the very innermost thoughts of the murderer, and under his touch every trivial incident came out with distinctness and coherency that made the cause and method of the crime perfectly plain.

"First he described the scene with accuracy of detail that would have been impossible for one who had not studied it closely. The selection of the spot, he explained, by the fact that the bright electric light, streaming through the windows, made it impossible for the passers-by to see into the shadows. Thus, while impenetrable darkness screened the assassin, ample light guided his blow, and, moreover, the rattle and roar of the machinery near by drowned all sound of the struggle.

"'The blow on the head,' he demonstrated, must have been from a loaded stick, while the wound through the heart could only have been made by one of those long, fine-bladed stilettos of Italian make. Furthermore, the fact that this peculiar weapon was driven home with a firm hand, after the victim had been stunned by a blow on the head, indicated premeditated and deliberate murder, while the theory of robbery was disproved by the fact that the man's valuables had been untouched. The only tenable theory, therefore, was that the motive of the murder was revenge.

"Altogether, a more masterly analysis of a case I never read, but here he branched off into what I at first supposed to be purely imaginary speculations as to the wrong which had led the murderer to seek the life of the unknown man. These seemed purposely vague at first, but gathered in strength and certainty, until I concluded that he must have some good foundation for them. Starting with hypotheses, he soon began to state them as facts. He described how the dead man, a once trusted friend, had entered the home of another; how, by subtle wiles and deceit, he had stolen the love of the wife; then followed an elopement and the breaking up of that once happy home.

"He told with the bitterness of truth how the scoundrel had deserted the weak and erring woman and left her to perish alone; how the idea of revenge had filled the mind of the wronged husband; how, himself unseen, he had followed every movement of the intended victim for months, and carefully plotted his destruction; how he had decoyed the doomed man to the town, and to the very spot where the murder was committed; how he had destroyed the only clues—two letters in the pockets of the dead man—and finally made his own escape, the secret safe in his own heart.

"As I read this remarkable story through, the conviction forced itself upon me that this was the absolute truth. If the writer himself had committed the deed, he could not have described it more graphically. Suddenly the thought flashed over me—could he describe such a crime thus without having committed it?

"We were alone in the room. I glanced at Jones apprehensively. He was writing rapidly—fiercely. His eyes were fixed, but he seemed looking through and beyond the paper across which his pen flew, at something fascinating—terrible! When he finished, it was with a start, as if waking from a trance. I glanced at the last page. There, to my indescribable horror, I found final confirmation of my fears.

"'My God, Jones, is this true?' I managed to gasp.

"'Every word of it, as I live,' he replied firmly, but faintly.

"'Then you have written the warrant for your own arrest,' I said.

"His head dropped on his desk, but he said not a word.

"'Jones,' said I finally, shaking him by the shoulder to make him understand my meaning, 'enough to hang you is already in type; in a few hours the papers will be published; an hour later the police will be after you! Go—make the most of your start!'"

* * * * *

"It was as I predicted," said the City editor, after a pause. "Before the paper had been published an hour, a detective called on me to ascertain the source of that story. I simply pointed to Jones' name, and they were after him."

"Did they catch him?" asked a young reporter eagerly.

"They found him in his room, with a stiletto through his heart," said the City editor.

Willard Holcomb.

Digitized by Google

THE PORTRAIT.

From the French of Armand Silvestre.

You will look in vain for a painting by Cascamille in this year's Salon; in fact it is extremely probable that he will never exhibit again, for that misadventure of last year will not be forgotten for many a long day.

Cascamille is an artistic mediocrity; that is the plain truth. The only thing he is any good at is the painting of cattle, sheep, and pigs; when he attempts anything else, he fails miserably. But he is good at drawing those animals. For instance, when he executes a study of a young bull, the little hard excrescences (where the horns will presently appear) are so real that you almost fancy you can see the horns growing; and the damp nose is so natural that when you put your finger on the canvas you quite expect to find it wet.

But that is the extent of his ability. Only once did he paint a portrait; he succeeded in persuading the deputy for the district to give him sittings. The portrait was exhibited in the Salon through the influence of some friends; but everybody who looked at it declared that he had introduced so much of the animal into the features that they expected to hear the portrait bellow like a bull!

Madame Cascamille is also an artist, her husband having taught her all he knew. But, unlike her spouse, Madame has a perfect mania for painting the human form divine. Cascamille has the utmost confidence in his wife's artistic capabilities and believes—and says it, too—that her forte is heads.

Of course, Madame Cascamille was anxious to be "hung," and she and her husband tried to get some celebrity to sit for his (or her) portrait; but, after that little affair of the deputy's counterfeit presentment, celebrities fought shy of the worthy pair. They could have had nobodies by the score, but they wanted a somebody, so that all who saw the portrait would be able to judge of Madame's genius.

A few months prior to the opening of the Salon last year, Cascamille hinted that his wife was painting the portrait of a well-known personage for exhibition, but he would give no further particulars. It was generally regarded as a polite fiction, but sure enough it was announced in due course that both husband and wife were to be represented at the Salon; the former by an animal study—as usual—the latter by a portrait.

Speculation was rife among their friends (and enemies) at Marseilles as to who could have been so foolish—that was how they put it—as to give sittings, but when questioned on the subject Cascamille only chuckled contentedly and replied: "Wait and see!"

A neighbour named Mafitas, one of those men who seem to have friends everywhere and get to know everything before other people, managed to get an advance proof of the particular page of the catalogue, but this was of no use. For all the information it contained was: "No. 69. A Portrait by Madame Cascamille," and "No. 100. An Animal Study by J. Cascamille."

Mafitas, who, although professing friendship, had a grudge against the artistic couple, determined to pay it off; with this object he left for Paris a good fortnight earlier than usual.

Varnishing day arrived. The Cascamilles were in Paris for the season, as were many of their friends from Marseilles. These latter, with Cascamille's artistic and other friends in Paris, flocked to the Salon. Madame Cascamille was indisposed—nervous excitement, no doubt—but Cascamille was there, and on exceptionally good terms with himself and everybody else. The long-kept secret would soon be known; therefore, Cascamille thought he might as well tell his friends as they arrived and thus enjoy the pleasure of watching their faces as they heard whose portrait it was. The happy man thought it was a grand triumph and was as proud as a peacock.

"How do you do?" was his salutation. "Go and look at No. 69; my wife's portrait of me!" And he drew himself up to his full height—five feet two—with the air of an Alexander.

He waited for each group to come out, in order to receive their congratulations on his wife's behalf.

"Splendid!" exclaimed a lady friend who was the first to pass out. "So lifelike."

Cascamille beamed with delight.

"Never saw anything so natural!" was the verdict of a neighbour from Marseilles. "Only a wife could have done the thing so naturally!"

And so it went on. At length it began to dawn upon Cascamille that the compliments were rather overdone. Just then up came the last of his friends.

"Cascamille, my boy," he said, slapping the artist on the back, "it's like looking at you. I could almost hear you grunt!"

Without waiting to reply, the artist rushed into the room to look at No. 69. Horror! Some rascal had changed the tickets bearing the numbers, and, to his dismay, he found that No. 69 was his own study of a full-grown pig, while his portrait was No. 100, "An Animal Study!"

The Cascamilles do not live at Marseilles now.

Geo Day.

Digitized by Google

WHEN THE BIRDS BEGIN TO SING.

By Winifred Graham. Author of "Through the Valley," "Six First-Class Passengers," etc.

CHAPTER XXIII.

No footstep stirred—the hated world all slept,
Save only thee and me. (Oh, Heaven! Oh, God!)

The following morning Eleanor, her face bright with smiles, kisses Carol as she bids him adieu.

"Shoot something nice for dinner, dear," she says, "and have a good day."

She waves her hand as he trots down the hill, his slim form erect, his eyes bright and lips parted.

"I hope you won't be dull, Eleanor," he cries with a gay laugh. "Keep house till I return, and take care of yourself."

As he fades from sight she turns singing into the bungalow.

There are several duties to be attended to. Her pink muslin gown needs rearranging, and the huge bunch of crimson flowers Quamina has gathered her must be put in the drawing-room. They are bright, and will please Carol's eye.

As she places them in tall, picturesque vases, Paulina's words return with aggressive force.

The sort of woman who stays at home tending flowers! They take the pleasure from her simple task. She leaves the fallen blossoms half on a couch, half on the ground, turning from them disgusted.

Perhaps Paulina was right! Carol would find her far more of a companion if she shouldered her gun and rode off with him to the jungle; but she hates killing things.

The chase is brutal! Sport is revolting! Thus she consols herself, and sends Quamina for the muslin gown.

How tenderly Carol had kissed her when he said good-bye. How brilliant he seemed that morning!

She laughs again at the thought of his wit. Her Carol was always clever.

He has marked a passage of Spencer's in a novel Eleanor is reading; she picks it up and comes across it.

It is like a rude shock. Why has he pencilled such disagreeable lines?

Full little knowest thou that hast not tride,
What hell it is in suing long to bide;
To loose good dayes that might be better spent,
To waste long nights in pensive discontent.

Perhaps it struck him as so strangely different to their ideal existence.

The hours do not seem long, for a "light heart goes all the day," but as afternoon wanes she is filled with expectant delight, awaiting Carol's advent. He will be naturally tired, and she draws the couch near the window, piles luxurious pillows upon it, and perches herself at the end of it, placing in readiness a loose lounging coat of yellow Tussore silk. Carol, it is a pretty name, she thinks, taking up his portrait and pressing it to her lips. It is in the same attitude as the one she destroyed in the railway train, upon her first meeting with Elizabeth Kachin's mother.

The faint light slants across the verandah, and falls on the yellow cushions placed for Quinton.

It creeps into the room, and sheds a halo round the striking likeness she still holds in her hand.

Eleanor gazes at the Oriental splendour, the beauties of which no utterance is capable of expressing, and indulges in visions that are pleasant and soothing, marvelling at a scene she has admired a thousand times before, and recalling memories of sweet caresses and whispered words.

Filmy shadows fall from the trees without, gradually outlining themselves upon the walls of the room, and the steps from the verandah. The hot air rises from the valley.

Eleanor breathes the tropical atmosphere and sighs. She loosens her gown at the throat, and waves an enormous palm-leaf fan leisurely backwards and forwards. The air stirs the soft hair on her forehead, cooling her brow.

She raises her eyes to the clock and smiles.

"He will soon return," she thinks. "It is growing late, and he promised to be home before nightfall."

She goes out on to the verandah, gazing down the road which leads to Mandalay.

Two or three black children are resting by a well at the foot of the hill, one squatting on the ground hugging his knees, the others standing in easy graceful attitudes, with round pitchers on their heads.

The well is beneath a huge palm. Eleanor has sometimes "wished" by it with Carol, pretending there is some mystic spell in the water.

He will pass that charmed spot as he returns, and she will stand on the steps to greet him.

Surely in all the world Carol could not have chosen a more romantic retreat in which to live and love!

The shadows deepen, they take forms, and glide from place to place, as daylight dies.

She peers into the gloom, the children go home to bed. Carol is not in sight!

The red flowers of the morning lie withered up and brown on the floor where she has left them. Carol must not be greeted by the sight of her negligence. She stoops down, and gathers them together in both hands, sweeping the dust and fallen petals into her white palm. Crossing slowly to the door, Eleanor calls Quamina.

"Take these away," she says.

Quamina looks anxiously into her face, as she relieves her young mistress of the dead blossoms.

"The Sahib is long in returning," she volunteers, with a nervous leer.

"Yes. We shall soon need a light."

"The devil will not catch him this evening; the devil is well employed," Quamina assures her. "Have no fear, lady."

"What do you mean?" asks Eleanor, a shade of anger crossing her face.

Quamina looks up proudly, delightedly.

"I have placed food and drink in the rock away from the roadside," she replies, chuckling. "He will be busy eating, and never see the Sahib riding up the path. Quamina loves the Sahib and his white lady; she will provide for the devil."

Eleanor shrugs her shoulders in sheer despair. She cannot bring this woman to reason. With a pitying smile she returns to the window, and buries her fingers in the soft silk of those yellow pillows with an almost frantic clutch. They are just like the sofa cushions at Lyndhurst. Philip, perhaps, is lounging on them now, or Erminie—he has given them to Mrs. Lane for her new drawing-room.

She kneels for a while on the lounge, and though there is no sound her lips move.

Thus she stays, directly opposite the open window, listening and looking, wondering and praying.

Can some evil have befallen him? She remembers his displeasure when she rode out to meet him that night—the man with the black mask.

There is a loud report in the room: she springs to her feet with a cry. It is only a string of her guitar which has broken, and she sinks back into the old attitude despairingly.

Digitized by Google

Quamina is pounding rice in the kitchen. Eleanor calls to her to stop. She fancies the sound may prevent her hearing the first fall of a horse's hoofs in the distance, for the moon has not risen yet, and she cannot see far.

So she remains perfectly still, waiting for the pale light to rise in the heavens, while crowds of unutterable fancies rush through her brain—a mad disorder of thought.

She stares outwards, as one in the fetters of an awful dream.

"Why does he not come to her?"

Some well-known words recur to her brain. "The eye, like a shattered mirror, multiplies the images of its sorrow, and sees, in innumerable far-off places, the woe which is close at hand."

There is a hot and heavy vapour in the air—it seems to poison Eleanor as she inhales it in her lungs. A settled apathy pervades her spirit. For some moments she feels nothing, has not a thought—only a strange ringing in her head. The landscape before her looks desolate and terrible, an unredeemed dreariness darkens her soul like a London fog—thick, stifling.

London! The word recalls Philip, the man whose home she shattered, whose life she ruined—for Carol's sake. It was easy to deal the blow, to forget the world, to forfeit her good name when love's overpowering fascination was the bait. She can annihilate that black past in the light of Carol's smile, but when he is absent, and night is on the earth and in her heart, then the spectre rises, points his deadly finger at her quivering soul, and she realises the hideous dropping off of the veil. Her mind is a chaos of ruins. She calls to Carol in vain; only the shrill cry of some night bird through the air, and the beating of her pulses, answer that he will not come!

The gaunt form of a four-footed beast steals across the shadows she has watched so long, that she almost doubts her senses. Can it be a tiger perchance come forth from the jungle to prowl around her home?

She looks again, a thrill of horror darting through her trembling body.

The beast creeps with a soft and stealthy tread up the verandah steps—it is long and yellow.

Eleanor stares in mesmeric terror at its fiery eyes.

Then she sees it is a dog—a huge sandy mastiff, with hanging jaws, wet with foam, a great square head, and broad noiseless feet. It shambles nearer, appearing so suddenly out of the gloom that it seems to materialise before her vision. It watches her as if about to spring; she cannot remember it is not a tiger after all.

Eleanor sickens with fear, a dizzy faintness numbs her nerves, the room swims round. Her breath comes in quick gasps from a throat parched and dry as with desert sand.

She stares dumbly into its glistening eyes that look like coals of fire in the dark.

Those moments seem to be long hours; they are spells of invisible woe; this dog is perhaps a phantom, come to warn her of some ghastly peril into which Carol has fallen. Its fangs look ripe for human gore; it pants, and its breath is as the rush of a storm.

"Help!" says a low voice, calling the dog by name.

The animal turns at the sound of that word. "Help! come back." He crouches away disappointed; he would have liked to seize Eleanor by the throat if he dared.

At the sound of the man's call Eleanor does not move, nor even start, only the blood seems to dry up in her veins, her fingers twitch convulsively, her eyes roll back in her head. She can hear the heavy footfalls mounting the steps to the verandah one by one; she dares not look, for she knows, she understands!

Then a sudden idea seizes her. They are not yet face to face. If her paralysed limbs will let her she may yet escape through the room, and out behind. She can hide in the thick undergrowth, and watch her opportunity to creep down the road and warn Carol of the danger threatening their lives. He may even now be passing the well and riding up the hill to death!

She rushes blindly across the room, but that instance the heavy steps reach the verandah. Her aim is frustrated. She staggers against the wall, extending her arms aloft with a wild gesture.

The intruder stands in the open window, his dark figure framed in the line between the verandah and the interior, his face illuminated by the moon which has burst like a ghostly lamp-man over the east. She feels like one dazed in the trammels of opium. She tries to cry out, to shriek for help, but only one word breaks hoarsely from her lips with a hollow groan.

"Philip!"

The man enters the room silently, his garments are thick with dust, his coat torn as with jungle briars sharply thorned. He looks as if he had lived in the outer air, unkempt, dishevelled! Thick black hair has grown over the lower part of his face; but his eyes gleam as they meet hers while he advances, his gaze riveted on Eleanor. A fierce growl makes him turn, and his eyes fall on the lounging coat of Tussore silk lying upon yellow cushions.

"Help" has scented it, and springing with his huge paws towards the sofa, tears and rends it furiously in his heavy jaws with the savage air of a lion destroying prey.

The sight is strangely horrible to Eleanor. Her eyes start from their sockets, staring, bloodshot, fixed. Her lips are livid, her limbs stiff, she is still drawn up against the wall at bay; but for its support she would fall upon the ground.

Philip smiles. The action of the dog pleases him.

He does not notice the photograph of Carol which dropped from Eleanor's hands as she started across the room, but the heel of his dusty boot falls on the face, crushing it under the weight of his tread, scarring the features and cracking the card. He advances and stands passively before Eleanor, so close that his hot breath fans her cheek, looking at her and waiting.

The steady ticking of the clock resounds in the room; in that moment of extreme tension it deafens her.

The silence is horrible, unendurable; she struggles to break it, and her voice sounds to her own amazement perfectly natural.

"I know why you have come, Philip," she says calmly, and it seems that she has lived through this moment in some past existence, so painfully familiar are the ghastly occurrences of to-night. Perhaps it was in some shadowy dream which faded from her memory on awaking. "I know why you are here," she repeats, throwing back her head against the bamboo panelling, and stretching out her arms in the attitude of a crucified victim. "I read it in your face. But I am too young to die, too sin-stained."

"You think I have come to kill you, Eleanor?"

His words are low and hollow; they seem strangely similar to the warning growl of his huge dog. She thinks he has grown to resemble the ferocious-looking beast, or "Help," in the moonlight, appears like his master—from perpetual companionship.

But even as she looks, something of the man creeps into Philip's eyes, humanising them. The brute nature fades.

She answers his question under her breath:

"Yes, you have hunted me down to take my life."

An expression of intense pain contracts his features; she has cut him to the quick.

With a woman's sharp instinct, intensified by dread, Eleanor sees that her doom is not yet; but the thought of another burns like fire in her brain. Her own miserable thread of life, what does it matter? She holds it as nought compared with the one she loves. She would die a thousand deaths if such a sacrifice would buy him safety.

"How little you understand me!" he says at last. "It was always so."

"Why have you come?" she asks, faintly tracing the shadows that fall around him in the pallid moonlight.

He turns, as if in answer, to the scattered rags of a silken coat, some of which still hang in the mastiff's jaws; then his gaze travels through the verandah, down the zig-zag path, towards the jungle.

Digitized by Google

Eleanor interprets the look. With a swift movement she wrenches herself from the wall against which she has seemed to be held as if by a strong magnet, crosses the room with quick and noiseless tread, fastens the folding window doors together with a click, facing Philip in defiant silence.

"You have come for him," she hisses, the hatred in her eyes gleaming forth. "You would kill—Carol."

At the mention of his name from her lips Philip starts.

"Is it not so?" she cries wildly, raising her voice, which trembles with emotion, vibrates with dread.

For the moment Philip does not reply, only his face lights up as with the glory of revenge.

Eleanor's fingers tighten on the window fastening. She clings to it for support.

A strangled cry breaks from her lips, and the half incoherent words: "My God! My God!"

CHAPTER XXIV.

Oh, I defy thee, Hell, to show
On beds of fire that burn below,
. . . . . a deeper woe.—E. A. Poe.

Philip pushes a chair forward as if to signify there is no need to guard the window.

The action excites Eleanor to passion.

"It is cowardly to kill," she cries through her clenched teeth.

"And if I did, what should I get in return for all he has stolen from me? Could he give me back your heart? Could he blot out the past with his blood? Should I regain the pure thing I lost, the wife I treasured, the woman I adored? Think how he shattered my life and wrecked my happiness, when he enticed you with the golden apple, that rots and decay, turning to wormwood between the lips! You were allured by the seductive cajolery, the damnable influence of a scoundrel."

Eleanor's breast heaves, she staggers forward in a frenzy.

"Stop! What you say is false. I was not 'enticed.' I went because I loved him body and soul; because existence without him was empty—impossible. If I had stayed with you, loving him, I should not have been true to myself. I should have played the traitor in my own home; the curse would have been on you and on your children. If such a thing were possible, here in this new land, my passion developed, increased ten-fold. The night and day, the light, the darkness, they hold nothing for me but this rapturous love, all that is precious, tender, sweet. I have fed on in this paradise till you came, like an image of death, to bring back all that is odious, hateful."

"Yes," he replies slowly, "I can believe you were happy, clinging to the prize you held so dear. Your words have not surprised me. I have listened to them so often in fancy, picturing this scene, when you and I alone should stand together and bare our souls. I expected to hear your short-lived rapture hurled at me as a shield, a fortification! I am ready to judge it, to weigh it if you will in the scales of right and wrong. Will you not continue?"

His words wither Eleanor's defence; she shrinks back into herself.

"Surely you have something more to say," with an ironical laugh, that re-echoes discordantly round the room.

She shakes her head mournfully, and drops her hands to her sides.

"Perhaps," he continues, "I was to blame. I was not in harmony with you; I failed to please."

"Oh! Philip!"

The words are a protest, rung from the bottom of her soul.

"Or I did not place sufficient confidence in you; we had 'family jars,' 'vexed questions,' 'disagreements.'"

"Philip, for pity's sake——"

He runs his fingers through the grey hair, lying moist upon his sun-bronzed brow. The crow's feet of sorrow furrow the corners of his eyes, which are stern, but not angry. They have looked for the last time on the golden season of life, now they stare at Eleanor as if reading in her face the key of the everlasting twilight that has fallen on his days.

Instinctively she cowers back, hiding her burning face in her hands, red with a flush of deepest shame.

"Don't shrink from me," he says. "It is almost incomprehensible, Eleanor, but——"

She looks up quickly.

"Ever since you left me I have had no thought but you. In life's morning you were my love, my all. I could not tear you from my heart had I wished to. But I never tried."

"Is that possible?" she gasps incredulously. "You must indeed have loved me!"

"I may be mad, but it is so. I love you now in your degradation, and misery, in spite of all!"

The confession staggers her.

"And you show it by hunting me down to destroy my happiness. You must have sought long to find me here, and now that you are successful, now that I am run to earth, what will you do?"

"What do you think?"

His face becomes fiendish. She watches his sinister smile.

"I have told you what I believe you capable of—you will murder him. I know it. You have no pity! The love you boast of is swallowed up in hate."

An evil flame lights his mocking eyes.

"Yes, I might spring at his throat as he comes from the jungle, I might set 'Help' upon him in the dark. He is a weak man easily unnerved. The very sight of this knife——"

"Ah!"

Philip has drawn a sharp blade of steel from his coat and flashed it in the moonlight, with a bitter groan.

He replaces it at the sight of her terror, with something of regret in his hard smile.

"What false professions!" sneers Eleanor. "You dare to speak of loving me, when you would rob me of the man in whom all my happiness lies!"

Philip winces as if suddenly recalled to facts.

"Yes, your whole future was controlled by him."

His words fill her with a vague misgiving, but she draws herself up proudly and replies:

"It is safe in Carol's keeping."

"You are sure of that?"

She bows a cold assent.

"Then listen, Eleanor." He speaks authoritatively. "Come here. Sit down."

He points to a chair, but she sinks on the edge of the sofa, too agitated to notice her proximity to the huge mastiff.

"There is need of explanation," Philip continues, never taking his eyes off her white, scared face. "It is time you understood me. You say I have 'run you to earth,' as if through this long period of separation I had been hunting you like a bloodhound, and suddenly found myself on your track. You imagine I have just discovered you."

Eleanor's lips part as if to speak, but the words are choked back in her throat. "Help" stirs his head, for the first time she sees he is at her feet.

"You recall," says Philip, "that small dog—a suspicious Irish terrier—you were given some time back?"

"What of him? How did you know?" turning her eyes wonderingly from "Help" to Philip.

"It was killed in some bushes by a wild beast, when you were riding one day with your lover."

"Yes."

He pauses.

The mastiff rises slowly, and stretches himself, as if wearied by his day's work.

Eleanor draws her skirts away from contact with his coarse hair.

She sees it all at last.

"Killed," she repeats, "and by your dog."

Her breath comes quicker, she turns and peers through the window, as if expecting something.

Digitized by Google

"There is still more," declares Philip. "That cat's-eye ring I gave you, Eleanor—where is it?"

His voice pulses with suppressed force.

"Carol was attacked in the jungle one night——"

"By a masked fiend, who tore him from his horse, and shook him by the throat, like a cat with a mouse, then flung him aside as a scorpion too poisonous to touch—a foul thing, only fit to lie beneath a rock, hidden from the sight of man. When he rose up, his assailant had gone, like a silent ghost on that lonely road."

Philip holds his lean fingers before her eyes, and flashing on one of them gleams the greenish light of the cat's-eye gem.

Again Eleanor looks fearfully out into the night, she fancies she hears Carol on the steps below.

"While you have been basking in your 'paradise,' dreaming your short-lived vision of love, I have watched and waited, prowling to and fro with 'Help,' a faithful servant, at my heels. Your dog scented me, he proclaimed my presence, so I let 'Help' silence him once and for all. Many a night when you sat together, there in that verandah, your hand linked in his ringless fingers, your eyes feasting on his false face, I crouched below, watching. Did you never feel my nearness? Ah, you shudder! It was strange—very strange. It maddened me that he should wear your ring—my ring—so I wrenched it from him."

She listens like one in the thralls of a hideous nightmare. If Carol comes now—he is lost!

"Why, when I had him by the throat," asks Philip, "did I not strangle the life from his body? Why did I stay my hand? How was it I watched your happiness with hungry eyes, and did not strike? I could have shot you dead in each other's arms scores of times. I inexorably determined on his death, but held the sword suspended, like Damocles, by a single hair."

She listens acutely to his every syllable.

"Why?" she stammers feebly, her mind groping in the dark.

"So long as he was faithful to you—so long as he valued what you flung at his feet, I would not wake you from your Elysium. By this I proved the love you discredit. My action should not plunge you into an abyss of woe; but now that he is false—false as Hell——"

"Liar!" breaks in Eleanor hotly; "your miserable accusation is unfounded."

"Wait. When he left you for long days of 'sport,' what do you think was the nature of that chase?"

Eleanor is silent, numbed by dread and despair.

"His game—was a woman, who knew from his lips your whole history. I have seen them together for hours at a time—heard them speak—jest at your expense. But, in spite of this, she was jealous of you, and, but for a bad shot, would have taken your life that day in the jungle, when I killed her horse under her. You see I was guarding you, Eleanor. He has been scheming to go away with her; to desert you as a toy that is broken—a flower which has lost its scent."

She leaps to her feet, and flings open the window.

"You are hoodwinking me with a trumped-up story; it is not true!"

"Hear me out. He is serving you as you treated me. It is retribution. You forfeited his respect and consideration. He gave you only the brief glamour of his passion, which has died, to re-live in the smiles of 'Paulina.'"

"Philip, these lies are dastardly—cruel! You do not know what you are saying."

"You cling hard to your faith!" he retorts savagely, her staunchness to Carol awaking a fever of indignation within him. "Did I ever in the old days deserve that hard term 'liar'?"

She shakes her head. "Oh, no!"

"You are waiting for him to-night, Eleanor. He had promised, I believe, to return?"

She gazes down the slanting road.

"Yes. He is late." Then, with a sudden cry: "And when he comes—oh! Philip, I had not realised it—your revenge! What can I do to save him? Anything—I care not what! I will go and leave him—I will kill myself here before your eyes, as a ransom! You are mistaken, he is not false to me; any moment he may arrive. Only spare his life, for the love of Heaven!"

She falls on her knees at Philip's feet, beating the air with her hands.

He raises her gently, but firmly.

"You need not look," he says, as her terrified eyes stare out at the moonlit scene, white and ghostly. "Yesterday he wrote to the woman Paulina, making all arrangements for their flight this night. She dropped the letter in the jungle, from a satchel full of shot. It is here."

He holds out the torn envelope, with its broken seal and deadly intelligence.

Eleanor takes it mechanically—as yet she cannot believe—while the sight of the familiar handwriting sends the hot blood coursing freely once more through her brain.

She draws the closely-worded sheet from its resting-place and crosses to the light to scan the text.

Philip watches her face as it bends over the letter. He has struck a match and holds it up to illuminate that fatal message.

Every vestige of life seems to fly from her features. The page swims before her failing sight, the words become crossed and blurred. She has read enough!

Then she remembers Paulina's fingers have touched this paper, perhaps her lips, and it flutters from Eleanor's hands at the thought, falling silently between her and Philip.

"Now," he cries, "can you grasp my mission? Do you guess why I am here? There was no longer any cause for him to live." Philip throws back his coat, and she sees the shirt beneath it is splashed with blood.

He takes her icy hand and draws her towards the verandah.

"I killed him at sunset," he whispers, pointing outwards, "over there, on that far hill. When night came I bore him back to you. Now in the moonlight, down near the well, or to-morrow at dawn in the rosy glow, you will find your lover. His set face is looking up from the long grass, his last word was 'Paulina!'"

Eleanor staggers to the rails, and points towards the well.

She seems struggling to speak, but there is only a low gurgle in her throat.

Philip stands on the steps. "'Help,'" he says abruptly, calling the dog. "Come."

Together the man and beast pass like visions into the night.

* * * * *

Eleanor crouches away to the far corner of the verandah, her limbs relax, and she huddles herself in a heap on the hard ground, without a cry, without a moan.

* * * * *

Another day breaks gloriously over the East, in the first rays of sunlight Eleanor stirs. With difficulty she rises from her cramped position, a shudder runs over her frame as she walks unsteadily down the steps, in the direction of the well.

The jungle fowl on tree and ground give forth their sharp shrill cries.

The bulbul whistles sweet notes like those of a thrush.

The golden oriole with its bright yellow plumage whirrs as a flash of sunlight through the trees, and the birds at home are singing.

The End.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

NOBLE'S MODEL COSTUMES.

ABSOLUTELY THE BEST VALUE IN THE WORLD.

IT PAYS TO PURCHASE YOUR COSTUMES BY POST ALWAYS PROVIDING YOU BUY THEM DIRECT FROM THE LARGEST FIRM OF COSTUME MANUFACTURERS.

The John Noble Model Costumes are Scientifically Cut, well made Throughout, and Beautifully Finished in John Noble's own Factories, where over 1,000 well-paid Workers are employed under the strictest Conditions of Sanitation and Cleanliness.

MODEL 402.

A SUCCESSFUL MODE

In the JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE, consisting of gracefully-cut full width Skirt, and very Stylish Bouse trimmed at the Collar, Front, and Sleeves, with detachable fittings of a contrasting shade of Finer Serge. The Saddle and Sleeves are Lined. Price only 14/9 complete. Safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra. 14/9

MODEL 453.

EMBROIDERED COSTUME

In the JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE, consisting of wide Godet Skirt and smart Bodice, the front of which is in very fine Foulé Serge, elaborately embroidered with beautiful bold Silk Cord. Colours: Black with White or Helio, front embroidered Black Silk; Brown with Fawn, front embroidered Brown Silk; and Navy or Myrtle with Cardinal, front embroidered Black Silk. Price only 21/-. Safely packed and sent carriage paid. 21/-

MODEL 404.

STYLISH EMBROIDERED COSTUME

In the JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE, comprising very Smart Bodice, full wide Godet Skirt with Eiffel Tower Belt attached which extends from waist to throat, and is prettily embroidered with Silk in harmonising shade; collar and cuffs trimmed en suite. Price only 16/6 complete. Safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra. 16/6

MODEL 427.

YOUNG LADY'S COSTUME

In the JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE, with lined Bodice, trimmed Military Braid, centre box-plait and buttons, the skirt being ornamented at each side with fancy pocket, and finished Military Braid and Buttons en suite.

FROM 8/6

Lengths: 35 38 42 46 50 in.
Price: 8/6 9/6 10/9 12/- 13/6 each.

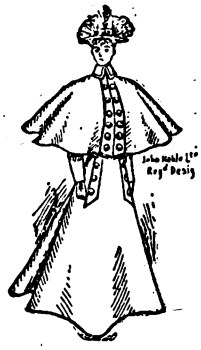
Lengths are from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front. Safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

MODEL 410.

THE JOHN NOBLE

COMPLETE CAPE COSTUME.



In the JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE, comprising Fashionable Godet Cape, lined through, and trimmed Revers and Large Buttons; also well-cut stylish Bodice, trimmed en suite, and full Godet Skirt trimmed from waist to match Cape. Price only 25/- complete. Safely packed and sent carriage paid. 25/-

MODEL 374.

THE JOHN NOBLE

HALF-GUINEA COSTUME.

An exceedingly smart mode in the JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE, consisting of wide Godet Skirt, with belt, also very neat Bodice, with full front and broad box-pleat down centre, trimmed bold Silk Cord, and three large Buttons; Collar and Cuffs finished Silk Cord; Saddle and Sleeves lined. Price only 10/6 complete. Safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra. Skirt only as sketch, can be supplied for 5/6, carriage 6d. extra. 10/6

MODEL 415.

THE JOHN NOBLE POPULAR SUIT

For Ladies, made in the JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE. The Suit consists of newest shape Open Coat with full Sleeves, fashionable Revers and Pockets, all finished tailor-stitching; also gracefully-cut Godet Skirt, tailor stitched, to match, and bound at extreme edge with bias Velveteen. Price complete only 15/-. Safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra. 15/-

MODEL 435.

GIRL'S OVERALL.

In the JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE, with Saddle top and full Skirt, trimmed round Skirt, Collar, and Cuffs with finer Serge of contrasting shade. An admirable style for rough school wear.

FROM 2/8

Lengths: 19 21 24 27 30 33 36 in.
Price: 2/8 3/3 3/9 4/3 5/- 6/- 7/- ea.
Postage 4½d. extra.

Lengths are from top of neckband to bottom of Skirt in front.

N.B.—The ordinary stock sizes of the Ladies' Costumes fit figures measuring 34, 36, or 38 in. round the bust under arms, the skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure for 1s. 6d. extra. COLOURS: Any of the above Costumes can be supplied in Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Bronze-Green, Electric-Blue, Ruby, Dark Cinnamon, Fawn, or Grey. Patterns, also Fashion Sheets, of numerous other designs in Ladies' and Children's Costumes, etc., sent Post Free to any reader of Short Stories on application to

JOHN NOBLE LTD., BROOK STREET MILLS, MANCHESTER.

COSTUME SHOWROOMS: PICCADILLY, MANCHESTER.

Digitized by Google

1896 PROCLAMATION.

THE "SUPER-EMINENT" PIONEER REDUCTION SALE

By Messrs. F. HODGSON & SON, the well-known Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds.

To the Influential Readers of "SHORT STORIES" and may not appear again.

Important announcement of Gigantic Reduction in the price of our Manufactures WILL TAKE EFFECT ON SIGHT of this advertisement, and is of great importance to parties furnishing.

REMARKS.—A lady customer writes complaining that we send out too large a carpet for the money. Be this so or not, we send out no Carpet measuring less than 6ft. by 9ft.—even for 2s. 11d.

TEST THEM. THEY WILL SURPRISE YOU. EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ALARM" CARPETS (Reg.)

Sale Price 2/11 Each.

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS. This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract made with Readers of Short Stories only. WE WILL FORWARD DIRECT FROM THE LOOMS TO ANY ADDRESS ON RECEIPT OF AMOUNT, A GENUINE, WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, THE LARGEST EVER SOLD AT THE PRICE.

Suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our Goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double the above prices. A Rug sent with Carpet, 10d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER—2 Carpets and 2 Rugs, 7s. 3d.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly examine and compare these Carpets.

Hon. and Rev. T. Markham
Rev. Canon Henderson
Rev. Canon Barrett
Dean Carrington
Ven. Archdeacon of Kilmore.
Ven. Archdeacon Wright
Archdeacon of Aghadoe
Archdeacon Long
Archdeacon of Dromore, D D.
Archdeacon of Ossory
Archdeacon of Wolseley
Rev. Canon Tate
Rev. Canon Whitford
Rev. Canon Upperton
Rev. Canon W. W. Kirby
Rev. Canon Kinsman
Canon Prothero
Rev. Dr. Nelson
Rev. Dr. Banks
Lady Clayton

THE 'QUEEN'S ROYAL' HEARTHRUGS, Registered.

IN THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (CHANCERY DIVISION), HODGSON v. WEBB BROTHERS.—On the 18th day of July, 1890, his lordship, Mr. Justice Chitty, granted an interim injunction, restraining Messrs. Webb Brothers, of Hackney Wick, from infringing Mr. Fredk. Hodgson's Trade Mark "Eclipse," No. 93,774 (Leeds).

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 'ECLIPSE' CARPETS (Regd.)

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Sale Price 3/6 Each.

This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. We will forward direct from the looms to any address on receipt of amount, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, in our New (Reg.) Waterlily and Persian designs, suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, not Printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. An "Eclipse" Rug sent with Carpet 1/- extra.

Sale Price 3/6 Each.

Kilkea Castle, Magency, co. Kildare, 7th August.

LADY EVA FITZGERALD writes: "The 'Eclipse' Carpets supplied by Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son—her ladyship is much pleased with them."

SPECIAL OFFER.—Two Carpets and Two Rugs 8/-, or Four Carpets and Four Rugs 15/6.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly Examine and Compare these Carpets.

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED. Do not miss this opportunity. It may not occur again.

OUR NEW VENTURE! Yes. Two Different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright.)

Prodigious Sale of the "PRUDENTIAL"

REVERSIBLE CARPETS (Reg.)

Reversible, with a different pattern on both sides, woven throughout with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in 12 sizes only. These carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine on one side the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian, and on the reverse the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

REDUCED SALE PRICE.

		Each.			Each.
6ft. by	9ft.	... 4/9	9ft. by	15ft.	... 12/6
7½ft. by	9ft.	... 5/11	12ft. by	12ft.	... 12/9
9ft. by	9ft.	... 7/6	12ft. by	13½ft.	... 14/6
9ft. by	10½ft.	... 8/6	12ft. by	15ft.	... 15/9
9ft. by	12ft.	... 9/6	12ft. by	18ft.	... 19/6
10½ft. by	12ft.	... 11/6	12ft. by	21ft.	... 22/6

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

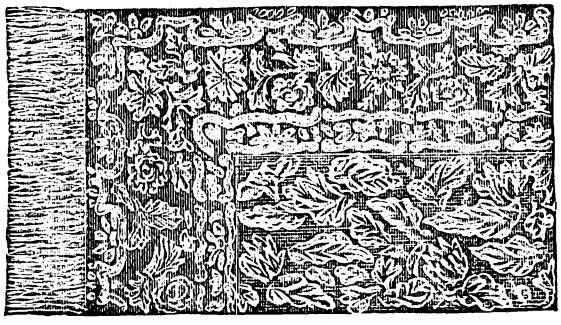
Blairquhan, Maybole, N.B., August 3rd.

Lady Hunter Blair writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son send her another 'Prudential' Carpet, same as before, crimson and gold, dimensions 9ft. by 10½ft. Cheque inclosed."

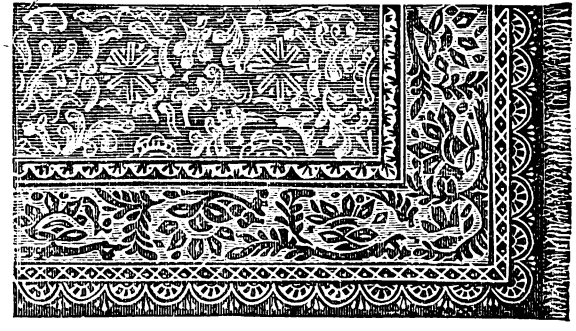
Baroness de Linden
Baroness de Penmoyrie
Baroness de Rottenburg
Dow. Lady Abercrombie
Dow. Lady Aylesford
Right Hon. Lady Martin-Keane
Countess Kearney
Countess Cowley
Countess Lintzow
Countess of Westmeath
Countess of Mayo
Viscountess Torrington
Viscountess Molesworth
Viscountess of Hereford
Rev. Canon Hirst
Rev. Canon Thornton
Rev. Canon Mather
Rev. Canon Cooper
Rev. Canon Hamilton
Rev. Canon Tottenham

THE 'QUEEN'S ROYAL' CARPETS, Registered.

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Regd.), to match above Carpets, sent for 1/6 extra, size 2yds. long and 1yd. wide. Special Offer, Three Hearthrugs for 4/3, or Six for 8s., or Twelve for 15/6.



P.S.—When this "Eclipse" Design (registered) is wanted in Carpets or Hearthrugs, as above, kindly quote No. 268,491.



P.S.—When this "Prudential" Design is wanted in Hearthrugs or Carpets, as above, kindly quote Registered No. 268,495.

We Rely upon Spontaneous Repeat Orders from our Clients for the Maintenance of our Trade. Established nearly a Quarter of a Century. All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON, 18/4/96.
On receipt of this Coupon and P.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send any goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom.
(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.
Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY RD., LEEDS.

Telegraphic Address: "ECLIPSE, LEEDS," Telephone No. 948. N.B.—Foreign Orders executed and packed free, and shipped at lowest rates.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 382. FOR WEEK ENDING APRIL 25TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

10/6 HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES. 10/6

TO MEASURE. BY PARCEL POST.

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

Design No. 100.

10/6 Thousands of Testimonials testify to the wonderful value of our Half-Guinea Costumes. Perfect fit guaranteed. MADE IN OUR WORLD-FAMED SPECIALITE SERGE. 10/6

Our most successful Costume for indoor wear is design No. 100. This Costume appears to stand alone in point of excellence to such a great degree compared with other Costumes offered to the public at anything approaching the same price, not only as regards the material, the Celebrated Specialite Serge, but as regards the make, style and general appearance of the Costume, that we cannot but feel the greatest amount of pleasure as well as unbounded assurance, in recommending these useful and ladylike Costumes to your notice.

We can equally recommend our NEW OPEN-FRONTED COSTUME, Design No. 110, also made in the Matchless Specialite Serge, which is comprised of a stylish Jacket with fashionable and full size skirt. Patterns Post Free. Ladies are requested to kindly forward their name and address for patterns, which will be sent free, and not on approval, together with our Sketch Book containing Illustrations and Sketches of our various designs.

Allen Foster & Co.'s Half-Guinea Costumes are UTTERLY UNRIVALLED ALL THE WORLD OVER. Can be had in following shades: Black, Navy, Tabac, Brown, Cinnamon, Fawn, Grey, Electric Blue, Myrtle, Bronze-Green, Ruby, Cardinal, etc.

Design No. 110. Seaside Costume.

15/6 We also offer another Costume at Fifteen Shillings and Sixpence, made from our New and Fashionable Frieze Cloth, and can be had in any of the designs as advertised in the Specialite Serge. Patterns and Order Forms, post free. Each Costume securely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra. We can recommend our Velveteen Cape, handsomely trimmed, Lace, Gimp, and Ribbon, for 7/6; also our Rich Silk Plush Cape, 15/6. Carriage 9d. extra. 15/6

CAUTION. We have no Branch Establishments or any connection whatsoever with any Provincial Firms. We are bona fide manufacturers, and all our Goods are guaranteed LONDON MADE. BANKERS: London and County, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., 17, ROSCOE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Direct from the Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in the world, have secured beyond a doubt the ADMIRATION OF THE WORLD. Being Absolutely Without an Equal Anywhere for Stylish Appearance, Durability, and Actual Money Value. 10/6

TWO GOLD MEDALS AWARDED.

These Costumes have received the highest praise from the leading journals of the day, and are justly regarded by all purchasers as Even Better than Advertised.

Each Costume scientifically cut, tailor-made, and beautifully finished in an exceedingly smart mode, as illustration. The design consists of full wide Godet skirt with belt, also very neat bodice with full front and broad box-pleat down centre, trimmed bold silk cord and three large buttons. Collar and cuffs outlined silk cord; saddle and sleeves lined.

Price complete only 10/6, safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

Sizes in stock fit figures measuring 34, 36, or 38 in. round bust under arms, skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front; larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

THE JOHN NOBLE

COSTUMES FOR YOUNG MISSES are made in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, and trimmed military braid as illustration. A large box-pleat down the centre of the lined bodice, and a fancy pocket at each side of the skirt, complete a charming design at these prices: FROM 8/6

Lengths	35	38	42	46	50 inches.
Prices	8/6	9/6	10/9	12/-	13/6 each.

Each costume safely packed and sent carriage paid for 6d. extra.

KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS are also supplied in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, with saddle top, long full sleeves, and pocket, at following prices: FROM 1/6

Lengths	21	24	27	30	33	36	39	42	45 in.
Prices	1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-	5/6 ea.

Postage 1½d. extra. Lengths stated above are from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front.

COLOURS: Any of the above garments can be supplied in Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Bronze Green, Electric Blue, Ruby, Dark Cinnamon, Fawn, or Grey.

The JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE in which the above garments are made is a fabric of world-wide fame and durability, measuring 52in. wide. The full Dress Length of Six Yards can be supplied for 7/6, or any length at 1/3 the yard. Colours as above. 7/6

PATTERNS, also FASHION SHEETS of numerous other designs in Ladies' and Children's Costumes, etc., sent Post Free to any reader of "Short Stories" on application to

JOHN NOBLE Ltd., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

MRS. LAWRENCE

A Farmer's Wife, writes from Mid-Rasen, Lincolnshire: "For a long time I suffered severely from

INDIGESTION

And Wind in the Stomach, and had to call in the doctor. Having prescribed for me some time he said, 'I can do nothing more for you.' My husband urged me to try your WIND PILLS; he brought me a box and I took them. In a few days I was quite well and able to get up, and now enjoy excellent health. Publish my name and address."

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills

Being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, Mild, and Tonic, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex,

ALL SUFFERERS from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND ON THE STOMACH, BILIOUSNESS, SICK HEADACHE, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, etc.,

should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

Of all Chemists, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for Price from PAGE WOODCOCK, Lincoln.

TRILENE REGd TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (359 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING Co., 183, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 17

April 25, 1896.

S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET Co. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

Profits Paid during 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 per cent. per month.

Profits Paid during 1896.

Jan. 2 ... £6 per cent.	Feb. 1 ... £7 per cent.
Mar. 2 ... £6 per cent.	April 1 ... £6 per cent.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

THIN BUSTS

Quickly transformed and a good figure permanently obtained by a perfectly harmless, simple, and inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. For particulars, free, send stamped envelope in confidence to "Madame B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

"JUNO" CYCLES

Are the Very Best.

JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb. JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

AJAX CYCLES FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN

ARE RICH VALUE. 25 to 30 per cent. saved and carriage paid.

IMMENSE STOCK, NEW AND SECOND HAND.

Easy Terms from 10s. per Month. Lists free.

Now Open.—LARGE CYCLING SCHOOLS, at 42, High Street, Camden Town, LONDON, and at Liverpool.

BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING COMPANY, 42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W., and 45, Everton Road, Liverpool.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY

C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 382.] For the Week ending April 25th, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

The Suicide of Julian Sorel.

From the Italian of Matilde Serao.

He went slowly up the Via Nazionale, moving with difficult steps, and upon his handsome, pale face, worn and altered, was the look of mortal lassitude. He went with downcast eyes, and hands hanging loose at his sides, jostled, pushed by people in haste, and he seemed to see nothing, to feel nothing, only every now and then there sounded in passing the whistle of the train which goes from the Piazza Venezia to Termini, and Julian Sorel started at the sharp note, stopped and looked with his wan and sadly-wearied eyes at the car, jolting upon the rails with a dull crash.

Then Julian Sorel resumed his way, always more slowly, stopping to look at the shop windows, of which the gloss was dimmed by the heavy dampness of that morning in March; but his eyes had the vacancy, the cold stupefaction, of those of a man who does not see. Yet he remained several minutes before a display of toys, looking at a row of dolls, with hair blonde as tow, eyes bluer than any blue sky, cheeks pinker than any rose; dolls in lace-trimmed nightdresses, or sumptuously clad in satin and velvet; dolls wrapped in furs like Russian great ladies; dolls with their outfit and furniture.

A cloud of tears rose to veil the dry eyes of Julian Sorel, before all that blonde beauty richly clothed, before those rosy creatures loaded with adornments of luxury, and he was obliged to lean against the window-frame of the shop, in order not to fall. Then he walked on more depressed than before. But although his step was that of a man who has not strength to reach his aim, or fears to reach it, he arrived at the corner of Via Torino, where he was to turn. He stopped, remained motionless, as if incapable of arriving at the grey villa, which was already seen amid the slender group of green trees that surrounded it. Now an expression of fear was added upon his face to the profound weariness evident there; the pretty villa arising amid the boughs frightened him.

He was a prey to a thousand hesitations as he traversed the short space of the street; his hand, pressing the white button of the electric bell, trembled.

A serving-man, still in his morning jacket, and with a blue cotton apron before him, came to open the door.

"Is the signora still asleep?" asked Julian Sorel, with a weak, broken voice, sadly hoping for an affirmative reply.

"No, Eccellenza; she called her maid an hour ago."

The servant had given him, it is true, the title of Eccellenza, but he had looked with such easy coolness, had preceded him with such indifference, without even looking to see if Julian Sorel followed him, that the latter quivered with pain, perceiving at once, with his morbid sensitiveness, the shade of contempt in the servant. Julian Sorel has traversed a large ante-room and two parlours, furnished with the most expensive luxury, in the most correct and artistic taste, and had stopped in the hall, a room like a conservatory, all covered by glass and veiled by thin, but impenetrable, curtains of Oriental gauze, full of the rarest plants and the richest and most fantastic furniture, soft skins spread upon the floor, and exotic flowers rising from vases of choice porcelain, of delf or china.

The air was warm, and a strange, inebriating perfume was in the atmosphere. Seated in a bamboo armchair, with elbows resting on his knees and his head leaning on his hands, he abandoned himself, so to say, to utter depression, without raising his head, without even hearing the light step of Gwendoline Harris; and the blonde, slender woman stood before him, looked at him with her cold and brilliant blue eyes—bluer than the skies—passing her pink, taper fingers over the fluttering white feathers with which was trimmed her gown of white wool, all embroidered with silver like a priestly stole.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"Then?" asked the fresh, clear-cut voice of the woman.

"Oh, Gwendoline!" he murmured, becoming paler still, unable to bear the gaze of those icy blue eyes.

She extended herself, all white, upon a white divan, covered with cushions of white silk so soft that she sank among them. There were to be seen the two little feet clad in slippers of white velvet, edged with feather trimming, and her thin stockings of black silk, lightly embroidered in silver. The mass of her blonde hair was held up by a large comb, all studded with small pearls, and two great white pearls hung from her ears. She played with the filaments of the feather trimming of her gown softly, as a bird that smoothes its plumage. The pink of her skin was truly pinker than any rose.

"Then?" she asked again of Julian Sorel.

He dared not reply, and looked at her with eyes of intreaty. Gwendoline shook her blonde head slightly, and began to play with her gleaming rings, that covered every finger up to the first joint, like an Egyptian idol.

"Then the affair has gone wrong?" Gwendoline then asked with her pure crystalline voice.

"Wrong," he answered feebly.

"For ever?"

"For ever," he repeated, like a fatal echo.

No impression of wonder, of sadness, of pity came to trouble that pink face of the woman, that clear-cut and calm forehead, those eyes like a frosty heaven.

"You are a dead man," she declared coldly.

"Yes, indeed," said Julian Sorel, ashen of face as a corpse.

"What are you come to do here? This is not a cemetery, and none of my antique caskets can serve you as a coffin," said Gwendoline without anger, breathing upon one of her opal rings to make it shine.

"I came to salute you for the last time."

"And yesterday evening did I not say adieu to you? Did not you understand it?"

"I did not understand it, and I hoped, from the banker Colzada this morning——" he stammered humbly.

"A useless hope; no one gives money to the dead."

"You are right," he said in a low tone, with bent head.

She watched him strangely. It seemed as if she were measuring the moral depth of that depression, and wished to know of what that immense weakness would be capable. He was silent, lost, exhausted.

"To what figure do your debts amount?" she asked all at once in her clear, cold voice.

Julian Sorel lifted his head, and looked at Gwendoline as in a dream—as if he had not heard or understood.

"To what figure do your debts amount?" she repeated, dominating him with her blue eyes.

"I don't know . . . I don't know . . . do not talk to me about it," he begged her, shuddering, passing one hand across his brow.

"You owe two hundred and seventy thousand lire. I reckoned the sum."

It seemed as if the syllables of this hard phrase beat, every one, upon the brain of the unhappy man, for his face altered.

"And you have not a soldo to pay with; and you have no more resources; you have exhausted all of them; and you have no hope of inheritance, for all your relatives are dead; no hope in your work, because you do not know how to work; you have been a man given to love and to pleasure; no hope of business, of speculation, because within a month, a week, you will be a bankrupt, a defaulter."

"Gwendoline, if you love me, be silent, be silent."

"I do not love you," she said quietly.

"If you ever cared for me be silent, do not kill me."

"I never cared for you," she persisted, proudly contracting her beautiful lips, red and fresh.

Julian Sorel looked at her with such new despair in his eyes that the haughty woman smiled with pride.

"Sometimes—you have told me that you cared for me," he stammered.

"I told a falsehood, naturally," she explained, "and you know that very well. It pleased you to have me tell falsehoods, that is all."

"Yes, it is true, your falsehood was my happiness."

"And so," she concluded, "you have spent all that you possessed, and you have made two hundred and seventy thousand lire of debts to pay for that falsehood. For that falsehood you go to your death."

"To my death," he repeated, opening his arms, with the gesture of final despair.

"It was a sweet and beautiful falsehood, let us say so," resumed Gwendoline, crossing her pretty feet, finely shod with dainty black and white, "and 'tis worth the trouble of dying for. Do not hope that your creditors will give you truce! You owe between fifty and sixty thousand lire to Giacomo Levi, to Francesco Sangiorgio, to Giovanni Lamarca, your friends, whom you have made your enemies for ever, and who persecute you worse than the money-lenders, Pietro Toscano and Angelo Cabib, to whom you owe less, much less, but the interest has mounted up so high! You are in debt, too, to the Parisian milliners, Worth, Morin, and Redfern, all for dresses, for me, and they have given you credit because you had spent with them the half of your fortune; you owe the Italian dressmakers, Bellom, Pontecorro, the Boria sisters, Tua; you owe all the jewellers, Marchesni here, and Franconeri at Naples; you owe all the dealers in furniture and elegant bric-à-brac, Janetti, Cajiata, Maria Beretta, also Guglianetti, of Milan; all these have given you credit, because you have bought so much of them before. But they want their money, and they are right; why should they lose it? They are worthy people."

"Gwendoline, Gwendoline, do not be pitiless; be silent, be silent, I am dying," he cried, with his eyes wild with acute pain.

"Do you know what is the balance of accounts for the beautiful sweet falsehood?" she continued, as if she had not heard him. "A million and eight hundred thousand lire. You, I imagine, have not even the money to buy a revolver."

"I have not," he moaned, from his abyss of sorrow.

"One million eight hundred thousand lire, and to be obliged to resort to an economical suicide, a poor little suicide—that of the beggars and the forsaken servant maids—in the river, the Tiber!" she murmured with a vague smile, as if she were speaking to herself.

He raised towards her his painfully stupified gaze. And Gwendoline understood the meaning of that amazement.

"You are now telling yourself that I am a monster of cruelty."

Digitized by Google

"I am not saying anything," stammered the weak creature.

"You say it. And you are wrong. Let us balance our accounts, for we are never to see each other again. You, what did you want of me?"

"That you should love me—that I might be your lover, your servant, your friend."

"And I, what have I asked of you?"

"Nothing."

"And you have given me everything in order to be loved or that I should feign to love you. That is the balance of accounts. Now I, to show you that I am not cruel, can only give you one piece of wise advice—kill yourself. You had a fortune, you have it no longer; you had a woman, you have her no longer; you had honour, it is shipwrecked; you have a fine and delicate soul, a sensitive mental heart, and you have, together with all that, a need to enjoy, to be happy, which is your greatest need; you cannot, then, combat against poverty, abandonment, and dishonour. Kill yourself! kill yourself. You cannot save yourself otherwise. For what should you live? He who kills himself pays his debts; he who kills himself has no more need of honour, nor love, nor money; he who kills himself conquers supreme peace. You have nothing more to do in the world; go out of it, into the common grave, where there are no creditors, and where there will not appear any more the divine and cursed blue eyes that were the cause of your death."

They flashed, those blue eyes, with these last words. Julian Sorel looked at them and drank from them deadly poison. Julian Sorel heard the clear and fatal voice, and felt in his heart its mortal and lugubrious vibrations.

"It is two months since I decided to kill myself when there should no longer be any remedy," he said faintly.

"You have waited too long; go, go and throw yourself into the Tiber," she said, looking at him, hypnotising him, giving him the suggestion of love, grief, terror.

"I am going," said Julian Sorel, and he rose.

But he did not take a step. She still looked at him, in order to conquer him entirely in his infinite weakness.

"Go, go; you will be happier dead," Gwendoline told him again.

"Give me a kiss," he asked humbly, kneeling before the divan where she lay, not to give her the annoyance of rising.

She turned slightly towards the kneeling man, took his head between her slender, jewelled hands, and placed her beautiful fresh lips upon his forehead. And it seemed that again, in that long kiss, the lips of Gwendoline said to him:

"Go, go, you will be happier dead."

* * * * *

Going down the Via Nazionale, Julian Sorel went to death. He no longer dragged his limbs wearily, but neither did he hasten; he did not stop before certain shop-windows, but the eyes that he fixed upon the passers had the same painful expression of sightlessness; he did not start now when the whistle of the train sounded, but the pallor of his face had become livid.

The dying man had received the final wound; but a way had been pointed out to him and he was going there, without haste, but fatally, by the blue, icy light of two divine eyes which led him, to the funereal sound of a crystalline voice of a woman which accompanied him, with the caress of two slender hands upon his brow and hair with the last kiss of the speaking lips, the last kiss and the last words pervading his brain, his soul, his heart, all his being.

Now, as he walked, Julian Sorel thought only to what point of the great Tiber he should go to throw himself in. Gwendoline Harris had not told him that. Not at Pipetta, for the bridge is too much frequented by day, and there are the landings for the shell row-boats, and a suicide is always a failure there; not at the Albero Bello, because there are too many vessels loaded with Sicilian wine; where, then?

He remembered an evening in August, in which, passing through Rome with Gwendoline Harris, on the way from Vienna to Sorrento, they had gone to Ponte Molle, like citizens, like all who are obliged to remain in Rome for the summer; and they had walked up and down along the river, towards the vast meadows of Tor di Quinto, towards the shady Via Angelica; Gwendoline was dressed in soft, white silk, as always, all in white, and had had a large, light mantle of white wool; yes, yes, he would die at Ponte Molle, towards Tor di Quinto, or by the shore of Via Angelica; it was still she who suggested to him this idea. He was at Piazza Venezia when he decided.

He took his way by the Corso to the right. Some one saluted him; he did not recognise who it might be, and passed on. Several stopped him, they were creditors for small or great sums, and the demand varied, now brutal, now whining, but insistent, implacable. They had known him to be rich and had given him credit, and they believed that he still had money, believed that he denied them from unwillingness. All the passage by the Corso was one long torture for him, an unmerited, unjust torture, since, indeed, he was going to die at this place, amid a concert of voices, of words, of phrases that all told him seeking his money: "Go, go, throw yourself into the river; you will be happier dead."

So when he had nearly reached the Piazza del Popolo there was hardly anyone about; and that increasing solitude calmed him a little, as he took the muddy walk that leads by the Via Flaminia, along the Parioli hills, to Ponte Molle.

No one in the little café where the cab-drivers and carters stop; no one in the little taverns that sprout up every few steps, until the middle of the Via Flaminia; no one in the lonely fields, all a desert of mud, where hardly grew some blackish, stunted trees. He thought whether he ought to write something before dying, an explanation, a salute; and a new wave of despair suffocated him; he had no one, no one to whom to write, not a relative, or a friend, or an acquaintance; no one would mourn or curse him except his creditors; he had lived for enjoyment, only for sake of love, luxury, pleasure; and so he died for these things, bearing in his soul as a last farewell the words of Gwendoline Harris, for whom he had spent a million and eight hundred thousand lire, the words with which she had told him to kill himself, because he would be happier dead. No one, no one, not his mother, not a sister, a betrothed, a friend, nothing, nothing—not a human tear for him; and the final scene of his life, in that great solitude and silence of the Roman Campagna, on that forlorn March day, walking and sinking in the mud, was the worthy completion of his existence.

All at once he felt a push against his leg. He turned. A dog was following him, and he turned to look at it. It was a very ugly, very dirty, lean dog, that appeared as if he had upon him ten days of vagabondage and hunger amid the mud of the Campagna; a disgusting dog. Where had he come from? Julian Sorel could not have told. There were no more houses on the Via Flaminia; perhaps he had run out, unnoticed, from the lane of the Arco Scuro. He had been following, perhaps, for some time; and he looked at Julian Sorel with his kind and gentle dog's eyes.

Digitized by Google

"Go away," said the man rudely.

The dog stopped a moment, then began again to follow.

"Go away," and he gave it a kick.

The poor dog took the kick in one shoulder and howled sadly; but still looking at Julian Sorel, it still followed him. He stopped, greatly disturbed. Why did that dog follow him so obstinately even after being beaten? Why did it look at him with those eyes that seemed human, so expressive were they of pity and sorrow?

"It must be a lost, hungry dog looking for a master," he thought, as he stood contemplating that singular beast.

The dog, too, had stopped, and held its scrubby head down, patiently waiting.

"Go away, go away," Julian Sorel said to it, "I must die."

The beast raised its head and looked, with those eyes of a loving, poor, sorrowful animal. All the soul of Julian Sorel shook with fear and wonder. But who, who was looking at him in that tender animal gaze. What new madness of pity came to give him a final grief, a grief made of humble tenderness of a most bitter and sweet melting mood?

"I must die, I must die," he said, speaking to that beast as if to a man; "I shall be happier dead."

And he went on again, towards Ponte Molle, repressing all the tears of an unknown sadness which rose to his eyes, repressing the sharpness of a mysterious regret. The dog followed him step by step; Julian Sorel heard it behind him, walking faithfully, disgustingly ugly and dirty, half dead with hunger and fatigue, but decided to follow him, wherever the man on the way to death might wish to go. A prey to an unconquerable disturbance between an odd new despair and an odd breaking up of his entire will, Julian Sorel shuddered, hearing the animal's step, vigilant, almost inflexible in its affectionate persecution.

He would have liked to stop, strike it, throw stones at it, kill it with kicks, but the idea of encountering those tender canine eyes, so filled with human pity, frightened him. Ah, surely, surely, someone was looking at him through those eyes. He dared not look at them, those eyes of an animal almost as if they spoke to him of the human goodness that he had disdained, of all the human sufferings that he had despised, of all the human tears that had flowed for him in vain; he dared not look at them, as if he found in them the unknown reproof, mystic and austere, which Life makes to him who has not known how to understand her and therefore has not known how to deserve her. Who was looking at him, through those eyes so deep with compassion; who was still weeping over him, over the existence of a pleasure-loving and capricious brute that he had ever lived; who was weeping over that noble soul dragged in the shame of an impure love?

Ah! that beast would not go away; it followed him, it followed him until his final step, no human force could liberate him from that company.

"Let him come, then, to see me die," he thought. But at Ponte Molle they met three carts full of pozzolana that came slowly towards Rome to the melancholy whistle of the rough drivers; and towards Tor di Quinto it seemed to Julian Sorel that the land was too wide, too open, to kill himself there in the river. Better the wide and winding road of the Porta Angelica which runs under large trees, beside the great yellow river full of whirlpools and the Farnesina meadows. He would go down to the water's edge, and silently, falling rather than throwing himself in, without any noise, would die in the deep, fierce river. But the dog would perhaps throw itself into the water to save him; the dog did not wish him to die—this was the idea working in the disordered brain of Julian Sorel. And then, as if that unknown animal were a man, as if he could understand everything, Julian Sorel, in the muddy and deserted road, under the great, black, bare trees, before the wide, yellow river, cried to it desolately:

"I must die; I have two hundred and seventy thousand lire of debts and cannot pay; I must die, let me die."

The poor beast, dirty and hideous, looked at Julian Sorel with eyes full of pity, as if veiled by tears; not a voice nor a footstep throughout the wide plain, smoking with moisture from the soil of the fields; not a voice, not a boat upon the wide river with its destructive whirlpools; alone that man and that dog. That look! Did it not say, perhaps, to Julian Sorel, that humble look of an animal—that death does not save from dishonour, that it is more honest to live, working out the penalty of a great error, than to take refuge in the tomb? Who, who told him so, in those eyes, and in his conscience?

All his own people, who were dead at their appointed hour, quietly touched by destiny, but honoured, trusting to be mourned, told it to him, perhaps, in those eyes; all those who had loved him, and who were far away and could not save him now; all those whom he had loved in childhood, in youth, ten years, a day, an hour, they, perhaps, or their beloved shades, or their far-off tender voices, or their kind eyes thus would save him, or their caressing hands that would withhold him—they, in that look!

Conquered by an immense weakness, Julian Sorel let go himself upon the sandy bank of the river, hiding his face in the damp sand, with open arms, sobbing softly every now and then, but without tears. The dog had seated himself beside him, and laid its muddy nose upon its dirty, thin paws; and during all the while that Julian Sorel lay, stretched at full length in the fatality of life and death that fought for their prey, the poor beast did not move, keeping his eyes fixed upon the man in his agony. In agony, the weak creature who had always lived for the smile of the moment, without will, without faith, without goodness; in agony, the flaccid soul, the conquered soul, the soul impoverished by small ideas and by impure desires; in agony, the soul that had cast away the noble part of himself, that feared the penalty and would flee the chastisement—in agony!

The turbid waters of the murderous river ran, they that had borne to sea so many corpses; the funereal Roman Campagna was silent, motionless under the damp, malignant breath of March; the day was at its end. The dog softly, softly, lapped the open hand of Julian Sorel; that indistinct caress was like a breath, like a voice, like a word, was like the apparition of a phantom. The body of the man stretched out there gave a great start, and the heart truly broke in tenderness, in repentance, in pity, in the desire for human chastisement.

Then, in the frosty twilight, he returned towards Rome. Between Via Angelica and Via Triofale the dog disappeared in the shadow and Julian Sorel continued his way towards Rome—towards chastisement.

Digitized by Google

The Dissolution of The Templars' Clique.

"Why don't—you—fellows—get—married?"

These were the astounding words, jerked out between the puffs at a pipe, that awoke me suddenly from my pleasant dreamy reverie.

The words came in appropriately enough, for I was thinking of the sweet face of a girl, to whom I had been introduced a few days ago.

There were three of us smoking and talking round the fire in our rooms in the Temple—Danvers, Brown, and myself. We were known to our friends as the "Templars' Clique," this because of our persistent resistance to the fascinations of certain fair charmers.

No words to do with matrimony had been mentioned among us for years; each one prided himself on the fact that he was a confirmed woman-hater.

We were therefore surprised and incredulous at the astounding question Brown propounded. It was the prelude to the dissolution to the Templars' Clique.

It was some time before I could grasp his meaning. I sank back in my chair, and blinked feebly at Brown. He was calmly engaged in lighting his pipe.

Danvers sprang to his feet.

"What did you say then," he cried, "will you kindly repeat yourself?"

"Why don't"—puff—"you fellows"—puff—"get married?" said Brown. There could be no mistake about his words this time.

He feigned surprise at the look on our faces, threw away his match, and settled back in his chair with his hands behind his head, evidently preparing himself for a lengthy argument.

Danvers accepted the challenge.

"What do you mean by asking such a question as that?" he said.

"Are you mad, man, or don't you know what you are saying? Does it look as if we should get married?"

I sprang on a chair in my excitement.

"Look at this room," I cried, "what do you think it would be like if a girl was here? Do you think she would allow me to stand here if I was married, eh?"

"Look at me," shrieked Danvers (he was dancing madly about). "Do you think I could go about like this if I was married? What should I do if a girl was sitting here?"

Brown had been listening patiently to our excited words. I did not like the look on his face. It seemed as if he had heard our arguments before, and was prepared with an answer for them. He looked round the room, noting every detail.

"I see," he said, "a disgracefully untidy room, filled with tobacco smoke, and—altogether repulsive."

Altogether repulsive! Brown was indeed in a bad way.

He closed his eyes and leant back in his chair.

"Now I can see," he went on, "this same room transformed by the sweet presence of a woman. It is brightly furnished, filled with flowers, and abounding with knick-knacks and tables. Two chairs are drawn to the fire."

Brown gazed steadily at Danvers to answer his questions.

"I look at you," he said, "and see an excited little man, dressed in a barbarous fashion." Brown closed his eyes again.

"Now," he continued, "I see a respectable, smug looking fellow, occupying one of the two chairs drawn to the fire. By his side is seated—"

"Oh, stow it," interrupted Danvers, whose patience was fast coming to an end. Then after a thoughtful pause: "Well, yes, then. By his side is seated—a girl—already tired of married life; her husband enjoys little of her society, and begins to look fondly back on his bachelor days."

Danvers laughed merrily when he remembered that he was still free.

Deep down in his heart, however, he knew he was belying the sex. A sweet name kept ringing in his ears—May Lancaster—a sweet form kept floating before his eyes, and was enframed in the tobacco rings he was blowing. It was wearing a bright blue dress to match the laughing eyes; freckles covered the childlike forehead, and two laughing dimples were on its cheeks.

I took up the train of Danvers' thoughts.

"By his side was seated a girl—whose sole object in marrying seemed to be to deprive her husband of freedom. She rules him with a firm hand, which is perhaps accounted for by the fact that she was once captain of her football team, and had ambitions of taking a degree at Oxford."

Yet all through the day I had been haunted by a face to whom I knew these words would never apply. May Lancaster! What a pretty name it was!

Suddenly an idea struck me. I sprang forward and looked Brown steadily in the eyes. I beckoned to Dangers to come and look.

"You are in love, man," we cried suddenly, "we see it in your eyes, it is written clearly on every feature. Traitor!"

Brown put his hands in his pocket and slowly drew out a photograph. He held it up to our faces.

At the sight of it Danvers sank back in his chair; and covered his face with a cushion. I reeled on to a sofa.

It was the picture of a smiling girl with light coloured eyes, who had freckles on her forehead, and on whose cheeks two charming dimples were to be seen.

Two words were scrawled across the photograph in bold character: "May Lancaster."

"She's going to marry me," Brown explained.

The Templars' Clique was dissolved.

M. Woodward.

Digitized by Google

The doctor's wife scanned her visitor in silence. With the audacity of an out-and-out Protestant she was revolving in her mind certain impious questions. This was the third mendicant in pious garb who had come to her door within a month soliciting alms for the support of some far-away religious institution. Who was to assure her that the contributions she had already made would be faithfully dedicated to the purpose for which they had been given? Would the Catholics take pity upon the needy or suffering of other denominations? In her growing distrust she leapt to reckless surmises. What if these black-robed women were not "sisters" after all, but merely bold imposters, who assumed the dress of the order for the time for their own selfish aims and purposes?

She recalled herself from her reverie with a little shudder, and her voice was hard and cold as she spoke.

"Sister Veronica, I really do not feel justified in helping your hospitals and asylums any more. I think it is time we were looking up the poor about us. There may be fellow-beings suffering in our midst without a murmur, people whose pride forbids them to appeal to public charity. I think we should be doing more nobly if we devoted our time to looking up such cases, instead of contributing to the support of distant institutions, of which we know nothing."

"Oh, madam, if others were only of your thinking!" interrupted the visitor impetuously.

"What then? I fear you would not succeed so well in your missions"

Mrs. Belden leant forward as she spoke, and gazed curiously upward into the countenance beneath the peaked white bonnet. The momentary flutter, and the crimson wave which had transformed her caller's face, passed away, leaving it cold and still in its purity.

"One must rejoice at any lessening of the great sum of human misery," was the quiet response.

The anchorite turned to go. She had not only failed in her errand, but had met with a decided rebuff; yet at the door she paused a moment, and held out a shapely white hand, which met the other's in a sympathetic grasp.

The doctor's wife stood at the window, with mingled curiosity and interest, and watched her visitor depart. To her surprise the latter did not continue up the street, but retraced her steps along the lonely path leading in the direction of the railway station.

The picture of the strange woman lingered obstinately in Mrs. Belden's memory. There was something oddly familiar about her face. The very dimples in her cheeks—that a sister of charity should have dimples—the gentle curves of chin and mouth, and the bright flash of her eyes, unsubdued by the long and weary penance to which her pale face and wasted figure bore testimony, were all parts of a haunting and elusive memory. She wondered to what order the woman belonged. The skirt of her robe was certainly very scant and shabby, and a faint line about the bottom reminded her of the mark left on her own black silk where she had lately ripped off a plaiting. A little starch and skilful manipulation might easily convert a pillow-case stiffly starched into one of those large, square bonnets. But after a short time Mrs. Belden dismissed these wandering speculations from her mind, and, resuming her patchwork, was soon deeply absorbed in studying the arrangement of some "samples."

Digitized by Google

* * * * *

Several months sped by, and the good lady, in spite of her creditable resolutions, had taken no active step towards ascertaining the circumstances of her neighbours. One day had been too chilly, another too windy, a third too warm, to sally forth on her charitable errand. So she had contented herself with making a few inquiries of chance visitors. She had been laughed at for her pains. It was an axiom in the town that no worthy and industrious person could ever suffer for lack of food or raiment.

There came a day when the doctor was late to his six o'clock supper. The table was spread in the cosy dining-room and the tea simmered on the hearth. The young housewife vibrated between table and window. The little cathedral clock on the parlour mantel sounded the half-hour. The young wife busied herself picking off the dead leaves from a twining similax which stood in the window—so many withered leaves do the house-plants show in that exasperating climate.

The clock solemnly struck the hour of seven. The little woman had grown too accustomed to the exactions of a physician's life to feel more than impatient. She sat down to the table alone and tried to eat, but only succeeded in swallowing a cup of tea and a bit of fruit. Then she resumed her post at the window. A light rain was falling, which increased until it came in gusts and squalls, then settled into a steady downpour.

It was after nine o'clock when she descried a dark figure hurrying up the street. The gate opened and shut with a click, and the doctor bounded up the steps, to be met with a tearful greeting on the part of his wife.

"Oh, Robert, you don't know what I have suffered! I was so afraid that some of those dreadful men who are always——"

"Nonsense, child!" But his voice was shaky, and as he reached out his hand and laid a long morocco case on the table, she noticed that his face was pale and drawn.

"An operation, dear? What was it?"

He did not answer at once. Indeed, he sat down to the table and drank his cup of tea and ate a slice or two of bread-and-butter, chatting, meanwhile, in an absent way on indifferent topics. It was only when they had gone into the little parlour, and he had thrown himself into a great easy-chair before the glowing fire, that he recognised her question.

"A seven-year old boy, dear. Leg crushed. Stood it like a hero!"

"How did it happen—the injury, I mean?"

"Slipped and fell under a backing engine. They seem to have been pretty badly off—the mother and child—and the stoker of engine No. 26 had been in the habit of throwing off lumps of coal for the little fellow to pick up. To-day the lad tried to climb up before they had slowed down, and missed his footing and fell."

"How he must have suffered!"

"He never seemed to think of himself at all. Was possessed with a fear that the stoker might be blamed. Beautiful little fellow, in spite of his shabby clothes. Broad white forehead, curling brown hair, and thoughtful grey eyes. Do you know I can't get rid of a certain fancy that I've seen the child before."

"Probably in the streets," suggested Mrs. Belden.

"No, no. Years ago; when I was a boy, or in some other existence."

"Oh, madam, if others were only of your thinking!"

"Where do they live?"

"I declare, Bessie, I never suspected there was such destitution in this place. We had to perform the operation by the light of a coal-oil lamp. She held it."

"The mother?"

"Yes; and never flinched. Shielded it with her hand to keep the rain from putting out the light. In all my professional experience I never saw such self-command."

"Indifference I should call it," suggested the indignant listener.

"I don't know, my dear," he replied; "I don't know. When we got through I wondered that she did not move or stir. I looked at her, and her eyes were fixed upon the face of the unconscious child. I had to unclasp her hands from the lamp. Her fingers were cold and clammy; she was like a person in a cataleptic trance. I thought she was going to fall to the ground. But, instead——"

"Instead—what?"

"Instead, she insisted upon staying there alone to-night. Would not listen to our offer of watchers. Seemed in a hurry to get us off."

"But how can a child recover in such a place? It is criminal to leave him there."

"The townspeople may be a trifle uncivilised, my dear, but they are not wanting in the common attributes of humanity. The men have been busy this evening. They have rented that little house Brown's family vacated last week, and eighty pounds will be placed in bank to-morrow to the little boy's credit."

But the townspeople found that they had a difficult case with which to deal. Face to face with the exigencies of her situation, the mother consented to move to the house made ready for her, but she drew sparingly upon the funds placed to her credit, and took a careful inventory of everything the house contained, with a view to paying for everything as soon as she should be able.

In an inconceivably short time, thanks to the reactive powers of healthy childhood, and the purer air the child was able to be about the house, blithe as a little maimed bird, on his single leg and crutch. The scant sewing that the mother could procure was ill-paid and inadequate for her needs, and she quietly opened another industry. She made the fact known that she was ready to wash soiled linen.

Digitized by Google

The doctor and his wife sometimes discussed the anomalous character of the woman with whom Fate had brought them in contact.

"I can't quite make her out," the doctor once remarked; "to look at her one would think her incapable of feeling—that she had scarcely a human instinct. She is developing into the hardest business woman I ever saw. Yet I am inclined to think that the night I first saw her she was stimulated by courage of the highest order, an heroic self-forgetfulness that conquered her own physical weakness."

"I understand her perfectly," returned his wife, with prompt feminine decision; "she is constructed on a different principle from ordinary women. Some gentle instinct of sympathy — of womanly tenderness—is wanting in her composition. I have seen her day after day, you know, my dear, and I ought to be able to judge. Though she is not a bad sort of woman at all," she generously conceded.

"Curious sort of name, isn't it?—Mrs. Ruthstan. It has a very fancy sound."

"It doesn't sound like a real name at all," returned Mrs. Belden severely. "Oh, she has a history behind her, and we shall know it some day, depend upon it."

Caught the fainting woman in his arms.

It so happened that the very next day the doctor stumbled across an old friend, newly arrived in the place, and brought him home. "Bessie, you remember Jack Grosvenor—the oldest friend I have. You remember he would have been the best man at our wedding ——"

"If he hadn't been busy getting married himself a thousand miles away. Yes, I remember, I am very glad to welcome you to our home, Mr. Grosvenor," said the doctor's wife, holding out her hand with a winning smile.

But there was no answering smile on the face of the man she so cordially greeted. She remembered her husband's description of the gay, light-hearted fellow, and tried to identify him with this sober-faced, reserved man, who had silently seated himself by the window.

"Jack has just come back with a party from South Africa," exclaimed the doctor; "he is a rich man now."

"That is very good," said Mrs. Belden absently, wondering why her husband should have made such a point of his friend's business success, or speak of it as if it were of vital interest to her.

"I am glad for Jack," proceeded the doctor, a little awkwardly; "he has been telling me something of his experiences to-day—you don't mind my telling Bessie, Jack, I'm sure, do you?—and he's had a terribly hard pull. Worst of all, he lost his wife."

"I am very sorry——"

"No, not that way!" hastily interrupted the doctor; "lost sight of her. He left her in London three years ago. Heard from her once or twice, but his roaming life was not favourable to correspondence. Now he tells me he has lost all trace of her."

"How very strange!" Her woman's curiosity was roused. "And she was such a pretty woman, Mr. Grosvenor. I remember the lovely face of the photograph you sent us, when you were married. Such a dimpled, laughing face! Where was it I saw one that reminded me of it, not long ago?"

"I can't say it seems so very strange to me," remarked Grosvenor, taking part in the conversation for the first time, and speaking in a laboured, husky voice; "I wonder that she put up with it so long. We had had a hard time of it for years. You know how she had been reared up. She was a Miss Ruth Stanhope. I was never able to provide for her in the way she had been accustomed to at home. I left her with almost nothing. She was a proud, spirited woman. She tired of the struggle and went back to her friends. I had hoped she might hold on account of the boy."

"The boy? Then you had a child?"

Grosvenor assented with a mute gesture.

"Ruth Stanhope," repeated the doctor's wife slowly, looking steadily at her husband, who sent her back a significant glance; "and the boy—how old would your little son be now, Mr. Grosvenor?"

"A little more than seven years."

"Robert, I have an errand that must be attended to at once. You and Mr. Grosvenor will excuse me. I will not be long."

Mrs. Belden had snatched up a broad-brimmed hat and was tying it under her chin as she spoke, her eyes kindled with excitement, her cheeks lit with a sudden flame. Jack Grosvenor, aroused from his apathy, looked curiously after her as she sped down the street, her head in a whirl. As she flew along the pavement she tried to balance and arrange the queer facts and strange memories that were flitting through her brain. She remembered something of the splendour of Jack Grosvenor's wedding, and the contrast it had presented to their own modest nuptials.

Digitized by Google

She recalled an account she had read of the marriage banquet and the list of the notable guests who were in attendance. She saw in anticipation the bare room she was about to enter, with its beggarly strip of rag carpeting along the centre, the bedstead with its worn coverlet, the wooden chairs, and the woman bent over the ironing board, contrasting it with the abounding comforts and generous hospitality of that earlier home.

A high wind was blowing, and clouds of dust darkened the air about her. Battling with the force of the storm, she yet found time to marvel at the strength of character that had enabled the petted girl, born and cradled in the lap of luxury, deliberately to renounce the life of ease open to her, and condemn herself and her child to the life of toil and hardship that had resulted so disastrously. The gentle woman's heart filled with love and sympathy, and she was ready to take Jack Grosvenor's wife into her arms and cry over her sorrows and humiliations.

Her heart was chilled at the sight of the cold, proud face, whose severity was increased by the piece of stiff, white muslin bound about the head as a protection from the smoke and coal-dust of the ironing-stove. Mrs. Belden looked in momentary abhorrence at the mass of lace and embroidery lying upon the ironing-board, guessing only too well the owners of that tawdry splendour.

"What! do you work for them?"

For a moment the woman calmly gazed upon her questioner, then turned with an expressive glance to the low pallet where her boy lay sleeping, by his side the crutch that must be his life-long companion.

Notwithstanding the mother's impassive demeanour, the eyes of the visitor filled with sudden tears. She twirled her hat-strings and searched the cold face, wondering how she had best communicate the tidings of which she was the bearer. She observed the dignified movement of the tall figure across the room, the shapely hand that changed the cool iron for a fresh one, and she remembered how the same hand had held a light without flinching, while the little boy's limb was being taken off. With what a disdainful front she had faced poverty, and how sternly she had repelled those who offered sympathy and help. Such a woman would never have nerve for anything. Why should she plan to spare her what would at most be little more than a slight surprise.

Mrs. Belden ended by flinging all her scruples to the wind.

"My husband's old friend, Jack Grosvenor, is at our house."

"Alive?"

The word spoke volumes. The pain and agony of years were concentrated in the cry. The hot iron she was holding dropped upon the lace draperies and burnt its way through them, as she clutched at the table to steady herself, while her brown eyes sought her visitor's with a look of piteous intreaty.

"Is—it—true?" she pleaded.

There was no need of answer. A man's step sounded outside, and the door was flung open, and Jack Grosvenor, returned to something like his old, impetuous self, strode across the room and caught the fainting woman in his arms. The white turban fell back from the pale face, its rigid features relaxed into a happy smile, and the doctor's wife, struck by the transformation was startled with a sudden recognition and murmured softly:

"Sister Veronica!"

Flora Haines Loughead.

STILL ON SALE . . . . . No. 4 of Pearson's Magazine.

THE CONTENTS INCLUDE:

Gates and Pillars of the Empire. Robert Machray.
No. I.—Liverpool Illustrated.

The Mountain of Valour. Sir Evelyn Wood.
Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood.

Soldier an' Sailor too. Rudyard Kipling.
Illustrated by Georges Montbard.
One of Mr. Kipling's most brilliant poems.

The Men who will Lead if War Comes. Archibald Forbes.
Illustrated with photographs.
An interesting statement by one of the greatest living authorities upon this subject.

Secrets of the Courts of Europe. Allen Upward.
No. IV.—The True Story of Prince Bismarck's Fall.
Illustrated by Hal Hurst, R.B.A.

The Bravest Deed I ever Saw. Marquis of Lorne, K.T.
Illustrated by Sydney Cowell.

How the Frontiers of Europe are Kept. Levin Carnac.
Illustrated by H. Piffard.

Loved I not Honour More. Sir Walter Besant and W. H. Pollock.
Illustrated by Chris Hammond.

Verse { A Retrospect. George Chetwynd. / A Waking Dream. Clarence Hope.

With other stories and articles by Ian Maclaren, H. J. W. Dam, W. L. Alden, Nellie K. Blissett, J. F. Sullivan, Winifred Graham, etc., etc.

While work by the following artists appear in addition to those mentioned above: G. G. Manton, George Ashton, R. Sauber, R.B.A., H. Piffard, Charles May, A. Kemp Tebby, A. Ludovici, etc., etc

PRICE 6d. NETT. PRICE 6d. NETT.

Digitized by Google

Charmed by a Waltz.

HE was the most interesting murderer I ever met. Before the crime he was a private in my company and section, and even the captain thought him an excellent soldier. During his confinement in the guard-room, which lasted over a month, his actions were those of acute mania, so that the sergeant of the guard did not enter his cell.

He was as restless as a hyena, and paced his cell with a monotony of movement almost hypnotic to one watching him through the bars of his cage. When I was sergeant of the guard I would lie on the hard guard bed and look through the small, iron-latticed window in the centre of the door that opened into the prisoner's room, and see him in his cell, where the view of his legs and feet was cut off, by the lintel of the window. Dimly through the iron meshes I would watch the slow, regular movements of his body as it passed from end to end of his cage, like a human pendulum, beating in death strokes the time which elapsed until it must swing into eternity. In spite of the horrors which it suggested, this vision fascinated my attention, and if watched for long seldom failed to produce sleep, for the prisoner kept constantly crooning the insistent measures of a popular waltz.

All through the sultry night the sentry on number one could hear the sharp click of his steps on the concrete floor of his cell, beating regular accompaniments to the accented notes of this recurrent strain. Before trial, Davis, our surgeon, was ordered to examine the prisoner's sanity, and I went with him. He was still pacing his cell and slowly humming "The Blue Danube."

It was during this very waltz, played by the orchestra the night of the regimental dance, that he had brutally butchered Corporal Jenkins with a long-bladed knife, so it struck me as appropriate that this same air should now be a monomania in his madness and control his brain. As he paced his cell he was beating time to the swing of the waltz with a pencil by way of bâton. Davis asked the officer of the guard to have the prisoner brought into the general prison room, but the latter replied that the man was raving mad, and that it was folly to think of letting him from his cell or of sending men to enter it.

Davis then asked for the key, quietly unlocked the cage and opened it. As he did so the prisoner wheeled in his promenade and sprang towards him. Davis stepped quickly aside and struck him a half blow behind the ear, which felled him. Then we carried him into the general prison room, where Davis made an examination, during which the prisoner struggled for freedom with a nervous, weakening strength, as, assisted by a file of the guard, I held him pinioned to the floor. "The man seems insane," said Davis, speaking quietly to the officer of the guard. "Does anyone know the exact hour and minute at which the stabbing of Corporal Jenkins occurred?"

"It was exactly ten o clock," replied the officer of the guard. "Sergeant Morrow stated in examination before the colonel that 'last post' was sounding just as he entered the dance room, and at that moment the stabbing occurred."

"Were they playing 'The Blue Danube' at the time?" Davis asked. I replied that Sergeant Morrow had told me they were. I had mentioned to Morrow that Henderson raved constantly in this tune. "Ah, then!" said Davis, speaking in a low tone to the officer of the guard, "then I understand his case. This is a very peculiar form of monomania. The waltz, the dominant sound during the act of murder, will rule his waking hours day and night, for it was then the madness struck in and phonographed it on the brain. In this form of insanity the brain acts like the sensitive plate of a phonograph to receive the ruling sound of the moment and will repeat it incessantly until the brain wears itself out. If the madness be complete there will be but one break; that will occur exactly at ten o'clock, when the prisoner will cease humming the waltz, and re-enact the tragedy. After a few moments the impression of the murder will pass away, when he will again resume the waltz."

I was impressed by the clear statement Davis made on what seemed to me a most difficult case. Lieutenant ——, the orderly officer, was also struck by it, for he asked if he should send the prisoner into the hospital. "No," replied Davis, "keep him confined in his cell, and, without being observed, watch him closely about ten o'clock for the completing symptoms. You can report to me in the morning." Then he replaced Henderson in his cell, who at once took up his musical promenade.

Digitized by Google

I was detailed that night to watch him, and did so from my bunk in the guardroom. I had cautioned the bugler of the guard to warn me quietly when he left the guardroom to sound "last post." All through the evening I witnessed the same monotonous movement and listened to the same monotonous waltz, chanted slowly as always before. At intervals I would rouse myself and step outside the guardroom and stand in the cool sallyport to assure myself that I was awake and my vision unimpaired, so drowsy would I become under the effort of strained attention. I must finally have fallen asleep, for the bugler touched me on the shoulder and startled me. I did not see him enter, but could have sworn I was still viewing Henderson's movements in the cage.

I placed my face against the latticed window, looking into his cage, which he was still mechanically pacing. Then, as the first note of "last post" sounded, he stopped and reared as quickly as a stag is startled when he first hears a hostile shot that has struck wide and knows not whence it came. The waltz ceased, and in a moment I had all but seen the stabbing of Jenkins—then, as always before, the waltz again.

In the morning I reported. It was clearly a case of acute madness, or no one who ever performed a tour of guard duty with Henderson had ever seen madness. but, to our astonishment and horror, the surgeon thought otherwise, and so officially reported.

The colonel was furious. He had inspected the man—the man was mad! He called up Davis and informed him of the facts. Davis replied firmly: "The man is sane, colonel, and I so reported."

"He's not sane!" the colonel retorted. "Why influence me to stir up a civil murder trial, which plays the dickins with discipline. He should be sent to an asylum!"

Ten years ago Davis would have explained patiently and at length why he thought Henderson sane, but since these callow days he had once offered gratuitous information to a superior in command, so he said simply: "I'm not influencing you to do anything, colonel, unless it is permitting you to do your duty by doing mine."

Davis spoke with the gentle firmness of one struggling to be respectful. The word "permitting" had been delicately chosen, and passed below the colonel's guard.

"That will do, doctor," said the colonel stiffly, his colour rising, as Davis left the office. Even after long Indian service has killed your respect for a man, his opinions are still entitled to it, for they are usually the result of experiences that have cost the man dearly. Yet my faith in Davis weakened. It takes more than five years' confidence in a human being to outweigh our own fallible deductions even on subjects of which we are variously ignorant. The egotism of being rational is so pleasingly pleasant. Still, the colonel sent Henderson to civil trial, and bullied Davis in the hope that he would stop it.

The trial was held, and many attended it. Before it proceeded to the arrangement, the court summoned Davis for opinion. Again the same reports he had made so confidently to the colonel. Everyone was dissatisfied, and the court proceeded to trial. The colonel again called Davis up. "Davis," said he bluntly, "this has gone far enough. I was a witness in that man's trial to-day, and the man is mad, and the court and everyone knows it except you, who of all persons should know it. I don't want a man of my regiment to be hanged unless I'm convinced that he deserves it. Now, stop your professional stubbornness, and request some one in consultation before the verdict. Would you have a crazy man hanged?"

"The man's as sane as you are, colonel, and even grant he is not—which I don't—the class of insanity which he affects, if real, would be subsequent to the act, so he would be punishable whenever reason or a lucid interval appeared. It would be only a little too kind to hang him now, that is all," replied the surgeon. So the trial concluded and Henderson was sentenced to be hanged. On petition of the colonel, a stay of execution was granted until medical experts could be summoned from Calcutta.

These, after consultation with Davis, pronounced the prisoner sane.

During the week before the day set for his execution, Henderson confessed his feigned insanity to me while I was taking him some tobacco, and said that he felt kindly towards everyone for his treatment in trial except the surgeon, who had played it on him that he might hang. "If I only had my liberty long enough to kill Davis," he said to me one day, "I'd die happy." He said to me that I had been good to him; I had fetched him some clean clothes and tobacco, and that he would reward me. Then he outlined how he had killed a rich Hindoo near Delhi, three years before, that he had robbed him of gold which he had buried, and that he had intended to return for the treasure and had never done so. Then he gave minute directions as to place and exact locality and amount of the buried gold.

"Henderson," I asked, when he had finished, "are you still crazy, or are you only lying?"

"Neither," he said simply. "As I mount the scaffold I'll incline my head towards you, which is to affirm, in the presence of eternity, that I speak the truth."

The day before his execution he told me he had forgiven everyone, even Davis, who had only done his duty, and to tell him that now he invited him to come and see him hanged.

After my discharge I actually went up to Delhi and followed the rascal's directions, but found no buried money, though the old Hindoo had been murdered, as stated. Shortly afterwards I met Mr. Davis, and told him of my chase. He laughed pleasantly, and then I asked him:

"Doctor, would you mind telling me how you could be so certain that Henderson was not really insane?"

"Why, you should know that," he said, with a slight twinkle. "You helped me to establish the fact. Do you recall that I gave you a diagnosis of his case before his cell, and had you placed on guard to observe the completing symptoms?"

"Yes, but he really showed them."

"So would you, had you been feigning insanity, as he was doing, and overheard me, and believed, as until now you evidently did believe, that I spoke the truth."

I now understood Henderson's extreme bitterness towards Davis, who had duped him into self-conviction.

Harry Rogers.

Digitized by Google

THE WINNING OF GUNHILD

By George C. Wallis, Author of "Behind the Barrier," etc., etc.

CHAPTER I.

The Bringing Home of Olaf.

The little group of women at the landing place were very busy with their tongues as they watched the black ship coming slowly up the fjord, the shining shields hung on her sides, and the broad-bladed oars dipping regularly in the water as she came through the purple shadow of the great cliffs and then out again into the full blaze of the summer sun. The Swallow was not expected back at North-hold so soon from her voyage of vengeance, "and surely," said Editha, "they return with victory, or they would not be here at all."

Yet there was a note of fear in the Norse-woman's voice as she said this, for no flag fluttered from the mast, as was the custom when the Vikings came home in triumph, and as the ship drew nearer it was plainly seen that the rows of shields had great gaps in them and that the men on board seemed few and the oarsmen put no heart in their work. A murmur went through the waiting group, and Gunhild, who stood by her mother's side, gave a little cry of alarm.

"I see but one of my brothers standing in the prow, mother," she said trembling. "Think you that evil man, Valstran, has slain one of them?"

"Hush, child!" said Editha, "or your father will chide you for a weakling! 'Tis Sigismund you see, and he will tell us where Olaf is, if he has not brought him home. Keep a brave heart, Gunhild,"—as the golden-haired girl clung in fear to her arm—"befitting the daughter of Bjorne and Editha; and not like the women of the south!"

"But even Harald wept when he found his father Asli slain, and Valstran gone," said Gunhild.

"Ay, child, and so would any in whom the kindness of Baldar was instilled from the first," said Freyda, stepping forward and taking the girl's soft hand in her own. "Ay, and so would you, Editha, if aught had happened to your Olaf then!"

"If aught had!" cried the resolute woman going towards the steps to meet the returning warriors, "but I think the gods will guard him well; it was so foretold."

The Vikings were at the landing now, but instead of leaping ashore as he was used to do, Sigismund hung back gloomily while the men took something gently from the deck and carried it slowly up the steps and through the silently-parting crowd

Reverently lifted the sail-cloth from the something on which all eyes were turned.

Digitized by Google

to the feet of Editha, there laying it tenderly down, without speaking a word.

Then Sigismund followed from the ship—which all saw to be so badly battered and splintered as to be scarcely seaworthy—and motioned to Harald Aslison and his man Eric, and they bent and reverently lifted the sail-cloth from the something on which all eyes were turned.

For a moment Editha stood as if carved in stone. Bjorne's face grew white and drawn. Gunhild gave a cry of terror, and Sigismund drew near and looked on with haggard eyes. Then the woman broke out angrily to the dead son's brother:

"This is your care of him! This is the guarding strength of your ready arm. This—nithing, craven, sleepy one! This is what you dare to bring me home when I want my Olaf as he was when he went away—beautiful as Baldar and strong as Thor. This is how you dare to bring him back to me—coward, outcast one, no longer a son of mine!"

"Have patience, wife," said old Bjorne, striding forward to gaze nearer upon the calm features of his youngest son as he lay there so still, with his sword upon his breast, his shield upon it, and the war-axe at his side. "Have patience, wife, till Sigismund has spoken. This is an evil day for us, but I would fain know whether he died in fair fight, with his face to the foe, so that he went straight to Valhalla."

"Yes, weak one, tell us how it is you bring him home to us thus!" cried Editha wildly, stroking the face of the dead with quivering hand. "Tell us! tell us!"

For all answer Sigismund shook back his cloak from his left shoulder, and they saw that where his left arm should have been was only a bandaged stump, scarcely reaching to the elbow. And then, seeing their horror-stricken gaze, he said, slowly:

"This was done by the last stroke but one of the battle-axe of Valstran. The last laid Olaf low."

With a stifled cry Editha sprang forward and seized him in her arms, and wept over him as if her heart would break. Sigismund took her by the arm and led her away and into the house. And some of the thralls picked up the rude bier and carried the dead after them, and Freyda and Gunhild followed, weeping together.

Then Bjorne turned to the sailors, saying, without a quiver in his voice, though his lips were pale and his eyes wet with tears that he fought back as only an old Viking could:

"How came you to be beaten by the Danes, Algar, and yet escape from their clutches?"

Harald and the others crowded round as the battle-scarred seaman made reply:

"It is very simple, Earl Bjorne. We took the Swallow straight to Denmark and up the creek to Valstran's lair, for your sons were eager to avenge their uncle's death before Harald should return to North-hold and come to their aid; and, having news of our coming, the Dane met us with two long ships filled with men, and attacked us in the narrows of the creek. We fought stubbornly, I can tell you, Earl, and none of us so well as Sigismund, who saved his brother a full score times before Valstran slew him with the swinging axe. As they numbered three men to each one of us and boarded us from both sides at once, Sigismund gave word, when Olaf fell, to be going home, and we cut the grappling chains and got away, and being the swiftest vessel of the three, left Valstran raging on the high seas. That is all, Earl Bjorne."

There was a moment's silence, and then old Bjorne raised his right hand to the heavens and swore by Odin that if Valstran lived to see next Yuletide, he would go to meet him despite his age and stiffness of limb.

"Ay, though he slay me with the same axe with which he has slain my son Olaf and my brother Asli, I will try my steel on him!" he cried.

"He shall not be alive next Yuletide, father," said Sigismund, who had come out of the house with Harald's mother, Freyda, "for even one-armed as I am, I will yet have revenge on him. Thanks be to the gods that it is my right arm that is whole and sound."

"And I, too, will go!" cried Harald—"I, who would have gone before but that you two were too quick for me, and my father's old ship was burnt. Men call me Long-sword in derision, because I carry the blade that old Thrunna the armourer made just before he died, and will have no other. They laugh at me because I have as yet done no deed of valour that entitles me to wear the golden wings, but I tell you all that I shall do a deed yet that will make you old warriors burn with envy, and make my long sword a name in the land!"

Old Bjorne raised his hand to the heavens.

"If you also will rashly throw away your life and leave me alone with little Thelma," said Freyda sadly, "woe is me. But as it is my own unfortunate face that has wrought this mischief—for Valstran was an old love of mine, and for that slew Asli—it is, perhaps, decreed that on me must fall the greatest burden. Go, Harald, and may the Hammer-Thrower guard thee!"

And the pale-faced woman, still beautiful despite her years, bent and kissed Harald on the forehead, and then left them.

Long after supper that night the men sat and talked over their plans of retaliation, and many were the foaming horns of good, strong, home-brewed ale that they emptied ere they were satisfied to seek their couches and a needed sleep. And this is what they decided.

Digitized by Google

As the Swallow was not fit to take out without repair, they would launch the new ship that had just been built at North-hold—the Walrus—and loading her with as many men as she could carry, set out the next day, and so come upon Valstran before he expected them. A good crew would more easily be got together now, because Harald and his men had returned from the inland, and his mother and all her household had come to live with Earl Bjorne at his great hall. There would be no lack of men, therefore, both to guard the house and to fill the Walrus with a staunch crew.

CHAPTER II.

The Were-Woman's Words.

Now Harald was in love with his cousin Gunhild—as, truth to tell, fair Gunhild was in love with him—and so, in the early dawn, before the war-worn men were astir, the son of Asli rose and went out across the fields to where the fjord broadened out into a gravel-shored lake of still, deep water, unfathomable as the dark blue eyes of his sister Thelma. It may have been that Harald went thither because he knew it to be a favourite walk of Gunhild's from when they played together as children, or it may not—these things are hard to say—but however it was, he had not long to wait before Gunhild also came tripping lightly down the home-path, her white arms locked upon the snowy coif that bound her glorious golden hair, and her blue eyes glancing merriment that not even last night's sorrow could dispel.

Their gaze fell on Harald and Gunhild.

And Harald, seeing her coming down the pasture edge, the colour of her cheeks out-matching the thousand pink and white flowers that she passed on her way, and the sweetness and charm of her lithe, supple figure blotting out for him the beauty of the dissolving mist in the hollows and the dew-hung gossamer tracery on the bushes by the water-side, thought that surely there was never so fair a maiden before in all Norseland!

And when she came blushing up to him, Harald sprang forward and clasped her in his great, strong arms and kissed her on the lips before she could resist—which, when she did, was very gently done.

"You are not angry with me, dear one?" questioned Harald, as the girl slipped out of his embrace, "not angry with one who has loved you ever since he can remember?"

"If I would be, I cannot, Harald!" said Gunhild, putting her hand in his again and a soft light gleaming from her blue eyes, "'twas only a maiden's bashfulness that made me draw back, and surely you know how to deal with that—if you have not yet won name and fame for my sake!"

Then Harald knew that she was his from that day henceforth, and a great joy seized him, and as sweet-lipped Gunhild nestled to him and he kissed and kissed again that lovely face which shone with pleasure pure as the light of the northern sky, he took vow by all the gods of Asgard that never would he rest till he had won fortune and renown and could claim her for his wife without fear of refusal from her father. And Gunhild was very happy in his love, and strengthened his resolve.

"I pray that the Nornas* have so decreed it," said she, "that you are the chosen to avenge Asli and Olaf, and in so doing to win the wings and then me; but," she went on, after he had kissed those pretty lips again, "I have some fear of my father's love of riches and the favours of some of his distant friends. You know that wealthy Turgrimm sent messengers some weeks ago to say that he would repeat his visit, and he is a man of great influence at the Folk-Thing, and will help the Earl with his land troubles if some boon be granted him in return."

"And it will be you whom he will want," cried Harald, his brow darkening like the brow of Thor the Thunderer when the storm-clouds gather; "and still I am fameless, and know of no quarrel I can pick with him. I am but a poor man."

"Yet have patience and hope, dear heart," said Gunhild gently, her slight fingers playing with the drooping yellow curls upon his upper lip; "you will make a beginning to-day to gain these things you lack, and while you are gone I will pray unceasingly to Wunsch to grant your desires—for it would be a hard lot for me, Harald, if I had to be the bride of another, though I dare not tell the Earl, my father, as much."

Then the two young lovers, happy while the sun shone on their early lives, sat down awhile on a large stone at the foot of the rising ground, and talked of much that would be very interesting to hear, but most profitless to write, and then parted and went home by different ways.

Now, so engrossed were Gunhild and Harald with their own company whilst they were talking together, that neither of them noticed a fierce-faced woman, with matted hair, crouching just behind the bushes, nor heard the slight movement of her feet on the ground when she bent nearer to catch the import of their conversation. And had either of them known that she was there, their hearts would not have pulsed so lightly that morning, for every thrall and freeman in the garth and homestead of North-hold knew the evil repute, and stood in awe of the ill-will and dire spells of Svenda, the witch, the Were-woman, who was so clever at reading obscure runes, and foretelling death and disaster and plague. And very few there were, excepting the evil-minded—who bought her questionable aid in times of need by various presents—who cared to pass her cave in the hill above the Rainbow Falls at night or alone.

She was early up and about that morning, having doubtless seen some of the commotion of yestereve, and it would have sent a thrill of horror through anyone to have seen the ghoul-like glitter of her fiery, deep-set eyes when their gaze fell on Harald and Gunhild sitting in converse on the mossy stone.

She drew near to them like a cat stealing on her prey, remaining quite still until they rose to depart, making no sound even when she stretched forward to hear more distinctly, and in so doing espied a young stint running out of a hemlock shrub towards the lake margin for his morning meal of water-flies. Fearing that they might glance that way and see her if he ran across where she crouched, Svenda rose up a moment and breathed an incantation silently with her lips, and cast her hands vindictively towards him, so that the merry little creature stopped in his career and shivered from snout to tail, and rolled over and, with a feeble gasp, expired. Svenda shrank back to her crouching position, waiting till the two parted, then rose and ambled clumsily but swiftly after Gunhild, overtaking the light-hearted girl at the stone across the brook.

"You seem merry of mien this morning, proud one," said the Were-woman, laying her scraggy hand on Gunhild's shoulder, "very merry, considering that death is in your house! For I know, you see, my ruddy-haired one,

* The Nornas were the Three Fates—past, present, future—of the Norse mythology.

Digitized by Google

though the news was spoken to me by no human lips, and all shun me as the people of the southlands shun keen-biting Thrymm.* Ha! ha!" and she laughed horribly.

Gunhild quailed a moment, then tossed her head haughtily and would have gone on, but the Were-woman continued:

"Be not in haste to leave me, pretty one—you have stayed long with your lover—and I can soon tell you that which I came to say. You sent me from your door—you and your stern mother—when I came begging to you; sent me away with scorn and anger when I offered to read the future for you; and for that I hate all you Bjornes, and you, milk-faced one, all the more because love smiles on your path. Silly wench! I tell you that a sea of blood and tears is awaiting you and your fameless lover, and hardly shall he win you at the end."

"Let me pass, wretched woman!" cried Gunhild, pushing aside the bony hand that was outstretched to clutch and detain her, "let me pass, for I trust Odin more than to believe your evil tale."

"Ay! go, girl," said the Were-woman, with a mocking gesture, "go your way and meet your troubles as you will! Death and sorrow and blood—red, streaming blood—are foredoomed to fall upon you and your love and your house, and the smell of the crimson gore is already in the air and on the fields and the crops! And in the day of your desolation remember the Were-woman of the cave and know that she is laughing at you—laughing!—as she laughed when your Olaf came in dead! Ay, go, and let that be your comfort!"

But Gunhild had leaped the brook, and with fingers to her ears had sped away out of reach of the cursing hag into the home-garden, and so, with an evil smile and a strange arm-crossing motion, the Were-woman turned and was gone.

CHAPTER III.

The Treachery of Turgrimm.

The Walrus was let down her sliding planks and out upon rollers into the fjord, her virgin timbers raising a curving cloud of spray about her figure-head as her prow clove the still waters. A faint cheer went up from the little crowd gathered to watch her depart.

Harald and Sigismund stood high in the stern as the rowers pulled the long ship out into the mid-channel, and as far as they could be seen from the landing-place remained there, waving their swords in the sunlight in parting token to the women-folk they left behind, neither of the cousins speaking until the great cliffs were rounded and the only living thing in view was an osprey circling slowly in the clear air.

Then Harald said, with hand on his cousin's arm:

"We have seen the last of North-hold, Sigismund, and of all those near and dear to us, unless we slay the Dane."

And Sigismund answered that that was his thought, too, and then, too full for much speech, strode forward and sat silent on a coil of rope, with his back to the bulwark.

So they sailed on down that wild, rugged coast of jutting rocks and deep inlets, and after many days came to the mouth of the Sound. Late one afternoon the keen eyes of Eric discovered two ships scudding along southward before the rising gale.

It did not take long for the Vikings to be alert and at their posts, and for full sail to be put on despite the risk of a coming storm. As the Walrus leapt through the water after the flying ships like a living creature after her prey, Sigismund, standing up in the prow in the full brunt of the sea-spume cloud that rose from the sharp-cutting keel, recognised the ships as the ships of Valstran and cried out to the rowers to out their blades and bend to their work like men.

"The wolf has not yet returned to his lair!" he said to Harald, as the two tested their weapons afresh and the latter lovingly polished that long sword of his that was as yet new to its work, "he will therefore be short of some of his men. We must catch him out here in the open sea if the Aegar will let us."

"Let the Aegar come and bring what storm he will," replied Harald, "we shall get up with yonder vessels, for I see they are not over swift. Pull, you hardy warriors, pull! Put your muscles into it, and with our steel and the tempest's fury we will leave the ships of yonder Dane a couple of wrecks before the night be gone."

But little need was there to urge on those lusty Vikings! They burnt for revenge as much as their two leaders, and very soon the Walrus drew close up under the stern of the rearmost Dane, the bellying sails and the long, powerful sweeps of the big oars sending the great ship churning through the water at matchless speed, the salt sleet dashing halfway across her deck before its wet advance was checked by the breath of the storm that howled behind.

The Walrus.

Now Valstran was a wily sailor, and seeing that he could not get away from the enemy, waited with hand on the steering-oar and eye on the main-sail of his own ship till the Walrus came foaming on like some great avenging monster through the tempest-tossed and white-crested sea, and just as the long, gleaming tusk of the walrus head grazed his stern, gave word to furl sails and draw in blades, and the other vessel following suit, the two parted slightly and suddenly slowed down, while the Norse ship came ploughing on between them unable to stop, and the two keels mowed down the banks of oars and threw the rowers into confusion. And ere Harald could get his men into order, the grappling chains were cast and secured, some one sent a long axe tearing through the sail, splitting it cornerwise, and from both sides the boarders leapt upon them and began the fight.

It was a wild encounter, that of the avenging Norsemen and the desperate Danes, plying their heavy axes and keen swords on each other there in the mid ship of the three, that bound together, rose and fell with the up and down heave of the raging sea, the sound of the strife now rising harsh and strong above the whistle of the wind in the cordage and anon being drowned in the angry roar of the storm and the lash of the driven rain.

But the men of North-hold soon recovered from their momentary panic, and being at least as many in number as the others, drove them back a space, making better foothold for themselves, and for a time held their own against the plundering sea-rovers of Valstran.

Then the Dane, full of evil resource, bade some of his men cut down the mast of his smallest ship so that it would fall crosswise on the deck of the Walrus, and though skilful Eric saw the foul trick and laid low three of the men with

* Thrymm, God of Frost.

Digitized by Google

his arrows, down came the broken, splintering pole full across the deck, bringing with it what little sail was left up and falling with a sounding crash into the midst of the struggling Norsemen.

Algar, and Hrolf the Ready-Witted, and Edred the Silent, and three more, all good men of North-hold and trusty servants of Bjorne, were stricken down under the hammer-like blow of that mast, and Valstran and his Danes, seizing their chance, leapt over the barrier it formed and plunged into the backward-surging crowd of their foes with shouts of victory.

Harald and Sigismund were forced off their feet by the rush and carried helpless before it to the stern ere they got the use of their arms again, and then so blinding was the flying spray and so keen the blast of the tempest, which had now veered round to the south-west, that it was difficult to distinguish one foe from another and their hands could scarcely hold their weapons. The night had also come down on the sea, dark as Hela and full of lowering storm-clouds and incessant deluges of rain.

Yet Harald, standing high on the woodwork to see where Valstran fought, if possible, caught a glimpse, as the three ships rose on the boiling crest of a great wave, of a long, high-ended vessel just sliding down the front of another billow to windward, coming along under bare poles. Raising his voice, Harald roared a lusty hail into the wild grey night as the ships plunged into the trough of the sea again, and the other sank from view, and presently the huge wooden beak of a hawk came through the foam to starboard, and an answering hail as the long ship drew out and was passing.

Harald rushed forward, long-sword in hand.

"In the name of Odin, from what parts do you come, who can fight in this storm?"

"'Tis I, Harald, late of Svolvaer, with sundry friends, and we are at war with Valstran the Dane," cried Gunhild's cousin, wondering where he had heard that rasping voice before. "Come and help us, for we are sore pressed, and this Valstran has no more honour than a wild beast!"

"And why should I help you, Harald Aslison?" sneered the rasping voice out of the dull greyness of the storm, "I, Turgrimm, have no quarrel with the Dane."

"If it is Turgrimm, you have," roared Harald back again as well as he could across the seething cauldron of the ocean, "for Asli my father, Gunhild's uncle, lies dead at this Valstran's hands, with others dear to her and me."

As it happened, this was the worst thing Harald could have said to the old Viking bully of the Hawk, who himself had designs on Gunhild, and had noticed, on his former visit to North-hold, how the son of Asli had watched the daughter of Bjorne as she went about the household duties, and so, instead of trying to put about and beat back to the rescue, Turgrimm held on his way, shouting in derision as the distance widened that he had no time that night to stop his vessel and share in the conflict in aid of a rash young boaster of no fame.

One glance only Harald caught of a grim, surly-faced old man with most repulsive eye, standing in the stem of his ship, and then the storm and the blackness swallowed up the sight, and with it all hope of relief.

As he sprang down into the fight again Harald saw with dismay that his men were slowly giving back, that Sigismund was sorely wounded and hard-pressed because of the loss of his left arm, and that Valstran raged along the deck with victorious fury, his long, heavy battleaxe finding none strong enough to bar its progress.

Harald rushed forward, long-sword in hand, and met the Dane, there was a short passage of arms, and down came that swinging, shining, red-dripping axe through the rain, its keen edge catching his plain helm sideways, throwing him to the deck.

And as he fell Harald caught sight of a rush of faces and heard the clash of clanging steel, and then all was dark and still.

CHAPTER IV.

The Bribing of Bjorne.

The day was bright and clear, though chilly for the season, when the Hawk forged up the road before North-hold, and there let down her anchor. A goodly number of vikings and servants, well laden with costly presents for his host, followed Turgrimm to the great hall, and when he met the old Earl the sinister-looking suitor for Gunhild smiled a smile that was evil to see.

He came at a most opportune time he thought, and the only rival he seriously feared was by then, he hoped, a good many fathoms under the waves off the Danish coast: so he was determined that golden-haired Gunhild, whether she liked him or not, should go back with him as his wife.

They had buried Olaf when he arrived, and in honour of the guest's wealth and rank, Earl Bjorne had a good supper laid at night in the hall, and feasted Turgrimm to his heart's content. Long they drank and talked, and loudly the men of Turgrimm laughed as the strong ale warmed them to jollity, while the home-folk sat around for the most part soberly silent, full of the sorrow of the last days, and of thought for their heroes away.

Digitized by Google

Editha, and Gunhild, and Freyda left the banqueters ere the night was far gone, and then one by one the men stole out or fell asleep beside their empty cups; and when Turgrimm saw this he signed to the old Earl and drew him apart to the far end of the long room, and there told his errand.

Old Bjorne stroked his grizzly chin, sorely troubled; he well knew his guest's desire, and how much he himself stood in need of assistance to get hold of that piece of land he coveted, yet he loved Gunhild well, and more dearly now that one of his sons was taken from him and the other in equal danger.

"You know, Earl," went on Turgrimm in his rasping unpleasant voice, "that my word and will carry great weight at the Thing, for I have much land and am rich, and if you want those fertile acres down by the lakeside yonder for your own—well, they shall be yours, I swear, if you will grant me Gunhild for my wife."

"Give her to you, I might," said Bjorne, "but think you that of her own free will she will choose you?"

"That must be seen," answered the other with a grim smile, "and will be seen shortly, but first give your consent, that I may have a fair chance, for she is a dutiful daughter, I trow."

"Ay," said the old man thoughtfully gazing down the dimly-lighted hall where the revellers lay snoring on the trestle tables; "ay, a very dutiful girl, Turgrimm, and I trust that she will look on you with favour. For the rest, tell her that I am willing, and after she has decided we will talk again."

"So be it," said Turgrimm, as kindly as his rough tongue would allow, and then Bjorne led his guest to the sleeping chamber set apart for strangers, and left him for the night.

Now Gunhild was up early the next morning, more with idea to get away from the house and find some solitude in which to think on her besetting danger than for any other reason, and early, too, was Turgrimm. Not far from the gravel shore of the lake where she and Harald had told their love, the Viking caught her up and poured into her ear such clumsy words and phrases as with him did duty for a declaration of undying affection and regard.

"Pretty one!" he said awkwardly, while the girl shrank from his touch. "You are not frightened at me surely; at me—who am wealthy and can grant all that your fancy may desire?"

"You cannot make me love you," said Gunhild, edging away at each step he made towards her, "and as for your riches, keep them, or bestow them on some old woman of your own age."

"You are sharp of tongue, my pretty one," cried Turgrimm, attempting and failing to seize the slender fingers between his own; "but I pray you to think twice before you refuse me, for your father has given his consent, and mine you will have to be whether you will or no, because my will knows no bending to another's!"

This and much more he said more or less clumsily, but Gunhild was not moved to aught save alternate laughter and scorn, and at last slipped past him and flew down the path towards home with a heavy heart, and left the Viking standing there by the lake with a black scowl on his evil face and mortification and rage and stern resolve in his evil heart.

Early that day he sought out Earl Bjorne, and with a very bad grace told him of his failure, and demanded that Gunhild be given to him forthwith, and the wedding-day fixed as soon as the women-folk could be ready.

"I would fain wait till Sigismund and Harald come home," said the old Earl hesitatingly. "To give up Gunhild will be a heavy price for this land."

"Then to this land that you want—and that is very good and desirable land"—put in the crafty Turgrimm, "and to all the rich cloth-stuffs and jewels I have brought you, and the aid of my fighting men in all your future quarrels or needs, I will add a new long ship from my own building-shed—a ship that shall be fleeter than any now on Viking cruise."

Right skilfully he worked on the one weak place in the old Earl's mind—the love of money that was his one besetting sin—and so, though inwardly ill at ease, Bjorne gave the promise at last on condition that Turgrimm, on his part, fulfilled his offer. It was a heavy bribe for a girl in those warlike times, and, to do him justice, Bjorne thought that with a man who was ready to give so much for her, Gunhild could not well be unhappy.

Turgrimm went about with a most insufferable air of mastery the next few days, though he was not at Gunhild's side so much as an accepted suitor should be, nor so happy when there as another who was far away would have been. He felt a strange uneasiness about the possibilities of some survivor from the sea-fight coming to condemn him and snatch the prize away just when it was within his grasp, and he was ever urging on the submissive Bjorne—who was already counting his gain—to hasten the ceremony, that he might sail away to Dertheim and there instal Gunhild as the mistress of his home.

But the women would not be hurried. They disliked the overbearing thane and spared no ingenuity to delay the fateful hour, and some sharp words had Bjorne heard from Editha, and many tearful intreaties from Gunhild herself, who longed with all her soul for Harald's return; and much work had he to keep peace between the men of North-hold and the followers of his guest, which latter the servants treated with such scant courtesy that they almost lived apart—two factions under one roof.

The days went on; there was no sign of the absent cousins, no further excuse for putting off the wedding feast, and so one sunny morning miserable Gunhild woke to find that it was her marriage-day, and that before night she would be aboard the Hawk and leaving her home perhaps for ever, united to a man she loathed.

Very bitter were her thoughts as her maid Iduna dressed her for the day and combed her long, luxuriant golden locks and put the silver shoes upon her feet and bade her carry a cheerful face for her own sake; and heavy as a band of lead and hateful as a slave's fetters felt the golden hoop set with diamonds that Turgrimm had brought for her to wear upon her queenly head in honour of the event of becoming his bride.

Sad and silent Gunhild went down to the feast, and melancholy sat the invited guests round the tables, while Turgrimm ate and drank with boisterous mirth and cracked coarse jokes at which only himself and his men laughed, and Bjorne hung his head even while thinking of his future possessions, and Editha and Freyda sat together, disdainful of the scene. From the first feast the company were to adjourn to the marriage-room for the nuptials to be performed, and Gunhild dreaded the rising from the table, and hoped that the meal would be well prolonged.

"If Harald would only return!" she cried out to herself in the anguish of her soul. "If Harald would only return—if, indeed, he will ever return!"

Turgrimm, whose hateful presence was near her, heard the stifled cry which she could not suppress, and turned to her with a brimming beaker uplifted to his lips.

"Harald, my pretty one, will never return, for he must be under the sea by this, or he would be here! Drink, sweet one, to his good fortune in Odin's Hall!"

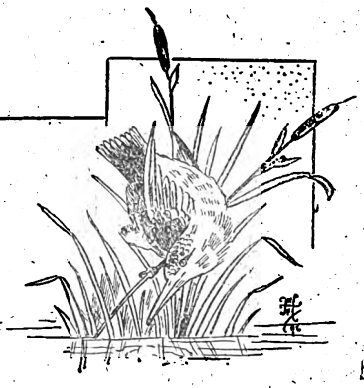
Not an atom of the keen sting of the sarcastic words of the half-drunken Viking escaped Gunhild, and with a sudden access of anger and disgust, she seized the cup nearest to her hand and dashed the contents in his leering face.

With a wild oath the amazed Turgrimm rose spluttering to his feet, and at that instant the great oaken door was flung wide open, and a man strode into the hushed room.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

THE FLOWERED PLATE.



I STILL remember well a horrible story of the invasion which my nurse used to tell me when I was a child.

It was of the first German invasion, in 1814.

My nurse's grandmother was a poor old woman who lived in a cabin in the middle of a forest, somewhere near La Fère. This charming person was quite toothless, covered with innumerable wrinkles, and as withered and yellow as an old poplar. The country folk were ignorant of her exact age. Her husband had been a soldier in the Guards, and if in a gay mood, she would willingly, when out gathering wood, tell many a tale of the old days, when the Duke of Orleans was Regent.

Marianne was sixty-five years old, at least. Her husband had been dead for many years; he was killed, she said, at Valmy. Her only daughter was in service in the town, and she lived quite alone in her cabin, subsisting wretchedly from day to day upon such stray pickings as she could steal from under the bushes when the gamekeepers' backs were turned.

One day there was great excitement in the village near Marianne's home. The woodmen stood about all the day long, open-mouthed, with their hatchets idle in their hands, watching the retreating remnant of the French army pass through the village. There were the old grenadiers, with drooping moustachios, soiled, torn uniforms, and ragged gaiters; there were the artillerymen, with their caps drawn down over their ears; their horses were dragging along painfully the empty, dull-rumbling waggons. The gallant cuirassiers stooped and drooped upon their steeds, and many a dent could be detected in their armour. All these passed like a whirlwind, pell-mell. It was a melancholy sight.

On the following morning at daybreak, some peasants knocked at Marianne's door.

"Quick, Marianne! be quick!" cried they; "let us save ourselves; the Uhlans are coming!"

"The Uhlans cannot harm me, my poor friends," replied Marianne, "for I have nothing to lose."

So Marianne remained alone in the forest. She went out, as usual, into the woods, returned with her apron full of dry branches, and proceeded to set about her little bit of cooking. She began by unhooking her large pot, which she placed upon the fire in preparation for her evening meal.

The old woman had not spoken the exact truth in asserting that she had nothing to lose. The only plate she possessed was a very beautiful specimen of delf ware, patterned with blue flowers. This plate was the only one of its kind in all the forest land, and it had been the cherished ornament of the cabin for the last fifteen years. Marianne prized it above everything else.

* * * * *

Two hours later, the foremost scouts of the enemy made their appearance. There was the thud of horses' feet, the scrunch of dead leaves, the sound of breaking branches; finally, a violent banging upon the door of the tiny, tumble-down cottage.

A German officer stood there, covered with dust. His epaulettes were concealed beneath a large cloak.

"Hallo!" said he, in French, "you do not appear to be particularly rich here. But I suppose that you can find a man something to eat?"

"Indeed, monsieur," replied the woman, "I have nothing. If you ask but a little, it is yet too much. I have nothing—nothing at all!"

"You lie!" said the officer roughly. "Why is that pot upon the fire?"

"I was going to make a little broth, monsieur."

"Very good. Make your broth; it will do very well for Hermann! Take in this man, and feed him for me; give him your broth, bread, and bacon. We will return this way to-morrow."

Hermann fastened his horse to a tree, and the rest of the troop disappeared in the direction of the town, in search of wealthier prey.

The Uhlan strode with heavy tread into the cabin, and by means of expressive gestures demanded food. He was hungry, for His Majesty's soldiers did not dine every day.

Marianne brought out all her table-vessels; a hunting-cup which had belonged to her husband, a wooden bowl, a cracked glass, and the famous flowered plate.

Hermann demanded food, and because the broth was not yet quite ready, he flew into a terrible passion; he stormed and fumed, broke up the chairs, smashed the glass, and buried his knife up to the handle in the table of white wood.

Meanwhile, the old woman, trembling in every limb, and with tightly set jaws (teeth she had none!) was stirring with a wooden spoon the contents of her pot, which was droning a monotonous song over the fire of vine-branches.

All the time that she was doing this, and attending to her pot, in which great bubbles were now forming upon the surface of the liquid, she kept her eye upon the blue plate—her precious, flowered plate—which she momentarily expected to see shattered and added to the Prussian's hecatomb.

Digitized by Google

In order to avert this disaster, she laid upon the plate a small piece of bacon and a roll of bread. Hermann attacked these viands ferociously. He ate and ate; until the bread had vanished, and the bacon was but a dream. Yet the Uhlan hungered still. With a gesture of demand, he fixed his eyes upon the pot still singing upon the fire.

The woman again put a little bread and a small piece of bacon—all of the latter that remained to her—upon the blue plate. Then she went softly, softly, back to her pot.

With a satisfied air, she gave her spoon one more turn. The broth was boiling furiously; enormous bubbles were dancing madly all over its surface.

It was a great exertion to lift off the great pot. It took all Marianne's strength, all her care, to carry it steadily in her two hands. The Uhlan was still engrossed in the consumption of the bread and bacon, although, doubtless, enjoying also the appetising odour wafted from the uncovered pot behind him, in which the broth was murmuring its last strains.

The old woman hobbled towards her unwelcome guest, taking extreme care to make no sound, and bearing with great difficulty the full pot. Painfully she lifted it behind the man's head. Hermann, utterly unconscious of her proximity and his own peril, continued his meal. Then, with one supreme effort, she turned the pot upside down over his head, and the boiling liquid flowed all over him.

He fell, his whole body horribly scalded, his head still completely covered by the great pot.

Old Marianne, locking the door of her cabin behind her, went forth calmly into the forest.

That is how my nurse's grandmother saved her flowered plate. LE VIER.

Lorry, Mamie, and I.

LORRY is a dog, Mamie is the sweetest creature that ever trod on earth, and I am I.

I first met Mamie at a crowded ballroom, and sat out a delightful dance with her. I am a very nervous man, and every word that Mamie said caused my heart to jump; nevertheless, just as her next partner was coming up to claim her, I managed to ask her if she would allow me to visit her.

"Yes," she called back over her shoulder, "No. 3. And—come soon."

I saw her partner turn round and look at me, and the expression on his face wasn't pleasant. I couldn't bear to see Mamie dancing with anyone else, and so I went away.

A day or two later I was walking about in the vicinity of No. 3. I had passed and repassed the house many times, and was suffering from nervous excitement. My heart was fluttering within me, and my feet almost refused to carry me. At last I summoned up my fast oozing courage, sprang up the massive steps with the same feelings as one who visits the dentist, and rang at the bell. There, it was done. There was no chance of escape; already the butler was at the door.

Was Mamma at home? No, she was out. Was Mamie at home? Yes, she was. Er, oh, yes, and before I had time to say a word I found the door had closed behind me.

There was no possible escape, for already we were at the drawing-room door. A moment later the butler came back again. Mamie would be in in a few minutes; would I take a chair?

I looked round for the most effective seat for me to sit in. Yes, this will do nicely; I will be in this position when she comes in. What had I better be doing though? An album of photographs; nothing could be better. I began turning over the leaves, and wondering if I should come across Mamma. Good gracious, supposing that this fat old lady was she! If Mamie was going to grow up like that!

I suddenly began to wonder whether my tie was straight; should I have time to steal over to the looking glass and have an inspection? I lay down the book and creep across the room. Yes, everything is irreproachable. Not a hair on my head is rough, my frock coat is perfect—stay! A speck of dust on the sleeve. I take my handkerchief and carefully remove it. Then I have to arrange my handkerchief again in my pocket.

All this takes time, and before I am able to get back to my chair again, I hear a voice outside; a silvery voice, evidently speaking to a dog.

"Now, Lorry, be a good boy. Whatever happens don't bark or snap. Lorry, come back, sir."

Before I have fairly had time to reach my chair again, and hurriedly take up my book (my position must have looked most affected) the door opens, and a dog bounds in—an absurd little toy dog, its ridiculous body covered with long hair, with only two twinkling eyes to be seen.

In two bounds the animal is on me; "Lorry" as Mamie calls him. He springs on to my photo album, swarms all over me, rumples my hair, and in a twinkling is back again to his mistress.

"Lorry, come back, sir! How dare you!" and in another minute I am holding Mamie's hand. She is a sweet little piece of womanhood; so rosy, and soft, and childlike.

"I have never known him do such a thing as that before," she explains. "He is usually so naughty, and snaps and bites at strangers. It shows you must be very fond of dogs—and very good-tempered." She drops her eyes as she says this and a maidenly blush steals over her face. It matches some red flowers she's wearing in her belt.

I wonder where she got those roses from. I wonder if any other fellow gave them to her. Presently I ask her this.

"They came out of the garden," she replies. "Would you like to come and see them?"

She leads the way out of the low window, and across the lawn, on to the rose beds.

"Look. That red bud would just suit your buttonhole," and she reaches over to pick it.

Digitized by Google

"Oh!" she cries suddenly, "its thorns have caught my sleeve. Do release me!"

She is wearing some kind of lace frill which is hanging down over her hands. I pretend to be unentangling this, but really pin it on to two more thorns, and hold her captive. What a soft little hand it seems, as it touches my great strong ones! I whisper something into her ear, and once more her blush matches the rose; then I release her hand, and we go back to the house again, forgetting all about my buttonhole.

Mamie goes off to hunt for Mamma. I am about to sit effectively down in my chair again, when I find the dog, Lorry, has taken my seat. Now's my chance.

"I will teach you to jump upon me again, my sweet little thing," I cry, and look round for my stick. Stick and hat have disappeared, but something shining under the sofa catches my eye. It's my new Gibus, completely ruined. Under another chair I see the nob of my stick.

I seize my stick, and catch the dog, and draw him to my chair. I am about to give him the soundest flogging he ever received when the door opens, and Mamie came in.

"See," I cry, "what a playful little dog. He wants me to throw my stick for him."

"Good boy," says Mamie. "Sweet little dog! He does seem to be fond of you. Mamma has just gone out," she resumes..

Happy chance! Then I may come again to see her? When? "Let me see. To-day's Tuesday. Say Thursday, at this time."

Thursday. Two whole days! I groan inwardly.

On Wednesday I find myself irresistibly attracted to the street where No. 3 is situated. I wander up and down for a long while, and presently my patience is rewarded. I see Mamie and Lorry coming straight towards me. Lorry sees me at once and in a moment rushes to meet me. A twinkling of the eye, and his muddy paws have rendered me unfit to be seen.

Mamie is very sorry. How fond the dog is of me though. Then she smiles and bows, and is gone. "To-morrow at three," she calls back over her shoulder.

I go to-morrow at three, and meet Mamma, and everything is going satisfactorily.

After this I go a great many times, and gradually my nervousness disappears.

But at last the day comes when I set out for No. 3, quaking as I never quaked before. For hours I wander up and down in front of the house, until the jeers of a street boy drive me in. I spring up the steps and ring the bell without giving myself time to think.

Is Mamma in? No, she's out. Is Mamie in? Yes. I bound up the stairs, and burst into the drawing-room, and then almost faint with fear. Mamie is here already, holding Lorry in her arms, looking so childish and pretty that I am more in love than ever.

"Oh, I am so glad you've come," she cries, "do you know I was just thinking of you. I was really. I was just thinking how nice it would be if I was to give you Lorry. He always seems so fond of you and I thought —if you would take him — do, please now; for my sake."

Here was a chance! I should be nothing less than mad if I did not take it. I grew redder and redder, and mumbled beneath my breath. Lorry, surprised at my extraordinary expression, barked sharply.

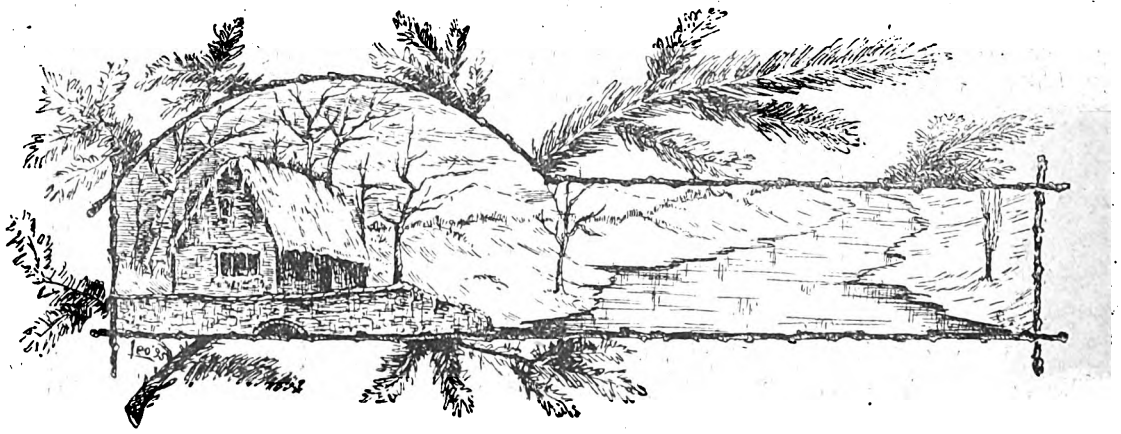
"See" I cried. "Lorry doesn't want us to part. Listen how he barks at the idea." I fell on my knees, and grew redder and redder.

"Mamie, dear, must we three ever part? Couldn't we——"

* * * * *

Lorry and Mamie and I have never parted since. I allow Lorry to live because if it hadn't been for him I should never have won my wife. When he sees me now, however, he takes care not to jump on me.

J. Marcus.



Digitized by Google

The Tiger Slayer.

WHILE travelling through the States of Mirandea, in New Venezuela, I made the acquaintance of a man who was known as Manuel the Tiger-hunter, and one day had the opportunity of accompanying him on one of his perilous excursions.

It was about three o'clock in the morning when we reached the mountain which was our destination, and after about half-an-hour's farther walking, my strange companion paused at a turn in the narrow path which we were then pursuing, and I felt rather than saw that the dawn of a new day was close at hand.

There was a strange stir in the air, as though the feeble breath of life had come back to dead, inanimated nature. Over the eastern mountain tops the stars were growing pale. The first faint, grey tinge of dawn was coming, a long way off.

Day advanced slowly. I noted this with surprise, for all the books I had read, which gave a description of dawn in the tropics, had asserted unanimously that day came with a bound, out of the blackness of the night.

Perhaps the writers of these descriptions had waited until the sun had already reddened the eastern sky before watching for the dawn, for from the time when I noticed the first faint, grey streaks in the sky, until the sun was actually shining on the mountain tops, fully an hour elapsed.

I could have remained watching the coming day for another hour, at least, but as soon as it was light enough to see surrounding objects, Manuel carefully chose a spot which I could occupy during the impending gladiatorial contest.

The coign of vantage was the peak of high rock, which almost overhung the path which he eventually chose, and with some difficulty climbed to the top of it.

Nature, I thought, must have intended the rock for some such purpose as this, for it gave an unobstructed view of the path for some distance on each side, and I could hardly have missed seeing any animal walking upon it, for a considerable distance.

There was plenty of evidence, too, that the advantage of this peak, as a look-out station, had been appreciated and used by other hunters than man. Indications showed that wild beasts, presumably tigers, had crouched there in wait for unsuspecting prey.

This discovery did not fail to give me a mild sensation. I might be reasonably safe from the attack of a tiger in the path below; but I hesitated, when I speculated upon the consequences likely to ensue if a tiger came up, and found me occupying his own private and particular look-out.

As soon as I had comfortably concealed myself behind the rock, although in a position that permitted me to keep careful watch upon the exposed parts of the path, Manuel disappeared. He was standing behind the base of a rock one moment, and the very next instant he had vanished. He must have gone like a serpent, for I heard no sound.

Then I was alone on a tiger's favourite resort in an uninhabited South American forest. It was hardly a pleasant sensation, especially as my revolver seemed to be, as doubtless it was, a very inadequate weapon. A suspicion might have crossed my mind that Manuel had left me there as a bait for a tiger, but I would not give it a moment's credence.

There were noises on the mountain-side by this time, and some of them so distinct that I could distinguish them. Small animals were scampering about in the undergrowth, and birds were calling in the trees. A commotion among the birds down the path attracted my attention, and I wondered if a tiger had stirred them up, or if Manuel had strayed as far away as that.

A few moments later there was another commotion in the distance on the other side of me, but I gave little heed to it. On the right-hand side of the path, a small creature, something like a woodchuck, stopped short in his leisurely morning walk, and sniffed suspiciously at the air. I was to leeward of him in the light breeze that had sprung up, and so he could not have scented me. He sniffed a moment in the direction of the first disturbance, and then suddenly dived headlong into the undergrowth.

Digitized by Google

Assuredly there was something off to windward that he was afraid of.

The disturbance ceased after a time, and then the mountain side was still again.

Looking down over the rock a few moments later, I found Manuel gazing up at me. He pointed to the left in the direction of the second disturbance and again disappeared. It is probable that on this occasion he hid himself in the undergrowth alongside of the path.

I gave my undivided attention to the distant fluttering of birds. It was a curious sort of circus that the birds were having. The little things circled about in the tops of the trees and screamed shrilly one to the other. It might have been a huge snake that frightened and fascinated them, or it might have been a tiger. Manuel knew, in all probability, but it made no sign.

The disturbance came a little nearer, but it seemed to me that it moved very slowly. If a tiger were coming along the path he should, in my opinion, have made better time.

I calmed my impatience by assuring myself that if it were a tiger he would come fast enough when he once got wind of me.

It was a long half hour of suspense before the disturbance came within reasonable distance. Before half of that time had passed I was satisfied that something very objectionable to birds was walking leisurely along the path, and perhaps stopping now and then in hope of surprising one of the birds unawares.

At length the thing was just beyond the turn in the path. In a moment or two I should see what it was.

Then I became conscious that Manuel was standing in the path, with a short spear held in a horizontal position over his shoulder. This was interesting, and at the same time very suggestive.

I concentrated my entire nervous system in an intense contemplation of the turn in the path. The suspense was awful.

Ah! what was that? A striped and spotted animal suddenly stood out in the open. His tail swung slowly from side to side, and his smooth coat moved nervously with some passing emotion. It was the tiger of the South American forests. He had stopped with one foot advanced, and with his head in the attitude of attention. He had seen something in the path before him. It was Manuel, who was standing as immovable as the rock beside him.

It was a beautiful beast, all silk and softness and graceful curves. I thought it was a pity that so beautiful a thing should be hunted to death, but at the same time I reflected that this wonderfully beautiful exterior covered a nature that was the incarnation of ferocity.

I do not know how long Manuel and the tiger faced each other there in the narrow path like gladiators.

It seemed a very long time.

This was the test.

The tiger waited instinctively to see the strange thing before him turn and run away as everything else in the forest invariably did, but greatly to his surprise the thing stood its ground like an immovable rock. The tiger was king of the forest, and he knew it, and when he had made up his mind that this thing was not going to run, he came forward slowly to investigate. This was courage even in a wild brute, and I respected him for it. I doubt if the lion or the tiger of India has this unshakable nerve.

I looked at Manuel as the tiger came slowly and cautiously along the path. He stood like a bronze statue with his spear held over his right shoulder. Not so much as an eyelid moved.

I confess that during this trying time I was a bit nervous. This was a new way of hunting to me, and a decided novelty in the actions of a wild beast which had not been attacked. I should expect an attack from a grizzly bear after it had been wounded, but assuredly the bear would not take the aggressive as this lithe and beautiful beast was doing. I will acknowledge that my heart thumped against my blue flannel shirt so hard that I was afraid that the noise would attract the attention of the tiger.

Slowly came the tiger; like a rock stood Manuel. It looked as though the case had been reversed, and that the tiger, instead of the half-breed, was the hunter.

At length the tiger was within touching distance of the man.

He looked the bronze figure over from head to foot, and then thrust forward his head and sniffed at the man's feet. Back the great beast sprang like a steel spring. The figure was flesh and blood.

The tiger's tail twitched from side to side like a flail; the great jaws opened with a snarl. Quickly the beast measured his distance and crouched with quivering sinews for a spring. Such calm courage was grand beyond all description. It was matched only by the steadfast nerve of the man.

Now came the crisis.

I could see the huge muscles heaving under the striped skin. In another second the tiger would leap upon his prey.

In that instant the hunter made a motion with his left arm as quick as light itself. He tore the handkerchief from his neck and thrust it full in the tiger's face. Up went the tiger's head in a quiver of electrical amazement. Then the hunter's poised right arm shot forward with incredible force, and the spear buried itself half-way to the handle in the tiger's neck.

Ah, it was nobly done; and throughout it all, from the beginning until the wonderful ending, the hunter's nerve never faltered so much as by the hair's breadth. Before I could catch my breath, and swallow the lumps of apprehension that had risen unbidden in my throat, the fierce beast was dead in the path.

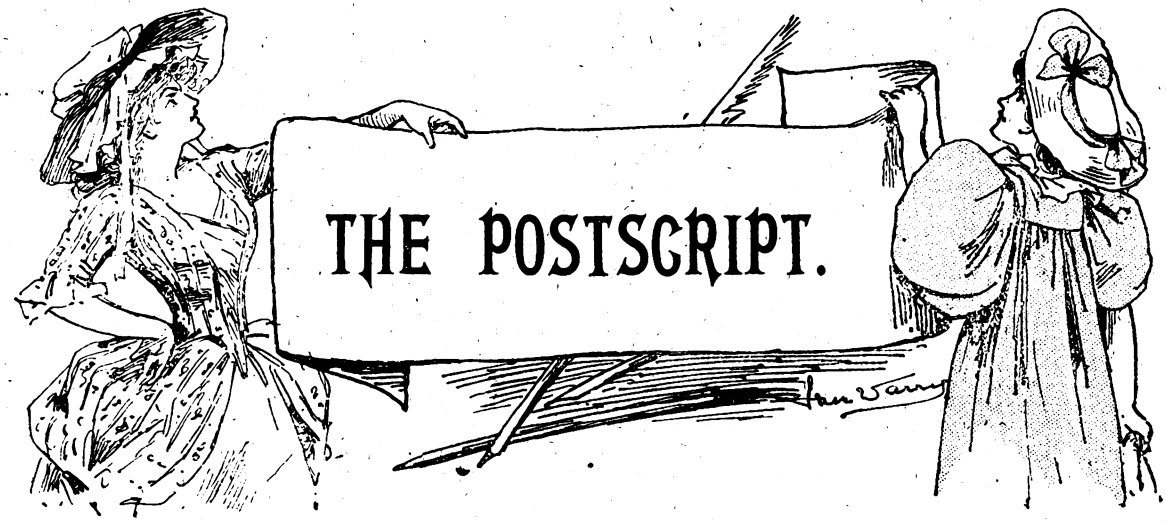
I scrambled down from the rock, and stood beside the dead forest king. Manuel picked up his handkerchief and pulled out his spear. There was a faint suggestion of a smile about his impassive face.

"Does the Señor Inglesi believe?" he asked.

"He does," I answered, and I gave him my hand in that universal brotherhood of which civilisation can never efface. By the side of that dead tiger the savage and the son of civilisation were on the one common level of man. There could be no difference.

Arnold Rees.

Digitized by Google



THE POSTSCRIPT.

Mlle. Pauline de Glanes had finished her shopping in the Rue Hausman, and was walking slowly up the shady side of the street, in the direction of her aunt's house in the Champs Elysées—her home for the next two months—when she became vaguely conscious that someone—a man—was following her.

Coming out of the fashionable photographer's further down the street, where she had gone to arrange for a sitting, she had narrowly escaped from colliding with a frock-coated, shiny-hatted, curly-haired young gentleman. In the short interval occupied by their mutual apologies she had had time to notice first that the boy—for he was really little more—had a great deal more than his share of good looks, and secondly, that he was regarding her with undisguised admiration.

Then she had gone on up the street, with an unmistakable blush on her cheeks, and a palpable quickening of the pulse beneath her slender wrist. She walked with the long graceful swing which is as common among the women of the stage as it is rare elsewhere. Her skirt, trimmed elaborately, but in perfect taste, seemed to move of itself in unison with her limbs, rather than be carried along with them. From the roses in the big hat which crowned her shapely head, to the pointed toes of her little morocco leather shoes she looked as charming as you could wish, and by the time she had reached No. 58, in the avenue, at least half-a-dozen men had fallen hopelessly in love with her.

As she stooped to put her key in the door she happened to glance down the avenue. The boy, whose appearance had been so forcibly impressed on her in the Rue Hausman, was standing at the corner gazing intently at her. She blushed violently and fumbled energetically at the key, (which, as luck would have it, seemed to have jammed), looked up again, impelled by some irresistible attraction, and caught the boy's gaze full, blushed still more, wrenched furiously at the key, and at last, with a desperate effort, turned it and disappeared within.

The moment the door closed behind her the boy advanced rapidly down the street, picked up the envelope which, unnoticed by her, had dropped from her pocket when she took out the key, carefully scrutinised the address, smiled, put the envelope into his breast pocket, and with a glance up at the windows of the house as if to impress it on his memory, lounged off down the street humming quietly to himself the chorus of the latest popular chanson.

* * * * *

"It's shameful! What sort of woman does he think I am? Oh, how I hate men!" and Pauline de Glanes' little French shoes beat a contemptuous tattoo on her bedroom carpet, and her little hands doubled up into dainty fists, suggesting that she would like to enter into violent physical warfare with the whole of the other sex then and there.

The innocent cause of this outburst lay, sublimely unconscious of the storm it had aroused, on her lap, the creamiest and roughest of creamy rough envelopes, addressed in a straggling masculine hand, with a corresponding sheet of note-paper protruding. Pauline pulled the letter out again, and half pouting, half crying, read it over for the sixth or seventh time. It was dated from the Club Olympique, and ran as follows:

Dear Mlle. de Glanes,—Pardon the liberty which I, a perfect stranger, take in addressing you. Your name and address I discovered from the envelope you dropped. The only excuse I have to offer—if it be an excuse—is that I cannot help it. The moment I saw you on the Rue Hausman I felt that, come what might, I would try to make your acquaintance. Ah! Mademoiselle, you know not how lovely you are. I know that by addressing you like this, I run the risk of forfeiting your esteem and perhaps losing sight of you for ever. But I cannot help it; I must take my chance Oh, pardon the presumption, but can you find it in your heart to permit me to call on you? Of course, I know that I have never been formally introduced to you, but I know if you will let me call we shall be sure to find that we have lots of mutual acquaintances who can arrange a proper introduction.

Yours in despair,
Andre de Saint Aydredon.

Pauline's tattoo on the carpet continued during the reading of the letter, and once or twice a tear fell and blurred the words.

When she came to the boyish sprawling signature at the end she got up from her chair and began to walk hurriedly up and down the room.

"It's abominable," she murmured, "to be insulted like that, abominable! And he was a gentlemanly-looking boy, too. Couldn't he see I was a lady? I am sure"—she went over to the glass, and gazed anxiously into it—"no; I am sure I don't look like that sort of woman—no, not a bit. Write to him? Yes, I will, and at once, too, and tell him what I think."

Digitized by Google

She sat down at the little escritoire and began:

Avenue Champs Elysées, May, 1894.

Sir,—Your letter has surprised me exceedingly. I am not in the habit of receiving such insulting——

She paused for a word, resting her elbows on the table and her chin on her hands. A photograph of a man—her brother—stood on the escritoire in front of her. She had always considered him good looking. Now, somehow, unconsciously, she began to compare him with the man to whom she was writing—to the latter's decided advantage. After all, she thought, Olivier was really nothing much to look at.

She took the frame up and scrutinised the picture closely. Now she came to consider matters critically, Olivier was not very far removed from absolute plainness. His nose was really almost a snub, his eyes too small, the forehead, the squareness of which she had once thought an attraction, seemed to have become obtrusively aggressive. It looked as if it were trying to push its way out of the picture. And the hair was uncompromisingly straight and flat. It was ridiculous! Men with hair like that ought to be made to curl it, like the girls did. Curly hair was so much prettier. Like, for instance——

A faint pink painted her cheeks. She took up her pen and set to work at the letter again.

Sir,—Your letter has surprised me exceedingly. I am not in the habit of receiving such insulting communications. I only take notice of yours at all because——

After all, why was she writing at all? Wouldn't it be far better to take no notice? Wouldn't—No, she would write, just to let him know that that sort of thing might be done to a chorus-girl—not to her, or any woman of her sort. It should be a lesson to him for the future. There was no reason why a man should treat a woman like that just because he had money—every one in Paris knew the St. Ayredons, and the old Baron was reputed a millionaire many times over. Yes, he certainly was handsome, too, this young aristocrat. How well he looked in his frock coat and glossy hat! It was all very well to run down men's clothes, but they suited some men to perfection. And good-looking young men were not too plentiful.

He had money, too. How lucky some people were to be sure. She must really get her father to raise her allowance. As it was, she was always in debt. Only that morning, Sylvestine had sent in her bill for the third time, with a rude little note to the effect that it was very much overdue and must really be settled at once. And there was that delicious little pony Lablache wanted her to buy. It certainly was dirt cheap at 1,000 francs. But, of course, cheap or not, it was quite out of the question. Equally, of course, that horrid Gailliard girl would jump at it. Lablache said that she was dying to have it, but he would rather sell it to a lady who knew something about horses—like herself, naturally—if he could. It was hard to be done out of it just for a paltry 1,000 francs. Still there was no help for it and——

Good gracious, six o'clock! She had been half-an-hour over that stupid letter already. It must be finished at once.

She took up her pen again:

I only take notice of yours because it is well you should know that though that sort of thing may do with some women, it won't do for me. For the future you had better confine such attentions to——

Chorus-girls? No! I don't like that. Besides, after all, he's only a boy, and chorus-girls, I know, are awfully expensive. Olivier told me so! Let me see; ah, that's it:

to women who care for that sort of thing. I do not.

Pauline de Glanes.

No, of course I don't!

The letter was duly blotted and an envelope addressed. But instead of folding it up at once, Pauline hesitated a moment, bit the end of her quill pen, took up first paper, then envelope, and put both down again, fidgeted in her chair, rubbed one dainty little foot against the other, and finally her cheeks, ears, and even her neck suffused with blushes, snatched her pen and hurriedly scribbled another line.

It ran thus:

P S—If after what I have written you dare to call, please don't knock, but ring three times.

Allen Goodman.

A TEN-POUND PRIZE.

(See Opposite Page.)

On the opposite page is a puzzle picture composed of 88 squares. If these squares be rearranged in a certain order they will form a real picture.

We offer a prize of £10 to the first person who sends the correct solution. In order to give readers in all parts of the United Kingdom as equal a chance as possible, none of the solutions received will be opened until Thursday, April 23rd, when all those received will be considered together. In the event of two or more correct solutions being included in one day's post, the prize will be given to the sender of the neatest one. Consolation Prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

If no correct solution be received on or before Tuesday, April 28th, 1896, the Ten-Pound Prize will be given to the sender of the solution then to hand which is most nearly correct.

Pictures should be packed flat or folded, not rolled, and the outside wrapper must be marked "June."

N.B.—To make the puzzle more difficult some of the squares have been turned upside down, others sideways.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

The Abode of Ideal Life.

Translated from the Polish.

ONCE, on a bright moonlight night, the wise and mighty Krishna communed with himself and said: "I thought man was the most beautiful of created things, but I am mistaken. I see the lotus-flower bow to the passing breeze. How it surpasses all living creatures in beauty! Its leaves are just closed in the silvery moonlight, and I cannot turn my eyes away from it. Yes, there is nothing like the lily among men," he repeated, sighing.

But a moment later he thought: "Why should not I, who am a god, by the might of my word, create a being which would be to mankind what the lotus is among the flowers? So be it then for the delight of humanity and of the earth. Lotus flower, be transformed into a maiden and stand before me."

The waves rippled softly as the beating of swallows' wings, the night became clearer, the moon shone deeper, the night-song of the thrush rose higher, and suddenly died away. And it was as Krishna had commanded. Before him stood the lotus-flower in human form. The god himself was startled.

"Thou wert the flower of the waters," said he; "be henceforth the flower of my thoughts, and speak."

And the maiden began to whisper, softly as the murmur of white lotus-leaves kissed by the summer airs: "Lord, thou has transformed me into a living creature; where wilt thou that I dwell? Remember, Lord, that when I was a flower I trembled, and closed my leaves at every breath of wind. I was smitten with fear, Lord, at the rain and the storm, the thunder and the lightning; yes, I was even overcome with fear of the scorching rays of the sun. Thou commandest me to become a living, breathing lotus-flower. I have, consequently, retained my former nature, and now, Lord, I am troubled at the earth and at everything that lives upon it. Where wilt thou, then, that I make my abode?"

Krishna lifted his serene eyes to the stars, meditated a while, and asked: "Wouldst thou live on the mountains' peaks?"

"There is frost and snow; I am afraid, Lord."

"Well, then, I will build a palace of crystal for thee on the ocean floor."

"In the depths of the water there glide serpents and horrible monsters. O, Lord, I am afraid!"

"Wilt thou, then, dwell on the boundless prairie?"

"O, Lord, the prairie is ravaged with thunder and the whirlwind as with the tramp of wild herds!"

"How, then, shall I provide for thee, thou flower that hast become flesh? Ah, in the caves of Ellora there live holy hermits. Wilt thou, retired from the world, make thy dwelling in the caves?"

"There rules the darkness, Lord. I am afraid!"

Then Krishna sat him down upon a stone and leant his head upon his hand. The maiden stood before him, trembling, and quaking. At that moment the fiery crimson of dawn glowed in the east; the waves of ocean, the palm-trees, and the bamboos glistened with gold. The rosy-winged flamingoes, the blue cranes, and the white swans in the waters joined their notes in chorus with the birds in the jungle, and immediately was heard the clang of harp-strings extended upon a shell of pearl, and the words of a song in human voice.

Then Krishna aroused himself from his dream and said: "The poet Walmiki greets the rising sun."

A little later the purple veil of dawn was withdrawn from the flower-decked creepers, and Walmiki appeared by the lake. At sight of the transformed lotus-flower he ceased to play, the pearly instrument slipped softly from his fingers to earth, his hands dropped to his sides, and he stood as speechless as though Krishna had transformed him into a tree.

And the god was pleased at this admiration of his handiwork, and said: "Wake, Walmiki, and speak."

And Walmiki spoke: "I love." This was the only word he could recall, the only word to which he could give expression.

Krishna's countenance glowed suddenly. "Wondrous maiden," he said: "I have found a place fit for thee. Dwell in the poet's heart."

And Walmiki repeated: "I love."

The will of the mighty Krishna, the Divine will, drew the maiden to the poet's heart. At the god's behest also the heart of Walmiki became transparent as glass. Glad as a summer day, peaceful as a wave of the Ganges, advanced the maiden to her allotted place; but suddenly, as she looked deeper into Walmiki's heart, her countenance paled, and fear agitated her with its icy breath. Krishna was startled.

"Sentient flower," he asked, "art thou afraid even of the heart of the poet?"

"Lord," answered the maiden, "what sort of a dwelling place is this that thou hast appointed me? Here in this one heart I behold snowy mountain peaks and ocean depths peopled with terrible creatures; and here, too, the prairie with its whirlwind and storm; here, too, the dark caves of Ellora; hence I am again afraid, oh Lord!"

But the good and wise Krishna said: "Calm thyself sentient flower. If in Walmiki's heart there are solitary snowfields, be thou the breath of spring to melt them. If there are ocean depths in his heart, be thou the pearl of those waters. Are there prairie wastes, then sow them with the flowers of happiness, and if thou findest there dark caves as of Ellora, so be thou in this darkness as a ray of sunlight."

And Walmiki, who had meanwhile recovered his speech, added: "And be blessed!"

Digitized by Google

The Great Middlewick Bank Robbery.

CHAPTER XIII.

This Beats Anything I've ever Come Across.

Despite Jack Burton's common sense, and in the face of his strong fight against it, a dreadful suspicion began taking shape in his mind. It was that Bobby Roberts was either innocent of the strange disappearance of Alfred Taylor, or, at the most, was but a particeps criminis therein. In other words, Frank Rutherford, the suspected book-keeper of the bank, was the guilty person.

This at first was so violent a supposition that Burton dismissed it with a feeling of self-scorn that he should have allowed it to enter his mind. But it came again and again until it secured an abiding-place in his brain, and he was compelled to think it over in all its aspects.

There were a hundred facts against it and only a few in its favour, but these few outweighed all the others.

Let a man in Jack Burton's position once start upon a line of speculation, and the labyrinth becomes intricate, involved and endless, with the result that all is a hopeless tangle beyond his power to unravel.

It is useless to follow the theories which became a veritable torment to him; we have only to trace actions and their results.

Now that Roberts had withdrawn, for the time at least, Burton decided to give attention to Mr. Rutherford. He had learned from Taylor of the singular conduct of the young man on the night that Mr. Bryant visited Burton, when the latter was serving as watchman in the bank. In what manner Rutherford and Roberts could be jointly concerned in the abduction of Taylor passed comprehension, but, as has been said, the suspicion that such was the case now almost amounted to a certainty.

Burton was badly in need of sleep. He had had little slumber for the past forty-eight hours. It was foolish to presume too far upon his powers of endurance. He therefore flung himself on his bed, and, with that fortunate gift which a few men possess, sank into a rest that was unbroken until night had come. Upon awaking he descended to the dining-room, where a good meal completely refreshed him.

Burton looked up in the countenance of the banker.

From the hotel he went straight to the cottage of the old couple with whom he had lodged while serving as watchman at the Middlewick Bank. So well known had he become in the little country town because of his connection with the arrest of the burglars that a complete change of clothing was necessary to avoid recognition.

This completed, he sauntered to the outskirts of the town, beyond the further house. There, when certain that no one saw him, he made a still greater change in his personal appearance. He fastened a pair of bushy whiskers over his beard, carried a cane and walked with a slight limp, depressing his shoulders as though weighed down by a score of years more than belonged to him.

This disguise, as has already been stated, was complete so long as it was not subjected to scrutiny by day or the glare of a strong artificial light. Nothing could serve his purpose better when helped by the gloom of the street. No fear now of anyone taking him for the new watchman who had resigned his situation, as may be said, amid a blaze of triumph.

It was between nine and ten when Burton strolled past Frank Rutherford's home. He had no reason to expect anything in the way of discovery.

A dim light was burning in the upper room, which he had learned belonged to the young man.

"He is out and not likely to return for some time," was the conclusion of the watcher, who continued his stroll towards Mr. Bryant's residence, that being the most likely spot to find the book-keeper in case he wished to meet him.

A bright light in the sitting-room of the banker's house showed that in all probability Burton's surmise was correct.

That being so, what good could the knowledge do him?

But when opposite the house the front door opened, and the bank manager himself came down the graveled walk and turned to the right, that is to say towards the open country.

"He wishes to take a stroll before going to bed," was Burton's conclusion, as he turned and kept pace with him on the other side of the street.

Mr. Bryant walked slowly, so that Burton could not keep abreast of him without attracting notice. He therefore gradually walked on ahead; and, as it would have been still more suspicious to follow him out of town, the limping individual crossed the street and turned back over his own route.

This brought the couple face to face within the radius of the rays of the street lamp.

Secure in his own disguise, Burton looked up in the countenance of the banker, who merely glanced at him, with a neighbourly nod of his head. Burton was struck by the expression of anguish on the other's face. He seemed ready to sink under the weight of some overwhelming sorrow.

Digitized by Google

"Poor man! The blow hurts him more than any of his friends suspect. Can it be he has an inkling of the truth? Does he see that the happiness, and life itself, of his favourite niece is wrapped up in this hateful mystery? Does he know that when the solution comes it means disgrace worse than death?"

Deep resentment towards Rutherford took possession of Peered anxiously across the way.

Burton as these thoughts flashed through his mind. That any man worthy of the man who had been accepted as a trusted friend and as the suitor of the young lady's hand should have behaved as the young book-keeper had, made him the more anxious to bring his guilt home to him. If he could have seen his way open to punish him without making the innocent suffer he would eagerly have done so. But, alas! in this life it is the innocent who suffer more than the guilty.

At the next corner, Burton looked round. If Mr. Bryant had intended taking a country stroll, he had now evidently changed his mind. He was standing motionless, as though undecided what to do. Burton slackened his pace as much as he thought prudent, but again glancing round he saw that the old man was as immovable as the lamp-post beside him.

Yielding to a feeling of uneasiness, Burton slipped across the street, intending to return and keep an eye on the banker. It might be he contemplated doing violence to himself.

So absorbed had he been in watching Mr. Bryant that it was not until he started crossing the road that Burton noticed that another person was doing what he had in view. A man was coming from the direction of the banker's house, and walking so slowly that it was clear that his interest was centred in the old gentleman.

Had Burton observed him before leaving the pavement, he would have kept on his own side of the road, but having made the move he thought it best not to turn back. Thus before he had taken many more steps he was face to face with the newcomer, whom, despite the gloom, he recognised as Frank Rutherford, the book-keeper of the bank.

Rutherford hardly noticed the limping man with the cane, but peered anxiously across the way at the dimly outlined figure in the distance. It was easy for Burton to keep the younger man in view, as, but a few yards further on, he paused evidently afraid of attracting the banker's attention.

That was the tableau—the old man, silent, thoughtful, motionless beneath the glare of the lamp; the younger, still as a statue in the gloom, dimly seeing and yet intently watching the other.

Burton added himself to the scene by halting also, but at such a distance that he would not have been able to notice Rutherford had he not done so before increasing the space between them.

This distribution of character brought about another result; Burton had stopped almost in front of Mr. Bryant's house, so that by shifting his gaze he was given a good view of that building.

The light was still burning in the drawing-room, and in the gloom of the verandah he made out the figure of a young lady, whose interest doubtless centred in the two persons who had left the house but a few minutes before.

The interpretation of the whole scene could not have been plainer.

The banker, for some reason, had left his home at a later hour than usual. It might have been for a simple stroll, and it might mean much more. His niece and her lover were startled by his action, and the latter had set out to note the movements of the elder. That was what he was doing, while she, in her anxiety, could not remain indoors until the return of the watcher.

There was a flicker under the distant lamp, and for a moment the figure of the banker was revealed, then lost to sight again in the shadows. He had resumed his walk, but instead of going towards the country he was returning home.

Hardly had he started when Rutherford imitated him. Burton was only a second or two later in doing the same, so that Mr. Bryant at the further end of the line controlled the movements of the trio.

A brief walk brought the young man opposite the house he had left only a short while before. He did not cross and re-enter, as Burton expected him to do, but coughed vigorously. Immediately Miss Crossland turned and disappeared through the French windows. She understood the signal to mean that her uncle was coming back.

Burton did not think it wise to hasten his pace. He had acted his part so well that no suspicion was directed towards him. Thus it was that he had not gone far when Rutherford passed him at a sharp walk. Burton hastened his steps slightly, but so rapidly was the young man walking that he was soon out of sight.

"There's no need for me to hurry, for he's going home to bed. Still, I will give him a good-night look as I pass the house," was the watcher's conclusion.

As he turned the corner Burton observed that the light in the book-keeper's room was burning brightly, proof that he had returned and was doubtless preparing to retire. Dropping back to his slow pace, the late watchman sauntered on, intending to pass the little cottage. It was his intention to halt opposite it and wait until the light in the upper storey was extinguished.

To his astonishment, however, he discovered that a third party was ahead of him. Within the shadow of the door that had sheltered Taylor was a man, evidently with his attention fixed upon Rutherford's home. He was so deep in the shadow that Burton barely distinguished him, his notice having been attracted by a slight noise caused by a change of posture. Though the discovery was unexpected, Burton kept up his slow, regular pace, apparently looking straight ahead and noting nothing to the right or left.

But for the faint noise referred to he would have known nothing of the eavesdropper's presence, which doubtless had a significance of its own.

"Well," muttered Burton after reaching a safe distance, "matters are becoming more mixed than ever. Who can that fellow be, and what is his business there?"

The lame man made as if to turn the other corner, doing so for a few paces and immediately coming far enough back to see down the street he had just left.

Digitized by Google

At that moment the bright light in Rutherford's room went out and all became darkness. The stillness of the deserted street enabled Burton to hear the rapid footsteps of the watcher across the way, which began simultaneously with the extinguishing of the light. For a few seconds Burton stood in doubt, supposing the stranger was coming towards him; but the figure, he could see by the lamplight, was walking quickly in the opposite direction.

"I must meet him somehow," was the watcher's decision, and immediately he set out after him at a sharper pace than he had shown that evening.

The instant the one ahead vanished round the first corner the pursuer quickened his pace until it closely approached a run. He was sure he would be close upon him when he, too, turned the corner.

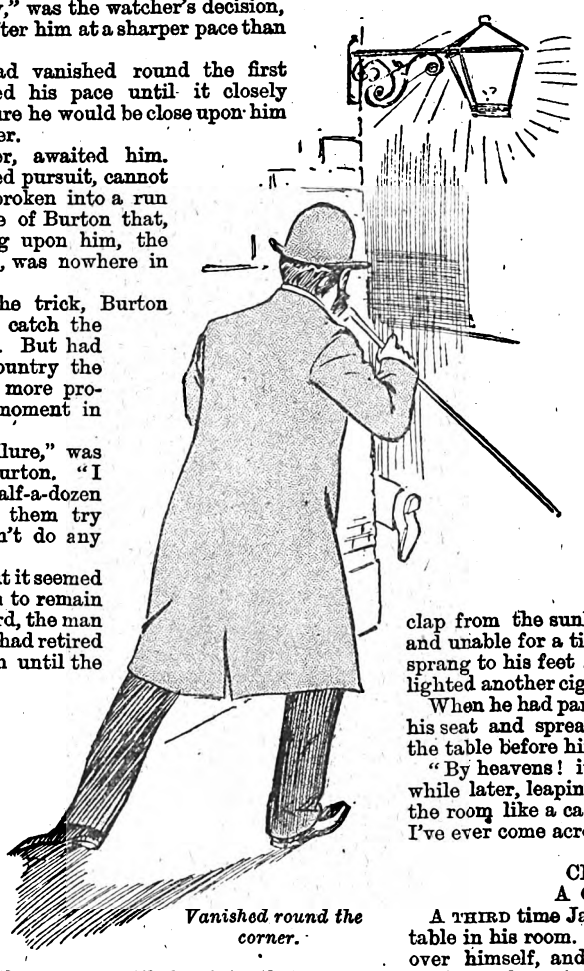
A disappointment, however, awaited him. Whether or not the man feared pursuit, cannot be told, but he must have broken into a run so much superior to the pace of Burton that, instead of the latter gaining upon him, the fugitive, as he may be called, was nowhere in sight.

Angry with himself at the trick, Burton listened intently hoping to catch the sound of the other's footsteps. But had he been miles out in the country the silence could not have been more profound than it was at that moment in that portion of Middlewick.

"To-night's work is a failure," was the disgusted conclusion of Burton. "I will send to London for half-a-dozen amateur detectives and let them try their hand. They surely can't do any worse than I have."

It was not yet midnight, but it seemed useless to the watcher for him to remain out of doors longer. Rutherford, the man whom he had set out to watch, had retired and would not be seen again until the morrow, when ten o'clock would once more see him at the bank.

The baffled watchman dropped back to his usual pace, and turned once more in the direction of Glenmora on his way to the hotel. Apparently Mr. Bryant's household had retired for the night, for the house was in darkness, though Jack Burton was right in believing that two persons, at least, beneath that roof would not close their eyes until far into the night, and even then sleep would be feverish, fitful, and tormented by the most frightful fears, misgivings and dreams that ever come to youth and age.



Vanished round the corner.

To avoid unpleasant complications, Burton slipped off his false beard and put it into his pocket before reaching the hotel. He managed also to recover from his lameness, and entered, looking very much, except as to attire, as he had looked upon his arrival in Middlewick.

It was still comparatively early for him, and after his rest during the afternoon, he felt no disposition to sleep. Nevertheless, he went to his room, paying little attention to the few loungers in the smoking-room, and without a glance at the visitors' book.

Had he scanned the written page of that book he would have learned something of importance.

Twenty-four hours and more had now gone by since Taylor's disappearance, and his friend had not picked up the faintest clue to his fate. He not only knew absolutely nothing, but was more perplexed than ever. He felt like roaming over the town the night through, and would have done so could he have felt the slightest assurance of accomplishing anything by such an action.

"Alf is dead," was his disheartened conclusion, "but how or where he met his fate may never be known."

Partly to distract his thoughts, he now turned his attention to the papers which Taylor had obtained when he made his call at Mr. Bryant's house. It will be remembered that they contained not only his handwriting but that of his book-keeper. With the paper also was the slip that had been pushed under the door of the bank on the night that Burton and Taylor were keeping watch together within.

Burton had given these a superficial examination when his friend first placed them before him, with the idea of instituting a comparison. As a relief from his worry about the detective, he now concentrated his whole attention on a minute and studied comparison of the penmanship.

It was inevitable that in the former instance he and Taylor, approaching the task with a preconceived theory, reached, as a result, the confirmation of that theory. The effect of this conclusion was still with Burton when he repeated the task. But suddenly a suppressed exclamation escaped him. A discovery came with a power that stunned him. At first it was a suspicion only, but it broke like a thunderclap from the sunlit sky, and held him breathless and unable for a time to go on with his task. He sprang to his feet and paced the room. Then he lighted another cigar and smoked earnestly.

When he had partly composed himself he resumed his seat and spread out the papers once more on the table before him, underneath the gaslight.

"By heavens! it's true!" he exclaimed, a short while later, leaping again to his feet and pacing the room like a caged lion. "This beats anything I've ever come across!"

CHAPTER XIV.

A Game of Bluff.

A third time Jack Burton sat down to the little table in his room. He had now gained the mastery over himself, and was the same cool, collected individual who had so rigorously followed the fleeing Sam Birch. He sat with his shoulder to the light, and, leaning back in his chair, scrutinised the papers for fully ten minutes, his whole mental strength concentrated upon and absorbed in the effort. When he had finished he carefully folded and placed them in an inner pocket, where he meant to guard them carefully.

"The secret is solved," was his conclusion, as he settled himself more comfortably in his chair. "Strange that the truth never suggested itself to Alf or me before; I see it all now."

Looking back over the events of the past few days, Burton saw their perfect conformity to the astonishing discovery he had just made. None of the slight difficulties which confronted himself before now showed themselves; everything was smooth, clear, and complete. It was a grand triumph, but his heart sank as he realised that all this had not the remotest bearing upon the fate of his missing friend. That awful problem remained unsolved.

Digitized by Google

The difficulties in his path, as far as that business was concerned, were as great as ever.

"Sh!"

Surely there was a noise in the room adjoining, the one which had been occupied by Alfred Taylor two nights before. Burton's heart gave a quick throb of hope at the thought that his friend had returned. He was on the point of jumping to his feet and dashing into his apartment to welcome him, but his habit of caution restrained him. Better to wait until all doubt on the question was removed.

Everything was quiet for a few minutes. Burton softly rose and again pressed his ear against the wall. Yes; someone was in the other room, moving softly about—proof that it was not the rightful occupant, for there could be no call for such precaution on his part.

A sudden thought flashed across Burton's mind.

"It's Roberts! It was he who was watching Frank Rutherford's place; he has come back to the hotel and has sneaked into Alf's room. It strikes me that it is about time I took part in this business."

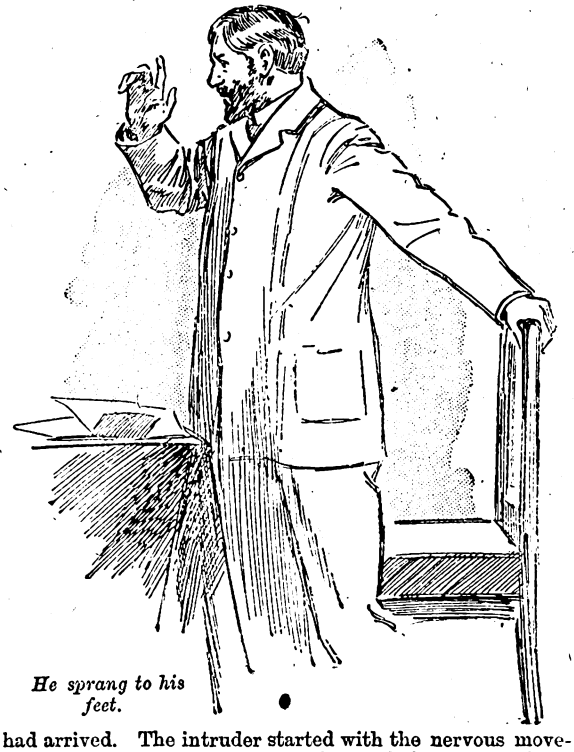
Noiselessly he opened his own door and stepped into the corridor. From the light shining through the space between the door and the floor he concluded that the intruder was availing himself of the benefit of gaslight.

Gently seizing the door-knob Burton tried it. As he suspected, it was not locked. Then he opened the door so quickly that it gave not the slightest sound.

Standing with his back towards the entrance was a man, carefully examining some papers that he had taken from the portmanteau on the floor, and which had been opened by means of one of his false keys.

"Ahem!"

Burton cleared his throat as an announcement that he had arrived. The intruder started with the nervous movement natural to a person when detected doing something wrong. He wheeled about and confronted the visitor, who instantly demonstrated that he was master of the situation. Extended at arm's length Burton held his revolver at a dead level with the muzzle aimed straight at the other's face.



He sprang to his feet.

"The first movement, and I fire!"

The words were spoken in a perfectly distinct, though low tone, while it was easy to judge from the gleam in Burton's eye that the threat was by no means an idle one.

Standing thus, Burton reached behind him with his left hand and closed the door. The two were now alone in the room.

"Bobby Roberts, alias John O'Kane, you are my prisoner," said Jack Burton.

It was impossible for anyone to be caught more fairly than was the individual thus addressed. Anticipating nothing of the kind, the revolver which he always carried still reposed in Roberts' pocket. In his confusion he dropped the paper in his hand, and demanded sullenly:

"What d'you want?"

"Sit down."

"Why?"

"Sit down, I tell you."

He was near the window, and close enough to a chair to obey without shifting his position. He did as commanded, dropping into a seat almost in a state of collapse. Sitting thus, he still confronted the levelled weapon, which followed his movements so that the muzzle held relatively the same position as before.

"Now, Roberts, let's understand each other," continued Burton, in the same off-hand manner he had shown from the first. "You can see that I have the advantage of you. Do as you're told, and you'll be all right; try to escape, and I pull the trigger. You know what that means."

The villain was rapidly regaining his self-possession.

"That's all right enough, but what's the use of keeping that thing pointed like that? It might go off accidentally."

"I'm too used to it to have any accidents."

"But it isn't necessary. It makes me nervous."

"All right, we'll have a change then," said Burton, taking a step forward and sitting down, but doing so without removing his gaze from the face of the other.

At the same moment he lowered his hand so that it rested on his knee. The position was less constrained and could be kept up for a long time without tiring his arm. Nevertheless, the weapon was so placed that any movement on the part of the prisoner could be instantly anticipated.

"Do you know me, Roberts?" asked Burton, with a smile.

The other, who had been studying his face intently, flushed and uttered a savage imprecation.

"Ah, I see you do. So much the better. Now we understand each other."

"I don't see what you can do with a man who gets into a wrong room by mistake," remarked Roberts, with a weak attempt at facetiousness.

"Not much, it's true, and if that was all I wouldn't bother you; but you haven't forgotten those other little accounts I have to settle with you, eh, Volney."

"What are they to do with you? What proof have you that I had anything to do with them?"

"Enough to arrest you at once on the warrants I have in my pocket."

Evidently Roberts considered the game up at last, and knowing well the man with whom he had to deal, he simply said sullenly:

"Well, Cairns, you've got the best of me this time. What are you going to do?"

"That depends upon you."

This was an altogether surprising reply. Roberts accepted it as signifying that the other, like too many people, were capable of being bought. The chance was eagerly seized.

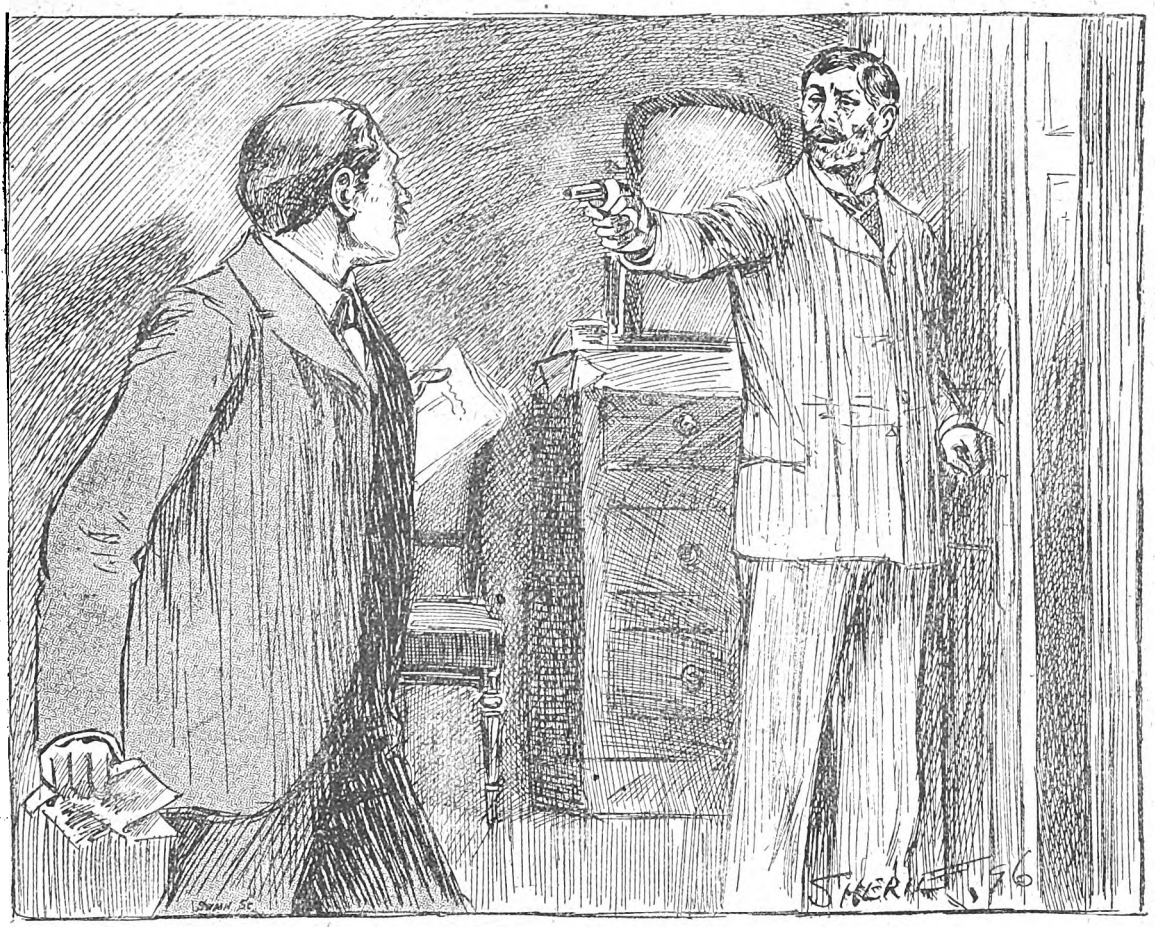
"Now you're talking sense. You'll find I'll act all square, old fellow. How much do you want?"

"What can you pay?"

"How does £300 strike you?"

"Come, you can afford more than that."

Digitized by Google



"The first movement, and I fire!"

"Don't be too rough on a poor orphan," said Roberts, who, seeing a prospect of release from an awkward dilemma, was disposed to be jocular; "you know I'm poor but honest."

"You wouldn't miss £500."

Roberts whistled softly, and opened his eyes.

"That's easily earned; but all right, it's a bargain, if you say so."

"I haven't said so," remarked Burton.

The couple had never once removed their eyes from each other's faces while talking. The remark of Burton awakened a sudden distrust on the part of his captive.

"It isn't fair to treat a fellow like that, Cairns; I would be square with you if our positions were different."

"Roberts," said the other, in the same low, business-like voice, which could hardly have been heard in the next room, "I wouldn't let you off for five, nor for ten, nor for one hundred thousand pounds. I have had plenty of such chances before to-night and haven't taken any of them yet."

"What did you mean, then, by saying what you did?" demanded the scowling ruffian, who would have given the sum named for the chance of twisting Burton's neck.

"I mean what I said. I won't compound a felony in the way you have in mind, but I will, for the first time in my life, do it, provided you pay me in another way."

"I don't understand you."

"Produce Alf Taylor alive and well, and you shall be free from any molestation from me for any and everything done previous to this night. We'll wipe it off the slate and begin anew to-morrow."

Eagerly Burton studied the miscreant's face while making him the offer. That it would be accepted he felt certain; but it was by no means certain that Roberts would be able to carry out his part of the agreement. He could lose nothing, and would have a chance of gaining everything, by making the required pledge.

The all-important question remained as to Roberts' ability to do anything of the nature required. It was not impossible that he knew nothing of the missing officer. Burton, however, believed that he did. At any rate, he was ready to act upon that supposition.

An indescribable expression passed over the villain's face.

"What makes you fancy I know anything of your friend Taylor?"

"I have only a suspicion; if you don't, why, the matter is ended, and I'll march you down to the lock-up to keep your three friends company."

"I haven't said I won't do as you ask, Cairns," was the significant remark of the prisoner.

"Understand, my proposition is that you produce Taylor well and unharmed—nothing less than that will answer."

Digitized by Google

"I'll agree he shall be alive, but suppose you leave out the condition of being 'unharmed.'"

The significance of this remark sent a chill through Burton, for it clearly implied that the detective had suffered some injury. Indeed, Burton felt that he ought to have known that for the brave fellow would have been heard from before had he not been disabled through some attack.

"Well, say the injury is not fatal; that will answer."

"I can agree to that proposition, but you wouldn't expect me to bring him here?"

"No, you are to take me to him."

"If I do that, you swear that you'll let me start afresh from to-night."

"I give you my word, which I have never broken."

"Ahem! I don't think either of us have much to boast of in that line."

"So far as you are concerned you are correct. Will you take me to him to-night?"

"Yes; but, look here, I don't intend to walk downstairs at the point of that thing," pointing to the revolver.

"You needn't; I'll put it in my coat pocket, with my finger nice and handy on the trigger, so that if you try any tricks I can fire through the coat with certain aim."

"And what about the one I've got."

"You're welcome to it. Being my guest you will walk ahead. If you can use it any quicker than me you are welcome to do so. Now that's settled. By-the-way, there are just a few things I'd like to know."

"I'm listening."

"You were in this affair with Birch and the others?"

Roberts nodded his head silently.

"Well, so was I, and what I can't make out is where the dickins you got to. I knew you were in Middlewick, for I saw you in the street, but Nash and King were the only ones inside the bank, and Birch was the only other one of your friends near the bank. I ask again, what did you do in the affair?"

A sinister smile crossed Roberts' face as he replied meaningly:

"The bargain that you and I have just made is sufficient answer to that question."

"I guessed as much," said Burton, trying to conceal the shudder that passed over him.

An indescribable expression passed over the villain's face.

"You expected me to turn up, and I didn't; you expected Taylor to help you, and he didn't. Put two and two together, and there you have the four as plainly as anything."

Burton nodded his head. Nothing could be plainer than that.

"Rather lucky for me, too," added Roberts, "for they can't bring anything against me, so far at least as Middlewick's concerned."

"That's true enough, but you forget the documents in my possession render that unnecessary; I rely upon them."

"Ah, but you promised not to use them after to-night."

"I won't use them provided you perform your part of the contract. How long will it take us to get there to-night?"

Roberts hesitated a moment.

"I am not sure as to that, it depends."

"Half-an-hour; an hour; two hours?"

The prisoner grinned knowingly. He did not mean to give away the slight advantage he now possessed.

"Well, half-an-hour, perhaps. But you understand, I am trusting to your honour to leave me alone from the minute I've taken you to Taylor."

"Yes. If I find him alive and not mortally injured."

"All right. I'll take you to him——"

"You needn't trouble yourself. Here I am."

It was the detective himself who uttered the last word as he strode into the room where the two men sat.

(To be continued.)

£100 GOING BEGGING.

At the left-hand bottom corner of the second page of cover of Short Stories will be found a coupon. This coupon will appear every week during the whole of 1896. It will also appear every week in Pearson's Weekly during the same period.

Procure as many of these coupons as you possibly can and keep them; because we are going to give the person who collects the most coupons during the year 1896 the sum of

One Hundred Pounds.

No coupons are to be sent to us until January 1st, 1897. Keep them safely till then. All coupons are of equal value.

Owing to the large number of attempts sent in for the Second Series of the "Brain Gymnasium," it has been found impossible to finish checking the solutions before this number of "Short Stories" goes to press. The names of the winners will, therefore, appear in next week's issue.

HAVE YOU HEARD PIERNÉ'S

"MARCH OF THE LITTLE TIN SOLDIERS"

IN

"MELODY"

For April? It is distinctly good.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

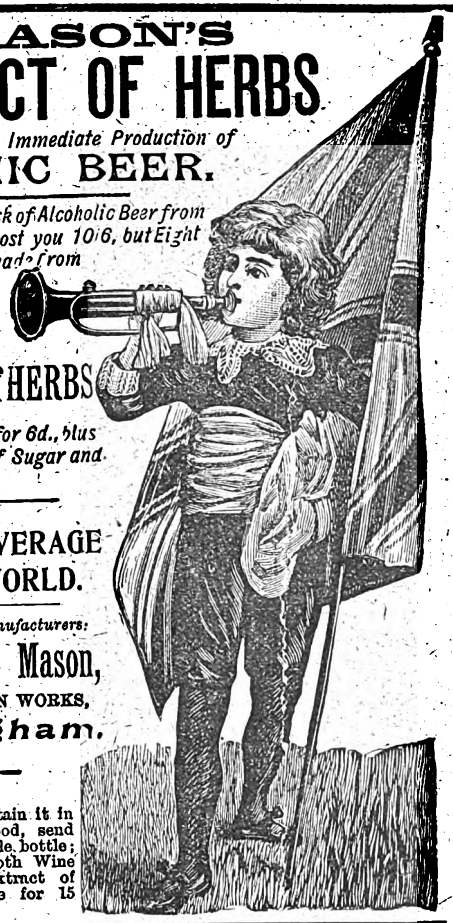
Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.



If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next-post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery.

The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents, And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

GIVEN AWAY £5,000!

GRAHAM & CO.'S

MONSTER GIFTS.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—Messrs. GRAHAM & CO. intend to present their Customers with a Monster Parcel as a means of advertising their celebrated

EGYPTIAN GOLD JEWELLERY.

For the small sum of 6s. 6d. we will send as follows:—

NOT A TOY

WE GIVE YOU A WATCH.

	Our Price.
One Gent's Egyptian Gold Albert, or one Lady's Egyptian Gold Albert	2s. 6d.	FOR
One Seal or Locket for Chain	1s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Ring, or one Lady's 5-stone Diamond Ring	3s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Scarfpin, or one Lady's Fashionable Brooch	2s. 6d.	6s. 6d.
One Pair of Cuff Links, or one Carbon Diamond Bracelet	2s. 6d.
Total	12s. 6d.

In addition to the above Every Purchaser will be Presented Free of Charge with one of our handsome

KEYLESS WATCHES.

USUALLY SOLD AT HALF-A-GUINEA.

Read what is said by those who have purchased.

WANTS A SECOND PARCEL.

Lowick-by-Neale, Northumberland, August 17.

GENTLEMEN,—Received to-day your second parcel of jewellery, with which we are immensely pleased. We really wonder how you can do it. The watch itself is worth more than the money charged for the whole. Many thanks for punctuality.—Very truly yours, WILLIAM McISAAC.

GOES BETTER THAN HIS £15 WATCH.

11, North Street, St. Peters, Tunbridge Wells.

GENTLEMEN,—Some few weeks ago I sent to your firm for the jewellery and advertised watch, of which I am surprised; the watch is a beautiful timist. I must admit, in fact, it goes better than my £15 gold watch; and for the jewellery it is astonishing value. I think you must lose money over such gifts, as I term it. The watch alone is worth double the 7s. I enclosed. I have shown it to several of my friends, and they were astonished. You can add this to your testimonials if it will be of any service.—I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully, LEWIS C. RHODES.

GUARANTEED TO KEEP CORRECT TIME.

Any Watch not received in going order will be exchanged.

Every Watch is Carefully Examined, Timed, and Guaranteed a Correct Timekeeper. Call and see them.

We do this to save the enormous cost of advertising, preferring to give our customers the benefit. As we lose money on each parcel we cannot supply more than two parcels to one person. If you cannot call get a P.O. at once, and send for this wonderful parcel. Orders will be executed in Rotation.

MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

NOTE.—The entire parcel will be sent for 6s. 6d. (post free, registered, 7s.). Each customer wil receive gratis one of our HANDSOMELY ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES. Be sure and call or send to-day for the

6s. 6d. Monster Presentation Parcel including the Handsome Keyless Watch.

S. S. GRAHAM & CO., 277, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

NAMES OF WINNERS IN BRAIN GYMNASIUM APPEAR ON PAGE 448.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 383. FOR WEEK ENDING MAY 2ND, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

IT WILL PAY YOU WELL.

BE SURE TO KEEP

WONDERFUL BARGAINS!

IMMENSE REDUCTION IN PRICES OF OUR WORLD-RENOWNED

BRUSSELETTE CARPETS.

ADMITTEDLY THE CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD. Seamless, Woven, and Reversible, Rich Turkey Patterns and Colourings, Superior Quality, with Handsome Border to match, a Marvel of Excellence and Beauty.

SIZES AND PRICES.

	ft.	in.		ft.	in.	Sale Price. s. d.	Former Price. s. d.
No. 1	3	0	by	6	0	5 6	9 0
,, 2	3	0	,,	7	6	7 0	11 6
,, 3	3	0	,,	9	0	8 0	13 6
,, 4	10	6	,,	7	6	8 9	13 6
,, 5	10	6	,,	9	0	10 0	15 6
,, 6	12	0	,,	9	0	11 6	18 0
,, 7	10	6	,,	10	6	12 0	18 6
,, 8	12	0	,,	10	6	13 6	20 6

	ft.	in.		ft.	in.	Sale Price. s. d.	Former Price. s. d.
No. 9	15	0	by	9	0	14 3	22 6
,, 10	13	6	,,	10	6	15 3	24 0
,, 11	12	0	,,	12	0	15 3	24 0
,, 12	13	6	,,	12	0	17 0	27 0
,, 13	15	0	,,	12	0	19 0	32 0
,, 14	18	0	,,	12	0	22 9	36 0
,, 15	21	0	,,	12	0	26 0	42 0

These Carpets are splendid imitations of Real Brussels Carpets, the designs having been carefully copied from the originals, both as regards colourings and patterns, so that when in use it is almost impossible, except by close scrutiny, to detect the difference. They have gained a world-wide reputation for magnificence, cheapness, and utility, having no equal. All designs are registered and deservedly considered works of art.

THIS ADVERTISEMENT.

GIVEN AWAY.

As an advertisement for the introduction of these goods to all readers of Short Stories, we have decided to give away to every purchaser of the above goods, enclosing cutting from this advertisement a very handsomely woven Hearthrug, 6ft. long and 2½t. wide, to match carpets in colours, etc.

Thousands of Repeat Orders and Unsolicited Testimonials have been received from our Customers.

7, Queen Street, Jersey.

"Dear Sir,—Enclosed find Postal Order for five Carpets. I had two from you three years ago, with which I am much pleased.

"Yours truly, J. AHIER."

United Service Institute, Walmer, Deal.

Mr. H. Swain writes: "The Carpets I had from you nearly five years ago are in wear now, and are quite good though they have had hard wear."

All goods despatched same day as order received. SATISFACTION GUARANTEED OR MONEY RETURNED. Cheques and Postal Orders to be made payable to J. HARGREAVES, Sec., and crossed "Union Bank." Established upwards of Twenty-five Years.

THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.,

31, OLD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PAY YOU WELL.

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or, samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 2d.; 1lb., 2s.; 2lb., 3s. 8d., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

THE

REV. C. HAVERGAL

(Nephew of the late Miss Frances Ridley Havergal)

Writes from 14, Alroy Road, Ansfield, Liverpool: "I can thoroughly endorse the statement of 'A Clergyman,' whose testimony to the efficacy of your WIND PILLS for affections of the Stomach, Bowels, and Liver, appears in The News. I shall be happy to recommend your Pills as I have opportunity. By all means publish my communication."

All sufferers from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND ON THE STOMACH, COSTIVENESS, SICK HEADACHE, NERVOUS DEBILITY, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, BILIOUSNESS, etc., should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

☞ The WIND PILLS being Purely Vegetable, Tasteless and Mild, and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

Of all Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for price, from

PAGE WOODCOCK, Lincoln.

"JUNO" CYCLES Are the Very Best.

JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb. JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Store, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 183, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 18

May 2, 1896.

S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2 ... £6 per cent. | Feb. 1 ... £7 per cent.
Mar. 2... £6 per cent. | April 1... £6 per cent.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Pinsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

"KEEPUMDRIE"

WATERPROOF GARMENTS.

Marvels of Cheapness and Durability.

		FROM
CHESTERFIELD, SCARBORO', INVERNESS	Men's	7/6
	Boys'	5/-

Illustrated list and patterns post free.

ANDREW POTTER, LONDON WORKS, READING.

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full natural perfect Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment, approved and recommended by the medical profession. Success guaranteed For particulars free, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87 Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87 Strand, London.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

LOVE ADVENTURE ROMANCE WAR HUMOUR PATHOS

EDITED BY C ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 383.] For the Week ending May 2nd, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

A Tragedy of the Sahara.

Translated from the French of Maurice Montegut.

IN our times, France's great African colonies are subdued for ever; but in other days, during the attempts of a laborious conquest, every moment held a danger. Skirmishes were incessant, real combats were frequent, and each post of the extreme vanguard had its romantic episodes, to be related later. Here is one of them.

* * * * *

Soft and wavering the wind blew up off the scorched waste of sandy desert, the air freshened suddenly, and night fell. Like a barrier upon the horizon the ascending hills gradually took on tints of lilac; to the right and to the left stretched the plain of reddish sand, traversed irregularly by ravines of less or greater darkness, according to their depth, and by strange palm-groves, yellow, dusty, sunburnt. Twilight is unknown in Africa; darkness falls there with a push, like a curtain, and this swiftness of change of setting is accentuated correspondingly as the dry country is reached, in the heart of the desert, in the unexplored lands. Here, past the High Plains, beyond Saida, Ain-Seffra, almost into Morocco, on the borders of the mysterious Fighig, at the farthest point whither the exploring columns have penetrated, this natural phenomenon is profoundly noticeable; the shades invade the earth in the briefest moment, and change and darken it with their clouds as ink darkens water.

A bugle sounded within the circle of tents; the horses of the picket lifted their heads, and the chasseurs, in their wide blouses and trousers of linen, went to form in line slowly for the evening roll-call. The bugle, loud and shrill, was echoed again and again, carried by the sonorous swells to the foot of the tranquil mountains, where the sound died out. The squadron was formed on the right. Cabarousse, captain, commanding, and his two lieutenants, Peyralte and Vaudras, all drowsy, regarded the manœuvre carelessly, without uttering a word, with their arms drooping, and all about, far, near above, everywhere, there reigned a silence so great that it seemed religious, sacred, full of august mysteries.

The roll-call was begun. After each name followed the brief, monotonous answers, as each day at that hour, with the apathetic indifference of mechanical exertion. The adjutant did not even pause before passing from one name to another.

"Present!—esent!—sent!"

"Hanrion?"

No one answered. The adjutant, surprised, lifted his gaze from his roll-book, and repeated:

"Hanrion?"

No answer.

"Well! are you deaf, you Hanrion?"

No answer.

A soldier was missing. His companions of the ranks spread their hands and gesticulated in token that they knew nothing, comprehended nothing. Cabarousse came forward.

"Let us see. Who was the last man to see Hanrion? Where was it? When was it? Speak up now?"

In the morning, at roll-call; none had seen him since.

"Finish the roll-call! Break—ranks!"

So there was a soldier missing. In the neighbourhood of a city, Cabarousse would have shrugged his shoulders, saying simply: "A hair thrown to the winds!" but here in this complete solitude, twenty leagues from the last advanced post, an absent man might as well be counted dead at once. And in a squadron alone there, isolated, lost, and entirely dependent upon itself, a call without response was enough to chill the boldest. In the desert, ranks are inevitably narrowed, and individualities are allied; no one is unknown, all are comrades, and one of these comrades had disappeared.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

In every group, whether the sleeves were blank or braided, that disappearance was discussed passionately, with the instinctive horror of the thought: "If it were I!" For human selfishness is never lost completely; all solidarity rests on personal considerations.

The country here was not, however, openly dangerous, not avowedly hostile; the bands of nomad Arabs had been repulsed, driven back to the mountains, and only a Kabyle village had its huts a short distance away. But the Kabyles are sedentary, of lazy habits, and they regard with indifference the foreign troops defiling past them in clouds of golden dust, and strike not, unless they are attacked in their own dwellings, under their roofs of mud and stone.

And yet, nevertheless, Cabarousse, suspicious, twisting his moustache, looked obstinately to that side where lay the Kabyle village. There, he was convinced, lay the solution of the mystery. Suddenly he strode towards the group of soldiers.

"Here, let us see about this! no more trifling! Does anyone know anything?—there must be a woman in this business—a Kabyle woman, eh? Answer—one or another, or all at once! But answer, or else——"

"A woman—or more than one! it is the same thing," let slip a soldier, shaking his head knowingly.

"Here, you! come forward and tell what you know."

The soldier advanced and spoke out, finally. He was a barrack's gossip, a swaggerer, and he spoke after his kind. "Well, this is about it, my captain; one is not made of wood, you see, and the desert is wide, and six months is a long time. It is very hard—not to see a woman for that long." Then he went on to say that the Kabyle girls were wont to go to wash their bright-coloured rags at a rill at no great distance from the camp, and "the devil! one gets a twist in both eyes when one sees their brown, round ankles, as they go down to the gully. But that is all! as to their heads, they are so togged out that one sees only their eyes. But such eyes! That scamp Hanrion liked to go to watch them wash—a fancy like any other. He declared that the tallest and the shortest of them winked at him sidewise as they passed him; and that always pleases a man, wherever he may be, my captain——"

"That is enough!" cried Cabarousse, and he gave the order to saddle the horses.

Thirty men were left in charge of the tents. The others were galloping in the bright moonlight, and by the clear rays horses and riders projected gigantic shadows, scattered by the haste of march, but equal in dimensions, the lines being maintained strictly. The thirst for battle and the joy of vengeance impelled the squadron; besides, any excitement is welcome which comes to break the monotony of long days of idleness. Then forward! Uprose and fled from the road the marauding jackals whose shrill squeals insult from afar their natural enemy, man, once he is safely past them. Now and then a sabre sounded against a stirrup, or a horse which left his place was by force of hand returned thither; but always the troop continued advancing with spectral aspect, forming an ever-retreating picture.

The soldiers were content with the expedition perceiving that the death of one among them was not to be passed over indifferently, and that all bloody memories would find prompt vengeance. Little by little, a sparse vegetation spread beneath the feet of the horses; then the way was streaked by the silhouettes of palm trees; farther yet, and the Kabyle village stood confusedly out from the earth, with its mud-hovels, low, narrow-windowed, whose doors were too small for human stature; and round about the inclosures for cattle, now vacant.

At a brief word of command, the squadron halted. No light shone, all was dark; no one moved, nor anything whatever. Only a few vagabond dogs, scenting the strangers, barked. The troop surrounded, at a walk, the village, still silent, still dark. Dismount! They entered the first hut, and it was vacant; the inhabitants had fled, taking their effects and weapons. This was their guilty confession. More than that all farther search was now useless and without purpose.

But what was that? Lying across a doorway, with its face in a heap of filth, was the body of a man, with its throat cut, its face bathed in blood. It was Hanrion. Then, on the vast night, arose a clamour of rage, which presently sinks into grief—a tone of unspeakable sadness, of supreme pity. Afar stretch the undulating plains; and the imperturbable chain of hills, black now, seemed insolently to bar the way to reprisals.

Stiff upon his horse, gloomy and forbidding in the clear night, Cabarousse shook his clenched hand at the invisible, as one who dreams of vengeance.

"Lieutenant!" he cried at last, "take fifty men and crush that brood of maggots until not two are left living! Oh, that I must stay at my post! that I might go with you!"

When the ranks were formed, the sub-lieutenant, Philippe Vaudras, saluted and started with his fifty men towards the Unknown, before them, while Cabarousse and his squad returned at a foot-pace, in their own despite, to the camp, with heads bent, with hearts saddened, bearing, laid across two horses, the bloodstained body of the murdered Hanrion.

Tall, slender, a leonine blonde, with clear blue eyes, when he left the military school, Philippe Vaudras had chosen Africa as a field for adventure, and, in a year of camp-life, he had made himself noted for his bravery, and this in a wild squadron where every man was valiant. Because of his white hands, his sweet voice, and his youth, the soldiers called him "Lady Sub-Lieutenant;" but, when he charged across the plain, that "little one" gladdened the heart; his horse had splendid legs, and was always first in the combat; and—what a powerful fist had "my lady sub-lieutenant!" His soldiers were fain to follow Vaudras, since they could never get before him; and they followed him with enthusiasm, drunken with his wildness, and, above all, so that nothing of ill should befal him. He seemed precisely the chief necessary for that romantic expedition, for that tragic, for that setting extraordinarily tragic; after him, his troop would follow blindly.

At the head of the van-guard and on the flanks of the squads, the guides, the explorers, the pathfinders, bent over their pommels, with their gaze fixed on the ground, directing their course by tracks almost invisible by the pale light. Across a width of forty yards, there appeared in the sand deep marks, footprints of men and beasts, whose wide spaces attested the tumultuous flight, the disorder of defeat, beneath the furious lashes of the Kabyle drivers, terrified by that corpse they left behind them.

The horses of the pursuers were panting. "Halt!" commanded Vaudras. The chasseurs camped as well as they could; they lay down to sleep with an arm through the bridle, and, in spite of the jerks and pulls of the animals, their sleep was deep and dreamless. At last, a faint white streak appeared on the horizon; dawn was breaking; and suddenly a growing light dispelled the shadows and discovered distant objects. Then, on the flank of the hills, appeared the tribe they were pursuing, a long, grey line of men, women, and children, of sheep and oxen, climbing the heights in haste, and the air conveyed to them, like a call, the lowing of the oxen and the bleating of the sheep.

Digitized by Google

With one simultaneous shout, the riders spurred to a gallop; but if they saw, they were seen also; and the Kabyles, abandoning already the heaviest of their luggage, ran up the steeps in a revolt of confusion. They were lost to sight in the chaos of gigantic boulders; one by one, as ants bury themselves in the earth, they were hidden to the last one in the hollows of the mountains. All that remained in sight were a few oxen, uneasy, turning towards the plain, lowing sadly, with necks stretched, muzzles thrust out, and nostrils flaring.

An hour later, Vaudras and his troopers found themselves all at once within a hundred yards of the enemy, having arrived thither by means of literal goat-paths. The Kabyles had made front and were awaiting them. The situation explained their audacity. Between the fugitive tribe and the blue and red chasseurs, the only path open was an extremely narrow pass which joined two level spaces; this pass ran along the side of the mountain like a forbidding balcony, hung over a gorge of immense depth.

It was not wide enough for two horsemen abreast, and that beneath the unerring fire of the Kabyles on the heights. The least slip, the first false step, would send one rolling into infinite space. Vaudras saw this conformation, and, understanding its horror, his face blanched, and he shut his eyes. The troopers paused in astonishment, and the smoking horses panted heavily, and receded, necks thrust over cruppers. Evidently the Kabyles had known of that natural redoubt; the women and children were hidden behind the rocks in the rear, and the men were on their knees, or on their breasts, sheltered from balls by great blocks of granite. They held the mountain, and could fire at their pleasure upon the soldiers in the open. Moreover, there was the ravine, the threatening fall.

The French soldiers thrust their heads forward to gaze at the abyss, saying by their grimaces: "If we were birds, now——"

Suddenly the bugler, a little scamp of twenty years old at the utmost, spurred his horse forward in bravado, and sounded the charge. The signal was given, the horses started of their own accord, and along the whole extent of the menacing pass, head flush with tails before them, the first squad dashed splendidly, under a furious fusillade. Only one man, restraining his horse with both hands—only one man, rigid as if petrified in his saddle, remained behind it as rear-guard.

It was Vaudras.

One, two, four, five, twenty; the troopers thundered past him, shaking their heads under that hurricane of balls, but laughing and encouraging one another with shouts. The sub-lieutenant remained immovable, with his eyes fixed on the summit, a cold sweat running off his temples.

Vaudras was smitten with vertigo.

To be attacked by vertigo is almost as bad as to go mad outright. The horror of it suffocates and paralyses; and the man predisposed by temperament to that mysterious potency of empty space, to that magnetic attraction from abysses, loses all consciousness of himself and all will power; he pales, he trembles, he recedes, and flies from the mute summons of the invisible death awaiting him in the air.

Vaudras was afraid.

Ah! the battle! there is the powder which laughs, the lead which whistles, the steel which darts, the blood which flows, the splendid shocks, the noisy death at will! But that great mouth, silent, terrific, waiting to suck one in—no!—no!—no! impossible! never!

Thirty men had passed, had taken the lead of Vaudras, They fancied that their officer, for the best of reasons, doubtless, watched their tragic defile, and would follow, to place himself at their head again. None noted his appearance, none suspected his anguish. The "little one" afraid! Bah! "Mademoiselle" Vaudras nervous! Indeed, that is enough to terrify. What is the matter? "My lady sub-lieutenant is crying!"

Forty men had gone forward; the balls whistled harshly, scratching the granite walls with terrible rebounds. The Kabyles were firing volleys, continual discharges, sure that they were lost if the charging foes should reach them. Vaudras was exposing himself as a target uselessly.

All the fifty men had passed by him. He remained alone. He dismounted, meaning to try the pass on foot; his horse broke from him, and hurled itself after the others; at a quarter the length of the trail, its shoes slipped on the rock, it lost its footing, and was whirled into the abyss, its four hoofs turned upward. Vaudras screamed, his eyes starting from their sockets. He threw himself upon his knees, he dragged himself upon his stomach, but brute instinct drew him backwards. He could not go on.

At that moment, he saw his men surrounded on all sides by the Kabyles, three times their number, rendered desperate by their danger. The women and children sallied from their rock-crannies, and hung themselves from the bridles, they plunged knives into the bellies of the horses, they scratched, they bit, they threw stones.

In that swarming of the horde, that entanglement, that furious grasp of the raving multitude, the chasseurs, suffocated, dragged down, felt their limbs grow numb. Their bleeding bodies were drenching the earth with red, and their leader was not there to inspire them, to ordain a victory!

It was faring ill with them. Their long sabres, dulled and bent, were withdrawn with difficulty from their thrusts into the masses. Their arms were weak and broken. They were powder-burned—at such close range were the Kabyles firing. They were deafened by the shrieks of the children, by the howls of the women, by the roars of the men; cut, bitten, bleeding, scorched on all sides, the little troop melted slowly before the multitude which assailed unceasingly. Sally, ambuscade, be the attack of what ilk it might, it meant defeat and death to the French cavalrymen.

Vaudras once more started to run forward, and with his mouth foaming, he fell back once more—the last time. From afar, he gazed with an infinite tenderness upon his men, dying there without him—but, ah! in dying, they were fighting bravely—slaying gallantly. He drew his pistol from his belt, he held it against his temple, he pressed the trigger, and the last convulsions of the death-agony precipitated his corpse into that bottomless abyss which had brought upon him the accursed vertigo.

Digitized by Google

Stazzemsko the Moujik.

It is morning. The little moujik Stazzemsko arises, very drowsy yet. The pigeons, cooing, brush their wings lightly against the roof of yellow straw. The horses snort impatiently over their mangers. The moujik pulls on a pair of trousers of Lesghis cloth, wraps his feet with the onoutchi, four bands of red wool folded crosswise, and, to complete his costume, puts on the schouba, the comfortable schouba, very long and very warm, which cost two roubles and a year's harvesting of honey.

Keivkine, his wife before God, sleeps stretched out upon the great tiled stove. He playfully touches her nose, then each cheek, and finally wakens her and says: "I am going to the city to your father's house to get what you have asked of me—two jars filled with mares' milk, and a flute one tone higher than cousin Serkow's, and a fat sheep for you to roast at Easter."

And the little moujik, after the manner of a fond husband, begins teasing his wife. He pats her gently on the forehead, on the cheek, then on the neck and pretty shoulders. "I am going to take our little one, Popow, with me," he says. "The air is cool and bracing, the journey will be good for him. I will take up little Popow, it will wake him up!" And the moujik laughed merrily.

A worthy man is the moujik, a shoemaker by trade. He goes regularly to church, swears not, never omits the sign of the cross in passing a funeral. He gives thanks at night for the day's blessings, and his faithful soul knows well that although he feeds his horse, and puts on its harness, it is the Lord who leads it.

He now awakens his son. Popow rubs his eyes with his chubby fist, and cries a little before knowing what is wanted of him. The moujik, assuming a gruff tone, says:

"I am going to the city to get some mares' milk, a flute, and a sheep. Who wants to go with me?"

"I," cried Popow.

Then the father takes up the child, places him astride his shoulders, and descends to the stable. There he yokes up his carriage, a well-made vehicle with fine axle-trees, high wheels, and traces of leather, to which the horses are buckled.

And now the day breaks, a fresh, lilac-coloured dawn spreading afar over the land.

Both Stazzemsko and little Popow are seated comfortably in the carriage, well covered up, and the moujik grasps the reins, calling back to the baba: "I will bring you the milk, the sheep, and the flute to-night."

They are off. The baba watches them anxiously as they disappear. "If only the snow did not catch them on the way—if only Popow be not cold—if only the horses be swift!"

Silent, she turns back to the house, burns a taper before a sacred picture, kneels, and sings these verses:

"God will protect those who live in fear of Him. The spirit of the Lord is a divine lamp which reveals all that is false in the heart of man. It is for us to prepare our soul, for Him to govern our tongue. Let us observe the law."

Father and son meanwhile are riding through fields, plains and valleys, and Popow is questioning the moujik. He is eight years old. He is wise.

"Papa, what is mares' milk for?"

"For the baba if she should be sick."

"Papa, what is the sheep for?"

"For the festival of Easter; the family must eat."

"Papa, what is the flute for?"

"To make the bees swarm; they are like simple-minded people—they listen to music."

Popow was satisfied. He is of a curious and thoughtful turn of mind. Beneath that shock of golden hair flying in the wind are grave thoughts, and these grave thoughts must be happy ones, since they make the child smile.

"I will drink some mares' milk; I will suck the fat from the bones of the sheep; I will play on the flute."

But the moujik urges on his black horses: "Up, my little father! On, my little dove!"

And the two black horses seem to fly over the ground. They leave behind them the roads, the ditches, the hills, the brooks, the high hedges of trees. And, behold, the great steppe spreads out before them—like a sea.

The pace becomes more rapid, but steadier. Nothing, neither ruts nor stones, will now impede the smooth movements of the wheels. The lilac-hued dawn rises higher, the sun appears, and Popow claps his hands, shouting: "Good! 'tis day!"

To amuse the child the moujik softly sings the Pliassoväia, a song of exile and poverty, a popular satire:

"From the north pole to the south pole, no place for us, no place!
The police are ever vigilant.
The hangman has a green eye.
Ai, ai, Tra-ra-rai, ai.
Virgin! but his eye is green!"

"Who are you singing against?" asks Popow amazed.

"Against the lords, the masters of the soil."

"The soil?"

"Yes, the land."

Popow does not understand. He asks absently:

"It has masters, the land?"

But the moujik whips up his horses and cries furiously: "Kss! kss! little demons!"

And turning towards his son:

"The poor do not plead, the rich reply harshly."

"And we, papa, are we rich or poor?"

"Half-way between the two," answers the moujik simply.

* * * * *

It is noon. They arrive at the great city. The father-in-law is pleased. He makes them drink a bowl of tea, offers them cake and game, and gives the moujik a Daghestan pipe, and Popow a porcelain figure of a Cossack thrusting out his tongue. He inquires how shoes are selling, if the supply of honey is good, if the baba is well.

"The baba is not only well, but doubly well."

And Popow does not understand why the two men whisper to each other laughing.

Digitized by Google

Finally the moujik says:

"I have come for two jars of mares' milk."

"Here they are."

"Also a fat sheep."

"I sold the last this morning."

"And also a flute."

"I have three of them; take your choice."

The moujik tries the three flutes, takes the one which makes the loudest sound. Then together they walk out into the broad streets. They look at the pretty women reclining on the cushions of their carriages, the fine shops, the people who are speaking French in the street, and when they have gazed at all these things, the moujik finally says, in a decided tone: "It is time to go."

"Well, son-in-law, God be with you."

Father and son are again traversing the fields, plains, valleys, and Popow is still asking questions as in the morning.

"Papa, you have the flute?"

"Yes."

"Do the bees like music?"

"As simple-minded people do," answered Stazzemsko, and he shook the reins.

"Go on, my little father! Go on, my little dove!"

And the two black horses seem to fly over the ground. The pace becomes more rapid.

Eventide in hyacinthine hues spreads over the land, the moon appears, and Popow claps his hands shouting: "Good! 'tis night!"

The moujik softly sings the Pliassoväia:

"From the north pole to the south pole, no place for us, no place!"

"It is beautiful, the darkness!" cries Popow, delighted at the sensation of moving swiftly through the shadows.

And now they had been galloping for two hours. The horned moon is bright. The sweat of the horses rises in vapour about them, glinting in the white light. On they gallop, on and on! Their eight hoofs make but a single flash.

"Kss! kss! little paschal lamb! Kss! kss! dove of my roof!" cries the moujik to his horses.

But now, just below, by the wheel, two white points light near him, and these points of fire follow him, bounding along. The moujik Stazzemsko shudders. But he is braver than a Pandour, stronger than a cannoneer. He lashes the right eye of the wolf with his whip, whereupon the wolf leaves the right side, and bounds to the left. But while the moujik lashes him with his whip, other white points light up at his right side, and, lo! now two wolves are following the carriage. They jump, they fix their eyes on the moujik in silence. Stazzemsko is afraid. He looks out upon the boundless steppe filled with shadows, and as he lowers his eyes he sees not four but thirty points of light gleaming about him.

"Ho! ho! ho! little dove! little father! faster! faster!"

And the excited horses raise higher their iron shoes, stretch their necks forward, panting for breath. So swift is their reaching gallop that they appear longer by half.

"Ho! ho! ho! rai! ra! rai!" screams Stazzemsko.

The moujik rises to his feet, holding the reins taut, his cap on the back of his head, his round eyes staring straight into the night. It is no longer a pack, but a multitude which follows him. He hears their panting, their claws scratching the hard earth.

"Ho! rai! rai! little dove! little father, hie along!"

And the carriage flies, a swiftly moving shadow in the night.

Stazzemsko stands erect like the Tamschtschik, the weird postillion with eyes of flame. He is seized with horror. The wolves seem about to spring upon him, to fasten themselves to his cloak, to bury their fangs in his arms, to leap upon the horses, to cut the reins with their sharp teeth, to tear his son in pieces. And Popow laughs, unconscious of the danger. Now and then he blows in the flute, his eyes turned towards the stars.

"Haou! ho! rai! rai! ho! hou!"

Poor Stazzemsko! He thinks of the baba, the pretty fair-headed baba, who is waiting for them by the stove or before the beehive, of the soup of pearl barley which is steaming upon the dresser, and of the tale he will tell of his journey. But now wolves, wolves, and more wolves, gathering silently, eager for one of the horses to fall. The sharp wind cuts the moujik's face, and pierces to the marrow of his bones.

"Clic! clac!—Hou! ho! rai! rai! ho! hou! clic! clac!"

A wolf has leaped upon the seat, has bitten the moujik's shoe. He utters a sharp cry, seizes the animal by the nostrils, hurls him back, but a spasm of fear pierces Stazzemsko like a sharp pain. He leaps upon the back of one of the horses, and cries in the ears of the faithful beasts: "Faster, lamb! faster, dove! for Popow's sake."

"By the Christ!" suddenly screams Stazzemsko.

A wolf is clinging to the seat. Stazzemsko now springs quickly back into the carriage. He lifts the tilt and looks behind him.

They are a score, three-score, seven-score, ten-score wolves. It is a black ocean swarming with stars, as if the canopy of hell were reflected in the steppe!

And still the moujik's cry: "Ho! rai! rai! ra! rai! ho!"

But he has lost all hope, he is gasping for breath! Popow has let the flute fall, the good flute which the bees love.

"Popow! Popow!" suddenly screams the moujik, with the gestures and cries of a madman.

"What, papa?" murmurs the child.

"Popow! Popow!" sobs the father.

"O, papa! what did you say?"

"Popow! Popow! you see the wolves?"

"Yes, papa, yes!"

"They are going to kill us!"

"No, papa, if the bees like the music, the wolves——"

But these are his last words! Suddenly the moujik seizes his child by the throat, lifts him on high, and with an awful blasphemy hurls the child into the midst of the wolves!

A strangled cry. The dark moving pack stops—stops for a moment. The carriage glides swiftly on.

Now it has passed the steppe. The horses slacken their pace. They enter the darkened, sleeping village but the baba, the pretty blonde baba, waits by the gate.

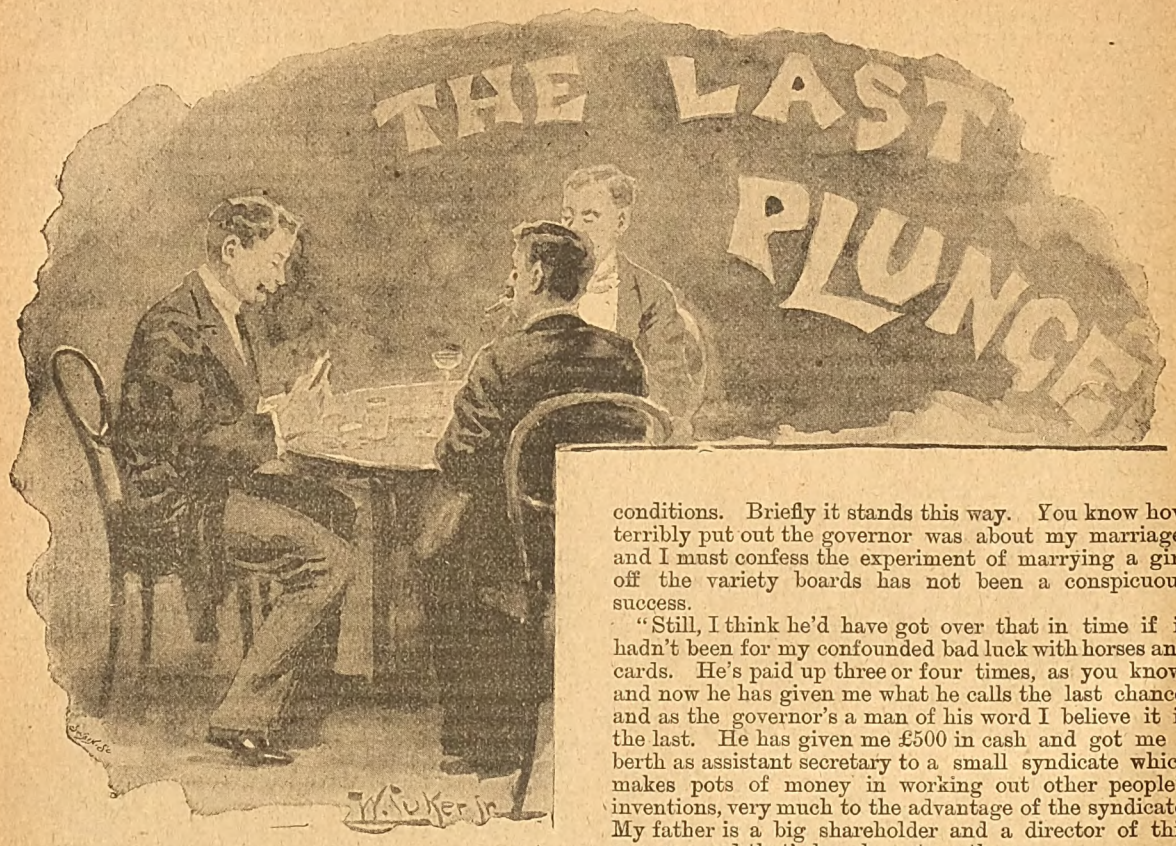
"Well, Stazz, dear Stazz, hast thou had a peaceful journey? Was Popow cold? Did the horses go well?"

But the moujik answers not.

He plays upon the flute, laughing long and loud, a strange shuddering laugh, for his mind is dead to all things.

M. M.

Digitized by Google



"My dear fellow, I tell you it's an absolute certainty. The mare is as bound to win as water's bound to run down hill. There's nothing else in it with her; it's a dead snip, and I've backed my opinion by putting every sovereign I can raise on it. If you are wise, you'll do the same."

"Yes, it's a very good thing I've no doubt, but for all that it's a terrible risk, you know. I don't mean that it isn't good enough as a bet, for I believe myself that May Queen will have a walk over, but then you must remember that I should be risking a lot more than what I staked."

"What do you mean? I don't see how you can lose more than you put on."

"But I should lose a great deal more than that, I can assure you. Of course this is strictly between ourselves, and so I don't mind telling you that the old gentleman has rehabilitated me and set me once more, and for the last time, in the pathways of respectability, but upon very stringent conditions."

Frank Yorke, roué, clubman, man-about-town, living one-fourth on a private income of five hundred a year and three-fourths on his wits, looked at his friend, Percy Savil, a rather weak-faced man nearly ten years his junior, with a sarcastic pretence of approbation, as he replied:

"I'm delighted to hear it, and I hope I may congratulate you upon having reformed for a very substantial consideration."

Savil laughed, not altogether pleasantly, and said:

"Not very substantial and not very pleasant as to conditions. Briefly it stands this way. You know how terribly put out the governor was about my marriage, and I must confess the experiment of marrying a girl off the variety boards has not been a conspicuous success.

"Still, I think he'd have got over that in time if it hadn't been for my confounded bad luck with horses and cards. He's paid up three or four times, as you know, and now he has given me what he calls the last chance, and as the governor's a man of his word I believe it is the last. He has given me £500 in cash and got me a berth as assistant secretary to a small syndicate which makes pots of money in working out other people's inventions, very much to the advantage of the syndicate. My father is a big shareholder and a director of this concern, and that's how he got me there.

"I'm to have five hundred a year and I shall have to earn it. If I stick to work and go steadily everything else is to be forgotten and when the old gentleman dies I shall come in for the Berkshire estate and about seven thousand a year, just as if I had been the best of only sons.

"But, if he finds that I have made a single bet, or put a single sovereign on a horse, or in any way indulged what he calls my pernicious craze for gambling, I shall get the sack from the syndicate, and be disinherited into the bargain. Now do see how much I should lose supposing I put money that I don't possess on May Queen and she didn't win?"

"But you told me just now that the governor had given you five hundred in cash. Haven't you any of it left?"

"Precious little. It was all owed before I got it. There was that hundred to D'Arcy, a couple of hundred to those Jew lawyers who run the Metropolitan Bank as a money-lending concern at sixty per cent., and the other two hundred just about sufficed to keep the most noisy of my creditors quiet for a bit."

"H'm, that's a pity! If you only had that five hundred now and could put it on May Queen at six to one it would be as good as three thousand in your pocket, and three thousand is not to be sneezed at, you know, by a man with your tastes who has to live on five hundred a year, and earn it. If it wasn't such an absolute certainty I wouldn't for a moment advise you to take the plunge under the circumstances, but I know how unfortunate you've been, and the information that I have had is so exclusive and so perfectly reliable that I thought it was only friendly to pass it on to you."

Digitized by Google

"Yes," replied Savil, as the voice of the tempter sank into his weak, undisciplined soul. "It's very kind of you, old man, and that three thousand would be the salvation of me, for the moment that it gets known that I'm drawing a regular income the duns would be down on me like a flock of vultures and I shall have either to reduce myself to the wages of a clerk to pay them off, or I shall be worried to death with judgments, and similar inventions of the law and the evil one. I daren't tell the governor about all of them for reasons that you will appreciate after what I have told you."

Yorke smiled and nodded, and he went on, staring blankly out of the club room in which they were sitting.

"Still I must confess that it's a great temptation. Three thousand would more than clear the lot off and then I could start square. I suppose there is no way of doing it so that even if she lost my name wouldn't appear in the business. Could you put it on for me in your name?"

"I would with the greatest pleasure, old man, but my book's full on Ascot, and between you and me the bookies know that I've got on all I can lose, and if I went for another five hundred they'd want me to put the money down, and that's not what you want. But as your father has settled up for you, and as you've got a decent appointment, I'm sure Dobson would take the bet from you if you could put down ten per cent. I suppose you could get that together?"

"Oh, yes, I could manage that," replied Savil. "You're right, it is too good a thing to throw away; I'll risk it."

"Bravo!" said Yorke. "That's like your old pluck. I like to see a man stand up to his misfortunes, and you can feel perfectly safe—May Queen is as certain to win the Ascot Cup as the sun is to rise to-morrow morning, so we may as well go and split a bottle to her success and your better fortunes."

There are some men who cannot go straight, and Percy Savil, only son of Sir Percy Savil, Baronet, of Trenton Abbey in Berkshire, and director of the Patents' Operating Syndicate, Coleman Street, E.C., was one of them. He had had every chance that his father could give him, and he had made a mess of them all.

Finally he had married a pretty, rather vulgar girl, perfectly respectable, and off the boards equally insipid, and this had led to the old gentleman first sending him out of the house and then cutting him off with less than a shilling, which he could do permanently if he chose, as the estate was not entailed, and his fortune was absolutely at his own disposal.

As has been seen, he had relented to a certain extent, as fathers are wont to do, but this was really the last chance that Percy would ever have, and he did with it as he had done with the rest. He was a gambler, heart and soul, and for such there is no hope.

Still if he could have had any idea of the depths to which this last act of wickedness and folly was to take him, short of money as he was, he would have thrown the fifty pounds into the Thames and consented to live on the barest pittance till his father's death rather than have paid the ten per cent. deposit to the bookmaker Dobson as he did on the day following the evening of his conversation with Yorke.

Frank Yorke's confidence in the May Queen was so far justified that a week before the race the odds had decreased from four to one to seven to four. With a last inspiration of good, Savil tried to hedge and save himself. But the Fates were against him. He had no money to deposit and he could find no one who would take the bet on credit. The day of the race came, he won about a hundred pounds through Yorke on one or two minor races, and May Queen was beaten for the Cup by half a head.

The race was run on Tuesday. On the following Monday he would have to pay £450 or he would be posted at Tattersall's and nothing could prevent his father finding out that he had broken the compact, and this would mean immediate ruin and future disinheritance. In the ordinary course of events he had about as much chance of paying the £450 as he had of materially reducing the National Debt. His credit among his own associates was gone, he dare not go to his father, the Jews would have laughed at him, and there was an end of it.

To say that he looked upon his position as desperate would be to describe his state of mind very inadequately. He was something more than desperate. He was in that state of mind in which a man is not only reckless as regards himself but completely careless as to any consequences that he may bring upon other people. It is a curious fact that when people are in this condition they usually have opportunities for making bad worse, and so it turned out with Percy Savil.

He got through his work at the office of the Syndicate in some sort of fashion the day after the race, and that evening he met Yorke by appointment and went to have, as he called it, a final flutter before the smash came. He had somewhere about a hundred pounds with him and the two went to a snug little private club, of which they were both members, not a mile from the centre of Piccadilly Circus, where unlawful games of chance were the rule and stakes were limited only by the purse or the discretion of the players.

"I expect a fellow to call at the club to-night," said Yorke as soon as they were seated in a hansom, "who ought to be a fit and proper person to give you your revenge against the Fates. He is a young American named, absurdly enough, Nasmyth P. Vansyller, but young and apparently simple, and absolutely wallowing in dollars. He had also a taste for poker, a game which you ought to know pretty well by this time, and I think instead of plunging with the other fellows at baccarat or roulette we had better arrange a quite little poker party in the small drawing-room, and get Mr. Vansyller to join us."

"All right," said Savil with the carelessness of a man who knows that he has only one more card to play. "That will suit me better than the other. I don't much care about absolute, blind chance for my last fling; I've had quite enough of it, but at poker, I think I ought to be able to relieve Mr. Vansyller of some of his dollars before morning."

So he did, but not at all in the manner he had in his mind when he spoke.

Mr. Vansyller, a young man of about four-and-twenty and apparently a representative specimen of the American parody on the English gilded youth, arrived at the club, sent up his card to Yorke, and was duly introduced, and made free of the premises for the evening.

The poker party was a great success, for Mr. Frank Yorke and Mr. Nasmyth P. Vansyller. Percy Savil, by dint of good nerve and better fortune, multiplied his hundred by five within the first two hours of the game. If he had stopped then there would have been no need to tell this story, but he didn't. The gambling madness was aroused within him, and he forgot all about the dangers of his position, and the duty that he owed to himself and his father.

Digitized by Google

He went on, thinking of nothing but the cards and the possibilities attached to their combinations, and the result was that by two a.m. he was cleaned out even to the last half-crown, while Yorke was £250 to the good and Mr Vansyller had displayed a grip of the game and a pluck and pertinacity in seeing his opponents out which had been very little expected of him, and which had resulted in the accumulation of the pile of notes and gold in front of him amounting to very nearly a thousand pounds.

Then the party broke up. Savil, sullen and callous to everything now that everything was lost, bade a hasty "Good-night" all round and started off to walk home to his house in Westbourne Terrace partly because he wanted to argue the matter over once more with himself, but chiefly because he hadn't as much in his pocket as would pay the cab fare. His head was aching savagely and all his nerves were tingling with the excitement of the game on which he had staked everything and lost.

The farther he went the darker and more hopeless his position seemed to be. There was not a ray of hope to be seen in any direction. In a few days he would not only be dishonoured according to the code of his kind but he would be ruined and disinherited as well.

By the time he got to the Marble Arch he had come to the conclusion that the future was not worth facing. He stopped and thought of the Serpentine away yonder behind the trees of the park.

Surely it would be better for him to drop into the water off the bridge and be done with it all than to drag out a miserable existence of poverty and discredit in which he would sink lower and lower as he went on until after all he would probably come to the same end, for he knew himself well enough to know that he was the last man in the world to wrest fortune out of misfortune by dint of sheer hard work.

He turned into the park and started off down the broad path which leads across to the Magazine. The night was dark and he strode along with his hands deep in his pockets and his chin on his breast. He never expected to meet anyone there at that time of night, but by the time he had covered two-thirds of the distance he ran squarely into someone, and heard a voice with a distinct Bostonian drawl say:

"Hello, sir! I should have thought this road was about wide enough for two to get past. You ought to keep a brighter look out a dark night like this."

"I beg your pardon, I'm sure," stammered Savil, stooping to pick up his hat which had fallen off in the collision. "Why, Mr. Vansyller, is it you? What on earth are you doing here at this time of night?"

"I might ask you the same, Mr. Savil," replied the American a little more politely than he had spoken before. "What I'm doing here is trying to find myself, for I'm lost. You see I took a cab from Piccadilly Circus and told the fellow to drive me to Victoria Hotel down yonder in Brompton, while I ought to have told him to go to the Great Western at Paddington.

"I don't know whether I got too much champagne inside me at the club or what it was, but I clean forgot that I'd ordered my traps to be sent over to the Great Western this afternoon because I'm going down West to Plymouth and round there first thing in the morning.

"I remembered this by the time I got to the corner of the park, and as I had a bit of a head on me I thought a walk wouldn't do me any harm, so I got down and started out to find the Marble Arch, and now I don't know where I am.

"Fool of a thing to do, wasn't it, considering I've got about a thousand pounds in this bag which I bought from the steward of the club to carry the plunder in?"

Savil saw at a glance that the American, though not drunk, had drunk quite enough champagne to make him talkative and careless. He looked at the bag which he could just see dimly in the darkness. There was a thousand pounds in notes and gold inside it—more than enough to repair all that he had lost, to redeem his position in the present, and to insure him riches and a title in the future.

It was a strong temptation, and he was in no state of mind to resist it. A plan instantly took shape in his mind as though some evil spirit had put it there complete.

He laughed good-humouredly and said.

"Well, do you know, I was doing very much the same thing, only I haven't lost myself. You're a good way from the Marble Arch and those are the only gates open on that side, but as I may as well go back now if you'll come with me I'll soon put you in the way of getting a cab in Oxford Street and then you will be at the Great Western in ten minutes."

"Good for you," said Vansyller. "Very kind of you indeed. I shall be most obliged to you. I began to get a bit skeery all alone here in this place with all this money about me."

"Oh! that'll be all right," said Savil. "Come along; this way."

They turned back together, and Savil took the first turning to the left, leading in the direction of Kensington Gardens. He knew the park thoroughly, and he took this path because he had determined by fair means or foul to have enough of the contents of the bag to save him from the ruin to which he had chosen death as a preferable alternative.

He determined to try fair means first and bringing the conversation round to the night's play and his losses he unbosomed himself to the American and put his whole position before him, winding up by asking him point-blank to lend him £500 out of his winnings.

Vansyller refused in no more words than it took him to say that he was not accustomed to lend large sums of money to casual acquaintances. A few pounds for present requirements, but five hundred—"That's two thousand dollars, you know," as he put it—was laying it on a lot too thick, and he was not the sort of man to do it.

Savil choked back his rage and disappointment, said that it didn't matter very much, as at the worst he would be able to get it from his father, and turned the subject off, with an apology for troubling him with his private affairs.

Then they tramped on through the darkness towards the Gardens until they reached a dark and lonely spot under the trees. Savil had taken a long-bladed, buck-horn handled pocket-knife from his waistcoat and opened it in his great coat pocket.

"This Marble Arch seems an almighty long way off," said Vansyller, somewhat alarmed to see the gloom growing deeper and deeper the farther they went.

"We're not far off it now," said Saville, pointing ahead. "Look, you can see the point of it through those trees."

The American leant forward, peering in the direction

Digitized by Google

pointed out. The next moment Savil's left arm was round his throat, choking back the cry that rose to his lips, and before he could make a struggle in self defence the thin, sharp blade of the knife was buried in his heart.

It was a very small wound and the bleeding was almost entirely internal. There was a seat close by under one of the trees, and Savil, leaving the knife in the wound, to keep the murdered man's clothes against it, dragged the body to it and put it in a sitting posture propped up against one of the arms.

Then he opened the bag, emptied several handfuls of gold into his pockets, picked out the largest notes he could find in the dark, and then, closing the bag, he put it beside his body and strode off rapidly towards the Marble Arch. He managed to get out of the park unobserved and made the best of his way home. He had purposely left the knife behind him, because it was not his, but one that he had picked up in a railway carriage two days before, and as no one knew he had it, it could furnish no clue against him.

As he was occupying just then a separate room from his wife on account of one of many quarrels, no one knew what time he got home. He counted the money that he had become a murderer to get, and found that he had got a little over £550. He locked it away safely, drank half a tumblerful of neat brandy, and got into bed—not to sleep, but to enact the tragedy in the park over and over again till daylight, and then at last he fell asleep to dream of it.

He went to the office as usual that day, and, coming back in the evening, he saw on the placards of the evening papers: "Murder and Robbery in Hyde Park. An Arrest." He bought a paper at Aldersgate Street, and while he was waiting for his train read the news which possessed such a terrible interest for him.

Stripped of its sensational garnishing it came to this. An American gentleman of wealth, named Nasmyth P. Vansyller, had been found on a seat under the trees near Kensington Gardens with the large blade of an ordinary pocket-knife buried in his heart. A small handbag, containing but a few loose coins, was found beside him.

Soon after daybreak that morning the police on duty at the Marble Arch had arrested a man named James Fordham, a mechanic out of work, on suspicion of robbery. As this man was going out of the park it was noticed that he was holding his pockets very carefully, as though he had something hidden in them. A policeman stopped him on suspicion, and as he did so the man started back in a fright, and a sovereign dropped down the leg of his ragged trousers, evidently from a hole in his pocket.

He was at once searched, and notes and gold to the amount of over £400 were found upon him. While he was at the police station to which he had been taken, news of the finding of the dead body came, and a charge of murder was added to that of robbery. Thereupon the man confessed that he had been sleeping all night in the park and, starting to come out at daybreak, he had seen a gentleman apparently sitting asleep on a seat with a bag beside him.

He thought he was drunk, and curiosity made him look into the bag. He saw the money in it, and, having been out of work, and nearly starving, for six weeks, he had been overcome by the temptation and had taken it. He, however, strenuously denied the charge of murder, and protested that he knew nothing more than what he had told.

Savil's left arm was round his throat.

Later on in the day a Mr. Frank Yorke, from whom a note of invitation was found on the body of the murdered man, had been communicated with. He at once attended and identified the body, and recognised the numbers of some of the notes. He said the notes were part of a large sum that Mr. Vansyller had won at cards the night before. The accused was taken before the magistrate, charged with murder and robbery, and stood remanded to the following day.

Although, in one sense the fact that the murder bade fair to be fastened upon someone else was a momentary relief to Savil's mind, the identification of the notes by Yorke completely confounded him and brought home to him the horrible conviction that he had stained his hands with blood for nothing.

He dare not venture to cash the notes that he had, for fear they would be identified, and this would leave him nearly £300 short of the sum which he intended to tell Yorke he had received from his father on making full confession of his lapse and giving him his oath that he would never gamble again.

As soon as he got home he put the notes in the fire. This left him over £200 in gold. At first he thought of flying the country, but this plan he dismissed very soon, for not only was the amount wholly insufficient for such a purpose, but his flight would bring immediate suspicion upon him.

Digitized by Google

He saw now what a fatal error he had made in not taking all the money and the bag as well, for there was sure to be a searching inquiry into the cause of the difference between what Vansyller was known to have had with him and the amount that had been found on Fordham. If he had only taken it all and sunk the bag in the Serpentine, whether anyone had been arrested for the murder or not, the fate of the bag and the money would have remained a mystery.

Now he dare not even spend the gold that he had in paying a portion of his racing debts, for, to his morbidly excited mind that would immediately excite suspicion against him, and if any inquiries at all were made as to how he got it, a few lines from Yorke to his father would prove instantly that he had not had it from him.

Dropped forward on his desk, with his face buried in his hands.

The next day, James Fordham was brought up on remand and committed for trial on the capital charge. His statement had been wholly disbelieved and the only mystery about the case seemed to be what had become of the rest of the money. A new horror was now added to Savil's mental misery. It seemed almost certain that an innocent man would suffer for the crime which he had committed with so little result, and thus he would have the blood of two instead of one upon his soul.

As the fatal Monday came rapidly nearer, with its inevitable ruin and exposure, his misery began to degenerate into madness, and his thoughts turned once more to suicide. He had nothing to live for. Why should he let an innocent man be hanged for him, when his own life was no use to him?

On the Friday night he made up his mind to do the only act of justice he could do and then end his life. He sat down and wrote a full confession, describing why and how he had committed the crime, and what he had done with the money. He put this in a blue envelope, addressed it to the Magistrate of the Marylebone Police Court, and put it in the drawer of his writing-table.

The next day as he was going to the City he took with him a prescription for some morphia and strychnine pills which his doctor had prescribed for him some months before. He had these made up at three or four different chemists, and so obtained enough to poison him with certainty. It was his intention to go home after office hours, post the confession, which he had not dared to carry about with him for fear of an accident, and then poison himself.

He had scarcely taken his place in the office when a telegram was brought to him. He opened it, glanced at the few words which it contained, and then ordered the boy out of the room in a voice scarcely recognisable as his own, and dropped forward on his desk with his face buried in his hands, sobbing out:

"My God! I've done it all for nothing"

The telegram was to tell him that his father had died suddenly of apoplexy, shortly after six that evening, and this meant that he was master of the Berkshire estate and £7,000 a year.

The first thing he did after regaining a little self possession was to get into a hansom and drive off home as fast as he could to destroy the confession. Life was very different now; it was worth living, and the poor wretch of a mechanic might swing for him! What did he, Sir Percy Savil, of Trenton Abbey, care for that?

When he reached home he went to his room, took out his keys and put one into the keyhole of the drawer into which he had put the fatal document. It was unlocked, for in his distraction he had forgotten to lock it. With the beads of perspiration standing out upon his brow, he dragged the drawer open. The blue envelope was gone, and in its place lay a note scribbled in pencil by his wife. With trembling hand he picked it up from the drawer and read it:

I have long known that you were a fool and a brute, and I have just learnt that you are a murderer. I will not betray you, unless the man who is charged with the murder is found guilty, but I will live under the same roof with you no longer. Don't follow me, or find out where I am, at your peril.

KATE.

With a cry of fury almost like the howl of a wild beast he sprang from the chair and began pacing up and down the room. Only two thoughts were clear in his distracted mind: he must at once go to Trenton, and he must get the confession back at any price, and all risks, but he must go to Trenton first. That was inevitable and he went.

Four days later he had buried his father and was Sir Percy Savil of Trenton. The next day he returned to town and put a skilful private detective on the track of his wife. After a week of agonising suspense, he received a note from this man to say that his wife under her old stage name, Miss Kate Nelson, had taken an engagement to go to America, and would leave for Liverpool the next day. He had inclosed her London address.

That was the day of the trial of Fordham at the Old Bailey, and there was not an hour to be lost. So determined to make one desperate effort to recover the confession from his wife, he got into a cab and drove off to his wife's lodgings in an obscure street off Essex Road, Islington. She was not in when he got there, but he gave a false name, saying that he had called on urgent theatrical business, and asked to be allowed to wait, as she was expected in in about an half-an-hour.

He waited an hour, and then she came. As she opened the door and saw him, she staggered back in such undisguised horror, that his blood rose in ungovernable fury in an instant.

"What have you come here for?" she said. "Didn't I tell you that you would follow me at your peril?"

"You know what I've come for," he said hoarsely, "And I'm going to have it before I go away."

She made a motion as though to turn and leave the room, but he was too quick for her. He had risen as he spoke and crossed the room, with three long swift strides. He saw her mouth open to scream, and like a flash his hand darted out and was clasped over her lips. Then with the other he seized her by the back of the neck, and held her powerless either to move or utter a sound. He pulled her back against the door and shut it with his foot. Then he hissed in her ear:

Digitized by Google

"Now utter a sound above your breath and it shall be the last you'll ever make. I've something to live for now, and I'm going to live. Give me that confession quietly and you shall have two thousand a year for life. Refuse, and I'll kill you. Now which will you have?"

He took his hand from her mouth and waited for her reply. She didn't scream or make any attempt to leave the room, but she looked at him with eyes burning with hate, and said in a voice that trembled with a passion almost equal to his own:

"You hound, to strike me like that! Haven't you ill-treated me enough already? Why couldn't you let me go to America without seeing your face again? No, I won't give you your confession, and I've a good mind to hang you, you brute, for you're not fit to live.

"Get out of the room, and never come near me again. Send me the two thousand a year, and as long as you send it you shall be safe, always supposing they don't hang Fordham. This is the day of the trial, you know."

She spoke the last words in a bitter, taunting tone which turned his anger into absolute madness. He sprang at her again, and caught her by the throat. As he did so she picked up a dinner knife that was lying on the table which had been laid for supper. She made a stab at his face with this, but he parried the blow, and in a moment he had wrested the knife out of her hand, and, still holding her by the throat, with his left hand he lifted the knife and said:

"Now. Which is it, for the last time—the confession or this?"

At the sight of the threatening steel her nerve failed her, and with trembling lips and in a half-choked voice she stammered:

"I can't give it you, Percy, because I haven't go it."

"What?" he shouted. "You've sent it, have you? Curse you, take that," and before she could say another word the knife was buried deep in her throat.

She dropped to the floor almost without a groan, but she was not dead, for when he stooped over her, overcome with a sudden revulsion of horror at what he had done in the moment of blind passion, and tried to staunch the blood that was flowing from the wound in her neck, she looked up at him and said in a weak voice, half choked by the internal bleeding of the wound:

"You fool! I never meant to hang you, and I couldn't have done, for I burnt the confession when I found it. I didn't want to be pointed out as a murderer's wife, and I knew you'd be rich some day. But you won't now for you'll hang for this."

Then her head fell back, there was a rattle in her throat, and after a few convulsive struggles for breath she was dead.

Sir Percy Savil did not hang for either of his murders, although he saw that there was no escape from the consequence of his last crime. He had his pills still in his pocket, for he had carried them ever since he bought them.

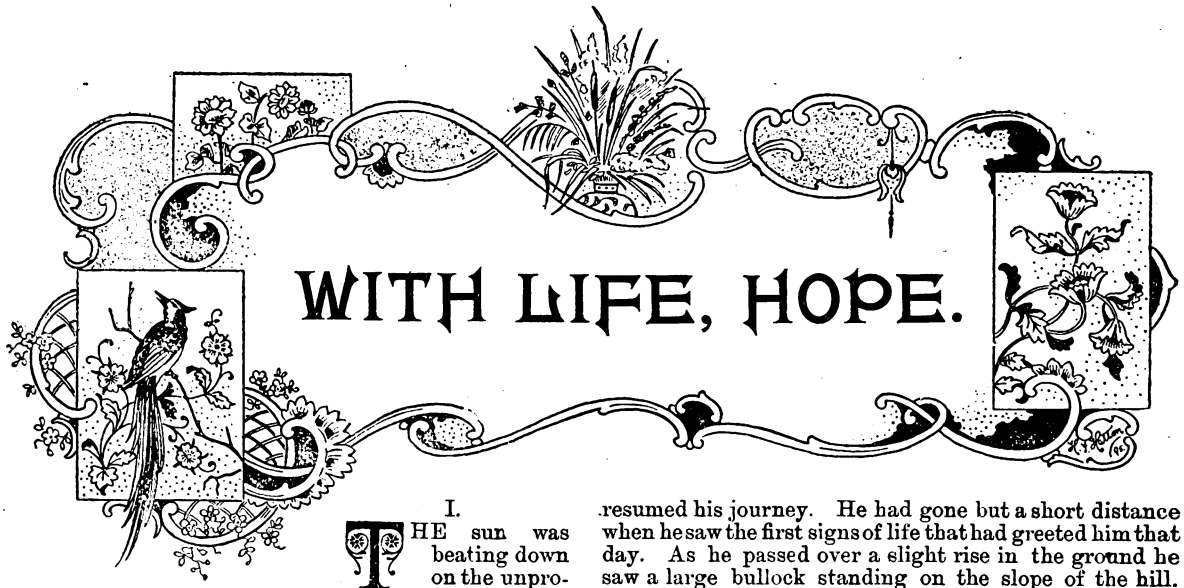
He emptied the box into his mouth, took a gulp of water from a bottle on the table, and walked out into the street and gave himself up to the first policeman he saw, confessing both the murders to him there and then. As the astonished man took him into custody, wondering whether he was mad or not, a boy came running down the street with a flaring placard with the words in big red letters: "Hyde Park Murder. Verdict and Sentence."

"They won't hang him now, will they?" said Savil to the policeman.

"Not if what you've told me's true," replied the man. And they didn't.

GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Digitized by Google



WITH LIFE, HOPE.

I.

THE sun was beating down on the unprotected earth. The defenceless soil smoked and quivered under his continued rays, its sides parched and cracked open. The streams murmured in subdued tones, the crickets creaked a dismal refrain.

Only one adventurous mortal was braving the tropical noonday heat. Slowly he toiled over the low, rolling hills, their sides bronzed with exposure, unprotected as they were by tree or shrub. No green thing in sight to rest the eyes from the glare of dried earth and grass; nothing to relieve save the hazy and uncertain outlines of the distant hills, that danced like a will-o'-the-wisp in the smoky atmosphere. The hot air scorched his nostrils as he inhaled it, and then came back from his lungs with increased heat; his face was dry and burned, and through the gaping pores no grateful moisture came. Yet on he strode, with steady swinging pace, as if heat and cold were alike indifferent to him.

He was indeed well calculated to withstand the buffets of the weather or the fiercer attacks of his fellow men. More than six feet in height, his broad shoulders and well-proportioned figure made him seem much shorter, and his easy, graceful movements evidenced a control of every muscle that could come only from constant active exercise. A long, reddish blonde beard covered his face, which was bronzed by exposure almost to the colour of his beard, and his long hair fell in waves upon his shoulders. His whole appearance was striking, yet the most striking feature was his piercing blue eyes, which seemed to look you through and through, and announced plainly that their owner could not shirk from danger or hardship in whatever form it might come.

His costume was that of a hunter, and indicated—as did his small cap, made of the skin of an animal, even more strongly—that its purpose was to withstand a much colder climate than that which he was now experiencing. Upon his back was slung a well-fashioned rifle.

II.

PAUSING on the crest of a small hill he glanced around him towards the distant line of hills, and then, turning his course towards their nearest point, he resumed his journey. He had gone but a short distance when he saw the first signs of life that had greeted him that day. As he passed over a slight rise in the ground he saw a large bullock standing on the slope of the hill. The animal saw him at the same moment, and turning towards him stood looking at the intruder. Soon several more appeared, regarding him attentively, and then the whole band began moving slowly across his path, about a hundred yards in front of him.

Pushing on his course he paid no attention to them, until they again attracted his notice by the peculiarity of their actions. The whole band of about a hundred cattle were now in sight, and were circling around him with steadily increasing speed. It was evident that he was the object of their attention, and he attempted to frighten them away by shouting and waving his arms, but these efforts were without avail. On the contrary the animals had drawn about him in a circle, and were now approaching nearer and nearer, drawing the circle tighter about him every moment.

He saw that it was practically impossible to break through their line, and yet to stand there and await their attack was certain death. Their long, sharp horns gleamed viciously in the sunlight. Glancing hastily around he sought some tree or rock that might offer some shelter from their attack. But there was none within reach; nothing within that fatal circle to relieve the monotony of the shining slippery grass. There was no time to be lost, for the circle was constantly growing smaller, and the animals becoming more and more closely packed. Quick as thought he formed his plan of action. Unslinging his rifle, he prepared to shoot one of the animals in front of him, hoping in the confusion that would follow to break through the lines and find shelter among some trees at the foot of the hill. Bringing the rifle to his shoulder he prepared to make his single shot as effective as possible.

III.

"Do not shoot! I implore you, do not shoot."

The voice came from behind him, and he turned in surprise in that direction. His astonishment was considerably increased when he saw a horse approaching at full speed, and upon its back a young girl, whose long, black hair, loosened by her riding, was streaming out behind her, while she anxiously urged her horse onward. As he looked, her horse dashed into the circle, and the nearest cattle were turned and headed down the hillside. With a dexterity that astonished him she "rounded up" the herd, and soon had them all started down the side of the hill after the leaders, and then halted her horse alongside of him.

Digitized by Google

The situation was an embarrassing one for him, and for once in his life he felt uncomfortable and ill at ease. To require assistance in getting out of a bad scrape was no new experience, but to have the whole matter taken out of his hands, and to be rescued from his peril while he stood idly by was unpleasant; to have this done by a woman was humiliating He stood looking at her awkwardly, while she sat shyly returning his glance. Indeed, she felt as uncomfortable as he, though he was too confused to notice it. Finally, he recovered himself sufficiently to speak.

"I have to thank you," he said. "They would probably have killed me." There was no trace in his voice of the excitement of the situation from which he had just been rescued.

She looked at him curiously, for evidently his mode of dress puzzled her.

"Where do you come from?" she inquired at length.

The tone of uncertainty and the abruptness of the question discovered to him the fact of her embarrassment and gave him that feeling of superiority that enabled him to regain his self-possession.

"From England originally, but from the Blue Mountains lately," he answered with a smile.

"The Blue Mountains?"

"Yes; you have not heard of them? They are far away to the north of here, many hundred miles I have travelled alone for many months. Until now I have not seen a human being for weeks."

"But how did you know we lived here?"

"I did not know."

"Then why do you come."

"I have travelled for pleasure, for curiosity. I wished to see this southern country, where the sun burns you up."

"I do not understand," she said quietly. "Where are you going?"

"I do not know. Anywhere; I am going now to these mountains," pointing to the distant line of hills.

"But you will first come with me? You must rest until it is cooler. Nobody travels here in the heat of the day; it would kill you. You must come and eat with us, and then we can give you a horse to continue your journey, and tell you how to go. Oh! in this heat and this country to think of walking!"

"I thank you, no. I must go on."

"In the heat? You will die. You must come with me. My father and mother will welcome you. I wish you to come."

He looked at her closely for the first time, and then he wondered why he had not noticed her beauty before. She was dark, with that Spanish complexion through which the warm blood showed with a rich colour, heightening the brilliancy of her lustrous black eyes which lighted up her whole face with a tender, trusting expression. Her raven hair hung in masses upon her shoulders. And as she leant forward with a confiding, intreating gesture, he thought he had never seen so beautiful a woman.

"I will come," he said briefly, and as she turned her horse in the direction of her home, he walked on by her side. So they journeyed in silence for a time.

"I must thank you for saving my life," he said, at length. "They would surely have killed me, and you ran a great risk yourself."

"If you had shot at them I could not have turned them away," she answered. "They would have been angry. You should not have walked here; they do not attack one who rides, but when you walk they will kill you."

IV.

BEFORE long they came in sight of the hacienda, a long, low house, upon a flat with neither tree nor shrub near, but upon one side the steep spurs of the range of hills came almost to the house, forming deep cañons.

The old folks received the traveller kindly, listened gravely to the story of his adventure, and then showed him to an apartment in the house where he might rest until his meal was prepared. But he was in no mood to rest. The indolent Spanish customs suited him but ill, for he was unaccustomed to the heat of the weather and the habits that it necessitated. Besides, his mind was far from easy. He was of a quiet disposition naturally, and loved solitude. His impulse, even while prompted by gratitude to the girl for the service she had rendered him, was to retreat from the settlement. But she exercised a strange fascination over him, and, though he would not confess it even to himself, it was to be near her to feast his eyes upon her beauty, that he had accepted her invitation.

It was with a pleasing fiction by which he only half deceived himself, therefore, that he now sought the low verandah in front of the house, "to enjoy the fresh air outside."

"Josefa is preparing a little supper for you," explained the old man as he sat puffing a cigarette.

The stranger seated himself near the door, where he might see the lithe, slender figure of the girl as she flitted about inside, produced a pipe after having refused a proffered cigarette, and was soon entertaining the old man with stories of his adventures among Indians and wild beasts. The Mexican listened gravely, only half understanding the allusions of his guest to unfamiliar localities and customs, yet refraining from asking questions lest he might seem inquisitive about the visitor's antecedents.

Soon Josefa, having finished her preparations, came and stood by her father, and the stranger found fresh enthusiasm for his narrative in her evident admiring interest.

The afternoon shadows lengthened imperceptibly as he continued his reminiscences, and the sun was almost disappearing behind the distant hills, when they sat down to the meal which Josefa had prepared some hours before. He became more and more interested in the girl, and it required but little pressing to persuade him to stay with them that night. The next day he was even more reluctant to leave, and they seemed equally loth that he should do so, and so his stay was extended two or three days.

V.

ONE evening as he stood with Josefa, talking of anything so that he might have the pleasure of her company, and wondering whether the moon ever shone so beautifully before, she suddenly said to him: "Manuel is coming home to-morrow."

"Manuel! Who is Manuel?"

"Ah, you do not know him," she said. Then after a pause, as if reluctant, yet anxious to tell her secret, she added: "We are to be married; he is my lover, and I shall marry him next week. Oh, you should see Manuel! So handsome! not handsome like you are,

Digitized by Google

but like a Spaniard. You must stay and see Manuel; I would show him the big, strong man I saved."

"I would no doubt entertain him." It was the tone rather than what he said that arrested her attention.

"Ah, I have hurt you now," she said, laying her hand gently on his arm as he turned away. "Forgive me; it was but a joke I intended. You are so good and strong, I did not think."

"Forgive you!" he cried. "You could not offend me; I would give my life to make you happy." Then, as she looked at him in surprise at the earnest intensity of his speech, he added: "Have you not saved my life? And so you see it belongs to you. And you love Manuel very much?"

"Why, yes. Are we not to be married?"

"Then I am glad that you will be happy."

"And you will stay and see Manuel?"

"Yes, I will stay. Now I want to be alone," he added abruptly, and she turned into the house murmuring to herself: "He is so strange. I cannot understand. He is different, that's what it is; he is different." And with this somewhat obscure explanation she was content.

VI.

But with the visitor it was far otherwise. As she disappeared from his view he strode out in the moonlight and paced up and down with quick, nervous strides. The bright moon cast a flood of silver light over the scene, but somehow the beauty seemed to have departed from it for ever. A gentle breeze fanned his brow, but he was too agitated to feel its soothing effect.

"I might have known it," he muttered. "What am I, that I should hope to win such a prize? A wanderer, without a home that I might offer her. Fool that I was to have stayed here, when I might have known that she would have some lover among her own people. But what right has he to interfere? Stay to see him? Yes, I shall stay, and I shall kill him."

Suddenly he stopped short.

"Bah!" he exclaimed. "A fine thing this, for a man like me to give up in this way. To think that a gentle, timid creature like that should make me mad with pain. I have but to say: 'It is over,' and I shall suffer no more."

But his will was weaker than his philosophy. He retired, but not to rest.

He tossed about in a troubled, feverish sleep until daylight, and then rose and strode out into the open air. The atmosphere of the house seemed to stifle him; his old restless longing for an active life was upon him, and he must be moving. "If I had not promised her to see this man," he murmured, "I would go now, and be among the mountains once more. Nature is the only thing that is true, after all. Yet why should I wait to see him? She would be disappointed and unhappy; but am I not unhappy? Shall I go?"

VII.

Nevertheless, in spite of his determination, he lingered on through the day, and into the afternoon. The day was hotter than any he had ever experienced. The atmosphere became more smoky, until the sun shone through it with a lurid light. Even the Spaniards felt prostrated by the unusual heat, and Josefa glanced anxiously towards the mouth of the cañon through which the trail wound by which Manuel was to return. He had gone across the mountain with a herd of cattle, his only companion being a Mexican vanquero, and he had been expected to reach home that morning, but still he did not come.

Suddenly a low, distant rumbling was heard, and a sound as of a strong wind blowing through the trees. The rumbling increased in volume, and the earth began to sway with a sharp, quick motion, that seemed to increase in force with each movement.

"An earthquake!" exclaimed Josefa, springing forward with blanched cheeks. "And Manuel is in the cañon! He will be killed, he will be killed!"

The few horses that were near the house were running wildly to and fro, and the cattle were bellowing, adding to the confusion of the moment. Josefa rushed forward, and securing her favourite horse, was on his back and speeding towards the cañon in a moment. Despite his nervous and excited condition, the traveller rose and followed her as fast as he could, and as the trail in the cañon was difficult for horses, owing to the loosened boulders that had lodged across it and broken it away in places, he overtook her before she had gone far.

"You must not come here," he cried. "The earthquake has loosened these boulders and has cracked the trail, so that it may give way at any moment. Go back, and if Manuel is in the cañon I will find him and bring him safely to you."

"No, I must come," she said briefly, and on they went up the trail. They had not gone far when they came upon the object of their search. Manuel was lying in the trail, beneath an immense boulder, which, wedged between the bank and a small tree on the outer edge of the trail, rested upon his legs so that he could not move, though his arms and body were free.

Although he was not badly hurt, his position was a precarious one, for the boulder in striking the tree had loosened the roots, and the whole trail at that point was likely to give way at any moment, plunging him a thousand feet down the precipice.

VIII.

Keeping Josefa back from the dangerous point, he examined the situation thoroughly, and then shook his head gravely.

"There is but one way," he muttered to himself, "and any way it will pay my debt. A life for a life is fair turnabout." Then addressing Manuel, he said: "When I tell you push upward with your hand on the boulder, and lie as close to the inner wall as you can. Do you understand?"

"Yes," replied Manuel.

Stepping carefully over the crumbled earth, the stranger caught the small tree, and picked his way out until he stood over the precipice.

"Now push with all your might," he cried, and, giving himself a violent swing outwards, he threw all his weight upon the tree. It trembled a moment, and then the roots tore themselves loose, and tree, boulder, and man went crashing down the precipice.

Josefa, who had gone back round a bend in the trail, heard the crash, and stepping forward saw Manuel lying upon the edge of the trail, released from the boulder, but still lying upon the crumbling earth.

With a glad cry she rushed forward and helped him out of his peril. Then she looked round for his preserver. He was nowhere to be seen.

"Ah, he has gone," she said. "He said he would go when you came, and he has run away from us. But I have you now, Manuel, and I am so happy." Then, with a little shudder, as she looked over the edge of the trail of the seemingly bottomless abyss: "Suppose you had gone over there, Manuel. It would have been terrible!"

Barry Sharpe.

Digitized by Google

THE ✦ WINNING ✦ OF ✦ GUNHILD:

Or, The Vengeance of the Vikings.

By GEORGE C. WALLIS, Author of "Behind the Barrier," etc.

SUMMARY.

Valstran, a Dane, attacks North-hold, a Viking homestead, during the absence of the young men. Sigismund and Olaf follow the raider, but are defeated, and Olaf is killed. Editha, their mother, and Earl Bjorne, her husband, induced their only remaining son to take Harald Aslison and go out again in the new ship, the Walrus. Before leaving, Harald plights his troth to his cousin Gunhild, daughter of Editha. While they are out fighting against great odds at sea, Turgrimm, a friend of Bjorne, comes upon the scene, but on learning that Harald requires help, refuses it, and goes on to Bjorne, whose daughter, Gunhild, he wishes to marry.

CHAPTER V.

How Harald Won the Wings.

Harald was not unconscious long. Eric and Sigismund together had turned Valstran's weapon back as it curved to the next stroke, and when Harald opened his eyes again these two were keeping off the Danes like the tough fellows they were. His head was throbbing with a violent pain, and all things swam before his eyes when he staggered to his feet and seized Longsword from one of his men.

But the son of Asli was made of hero-stuff, and, conquering his pain and unsteadiness with a mighty effort of will, he rushed into the fight anew, and, all bleeding and bruised as he was, slew three reckless Danes who came in the way of the keen blade. Then he met Valstran again hand-to-hand, though Eric would have held him back, and Sigismund cried out to the men to follow him closely and have an eye to the swinging axe of the foe.

"Stand back, men!" shouted Harald, so that his voice was heard above the roaring of the storm; "stand back, and let me have fair play with this blustering Dane! Stand back, I say!"

Reluctantly the men of North-hold obeyed, and the enemy also let their leader have a free space, and there the two met again in a duel that each knew would only end with the death of himself or the other. Valstran was by this time like a man bereft of his senses, so long and stubbornly had these sturdy Norsemen withstood him and his crew, and his swings, therefore, came fast and furious, his battle-axe strokes playing on Harald's defence like a fiery hail, and bearing him abaft before the fierceness of the onset.

The nearly-severed body was hurled . . . down into the hold.

Nevertheless, Aslison grew calmer as the fight went on, and though ever stepping back or sideways to avoid the crushing blows, kept a wary eye on the red-haired Dane's every move, and twice got the point of the long-sword through his guard, and drew blood on his left arm.

This made Valstran wilder than before, and he foamed at the mouth like a berserker, and gritted his teeth with rage, and redoubled his frantic efforts, till Harald saw that he must close with him, and that speedily, if he would keep a whole skin.

So just when the gleaming axe came sweeping down he sprang nimbly aside and let out suddenly in the other's face with the keen sword. Valstran saw the flash of the steel and jerked back his head so that the blade was foiled of its aim, but so great was the force that its owner's arm had given it, and so sharp its edge, that it passed clear through the thick pine shaft of the axe, severing it in twain as neatly as a woodman's knife lops off the dry branches of a sapless tree!

"It is a good blade that Thrunna gave me!" cried Harald with a grim laugh at his foe's discomfiture, "and well-tempered, I swear! It shall win me a name yet. And, Sir Dane, get you some other weapon, and let us finish this little bout of ours—if you dare!"

Stung to additional fury by the taunt, Valstran seized a sword and flew at his enemy, and the two were soon deeply engrossed in an interchange of straight cuts and short slashes and firm thrusts and swift strokes and lightning parries and cunning feints, till the young eyes and strong arms of Harald began to tell in his favour.

Then slowly he recovered the ground he had lost, and pressed the other back towards the fore hatchway. Valstran struck out at random now, and not so often, as his strength failed, and when, in recoiling from a flaming slash of the Norse blade, his feet caught in the combings of the hatch and he stumbled, Harald leapt forward with a fierce laugh, and raising the long sword high above his head, brought it down upon the other with such true aim and stern force, that the matchless edge cut right through chain-mail and jerkin and flesh and sinew and bone, and the nearly-severed body was hurled in a heap through the loosely-closed woodwork of the hatch down into the hold!

A mighty shout of victory rose from his men at that master-stroke, and with one accord they fell upon the startled Danes and quickly drove them to their own vessels, and then, led by Harald, boarded in their turn, and hunted them down and slew them one by one till not a Dane was left alive in the three ships, and the sea was rid for good and all of that sea-wolf and his ravening crew.

But when the struggle was over, they found Harald leaning against his own mast, his hot fingers still clutching the handle of the long sword, but so death-like a pallor on his face that it was visible under the wet salt glaze and in the dim light afforded by the stray moonbeams that now shot through the rapidly sailing clouds. Eric and Wulfhere saw him first and seized him ere he fell to the deck, and tenderly carried him to shelter and laid him on a rude couch and fetched Sigismund to him. Between the three of them they wiped the brine from his skin and washed him and then left him to sleep till dawn.

Meantime, the storm still raged—the Storm-Yötun, Aegar, was in one of his wildest moods—and not until far into the next day did the sea calm sufficiently for the sailors to unhook the grappling chains of the two empty ships and cast them loose with holes in their keels below the water-line so that they sank, and then, at Sigismund's command, they ran into a little solitary creek where only peaceful fisher-folk dwelt, and after quieting the alarm their sudden appearance caused, took Harald ashore and had him nursed in one of the huts.

Digitized by Google

Some weeks the Vikings lingered there, resting and helping the villagers to fish and putting the Walrus to rights, and Harald recovered from his hurts and grew strong and well again and was impatient to be going home.

But Sigismund, who had a wise head on his young shoulders, would not hear of undue haste.

"The storm has blown us far out of the beaten track," he said to the fretful youth, "and though you have fairly won the right to wear the golden-winged helm of your father's, which you have in the ship, you must be well rested from the strain that the gaining of the right has cost you. And if that traitor Turgrimm has, indeed, gone to North-hold, as you fear, it will be well to be prepared with strong sinews and steady nerves for the meeting with him!"

"You are right, Sigismund," said Harald, stroking the fair curls of a little Norse maiden who clung to his knee—a little maiden whose blue eyes were as lustrous and deep as his sister Thelma's. "You are right; yet I fear every moment of delay while that crafty hound is there—for something of myself and Gunhild I must have told you when I raved in my fever-madness after that night?"

Sigismund understood and nodded, then said quietly, as was his habit when well pleased:

"No one better could I wish to be at once my cousin and brother. As soon as I feel justified in letting you go we will hoist sail."

And Harald held out his right hand and Sigismund grasped it, and the two looked into each other's eyes, and in the silence knew that their souls swore eternal friendship, and that the desire of each was henceforth to be aided by the other to the end of life—be it near or far.

Then after a few days more of rest, Sigismund gave way to Harald's pleadings, and they set the bow of the long ship for the fjord on which stood the home of their kith and kin.

The place seemed strangely deserted as they let down the gangway plank to the shore, and Harald felt a chill of terror at the silence of it all as he leapt to the ground in the fresh morning air.

"What evil thing has befallen the hold, Brun?" he inquired of a solitary fisherman whom they discovered mending his nets under the lee of an upturned boat. "Has some spell fallen on the place, that none of the folks are stirring?"

"Why, 'tis the young Earl!" cried Brun, uprising as quickly as the rheumatism in his old limbs would allow, "and all too late come, I fear, if you would have Gunhild to wife, as we all hoped."

"What has happened? Speak, man!" cried Harald, clutching his shoulder in the extremity of his fear for his love, till the old man cringed in his grasp, "out with your news, no matter how evil it may be!"

"Well, Earl Harald," said Brun, "this is Gunhild's wedding day, and all the folk are feasting in the grand hall, and I expect by now she is wife to surly Turgrimm, whom we all wish anywhere but here. But you have made my shoulder ache, young sir!"

Harald heard not the last half of the old man's tale: he was out of hearing before it was finished, and running as though for his life with long swinging strides up the hill to the hold, and had outdistanced the others by a hundred paces when he reached and opened the door, and burst in upon the amazed guests.

BODLEIAN BODLEIANA

The two looked into each other's eyes.

CHAPTER VI.

The Fight at the Feast.

Stalwart and glorious he looked as he stood there in the hall in the full glow of the sunlight that gleamed on the golden wings of his helm and glittered adown his mail and threw into bold relief the sinewy outlines of his form; and Gunhild, recognising him before any of the others save his mother, rose to her feet and gave a little cry of joyous surprise, and then, with a wild, impetuous motion, took the golden hoop that shone with gems as many as the stars in the northern crown, from among the sunny masses of her hair and threw it to the floor at Turgrimm's feet.

A moment they stood thus; the traitor who knew that his prey was snatched from him at the last, staring wildly at Harald through the smart of the ale in his eyes, and wishing that he had not hung his sword and belt on the wall opposite in order to indulge his appetite to the full. Then, as Sigismund and the others filled up the doorway behind him, Harald drew the long sword from its sheath and said:

"You offer me no greeting, Uncle Bjorne, when I return with name and fame and the wings upon my head? You thank me not for coming in time to save Gunhild the disgrace of being wife to a cowardly traitor!"

"Yes, you are strangely silent, husband," said Editha, before Turgrimm could reply to the purposed insult.

"Peace, woman!" cried the old Earl, rising in his place,

Digitized by Google

"let us know what has kept you away this long time, Harald Aslison, and why you speak of my guest thus?"

His manner was stern and his voice threatening, for Bjorne was in a very irritable mood, being neither pleased with himself nor with anyone else.

"Sigismund shall tell you what has kept us away so long," said Harald, smiling grimly, "and then you will not need to ask why I spoke as I did."

And he leant on his sword whilst his cousin told the tale of Turgrimm's meanness and his own brave deed, and at the hearing of how he had slain Valstran, such a wild Viking cheer went up from the men of North-hold that the rafters rang again with its echo, and a kestrel wheeling in mid air near the cliffs was startled by the sound of it.

And Freyda whispered to Gunhild, seeing the girl's secret in her burning cheeks and flashing eyes: "He is a worthy lover for you—this son of mine!"

Gunhild answered not, but clasped Harald's mother's hand tightly in her own, and with her free arm pressed wondering Thelma to her side. Harald, seeing the three standing together at the far end of the table, was glad, but had no time for gentle words just then.

"Yes; Earl Bjorne," he said, "that is our story, and that is why I ask you how it is you thank me not for coming to save Gunhild from being wedded to this knave."

The old man groaned aloud, answering not, but Turgrimm replied, attempting to brave the matter out:

"The marriage feast shall not be stopped by the idle, spiteful chatter of a braggart stripling but just out of his teens. To your tables, men, and when the ceremonies are over I will set you to chastise this bitter-tongued youngling for his false sneers."

Instead of noticing him, however, all men turned to look at Harald, who strode a step nearer to his rival, and said calmly:

"You fear my strength and skill, traitor, or you would have given me back my charges at the sword point, poltroon that you are!"

"I do not waste good steel on rash youngsters," said Turgrimm, though shifting uneasily, and glancing furtively and longingly at his heavy blade on the wall.

"Nithing!" cried Harald, raising his sword till it flashed in his hand like a bar of light, "Nithing! You are not worth a fair fight, and so, by all the Gods of Asgard, if you do not turn at bay, I will cut you down, even here, in my uncle's hall, come what may of it!" And the long blade came to within an inch of Turgrimm's side.

The craven hesitated no longer then, but ran round the table for his own weapons, and Harald came after so close on his heels that in fear of the keen blade behind, Turgrimm passed them without a stop, and would have slunk outdoors but that Sigismund and the others barred his way. Then twice more round the table he sped, with Longsword after him, while the men of North-hold roared aloud at his evil plight, and the women laughed and called him "nimble-feet," and his own men sat and muttered under their breath till presently one of these latter put out his foot as Harald came past, and tripped him to the floor.

In an instant he was afoot again, and an arrow of Eric's quivered in the man's back, but Turgrimm had seized the chance and his shield and blade, and stood on the defensive, calling to his crew to aid him.

At that Sigismund and the men of the Walrus got out their weapons, and fell upon the guests, and then uprose such a clamour in North-hold Hall as had never been known since Bjorne's grandfather Offa had slain Edda his brother as he sat drunk in his chair, for jealousy.

The women clung together at the lower end of the room, palely anxious, but without cry or sound, while the men of the Walrus and the men of the Hawk fought and struggled in the mêlée of overturned tables and broken stools and spilt ale, and food trampled underfoot, and so fiercely they strove that twice Turgrimm fell and escaped by the skin of his teeth, that a flying dagger, missing its aim, was embedded to the hilt in one of the criss-cross beams of the wall, and that two of the combatants who were locked in the death-grip near the fire fell upon the blazing logs in a helpless heap, when one of Eric's arrows pierced the follower of Turgrimm in the side, and they were with difficulty got out and separated before being burned beyond hope.

An arrow of Eric's quivered in the man's back.

The opposing parties were evenly matched, and the fray might have been long-drawn-out had not Earl Bjorne—having held his men back with great trouble—at last made his stern voice heard above the wild tumult, and commanded that as they all valued the rules of hospitality and common civility they would hold down their weapons in his house while they called themselves his guests and friends.

Harald had already shivered his enemy's blade with his own ringing steel, and had got the traitor by the throat with his left hand, and was shortening his sword in the act of running him through, when the others dropped their hands, and he heard the words of Bjorne. Even then he would have made an end of his foe—and better it would have been had he done so—had not Gunhild rushed forward and stayed him with her hand.

"Nay, slay him not, Harald, but let him go like the disgraced cur that all men now know he is."

With a wild cry of hate and impotent chagrin, Turgrimm wrenched himself from Longsword's grasp, and calling his men together, went with them out of the hall in the midst of a great silence.

Six of the guests were left dead amid the wreckage of the feast, and five of the men of the Walrus. The first they took and flung outside to their comrades, the latter the

Digitized by Google

"Slay him not, Harald!"

women cleansed and laid out on a rude bier, and then began putting the place to rights, as is the way of women in a house. And Harald sheathed his blade and went to old Bjorne and said:

"I crave pardon, uncle, for treating your guests so roughly. Pray tell me that I have your pardon—for I was sorely tried—and give me your permission and your men to hunt down this traitor without delay."

"And I, too, crave that boon," said one-armed Sigismund.

Bjorne thought moodily awhile before he spoke, meeting the approving gaze of his wife and of Asli's widow as he said:

"No, Harald. There has been blood enough spilt in my house to-day; enough of my visitors slain. Also, this man is the friend of my second cousin, Ogier, and for his sake I must let the coward and his crew go. For the rest, you have my pardon."

The two young men turned away at that, knowing further appeal would be useless, and Freyda and Thelma met Harald, and the one wept over him for joy at his success, and the other clung to his hand and gazed into his face with all a child's awe at the strong and marvellous.

"Yes, little one!" laughed Harald, raising his favourite to his shoulder, where she held on by the wings of his helm, "You will have a warrior do as much for you some day, with those wonderful deep eyes of yours!"

And then, after he was washed and refreshed, Harald sought out Gunhild—who was not hard to find—and they talked much. And Harald's man, Eric, stole round to the back of the house and made love to Iduna, Gunhild's maid.

CHAPTER VII.

The Coming of Ogier.

Though thus roughly repulsed, and with no excuse left for further lingering, Turgrimm—keeping for the most part of his time on board the Hawk, which lay moored below the landing-place—stayed in the fjord for several days, and when one misty morning he saw the peak-sails of a short but deep-draughted ship coming round the bend of the cliffs, he frowned angrily to himself and bade the men hoist a friendly signal.

In answer from the other vessel up went the fluttering ensign of the Silver Fox which Turgrimm knew so well as the name of his friend's ship, and presently unseen by the landsfolk, the sides of the two craft grazed and his friend Ogier stepped aboard the Hawk.

"Greeting, friend," said Ogier, grasping the other's hand, "what do you here?"

"I came after a girl's pretty face—more fool that I was—and have been well snubbed for my pains," said the other bitterly.

"After Gunhild?" asked Ogier. He was a man of few words, was this tall, dark warrior, whose cool bravery had won him wealth and renown in many a hot fight.

"Yes," answered Turgrimm, "and the saucy minx would have none of me, and her father and brother were full of harsh words. So I am sulking here until the fit seizes me to stir!"

Not a word of his own treachery and rough treatment; not a word of Harald!

"Well, friend," said slow-speaking Ogier, going back to his ship after some further talk, in which he made no mention of his own purpose, "I am here on a short visit, and I will talk of this with these relatives of mine."

And when the Silver Fox was out of the range of hearing, Turgrimm said aloud: "There goes his friendship, I'll warrant. It will be as well to be out of here before he knows the truth, for he is one of those silly sticklers at trifles who would slay himself or anyone else for honour!"

Ogier went in, and all innocent of the events of the last few weeks, was made as jovially welcome at dinner as the home folks could make him, and through the whole of that day thought that it was no marvel his friend had loved fair Gunhild, seeing that he—who was so very hard to move to tenderness for women—was even more in love with the Earl's daughter now than when he had last seen her, a year agone.

And when the women left the room at night, Ogier leant back in his chair and thought that the time had come to speak that which was in his mind. But being very sensitive to rebuffs, and more fearful of failure in love affairs than in matters of war, he resolved to speak to Gunhild before he mentioned his desire to her father. If she looked on him with favour, well and good; if not—and the way her eyes brightened when young Harald spoke to her gave Ogier some misgivings—if not, he would go away and try to forget.

Editha took Gunhild aside that night and said in a softer tone than was her custom:

"You will be asked again in marriage ere to-morrow night, child, for a multitude of lovers is the penalty of fairness such as yours. Shall I speak in this Ogier's favour for you, or not?"

"What mean you, mother?" said Gunhild, open-eyed, thinking of Harald the while, "how know you that our guest will do what you say?"

"I have made no mistake," said the Earl's wife, smiling

Digitized by Google

shrewdly, "he is rich and a widower, and it is a long way here from his home. His glance was on you all the time you were in sight, and three times when Sigismund spoke to him he was so lost in reflection that he answered not. It will be as I say."

Gunhild was silent, and after a pause Editha went on:

"But there is one in whose favour I may speak, if Freyda tells me truly, and his name is not Ogier! Am I not right in that also, child?"

Gunhild's colour deepened and she would have said "yes," but that she was a little afraid of her stern mother even yet over this matter, so she said naïvely:

"I cannot feel the same for this Ogier that I do for cousin Harald."

Editha laughed softly to herself, and said no more.

Sure enough Ogier spoke to Gunhild, as her mother had prophesied, and that sooner than the girl had expected.

She had gone with Sigismund up the fjord to fish in the early morning, a time of day she dearly loved to be about, and which, perchance, had given that delicate rose tint to her fresh, young cheeks; when Ogier came pulling up the crystal waterway and joined them as they passed the spot where the river falls with a mellowed roar in twenty white-wreathed leaps into the deep flood below. Then Sigismund, feeling lazy, got ashore on a green island, and let the two go on, bidding them pick him up on the way back.

Silently the thoughtful man rowed up the still waters, past more green islets and clumps of wild raspberry and hemlock, behind which the buzzards called to each other, until they came to the shadow of the great cliff whose rocky face goes sheer down to the fjord bottom without a jutting crag or needle to entangle the fisher's lines.

On all sides of them—for Gunhild was in Ogier's boat—rose the fir-clad mountains, purple and stupendous, and on the bright greenery of birch and pine, and spruce twig and bilberry bush seen on the lower slopes, the dew-gems strung on the gauze-threads of the morning sparkled like a tracery of molten silver fire. And save for the occasional scream of a kestrel overhead or the rustle of the hawks as they sought their nests in the cliff-face, all was wrapped in a quiet that one hesitates to break.

Ogier.

Yet love unloosed the tongue of the man of few words, and presently, when the long weighted lines had been thrown and several good trout hauled in, Ogier, taking Gunhild's hand in his, said, with a heart-tremour such as he had never felt in the thick of the fiercest fray:

"Can you guess, fair Gunhild, why I am here at North-hold?"

"Partly, sir; but I wish you would not hold my hand so tightly. You are my father's cousin, and he is noted for his strict hospitality, and there is better fishing here than at most places!" and Gunhild looked at him shyly, yet with a merry laugh in her bright eyes.

"All excellent good reasons," said Ogier, his words coming with great trouble, "but not one of them is the true reason, fair child. There is a maiden lives at North-hold, with whom I am in love, and it is her presence that brings me here. And you can tell me her name if you will, and whether my love is likely to be looked upon with favour."

"What mean you, mother?" said Gunhild.

It was in Gunhild's mind to ask, with a jest, whether this fair one was Iduna, her maid, but she glanced at Ogier ere she spoke and the smile died on her lips at the earnestness she saw there, and she replied:

"Yes, I know that it is I, Ogier, whom you would ask to love you. And sooner than trifle with such an honest heart as yours is, I must tell you that it cannot be."

Ogier was not downcast at once, but went on his knee before the fair girl—whose golden locks, escaping from her coif, shone in the morning sun like a shoulder-mantle of priceless worth—and bent his dark head over her dainty hand and kissed it reverently and said:

"I do not ask you to marry me at once, Gunhild, but I would plead that you think of me, and, if you can, come to love me, no matter how little. No other shall I have if I have not you, and no other can love you more deeply. Pray tell me there is hope, and I shall be more than satisfied."

The girl looked down at the man's bronzed, honest face, handsome now with the earnestness of his pleading, and tears stood in her grave eyes.

"I am more troubled than I can tell you, Ogier, that my luckless face should thus excite such a hopeless love in one so brave and true of heart, but it is better that you should know, once and for all, that it cannot be. There is another who loves me—whom I love."

"Harald?" asked the man, with a quiver in his voice.

"Yes, Harald," answered the girl, disengaging her hand.

"Well, he is a brave youth and a good one, Gunhild," said Ogier, rising and mastering his emotion like the true man he was, "and I pray that you and he may be happy."

"I trust that we shall, and I shall always remember your gentleness," said she; then added, a sudden thought arising: "Have you spoken to my father—of—of this?"

"No, child. I thought that yourself should best know your own mind's desire."

"Then I am more grateful than words can tell," said Gunhild, "and think it will be better for both of us if what has passed between us this morning remain known only to ourselves. It will save you from much thankless pity, Ogier, and me from much flattery."

"It shall be our secret," said Ogier.

Then they pulled in their lines and rowed back to the islet and roused Sigismund, and went home for the morning meal.

(To be concluded.)

Digitized by Google

LEGENDS OF WOLFVILLE.

BY "DAN QUINN."

Wolfville is a Cattleman's Settlement in Arizona, and the Characters in these Legends are Cowboys.

No. 9.—Spanish Bill Helps Point a Moral.

"IT is just after Short Creek Dave gets to be one of them evangelists," remarked the old cattleman as we made company for each other one evening, "an' has been exhortin' of us Wolfville people over in the warehouse of the New York store, as Dan Boggs confides in me how once he mebby half-way makes up his mind he'll be religious.

"'Leastwise,' says Boggs, when he takes me into his past that away, 'I allows I'll be religious in the spring after the round-ups is iver.

"'It's in the winter when I makes this determination, an' of courze the spring round-up is months away. But I allers puts it up I'd shorely made it an' got plumb into the fold, only it was a bad winter, an' in the spring the cattle was weak an' starved; an' gettin' down an' chillin' to death about the water-holes; an' I was ridin' the hills a-cussin' an' a-pullin' of 'em up on to their feet; an' all 'round it's that rough an' I'm that profane an' violent, I reckons towards April probably my soul's buried under ten foot of cuss words, an' j'inin' the church in my case is mighty necessary.

"'You see,' says Boggs that time, 'thar's no use tryin' to hold out cards or coal-deck your Redeemer. If your heart ain't right it's no use to set into the game. He sees plumb through every card you holds, an' nuthin' but a straight deal from the warm deck does Him.

"'So I thinks bein' as how you can't fool your way into Heaven, an' recallin' the bad language I uses that spring an' winter workin' them cattle, I won't even try. An' that's why, when resolvin' one winter to get religion mebby next June, I don't get nothin' when June comes but whisky, an' goes on an' persists in my sinful life as thartofore.

"'It's over to Taos I gets this religious idea. I'm just into camp from some'ers down 'round Seven Rivers, in the Pecos country, an' I don't know a soul. Which I'm by nature sociable an' gregarious; so not knowin' what folks weighs an' preys on me, an' the first night I hastens to remedy this yere evil.

"'I'm the possessor of wealth to a limited extent—for I shore despises bein' broke complete, an' generally keeps as good as a blue stack in my war-bags—an' so I goes projectin' round from dance hall to saloon an' deciminates my dinero and acquires nose paint an' friends.

"'As that ain't but three saloons incloosive of the hurdy-gurdy, I'm goin' cursin' on these grand rounds I've instituted on a sort of triangle. It can't be said but I'm makin' runnin' of it, however, an' I don't reckon now it's more'n an hour when I knows all the good people in Taos, bar Mexicans an' what Eastern folks would get fooled into callin' "the bitter element." It also follows like its lariat does a loose pony, that I'm some loaded, not to say confoosed.

"'It's because I'm confoosed I'm misled into this prayer-meetin'. Not such exercises is due to dim my chances none now, nor yereafter, but I ain't calculated to adorn no such exercises, nor take proper part tharin; an' I'd shorely passed it up an' kept on to the hurdy-gurdy if I'd known.

"'As it stands, I blunders into the game inadvertent, but havin' picked up the hand I nacherally goes on an' plays it.

"'It's this way about them religious exercises: I'm just emerged from the "Tub of Blood," an' am p'intin' out for the dance-hall when I crosses the trail of a wickey-up all lighted, an' singin' on the inside. I takes it for a joint I don't know an' ain't seen none as yet, an' nacherally heads up an' enters. From the noise I allows mebby it's a Mexican place, which greasers allers puts up a heap o' singin' an' scufflin' an' talkin' in all they does from monte to a bull-fight.

"'The second I'm in I sees it ain't Mexicans an' it ain't monte. Good people they was; I sees that; an' as a passel of 'em near the door looks shocked at sight of me, I'm too bashful to break out again, but sorter aiges into the nearest seat an' stands pat.

"'I can see for all I has under my belt the outfit figgers on me raisin' the long yell an' stampedin' 'round permiscus to make trouble; an' so I thinks to myse'f I'll fool you all a lot, for I just won't say a word.

"'So I sets quiet as a coyote at noon, an' after a while the sharp who's dealin' for 'em goes on with his orisons which I interrupts as I comes surgin' in.

"'When he's talkin' he says one thing I remembers. It's about castin' your bread upon the waters. He allows you'll get it again an' plenty with it. It's playin' a white chip to win a blue; that's what this sharp says, an' it shorely strikes me as a dead easy game.

"'Every time you does good, says this sky pilot, Fate is out to play a return game with you; an' sooner or later you quits winner on all the good you promulgates that away.

"'I sets the deal out an' gets some sleepy at it too. But I won't leave till the end, so as not to scand'lise the congregation; an' as I contributes some heavy when the plate goes by, I ain't regarded as no setback to the meetin' neither.

"'When the contreebution box—which she's a tin plate—comes down where I be, I'm sorter noddin', I'm that sleepy. I hears the jingle of money an' rouses up thinkin' mebby it's poker I reckon.

Digitized by Google

"'"How hard are you in?" I says to the part next door to me who's just gone to the centre for a peso.

"'"Dollar," says the party.

"'"Well," I says, "I ain't seen my hand since the draw, but I'll raise yon nine just the same." An' I boards a ten-dollar bill.

"'When the rest goes I sorter sidles forth an' lines for the dance hall. The fact is, I'm needin' what you call stimulants. But all the same it sticks in my head about that bread business, an' castin' good deeds on the water that away. It sticks thar yet for that matter.

"'Bein' released from the devotions of them people I starts in to drinkin' agin with zeal an' earnestness. Thar comes a time when all my money is in my boot.

"'You see, I only takes two stacks of reds with me when I embarks on this yere debauch. Bein' some crafty; an' a new injun at that agency that away; an' not knowin' what game I may go against, I puts the rest of my bank roll over in Howard's store.

"'It turns out, too, that every time I acquires silver in change, I carefully commits it to my left boot, which is high an' ample an' seems to be built to hold specie.

"'Why I puts this yere silver money in my boot laig, is shore too many for me as a conundrum. But I recalls that I feels mighty cunnin' over it at the time, an' regards it as heap deep play.

"'As I tells you, thar arrives an hour while I'm in the "Tub of Blood," when my money's all in my boot an' thar's still liquor to be purchased. Fact is, I just then meets a gent named Hawkins; as good a citizen as ever rifles a deck, or pulls a trigger, an' of course p'liteness demands we put a bottle or two in play at once.

"'That's why I has to have money. I don't care to go pullin' off my boot in the "Tub of Blood," an' makin' of a vulgar display of my wealth by pourin' the silver on to the floor. Thar's a peck of it, if thar's dos reals; an' such an exhibition as spillin' it out in the "Tub of Blood," is bound to mortify me and Hawkins, too; an' most likely lead to the barkeep or somebody makin' remarks. So I concloods I'll hop outside an' round up my silver, an' then return.

"'"Excuse me," I says to Hawkins, "just you camp right yere with the bottle an' I'll be among you agin in a minute all spraddled out."

"'So I goes wandering out back of the "Tub of Blood" whar it's lonesome an' thar's nobody lookin' on bar coyotes, an' camps down back of a Spanish bayonet bush an' tugs away to get my boot off, an' my dinero into circ'lation.

"'An' while I am at it, sleep and nose-paint seizes me, an my light goes plumb out. I rolls over behind the bayonet bush, an' snores off to sleep. It must have made them coyotes stop an' consider a whole lot about whar I be.

"'Just to show you how good them coyotes is, I want to tell you—I don't notice it none till the next day—while I'm curled up to the rare of that bush they comes mighty near eatin' of the scabbard off my gun while it's in my belt. Fact; the scabbard looks afterwards like some pup not otherwise engaged has been chewin' it. But of course, bein' dead entire like I was from visitin' 'round so much, I ain't mindin' nothin' so oninterestin' as a coyote bitin' on the leather of my gun.

"'Now this is where that bluff about bread on the waters comes in; an' it falls all so pat on the heels of them devotions of mine that night, it he'ps burn an' brand it on my memory.

"'While I'm layin' thar too dead to skin from nose paint, and mighty likely while them coyotes is lunchin' off my scabbard that away; along comes a bad man they calls Spanish Bill. I learns afterwards how this Spanish Bill is hard clean through. He's rustled everything from a bunch of ponies to the mail bags, an' ain't reckoned nuthin' but a hold-up who needs hangin' every minute of the day.

"'Whatever takes him out to where I lays by my bayonet bush I never knew. He don't disclose nuthin' on that p'int afterwards; an' I've figgered more than once mebby he tracks up on me accidental.

"'But what informs me some plain that he explores my war-bags for stuff before he concloods to turn in an' look after my health is that later on when I onfurls my finances to him he seems sorter disapp'inted an' hurt.

"'When this yere Spanish Bill ropes on to me I don't know nuthin'. The statesticks furnished by the barkeep of the "Tub of Blood" next day goes to the effect that I'm shorely out thar four hours.

"'When Spanish Bill discovers me I'm mighty near froze stiff; for I'll let you in quiet and between us, those nights in November has a heap of things in common with them Arctic regions we hears of, where Franklin an' Kane an' the rest of that passel of fur-lined sports goes in pursoote of that North Pole.

"'So, bein' froze that away, an' mebby from an over dab of nose paint, I never saveys a thing about this yere Spanish Bill ontil hours afterwards.

"'But the barkeep says this Spanish Bill drags me into the "Tub of Blood," an' allows he's got a maverick.

"'"Fix this yere froze party up something with fire an' teeth," says Spanish Bill to the barkeep. "I don't know him none; but he's got to be recovered if it takes every chip in the check rack."

"'So the barkeep an' Spanish Bill stands in an' brings me to, so I can walk some if Spanish Bill goes along steadyin' of me by the collar. Tharupon said Spanish Bill rides herd on me till he gets me down to the Jackson House an' spreads me out on some blankets.

"'It's daylight when I gets around so I knows my name's "Boggs," an' I'm a native of Kentucky, an' little personal things like that. An' what wakes me up is this Spanish Bill; he's shakin' my shoulder.

"'"See yere," says this hold-up, "I'm goin' to turn in now an' yere's what you do. Thar's five whisky checks on the 'Tub of Blood' which will he'p you to an appetite. Followin' of a sufficient quantity of whisky you will return to the Jackson House an' eat. I won't be rolled outen my blankets by then, but they knows that Spanish Bill makes good, 'cause I impresses in on 'em speshul when I comes in.

"'"You don't know me," goes on this Spanish Bill, as I sets up and blinks at him some foggy an' blurred yet, "an' I don't know you; which we'll allow outen p'liteness is a dead loss to both. But my name's Spanish Bill, an' I'm turnin' monte in the Bank Exchange. I'll be thar at my table by first drink this evenin'; an' if you'll sa'nter that way at that epock as your busted an' ain't got no money, of course, I'll stakes you on my way."

"'It's this bluff about me not havin' money puts me in mind when my head's in better thinkin' order that this Bill must have rustled my raiments that time I'm presided over by coyotes while I sleeps. When he says it, however, I merely remarks that while I'm grateful to him as mockin' birds, money after all ain't no object with me; an' pullin' off my high moccasin I pours some two pounds of specie on to the blankets I'm camped on.

Digitized by Google

"'"Which I merely packs this in my boot," I observes, "to put myse'f in mind I've got a roll big enough to choke a cow over to Howard's store."

"'"An' I'm glad to hear it," says this Spanish Bill; though as I suggests he acts pained an' amazed at the exhibition like a man does who's overlooked a bet.

"'Well, that's all thar is to that part. That's where Spanish Bill launches that bread of his'n, an' as I states, it sorter bears down on me as a thought like a saddle that don't fit, an' keeps me feelin' an' rememberin' what that sky scout says at the prayer meetin' about the action a man gets by playin' a good deed to win.

"'It's the middle of January; mebby two months later when I'm over on the upper Caliente about fifty miles west of the Spanish Peaks. I'm workin' a bunch of cattle; Bar-c-Bar was the brand, an' the y'ear mark's a swallow-fork in the left y'ear, with the right y'ear under-hacked.'

"What's the good of a y'ear mark when thar's a brand?" repeated the old cattleman after me; for I had interrupted his tale of Boggs' troubles with the question: "Whatever's the good of y'ear marks? Why, when cattle is in a bunch standin' so close you can't see no brands on their sides, an' you're looking through the bunch to cut out what don't belong therein, y'ear marks is all you can go by.

"They all turns to look at you as you come ridin' an' pesterin' about among 'em, an' thar you get their y'ear marks like printin' on the page of a book. If you was to try an' go over a herd by the brands you wouldn't cut out a steer an hour. But to go back after Boggs.

"'I'm ridin' down a draw one time,' says this Dan Boggs, 'cussin' the range, which is bad, an' the weather which is worse—it's the hard winter I mentions when so many cattle dies an' I swears so much—when my pony goes to having symptoms.

"'This pony I've saddled—I has ten in all—is that sagacious that while it makes not the slightest mention of cattle when they're near, never draws up on deer, or people, or any body strange in the hills, but it takes to givin' of manifestitations so as I can square myse'f for whatever game they opens on us.

"'As I says, me an' this yere wise pony is just pushin' out into the Calient when the pony begins to act queer an' make signs. I brings him down all cautious where we can look out across the valley, an' you can gamble I'm some astonished to see a gent walkin' along a foot out mebby a couple of hundred yards. He sorter limps, an' leans over on one side, like he's hurt.

"'Nacherally I stops an' surveys him careful. It's plenty strange he's there at all, an' stranger still, he's a-foot. So I looks him over for weapons—I wants to note what he's like, an' how he's heeled.

"'You saveys as well as me it don't do to go canterin' out to strangers that away in the hills, speshully a stranger who's a-foot. He might want your pony for one thing, an' open a game on you permiscus with his gun, an' would leave you broke, an' too dead to know it.

"'I'm allers cautious around a man who's lost his hoss. It makes him cruel, crazy an' f'rocious, helpless, an' let out, he goes plumb locoed. A gent afoot is a heap easier to aggravate, an' a mighty sight more likely to lay for you than if he's safe an' solid in a Texas saddle with a Spanish pony between his knees.

"'Which is why I remarks that I takes in this pedestrian all car'ful an' stacks him up ackerate before I goes after him.

"'As I says, he carries on like he's hurt, an' he's packin' a six-shooter. He makes a sorter familiar figure, too, an' while I looks him over I'm wonderin' where I crosses his trail before.

"'As I has the advantage of a Winchester I at least rides out into the open an' gives a whoopee. The party turns, comes limpin' towards me, an' whoever do you allow it is?

"'Which it's shorely Spanish Bill, an' it's right yere he gets action on that bread on the waters he plays in when he recovers me an' releeves the coyotes that time in Taos, on which occasion disinterested people like the barkeep of the "Tub of Blood," offers two to one I'd shorely freeze stiff if Spanish Bill hadn't stood in on the play.

"'To make it brief, here is how it is: Spanish Bill tells me that after I leaves Taos he goes over an' deals monte a bit at Wagon Mound. One night a Mexican comes caperin' in, an' after Spanish Bill gives him a lay-out or two he makes a bet of fifty dollars on the queen—what the greasers call the hoss. The Mexican loses, an' instead of takin' it easy like a sport should he grabs the money.

"'As was his duty, Spanish Bill wipes him over the head with his six-shooter as a reason to drop the money. The Mexican tharupon searches out a knife, an' this so complicates the business Spanish Bill in an effort to simplify things, ups an' shoots the Mexican full of holes.

"'The shootin' was on the square, an' of course no one takes no hostile notice of it. Spanish Bill goes on laying out his monte cards same as usual. Two days later, though, he gets a p'inter the Mexicans are fixin' for him. So that night he moves camp, mebby it's 160 miles from Wagon Mound over on the Vermejo.

"'But the greasers hang to the trail, it seems; for the day before I tracks up on him, as he an' a side pard whose name is Hill, is ridin' along, a band of Mexicans hops outen a dry arroyo where they're bush-whackin' for 'em, an' goes to shootin'.

"'As might be expected, Spanish Bill an' his pard turns loose an' shoots back agin free an' frequent, an' near as I sees, they shorely enjoys a high, successive time.

"'They downs Spanish Bill's pony an' creases his side; which is what curves him over, an' indooces him to limp when I meets up with him. As well as he knows his pard charges plumb through; an' as Spanish Bill goes down with his pony, leaves him, allowing he's dead an' done for good.

"'Which it was this pard's turn to know that Spanish Bill's dead before ever he lines out; but he's weak or rattled, so he don't stop to investigate. Spanish Bill puts it up when he tells me the story, he's due to shoot up this pard of his'n for abandonin' him that away, if he ever crosses up with him. Which bein' as it should be, I fully approves tharof.

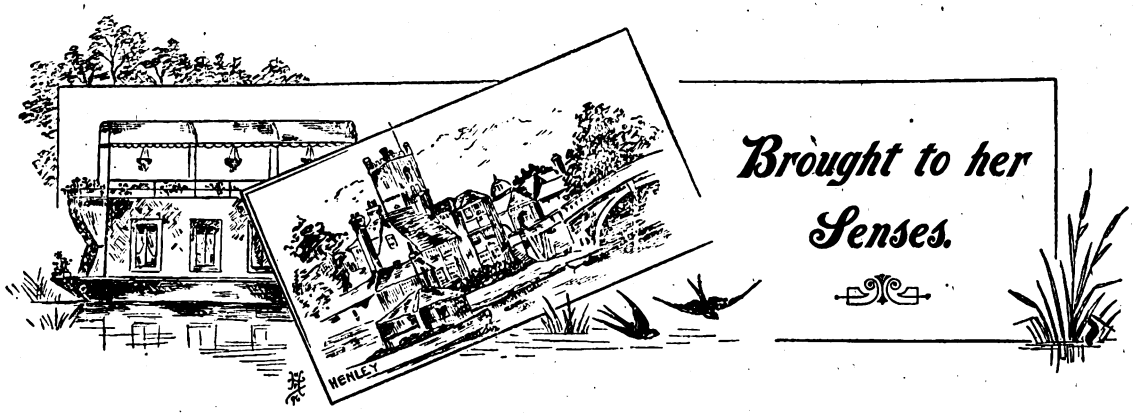
"'When this yere Spanish Bill goes down, the Mexican scatter likewise. They was shy two people with another plugged deep and good; all of which I hear afterwards; so you notes that Bill an' his mate is aiming low an' excellent.

"'It's only a half mile to a little ranch, an' Spanish Bill gets over thar as soon as he can, an' gettin' a pony an' saddle, which he easy does with his money, he breaks back into the hills, where we met. He's afoot, because that mornin' his pony gets tired of the deal an' bucks him off, an' goes stampedin' back where he gets him.

Digitized by Google

"'While he's talkin' I recalls how Spanish Bill rounds me up that night in Taos, so I don't hesitate. I takes him over to my camp an' fixes him up. The next mornin' he turns his nose towards Texas on one of my best ponies; which is the last I sees or hears of Spanish Bill—onless he's the Bill who's lynched over near Eagle's Pass a year later, of which I has no proof, but surmises it some likely.

"'It's after Spanish Bill is gone, I brings up again what that Gospel person says about doin' benevolences, an' how after many days you reaps a big winnin', an' lives on velvet for all eternity. An' don't you know this Spanish Bill pickin' me up that night, an' then in less than two months when he's afoot an' hurt in the hills, gettin' against me an' drawin' out of the game ahead a saddle, a pony an' safety, makes it look like that Bible sharp is right? That's how it strikes me, an' just as I tells you, if so many cattle hadn't died that spring, an' if I hadn't give way so frightful in my talk, I'd shorely trailed down a congregation the next June, an' got a stack an' stood in.'"



"GREG, are you awake?" calls a tumbled heap of femininity upon the sofa.

"I am." And a wreath of cigarette smoke floats above a masculine head lying comfortably amid a heap of cushions in the big armchair.

"I've just come across these old letters in my desk. I'm going to read them aloud."

"I'm at your mercy."

"I'll stir up the fire first. I want more light. There! Just listen to this, now:

"MY OWN DEAREST GREGORY,—For the last time I write you thus. Yes, indeed, it must be so. It has all been a happy, foolish dream, but now it must end. To-day, I release you from our engagement. A marriage between us would be most ridiculous. We are both so very young—too young to decide so important a matter; mamma says so, and I am sure she is right. We have had a long talk. Besides, your salary has proved too small for one.

"Now, dear friend, do nothing rash. Men do not die of love. Your life is not your own, so no experiments with laudanum. Do not come to see me. My mind is fully made up. I shall travel with dear mamma, and see more of this great world than I have hitherto known. Now write me a nice letter, and tell me that I am a very sensible girl. Be brave—no nonsense, and remember that I am your ever-devoted friend,

LUCY."

"That was a nice letter to read when a fellow was hungry!"

"Did you receive it before dinner? I might have known you did by your hateful answer. Here it is:

"MY DEAR LUCY,—You are indeed a sensible girl, and I am proud of my little friend's judgment. You were always a trump. My mind is much relieved by your decision. I have often thought that perhaps we were a trifle foolish, don't you know. I didn't like to say so myself, though. You will pardon the brief character of this note when I tell you that Tom Wayland is waiting for me. We are just off to the club to dine. By-the-way, that report in regard to his sister's engagement is false. She told me so herself this afternoon. And now, good-bye, little kitten. Be happy—bu of course you will. It is the warm wish of your friend,

GREGORY.

P.S.—Regards to your mother. Appreciate her. You may not have her always."

Silence.

"What a villain!" A sigh.

A chuckle from amid the cigarette smoke.

"What fools girls are!" from the sofa. "'Tis easy to forgive them for it—as long as they're pretty. Go on. Read your answer."

She reads:

"Sir,—I have heard before of the transient nature of man's love, but allow me to assure you that I have found yours more ephemeral than any yet on record."

Interpolated chuckle from the big armchair, and vigorous response of "Wretch!" from sofa. Resumes letter:

"As for Miss Wayland, I am glad somebody finds so much to admire about her. The poor thing never had any attention before. I hope you may both be happy."

Voice from the armchair: "She was a beauty."

Voice from sofa: "She was horrid. Great big, vulgar thing."

"Go on."

"Hum! Where was I? Oh, here." Reads:

"As for my mother, she inherits her worldliness. I have not spoken to her to-day. And now, good-bye—what a word! May you forget the ruin you have wrought in a young girl's heart! I shall pray for you always. May death soon claim LUCY.

"What a wretch you were!"

"A very clever wretch, I think."

"Was it a trick?"

"It was—and it succeeded."

MADELEINE BRIDGES.

Digitized by Google

MY FRIEND SIR KIRBY HALLUM

THIS winter I am taking a rest after a round of gaiety and social activity which I never equalled before, and I doubt my going into the "swim" again next winter, or for some winters to come, for that matter. I am desirous to explain my reasons for this withdrawal from society, and in order to do so I shall be obliged to tell you of my relations with Sir Kirby Hallum.

You see, I have aways felt that it was in a sense my duty to move in good society, and I have been at some pains so to arrange my affairs and social relations as to be able to attend most of the better class of private entertainments given in London during the past two or three winters. It not only gave me no small enjoyment, but it also assisted me materially in my business.

It was a matter of considerable difficulty to secure an invitation to the Fitzwarren reception, but I managed it—no matter how—and it was at this reception that I made the acquaintance of Sir Kirby Hallum.

I had strolled into Dr. Fitzwarren's surgery to get out of the hot and crowded reception-room, and, in the dim light, was leaning against the window-casing, idly tapping on the glass with my nails, when I noticed at the top of the window-sash a bit of metal gleaming in the semi-darkness. I touched it, and found that it was a part of a burglar alarm, moving when the window was opened upon another bit of metal, and by contact completing an electric circuit of some sort.

I am something of an electrician, and my interest and curiosity were at once aroused. Without stopping to think, I unscrewed the upper bit of metal with my knife, and, after twisting off the wire which led from it into the woodwork, was examining it when I heard a light step at the door, and looking round, found standing by the table a tall, dark-skinned man in an evening dress, with black moustache and imperial, and long, rather curly black hair—in all suggesting at once the popular idea of his Satanic Majesty.

By one of those impulses which overcome us at all times, I slipped the bit of metal in my pocket and turned towards the stranger, whom from his dress and manner I assumed to be one of the guests at the reception.

"I hope I don't intrude," he said politely.

"Oh no," I hastened to reply; "I am glad someone else can enjoy the coolness here."

"I think I have not the pleasure of your acquaintance," the stranger said, smiling; "as guests of this house, I trust we need no formal introduction—my name is Hallum, Sir Kirby Hallum."

"And I am William Vance; very much at your service, sir," I returned, decidedly pleased with my new friend's voice and manner. "I am indeed glad to make your acquaintance, Sir Kirby."

I found Sir Kirby Hallum a very agreeable fellow; a gentleman of refinement and culture, polished, and well-informed, a ready conversationalist, though decidedly reserved as to himself, and a smoker of excellent cigars. We discussed books, yachting, horses, politics, et cetera, Sir Kirby showing himself a man of wide reading and depth of thought along many lines.

I could learn nothing, however, of his own occupation—he was especially reticent on that point. Sir Kirby casually let slip that he had been on the Continent until recently; his business had taken him there on two days' warning, and had brought him back as suddenly; he could not tell how soon the present matter would be disposed of, or where he would go next.

"I am an uncertain fellow," he said, laughing, "and never know my own plans two weeks in advance. Indeed, my plans are largely made for me, and I go and come usually at the bidding of others."

While we were talking, Dr. Fitzwarren entered, and I did not see Sir Kirby again that evening, for, while I presently returned to the reception-room, Sir Kirby remained chatting with his host.

I was decidedly ill at ease, for I had that piece of burglar alarm in my pocket, and could find no opportunity to put it back. I was fully aware that my hasty action might be misconstrued by one who did not know me, and I was anxious lest Sir Kirby had seen me take it down, though not in the most remote way had either of us referred to the subject.

It was no business of his, though, in any case, and I deemed myself in no way bound to consult him about so trivial an affair. Besides, I was inclined to think he had not seen me take the piece of metal. It subsequently appeared, however, that he did see me take it, and his actions were strongly influenced by the ideas this trifling incident suggested to him.

As it happened, I found no opportunity to approach the window again, and I went home with the bit of metal still in my pocket.

That night an attempt was made to rob Dr. Fitzwarren's house, the burglars entering by the very window from which I had removed the burglar alarm. They did not succeed in securing any plunder, being frightened away before any valuables were found.

Now this attempted burglary was similar to several others which had taken place at some of the finest residences in town, in each case following only a day or two after a reception or a ball similar to that at Dr. Fitzwarren's house. As it happened, in every similar instance but one, I had been a guest at the entertainment, and I had almost begun to fear lest the people who had invited me should regard me as a bird of evil omen, and cease to "request the honour of my presence" at their houses.

Digitized by Google

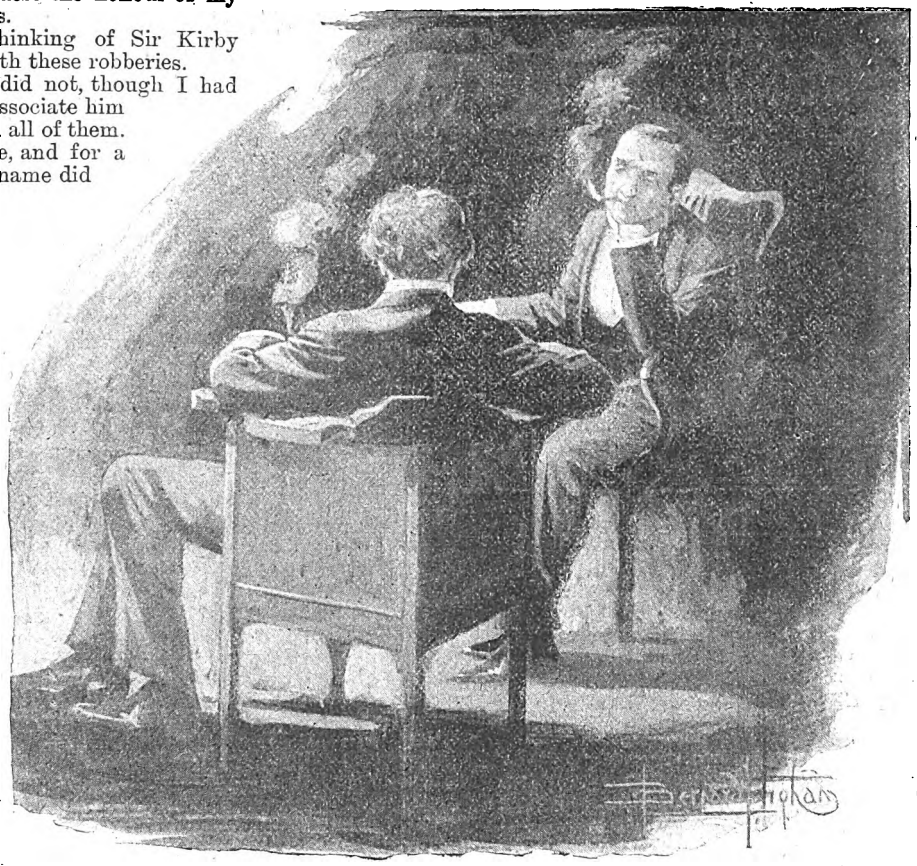
Probably you are thinking of Sir Kirby Hallum in connection with these robberies.

I must confess that I did not, though I had occasion afterwards to associate him more or less directly with all of them. I had met him but once, and for a short time only, and his name did not occur to me until two weeks later, when Lord Upton's daughter was married. At the reception, in the evening, I met the baronet again, sauve, polite, but, as before, suggesting Mephistopheles.

I encountered him a dozen times that evening — on the back verandah, in the conservatory, in the garden —till I began to regard him as my evil genius. Particularly did he hover in the neighbourhood of the room full of silver ware and jewellery which comprised the wedding gifts.

When I left the house the last person I saw was Sir Kirby, who went out with me and left me at the corner below, turning down a narrow side street with a wave of the hand and a cheery:

"Good-night, Vance."



I found Sir Kirby Hallum a very agreeable fellow.

I saw the baronet again that night, and it happened in this wise. The moon had gone down, and it was nearly three o'clock in the morning, when, with two friends, I stood in the rear of the ducal mansion, under the shadow of a large bush. I was still in evening dress, but I had a soft hat pulled down over my eyes, and wore a dark overcoat. In my hand I held a revolver, as did my two companions.

In pursuance of my project, it was only a minute's work to quietly open the door at the rear of the house and the glass door at the head of the stairs within. Two minutes later we were in the room with the wedding gifts. A dim light burnt in the chandelier, and at the other side of the room the figure of a man lay on a sofa. I slipped over to his side, and with my revolver close to his temple, signalled to my friends to begin their work.

At the first soft clink of the silver in the bag in which they were guardedly slipping the wedding gifts the room was suddenly flooded with light, and I heard an oath from one of my companions. I turned quickly, to see Sir Kirby Hallum and three policemen standing in the doorway. I had time only to see the baronet smile triumphantly and nod in my direction, before my arms were seized from behind, the weapon wrenched from my hand, and with sharp clicks of locking handcuffs I was a prisoner. Sir Kirby then spoke:

"Hardly expected to meet again to-night, eh, Vance? You tried that burglar alarm dodge once too often, let me tell you. Gentlemen, you are my prisoners."

As I before remarked, I am now taking a rest from my social duties. I shall stay at this institution somewhat less than twelve years, and there are eight indictments, I am told, waiting to be attended to when I leave.

HARRY ROGERS.

"Melody" Concert.

At ST. JAMES'S HALL,

ON SATURDAY, MAY 2.

A Copy of the May MELODY will procure admission.

Miss Esther Palliser, Mdlle. Landi, Mr. Edward Lloyd, M. Johannes Wolff, M.M. Fauré and Pierné, are amongst the artistes engaged.

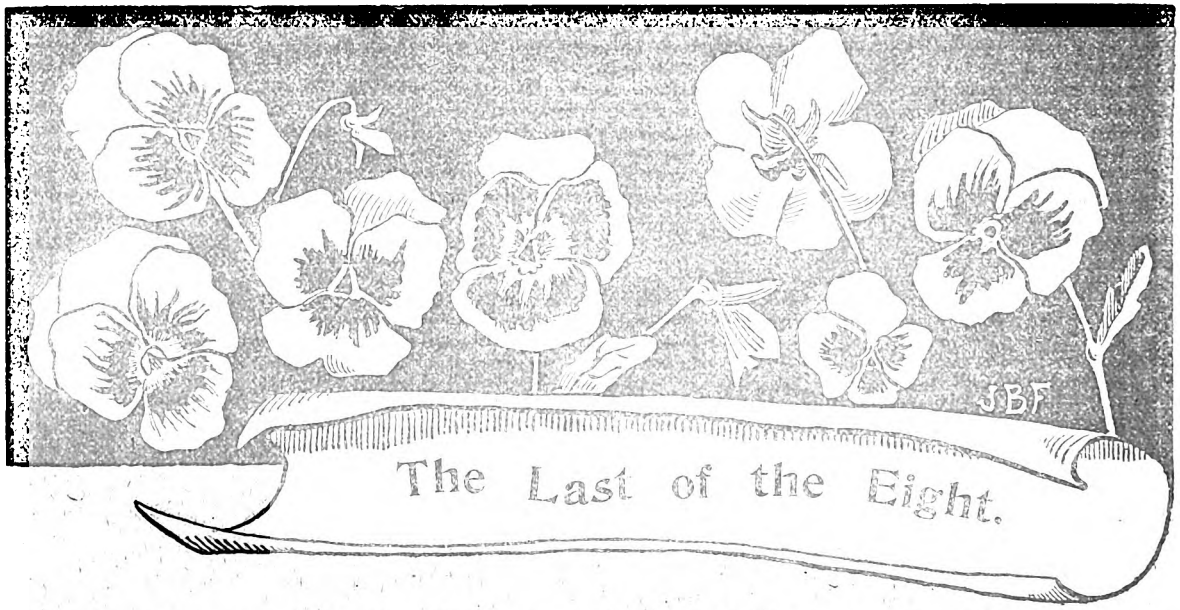
No. 5 OF PEARSON'S MAGAZINE.

No. 3 OF MELODY.

Price Sixpence each.

ON SALE ON THE FIRST OF MAY.

Digitized by Google



Ahmanzade Mehemed, the Sirdar of the troops of Tunis, was renowned for his extraordinarily severe discipline among the soldiers under his command. "Don't fear the enemy," Mehemed used to say, "only fear Ahmanzade Mehemed, your commander." And it is recorded as a fact that his soldiers did not know such a word as fear on the battlefield, but they trembled in the presence of their general, Mehemed.

The first war in which Mehemed was engaged was against the insurrecting Greeks in Albanus, and it was in this expedition that his troops first excelled. In this campaign Mehemed ordered eight cavalrymen to watch the five wells of Arta, a spot which the Greeks often visited. These eight soldiers had received strict orders to challenge every passer-by, never to close, as the saying goes, even one eye, and not to dismount on any consideration.

About midnight on the first day of their watch a driver of a waggon tried to pass by unobserved. When he saw he could not carry out his intention he left the waggon and his team of oxen and fled. The waggon was loaded with a cask, and, without dismounting, the soldiers succeeded in removing the bung, and they then soon detected from the smell that the cask contained brandy, an excellent beverage, most probably distilled from figs and raisins.

Mehemed's soldiers were not forbidden to drink confiscated liquors. They managed to get some reeds, which they inserted in the bung-hole, and began to suck the delicious brandy to their hearts' content. They never thought of the Prophet's saying that wine in any form was a wicked drink of Satan, and Satan soon saw that he had the soldiers at his mercy. First of all the soldiers were asking each other why they were sitting in their saddles when they could enjoy a much-needed rest on the lawn. Nobody would ever know if they were to dismount and to stretch their tired limbs on the grass. They could fasten their horses to the waggon, and nobody would betray them.

And they finally did lie on the lawn. The drink persuaded them to be still more incautious. Why should eight of them be watching when four would do just as well? And a minute later were fast asleep, and the rest—well, they tried to keep the watch, but not for long. The remaining four soon argued that two would be enough to watch, and Maruf and Sefer were left to guard the wells of Arta and their comrades.

"Let me tell you," said Sefur to Maruf; "one man would do just as well as two. What do you say?"

Maruf, being of the same opinion, answered—"Let us play a game of chess. The loser must keep the watch; the winner may rest." Sefer accepted the proposition.

The two drew a chessboard on the sand. They made chess pieces out of wild pears to represent the kings, wild apples served as queens, nuts, acorns, and other things served as rooks, knights, and pawns, and the game began. At first Sefer had an advantage, but getting rather mixed up, and not being able to distinguish the pieces, he lost his queen, and was about to resign, as he could not prevent a mate in two moves. Maruf interrupted the game by exclaiming: "You are in a precarious position, Sefer."

"Yes, I know," replied the latter. "I shall be mated in two moves. I could not play well, for I am almost asleep."

"Go on, then, and asleep," said Maruf. "I shall watch for you all."

An instant later seven of the eight soldiers were fast asleep. Maruf, gun in hand, was walking to and fro after the fashion of sentinels, principally to keep sleep away. After a while he decided to sit down on the lawn. He closed his eyes, thinking that he could rely on his ears if anybody should approach, and only a few minutes had elapsed and the eight soldiers were fast asleep.

The Greeks who lay in ambush, came forth, unfastened the horses, and would have certainly have killed the Turks but for the noise made by one of the animals when led away. Maruf was the first on his legs. In an instant the eight were standing in fighting attitude, but it was useless. The Greeks had mounted the horses and laughed at the pursuing Turks. Maruf's horse, however, made it hot for the Greek who rode it. The rider was thrown and the horse joined the eight Turks. One horse for eight cavalry-men!

Digitized by Google

"What will Mehemed have to say to this?" exclaimed the soldiers.

They knew that their lives were forfeited, but they were really more upset about the loss of their horses than about that. Sadly and timidly they returned to the camp, and, being brought before their severe commander, they made a clean breast of it. They related the story in all its details; how they had disobeyed orders by dismounting, how they fell asleep in consequence of taking too much brandy, how the two men had played a game of chess, and how they had lost the seven horses.

Ahmanzade never showed his feelings when about to speak. From his face they could not read the sentence which he was to announce, after he had listened to the story of the disobedient soldiers. At last he spoke:

"As there are eight men for one horse, seven of you are superfluous, for I never read in the Koran or in the Azorath that eight men could mount one horse. But as you are all good chess players, let a tournament decide who of you shall be the one to sit on the horse. The other seven will be shot."

He now ordered four sets of chessmen and boards to be brought to a specially appointed spot in camp, and then the eight men began a tournament in which their lives were at stake. Twelve sharpshooters were ready to carry out the sentence of death passed upon the losers. One or two weak players soon surrendered to their strong opponents; others got desperate and won their games by hazardous combinations. The four losers were at once led away, and twelve shots announced that they had paid the loss of the game with their lives.

The first round was over, and the four surviving players were now paired for another go. The excitement and the seriousness of the stakes seemed to prolong the contest. An ill-considered move, a loss of a piece or even a pawn, meant death. After a while the second round was over, two were taken away from the boards, and a few minutes later twelve shots announced in camp that two had ended their lives. Only Maruf and Sefer were left for the third and final round. Both men were known to be the best players in the regiment, and when they sat down to begin the game the excitement in the camp was at fever heat. A big crowd of soldiers was standing around them, and as the contest remained even for a long number of moves, as neither side was able to gain the least advantage in position, the spectators and players alike became so interested in the game that they forgot the seriousness of the stakes. The lookers-on nodded their appreciation when a good move was made, and discussed in low tones the position arrived at.

By-and-bye the battlefield became simplified, pieces were exchanged and pawns taken. Maruf succeeded in capturing a rook by a seemingly brilliant combination. Everybody now named Maruf as the winner.

Sefer, upon losing that important piece, studied a long time. Maruf, who thought he had the man beaten, did not look at the board—that is to say, his mind was occupied with other thoughts. Sefer did not move, but still kept looking at the position, and Maruf again directed his attention to the board. As he did so he became as pale as death, and he trembled all over. He suddenly perceived that, in spite of his numerical advantage of pieces, his game was hopeless. He saw not that if Sefer sacrificed his queen for a rook, he could then effect a mate by means of a bishop. "Will he see the combination?" Maruf said to himself. The answer of this question meant death or life. Maruf realised in an instant Sefer was aware of the situation. Maruf wondered why did he not make the move. But Sefer's thoughts were no longer given to the game, but to some other subject altogether. At last the silence was broken.

"Maruf," said Sefer, "how many children have you at home?"

"Four," came the reply, in a trembling voice.

"Your wife will shortly present you with another child?"

"Yes."

"Have you a good wife?"

"She is faithful and good," answered Maruf, while the tears were rolling down all over his face.

Sefer put his hand to his forehead, murmured something like a prayer, and asked for a dish of water. When this was brought he washed his hands and his face and addressed his adversary thus: "You have always been a good comrade. Last night you did not make me keep watch, although I lost the game to you." Then he touched the bishop and not the queen. A few moves later Maruf gave a check, the crowd of bystanders solemnly cried "mate" in a chorus: Maruf was proclaimed as victor.

Sefer got up, shook hands with his late antagonist, beckoned to the sharpshooters who stood in readiness, and two minutes later Sefer's noble heart had ceased to beat.

Maruf, however, remained at the chess-board. He stared at the pieces as if absent-minded, and later he tried in vain to place the pieces in a certain position. He placed black and white men into altogether impossible positions, and then he kept staring at the board.

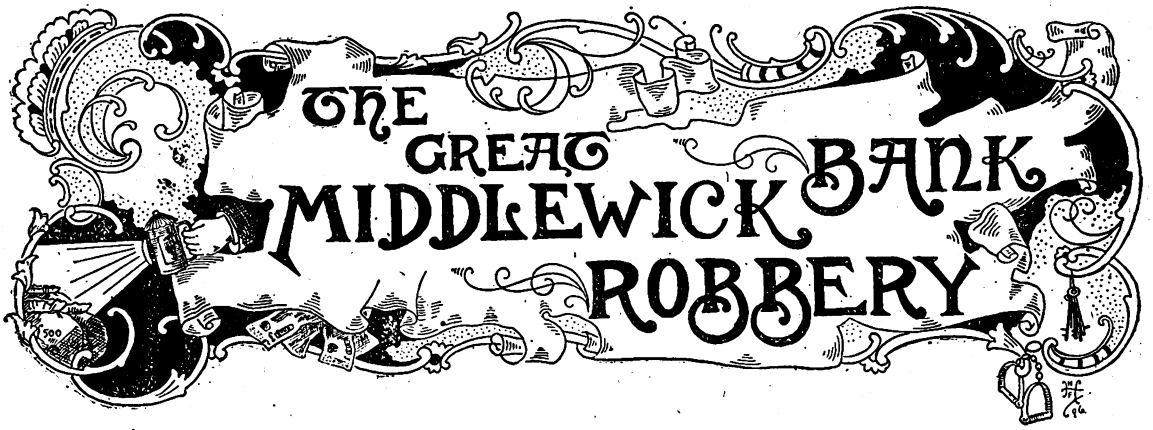
"Get up," commanded Ahmanzade, who has been a witness throughout the tournament. "Mount your horse; your life is spared."

Maruf, however, did not heed the words of his commander; he still kept looking at the board, making all sorts of silly moves, and winding up with an outburst of laughter. Then he wept bitterly for a while. "How stupid these pieces look," he then said; "one is a horse, the other wears a turban."

"Lead him away," ordered Mehemed. Two soldiers took him away. Maruf stared like a madman. The surroundings seemed strange to him. He looked round, still absent-minded, and what he said was unintelligible. His last game of chess had made him mad.

MORITZ JOKAI.

Digitized by Google



CHAPTER XV.

AN ADVENTURE AND A MISADVENTURE.

AFTER leaving Jack Burton on the afternoon preceding the last attempt upon the Middlewick Bank, his friend Taylor had strolled off in the direction of the hotel.

It will be remembered that a plain understanding had been come to between the two men as to the respective parts they were to play in the events that were then only a few hours distant.

It was growing dusk when Taylor walked into the coffee-room, in the doorway of which he encountered a man coming out whom he recognised as Roberts. Neither showed the least sign of recognition, and Taylor, for his own part, was convinced that therein Roberts was not acting a part.

In the most natural manner the detective turned and watched the criminal, who crossed the street and turned to the left. Determined to keep him in sight, Taylor did the same, keeping sufficiently in the rear to prevent his errand being suspected in case the other should look round or retrace his steps.

Roberts' course convinced his follower that he did not know he was being shadowed. The one in advance continued onward, turning several corners until he speedily reached the outskirts of the small town. This fact added to the delicacy of the work Taylor had taken upon himself, for both were soon practically alone.

Believing he was on the eve of an important discovery, the pursuer held back until he could hardly distinguish the shadowy form as it moved forward at a moderate walk. About a hundred yards ahead, to the right, among a clump of trees, the detective fancied he saw the outlines of a house. He had never been in that vicinity before, but like a flash he associated the building with the business of the man whom he was following.

He was right. Roberts turned sharply to the right, and came more plainly into view as he walked along what seemed to be the remainder of a path and disappeared in the gloom of the trees.

"That old building is the burglars' headquarters," was the detective's conclusion. "I wish my lord the watchman was with me, but as it is I'll investigate for myself."

Nothing would have been more imprudent than to follow directly in Roberts' footsteps. He and his friends were sure to be on the alert, and would discover Taylor the moment he turned to follow their confederate. Accordingly, the detective walked past the building, hardly turning his head when opposite, though it is needless to say he used his eyes to the utmost.

It was as he supposed. A low, broad stone building stood in the grove, a structure that had probably been built before any of the houses in the present town of Middlewick. It was unoccupied, except by the men who had taken possession while planning the robbery of the bank.

A short distance to the rear of the building wound a brook that was lined with trees. The stream was several feet below the level of the surrounding land, and, crossing the road, was crossed in turn by Taylor, after passing further along the highway. A little way in this direction brought the wooded hollow between him and the old house, thus affording the screen necessary in carrying out the plan he had formed.

Taylor vaulted over the fence, hurried along the edge of the wood, and in a few minutes was behind the structure that had assumed so much interest for him. He found that between it and the nearest point of the hollow was an open space of a hundred feet in extent. The grass-grown plot had to be crossed in order to reach the building itself.

A nearer view of the old stone building left no doubt as to its great age. It had probably been deserted for the past twenty years, and no doubt was in a dilapidated condition. The surrounding trees were so scattered that, despite their exuberant vegetation at that season of the year, the structure was seen distinctly.

Nothing, however, could be effected without a closer view. From where the detective stood not a sign of life was observable. All the windows were dark, and the stillness of the tomb rested on the scene.

Taylor was not the man to hesitate when once he had decided upon his course of action. With his head bent as low as possible, he ran rapidly and lightly across the open space and entered the grove immediately surrounding the old house. With the utmost care he made a circuit of the building, coming back to the point from which he started. The shadows gave him good protection, for the moon had not yet risen.

Not the slightest sign of life was observed during his circumnavigation of the mysterious building. That one man, at least, was inside, he was certain.

While still debating upon the right course to take, he heard the sound of voices. Taylor stealthily shifted his position in the direction whence came the murmur, and saw three men approaching from the highway over the same course that had been followed by Roberts a short time before.

There could be no mistake as to their identity; they were Joe Nash, Will King, and Sam Birch. They entered the broad, tumble-down front door, and then followed the sound of several voices in conversation, though nothing that was said could be identified.

Then a singular occurrence took place. A light flashed to view in the large middle room on the lower floor. It need hardly be said that the windows were without curtains, and most of the panes were gone. There were two windows opening on the right, and the same number on the left.

Digitized by Google

On one of the other sides of the room a door communicated with the kitchen, and on the remaining side, with the broad hall leading to the front door.

Joe Nash found some sort of a seat at one of the windows on the left, and Will King did the same on the right. This, it will be seen, commanded every possible view of the outside and shut off any attempt on the part of Taylor playing eavesdropper by slipping forward and crouching under one of the windows.

Evidently the two had taken these positions to make sure that no one should steal a march upon them. Birch and Roberts kept away from the windows and nearer the middle of the room, since there was no occasion for them to help their comrades watch.

Only two alternatives remained to the detective, to enter the building from the back or the front. A brave man might well shrink from either attempt, for it was virtually entering the lion's den, with every chance on the side of the lion. But Taylor decided to take the risk.

Favoured by the gloom among the trees, he easily passed beyond sight of the watchmen at the windows, and approached the kitchen part of the building. An old door, with a single stone step, opened into this, the interior of the kitchen being in utter darkness.

A few minutes' examination revealed the old form of entrance. Instead of the modern latch or lock, a string dangled through an aperture that had probably been bored a century before. As in the days of our forefathers, a twitch of the latch-string opened the way into the building, while the door was locked by drawing in the string.

Taylor softly pulled the leathern thong and the latch was lifted. When he pushed against the door, however, there was no yielding. He tried it until convinced it was fastened on the inside by some other means.

Hobson's choice remained: he must enter by the front, or leave without accomplishing anything.

With a temerity approaching foolhardiness, the detective set about his perilous task. His action was almost a crime, inasmuch as there was no necessity for any such frightful personal risk as he now took upon himself. The programme for the evening had been made out. It was certain that these four men would try to rob the Middlewick Bank before the rising of the morrow's sun. The measures intended to defeat them had been agreed upon; it was not necessary to know more, to say nothing of the great risk Taylor ran of upsetting everything by his rashness.

With hardly a moment's hesitation he set about his task. Two broad, flat stones served as the steps to the front entrance. Here the massive door was ordinarily opened and shut by the old-fashioned iron latch, below which, on the inside, were the huge bolts and cross-pieces by which the entrance was rendered almost as secure as the solid walls themselves.

The criminals within might well think it unnecessary to lock the outer door. Surely no one would attempt to enter by that means, while any other approach would be detected at once. The rear being secured, they might well believe that anything they said was safe against eavesdroppers.

Taylor was on the alert for the sound of anyone moving within. If he could not avoid alarming the four conspirators, he could dash down the weedy walk to the highway, and thence in the direction of the town. The plotters would hardly dare to follow him, and if they did he was confident of surpassing their best efforts.

With the utmost care he raised the latch and held it suspended under the pressure of his thumb. So far as he could tell, not the slightest sound was produced. Then he pushed the door open. It moved backwards as if the hinges had been newly oiled. The darkness of the wide hall was before him, while a yellow line of light along the floor showed the closed door leading to the large room where the four men were seated.

He not only heard them laugh and speak, but distinguished several of the words that were uttered. It looked as if fate were favouring him. With the utmost care he managed to close the door as noiselessly as he had opened it. Although he was in a place he had never before seen, and with the impenetrable darkness on every hand, he had a general idea of his surroundings and of the right thing to do.

It must not be supposed that Taylor did not comprehend the risk he was running by his daring act. Sooner or late the four men would complete their council and leave the building, to do which they must come through the hall along which he was advancing like a cat. If they made this move suddenly they would be upon him before he could escape. In a conflict with four such desperate men he could have not the slightest chance. If he should attempt to run he would become the target for all their revolvers before he could reach the highway.

But Taylor indulged in some exceeding close theorising. Hours must pass before a move was made against the bank. Nothing was more likely than that the quartette meant to stay where they were until eleven o'clock, if not later. If for any reason they changed their minds, or had already formed a different intention, the listener would be able to gain ample notice of it from their conversation.

This was the theory that sustained him while advancing with the caution of one who feels that every moment may be his last.

When almost close enough to touch the inner door the detective stopped. He had gone so near that every word uttered was intelligible. He even withdrew a step or two towards the entrance.

As may be supposed, the conversation was extremely interesting to the man who had run all this risk to overhear it.

It was Joe Nash who said:

"It doesn't look as if a single person in the town suspects us. I've kept my eyes open ever since we've been here and seen nothing."

"Why should you?" asked Will King, "when it isn't to be seen. This is the finest job we've had for a long time. I was in the bank to-day, and had a good look at the safe."

"What sort is it?" asked Birch.

"The old-fashioned kind; it's as easy to open as a sardine tin."

"Do you s'pose there's much in there?"

"Enough to pay us, if we get hold of it."

"I came up last week, you know," observed Roberts, "and looked round. It took some time to learn what I wanted to know, but I found it out at last. Whom do you suppose this old hulk belongs to?"

The others could not guess.

"The old watchman at the bank. I met him the other day, when he was having a look at it, and got him to show me over it by pretending I thought of buying it. He said it was built by his great-grandfather, or some one, and that nobody has lived in it for twenty-five years. He's been trying to sell it for a long time, but no one will buy it at any price."

"You managed to get the provisions in here without any one seeing you, Roberts?"

"Oh, yes, that was easy enough after I'd learned all the ins and outs of the old building. I could stroll out this way after dark and leave a little of the stuff at a time. Besides, drinkables are more in our lines than eatables, so that made less trouble, you see."

"Especially when you carried most of the drinkables inside," was the facetious observation of Sam Birch.

"Of course I brought them inside, all of them, and I notice you've done your share in placing yourself outside them."

"Well, I think we can all plead guilty to that," was Birch's comment.

"Then," said Nash, "it is understood that as soon as the job's over we all come back here and stay for several days."

"You think that's the best plan?"

Digitized by Google

"By long chalks; the news will be telegraphed to-morrow to London, and the detectives will be on the look-out for us at all points. They will watch the railway station, scour the country and hunt everywhere—except here in this old building in this old town."

"The safest place after cracking a safe," philosophised Sam Birch, "is in the house next door."

"We will keep out of sight; that is, all except Roberts, who mustn't clear off too suddenly, and then when the way is clear steal off one by one and come together, as we get the chance, at the Hole in the Wall."

Taylor, who did not lose a word of this edifying conversation, felt that he was being repaid for his risk.

"Roberts is the master of ceremonies," added Joe Nash, "and is used to the business, so he need not make any mistake."

"Suppose there's a slip to-night."

"There won't be. That watchman is the stupidest dolt I ever met; we won't have any trouble with him, and that's all we need fear."

"Shall we drink to the success of the scheme?" asked Birch.

"No," was Nash's prompt reply. "We must have no muddled brains to-night. You've got to stand watch, and mustn't see double."

"But after the job's over and we are here, what then?"

"Then will be time enough to drink to the success of what we have done, not of what is left to do."

"And we are to stay here until it's time to move?"

"That's the idea."

At that moment the listening detective fancied he heard the door leading into the kitchen open. The noise was slight, but it disturbed him. He stood a few seconds, hesitating whether to withdraw or stay. He ought to have gone, for surely he had learned sufficient, but the words of the party proved they intended to wait several hours, and, unfortunately, he decided to listen a little longer.

"It's tedious business," said Birch.

"D'you know of anything that pays better?" was the pert inquiry of Nash. "You ought to understand that one of the virtues of our profession is patience."

Just then the detective heard a faint disturbance at the door behind him. He turned his head, but of course could see nothing in the gloom, nor did he detect any additional sound.

"I've stayed too long," was his conclusion, as he moved with less care than before along the hall.

Seizing the latch he drew it smartly backwards. The door did not respond. He tried harder than before, but it did not yield the fraction of an inch.

Convinced of treachery, he turned to ascend the stairs, which his sense of feeling told him ran up one side of the hall; but before he could reach them, the inner door was opened and a stream of light swept over him. In the blinding glare he saw himself confronted by three men, each with a levelled weapon, and he recognised the gruff command of Nash:

"Don't move!"

Even while the words were uttered the outer door also opened behind him, and Roberts approached from the rear.

Taylor was fairly caught, and had no choice but to obey. He did so with that promptness which he always demanded from members of the criminal professions when he held them at a similar disadvantage.

CHAPTER XVI.

How Roberts made a Distressing Discovery.

By what means the four criminals discovered the presence of the detective in the hall outside was never ascertained. Probably he made some slight noise that betrayed him, for the descent upon the startled officer was so overwhelming, surrounded as he was on all sides, that he had no choice but to submit as a prisoner.

Taylor knew how to bow gracefully to the inevitable. He remained stock still, until Joe Nash—the others holding their weapons ready—stepped forward and disarmed him.

Having satisfied himself that the captive had no more weapons about him, they all returned together to the room where a couple of candles were burning on the broad mantelpiece.

Taylor walked to the middle of the room, turned round, and, with a smile, lifted his hat, bowed, and said:

"Good-evening, gentlemen. How are you all? I hope I see you well."

"Alfred Taylor!" was the exclamation of Joe Nash, who was the first to recognise the famous detective. "What are you doing here?"

"Awaiting your pleasure, gentlemen," was the imperturbable reply.

But this facetiousness was wasted on these men. They were filled with wrath that the interloper should have followed them to their chosen retreat. Each man held his weapon in hand, and the scowling, threatening looks they cast upon the prisoner boded ill to him.

"We don't want any nonsense from you. If you know what's best for you, you'll answer our questions truthfully."

"I can't answer them before they are asked."

"What brought you to this out-of-the-way place?"

"I saw my friend Roberts strolling in this direction, and having nothing special on hand, thought it would be interesting to follow him. I did so; came in at the front door, and employed myself listening to your entertaining conversation."

"How much did you hear?" demanded Nash.

Had Taylor attempted to deceive these men by pretending he had just come and had not caught enough words to give him any knowledge of their scheme, every one of the four would have known he was speaking untruthfully. It could not have helped him, and was likely to work him injury.

"I have not been here long, but long enough to hear, as I judge, about all that was worth hearing. I understand you have arranged to crack the vault of the Middlewick Bank to-night, and that you intend to stay in this old house until the hue and cry is over."

There was the whole thing in a nutshell. What more could they ask?

"What brings you in Middlewick at the same time with us?"

This was an important question, and, as will be observed, the detective's reply was straightforward, even though misleading.

"I was sent for to look into another matter."

"What was it?"

"That I cannot tell you, for it would be unbusinesslike. I pledge you my word, however, that it has not the remotest connection with any of you. You can well understand that, when I say I have been in Middlewick the best part of two days, and had no suspicion when I came that any one of you had ever been in the town. Indeed, it is less than two hours since I accidentally laid eyes upon Roberts."

The criminals were inclined to believe this statement.

"Well," said Nash, "we've got you here, and that bank is to be cracked to-night. What do you suppose we are going to do with you?"

Taylor shrugged his shoulders.

"I'd like to know myself, but I shall have to wait until you choose to tell me."

"There's only one thing to do," interposed Roberts, who in some respects was the worst of the party.

A suggestive movement of his pistol left no doubt as to his meaning. A word from the leader would have caused Roberts to carry out his own wishes, and he would have done it, too, with pleasure.

But here was the problem. To release the prisoner would destroy the scheme they had elaborated with so much care and place every one of the four in peril, for the detective would be certain to turn his liberty to the best account without delay.

Digitized by Google

Taylor knew there was not one of these four who would hesitate to shoot a man in the way of self-defence, or when it became necessary to insure the success of an enterprise. Their previous history had proven that. There was only one of them, however, who was prepared to kill a detective when it was not absolutely necessary. That one was Roberts. He had followed his profession long enough to look upon all officers of the law as his mortal enemies. He specially detested Alfred Taylor, who had for months carried a warrant for his arrest and was suspected of holding similar papers relating to one or more other members of the party.

The question presented itself as to what was to be done with the officer to prevent his interfering with their plans. Taylor would have given his parole and respected it, but the ruffians were too suspicious to take any chances like that.

"Dead men tell no tales," added Roberts. "If you fellows are afraid to undertake the job I'll do it myself."

"Let me have my pistol," said Taylor, "and I'll be pleased to stand up in front of that coward."

But Roberts had no intention of settling the question in that fashion.

While Nash was as merciless as Roberts, he looked ahead. The disappearance of so widely known an officer as Alfred Taylor would be certain to be discovered sooner or later, followed by a strong probability that the crime would be brought home to them. That was liable to produce unpleasant consequences.

While the discussion was going on Nash took a candle from the mantelpiece, and said to King:

"Come with me."

He led the way down the stone steps to the cellar, the door of which was at the side of the room. Pausing at the bottom, Nash held the light above his head and looked round.

It was a spacious apartment, and, like most of the old-fashioned ones, wholly below ground. The two small windows, which lighted it by day, opened into little excavations dug on the outside, and neither window was large enough to allow any animal larger than a cat to crawl through.

All the walls were a foot in thickness. The only possible egress was through the door at the head of the steps by which they had descended into the cellar.

"What do you think of it?" asked Nash of his companion.

"It will do; it couldn't be more secure, but what about the door at the top of the steps."

"Some one will have to stand guard there."

"Who shall it be?"

"Roberts."

"But he'll shoot the prisoner."

"What of that? We'll be away when it's done."

"I understand," replied King with a nod of his head.

"All right. Then let's get upstairs again."

On their return to the room where Taylor and their two friends were waiting, Nash announced his decision.

"It won't do to let this young man loose till we've finished our business. The cellar looks pretty strong. Mr. Taylor will oblige by going down to the steps and staying there for a few days. In case he should be lonely, Roberts will stay in the building to keep him company and see that he doesn't get into mischief. Roberts, you're at liberty to do that as you think best. When Mr. Taylor returns to his friends he isn't likely to boast about this affair."

No, indeed; could the detective ever recall the episode without mortification? Never was an officer more perfectly checkmated.

"Good-evening, gentlemen, and may your scheme for to-night be confounded."

Taylor, hat in hand, bowed to the party, walked to the head of the stairs and coolly descended into the darkness below. His imprisonment had begun.

Roberts was disposed at first to protest against the leader's arrangement, for it eliminated him from all active participation in the unlawful business wherein such a distinctive part had been assigned to him.

But the scheme, after all, commended itself to him in more than one respect. In the first place, he was the most cowardly member of the company. He saw that if by any chance their scheme was overthrown, his position would be far more favourable than that of the rest of the party. His confederates were bound to protect each other to the last extremity, and, if the worst came to the worst, he could prove an alibi at the time of the burglary.

Then, again, he was to have charge of his most execrated enemy; that triumph was worth much. So he assented to the scheme.

The understanding was that the three men should leave the old stone house about eleven o'clock, each making their way to the bank by a different route. Birch was to take the lead, signalling to them as near midnight as possible if the coast was clear.

How this plan, supplemented by the complete overthrow of all their arrangements, was carried into effect is already known.

Thus it came about that Roberts found himself the only member of the party in the building, before midnight. He sat in the upper room, where he had been left by his companions with the candles burning and with his prisoner downstairs. He had given his own weapon to Will King, retaining for his own use the detective's revolver.

The door leading to the cellar, like all the rest in the old house, was much more massive and strong that is generally the case in houses of more modern style. It opened inwards, and was secured by means of a powerful iron bolt. Its position, protecting it from the weather, caused it to be much better preserved than the other doors.

The situation of the prisoner could hardly have been more secure. The single door by which he could escape was the one just mentioned. Since that opened into the cellar, it could be moved only by pulling it towards him. Thus assurance was made doubly sure, as any idea the detective might have of breaking it down by forcing it open with his shoulder was effectually done away with.

On the other hand, Roberts was at a great advantage. He was armed, while the prisoner was weaponless. It cannot be known what sinister designs assumed form in the treacherous depths of the miscreant's heart. Probably he contemplated an excuse for shooting the helpless officer, but was deterred by the fear of consequences.

Taylor's body might not be found for weeks, but one fact could be brought home to Roberts; he had visited the house a short time before the detective's disappearance, and represented to Warren that he was considering the purchase of the structure. Trifling as was this incident, it would be made to connect him with the crime, and he shuddered to think what the ultimate end of the other detective's work would assuredly be.

No; much as he might wish to put Taylor out of the way, he was afraid to do it. He would leave him in his underground prison without food or water, there to perish for aught his gaoler cared; but further than that he dare not go.

For fully half-an-hour the ruffian turned over in his mind a scheme for making a bargain with his prisoner by which the latter should pledge himself to drop all proceedings against him. The trouble about this, however, was that Roberts was powerless to offer the only terms the detective was likely to accept, since he dare not release him.

Roberts shrank from any attempt to take the papers from his man by force. Although a bigger built man than Taylor, he knew that his mode of life would give him the advantage. But the decisive point against the whole thing was that any papers obtained forcibly could not be of the slightest possible benefit to Roberts. Furthermore, it was likely that all documents which concerned the criminal were at the hotel where Taylor had been stopping.

It was natural that Roberts should feel curious as to the way in which his prisoner was passing his time in the gloom below. He could hear nothing, though he stood by the door several times listening for sounds from below.

Digitized by Google

He returned to his seat, lighted a cigar, and, looking up at the candles, awaited his friends' return. He calculated that this would not be for some time yet, as the bank job would employ them for some considerable time. At the end of three hours, perhaps, one or more of them would be back at the stone building.

It was now one o'clock, as a glance at his watch showed, and surely never had the minutes seemed longer. He assumed the easiest position he could in the unfurnished room, and, despite the many stirring thoughts which filled his mind, dropped asleep.

When he woke the morning light was shining through the broken window. The night had passed.

As soon as he recalled his wandering senses he sprang up and dashed to the door at the head of the cellar stairs. A second's examination proved it had not been opened, and showed no signs of disturbance. The iron bolt was in place, and Hercules himself could not have had forced it from the other side. Roberts listened, but all was silent below. Nevertheless, he knew his man was there, for he had not passed through the only avenue of escape that it was possible to use.

But what meant the absence of Nash, King, and Birch? They ought to have returned hours ago. Could anything have gone amiss? Roberts grew faint at the thought, but no other explanation presented itself. His anxiety became a torment to him. He peeped out of the window, but saw only a farmer driving along the highway.

He could stand it no longer. He must find out what it all meant.

But the prisoner below stairs—what would become of him?

Roberts knew of the two windows which let in a few streaks of daylight. They were too small to help Fagan. No; the door must be used, and that alone. The criminal now examined the fastenings once more. There was no way of making them more secure. In fact they were as strong as the entrance to the penitentiary from which he had had so much trouble in escaping several years before.

"He won't dare approach the door as long as he thinks I am on the watch," was Roberts' belief, "so I will let him continue to believe I am at my post."

This was easily done. He slipped out at the back of the house on tiptoe, and then reached the highway by a round-about course which precluded all possibility of the detective seeing him had he attempted to use the small windows.

Pulling himself together, Roberts walked as briskly as was prudent towards Middlewick, with eyes and ears alert. He did not have to go far before his worst fears were realised. The whole town knew of, and were talking about, the attempted burglary of the bank. All three of the men concerned had been captured, and were at that moment securely lodged in the county gaol.

"Heavens!" muttered the startling Roberts, "suppose I had been with the boys last night! They would have nabbed me, too. I think the best thing I can do is to make myself scarce."

But instead of yielding to this natural impulse, he mustered enough courage to stand his ground. Moreover he began stirring himself on behalf of his unfortunate comrades. He visited them in gaol, under the pretence of being a lawyer, engaged the services of the first attorney in Middlewick in the hopeless case, and left no stone unturned that promised the slightest hope.

Roberts was shrewd enough to discover one important fact. Taylor was not the only detective concerned in baffling the burglars. Some one besides him, and possessing greater skill than he, had taken a hand.

Who this man was Roberts did not know, though he meant to find out in the course of the day. Well aware that he himself would be an object of interest, if not of suspicion, he resorted to the common artifice of leaving the town, only to return stealthily later in the evening.

It was he who, prowling in the neighbourhood of Mr. Bryant's house, was attracted by Rutherford's movements, and held his home for a short time under surveillance, with no well defined idea of what he hoped to accomplish by that course.

Roberts' absence from town for the afternoon prevented his ascertaining the identity of the detective who had entrapped the burglars so cleverly, but he was certain of learning before the passing of the next day.

Roberts went back to the hotel and repeated his visit to Alf Taylor's room, and while engaged in examining the missing detective's luggage, discovered, though not by any means in the way he had intended, the identity of the second detective engaged in solving the bank mystery.

(To be continued.)

RESULT OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM COMPETITION.

SECOND SERIES.

Of the thousands of competitors in the second series of the Brain Gymnasium, fifty-five succeeded in correctly answering every one of the twenty problems set. The amount offered in Prizes was £12 10s., to which we have added another 25s., in order that a fair division may be made, and each correct competitor therefore receives 5s.

As the problems were originally set in The Story Teller, it would scarcely be fair to the readers of Short Stories to occupy space in the latter paper by publishing a full key. Therefore, on this occasion, the solutions will not appear.

These competitions have proved so popular that it has been decided to continue them in Short Stories, and the first set of problems will appear next week.

The advent of this competition will in no way affect the continuance of the Picture Puzzle.

A postal order for five shillings has been forwarded to each of the following persons:

C. E. Bullock, 88, Coburg Buildings, Fancis Street, Victoria; T. O. Jowett, 36, Hargwyne Street, Stockwell, London; C. B. Keston, 11, Queen's Road, Bayswater, W.; J. Gillespie, 105, St. Michael's Street, Dumfries; J. R. T. Hill, 3, Merchant Street, Peterhead, N.B.; Miss A. Hammon, 23, Thornhill Crescent, Barnsbury; Mrs. M. E. Nennie, 99, Queen Street, Peterhead; Miss G. Bond, Southbrook, Budleigh Salterton, South Devon; W. J. Griffith, Mount Pleasant, Gettin's Street, Oswestry; R. M. Brown, Silcoke, Claremont Road, Highgate; H. J. C. Davies, 23, Haselrigge Road, Clapham; W. S. Cool, 28, Thirsk Road, Lavender Hill; T. Griffiths, 3, Chesnut Avenue, Normanton Road, Derby; Miss Niblett, Ecclesfield, Ashford, Middlesex; H. Blackburn, 7, Airdale Crescent, Otley Road, Bradford, Yorks; C. H. Beech, 219, Gt. Cheetham Street, Higher Broughton, Manchester; W. McDermott, Custom House, Southampton; T. P. Burton, 69, Grosvenor Road, Camberwell; Miss H. Backwell, 11, Peak Hill Gardens, Sydenham; G. Thomson, 59, Stanmore Road, Glasgow; W. Buchan, 9, Romford Road, Stratford; A. Gresham, 30, Bradstock Road, South Hackney; A. M. Trivess, 4, Graham Road, Southsea, Hants; W. G. Cool, 28, Thirsk Road, Lavender Hill; R. Paterson, 11, Vere Street, London, W.; Miss E. Hill, Fairlawn, Castlenan, Barnes; Miss E. Murray, 44, Shelgate Road, Clapham Junction; C. E. Kaye, St. Andrew's Lodge, Victoria Road, Worthing; H. Coles, 37, Walnut Street, Southport; F. C. Smith, 77, Elm Grove, Brighton; G. W. Young, 20, Claremont Square, Pentonville, London; E. G. Darvill, 87, Bristol Road, East Ham; W. Jackson, 11, Pedworth Road, Reymouth Road, Rotherhithe; Mrs. Griffith, 23, Gittin's Street, Oswestry, Salop; C. J. Payne, 50, Matcham Road, Leytonstone, E.; G. H. Perry, 127, Elizabeth Road, Upton Park, Essex; W. H. Deeble, 25, Arvenach Street, Falmouth; A. J. Whitworth, Manston, Mason's Avenue, Croydon; B. C. Smythe, St. Ann's House, Lewis; P. J. Duncan, Woodville, Christchurch Road, Bournemouth; A. Grigg, 23, Church Street, Edgware Road; Mrs. R. W. Bland, 29, Bridge Road, Hammersmith; T. Bessant, 15, Eton Place, Falmouth; Miss B. Stagg, St. Paul's Street, Milton, Sittingbourne; R. H. Monnickendam, 175, Gloucester Road, Regent's Park; J. Young; Ivy Cottage, St. John's, Woking, Surrey; Mrs. J. Jenkins, 15, Castle Street, Barry, Glam.; J. Shearer, Overlea, Busby, Glasgow; S. W. Burgess, Halse, near Taunton; P. Sweeney, 124, Hartnup Street, Anfield, Liverpool; P. W. Millard, 29, Patshull Road, Kentish Town; J. Thain, 35, Noel Street, Islington; W. Caird, 12, Franklin Street, South Tottenham; Miss E. S. Anderson, 250, King's Road, Kingston Hill; H. J. Wray, 15, Cemetery Road, East Durham, Norfolk.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

1896 PROCLAMATION.

Grand Pioneer Reduction Sale

By Messrs. F. HODGSON & SON, The Well-known Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds, will take effect on sight of this advertisement.

SUPER-EMINENT.—The Queen's Royal Household Prudential, Eclipse, and Alarm Carpets and Hearthrugs, etc. (Regd.). Amazingly interesting, instructive, and detailed Grand Reduction Catalogue post free, if, when writing, you mention this paper.

REMARKS.—A lady customer writes complaining that we send out too large a Carpet for the money. Be this so or not, we send out no Carpet measuring less than 6ft. by 9ft.—even for 2/11. TEST THEM. THEY WILL SURPRISE YOU.

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ALARM" CARPETS

(Registered). GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Sale Price 2/11 EACH.

This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. We will forward direct from the looms to any address on receipt of amount, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, the largest ever sold at the Price.

Suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. A Rug sent with Carpet, 10d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER. 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs ... ... 7s. 3d.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly Examine and Compare these Carpets.

Satisfaction Guaranteed. DO NOT MISS THIS OPPORTUNITY. IT MAY NOT OCCUR AGAIN.

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON, 2/5/96.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

F. HODGSON AND SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants,

WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Telegraphic Address—"Eclipse, Leeds." Telephone No. 948.

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lb. 30/-

No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 54lb. 37/6

No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 55lb. 41/3

No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lb. 48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

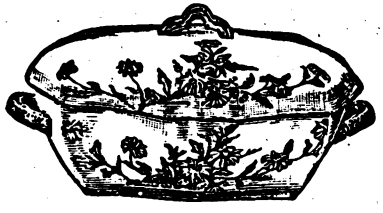
HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.



100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery.

The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

ALWAYS READY FOR FIRE.

"Yes, sir, you will find one of those things, all ready for instant use, on every floor in the house. The fireman would answer a call right on the jump, sir, of course. We know that, but with our own hose we might prevent a fire from gaining headway, or even put it out before they could arrive. Anyhow, we think it prudent to have this arrangement, even if the law didn't require it."

So said the manager of a big London hotel to the writer not long ago. He was obviously right. There are no two sides to that question in the eyes of any sensible person. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. We all agree to that, yet how many of us habitually shape the principle into practice? Not many, I am afraid.

"I always keep a bottle of Mother Seigel's Syrup in the house," says a woman in a recent letter, "and if any of my family ail anything a few doses sets us right." Yes, she does now, but there was a time when she did not, and for a good and sufficient reason: she had not heard of it. After she heard of it, and found out its value, you could never catch her without it. The big apple of wisdom grows only on the tree of experience.

"Up to the early part of the year 1885," she says, "I had always enjoyed good health, and had no occasion for doctors or medicines. At that time I began to suffer from an illness which, after a little time, seemed to involve my whole system. My appetite at first was fitful and variable, and I had no proper desire or relish for my meals. After eating I had great pain at the chest and dulness at the stomach, as though what I had taken lay there as it might lie in a dish, without warmth or life.

"I was also much troubled with a sickening wind or gas that came up into my throat, sometimes in such volume that I could hardly draw my breath. Then I would have frequent attacks of sick headache, with a pressure upon the head as of a heavy weight. I resorted to every means I could hear of for relief, but the disease appeared to be too deeply seated for any medicines known to me or to my friends, so that I got to be more and more of a confirmed invalid as time went on.

"Not to weary you with the numerous details of my illness I will simply say that my strength continued to fail, and I eventually became so weak as to make getting about the house a difficult and exhausting matter. It was not until I had been in this condition nearly five years that a kind Providence placed in our way the means of recovery. In December, 1889, I happened to read in a newspaper an article about Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup and what it had done in a case very much like my own.

"Inasmuch as I had no hope of help from any other source, I felt moved to try the Syrup and see whether there was any truth in the claims made on its behalf. I procured a bottle from Mr. W. L. Clarke, Chemist, The Pavement, Forest Hill, and found wonderful relief after I had taken that one bottle. Confident that I had come upon the right medicine at last, I got, perhaps, two bottles more in all, when all the bad symptoms left me, and I was soon as well and strong as ever. Since then I always keep a bottle in the house, and if any of my family ail anything a few doses sets us right. (Signed) Mrs. S. C. Bowall, 45, Stanstead Road, Forest Hill, London, January 1st, 1895."

No building would ever be destroyed by fire if the first spark were extinguished the moment watchful eyes looked upon it. Be ready, and have the means of prevention where you can lay hands right on them. That's the way to save time, money, and trouble. As with fires, so with diseases. They spring from small beginnings; and as the beginning is almost always in the stomach (indigestion and dyspepsia), a few doses of Mother Seigel's Syrup, taken now, will do for you what it does for Mrs. Bowall, and for many other wise and thoughtful women.

Digitized by Google

A £10 PRIZE FOR PUTTING A PICTURE TOGETHER. (See page 460)

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 384. FOR WEEK ENDING MAY 9TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

1896 PROCLAMATION.

Grand Pioneer Reduction Sale

By Messrs. F. HODGSON & SON, The Well-known Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds, will take effect on sight of this advertisement.

OUR NEW VENTURE! Yes, Two Different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright).

Whereas, in launching forth our New Production, THE "PRUDENTIAL" CARPETS AND HEARTHRUGS, we beg to state they will have a Rich Turkish and Persian Design on one side, and on the reverse he elegant and costly designs of Wilton make. The advantage thus gained is great, as they can be utilised in various rooms at one cost. This is a valuable step in economy.

PRODIGIOUS SALE OF THE

"PRUDENTIAL" Reversible CARPETS

(Registered.)

Reversible, with a different pattern on both sides, woven throughout with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in 10 sizes only. These carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian with the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down and cannot be excelled in durability.

	Each.		Each.
6ft. by 9ft., Reduced Sale Price	4/9	9ft. by 15ft., Reduced Sale Price	12/6
7½ft. by 9ft. " " "	5/11	12ft. by 12ft. " " "	12/9
9ft. by 9ft. " " "	7/6	12ft. by 13½ft. " " "	14/6
9ft. by 10½ft. " " "	8/6	12ft. by 15ft. " " "	15/9
9ft. by 12ft. " " "	9/6	12ft. by 18ft. " " "	19/6
10½ft. by 12ft. " " "	11/6	12ft. by 21ft. " " "	22/6

When ordering please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

"Neal Lodge, Upper Norwood, S.E., January 18th., 1896.
The Dowr. Lady Abercromby is pleased with the 'Prudential' Carpet she ordered."

Blairquhan, Maybole, N.B., August 3rd.
Lady Hunter Blair writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son send her another 'Prudential' Carpet, same as before, crimson and gold, dimensions, 9ft. by 10½ft. Cheque inclosed."

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Reg)., to match above Carpets, sent for 1s. 6d. extra, size 2 yards long, and 1 yard wide.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Hearthrugs for 4s. 3d.; or 6 for 8s.; or 12 for 15s. 6d.

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ALARM" CARPETS

(Registered). GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Sale Price 2/11 EACH.

This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. We will forward direct from the looms to any address on receipt of amount, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, the largest ever sold at the Price. Suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. A Rug sent with Carpet, 10d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER. 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs ... ... 7s. 3d.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly Examine and Compare these Carpets.

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON, 9/5/96.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

F. HODGSON AND SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants,

WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Telegraphic Address—"Eclipse, Leeds." Telephone No. 948.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 2d.; 1lb., 2s.; 2lb., 3s. 9d., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

Digitized by Google

THE JOHN NOBLE
HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Direct from the Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in the world, have secured beyond a doubt the ADMIRATION OF THE WORLD. Being Absolutely Without an Equal Anywhere for Stylish Appearance, Durability, and Actual Money Value. 10/6

TWO GOLD MEDALS AWARDED.

These Costumes have received the highest praise from the leading journals of the day, and are justly regarded by all purchasers as Even Better than Advertised.

Each Costume scientifically cut, tailor-made, and beautifully finished in an exceedingly smart mode, as illustration. The design consists of full wide Godet skirt with belt, also very neat bodice with full front and broad box-pleat down centre, trimmed bold silk cord and three large buttons. Collar and cuffs outlined silk cord; saddle and sleeves lined.

Price complete only 10/6. Safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

Sizes in stock fit figure measuring 34, 36, or 38 in. round bust under arms, skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front; larger or special sizes made to measure. 1/6 extra.

THE JOHN NOBLE
COSTUMES FOR YOUNG MISSES

are made in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, and trimmed military braid as illustration. A large box-pleat down the centre of the linen bodice, and a fancy pocket at each side of the skirt, complete a charming design at these prices: FROM 8/6

Lengths	35	38	42	46	50 inches.
Prices	8/6	9/6	10/9	12/-	13/6 each.

Each costume safely packed and sent carriage paid for 6d. extra.

KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS are also supplied in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, with saddle top, long full sleeves, and pocket, at following prices: FROM 1/6

Lengths	21	24	27	30	33	36	39	42	45 in.
Prices	1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-	5/6 ea.

Postage 1½d. extra. Lengths stated above are from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front.

COLOURS: Any of the above garments can be supplied in Black, Navy, Brown Myrtle, Bronze Green, Electric Blue, Ruby, Dark Cinnamon, Fawn, or Grey.

The JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE in which the above garments are made is a fabric of world-wide fame and durability, measuring 52in. wide. The full Dress Length of Six Yards can be supplied for 7/- or any length at 1/3 the yard. Colours as above. 7/6

PATTERNS, also FASHION SHEETS of numerous other designs in Ladies' and Children's Costumes, etc., sent Post Free to any reader of "Short Stories" on application to

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

MRS. LAWRENCE

A Farmer's Wife, writes from Mid-Rasen, Lincolnshire: "For a long time I suffered severely from

INDIGESTION

And WIND IN THE STOMACH, and had to call in the doctor. Having prescribed for me some time he said, 'I can do nothing more for you.' My husband urged me to try your WIND PILLS; he brought me a box and I took them. In a few days I was quite well and able to get up, and now enjoy excellent health. Publish my name and address."

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills

Being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, Mild, and Tonic, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

ALL SUFFERERS from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND ON THE STOMACH, BILIOUSNESS, SICK HEADACHE, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, etc.,

should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

Of all Chemists, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for Price from PAGE WOODCOCK, LINCOLN.

"JUNO" CYCLES

Are the very Best.

JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb. JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C. N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 19

May 9, 1896.

S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

CAN YOU WRITE?

Of course you can! Why not then emboss your Notepaper, etc., with a pretty Monogram? using the

Patent Pocket Monopresse

Every Initial and Monogram of two letters kept in stock. Monogram of two letters, 1/1; Initials, 10d. each, post free. Apply—

CHAS. ROMPLER, 7, New Basinghall St., London, E.C. Agents wanted.

GOVERNMENT ARMS, ACCOUTREMENTS, CLOTHING, STORES, etc.

Government Clothing.—Great Coats, 7/6; Scarlet Tunics, 1/8; Jackets, 1/1; Grey Capes, 1/10; Glengarries, 1d.; Waterproof Hoods and Capes, 10d.

Police Clothing.—Great Coats, 5/6; Trousers, 1/9; Leggings; Lanterns, etc.

Arms as actually used by the French during the Franco-Prussian War.—Chassepot breech-loading Rifles, 8/- each; Swords, with brass handles and steel scabbards, 1/-; Lances, 4/-; Navy Boarding Pikes, 2/-, etc.

British Government Camp Equipment.—Army Bell Tents, 40ft. in circumference, with pole, pegs, peg mallet, and lines, in bag complete, ready for use, 17/6 each; Brown Army Blankets, 7ft. by 5ft. 8in., 1/6; Waterproof Sheets, 3ft. by 6ft., 1/6; Mess Tins, 3d., etc.

British Government Harness.—Heavy Cart Harness, £1 15s. 6d.; Gear Harness, £1 1s.; Troopers' Riding Saddles, complete, 12/6 each; Bridles, 2/3; Head Collars, 1/9; Leather Surcingles, 1/3; Nose Bags, ventilated, complete with buckle and strap, 3d., etc.

New Harness.—Full-size Gig, complete, £3 15s.; Dismounted Riding Saddles, complete, £1 5s., etc.

Curtains, Carpets, etc.—White Lace Curtains, 3yds. long, 50in. wide, 2/4 per pair; Carpets, 2yd. by 3yd., 3/- each; Rugs to match, 8d., etc.

Illustrated Price List Free on application to

JARDINE, NOTTINGHAM.

1,000,000 FOREIGN STAMPS

in packets of 100 each containing Trinidad, British Guiana, Japan, Orange Free State, Jamaica, Natal, Australia, New South Wales, Canada, Victoria, India, Cape, Cuba, Transvaal, Porto Rico, Norway, Sweden, Ceylon, Russia, Denmark, etc., post free 4½d. Five Price Lists Gratis. Cheap Cards and Sheets on approval. MORRISON, 3, Greenhill Avenue, TENBY, S. Wales.

"KEEPUMDRIE"

WATERPROOF GARMENTS.

Marvels of Cheapness and Durability.

CHESTERFIELD	Men's	FROM 7/6
SCARBORO'	Men's	FROM 7/6
INVERNESS	Boys'	5/-

Illustrated list and patterns post free.

ANDREW POTTER, LONDON WORKS, READING.

HIGH-CLASS TAILORING

Every Garment cut to measure.

DIRECT from the Manufacturer, Saving all Middle Profits.

LADIES' TAILOR-MADE COSTUMES

In all the present Shades, From 10/6 to 70/-. Value Unequalled. Fit Guaranteed.

MEN'S SUITS 18/6

Better Qualities, 22/6, 25/6, 31/6, 37/6, 45/-, 52/6, 63/-.

Cycling Suits from 12/6.

BOYS' SUITS.

Pieces for mending sent with all Suits.

See our New Patterns before ordering. It will pay you to do so.

Hundreds to choose from. Fashion plates and measure forms free on application. All Goods Carriage Paid.

Factory Clothing Co.

Manufacturing and Ladies' Tailors,

117K, ALBION ST., LEEDS.

Digitized by Google

EDITED BY ARTHUR PEARSON OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY

SHORT STORIES

No. 384.] For the Week ending May 9th, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

THE QUEEN OF THE ROSES.

PIERRE DUBOURG, the Headsman of the Luxembourg! It was a name of horror, overtopping the terror of the Reign of Terror, when men revelled in the shedding of blood, and women worshipped the guillotine, whose effigy they wore as a sacred ornament, replacing the discarded crucifix.

Like the prison, raising its ominous roof within musket range of the graceful, ornamental palace of the Luxembourg, Pierre Dubourg boasted a history as instructive as it was terrible. Prominent as was its headsman among the frenzied actors in scenes of revolutionary massacre, memory of his personal injuries and of the merciless avengement of his wrongs have been buried in oblivion, while the gloomy dungeon of the Luxembourg, whence emerged hundreds of innocent martyrs to meet an ignominious death, is suffered to survive, the monument of a nation's tyrannical zeal.

* * *

Towards the declining hours of the monarchy there was held in the environs of the frontier town of Varennes a rustic festival, at which congregated the youth, beauty and bourgeoisie of that pretty bourg, famed for the loveliness of its female denizens. It was a communal jubilee given at the expense of the Government, still managed by the local authorities, who took good care that the royal bounty should afford an abundance of the fat of the land, inasmuch as the Vidame chanced to be a wine grower, his subordinate a publican, and the remainder of the municipal rulers, butchers, grocers and bakers. Consequently, large as was the assemblage of revellers, they could eat, drink and be merry at the expense of the Crown.

Prior to the actual commencement of festivities had occurred one of those provincial ceremonies held in high esteem by the peasantry of certain portions of France, and attended by the minor gentry of the bourgs adjacent to the scene of their celebration. Of remote origin, these festivals were ordinarily known as the "Crowning of Rose Queens," damsels selected by the Church and presented to the Lords of the Manor to be enthroned and revered in public by their admiring neighbours as the most dutiful, respectful, and virtuous of maidens attending their first communion during the current year.

With the crown of roses upon her head, a sceptre of witch-hazel in her hand and a virginal girdle binding her waist, the monarch ascended her throne, surrounded by a bodyguard of liveried youth, there to receive homage from her subjects, whose loyalty was to endure until the day whereon the Rose Queen condescended to bestow her hand in marriage upon some suitor with whom, as a preliminary favour, she condescended to divide the honours of her Coronation Day.

Deposited the crown of roses upon the brow of Marie Duchesne.

All Rights Reserved.]

Digitized by Google

There was a blast of deep toned trumpets as the Vidame of Varennes deposited the crown of roses upon the brow of Marie Duchesne, while the tall beadle of the suburban church of Ste. Claire, garbed in his feudal uniform, waved the banner of the Blessed Virgin over her bowed head. Neither cheers nor other outbursts of enthusiasm accompanied this mute but impressive proclamation of virtue's triumph, and a dignified silence reigned until the Curé of the parish, after delivering a eulogy upon the domestic life of the fair elect, completed her exaltation by a fervent benediction, designed to strengthen the temporary monarch in her moral progress through life.

Upon a grass mound surmounted by the Rose Queen's throne was placed a chair, still not upon a level with the royal seat. It stood at the right side of the presiding sovereign, and so that the head of the occupant would be upon a line with his regal mistress's shoulders. It was vacant, still upon it concentrated the glances of all the lads and lasses in attendance as they craned their necks in anxiety to catch the first glimpse of its intended occupant, conscience-keeper of their Queen.

Marie Duchesne was a maid of eighteen, the daughter of mine host of the "Golden Swan," a posting-house on the outskirts of the bourg, necessarily patronised by all the travellers crossing the frontier into German territory.

The girl was remarkably handsome, better educated than most of her class, cheerful, of winsome manners, amiable disposition, and austere piety.

The sole child of the Père Duchesne, Marie would be entitled to a handsome dowry, a temptation to mercenary suitors, while her striking beauty and modest demeanour attracted a horde of obsequious adorers. To gain her hand had been the object of all the marriageable youth of Varrenes, who now clustered round her throne, the decisive moment having arrived when an invitation for one among them to occupy the vacant chair would be public announcement as to the conqueror of her virgin heart.

"Whom doth her Majesty please to summon as guardian of her conscience—as minister of state?" said the Vidame, with the air of a lord chamberlain.

Marie Duchesne blushed until her cheeks corresponded in hue with the roses of her crown. She had been called upon to perform the first act of her sovereignty and to be her life's destiny. Recovering herself, Marie, with maidenly modesty, whispered into the Vidame's ear, and that worthy magistrate transferred the whisper to the stalwart beadle protecting the throne as would a captain of the royal guard.

"Pierre Dubourg!" announced the church dignitary, who had lain aside the banner and armed himself with a halberd, upon whose glittering blade were etched the armorial bearings of the Vidame.

The female revellers glanced at each other in astonishment, then turned up their dainty noses, and finally subsided into derisive giggles, evidently affected to cloak some internal vexation. On the other hand, no sooner had their male companions heard proclamation of the happy couple than they broke forth into a hearty ebullition of congratulation, clapping their hands, tossing up their holiday hats, shouting and cheering at the top of their lungs.

This spontaneous demonstration of common satisfaction endured for many minutes with augmenting ardour, during continuance of which a stalwart youth, who had been timidly ensconced upon the outskirts of the crowd, was seized by his immediate neighbours and borne uplifted in their arms to be deposited at the foot of the throne, where he knelt, as in duty bound, to pay open homage to his queen.

"Arise, Pierre, and take your seat," quoth Marie. Dubourg obeyed, and the cheers were renewed.

After cessation of this ovation the leader marshalled the joyous crowd into a decorous procession, assigning rollicking cavalier to blushing damsel, and male escort to feminine loveliness in accordance with his own ideas of rustic etiquette. Then, waving his halberd as a drum major manipulates his baton, he headed the long line of her subjects as they passed in review before the queen of a day and her companion for life.

Pierre Dubourg was the blacksmith of Varennes, whose smithy was located directly oppose Père Duchesne's postal inn. He was a good-natured, kind-hearted fellow, more remarkable for his massive frame and herculean strength than either good looks or alluring manner. Hence the villagers wondered how Marie Duchesne, the belle of Varennes, rich, refined and personally attractive, could have selected such a mate, when hundreds of handsome youths had sought her hand.

But Marie carried her reasons for this preference hidden within her breast. She had watched Dubourg daily and unseen while labouring at his forge; she had conversed with him in her father's presence when, after cessation of work at nightfall, he was a welcome guest within the private parlour of the roadside inn. Marie discovered him to be industrious, provident, well instructed, fond of learning, and of a retiring, docile temper. Consequently she had selected him without his knowledge to be her future husband, and none among her admirers were more astonished at the declaration of choice than Pierre Dubourg himself, whose lips had never spoken a word of love when in her presence.

The Sunday preceding Christmas was the day set apart for the solemnisation of Marie's marriage, and during the interval elapsing Pierre Dubourg laboured night and day to earn the money necessary to purchase a suitable bridal outfit. "Marie," he said to his betrothed one evening as he was about closing up his smithy, "I have gained a hundred gold louis, and to-morrow I will leave for Paris."

"What for, Pierre?" inquired his betrothed.

"To buy your trousseau, my love," returned Dubourg, somewhat proudly. "I will spend the whole of it on you."

"That's kind of you, Pierre," quoth the girl, after a moment of hesitation. "But I have money of my own, and would it not be better to save yours, which we may want after we are married, dear."

"But how will you get your trousseau?" inquired the smith, after considerable reflection.

"I will go to Paris and buy it," answered the girl.

"You, Marie? You, alone in Paris?" returned the lover.

"Why, yes, Pierre!" rejoined the bride elect. "I have never seen Paris, and can buy such articles as I want while seeing the sights. It will save your money, Pierre, and be the better for me, as you cannot know what a woman wants. So I had better go."

"But it will not do for you to go alone," urged Pierre. "Paris is dangerous for an unprotected girl."

"I will not be unprotected, Pierre," interrupted Marie, somewhat petulently; "besides, I am old enough to take care of myself, and know that I will."

"Suppose I should tell you not to go," interposed Pierre, vexed at his betrothed's pertinacity.

"Then, Pierre," said the young girl determinedly, her bright eyes flashing fire. "I shall go, and you shall never see me again. I have father's consent, and I have no need of yours, at least, not as yet."

Digitized by Google

Pierre Dubourg was abashed and quailed before the girl's exhibition of firmness. It was the only time that he had attempted suggestion of his implied authority and was ashamed at his decisive repulse.

"When will you return?" Pierre inquired after a prolonged pause, during which Marie scrutinised his countenance closely to catch, if possible, a reflex of his thoughts, for Dubourg was in evident tribulation.

"Within a month, Pierre, at the furthermost, although it is a long way to Paris," returned the girl unconcernedly. "Still, you must not fret yourself should I be detained a few days longer."

"You go by the malle-poste, then, to-morrow?"

"No; were that so, I would not go. Now, listen, Pierre, how fortunate I am. You have seen the carriage belonging to that nobleman who came from the Court at Paris, standing under father's shed? Well, it's going back again, and the gentleman says that I can ride in it. Won't that be nice, Pierre?"

The blacksmith, lost in amazement, recovered himself after a minute or so of meditation.

"Does the gentleman accompany you?" he asked with an effort, for jealousy commenced dawning upon his imagination. "That would not be right."

"Oh, no, it will be right," responded the girl assuringly. "I go alone, Pierre, with the coachman and the lacqueys in livery, since the Count stops with a friend at a château two leagues from here for a month or so."

"Who told you all this?"

"The Count told father before he left."

"He has gone away then?"

"Oh, yes. He went this morning in his carriage with its four fine horses and golden harness. It did look splendid, I can tell you. But it will come back to-night, and on the morrow I will start in it for Paris. You are not sorry I am going, Pierre, in such a style?"

"No, Marie," said the smith, the tone of his voice belying his words, "if it pleases you. Only my heart tells me that you will never come back. Is it so?"

"What nonsense, Pierre! I'm sure to come back."

"You swear that you will?"

"I swear that I will," repeated Marie solemnly, and then throwing her arms round her lover's neck, and bringing his lips to hers, implanted upon them a fervent kiss. Disengaging herself, Marie Duchesne tripped lightly and gleefully in the direction of her father's inn, leaving Pierre standing at his forge lost amid the bewilderment of conflicting emotions.

* *

Six months had rolled by since Marie Duchesne departed from Varennes in all the vanity of a noble equipage with a pomp and ceremony worthy of a dame of Versailles. Four of these months were seasons of anguish and of lamentation to Pierre Dubourg, who marked the flight of time as the weary period of his betrothed's prolonged absence waxed longer and more unaccountable, with sighs and tears.

The simple-minded smith, unconscious of the artifices of a wicked world, placed full reliance in Marie's plighted word, and not a post chaise or lordly carriage rolled into the courtyard of the "Golden Eagle" unless undergoing keen inspection by his vigilant eyes, in the trust that it would restore to his arms one whom, by dint of unremittent mental contemplation, he had transformed into the divinity of his widowed heart. Pierre Dubourg loved Marie with an intensity of passion unknown to lovers in high society, and with a spirit of adoration elevating his idol beyond a mundane sphere. True, at the moment of her departure the artisan entertained no such exalted feelings; still, as in the loneliness of his situation he brooded over the prospects of a more congenial future, his affections concentrated until Marie appeared the solitary aim of his mortal existence.

Perplexed and wearied at his betrothed's protracted

Aroused by the noise of a vehicle approaching.

Digitized by Google

"What do you want?" demanded the forest guard.

absence, Pierre Dubourg, nervous and anxious concerning the uncertainty of her fate, determined to solve the mystery by a journey to Paris. He disclosed his purpose to no one, not even to the Père Duchesne, who apparently interested himself slightly concerning his daughter's lengthened sojourn in the gay capital, then given over to libertines and roués attached to the court.

For three weeks Pierre Dubourg wandered through the streets of Paris in a vain search for Marie. He hunted the great city high and low, by night and day, until his limbs were fairly tired out with ceaseless promenades. He was upon the point of reluctantly relinquishing the search, when, wearied by an expiring effort, he seated himself upon a stone bench, placed against a garden wall surrounding an isolated villa upon the Cours de la Reine, the royal highway facing the Seine, and leading from the Tuilleries to the palace of Saint Cloud.

The disheartened, foot-sore and sorrow-stricken peasant, engrossed in meditation upon his untoward destiny, remained for hours in a species of stupor, when he was suddenly aroused from his reverie by the noise of a vehicle approaching the bench whereon he rested. The night was far advanced and somewhat dark, still, by the fading moonlight he was enabled to detect the outline of a lacquey who descended from the rear of the carriage, and seizing a tarnished metal knob projecting from the wall, extorted a deep-toned peal from a bell on the other side.

The sound of this alarm had scarcely died away before a ponderous, foliage-covered iron gate, almost concealed from view, turned upon its hinges to allow egress to a couple of servants, bearing flaming links extending at arm's length, who placed themselves beside the garden entrance in such a way as to render objects in the vicinity brilliantly visible.

Actuated by instinctive curiosity, Pierre Dubourg glanced at the vehicle, whose door had been opened by an obsequious footman to allow its occupant to descend, which proved to be a young woman. As she stepped upon the ground, a hood, with which which her face had been partially covered, fell back upon her shoulders, exposing her features to the full light of the links.

As he gazed upon the lady's face, Pierre was first amazed and then almost petrified. It was Marie Duchesne, whose features were too familiar to his memory not to be instantly identified. The lover was tempted to advance and throw himself into the arms of his betrothed. Still an unaccountable and irresistible force seemed to have paralysed his frame, riveting him, without power of motion, to where he stood. Impelled to uplift his voice and apprise her of his presence by calling her name, his tongue refused its office, and before he could recover from stupefaction, the lady passed within the garden gate. She was followed by her torch-bearing domestics, and the gate, swinging to behind them, interposed a barrier between Pierre and the vanished girl.

On the morrow Pierre Dubourg threaded his way with no little difficulty, being a stranger to the aristocratic faubourgs of the capital, to the scene of his previous night's adventure. Fortunately for him, a succession of mishaps and delays retarded his arrival before the foliaged gate until late in the afternoon, otherwise he would have found the tenants of the villa invisible to an ordinary visitor.

Pierre, discovering the metallic knob, gave a violent pull, causing a reverberating alarm. To this authoritative summons a gorgeously dressed chasseur responded, opening a small door inserted in the wall.

"What do you want?" demanded the forest guard sharply.

"To speak with the lady of this house," replied Pierre Dubourg, as he forced his way into the garden.

"You do not trespass thus," rejoined the chasseur, interposing his burly person to block Pierre's further passage. "Begone, beggar, or I'll kick you out."

"I have come to see the lady, and I will see her," replied Dubourg, with an air of serious determination.

"Out! I tell you, tramp!" ejaculated the domestic, and he seized Pierre firmly by the shoulders.

Digitized by Google

"Hands off, and let me pass," said the peasant, as he disengaged himself from the chasseur's grasp.

"Out! out!" shouted the forester, as he again laid violent hands upon Pierre.

But the man, muscular as he was, had reckoned without his host. Pierre Dubourg, hardy from toil, agile from daily exercise, and the most skilful wrestler of Varennes, where men are born gymnasts, instantly closed with his liveried assailant, and before he was thoroughly aware of the folly of his rashness, the fellow was whirled into the air and dashed prostrate upon the ground with such violence as to extort an agonising howl of pain and anguish.

Attracted by noise of this turmoil a young female appeared at a window overlooking the entrance to the villa, and inquired in evident trepidation:

"François, what is the meaning of this disturbance?"

"It is I, Marie Duchesne; it is I, Pierre Dubourg!" shouted the provincial, assured at the girl's identity.

"What do you want with me, Pierre Dubourg?" demanded the young woman, recovering her composure.

"To speak a moment with you in private."

"François, admit the man."

The chasseur, aching in every bone from the violence of his fall, reluctantly obeyed the commands of a mistress he dared not offend, by leading the way into the villa and introducing the unwelcome visitor, after passing through several richly furnished apartments, into an exquisitely decorated boudoir.

Carelessly lounging upon a velvet-covered couch reclined Marie Duchesne, habited in a silken morning gown, trimmed with Flemish lace, her face pale and seemingly careworn, her hair falling in negligent tresses, and her eyes slightly devoid of lustre. She was indeed the ex-Queen of the Roses, but, alas, not the bright, etherial creature gleaming upon the day of coronation.

"Pierre Dubourg, your business with me?" commenced the girl, with a calmness and deliberate chilling the reviving passion of her visitor.

"I have hunted long for you, and now I have found you," responded the artisan while tear-drops oozed from beneath his eyelids. "I claim you for my bride."

"Pierre Dubourg," said the girl, with emphasis upon each word. "I chose you to be my intended husband of my own free will, and of my own free will I have discarded you. Let us not part in anger, for we shall never meet again."

"Never again!" repeated Pierre aghast.

"Never again," rejoined Marie, "our journey through life lies through different roads. Now depart."

"Depart!" ejaculated the smith. "Am I a dog to be driven from your sight. I will not depart!"

"You will!" uttered a deep-toned voice from the bottom of the boudoir, as the hangings were moved aside from a cabinet door to allow the entrance of a new actor upon the scene. "This lady has given a final answer. Your presence pollutes the atmosphere. Begone, sir!"

"And who are you, my cocksparrow, who dare order me from the possession of my own?" cried Pierre, hurling a glance of vindictive defiance at the speaker.

"I am the Count de Fersen, at your service," replied the intruder, a handsome man of commanding appearance, wearing an embroidered court dress, emblazoned with the cross of St. Louis. "Furthermore, I am that lady's protector——"

"Protector!" interrupted Pierre Dubourg, with an unearthly yell. "You have ruined her body and soul! Have now your just and well-earned reward."

With a sudden dash, Pierre threw himself upon the nobleman, and before the Count could comprehend his intention, dealt him a blow upon the cheek, sending him staggering across the room.

Marie Duchesne shrieked and swooned. The Count successfully recovered from the effects of the assault, and going to the table, whereon lay an unsheathed rapier, presented the weapon's point at Dubourg's breast. "I could slay you," said the Count, stamping his foot three times, "but this blade shall never be stained with a plebian's blood. Your punishment will come at the hands of my servants, fellows of your kind." As he spoke four stalwart valets filed into the boudoir, the herculean chasseur at their head.

"François," said the Count, "let this vagrant be flogged off my grounds. He has dared to strike your master."

* * * * *

Ejected from the villa and cast into the muddy roadway, humiliated, scourged, and covered with bleeding wounds, Pierre Dubourg knelt and swore eternal vengeance upon the aristocracy of France. On the morrow he departed for Varennes a heartbroken man. Three years passed away, and during that interim radical political changes had been wrought in France, whereby the power of the aristocracy was on the wane. One day a lumbering travelling coach occupied by a plainly Presented the weapon's point at Dubourg's breast.

Digitized by Google

dressed portly man, two handsome ladies and a couple of children drove up to Dubourg's smithy, as a horse had dropped a shoe. The coachman entered the shop to give orders to the smith.

Pierre Dubourg's keen eyes were at once fastened upon the man, and detected, despite his disguise, the features of his enemy—the Count de Fersen.

"Scoundrel!" growled Pierre, as he tossed aside the pretended coachman's wig and grasped him by the throat with the tenacity of a vice, "it is my turn now.

"Père Duchesne, behold the Count de Fersen, the lover of his queen, Marie Antoinette, and the moral murderer of your daughter, our Queen of the Roses."

"Down with the aristocrat!" shouted the villagers in a common chorus.

"And who are these in the carriage yonder for whom you, a peer of France, act as a coachman?" demanded Pierre Dubourg of his prisoner.

"The royal family of France," returned the Count, "whom I would serve in any capacity."

Grasped him by the throat with the tenacity of a vice.

I will not dash out your brains, for a smith's hammer shall not be defiled by the blood of an aristocrat. So, Count, I shall hand you and your companions over to the people that they may mete out the punishment deserved."

Through exercise of main strength Pierre Dubourg dragged his captive over the roadway to the "Golden Eagle," where were congregated loitering gossips and village notables. Summoning Père Duchesne to the inner door, the smith addressed him in a voice of thunder:

"Then die with them on the scaffold," sneered the smith, "and remember that I will be there to see the will of the people done."

Pierre Dubourg was not false to his promise. During the Reign of Terror he became executioner of aristocrats confined in the various prisons, from the chief of which he derived his title, the Headsman of the Luxembourg.

LE VIER.

Digitized by Google

An Averted Scandal.

"WELL, here we are at last!" said my travelling companion, as the train slackened speed and pulled up at the little station called Oak Grove.

"Yes, here we are at last," I replied ill-humouredly, as I gathered up my belongings, for the train was three hours behind time, having been kept waiting all that while in a siding, owing to the breakdown of a mineral train, which had completely blocked both lines. "Good-night—or rather, good-morning," I added, a little more graciously, as I alighted, "a safe and pleasant journey to you. Thank goodness I have reached my destination."

Some ten days before, I, junior partner in the firm of Martin Bros. and Son, had accepted a pressing invitation from my old college chum, Gus Thwaites, to spend at least a part of my vacation at his father's country house, "The Larches," near Oak Grove.

Mr. Thwaites, senior, and his comely and motherly wife, were noted for their hospitality, and for the charming young society which they loved to gather about them. Often before had I been a participator in these merry gatherings, and, nothing loth, had set out to renew the pleasant associations.

But the welcoming greetings were scarcely over, and our plans of amusement were still unsettled, as the expected guests had not yet all assembled, when I was recalled hastily to town, on affairs unnecessary to mention here. Gus took me down to the train in his own trap, and his last words were:

"It's a provoking shame, old fellow; but cut it as soon as you can, and I'll meet you whenever you say the word."

With this the train whizzed off, and I turned my thoughts to London, where I arrived in due time, and devoted myself to the unreasonable business emergency with such success, that on the fifth day I sent word to Gus to be ready to meet me by the 9.30 train.

And now the 9.30 had become the 12.30 and a little more, and, of course, my friend must have gone home in disgust long ago; and here was I at a country station, four miles from "The Larches," time nearly one o'clock in the morning, with the surrounding neighbourhood in slumber.

Of course, there was no chance of a conveyance of any kind, and no place to put up at till morning. There was nothing to be done but to "foot" it along the country road, which I accordingly set out to do.

It was not an unpleasant walk, in the cool, dewy, summer night, with the stars twinkling peacefully overhead; but I must confess to being rather weary, and heartily glad when I drew near to "The Larches," and beheld once more the comfortable residence of my friend, now wrapped in profoundest quiet.

Until this moment, the question of gaining entrance had not arisen in my mind. Accustomed as I was to living in London, where light and noise are continual by night as well as by day, I had not pictured to myself the intense silence and repose of a country home at midnight, and I involuntarily quailed at the thought of disturbing so peaceful a household.

However, unless I determined to pass the intervening hours in the summer-house, among the damp creepers and blossoms, the deed must be done. So, walking briskly along the long gravel paths, I was about to ascend the steps——

"Ur-r-r-r!"

I stopped. What was that?

"Ur-r-r-r!" and, with a mighty dash, on came a great dog, his hair bristling, and his teeth glistening ominously.

I retired in haste.

After running a little distance, I noticed that he did not follow me, though he still growled threateningly.

I paused for investigation, and then, hearing a smooth, sliding noise, and coupling it with the fact that he did not come after me, conjectured that he was probably fastened to a chain, thus allowing him only a certain range.

Assured of this, I ventured back. My supposition proved to be correct. His beat extended across the front of the house, and, if I could get round beyond him, and crawl upon the extreme end of the verandah, I might thus reach the door bell.

This I tried to do; but I had not counted upon the lateral sweep of his tether, and, almost before I was aware of it, he was again in most unpleasant proximity to me, and still uttering those deep growls.

Digitized by Google

"Dash it all!" I thought, "if only he would bark and rouse somebody, instead of keeping up those insane growls!"

But my objurgations had no effect on the dog, so I again retired—this time to consider.

After all, why wake the whole house by an alarm at this unearthly hour? I knew just where my room was—Gus and I had always occupied the south-eastern chamber in company; and I knew, too, how I could get in, as we used to of old, when returning from some boyish lark and wishing to gain our beds unperceived.

There was a tiny dressing-room with a window opening from this room, and beneath that was an old-fashioned bay-window, with a permanent trellis on one side. By the aid of this and of the water-pipe, it was easy work for a boy to "swarm up"—as we elegantly expressed it—to the top of the bay-window, and, once in the dressing-room, the way was clear.

True, I was somewhat heavier now than I was at that time, but I trusted that my superior agility—resulting from a long course of gymnastics—and also my intense desire to escape from my uncomfortable situation, would enable me to perform the feat.

So I circled the house in the rear, and, removing my superfluous clothing, fastened it to my shoulders, and began to climb.

After a few slips, and some giving way of the trellis, I stood on the roof of the bay-window, and found, to my great joy, that the dressing-room window was open, though the shutters were closed. It was not a very hard task to force these open, and, in a few minutes, I stood safely in the dressing-room.

Now to surprise Gus!

I opened the communicating door very softly, and peeped in.

The room was indistinctly visible in the soft, summer twilight, and I stopped a moment to reconnoitre.

There was the bed, evidently disturbed, but there was nobody in it; there were the familiar table, wardrobe, mirror, etc. But what were those things lying on a chair? A dim mass of white and parti-coloured drapery, for which I knew no name or use. Queer, wasn't it? And where was Gus?

I heard footsteps—that must be he. I had it; he had been roused at last by the dog, and had been on a tour of exploration. Why couldn't he have gone before, and saved me all this anxiety? Well, I'd give him a good scare, to pay him off.

Just as I came to this conclusion, the outer door of the bedroom slowly opened.

I was still peeping through the crack of my door, expecting to see the dishevelled figure of my friend, and enjoying a quiet chuckle at his prospective discomfiture. So, making the opening a little wider, I put out my head.

Lightning never moved faster than I whisked it back again.

Ye gods and little fishes! Had I suddenly gone insane? Instead of the somewhat robust form of my friend, in a hasty nocturnal attire, my eyes had rested upon a tall, slender, female figure, in a long rose-coloured gown, and with golden hair flowing far down its shoulders.

Visions of screams and hysterics and fainting-fits, and I know not what, flashed across my mind as I squeezed myself behind the door, scarcely daring to breathe.

After all, I could retreat the way I came. I was no worse off than before, and it must be near morning. So I resolved to withdraw in good order; but, before going, I could not resist taking another peep.

The fair apparition had advanced to the table, placing thereon the lamp and a glass of water which she had carried, the latter probably explaining the cause of her nocturnal ramble; and having seated herself before the mirror, was engaged in coiling up her flowing tresses, preparatory to re-seeking her couch.

Of course, I refrained from further investigation, and drew near the window, to be in readiness to commence my descent as soon as the lady should fall asleep.

Half-an-hour, perhaps, of stillness, and darkness elapsed, interrupted only by the rustling of leaves without, and gentle, regular breathing within the next room.

It was now nearly morning. And I almost expected to see the gleams of dawn as I climbed out upon the roof. But no; all was favourable, and I prepared to descend.

"Ur-r-r-r!"

Did I fancy I heard that beastly dog again?

"Ur-r-r-r!" in unmistakable and vigorous tones from below.

I peeped over.

That confounded dog has broken his chain, and there he was, waiting below, ready to seize me the moment I came within reach. I resolved to postpone my descent.

Was ever mortal in such a predicament? I sat down upon the window-sill and pondered. What was to be done?

Which was worse? to be surprised by daylight, on the roof of the bay-window, watched by the dog like a burglar, or to hide in the dressing-room, at the risk of being discovered by the lady?

Clearly the former was the less ignoble course; only, as the window led to the lady's chamber, what explanation could I give of my presence on the roof, that would not also involve the delicacy of the lady?

The case was desperate. I could come to no conclusion.

Still the old watch-dog, true to his name, stood guard below, perfectly silent, except when I made some movement. And now a few faint streaks of light illumined the horizon. I must do something, and immediately.

A sudden inspiration seized me; I must not be found on the roof by the servants; I could not hide in a lady's dressing-room. But the lady was sleeping—she probably would remain so some time longer; could I not steal softly through her room without waking her, conceal myself in the drawing-room till the servants were astir, and then step out at the hall door? The dog would certainly relax his vigilance as soon as the family were awake.

This I resolved to do, so slipping on my coat and vest, I took my boots in my hand, and started on my perilous way.

I softly crossed the dressing-room, opened the door without a creak, stole noiselessly over the thickly-carpeted floor of the chamber, glancing neither to the right nor to the left, till I reached the door. It was fastened, but the key was in the lock.

Just as I put my hand upon it I heard a slight movement.

All wrought up, and nervous as I had become, I could not repress a start, and—horror! I dropped my boots!

Digitized by Google

It was all over! Involuntarily shutting my eyes, I turned and nerved myself for the impending scene, expecting heartrending shrieks, and subsequent alarm of the household, with all the contingencies that flashed through my brain like wildfire.

Perfect silence!

I opened my eyes. The lady was sitting bolt upright in her couch, and no marble statue could be whiter than she, nor stiller—she was literally paralysed with fright.

The glow of coming day now pervaded the room, and I knew that action must be prompt; so, scarcely knowing what words I used in my extremity, I began:

"I beg your pardon, madam—I entered the room, thinking it vacant. It used to be mine. I will retire——"

Here excitement, fasting, want of sleep, and, above all, my dreadful situation overpowered me, and I sank into a convenient chair gasping for breath.

My forlorn state acted as a restorative to the lady, and a lovely flush crept over her face as she replied, gently, but firmly:

"Sir, I cannot understand this, but I do not wish you to remain for an explanation. If what you say is true, you will immediately withdraw."

Her words were, in turn, like a tonic to me; I suddenly grasped the offending boots, threw open the door, and stood in the hall, but not before I had taken a parting glance at the lovely vision, with its fluffy white draperies and the rosy flush on the fair face.

My troubles were not yet over, however; for, unless I could safely pass through the outer door and present myself from without, I must give some explanation of the manner of my entrance: the truth I should never utter without the consent of the beautiful unknown.

I heard the servants moving about below; I heard old Jim, the gardener, calling the dog, and exclaiming over his broken chain; then came steps in the lower hall, and the unbolting and throwing-open of the front door.

I peeped over the balustrade. None of the family were yet down; and, as the footsteps retreated to the dining-room, I again took up my line of march, and, with a skill rivalling the most expert of housebreakers worked myself noiselessly down the stairs, and at last, —glory to the gods!—I stood on the outside.

I saw nothing of my old enemy, the dog, so I sat down on the steps, drew a long breath, and then put on my boots.

After regaining a little composure, I stepped boldly up to the door and rang the bell.

Satisfying the surprise of the maid with a few explanatory phrases, I asked for young Mr. Thwaites.

"You'll find him in the little hall chamber, sir, if you like to go up; we've had so many visitors that he gave his room to Miss Rossiter."

The mystery was explained. So it was Mabel Rossiter whom I had encountered.

I had heard her praises sung by every member of the Thwaites family, ever since she was in pinafores and I in jackets; but, owing to her having spent much time abroad with her parents, I had never chanced to meet her. And now—ye fates! what a meeting!

Thinking thus, I tapped at Gus's door. It was opened by my friend.

"Jupiter Olympus!" was his salutation. "Where did you come from? I should think you'd walked all the way from London, by the general 'all-gone-a-tive-ness' of your looks."

"Don't say a word, Gus," I intreated; "I'm tired to death. We had to wait three hours in a siding, owing to a breakdown on the line; and though I didn't walk from town, I did from the station, a little after midnight, and have been prowling about ever since."

Which was literally true, though I did not deem it necessary to state where I had been prowling.

"Why on earth didn't you rout us out?" asked Gus, rather emphatic in his disgust. "The idea of hanging about the outside of the house all night, when there were good beds and a warm welcome inside!"

"Yes, why didn't I?" I retorted, in the utmost indignation. "Ask that confounded and utterly abominable dog of yours why I didn't. A pretty fellow he is, to have on the premises of a respectable householder! Keep him out of my sight after this, if you want to keep him at all!"

Gus laughed.

"There, never mind, old boy; you're tired and cross, and no wonder. Here, just tumble into bed, and you shan't be disturbed for a week."

But I was in no mood for sleep.

"I'll take a wash, Gus," said I, "and lie down till breakfast; for I can't sleep, and some good hot coffee will set me up again."

"All right," said Gus, and, finishing his toilet, he left me to repose.

I had said truly that I could not sleep. Thoughts of my night's adventure, and everything connected with it, thronged through my brain and gave me no rest. What did the lady think? For, as yet, she knew not the cause of my strange intrusion. Would she recognise me? Would she allow me to make her acquaintance? How could I gain absolution for my frightful proceeding?

But the breakfast bell cut short my unsatisfactory musings, and I joined my friends in the dining-room.

Gus met me and placed me at his side, saying:

"Mother, here's poor Martin, who, as I told you, has been wandering in the grounds half the night, and stands in sore need of some of your best coffee."

After a smiling welcome from host and hostess, I greeted my other acquaintances among the merry party, and was introduced to the new-comers, Mr. and Mrs. Franklin, Mr. Preston, and—Miss Rossiter!

The lady strove her best to look unconcerned, but a blush would rise, and a repressed smile would dimple her cheeks; these, coupled with my embarrassment, caused some glances of surprise, and led Gus to exclaim:

"I believe you've seen each other before!"

I was silent, but Miss Rossiter instantly regained her composure, and replied:

"Yes, I think I have met Mr. Martin before, though I never had the pleasure of an introduction."

Bless her woman's wit! At this remark everybody subsided into customary commonplace, and breakfast went on.

It perhaps is almost unnecessary to say that my constant endeavour after this was to gain a private interview with Miss Rossiter, but, as we were decidedly new acquaintances, taken with the fact that she evidently avoided such a meeting, to accomplish the matter was a feat of some difficulty, and several days elapsed before I managed to do so.

At length, one pleasant day, when the ladies were supposed to be taking an after-dinner nap, I strolled towards a little rose-arbour with my cigar and book.

As I went in from the clear sunshine, my dazzled eyes did not at first identify a lady, who hastily rose in some confusion as I entered.

"I beg your pardon," I began, then suddenly recognised Miss Rossiter. "I implore you," I quickly ejaculated, "hear me! Only grant me five minutes! I must explain!"

Digitized by Google

The lady hesitated.

"Miss Rossiter," I continued in calmer tones, and with some dignity of manner, "I have to thank you from the bottom of my heart for your wonderful self-control and considerate silence in an affair that causes me the utmost distress and regret. If you will allow me, I will try to explain that unfortunate occurrence in such a way that even you will pardon me."

"You have my permission, sir," said Miss Rossiter, with a little stateliness, that I rather fancied was assumed to keep herself from smiling.

Somewhat encouraged I went on, and, if ever a man racked his brain for fit words for the occasion, I was that man, and I soon had the satisfaction of receiving full acquittal from the lady, together with the admission that she thought that inasmuch as I had unwittingly stumbled into such a predicament, I had chosen the very wisest course for extraction.

After this we were friends. She avoided me no more, and, in truth, it was not long before Gus accused me of being "regularly gone" on Mabel—a fact which I did not care to deny, and only wished he had been as good an authority as to the state of her mind towards me.

However, the few bright weeks, filled with all sorts of frolics, rides, drives, and tennis matches, slipped away rapidly, and the breaking-up was at hand.

On the last night of our stay, I coaxed Mabel down to the little rose-arbour. She seemed shy of entering, until we spied therein two or three others of our party enjoying the beauty of the evening.

After we had all chatted awhile, we were interrupted by Marlowe, who came after the rest of the party, according to appointment, to take a last excursion. This left Mabel alone with me, and, with a quickness born of desperation, I told her I loved her, and asked her to be my wife.

I need not put her reply in words; but, after the lapse of about half-an-hour, as I sat with her fair hands in mine, just as the voices of the returning party were borne to our ears, I said:

"How good it was of you, darling, not to make an alarm that time, as most women would have done unthinkingly, and then, what a position we should have been in!"

"Thank you, dear," she responded demurely, "but I must not accept more merit than I deserve. You see, I knew you, if you didn't know me; for, only the evening before, when Gus had gone to the station to meet you, good Mrs. Thwaites was talking about you, and showing the large photograph of you in the album in her room. So I recognised you, and, of course, after the first uncontrollable start, I knew that you were not likely to be prowling about with fell designs on unprotected damsels, or jewels; I knew, too, that I had your room, and, therefore, though very much amazed, I was not so utterly beside myself with fright as you have imagined."

I closed her lips with a kiss; but I insisted then, and still insist, that a most flagrant case of scandal was avoided simply by Miss Rossiter's presence of mind.

M. E. H.

A Nihilist's Revenge.

AN ugly, muggy, chilly evening, in spite of the fact that it was midsummer; but then I had found that weather in St. Petersburg was not all to be depended on. The streets were deserted, save when the death-carts rattled along, unmindful of their ghastly burdens. The city clocks had struck ten, and I was hurrying home—or rather to my den—to write my "special" to a London daily. Correspondents' letters are generally built upon a frail foundation of truth, but now, in these cholera times, I could hardly find time, or words strong enough, to depict the horrors I saw on every side.

I had delayed writing a little longer than usual, so that I might go more deeply into details, for the benefit of my horror-loving countrymen, and I was in haste. I was obliged to go through that part of the city most infected with the awful plague, where the air seemed reeking with infection, but being pretty well seasoned, I did not mind it very much.

As I hurried along, I saw, standing under a lamp, whose dim rays shed light but a few feet around it, a woman dressed in white.

As I passed her she stepped forward and said, with a tone of recognition: "I have been waiting for you."

I paused, and to my surprise recognised my beautiful friend, the Countess Reifsky, the toast of a hundred ballrooms, who had been flirting with me fast and furiously for some weeks—why, I could not imagine.

With reproof in every accent I exclaimed:

"Madame, what are you doing in this deadly atmosphere, and alone, at this hour?"

"I have been waiting for you," she repeated simply.

"How in the name of wonder did she know I was coming this way when I did not know it myself?" I asked myself.

I assumed a severe air.

"You must not stay here."

"No; I mean to take you with me to the final meeting of a society to which I belong. To-night we disband, and I want you to be there to describe the affair with your versatile pen to your great English people.

"You know we Nihilists are so misrepresented. No, you need not shrink away; you will come to no harm. Perhaps you do not enjoy being with a 'suspect.' To-night the far-reaching grasp of the Tsar himself would find it hard to reach me, and I shall place you beyond his power too. But we must hurry."

Half reluctant, and wholly fascinated, I allowed her to lead me along through the deserted streets until we came to a small, low building, which showed no ray of light. Here she tapped softly. The door swung back on noiseless hinges. Along a dimly-lighted hall we went to another door, which opened in the same quiet fashion, and we stood in the dazzle and glitter of a ballroom.

Digitized by Google

In my business suit I ought to have felt embarrassed, but I did not, for I was too much impressed by the scene before me.

It reminded me of what I had known in my younger days as "phantom parties," at which youths and maidens draped themselves in sheets. Yet that memory should not have given me a feeling of repugnance, for of those happy days I had the pleasantest recollections. As I looked more closely I recognised the fact that these people were masquerading in grave-clothes—mocking the destroyer which held the city in its grasp; and a great horror filled me.

I heard a low, musical laugh from the woman at my side.

"Monsieur does not approve of our masquerade? We laugh at Death. Come it in whatever fashion it may, by pestilence or in Siberian mines, we do not fear it. Swift or slow, it matters not to us."

"Yes, madame; I have heard that you Nihilists, if I must class you among them, care not how swift be the death to which you consign your victims."

"I see you do not approve of our methods, but you see we know of no other way more honourable. With us the end justifies the means, but when we must send death it is always quick."

"Not always. Bombs don't always work surely."

A gleam in my fair companion's eyes warned me I was on dangerous ground, but it was gone almost instantly, and she continued:

"Now in the case of the late prime minister—when his fate was sealed, we decided——"

I caught her arm, not knowing what damaging revelation she might make.

"Countess, you are insane. In your country, walls have ears."

"Monsieur, these walls are safely guarded. But we are missing the music and the dance."

Never, so long as memory lasts, shall I forget that evening. Noble and artisan met on equal ground. Social distinctions seemed for the time being obliterated. Brain, wit, and a common cause were the passports to this brilliant society. Words were spoken which would condemn a man to Siberia for a lifetime. No one seemed to notice me very much, beyond a courteous recognition, and as I looked among the guests, I saw my brother correspondent and compatriot, John McPherson, who was also clad in a business suit, and who seemed, like myself, a visitor.

The hours flew past. I thought somewhat uneasily of my neglected letter, but could not drag my reluctant feet away from the fascination of the scene.

The music grew faster, and more weird were the strains. My feet fairly ached to tread to their measure, but something held me back.

The hour grew late, the lights were dim, still the dancers kept up their dizzy whirl. The music rose and fell now wailing now entreating; I felt I must yield to it. My beautiful countess put her white arm on mine. I felt her warm breath sweep my cheek.

"Come with me; forget toil and sorrow. Name and fame are worth little. Together we should be for ever happy."

I looked into her great, seductive brown eyes, and almost yielded, but before my vision came a little primrose-faced girl I had left in a Devonshire village. I saw her as I had bidden her good-bye, and I pushed my temptress back.

The white arm fell, the music stopped with a crash, the decorations faded, the smiling faces vanished—changed in an instant—and with a cry of horror I saw death written on every countenance. I heard a hissing in my ear:

"When you are racked with pain upon a cholera bed, remember a Nihilist's revenge."

The floor swam. I turned and fled. At the door I met McPherson. Outside the grey dawn had broken; I turned to see where we were, and I recognised the grim walls of the morgue.

An hour later Mac and I were counted among the plague victims, hurried to the pest house. I pulled through, almost by a miracle; he, poor fellow, found a nameless grave.

Some weeks later, when I looked over the piles of newspapers which had accumulated in my absence, I read the notice of the death of the Countess Riefsky on the 17th of July, the day of my strange adventure.

H. P. D.

NOW READY.

Pearson's Magazine.

MAY, 1896.

Gates and Pillars of the Empire. Robert Machray.
No. 2.—Glasgow Illustrated.

The Ransom (A Complete Story). C. J. Cutcliffe Hyne.
Illustrated by Warwick Goble.

The Gorgeous Palaces of the Tsar. Mary Spencer Warren.
Illustrated with photographs.

Negro Serenade—"I Don't Care." H. J. Nicholls.
Illustrated by S. Nation.

Curiosities of Stained Glass Windows. Ernest R. Suffling.
Illustrated with drawings and photographs.

The Liar (A Complete Story). Edwin Pugh.
Illustrated by E. F. Sherie.

How Our Army is Clothed. Frank Lamburn.
Illustrated by George Ashton.

Wisdom Let Loose. W. L. Alden.
Illustrated by Charles May.

The Message (Verse). May Kendall.
Illustrated by Anthony Fox.

The Money We Spend on Sport. J. Mason.
Illustrated by E. F. Sherie.

The Bravest Deed I ever Saw. J. M. Le Sage.
Illustrated by Raymond Potter and C. L. Le Sage.

The Soldiers of the Khedive. Francis John.
Illustrated with photographs.

Secrets of the Courts of Europe. Allen Upward.
No. 5.—"Prince Citron."
Illustrated by Hal Hurst, R.B.A.

In the Public Eye.
Illustrated with photographs.

Gata (A Complete Story). Cuthbert Barnby.
Illustrated by Trevor Haddon.

A Peep into Penal Servitude. George Griffith.
Illustrated by H. Piffard.

The Shrinking Shoe. Sir Walter Besant & W. H. Pollock.
Illustrated by A. Jules Goodman.

The Fresh Air Fund. Clement Scott.
Illustrated by S. Nation.

The Editorial Mind.

Digitized by Google

THE LAW OF THE PLAINS.

The outfit of twelve waggons had stopped at a point on the Rio Pecos about seven miles above the town of Anton Chico. We had supper and were smoking our pipes, and it was between sunset and dark when a young fellow about twenty years old came riding up from the direction of the Comanche country. He was dressed like a cowboy, and what few words he spoke were in good English. He rode up to a camp-fire round which five or six of us were sitting, and after a "Good-evening" to all, dismounted and let his gaze wander about.

Teamster No. 5 was a Mexican half-breed known as Big Pete. He gave a start of surprise as the stranger rode up, and I heard him cursing and muttering to himself. By-and-bye the boy fixed his gaze on Pete and kept it there for a long half minute. There was a sort of smile on his face which made one think of the look of a wolf who had pursued a victim for hours and hours and was finally near enough to seize it.

"Rifle, pistol, or knife?" he asked of Pete in a low, even voice.

The big fellow looked round uneasily. He was no coward, as we all knew, but the sudden appearance of the boy had startled him for a moment. A full moon was coming up, and there would be light enough for fire-arms. He was a good shot, but that long, sharp knife was his favourite weapon. Besides, he was a giant compared to that slender but active-looking youth.

"The knife, and I will give you one minute to say your prayers!" shouted Pete as he sprang up.

"Very well. Just as you please!" quietly replied the young man as he unbridled his horse and sent him away.

Not a word was spoken by any of the rest of us. We all rose up, but made no other move. Not a question was asked of either man. It was the law of the plains. One man had the right to demand satisfaction of another by rifle, revolver, or knife. As to the cause of the quarrel, why should we ask or care? Pete removed his belt and jacket and sombrero, and tied a handkerchief around his head. The stranger removed his belt in which he carried a couple of revolvers, threw aside his sombrero, and walked off to a distance of fifty feet. Pete followed. Every man in camp formed a circle about the pair. The moon made everything as plain as daylight. The horses and mules were all to the right of us. So far as I could see, all of them stopped feeding and gazed steadfastly at the circle.

"Ready!"

It was the stranger who called out, and at the word both moved into the centre of the ring and menaced each other. A fight to the death with knives is a horrible thing to look at, and yet there is a magnetism about it which forces you to stand and look till the end comes. Boxers move about, feint, advance, retreat, rush at each other, and grapple. So it is with men who fight with knives. Back and forth across the circle, round and round it, their knives now and then clashing together, and it was ten long minutes before blood was drawn. With the first drop came death.

No man called out. No man in the circle moved out of his tracks. Some of the horses came nearer and whinnied softly, as if asking what it was all about, but this we remembered afterwards. Big Pete was working to make his great strength bring him an advantage. If he could seize that boy's right arm with his left hand and hold it for five seconds the duel would be ended. Thrice he attempted it and thrice he failed. Suddenly the boy found the opening he had been seeking. So swiftly that none of us could follow him he sprang forward under the uplifted right arm there was the flash of a knife, and Big Pete uttered a groan and sank down.

"You are witnesses that it was a fair fight," said the stranger as he stood over Pete and looked round the circle.

It was fair, but no man answered. He called his horse by a low whistle, slipped on the bridle, and half a minute later was cantering away to the east. Big Pete had wronged him. The law of the land would not give him satisfaction. The law of the plains had avenged him. A grave beside the Pecos—a guess or two as to the stranger's identity—that was all.

Harry Rogers.

PICTURE ✣ PUZZLE ✣ PRIZE.

No. 5.

£10 TO BE GIVEN AWAY.

On the opposite page is a puzzle picture composed of 88 squares. If these squares be rearranged in a certain order they will form a real picture.

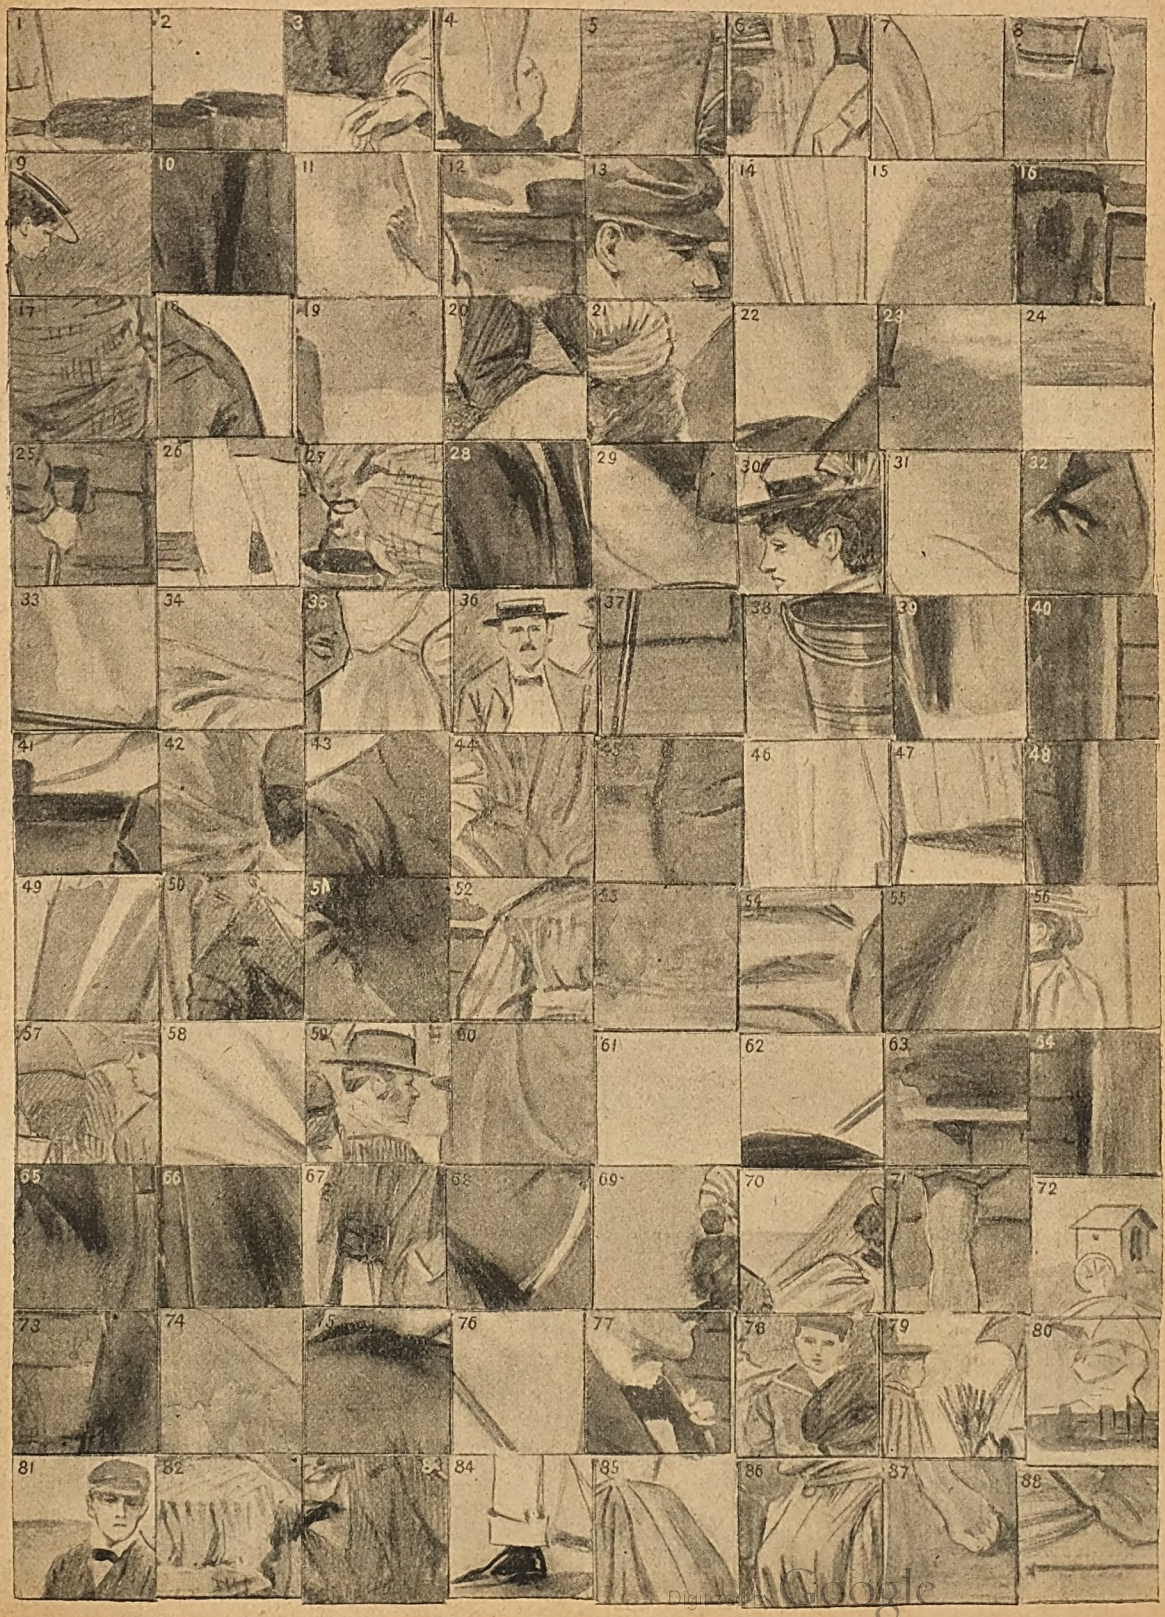
We offer a prize of £10 for the correct solution. In order to give readers in all parts of the United Kingdom as equal a chance as possible, none of the solutions received will be opened until Thursday, May 7th, when all those received will be considered together. In the event of two or more correct solutions being included in one day's post, the prize will either be given to the sender of the neatest one, or will be divided amongst the correct competitors at the discretion of the Editor. Consolation Prizes will also be awarded.

If no correct solution be received on or before Tuesday, May 12th, 1896, the Ten-Pound Prize will be given to the sender of the solution then to hand which is most nearly correct.

Pictures should be packed flat or folded, not rolled, and the outside wrapper must be marked "July."

N.B.—To make the puzzle more difficult some of the squares have been turned upside down, others sideways.

Digitized by Google



Digitized by Google

THE WINNING OF GUNHILD:

Or, The Vengeance of the Vikings.

By GEORGE C. WALLIS, Author of "Behind the Barrier," etc.

SUMMARY.

Valstran, a Dane, attacks North-hold, a Viking homestead, during the absence of the young men. Sigismund and Olaf follow the raider, but are defeated, and Olaf is killed. Editha, their mother, and Earl Bjorne, her husband, induce their only remaining son to take Harald Aslison and go out again in the new ship, the Walrus. Before leaving, Harald plights his troth to his cousin Gunhild, daughter of Editha. While they are out fighting against Valstran at sea, Turgrimm, a friend of Bjorne, comes upon the scene, but on learning that Harald requires help, refuses it, and goes on to Bjorne, whose daughter, Gunhild, he wishes to marry. Meanwhile Harald has slain Valstran, and after repairing his ship returns to North-hold on the eve of Gunhild's marriage with Turgrimm. A fight ensues between Harald's men and those of Turgrimm, with the result that the latter are turned out. Shortly after, Ogier, another friend of Bjorne's, arrives on the scene, and falls in love with Gunhild, but being a noble man, he resigns after discovering her love for Harald.

CHAPTER VIII.

The Stratagem.

Ogier was more reserved than usual that day, and listened with silent gravity when they told him of the doings of Turgrimm and his ejection from the house. When he had heard the whole story he sat awhile in thought, then said:

"You are noble lads, Harald Aslison and Sigismund Bjorne; you will always be welcome at my home. As for this Turgrimm, he is no longer a friend of mine."

And thinking of this, Ogier rose and went down to the shore and aboard the Silver-Fox and told the sailors left on guard what he knew, bidding them have no intercourse with the men of Turgrimm's Hawk.

It was growing dusk when he was ready to return, and once or twice on his way back he thought he heard the splash of oars and the muffled sound of voices on the fjord, but beyond wondering whether his quondam friend had anything to bring or send ashore, gave no further notice to the matter.

Now Turgrimm—for he it was whose oar-blades shattered the violet mirror of the water—had made up his mind to leave North-hold that very afternoon, but having afterwards seen a fierce-looking woman gesticulating wildly at the ship from the top of the rocks, a woman whom the sailors swore to be the witch Svenda of whom they had all heard, decided to land at twilight and consult her regarding his baffled plan, and even buy her aid, if by it his purpose might yet be worked.

He hailed the Silver Fox as he passed her in the boat, and receiving no response knew that Ogier had heard of his vain meanness, and so went on up the lake and landed, and then up the steep mountain path to where the cave of the Were-woman loomed black out of the hillside; the sudden fever of renewed desire and thwarted scheming and bitter hatred making him ready to listen to any evil counsel that might be given him, and more reckless than usual as to the right or wrong of his after-deeds.

Svenda looked even more frightful than she really was in the flickering glare of the torchlight she held aloft as she beckoned in, with skinny finger, her almost equally repulsive-featured guest. She stuck the spluttering torch in a cleft in the rock and then laughed—a shrill, gruesome, high-pitched laugh, that echoed dismally from the silent hills across the waters of the lake.

"Ha, ha! So you have come, as I expected, Sir Turgrimm!" cried she, drawing a short dagger from her black, matted hair. "And for no good purpose, I ween! Folk who have no dirty work to do give me plenty of room to pass as a rule."

"I am not here to listen to idle talk," said Turgrimm, "nor have I time to waste. I want your advice and help regarding something of which you may have heard. I am rich, so you will be well paid, and here is a small bag of gold to whet your interest."

The claw-like hand snatched the bag from his grasp, and the long, bony fingers closed on it greedily.

"Gold, gold!" cried the Were-woman, "it is the only thing I love now. But of your errand—there is no need to tell me, for I know what it is and how you may have revenge on your rival and secure your bride as well."

"How? Tell me," asked the man, from whose coward face all the colour was gone now, "tell me, witch, and your pay shall be doubled if it succeeds."

"Ay, I will tell you," said Svenda, playing with the short dagger, which seemed to slide along her horny skin without cutting. "I will tell you when I am ready. But know this, rich nithing, that it is for no friendship for you that I do this, but only for your gold and for the hate I bear another."

"Stop this chatter, woman!" cried Turgrimm angrily, though awed somewhat by the weirdness of the scene, "and put that knife down and tell me what I want. I have no time to waste, I repeat."

"It is a very useful dagger, and has done some good work in its time," said Svenda, grinning horribly, "it has drunk some noble blood before to-day, and is a wonderful silencer of one's foes! Ay, I will tell you, but first I would have you to know, Viking, that though I take your gold I hate you as I hate all men, whose hearts are full of deceit towards women, even as I hate all women for their pink prettiness and trust in men and fear of me. Yes, I hate you, as I hate them all.

"But for your ill-gotten gold

A fierce-looking woman gesticulating wildly at the ship from the top of the rocks.

Digitized by Google

I will befriend you. Put your ear to my lips—nay, no shrinking, craven!—and I will whisper to you, for it is a thing not well to shout to the night air!"

Now, in this the Were-woman was wise, for it so happened that a thrall of Harald's who was passing along the cliff had been drawn to the cave by unusual curiosity to see what game the witch was up to with a light in her generally dark abode, and, being unperceived, had heard most of the foregoing conversation. Yet no names had been mentioned, and, though he strained his hearing, the plan they were concocting was whispered too low for him to catch its import, so he had only a vague tale to carry to his master, who laughed at it and said there were enough strong men in the hold to defy all the tricks of the Viking and all the spells of the witch.

Could Harald have seen the startled look on Turgrimm's face as he listened to the Were-woman's advice—a look that grew to a smile so malevolent as the witch breathed on the dagger and gave it to him, that the thrall was unable to decide which of the two faces was the more evil—he would have been less confident of his own and of Gunhild's security.

* * * * *

Towards the small hours of the morning, when peaceful and honest folk sleep most soundly, a little band of men crept up to the back of the house and made forcible but silent entry into the buttery, from where access to the several living rooms was easy, since it was not customary to secure inside doors in that age.

Softly stealing along the passages, the group came to the room where Harald's mother and sister slept, and, leaving the rest outside, Turgrimm stepped gently in, with dagger in hand, and sought the bed where the little girl lay.

A straggling glint of moonlight crept through the lattice, and shone for an instant on the fair young head, with its clustering curls, and the bare white arm thrown back upon the pillow; and very pretty appeared the sweet child sleeping there so placid, so innocent, and so unconscious of the short, sharp blade that hovered above the creamy throat.

Yet Turgrimm's heart gave him never a qualm, for every rough-and-ready Viking of his type had seen and done too many deeds of blood and rapine to be lightly turned aside from a cherished desire. The coast villages of our British Isles could have told many a harrowing tale in that time of the northmen's ruthless slaughtering that would have put this deed of his into the shade.

So the keen steel sank swiftly down with unwavering stroke, and the little life was quenched without a sound sufficient to wake the mother sleeping so near. Then, wiping the blade on the bed-linen, the Norseman stepped from the room as softly as he had entered, and when he and his men had got clear away from the house bade them run to the ship with all speed and weigh anchor and row up the fjord as quietly as possible. And ere the dawn had tinted the portals of the east with pink and rose and the household was awakened to the horror of the night the Hawk was far out of sight up the inlet and moored behind a sheltering spur.

* * * * *

How can I—why need I—tell of the finding of the little corpse, of the wild grief of Freyda, of the tearless sorrow of Harald, of the gloom on the whole house, of the stern resolve to wipe out the deed with the doer's life?

"'Tis no other than black-hearted Turgrimm," said Harald bitterly, remembering what the thrall had told him yesterday, "'tis he who has done this, or why would the Hawk be gone so suddenly? How many will go with me in the Walrus?—for this will be a sterner chase than that of Valstran."

No need to ask for volunteers—there were men enough and to spare for both his ship and the Silver Fox, which Ogier insisted on placing at his service, and giving themselves and their men scant time to put away the desire for food, Harald and Ogier and Sigismund went aboard the vessels and hoisting sail to a favouring breeze and setting all the rowers to work, stood out for the open sea with intent to come up with the Hawk if possible, or pursue her to her owner's home if necessary.

Harald and Sigismund stood in the bow, hand in hand,

The claw-like hand snatched the bag from his grasp.

both gazing seaward yet neither speaking for awhile. Then the one-armed cousin said in a choking voice:

"Come with me and have some food. You will require it before our revenge is done."

Harald made no answer. Little Thelma was his favourite, his darling, whose merry laugh and mirthful prattle had cheered and amused him at the close of many a weary day, and it seemed as though the intensity of his grief had dried the fountain of his tears and turned his face to stone.

And Freyda left at home was in no better way, refusing to be comforted by any of the kind friends who strove to assuage her sorrow, and sitting all the morning long rocking to and fro with her apron thrown upon her head.

CHAPTER IX.

THE WAGER.

THAT day, at noon, Turgrimm, watching from his deck, saw Svenda signalling to him from the cliffs near the Rainbow Falls, and knowing by that the coast was clear, came down to the landing-place with the ship, then boldly marched up to the sorrow-silent house.

There were but half-a-dozen able men besides the old Earl left in the place, and so what slight resistance was offered was useless to prevent the ruthless Vikings from carrying off Gunhild and leaving the house in a state of general wreck. The Earl they left bound in his chair, almost beside himself with impotent rage and futile self-reproach, and the women they fastened in their own room, so that it would be some time before they could escape to carry the news. Then, taking the weeping Gunhild down to the Hawk and binding her to the mast, they ran up the sail and forged out of the road and into the open sea.

Digitized by Google

Turgrimm stepped gently in, with dagger in hand.

For six days they held on to the south, undeterred by storm or tide and unchallenged by any hostile craft, and never once was Gunhild left unguarded all those weary days. Twice Turgrimm renewed his love-making, telling the scornful girl how he had bought advice from Svenda and carried it out—and yet cheated the Were-woman at the end.

"Yes, my pretty one!" said he, "you will have a cunning fellow for your husband soon. For the witch's help and incantations for my success she was to have two bags of gold, one of which I gave her at the time, promising to pay the other when satisfied. But never a glint of Turgrimm's gold will the foul hag see again! Ho! ho! By the Tree Igdrasil, the Nornas have spoken in my favour, sweet one, and you will do well to submit to me with a good grace!"

"Never!" said Gunhild.

"Wait until we get to Dertheim, pretty one," said he, "then we shall see. Meantime I doubt not that your brother and cousin have been there before me, only to find themselves well fooled. And if we can pass them unseen on their return journey all will indeed be well."

This latter sentence raised a sudden spark of hope in Gunhild's breast, only to be extinguished as suddenly, for a driving Northern mist came down the following night, and when it had cleared away next morning Turgrimm walked the deck in high spirits, thanking the gods for so favouring his schemes, for in the semi-light of the chill dawn his look-out had espied the black sterns of two ships rapidly vanishing into the grey murk to the north.

To Dertheim Hold, then, came Turgrimm and his prisoner, only to find, as they expected, that most of the home serfs were slain and the house itself a black, charred wreck, some of the smoke-grimed timbers still aglow with creeping veins of fire.

"They have done their work well, gentle maid, I swear!" said the Viking, stroking his grizzled chin and smiling ironically; "but 'tis little matter. I can soon have a new house built and buy fresh serfs, and while we are getting settled, you and I, Gunhild, can live in one of the cottages in the garth. And here, at all events, is the last place they will look for us again!"

The girl shuddered and shrank from his embrace as though stung by an adder, and frowning darkly at her aversion, Turgrimm ordered the men to take her to the nearest hut and fasten her in.

"We will see what a little wholesome solitude and frugal fasting will do for her proud scorn!" he said.

But there was something of the stern spirit of her mother, Editha, in Gunhild's nature; the gentle influence of the White Christ had not yet supplanted the belief in the brave old gods of the Northland, and so not a word of pleading nor a sign of submission did Bjorne's daughter give when Turgrimm went to see her on the third day and brought food and drink. She was almost spent then, but relentless still, though her fair cheeks were red with the course of many scalding tears, her eyes sunken in great hollows, and her lithe fingers chafed and thin with constant frantic clasping of her hands.

Clearly, if he would have her bend to his will without main force—which would be a profitless success at best, a poor end to his plan, though a revenge to be reserved to the last, if all else failed—some other means would have to be tried to bring her to a fit frame of mind.

It was in vain he raved and pleaded and swore and spoke such honeyed words as he could, and threatened and sneered by turns. At last, weary of his importunity and tired of listening in silence, Gunhild rose up in fiery disdain, and, with eyes flashing and a rush of colour to her pallid cheeks, cried:

"I will not be your love, coward, traitor, and murderer! I will never consent to be married to so vile, so evil-hearted a man; nay, if you and your cruel men force me to the bridal seat of your new house, and bind the wedding-crown upon my head, and force the loving-draught between my lips, even then I shall defy you. At the last I shall have the one resource left that not even you can take away, for if you drag me to your bridal bed, it shall be as a corpse, and a corpse only! And now go, nor think I shall soil myself with speaking to you further."

Turgrimm quivered under the lash of her stinging and defiant words. He bit his lip in vexation till the blood came, and went out of the hut, darkly revolving certain plans in his mind. For a time now, Gunhild was left in peace and was well fed, though closely secured and guarded.

Digitized by Google

At the end of a month from her coming to Dertheim, a part of the new house was finished, and therein Turgrimm and his chief vassals installed themselves, making boisterously merry the first night of their dwelling there over the return of one Sigurd, a great-limbed, strong-sinewed berserker who had been in Turgrimm's service long before.

The ale passed freely round, and joke and story of none too choice a kind was told from roysterer to roysterer along the board, but loudest voiced of all and most unblushing in the telling of deeds of shame and blood, and most uproarious in his coarse mirth, was Sigurd, the berserker, who, as midnight neared, began to rave in his cups, and to become a dangerous neighbour. Inch by inch the men on either side of him at the table edged further off, and even Turgrimm himself, evil and hardened as he was, felt put to the blush by this erstwhile follower of his, and what with fear for his freaks and mortification at the failure of his wooing, sat moody and taciturn at the feast.

"What ails you, friend?" said Sigurd, noticing this at last. "Why look so miserably glum when all are so jolly? Art in love, or hast lost a fortune?"

Turgrimm's face darkened, but not wishing to appear offended, he owned that it was a woman that was the cause of his depression.

Loud and long laughed Sigurd at that.

"Come, bring out your wayward charmer!" he roared in his thick, gruff voice, a loud hiccough punctuating his sentences, "and let us look at her, and maybe we shall find means to conquer her dislike."

Turgrimm hesitated at first, but Sigurd looked so menacingly at him when he began to offer excuses that he sent a couple of stout thralls to the hut, who brought her in and placed her, with hands bound, at the end of the long pine table.

"She is my prize," said Turgrimm, a way of keeping her from Sigurd—whose wolfish eyes were feasting on the beauty which showed even under the sorrow-stains of captivity—suggesting itself to his mind, "she is mine, but so wayward that if you care, my doughty men, we will play a game of odds, and she shall be my wager."

So the half-drunken men fell to and played; but Sigurd had learned more craft on his travels than Turgrimm gave him credit for, and, to the latter's disgust, won all before him, until only his host remained to play.

Then the two villains sat down to play the last game, each prepared to stretch his honesty as far as the bleared eyes around would let, and in the end Turgrimm won. Gunhild gave a sigh of relief. He was brute enough, but the thought of falling into Sigurd's clutches—to be his sport for an hour, and then to be cast to the serfs, perchance—was too horrible. That worthy, however, was not to be put off so easily; he saw the look of relief in her eyes, and it fanned the flame of his vile desire.

"Not so fast, friend Turgrimm!" he roared, twisting his grey-streaked beard in his rough hand savagely; "we will have another game now, and she shall again be the wager. We will wrestle for her, you and I!"

The other's face turned a sickly paleness at that suggestion, but there was no help for it, so he said:

"As you will; but first let some of my serfs have the chance of winning her."

"I care not how I get her so I do get her!" laughed Sigurd, "whom shall I treat to the strength of these arms?"

"Othnar shall try the hazard," and Turgrimm named the stoutest-limbed and most noted wrestler present, "and the girl to the winner."

Then Othnar rose from his seat, and glancing once at Gunhild, advanced to meet the berserker, and the two were soon locked in a mad embrace, writhing this way and that along the rush-strewn floor.

The others drained their cups and sat back to watch and cheer them on with drunken levity, while Gunhild stood trembling at the end of the table, watching the two men with dilating eyes, her mind in a whirl of terror.

Presently the grey light of early day crept in through the casement and shone with ashen tint upon the flushed faces of the drunken men around the table, and the fiery visages and contorted forms of the two who still struggled, with cracking joints and heavy breathing and violent lifts, to win a wager that such men have seldom chance to wrestle for.

At last, with a crafty move, a mighty heave, Sigurd got Othnar off the ground, and poising him in air a moment, gathered his strength and threw him backwards over his shoulders with such force that the wretched man's head bent under him as he fell, and his backbone snapped and he died with one wild gasp of pain!

Forgetting that he was their master's servant, the men broke into a loud cheer at the feat, and drew back readily to let the victor seize his prize. And Turgrimm himself was too much in bodily fear to venture to cross the berserker in his present mood, so said not anything when Sigurd cut the thongs that bound Gunhild's hands, and finding she would not follow him outside to the hut allotted to him, and where he intended sleeping off the wild carouse, seized the rich golden hair that hung dishevelled on her back and shoulders, and bore her by it shrieking through the doorway.

In that awful moment Gunhild felt that all hope was lost, and breathing Harald's name with her lips, drew the small dirk she had cherished for this last resource with intent to plunge it into her heart and so end the suffering that her luckless beauty had brought upon her. But the berserker saw the steel in time and snatched it from her grasp, and with a little cry of despair the girl swooned away.

CHAPTER X.

THE EDGE OF THE LONG SWORD.

VOYAGE-WORN and sorrow-weary, Harald and his friends came back to North-hold after a three weeks' fruitless search along the coast and in the many inlets, and with dejected air walked into the great hall. One glance around showed the three leaders that their enemy had been there since their departure, and a chill of terror struck Harald when he saw that Gunhild sat not by her mother's side, and that the eyes of stern Editha were even then red with tears. They saw the question in his eyes, and the old Earl said in a broken voice:

The girl shuddered and shrank from his embrace.

"'Tis better you should know, all of you, at once. Turgrimm and his men came here the day you left and slew my men and carried away my Gunhild. And you have not found him?"

"No," said Sigismund, for Harald could find no words, and Ogier was slower of speech than even he was wont. "We sacked and burnt his place, but he was not there, and we have hunted him along the coast in vain."

Digitized by Google

"What can be done?" queried Editha, in a hard, dry tone.

"Nothing," said the Earl; "it will be a useless search I fear, now that you have missed him."

"Nothing!" cried Longsword, turning to face the old man, "nothing! By Thor, but if you can give up your daughter so easily, I cannot give up my love while I have strength to wield a trusty blade! Come, Ogier, we will hunt out this Were-woman who was seen in converse with that dog, and force her knowledge out of her, if need be. Come!"

Impatient, Harald strode away, and the two followed with hasty strides until they came to the gloomy cavern, where Svenda sat brewing a foul-smelling stew in a small pot on a log fire. She looked up swiftly at their entrance, then went on stirring the mess with studied unconcern.

"We have come to ask, Witch," cried Harald, shaking her roughly by the shoulder, and forgetting all fear of her in his haste to get news of his stolen darling, "what you said to Turgrimm the night he slew my little sister in her sleep. We want to know where the wretch has gone. Do you hear?"

"I am not deaf, my fine young sir," growled the Were-woman, never looking up from her work, save once when Harald's man, Eric, with bow in hand, entered the cave and stood behind his master. "I am not deaf, nor am I in any mood to do you a favour, for love or for gold!"—and she laughed again that horrible laugh of hers—"but I will tell you what you want because this Turgrimm cheated me out of half my price for breathing him a spell and lending him my silent dagger and suggesting a clever way for his dull wit to follow. Yet I will take your money after all. How much will you give me for my news?"

"A hundred marks of gold," said Harald abruptly.

"Then if you want the wretch—who thought to cheat me and escape my vengeance—you must seek him in his own lair, for there I told him to go after you had been and returned. His ship was anchored yonder by the cliff when yours set sail, and you must have missed him on the seas. Now your gold!"

"Not a mark, not a grain, wretched witch!" said Harald turning on his heel; "you may be thankful that I have not time to stop and slay you for your foul work. Come, friends; we have work to do now, and must be away!"

"For that defiance I will tell you what I would have kept back," cried she. "I will tell you that the Valkyrs have chosen one of you three; that one of you goes to his death! And for that defiance I will have my revenge on you, Harald Aslison!" and Svenda sprang towards him with a scream of rage, and raised her claw-like hands as though to strike him to the earth. But Eric, who had been silently fitting an arrow to his bow while they talked, was too quick for her, and ere the talons could descend, the feathered shaft had caught her full in the breast, and Svenda the Witch fell back with a wild shriek of mingled hate and pain.

"A good deed well done!" cried Harald, with the first smile that had wreathed his face since little Thelma had been killed. "Let us be gone."

Back to the hold they went and told their news, and after restocking the two ships with more food and more weapons, prepared to set out once more on their voyage of vengeance. Harald and Sigismund would have dissuaded Ogier from risking his life in their quarrel, especially after the evil prophecy they had just heard, but he simply answered, in a tone that ended the matter:

"I shall not rest till Turgrimm be sent to Hela. I am a man, and my friends' quarrels are my quarrels."

Then Harald sought out Earl Bjorne before he went aboard, and told him of his love for Gunhild, and begged his consent to their marriage if he should succeed in rescuing her in time. The old man broke down at that appeal, remembering his harsh treatment of Harald, and said:

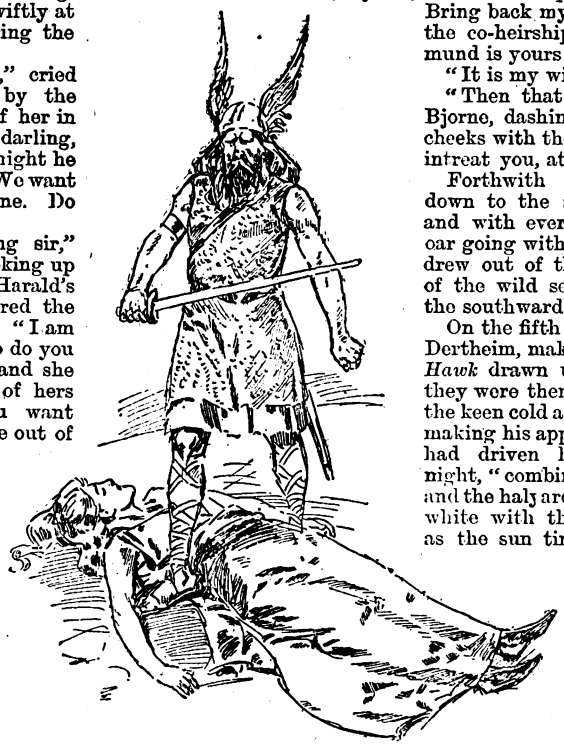
"Go, my son, and waste no precious time over my wishes. Bring back my Gunhild to me, and she and the co-heirship to North-hold with Sigismund is yours from then, if he wills it."

"It is my wish," said Sigismund.

"Then that is settled, my sons," cried Bjorne, dashing the tears from his aged cheeks with the back of his hand. "Go, I intreat you, at once, and fail not."

Forthwith the stern-faced men went down to the ships and got under weigh, and with every inch of sail set, and every oar going with a measured, sweeping swing, drew out of the fjord to the open bosom of the wild sea and held on their way to the southward night and day.

On the fifth morning they drew near to Dertheim, making out the dark hull of the Hawk drawn up on the shore long before they were themselves visible—so clear was the keen cold air. The frost king, Thrymm—making his appearance early this autumn—had driven his cloud-horses home last night, "combing their manes" as he went, and the halyards and masts and sheets were white with the small round rime, which, as the sun tinged it, shone and sparkled and glistened in the level rays like a myriad glow-worms clustered round the ropes and spars and sharp and rounded woodwork edges.



The berserker standing over her with a great blade drawn.

"Luff!" cried Harald to his sailors, as the cold shore loomed into nearer view. The willing men ran to their work with eagerness, despite their numbed hands and the keen breath of the morning wind, and in a trice ran the brace through the blocks and brought the boom round, and very soon the Walrus hove to, and they let down the gangway plank and Harald and Sigismund got ashore. The Silver Fox touched ground at almost the same moment, and Ogier and his men joined them ere they had taken ten paces towards the half-built house, wherefrom streamed several rays of sickly light and the sound of loud laughter and many voices.

"How best can we surprise them?" asked cautious Sigismund.

"I care not how, so long as we get them at sword-point, and that speedily," said Harald; "but we had best stay here till Ogier can reach the back, and so——" when suddenly a wild cheer rang out from the house, followed by a brief calm, and then the door was opened, and out came Sigurd the Berserker, dragging Gunhild with him.

Harald sprang forward with a cry and an oath, saw Gunhild snatch something from her bosom and Sigurd dash it from her hand, and came up to find her fainted away, and the berserker standing over her with a great blade drawn.

Their swords struck fire on the instant, and at the ringing sound out poured Turgrimm and the rest of the startled revellers from the house, the sailors surrounding them at once, and back to back the doomed men, sobered suddenly, fought as best they could at the disadvantage.

Digitized by Google

They were outnumbered, surprised, and unsteady with drink and long sitting, and very soon the paid men of Dertheim were separated and cut down one by one till only Turgrimm himself, and Sigurd, and four others, remained alive. Turgrimm, feeling that his last hour had come, had turned at bay and was fighting as desperately as any of the rest, and these six made so stubborn a resistance that there was a fear lest the whole country-side should be roused ere the work was done.

But the cool bravery of silent Ogier, and the cautious strokes of one-armed Sigismund and the fierce sweeps of Longsword, were not to be denied, and it was not long before only Sigurd and Turgrimm were left, standing back to back inside the closely-pressing ring of their pitiless foes.

Now the berserk fury came upon Sigurd, and, being relieved of Harald's attack now that the latter was engaging Turgrimm, he turned, all wounded and bleeding as he was, the foam flecking his lips and his bloodshot eyes glaring fire, and laid about him so lustily that the sailors gave back a space before his terrible advance.

Then Sigismund stepped forward to stop him as he strove to reach the recumbent form of Gunhild, but the great, heavy blade whirled madly once in air and then came down, and Sigismund's sword broke under it and he fell, the berserker's weapon piercing his mail at the shoulder joint.

Then, as the blade flashed once more above Gunhild's prostrate form, Ogier sprang to the rescue, and the silent man's axe struck the mad giant full on the nape of the neck and hurled him sprawling forward with a vivid roar of pain that ended in a death-rattle as he touched the ground.

Meantime, Harald had been playing with Turgrimm as a cat with a mouse, beating his defence at every stroke, piercing his armour in a score of places, and sending him reeling from the long sword's point till he was tired of the grim frolic, yet delaying the fatal blow so that his foe felt the fear of death a dozen times or more. But as Sigurd fell, what little spirit was in the craven flared up like the last flicker of a dying candle, and for a moment, with wild, reckless strokes and fierce cuts he held Harald on equal terms.

Then his strength and nerve failed, the merciless foe beat down his last weak effort of defence, sending his blade spinning from his hand; and then, raising Longsword's shining length above his head, Harald brought down its keen avenging edge with wrathful force upon the cringing wretch before him, and so fiercely, that it bit clean through the polished helm, and hard skull, and evil head, and Turgrimm of Dertheim received the fate his wickedness well deserved.

* * *

Then they fired the half-built house and the stranded Hawk, and went back to their ships, the sailors carrying the insensible form of Gunhild and the body of dead Sigismund carefully on a bier of upturned shields.

Clasped in Harald's arms, her head upon his knee, Gunhild soon recovered from her long swoon, and smiled faintly up at him with a great joy when she saw that it was he and felt his passionate kisses upon her fair forehead and sweet lips. And he, all hacked and jaded by the fight, sat there holding her patiently until she was well enough to walk to the side to be refreshed by the salt sea-breeze as the Walrus ploughed the waters on her homeward way.

But the Silver Fox did not go back with them to Northhold. Ogier's love for Gunhild had risen within him anew, and tenfold stronger at sight of her, though he tried to fight it down, and he knew that in her presence there would be no peace for him. So when Harald pressed him to return, the man of few words said simply, as the two ships parted and the gulf between grew wider:

"I have done what I could to help you, friend Harald, but for many things it is better that I leave you now. Farewell!"

"Farewell!" said Harald, with a minor note of sadness in the joy that was his at last without fear, "farewell, dear friend, say at least that you will come again on a visit soon."

Ogier only shook his head at that, and Harald and Gunhild, with hands clasped, watched the brave, silent man, standing there so nobly in the stern of his ship, until his figure grew indistinct in the morning haze on the sea, and the blue distance swallowed him from their sight.

THE END.

The death of Turgrimm.

Digitized by Google

JAKE'S SQUAW.

CARMEN stood in the door of the cookhouse, her hand shading her eyes, and gazed intently over the prairie towards the west. The level rays of the sun cast a rosy glow on her brown cheeks, and gave a reddish tinge to the coal-black hair falling straight over her shoulders, after the manner of married women of her tribe. Carmen was a Spanish-Indian half-breed, and a beauty. She was known at Star Camp as Jake Ringer's squaw. When Jake came back from Mexico, after the trouble about his knifing Longhaired Ike had blown over, he brought this woman with him.

Jake was not a man to be lightly questioned. He kept his affairs to himself, and his hand was ever ready to his pistol when he was pressed beyond his liking; but it was whispered among the boys that he had stolen his dusky bride from her mother's lodge on the night that was to have consummated her nuptials with Big Grizzly, the Apaché chief. Jake was kind to her in a fashion that decidedly astonished the men best acquainted with his fierce and gloomy character. As for Carmen, her soft, brown eyes followed her rough lord with the faithfulness of a dog; no white wife could have been so gentle or so helpful as this savage girl.

She had been alone for a week now, while the herders were off on the range, rounding up the horses for their yearly branding. To-night she looked for them home. There was a sound of bacon sizzling in the big frying-pan, brown jacketed potatoes peeped from their hiding-place in the hot ashes, and Carmen left the door for a moment to peep into the oven at the biscuit colouring delicately inside. Carmen cooked well, and the boys ound her presence a welcome one, freeing them of irksome stewing over the stove when they rode home tired and hungry.

She glanced through the window as she rose from her biscuit inspection, then hastily returned to her post n the doorway.

Far off on the edge of the prairie a tiny moving cloud imade its appearance, creeping snail-like towards her; gradually it rolled and swelled and came rushing over the intervening plain, taking shape into rounded puffs ever falling and renewing.

"La caballada!" she murmured, in a satisfied tone.

At last there came the thunder of quick hoof-beats, and then the excited herd dashed after their leader into the big corral. The heavy gates banged, the chains rattled over the staple. Five hungry men sprang from their saddles, and, hastily picketing their ponies, made a bee-line for the cookhouse.

They greeted Carmen with boisterous jollity, flung themselves upon their benches, and, without further ado, began to devour the food set before them.

"Hey! this coffee is prime, my Carmen!" "Some white woman taught yer to make biscuits, gal!" "I say, Jake, you bet it's fine to get back to Carmen's cookin'!" vociferated one and another, as, the edge of their appetites dulled, they began to ply their knives more slowly.

Carmen paid no attention to their rough compliments. She was standing behind her husband's chair, acting as waitress when occasion required, at other times fingering his sombrero or timidly touching his tousled curls. Each man was duly supplied with edibles; but the crispest bacon and brownest biscuit found their way to Jake Ringer's plate, until finally he looked up and announced: "I've had enough! Now eat yourself."

The men rose from the table, and scattered to their evening occupations; only Jake remained, smoking in the doorway, while Carmen sat down to her meal of fragments.

As the last slouching figure vanished towards the cabins, he turned to the woman with a slow smile, and asked in Mexican: "Has it been lonely these days, cara mia?"

"It is always night in my heart when thou art gone, oh, my husband!"

Then still in the soft Mexican tongue, they talked together of such things as made up their life—of the range happenings, of the morrow's work, of what they would buy in Alamito when the herds were driven in to be sold.

Lastly, as Jake rose and knocked the ashes from his pipe, he remarked, in English:

"To-morrow and Friday's the brandin', but Saturday I'll make the boys get out the plough an' fix us a fire-break. The grass is uncommon long jest now, an' it's dryin' fast. Ef we don't look out, we'll have the whole camp goin' up in smoke."

He strode through the starlit dusk towards his sleeping shack, and Carmen, shutting softly the door of the cookhouse, followed slowly in the same direction.

Digitized by Google

The air felt stifling and oppressive. A stiff breeze came out of the south, but its hot breath filled the frame with uncomfortable languor. Old Tom Griffin, standing in the door of the boys' shack, hallooed to Jake as he passed him. Carmen slipped by them and into her own little shanty.

"Looky here, Jake," growled old Tom in an undertone, "the boys is snoozin' a'ready, but I can't turn in fer thinkin' er that pesky long hoss-feed out yander. With this here breeze, a fire cud come a-gallopin'—what d'yer say ter you'n me goin' out now an' burnin' off a bit? Jest fer luck!"

"Pshaw, Tom, 'tain't so awful dry yet, neither. Turn in man, an' quit botherin'. After the brandin's done, we'll up an' plough a good breakin'. You bet I'm tired, an' I ain't no mind ter go burnin' off this time o' night."

He turned on his heel and disappeared into the smaller cabin. Old Tom shook his head. "Them boys ain't keerful enough," he muttered. "Seems to me them critters yander air oneasy." He glanced once more towards the corral, where an unusual stamping and pawing seemed to confirm his words; once more he shook his head doubtfully; then, after a look all round the horizon, where no uncommon sign was manifest, he at last sought his bunk. Tired nature soon drowned his fears in sleep.

Five hours later a slim, red tongue reached over the crest of the knoll that bounded the horizon of Star Camp to the south. It writhed this way and that among the long grass-stems. Another and another followed it, then a wall of flame, reaching east and west as far as the eye could follow, rose over the ridge and bore down, with racehorse speed, upon the devoted little settlement below.

Jake Ringer stirred uneasily in his sleep, and flung a protecting arm over the quiet figure beside him. A glare of lurid light filled the little room with the brightness of noonday; but still they slept on. Outside in the corral, horses were snorting and stamping, their wild eyes staring at the distant but swift-coming danger. The animals picketed on the prairie tugged at their stout ropes, rearing and screaming.

Old Tom Griffin, awakened by the rising clamour, sprang with a bound to the door. "Fire! Fire!" he shouted. "Quick, out of this, or ye'll smother like rats in a hole!"

Four half clad figures rushed out into the night, and Dick Elland beat on Jake Ringer's door, calling: "Up! up! if ye value yer lives!"

Roused from his heavy slumber, Jake stumbled across the floor; trembling, Carmen followed close behind.

One look at the oncoming demon brought Jake to his wandering senses.

"A back-fire, quick, you idiots!" he bawled, and made a break for the cookhouse.

Old Tom laid a powerful, restraining hand on his shoulder.

"Too late, my lad!" he shouted above the din of the frantic penned-in herd. "That furnace 'ud reach us afore 'twas even started."

Indeed, the fiery breath of the advancing flames already scorched their faces.

"We must trust to our good horseflesh!" spoke up Dick Elland quickly.

A rush for the picketed ponies—in an instant more each man was riding for his life.

Jake Ringer was first in the saddle; he curbed his frightened steed with one strong arm, and with the other swung Carmen's light form to a seat behind him.

It was old Tom who stopped at the corral, snatched the chain from its hook, and flinging wide the gates, gave freedom to the poor, crazed creatures within the walls.

Fear lent wings to their feet—the ridden and the riderless together dashed eagerly towards the dark northern horizon, where, miles away, lay safely in the cool waters of the Brazos. No one looked back in time to see how, with a leap and a roar, the hungry flames pounced on the deserted buildings, and, in one moment, licked up every trace of man's handiwork. On and on, mile after mile of dry prairie slipping back from their swift-beating hoofs, sped the fleeing band.

Anxious faces turned now and then to see if they kept their start from their evil pursuer. It was Carmen, cowering on old General's broad back—Carmen, clinging with a clutch of despair to Jake's shoulders—who turned the oftenest. It was Carmen who first noticed that the short distance—so terribly, hopelessly short—between them and the eddying flame cloud was lessening. She shrieked aloud in her terror, but Jake bade her sternly: "Take courage. It's only two miles more to the river."

Only two miles!—but the pace was telling. The work-weary and laden ponies were already distanced by the flying herd. Old General, with his double load, still kept his place in the van, but Jake could feel he was weakening.

Nearer and nearer swept the destroying element. Slower and slower seemed to move the panting and straining horses.

A mile—a half-mile—now but a quarter—to safety! Could they make it? The fire was pressing them closely; the stinging smoke blinded men and horses; their skins parched and cracked in the awful heat. Inch by inch old General lost his frontage; in vain Jake plied the spur; the good old horse was spent.

In one last despairing glance backward, Jake saw that the flames were upon them; his brave beast still staggered forward, but at that pace nothing could save them. Carmen's face was buried on his shoulder.

With parched lips, the man muttered: "At least we die together!"

A wild scream rang through the pall of grass smoke. Old Tom on the river bank heard it—"Adios, caro mio, one alone may be saved!"

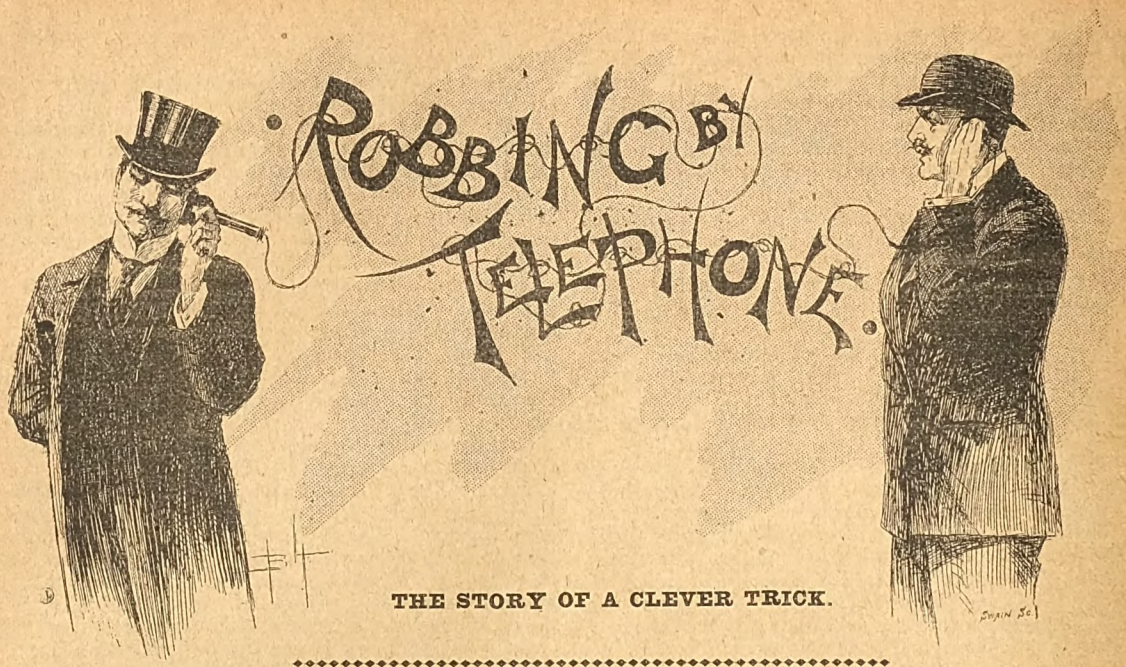
The clinging arms relaxed; relieved of the woman's weight, the horse sprang forward.

For a second her figure stood haloed, as her hair and light garments blazed upward; then the swirling billows shuts out the terrible picture.

Jake Ringer covered his eyes and fell forward on General's neck. He did not know that his hair was singed and his clothes already smouldering as his horse plunged into the Brazos. He did not know that his comrades lifted him gently up the opposite bank as the fire swept to the water's edge and died into sudden darkness. But when he came back to consciousness, then he knew that Carmen had given her life for him.

GERTRUDE MILLARD.

Digitized by Google



THE STORY OF A CLEVER TRICK.

"It is a well-known fact that no other section of the population avail themselves more readily and speedily of the latest triumphs of science than the criminal class," says a detective.

"The well-informed criminal skims the cream from every new invention, if he can make use of it. No iron safe has yet been constructed that keeps him out, but I don't recall a case in which this truth was more thoroughly demonstrated than the Maxwell case."

"What case was that?"

"It was at the time when the telephone had just been introduced into business and private use. George Maxwell was at that time one of the most successful speculators on 'Change, and was currently reported to have tipped the scale which marked £100,000. He was a young and handsome man, and had just married a lady of remarkable beauty. It was a decided love match. A score or so of messages were dispatched every day during business hours. They contained such important queries as: 12.10 p.m. 'How are you now, darling?' And replies like this: 2.35 p.m. 'I sigh for you. How is my sweetheart?' Well, to save outlay and to increase the facility of communication, Mr. Maxwell connected his office with his house by a private telephone wire.

* * * * *

"One day, just before the close of business, there was a ring at the telephone. The devoted husband, with a leap, was there. 'What does my darling wish?' he murmured.

"'I'm no darling. You mistake me, sir!' came the reply in a masculine voice, a voice rough and rasping, but very distinct.

"'Who are you, then?' asked the astonished Maxwell.

"'I'm Thomas Odell, the accomplished burglar, if you want to know!'

"'Repeat, please,' gasped the other.

"'Odell, the burglar,' came the answer. 'But, now listen, I cannot waste time. I and two of my gang have gained access to your house. The cook, the chambermaid, and your wife are lying here bound and gagged. The coachman has been disposed of. Some bundles of rags soaked in petroleum have been judiciously distributed about the house ready to be ignited.'

"'You scoundrel!' shouted the agonised husband, in an excess of emotion.

"'Don't excite yourself. Now, sir, here is my proposal. If you disappear from the telephone without acceding to it, I shall set fire to the house. It's no use applying to the police, for we'd be too quick for them. You will see, Mr. Maxwell, that you are utterly in my power. The only sensible thing you can do is to listen to my proposal, and to agree to it.'

"'Oh, I wish I had my hand at your throat, you villain!' shouted the other, shaking with rage.

"'But you know you haven't, so what's the use of your talking that way! Let us talk business instead. I need a loan of £2,000—cash. I need it at once. If you are inclined to lend me that sum without guarantee I shall leave your house with my men in exactly the same condition in which I found it.'

"'You are ruining me,' groaned Maxwell. 'And I don't think I have that much money in cash in the office safe.'

"'You'll force me to commit an atrocious deed,' came the remorseless reply.

"'All right, then—yes, I'll pay, but to whom?'

"'It is now 5.15 exactly. At this very moment my confederate has entered your office to receive the money. You will pay him and he will tell you that watchword agreed to between us, which you telephone to me at once.'

"Mr. Maxwell turned round. A stranger of pleasant mien, dressed in the height of fashion, stood before him. Said the visitor:

"'I have called to collect a little matter of £2,000 for a friend of mine, Mr. Thomas Odell.'

Digitized by Google

"'I understand,' replied Mr. Maxwell, who went to the safe, took from it several packets of notes to the value of £2,000, and handed the money to the stranger.

"The latter ascertained that the amount was correct, and placed it inside his breast pocket.

"'And the watchword?' demanded Mr. Maxwell.

"'Do right and interfere not!' replied the burglar's confederate, with an assumption of dignity, and strode out of the office with all the grandeur of a Spanish hidalgo.

"'Do right and interfere not!' joyfully exclaimed Mr. Maxwell through the telephone. 'And, now you'll leave my premises, Mr. Odell, won't you? And as for my wife——'

"'Have no fear, Mr. Maxwell,' replied the man at the other end, 'you have to deal with a burglar and a gentleman.'

"Mr. Maxwell locked his office, and entering a hansom, galloped to his residence. The more closely he approached the keener his fear of a catastrophe became. But as he stopped at the gate he noticed nothing out of the way. He sprang up the stairs, and entered the pretty boudoir of his prettier wife. She was quietly reading.

She was quietly reading.

"'How you must have suffered, my angel!' he cried, and a sob shook his voice.

"The young wife looked up, astonished.

"'Suffered? I?'

"'That burglar, you know—it must have been awful. Oh, you poor darling!'

"'Why, George dear, what is the matter? You speak in riddles.'

"'But didn't he gag you?' he asked.

"'Now, my dear George, I wish you would talk sense. What do you mean?'

"After Mr. Maxwell has finished the recital of his adventure, he asked:

"'Wasn't there somebody here using my telephone?'

"'Why, yes, there was,' replied Mrs. Maxwell, 'a young and well-dressed man came in, introduced himself to me as Mr. Thomas Odell, a speculator and business friend of yours, and requested permission to make use of your private telephone to send you a most important message on business. Of course I gave him permission. He used the telephone but a short time, and then came back into the drawing-room, thanked me for the favour I had done him, and went away, saying that the telephone was a most useful and admirable invention, it facilitated business so much.'

"'And that was all?' queried Mr. Maxwell; 'he didn't gag you and the servants? He was alone, and did not offer violence to you?'

"'Not at all. He was most polite and gentlemanly, quite as much as you are at this moment, George.'

"'Great Scott!' exclaimed Maxwell with a wild outburst, 'how gigantically I've been sold. Excuse me, dear, but I can't help it. I'll drive over and interview the police.'

"And that's what he did," concluded the detective, "and that's the way I came in possession of the facts. In spite of all our efforts since we've heard nothing more of the £2,000, nor of Mr. Thomas Odell and his confederate."

H. LEGGETT.

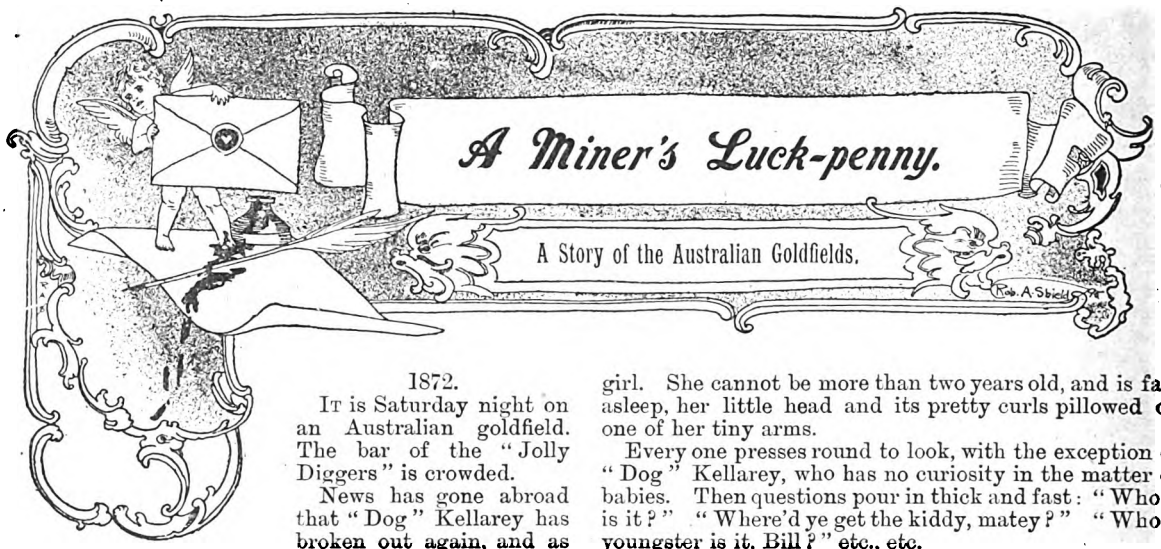
TO TELL the CHARACTER from HANDWRITING

THE services of a famous graphologist have been retained for the benefit of the readers of S.S. The inquisitive should send a specimen of their handwriting upon an unruled sheet of notepaper and signed with their customary signature and full address. With this should be inclosed six stamps and a stamped and addressed envelope. All letters should be marked "Graphologist," and forwarded to Pearson's Weekly Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

A CONTINENTAL TOUR FOR £2.

As the holiday season has now arrived, special arrangements have been made with Messrs. Thomas Cook and Son for a three days' tour on the Continent. The itinerary which has been mapped out is this: London, Harwich, Antwerp, Brussels, and back, including a visit to the field of the battle of Waterloo. The entire trip will cost £2 a head. All applications for tickets must be made to this office, stating the date for which they are required and inclosing £2 in postal orders.

Digitized by Google



A Miner's Luck-penny.

A Story of the Australian Goldfields.

1872.

It is Saturday night on an Australian goldfield. The bar of the "Jolly Diggers" is crowded.

News has gone abroad that "Dog" Kellarey has broken out again, and as he always takes care to have his little bouts remembered, a crowd soon collects.

On this particular Saturday he has set himself to try conclusions with "Kangaroo Jack" of the Midas Claim. It is a gorgeous struggle—even old "Wall-Eyed Bill," who is exacting in such matters, is compelled to admit that. They fight anyhow and everywhere, under tables and over chairs—while the lamps flare, and the dogs bark, and the crowd expresses its admiration in language full of picturesque detail.

"Kangaroo Jack" tires after the twenty-sixth round, and his friends carry him to his tent minus one eye and plus concussion of the brain.

Then when "Dog" Kellarey counts his broken fingers every one suddenly remembers the unguarded condition of his tent and vanishes in the darkness not to reappear until the sound of the coach-horn is heard on Portugee Hill.

The arrival of the weekly coach, bearing Her Majesty's mails, is an occasion of great importance, and ranks even before New Finds or Warden's decisions.

About eleven o'clock the coach creaks and groans up the street to pull up before the flaming lights of the "Jolly Diggers." It is a curious, lumbering old construction, riding on leather springs, and drawn by five strong horses—a sort of badly brought up cross between an antique mourning coach and a dilapidated Indian ghari.

The driver, to whom is intrusted the lives of the half-dozen passengers, travels the 240 miles between the gold fields and civilisation twice weekly, and is always preternaturally thirsty. Custom, however, forbids his leaving his box before he has seen his horses unharnessed and led away, and exchanged the usual pleasantries with his own particular admirers. When in due time he does descend, passengers, diggers, loafers, and dogs escort him into the hotel, and in half-an-hour the excitement is over.

On this occasion, however, it is destined to last longer; "Dog" Kellarey, advancing, invites the driver to take refreshment.

After complying with the request, that individual gets out to the vehicle, to return with a bundle. Then, unwrapping the shawls, he places on the table a baby girl. She cannot be more than two years old, and is fast asleep, her little head and its pretty curls pillowed on one of her tiny arms.

Every one presses round to look, with the exception of "Dog" Kellarey, who has no curiosity in the matter of babies. Then questions pour in thick and fast: "Whose is it?" "Where'd ye get the kiddy, matey?" "Whose youngster is it, Bill?" etc., etc.

Any other man would be bewildered—not so Bill Burns. He says slowly and solemnly, as if aware of his unique importance: "For 'Dog' Kellarey!"

"What!" shouts that gentleman, "that's a lie, you Bill! Who says the kid's for me?"

"I do," replies the driver. "Paul Waites of Wild Dog shoved it aboard, along with its duds, for yer. The little 'un's father pegged out on Saturday—'Flash Dick' of Wild Dog Creek. 'Is last word was: 'Sen' the kid to my old mate, "Dog" Kellarey,' an' so I fetched it along, and the passengers made up the fare among 'em, so there's nothin' to pay—there!"

"Old Dick pegged out!" the "Dog" mumbles slowly, "old Dick pegged out, an' sent 'is kid to me!"

The crowd is so tickled with the idea that it ventures upon a laugh.

The laugh decides him, and stepping up alongside the sleeping child, he sings out: "The kid's mine, an' the man as laughs agin 'er laughs agin me. Now let's see 'im as is game to grin!"

He has evidently gone home, for no one answers.

* * * * *

Sunday morning, and "Dog" Kellarey's claim is the centre of attraction. The little arrival of the previous night plays about the tent door. The "Dog," fearing harm to her from this crowd of visitors, carefully defines his boundary, and threatens dire penalties on the head of any man who crosses it.

* * * * *

News, news!—great and glorious news!

News which runs like wildfire through the field, which flies from tent to tent, from the police cells on the hill to Dutch Joe's across the flat, past the Eureka, down to the Day-dawn, never stopping until everyone has heard it.

"Dog" Kellarey's proverbial bad luck has turned at last—he had bottomed on the lead, the new claim has turned up trumps with a vengeance.

It is full of gold-specks, specimens, and nuggets. Not nuggets as small as peas, but large as walnuts. Not here and there, but in a big deep lead, a fortune at every drive of the pick.

The Luck-penny, who has been sleeping in the shadow of the tent, watches and chuckles at a piece of glittering mica. In his excitement the "Dog" sings out:

Digitized by Google

"Boys! 'tis 'er 'as done it; there's the lass that brought me luck!"

* * * * *

Three p.m. More excitement.

A nugget weighing five pounds! The monster of the field, a wonder of the country, and a fortune to its finder.

Picks and shovels are thrown down, the roar of cradles and sluice boxes stops as if by magic, and the excited crowd starts at a run for the claim.

On their arrival "Dog" Kellarey says nothing, but the second time he carefully points out the boundary. He places his revolver on the cradle ready to his hand, and, bless you, the crowd understands what he means by that.

The Luck-penny sucks her thumb and crows contentedly; womanlike, she knows she is the centre of attraction.

When the last visitor has departed the "Dog" picks her up, and says emphatically:

"Kinchin! It's you as brought the luck to the old man. Now, look here, three parts of that claim belongs to you, it does!"

And he meant it.

1892.

A bright, fresh morning, with a few white clouds scattered about the heavens, the better to enhance the blueness of the sky beyond. A happy spring breeze dashing round corners, and playing the very mischief with silk hats and dainty skirts, whistling through telegraph wires, and covering the harbour with a coating of continuous white foam. A morning on which to feel thankful for existence.

It is easily seen that something unusual is affecting the inhabitants of Potts Point, that fashionable suburb of luxurious Sydney.

At St. Mary's Church door I find a large crowd assembled, representing all ranks of society, and, for the first time, obtain some dim idea of the event I am about to witness. In order to make doubly sure I question an ancient lady, whose dress suggests connection with some charitable institution.

At first she seemed inclined to treat my thirst for information with contempt, but finally a desire for gossip overcomes her reticence, and she condescends to tell me, all in one breath, that "This 'ere is to be the weddin' o' Miss Athelwood; not but that 'er name ain't Athelwood, but Kellarey. 'Er as 'dow'd the alms'ouses down the street, which, times bein' bad, and a lone widder, as 'ad no 'usband an' whose son is doin' 'is last stretch, bein' as innocent as a babe unborn. An' rheumatiz' bein' that bad, she could cry, only she wouldn't. And Miss O'Sullivan, as lives in No. 9, said as 'ow Miss Athelwood was worth well nigh 'alf a million of money if she was worth a penny, not but what she shouldn't be, seein' as 'ow she was born on the gold diggings' and every one knowed them was good times. And a prettier and better lady never stepped, beggin' 'er pardon for sayin' so."

The old woman, once started, was hard to stop. But I was interested in Miss Athelwood, so ventured an inquiry as to her parentage.

"Ah, well may yer say that; not but what yer mightn't understand, seein' as 'ow ye're a stranger in these parts. The poor, young dear never 'ad no father to know but Mr. Athelwood, the lawyer. I 'eard tell she were just fetched up from them goldfields by a feller called Kellarey—a miner chap, who give 'er to Mr. Athelwood along of a fortune which 'e said was 'ers. That's twenty year or more now—the same year as my good man was took by the perlice fer the Orange bushrangin' case, an, 'im not never so much as 'avin' a 'alfpenny of the money, but——"

I stopped the dear old lady's family history by asking whom Miss Athelwood was about to marry. As I put the question, an old and villainously dirty swagman placed his roll of blankets down at the church door and pushed his way towards us.

"In beggin' yer pardon," my lady went on, "Miss Athelwood's a-goin' to marry, as it's not in my mind to remember—a dook, or a hearl, but I can't say which on 'em. Haide-de-camp to the Governor they do say 'e is. But look! look! 'ere they comes!"

Carriage after carriage rolled up to the church door, and set down its load of fashionables. Then, amidst continuous cheering, Mr. and Miss Athelwood arrived. She looked surpassingly beautiful, and I noticed that the old swagman was so overcome with astonishment that he kept his eyes staring at the door long after she had passed through it and we had rushed into the church to see the ceremony.

My whole attention was devoted to watching the bride. I could not drive her romance out of my head. She went up the aisle a homeless girl, the product of a goldfield, and returned, to the music of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," a Countess and a member of one of the oldest families in England.

After all the carriages had rolled away and I was turning to go, the old swagman touched my arm, saying:

"Mister! I'm goin' to get yer to do me a favour!"

Asking him what it was, he replied:

"Let's go somewhere out of this, where we're alone, an' I'll tell yer!"

When we had adjourned to a more fitting place my companion spoke:

"I fancy you'd call me a liar if I told you that I was the man who brought up that girl as we've just see married? But I am—I'm 'Dog' Kellarey, sure enough, 'im as give 'er into Lawyer Athelwood's 'ands twenty year ago, with 'er share of the mine that panned out so rich."

"Why don't you go to her, then? I hear she's been hunting high and low for you."

"That's just it; I know she has. But d'yer think I'm a-goin' into the company o' the likes o' 'er friends. Not me; I'd be making a fool o' the girl, and she'd be ashamed o' 'erself. No; I've tramped close on 400 miles to see 'er married, and now I'm a-goin' back into the Bush to-night for good, I want you to write this 'ere in a letter for me, it ain't much. Say, 'From "Dog" Kellarey to 'is Luck-penny on 'er weddin' day,' and put in the corner, 'I ain't forgot yer, mind!'"

I wrote as he directed, and inclosed—what do you think? A baby's little woollen shoe. The old man had kept this relic as his sacred treasure for twenty years.

ARNOLD REES.

In the issue of SHORT STORIES dated May 23rd will appear the opening chapters of a new serial story, entitled,

"THE WYTHECOMBE MYSTERY."

By Mr. JOHN K. LEYS, Author of "The Tenth of June," "The Lindsays," etc., etc.

Digitized by Google

The Brain Gymnasium

NEW SERIES.

TWO PRIZES OF A GUINEA EACH.

BELOW we publish ten problems, forming the first of a new series of The Brain Gymnasium. Two prizes of a Guinea each will be awarded every week to those competitors who answer correctly the greatest number of these problems.

Consolation Prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

Competitors, in sending in their attempts, must observe the following conditions:

1. All solutions to be written clearly on one sheet of paper.
2. Do not write the questions; simply put the numbers and the answer against each.
3. Each set of attempts to contain the £100 coupon (found on the second page of cover) for the current week.
4. All attempts to be in by Monday, May 11th. Those received after this date will not be dealt with.
5. Mark your envelope "Gymnasium."

☞ It is improbable that you will be able to solve all the problems set, but send in as many as you can do. Those who solve the greatest number receive the prizes.

(1.) The following disjointed words, when placed in correct order, form a sentence to be found in a recent number of Pearson's Weekly. The punctuation marks are placed in their correct relative positions:

It will be every rate of speed that require and at high travelling then the sixty four signals an express engine passed travels at an miles will rate often an attention. can be constant understood train readily and hour, minutes, that of (2.) By substituting a new letter for one already in the word, make a new word, and thus progress from word to word until the transformation is complete. The order of the letters may in no way be altered throughout. The number of moves in which the alteration is made should be placed against each, and those who succeed in transforming the following words in the fewest moves will be counted correct:

Example: Rash to calm. Rash—cash—cask—calk—calm. 4 moves.

Transform:

(a) Cap to low.
(b) Slow to fast.
(c) Sword to rifle.
(d) Pound to penny.
(e) Careful to tatters.

(3.) The initials of the words defined below—each of which consists of four letters—form the name of a place marked on every map of the globe.

(a) A number under 20.
(b) To yield.
(c) The cry of a lion.
(d) A river of England.
(e) Not soft.
(f) Taken for medicinal purposes.
(g) To unseal.
(h) A part of the body.
(i) To acquire by service.

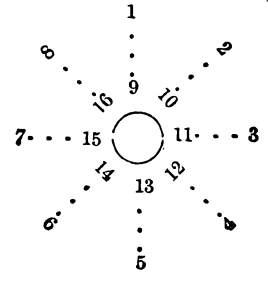
(4.) Each of the words defined below consists of five letters. Place them according to the instructions given:



From 1 to 9, gaiety.
,, 2 to 10, a country in Asia.
,, 3 to 11, a runner.
,, 4 to 12, to change.
,, 5 to 13, a Scriptural name, occurring in 1st Chron., Chap. V.
,, 6 to 14, water pitchers.
,, 7 to 15, a famous French astronomer.
,, 8 to 16, confederation.

The initial letters forming the perimeter of wheel (from 1 to 8 via 2) spell the name of a distinguished French statesman born March 9th, 1749.

The finals forming the hub of wheel (9 to 16 via 10) spell the name of a distinguished American statesman born in 1773.

Digitized by Google

(5.) Assuming that a=5, b=10, e=15, i=20, o=25, t=26, and u=30, what word on this page is of the greatest numerical value, and what is that value? Hyphenated words to count as two:

Example: Hyphenated =61., made up as follows:

(e) = 15
(a) = 5
(t) = 26
(e) = 15.

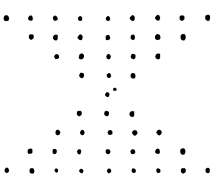
61

(6.) HOUR GLASS.



Each of the dots given above represents a letter. Place the words defined below in the order in which they are given, and when written one under the other they will form a shape similar to the example.

1. Parsons. 2. The human race. 3. On every dinner-table. 4. A poem. 5. In hour glass. 6. A feminine name. 7. A beverage. 8. A scamp. 9. Speaking indistinctly.

The central letters, when read downwards, spell a word which means "to run away precipitately."

(7.) What single word on this page has the greatest number of different meanings? And what are they?

Example: Page, a boy attendant, one side of a leaf of a book, to number pages, etc.

(8.) CHARADE.

My first is a complaint indigenous to our climate.
My second is a running body of water.
My whole is the name of a British regiment.

(9.) WORD SQUARES OF FOUR LETTERS.

(a) Smart; a flower; surrounded by water; to come in contact with.
(b) Sullen; doctrine; a constellation; to infer.

(10.) Commence at the word in capitals, and, moving across the squares in the same way as a knight moves on the chess-board, connect up the words given below so that they form a verse of rhyme.

Golden	not	As	my	Why	Oh!	shakes	folded chances	stay	Hair,	do	she	lady's	averted	stumbled,
keep	Lady	rose-bud's	that	as	her	lips.	her
tips	it	"DEAR	eyes:	am	mist	I	glances?
my	a	me	other	shrouds	Still	head	Tell how	from	face	humbled!	Golden	I	Why	where frowning	Tell	I	how	Tell	lady	me	there
fell	see	grace.	fair?	how	flies	me	disfavour

RESULT OF PICTURE PUZZLE COMPETITION.

BELOW will be found the names of the winners in the Picture Puzzle Competition announced in Short Stories, dated April 4th. In view of the small number of persons who have solved the problem under the conditions, it has been considered advisable to divide the prize amongst them, after adding 4s., with the result that each receives 17s.

Gold-plated pencil-cases have been sent to all those competitors who succeeded in putting the puzzle together within one square of being correct.

Mrs. G. Archer, 5, South Terrace, Bury Street, Lower Edmonton.

A. Hook, 9, Canterbury Place, Lambeth Road, S.E.

T. W. Garbutt, 35, Bright Street, Darlington.

H. Broadbent, 18, Finborough Road, South Kensington.

W. Simmonds, 16, Stockwell Street, Greenwich.

J. Cross, 34, Bentley Road, Kingsland Road, N.

C. Wilkins, 2, Claremont Villas, Tudor Road, Kingston Hill.

H. Cheeseright, 40, Granby Street, Liverpool.

T. S. Nunn, 10, Grecian Road, Tunbridge Wells.

C. G. Nancarrow, 267, Somers Road, North Fratton, Portsmouth.

H. Anderson, Naval Ordnance Office, Woolwich Arsenal.

G. T. Somerville, 17A, Great George Street, Westminster.

Here is the key:

23	11	86	16	84	22	10	88
17	74	64	12	43	24	49	53
27	37	58	35	87	81	66	1
69	39	57	78	12	36	29	76
41	63	55	14	3	47	62	82
85	8	6	9	15	4	83	34
42	28	79	44	13	56	59	2
72	75	51	30	61	7	59	32
88	20	48	45	65	71	50	60
26	25	5	90	18	31	54	40
70	73	77	19	33	68	49	80

Digitized by Google

DRAWN BY LOT.

THE thirty-eight of us were confined in a large room, and it was the fourteenth day after the Spanish gunboat captured our little steamer before we received a hint of what fate had in store for us. Then an officer entered, called on us to pay strict attention, and announced that we were to be taken out and shot on the morrow. An hour later he returned to explain that he was mistaken. The gracious and merciful Spanish Government would be satisfied with six lives instead of thirty-eight. We had killed six of the crew of the gunboat, and it was to be a life for a life.

"Gentlemen, it will be by lot, of course," he continued, as he bowed and smiled on every hand, "and I am here to oversee the drawing. See! I have here thirty-two white beans and six black ones. I will put them in a cap, and each gentleman will step up and draw as his name is called.

When he had announced that all were to be shot I heard no lamenting. On the contrary, men moved about saying that it was what we had been expecting, and that we would die like men. Lips were compressed, but I did not see one pale face. This new announcement created something like a panic. Only six were to die. Thirty-two would be sent to prison, but all of them would live to see home and friends again. In sixty seconds the face of every man was ghastly. In two minutes all were trembling. Mild-eyed men glared about them like wild beasts driven to bay, and there were lips which bled from the hard-set teeth.

"Gentlemen, my clerk will call the roll, and you will draw the beans," said the officer as he made ready. "Each man must show his bean as he draws, and those who draw black ones must stand over by the windows. Now then, are you ready?"

The clerk could speak and write English, and he had our names in alphabetical order. The first name called was that of Anson, and he hesitated a few seconds before advancing. Did anyone hope he would draw a black bean? I believe that every man of us hoped so. It would better our own chances. The man walked slowly forward, made a great effort to control himself, and made his draw. It was a white bean.

Anderson came next, and he drew his death-warrant as did also Bagley. Then twelve men drew white beans in succession. When it came to my turn, there were two blacks and thirteen whites still left in the cap. I drew a black. That fact did not shock me, as I had almost expected my ill luck from the start, but it hurt me when the men almost applauded. Only one to thirteen now!

It was a singular fate which left that last black bean in the hat Thirteen names were called off, and thirteen men stepped up and drew, and each and all drew white. It was the death warrant of the only man who did not put his hand in the cap. As soon as the drawing was over the thirty-two fortunates shook hands and congratulated each other, and smiled, and laughed. That was only natural. After the first ebullition of feeling, they turned to give us their heartfelt sympathies. We were not removed from the room. They would come for us soon after daylight.

What were our feelings? The first sensation was that of a man coming to after a fall which had deprived him of consciousness for a minute. The next was to doubt if we had not been asleep and dreamed it all. After that one man sat down in a corner and wept. A second lay at full length on the floor with his face to the wall. A third cursed and inveighed and hoped for vengeance. Within three or four hours there came a feeling of exultation. I believe that every man who goes to the gallows has that same feeling. I was still sleeping when the soldiers came to march the six of us out to the execution ground. We shook hands all round, but only here and there did one of the men trust his voice to speak to us. Those who were to live seemed most affected. Their faces were very pale, and their lips quivered.

Two by two, with soldiers on every side, we walked with heads up, but had no word for each other. There were scores of citizens out to see us, but we kept our eyes to the front. Halt! We have reached the grounds. I had thought of the six of us standing in front of six new-made graves, but there were neither graves nor coffins. They stood us with our backs towards a brick wall, and we knew it had been made for just such occasions as this.

"Gentlemen, your eyes—the blindfold!" said an officer as he came forward with several men behind him.

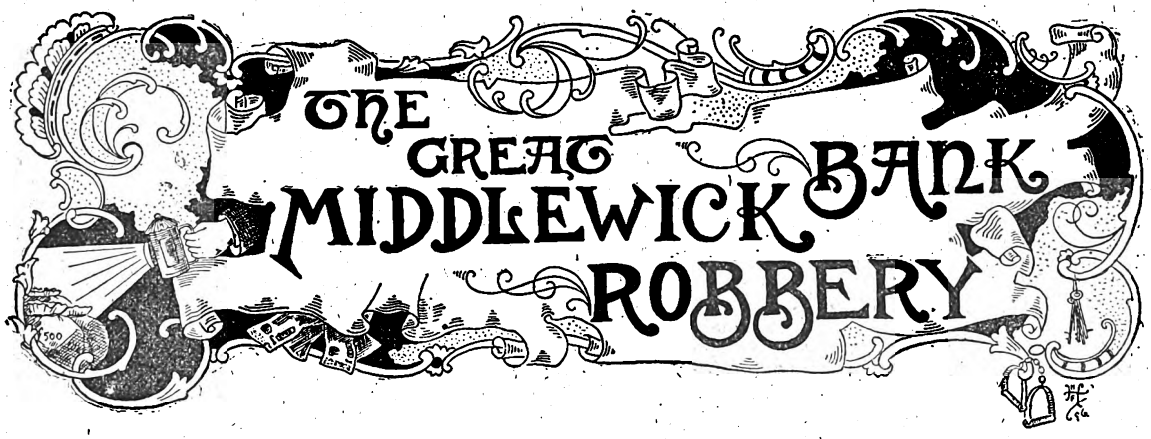
The last thing I saw was a platoon of twenty-four men forming up in front of us—four to a man. For perhaps ten seconds I shrank at the thought of the bullets striking me. For perhaps ten more I prayed that they would make sure work of it. My hands touched the hands of the men each side of me, for we were not bound. I said "good-bye" to each, and they returned it, and I heard the others speaking a last farewell word. I heard the last man walk away when the last victim had been blinded. I heard the platoon moving up nearer. I heard one street boy shouting to another that the soldiers were about to fire. There was deep silence for a few seconds, and then I heard advancing footsteps. Some one seized my arm, and I was led away to the right and the handkerchief removed. It was the officer again, and he turned me over to two soldiers with the remark:

"He is but a boy, and the Governor commutes. Take him back to prison."

I had not gone 200 feet when there was a crash of musketry, and my five comrades lay dead at the base of the wall. Was I rejoiced? Strangely enough, no—not for hours and hours. I had been so near death that I was dead to myself and all around me.

S. L.

Digitized by Google



CHAPTER XVII.

The Escape.

Meanwhile, how was the detective getting along?

It was useless for him to lament his foolhardiness or regret the step that had brought this peril upon him. He was caught in the worst predicament of his life, and the question that confronted him was what could he do to help himself?

He paused at the bottom of the stairs and stood motionless until he heard the bolt slid into place. Then he listened to the murmur of voices, but could not distinguish what was said. It mattered not, for he felt no further interest in the conversation.

Drawing a match from the little silver box he always carried in his pocket, he struck it and began an exploration of his prison.

Several matches sufficed to make him as thoroughly acquainted with its interior as if it had been brilliantly lighted. He was surrounded by four thick stone walls, so compactly cemented that the cellar was as if hewn out of the solid rock.

The floor was of earth, quite hard, but susceptible to his pocket-knife. To tunnel under the walls and to the surface outside, however, would require days, and possibly weeks of unremitting work. He would perish with thirst and starvation meanwhile, for it was not to be supposed that his captors meant to furnish him with water and food. So that idea had to be abandoned.

The smallness of the two windows rendered them equally unavailable. It struck him as strange that the cellar contained no other entrance than the one he had used. Everything that had ever entered or been carried out of it was by means of the door at the top of the stairs.

Wishing to economise his supply of matches, which numbered hardly a dozen, he devoted half-an-hour to fingering the walls in different places in the hope of finding some loose stones that might be further displaced. Nothing of the kind presented itself.

He half suspected that when Roberts was left alone upstairs he would carry out his threat against him. The detective, therefore, fought shy of the foot of the steps, and held himself in readiness to retreat if the man appeared. He meant to compel Roberts to enter the cellar to complete his work, and in that event there was no saying what might occur.

Taylor was too active both in mind and body to remain idle; all he was waiting for was to discover the best means of helping himself. The subterranean prison contained absolutely nothing at all, not so much even as a log on which he could rest. In places the ceiling was so low that he was compelled to stoop slightly to avoid hitting his head against the cross beams. By standing up straight he could easily press the palms of his hands against the heavy boards which formed the floor, supported on the beams.

This fact decided his course of procedure.

Several more of the precious matches were used to help him examine the roof of the cellar. It may be said of the men who put together this old structure that they builded better than they knew. Here were the floors, and many portions as strong as on the day the edifice was completed.

Taylor determined to cut his way through the floor overhead to one of the rooms above. If he could do that and climb out of the cellar, he was ready to take his chance of escaping.

It need not be said that he selected the corner furthest from where the men were holding their council. The cellar did not extend under the kitchen, but reached to the front of the house. It was there the prisoner decided to begin his work.

The task was a most formidable one, for the only instrument at his command was his pocket-knife, whose sharp blades were so delicate that the utmost care was necessary to prevent their breakage while working in the dark. If it should prove that the boards composing the floor were dovetailed into each other, the difficulty of his task would be increased almost immeasurably.

But minutes were valuable, and Taylor had none to throw away. He had fixed the point where he meant to begin operations so clearly in his mind that it was continually before him, though working in the dark.

Using his left hand as a help to guide him, he began cutting the wood at right angles to the grain. It was easy to decide how large a space was needed to permit the passage of his body, and he set to work to open such a passage. It was fearfully slow work. The wood was oak, and had been seasoned by a century of use. It would take hours to cut through any portion of it, but it was far better to keep busy than to sit down and fold his hands in despair.

Taylor knew he was progressing, though it was exasperatingly slow work. The unusual position of his arm, all the while extended above his head, and the continuous pressure and movement of the fingers, after a time brought so great a fatigue to arm and hand that he was obliged to rest. In a few minutes, however, he was at it again, and thus the work went on through the long lonely hours of the night.

No one, unless similarly placed, can understand the tediousness and trying nature of the task. After a time Taylor's right shoulder began aching, and caused such intense pain that he shifted the knife to his left hand, in the hope of obtaining relief without losing time. But the detective was not ambidextrous, and to his dismay the first effort snapped the blade in two.

"Heavens!" he muttered, "that ruins everything."

He stood for a minute bathed in perspiration, though the cellar was chilly at that hour. But the despair in his heart quickly vanished, when he recalled that the knife contained two other blades, though one of them was the small file meant for the finger-nails, but which is generally more ornamental than useful.

Digitized by Google

Besides, more than half of the broken blade remained. The abrupt angle made by the fracture caused this to be tenfold more effective. Forgetting his aching shoulder, he applied the piece of steel with such vigour that he accomplished more in the next half hour than he had in double that time before the accident.

"It would have paid me to have begun by breaking all the blades," was his thought, though he did not adopt the method with either of the remaining ones.

At last, however, the hour came when he had to stop operations for a longer time than usual. He sat down on the damp floor, with his back against the wall, so tired that, after the aching in his shoulder had passed off, he imitated the man overhead—and went to sleep.

He opened his eyes after Roberts had departed. The cellar was filled with a faint light, caused by the sun's rays entering the small windows. Taylor started up at the thought that if Roberts had known of his unconsciousness he could have descended the steps and carried out his purpose again. However, nothing of the sort had been done, and it was useless to think of it.

As the detective scrambled to his feet and stretched his limbs he became aware of two uncomfortable facts, he was exceedingly hungry and thirsty. Inasmuch as nothing in the way of food or drink had been offered him, it was evident he was to be left to perish by one of the most miserable and lingering of deaths.

But that release could not come for several days, no matter how intense the suffering. Meanwhile he must work, work, work. And work he did, plying the knife till he could no longer hold it.

When the growing dimness of the light in the cellar, and a glance at his watch, told him that the day was drawing to a close, and the second night was near him, the task was not finished, though much progress had been made.

The prisoner had cut a deep gutter on the four sides of a square about a foot and a half in diameter. Around this hollow the knife had travelled again and again, eating a little further on each circuit, until he began to hope he had nearly penetrated the thickness of the boards in several places. He ceased cutting at one end, giving all his efforts to the other three sides. When they gave way it would be easy to snap off the remaining portion.

But night descended, and he was still at it. Every possible incentive urged him on. He knew the crisis at the Bank had come and gone long before. Jack Burton must be puzzled and alarmed over his absence, but could never dream of its explanation, and so was powerless to help him.

He was almost faint for want of food, but the only means of obtaining relief was by cutting his way out of his prison. He must keep at it, or die a lingering death.

More than once he thought of attacking the door, but that was considerably thicker than the floor before he began cutting it. Besides, he suspected that Roberts was waiting for such a pretext for firing upon him. No, he had hit upon the one and only course.

Finally, the wearied officer closed his knife and replaced it in his pocket. Then he put both hands against the square space inclosed by the deep furrow made by his knife, steadied himself and pushed upwards with all his might. The whole piece yielded as though it were an egg shell. A similar effort two hours before would have accomplished the same result.

With a thrill of hope the detective grasped the edges of the opening with both hands and drew himself through. Had he been sure of landing right among the four burglars he would hardly have hesitated. His prison had become so hateful that he felt he would have gone mad had he stayed longer in it.

The occasion warranted the use of one of the two remaining matches. His listening ear caught no evidence that his gaoler had heard or suspected what was done, so he did not fear to draw the match along the hard floor and look round him.

He had entered the large room which years before served as the parlour of the old stone house. Neither on the mildewed walls nor anywhere about the rooms was there any sign of pictures or furniture. For generations it had been deserted and bereft of everything except the wide, gaping fireplace, and the traces of what once had been.

Taylor moved quickly and softly across the floor to the door that led into the hall where he was playing the eavesdropper at the time of his capture. It opened readily, as did the outer door.

Within three minutes after he climbed through the opening in the roof of the cellar, he was in the fresh, glorious air outside. Happy, thankful, hopeful; but half mad with thirst and starvation.

Quickly he hastened down the road, and then, when satisfied that no one was observing him, he hurried to the clear little stream winding through the hollow, knelt down, and there quenched his thirst.

"I wonder whether there are enough provisions in Middlewick to give me the supper I want?" was his next thought, as he strode rapidly towards the town.

He was confident that disaster had overtaken the criminals, since, from what he knew of the preparations made, he could not well see how it could result otherwise. Besides, the profound stillness within the stone house he had just left was proof that the party had not carried out their scheme of hiding there. There could be but one explanation of this failure.

Like Roberts, who had preceded him, Taylor had not far to go before learning the truth. The attempt against the bank had not only failed, but three of the burglars were securely lodged in the county gaol.

That much learned, a great load was lifted from the detective's mind. He therefore went straight to the hotel, and, though the hour was late, ordered a meal befitting the physical condition of a man who had not tasted food for more than twenty-four hours.

While Jack Burton and Roberts were holding their interesting conversation upstairs, the gentleman into whose apartment they had intruded was coming up the stairs in a very comfortable frame of mind.

"Hulloa!" he said to himself, when he caught the glimmer of light beneath the door, "someone has made a mistake."

In accordance with his habits of caution he stepped softly, pausing in the corridor and listening.

"Hulloa! that's Burton's voice, I'm sure. Who is he talking to?"

A moment's patience and the question was answered.

"Bobby Roberts, as sure as I live. He's deserted his post and come down to my room. What on earth is he talking to Burton about?"

Taylor's position enabled him to catch every word, even though the speakers were talking in unusually low tones. At the crisis of the conversation, he pushed open the door, with the exclamation:

"There is no need of that; here he is."

Nothing could have shown the training of the two friends more strikingly than their course at this crisis.

Burton did not look round at the man whose voice he recognised. He did not forget that the ruffian in front of him was on the alert to seize any advantage the instant it presented itself. In the most matter-of-fact manner, Burton said:

"Alf, take his revolver out of his pocket."

"It will afford me great pleasure to do so. Hulloa! by Jingo! it's my own little beauty," he exclaimed, deftly removing and holding aloft the pistol before Roberts could have prevented, had he dared to do so.

"So you are here?" remarked the scamp, with a smile,

Digitized by Google

looking in the face of his former prisoner; "we were just going after you."

"That doesn't seem necessary now," observed Burton, "but I gathered from what you said, Mr. Roberts, that my friend Alf had been wounded. I do not observe anything amiss with him."

"That was only a little joke of mine. I wouldn't have hurt such a courageous man for the world. I meant to excite your fears and then make you happy by showing how well we had treated your friend."

"If he had had his way," said Taylor, "he would have used his pistol on me long ago. But, Phil, what are you going to do with this gentleman? I don't want him in my room all night."

"We'll deliver him to the authorities, and let him join his friends in gaol."

Under the guard and custody of Burton and Taylor, Roberts was speedily lodged in as secure confinement as were those of his confederates who had preceded him to imprisonment.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Miss Denton Asks a Few Questions.

Jack Burton and Alfred Taylor had too much to discuss after delivering their prisoner to the authorities to think of retiring for a long time. In the first place Taylor gave a minute account of all that had befallen him after his disappearance on the preceding evening. Burton listened without a question, but indulged in a smile at some of the grotesque features of his friend's experience. He uttered no word of reproach. It was not his habit to do that, for everyone is liable to make a mistake.

It took Burton a shorter time to relate all that could interest his friend respecting the four men who had been secured.

"Now, as the case stands," he added, "we are back again precisely at the point where we started several days ago."

"In what respect?"

"Think. The episode of the burglars—that is, Nash, King, and Co.—is only a parenthesis in the flow of incidents; it is a side issue—nothing to do with the main question."

Taylor nodded his head.

"You were sent for a few days ago by Mr. Bryant to try to clear up the mystery of the missing thousands. You and I both came. Just as matters were assuming shape, four of our old acquaintances took it into their heads to rob the bank that had just suffered a big loss. 'Twas the oddest coincidence I ever knew, and but for the preceding burglary the quartette would have made a nice haul."

"And not one of the four yet understands how we happened to be in Middlewick at the time of their visit."

"And probably never will; they will all be somewhat older, if not wiser, men than they are to-night when they get out again. But business is business——"

"Which reminds me," interrupted Taylor. "I wonder whether that fellow took away any of my documents."

He made a hasty examination of his portmanteau, but so far as he could ascertain nothing was missing.

"He didn't find what he was looking for," suggested Burton.

"It doesn't look as if he did, though I don't see how anything of mine in the way of papers can help him. But I interrupted you."

"You remember the papers which you brought from Mr. Bryant's house, Alf?"

"Yes; I left them with you."

"I have them," said Burton, drawing the package from an inner pocket, and spreading its contents out on the table.

"They contain a good specimen of the handwriting of Rutherford, the Middlewick Bank book-keeper."

"And also a letter of Mr. Bryant, and the missive that was pushed under the door of the Bank when you and I were sitting in the building. We will make another comparison of them."

"Shall I try it first?"

"If you please. Let me know your conclusion."

"That has already been reached."

"Possibly you may revise it," was Burton's quiet remark, as he leaned back in his chair.

Taylor spent several minutes in carefully studying the several papers, but he did it only to oblige his friend.

"What is your second decision?" asked Burton.

"The same as the first."

"And that is——?"

"I pride myself upon being somewhat of an expert in reading chirography."

"Did you ever know of three experts reaching the same conclusion?"

"I don't understand what you are hinting at," remarked Taylor, taking up the papers again and glancing at them.

"You have not yet fully answered my question as to what your conclusion is."

"I never knew a person who could successfully disguise his handwriting for any length of time. He may work out a few words or sentences that will mislead you, but when it comes to a page of note or foolscap he is sure to betray himself. The person who pushed that letter under the door took every pains to conceal his handiwork, but half way down the page he drops into some mannerisms that betray him. My conclusion is that the same hand that wrote that purposely mis-spelled letter is the same that wrote this."

"You feel no doubt on that point?"

"Not the slightest."

"All the same, Alf, you are wrong."

"Impossible! You can never make me believe that."

"Oh yes, I shall, and in a few minutes, too. Study that paper in your hand more closely, and you will find that the writer not only attempted to disguise his handwriting, but strove still harder to make it resemble the writing of someone else."

"What in the name of goodness would he do that for?"

"He knew the note would pass under the critical eye of such experts as ourselves, and he meant to divert suspicion to an innocent party."

"You must be mistaken, Cairns," exclaimed Taylor, who, without noticing it, dropped into the habit of addressing his friend by the name to which he was more accustomed than that of Jack Burton.

"Let us see," said the latter, drawing his chair closer to the table.

He then proceeded to point out what might with truth be called microscopic evidences of his remarkable declaration. There were plenty of them, and few indeed would have detected what, to Burton, was as plain as day. But if ever there was a marvellous expert at that sort of business, Cairns was the man. Taylor's skill was that of a child compared with it.

He was still engaged at his task when Taylor interrupted.

"Enough! You're right. But heavens, what is the conclusion?"

"I need not name it. If I am right, and you know that I am, only one conclusion is possible."

For a few seconds both were silent; but they understood each other.

"Cairns," said the other, almost in a whisper. "There's another party whom we ought to see."

"Who's that?"

"Old Warren, the watchman, who was discharged and then taken back again. He must have an interesting story to tell if he can only be got to tell it."

"You're right, for he's told it."

"To whom?"

"To me."

"And what is it?"

"That on the night the twenty thousand pounds were taken from the vault of the Middlewick Bank, and previous to the visit of the thief, Warren was drugged, though he never suspected it."

Digitized by Google

"How could that be?"

Burton then told his friend of his visit to the old watchman and what he revealed of the medicine given to him for his rheumatism.

"When I held the empty phial to my nose I detected the odour of laudanum. Perhaps he caught a glimmer of the truth from my manner, but he is too slow of intellect to comprehend the shameful trick that was played on him."

"And he gave you the name of the party."

"He had been cautioned not to do so, and had pledged himself he would not. No bribe or threat could induce him to break his word, but, Alf, it wasn't necessary; I'm glad he didn't tell me his name."

"So am I," was Taylor's reply. "What's the next thing to be done?"

"Go to bed. It's past two o'clock; no need to hurry up in the morning. Good-night."

Back in his own room once more, Jack Burton was soon in bed and fast asleep. Taylor, on the contrary, lay awake a long time, disturbed by torturing meditations over what had taken place within the preceding two or three days, supplemented by the astounding knowledge that had come to him that evening through his friend in the adjoining room. But at last he, too, became unconscious, and he did not wake until the morning was well advanced.

"Alf," said Burton, in his sharp, business-like way when they met again after breakfast in Taylor's room. "Mr. Bryant must have wondered where you were on the night of the burglary. I haven't had time to explain matters to him, and had I had the time I shouldn't have known how to have done so. Hadn't you better call in and see him?"

"What shall I say?"

"I see no objection to your telling the truth. You may not feel very proud while doing so, but you needn't say much about how neatly the tables were turned upon you. Make it appear that you overcame your four enemies single-handed."

"I don't suppose he'd believe me, but still I'll do as you suggest."

"I'm afraid I shan't be here when you come back. It all depends. Before I decide upon what is to be done to-day I must consider matters."

Upon reaching Mr. Bryant's house the detective was told he was out, but expected back every moment. It was his niece, Miss Denton, who made this explanation, and invited the caller inside so cordially that Taylor accepted, and found himself alone with her. With some hesitation she said:

"You will pardon me, Mr. Taylor, but my uncle, who has few secrets from me, has told me your errand in Middlewick. That being the case, and feeling as deeply interested as he in your success, may I ask how you are progressing with your search for the parties who stole the large amount of money some nights ago?"

The visitor was somewhat surprised at this direct question, but he noted the distressed expression of her countenance, and answered:

"Such work, you know, Miss Denton, is very difficult and fails more often than it succeeds."

"I suppose," she remarked, "that it is wrong to feel pity for those who commit such crimes, but it always saddens me to hear of them. There may be so many palliative circumstances of which we can know nothing: a starving family, misfortune, or some sudden overwhelming temptation repented of as soon as yielded to, but not soon enough to save the erring one."

"True, and human judgment being fallible must not be condemned too harshly. It is more often right than wrong, and such as it is, it is the only thing that can make property and life safe."

"Do you think it right," asked the young lady, the flush on her face deepening, "to allow the guilty parties in a case of this kind to escape prosecution?"

"I am not sure I understand you?"

"I am not sure that I understand myself, but what I wish to ask is whether you can conceive of a set of circumstances in which you, as an officer of the law, would recommend that a wrong-doer should not be punished for what he has done?"

"Yes, I can imagine such. Suppose, for instance, the men who took the £20,000 from the Middlewick Bank should voluntarily give it up—why, having made all the restitution in their power, there is morally no crime, though technically they have violated the law."

The detective shook his head.

"Suppose they should offer to surrender a portion?"

"You must see, Miss Denton, that in such a case there is a double crime, and the demoralising sin of compounding a felony, as it is called, is committed."

"Is such a course never justifiable?"

"It is hard to conceive such an instance."

"But cannot some good be accomplished?"

"Possibly it might, so far as a single individual is concerned; but evil is encouraged. Those who consent thus to compromise with wickedness are incited by the basest motives, for they not only profit themselves, but help to protect the wrong-doers. No; the most severe punishment should be visited upon those who trifle with right."

The detective's heart ached while uttering these sentiments, for he saw how they agitated the girl to whom he was repeating them. She was a high-spirited, conscientious young lady, but, in common with her sex, her judgment had become warped by her devotion. There was something in the situation which touched her feelings more than anything that she had yet experienced. She looked up abruptly with the question:

"Do you think you will succeed in discovering the persons guilty of this wrong?"

"You must understand that it is impossible to answer that question, except by saying that I hope to do so. Your uncle has instructed me to spare neither effort nor expense in the undertaking."

She made no comment on this, and he rose to his feet. His wishes had undergone a change during the brief interview. He no longer desired to meet Mr. Bryant, and fearful that if he remained longer he would do so, he bade the young lady "Good-day" and withdrew.

(To be continued.)

NOW READY.
No. 3 of MELODY.

SONG ... ..."Pray for Me"... ... ... Ch. Gounod.
Posthumous Work. Written by F. E. Weatherly.
IRISH SONG ... ... "Rose of Killarney" ... Villiers Stanford.
Expressly composed for Melody. Written by A. P. Graves.
SONG ... ..."The Shades of Evening" ...Frederic Clay.
VIOLIN SOLO ... ... "Yellow Jasmine"
Arranged by Berthold Tours.
Language of Flowers. Composed by F. H. Cowen.
VOCAL DUET ... ... "Lullaby" ... ...Tito Mattei.
Expressly composed for Melody. Written by Clifton Bingham.
SWING SONG FOR PIANO ... ... Ch. Fontaine.
SONG ... ... "Ay de mi, My Bird" Sir Arthur Sullivan.
SONG ... ... "Ask Me Once More" ... Milton Wellings.
Expressly composed for Melody. Written by J. A. McDonald.
POLKA ... ..."A Cœur Joie ... ... E. Fischer.
The Great Parisian success.
WALTZ ... ... "Spring Flowers" ... Espir Dumaine.
Published for the first time.
"MARCHE DES MARIONETTES" ... ... Violet Nicholson.
For Mandolines and Guitar. Published for the first time.
POLISH DANCE FOR THE PIANO ... ... Cyril Dare.
Expressly composed for Melody.
LITERARY NOTES { A NEW REQUIEM (continued), by Joseph Bennett.
{ MUSIC OF THE MONTH, by R. S. Hichens.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

CORPULENCY

THE THIEF OF TIME.

"That procrastination is the Thief of Time is a truism so obvious that it has no claim to be regarded as an epigram. To more practical purpose it may be urged that Corpulency is, in very many cases, the parent of procrastination. The putting off till to-morrow what can be done to day certainly becomes a mental habit, but it is, unquestionably, very frequently begotton by physical conditions which render exertion irksome. That in the majority of cases procrastination is easily curable is one of the considerations suggested by a perusal of Mr. F. Cecil Russell's 'Corpulency, and the Cure,' whose remarkable popularity is evidenced by the recent issue of the 18th edition. The enormous mass of correspondence which this expert has accumulated, and many extracts from which are included in the 256 pages of his little book, forms the most valuable addition which has yet been made to the literature of obesity. It is specially notable that a very large propotion of Mr. Russell's correspondents who have undergone his course of treatment for the reduction of obesity, emphasise the renewed vigour which they have experienced after passing through the process—a wonderfully rapid one, according to this method—of banishing their superabundant fat. The universal adoption of Mr. Russell's system by corpulent persons of both sexes would increase, by a stupendous percentage, the working capacity of mankind. The rapidly growing popularity of the treatment is due, doubtless, to the author having discarded all the absolute notions about semi-starvation being requisite to ensure comely and comfortable slimness. It is certain that, the more the marvellous possibilities of Mr. Russell's system become known, the less will be the tolerance for the laziness of people who decline to reduce their overweight by the pleasant and facile means which are described in this little book, which can be had, post free, by forwarding six penny stamps to Woburn House, 27, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C."—Extract from Liverpool Daily Mercury, March 24th, 1896.

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS

IN THE

TREATMENT OF OBESITY.

"Our corpulent readers will be glad to learn how to positively lose two stone in about a month with the greatest possible benefit in health, strength and muscle by a comparatively new system. It is a singular paradox that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto, yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight 1lb. or 2lb. daily, as the weighing-machine will prove. Thus there is no suggestion of starvation. It is an absolute success, and the author, who has devoted years of study to the subject, guarantees a noticeable reduction within twenty-four hours of commencing the treatment. This is different with other diseases, for the patient in some cases may go for weeks without being able to test whether the Physician has rightly treated him, and may have derived no real or apparent improvement in health. Here, we repeat, the author guarantees it in twenty-four hours, the scale to be the unerring recorder. The treatment aims at the actual root of obesity, so that the superfluous fat does not return when discontinuing the treatment. It is perfectly harmless. We advise our readers to call the attention of stout friends to this, because, sincerely, we think they ought to know. For their information, we may say that on sending sixpence in stamps a book entitled 'Corpulency, and the Cure' (256 pages), containing a reprint of press notices from some hundreds of Medical and other journals (British and Foreign), and other interesting particulars, including the 'recipe,' can be had from a Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C."—Belfast News Letter.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lb. 30/-

No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 54lb. 37/6

No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6f.. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 54lb. 41/3

No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lb. 48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

Every Young Man can positively and speedily cultivate a HEAVY, HANDSOME MOUSTACHE,

By a few applications of Knowles' "Esauline," the newly-discovered Hair-Forcing Specific. Success guaranteed. "ESAULINE" thickens the growth of the Moustache, is an infallible cure for falling off of the Hair, weak or thin Eyebrows, Premature Baldness, etc., and as a general Hair Producer and Restorer is absolutely unrivalled. Will not stain or injure the most delicate Skin. Highly recommended for Children's Hair. From all Chemists and Hair Dressers.

"I USED IT."

Post Free, Prices, 1s. 6d., 3s., or 5s.

T. KNOWLES & CO.,
330, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION. Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (39 pages), 2d. "How to Open a Cigar Store," from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 183, Euston Road London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87 Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

ARMSTRONG'S

Lady's & Gentleman's, from £5 10s., carriage paid. Prompt delivery, lists free. SPORTING GUN DEPT., Collingwood Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2 ... £6 per cent. | Feb. 1 ... £7 per cent.
Mar. 2... £6 per cent. | April 1 ... £6 per cent.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

ORGAN 4s. Monthly.

WALNUT CASE.
KNEE SWELL.
SPLENDID TONE.

10 Years' Warranty. 72 Page List Post Free.

ALPHONSE CARY, NEWBURY, BERKS.

FREEHOLD LAND.

PLOTS or ACRES. Sales Every Week.

LEIGH SOUTHEND, RAYLEIGH, ROCHFORD, HERNE BAY, and MIDSTEAD. Shoebury & Goring Land Co., 67 & 68, Cheapside, are always selling good cheap land. Easy terms. Deeds free. Plans post free.

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full natural perfect Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment, approved and recommended by the medical profession. Success guaranteed. For particulars free, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J." Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE

DEAFNESS

And Head Noises Relieved by Using Wilson's Common-Sense Ear Drums. A new scientific invention, entirely different in construction from all other devices. Assists the deaf when all other devices fail, and where medical skill has given no relief. They are safe, comfortable, and invisible; have no wire or string attachment. Write for Pamphlet. Mention this Paper.

Wilson Ear Drum Co. Agent: D. H. WILSON,
Drum in position, 7, Newington Road, Edinburgh.

AJAX CYCLES FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN

ARE RICH VALUE. 25 to 30 per cent. saved and carriage paid.

IMMENSE STOCK, NEW AND SECOND HAND.

Easy Terms from 10s. per Month. Lists free.

Now Open.—LARGE CYCLING SCHOOLS at LONDON and LIVERPOOL. Address—

BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W., and 46, Everton Road, Liverpool.

HAVE YOU A BRAIN? IF SO, LOOK

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 385. FOR WEEK ENDING MAY 16TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

RISING SUN STOVE POLISH
EASIEST, QUICKEST, CHEAPEST, & BEST BLACKLEAD IN THE WORLD

1 BOONS

Risin' Sun METAL POLISH
Gives a beautiful soft brilliant polish to all kinds of Metal.

GREAT

A sample of any one post free 2 stamps.
Name this publication
C. CHANCELLOR & CO.
London, E.C.

THREE

MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH
CONTAINS IN PROPER PROPORTIONS
GLOSS, BORAX, GUM, WAX, & &c.

3

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS
For the Immediate Production of
BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's
EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE
IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:
Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

KIRBY BEARD & Co LIMITED

KIRBY BEARD & Co TRADE MARK

SPECIALITIES
PINS. NEEDLES
Hair Pins.

WORKS: BRADFORD ST BIRMINGHAM AND IPSLEY ST REDDITCH ENGLAND

BIRMINGHAM WORKS

REDDITCH WORKS

WAREHOUSES:
7 WATLING ST LONDON (E.C.) ENGLAND.
75, RUE DE SEBASTOPOL PARIS, FRANCE.
364 & 366 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & Co's
CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

Digitized by Google

MBLE 9D."

9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

Y GOOD AS EVER.

100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

EWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE

FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lb. 30/-

No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 50lb. 37/6

No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6f . 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 50lb. 41/3

No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lb. 48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

THE

REV. C. HAVERGAL

(Nephew of the late Miss Frances Ridley Havergal)

Writes from 14, Alroy Road, Ansfield, Liverpool: "I can thoroughly endorse the statement of 'A CLERGYMAN,' whose testimony to the efficacy of your WIND PILLS for affections of the STOMACH, BOWELS, and LIVER, appears in The News. I shall be happy to recommend your Pills as I have opportunity. By all means publish my communication."

All sufferers from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND ON THE STOMACH, COSTIVENESS, SICK HEADACHE, NERVOUS DEBILITY, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, BILIOUSNESS, etc., should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

☞ The WIND PILLS being Purely Vegetable, Tasteless and Mild, and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

Of all Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for price, from PAGE WOODCOCK, Lincoln.

Every Young Man can positively and speedily cultivate a HEAVY, HANDSOME MOUSTACHE, By a few applications of Knowles' "Esauline," the newly-discovered Hair-Forcing Specific. Success guaranteed. "ESAULINE" thickens the growth of the Moustache, is an infallible cure for falling off of the Hair, weak or thin Eyebrows, Premature Baldness, etc., and as a general Hair Producer and Restorer is absolutely unrivalled. Will not stain or injure the most delicate Skin. Highly recommended for Children's Hair. From all Chemists and Hair Dressers.

"I USED IT."

Post Free, Prices, 1s. 6d., 3s., or 5s.

T. KNOWLES & CO.,
330, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 20

May 16, 1896.

S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. E. I. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

ARMSTRONG'S

Lady's & Gentleman's, from £5 10s., carriage paid. Prompt delivery. List free. SPORTING GUN DEPT., Collingwood Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

ORGAN 4s. Monthly.

WALNUT CASE. KNEE SWELL. SPLENDID TONE.

10 Years' Warranty. 72 Page List Post Free.

ALPHONSE CARY, NEWBURY, BERKS.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

CAN YOU WRITE?

Of course you can! Why not then emboss your Notepaper, etc., with a pretty Monogram? using the

Patent Pocket Monopresse

Every Initial and Monogram of two letters kept in stock. Monogram of two letters, 1/1; Initials, 10d. each, post free. Apply—

CHAS. ROMPLER, 7, New Basinghall St., London, E.C. Agents wanted.

"KEEPUMDRIE"

WATERPROOF GARMENTS.

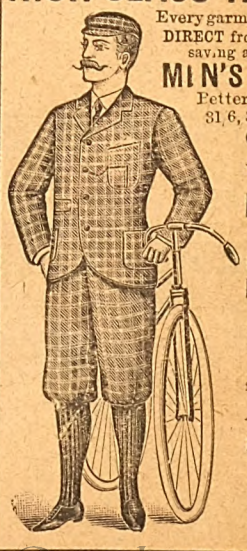
Marvels of Cheapness and Durability.

		FROM
CHESTERFIELD	Men's	7/6
SCARBORO'
INVERNESS	Boys'	5/-

Illustrated list and patterns post free.

ANDREW POTTER, LONDON WORKS, READING.

HIGH-CLASS TAILORING



Every garment cut to measure. DIRECT from the Manufacturer, saving all Middle Profits.

MEN'S SUITS, 18/6

Better Qualities, 22/6, 25/6, 31/6, 37/6, 45/-, 52/6, 63/-.

CYCLING SUITS

From 15/-. Value Unequalled. Fit Guaranteed.

BOYS' SUITS

Pieces for Mending sent with all Suits.

LADIES' TAILOR-MADE COSTUMES

From 10/6 to 70/-. See our New Patterns before ordering. It will pay you to do so. Hundreds to choose from. Post Free on Application. All Goods Carriage Paid.

Factory Clothing Company,

Manufacturing and Ladies' Tailors,

117K, ALBION ST., LEEDS.

Short Stories
EDITED BY ARTHUR PEARSON.
No. 385.] For the Week ending May 16th, 1896. [One Penny.

THE LITTLE WHITE MONKEY.

"BUT, Colonel——"

"No, I tell you! I am sorry to refuse you, but your continual absences have been noticed in the regiment. Hereafter you must remain here."

"But, Colonel——"

"No, I say; you cannot go!"

"But, Colonel, I want only twenty-four hours——"

"Ah! I see, to pass the day at Paris. What do you do in Paris? Women, women, of course, always women! Bah! it's sickening how the young men of to-day plunge into such stupidities! Woman is an inferior, mischievous being who should be stricken absolutely from the life of every man—particularly an officer's. Read, work, do what you please here, but as for going elsewhere, give up all thought of it. Do you understand?" And Colonel Belpoygne put his horse to the trot.

Crushed and disconsolate, Marcel returned to his company. Never before had the Colonel shown himself so stubborn, so whimsical. Worse than all, never had he been known to reverse a decision. No more leaves of absence It was settled; Marcel knew it, and also that Zoe would be waiting for him. For he had already written her that he would be at the circus that evening. She would look for him in his usual place—one of those stools with which the habitués of the place loved to encumber the passage—the third to the left, near the entrance to the boxes.

Since the opening of the circus he had never missed a Saturday, and he had always witnessed Zoe's arrival, breathless and smiling, finishing dressing as she ran, in order to have time to give him a greeting before her number. This evening she would not find him.

The devil fly away with the Colonel! And Marcel, scowling and fuming, gazed with an irritated eye at his chief spiritedly caracoling before him, content with the small lecture delivered and wholly indifferent to the pain he had given. Kind and considerate when what he called his "dignity" was not in question, he was wholly intractable when it was, or he fancied that it might be. Nevertheless, his regiment loved him, in spite of the occasional tempests of anger that swept impartially the entire quarter, and he loved his men and permitted many a small lapse and peccadillo to pass unnoticed upon the score of human weakness, so long as it did not reflect upon the regiment. But women—ah! you have heard his lecture to Marcel; it only remains to add that so far—and they had watched him ceaselessly—not a single weak spot of this kind had the regiment been able to discover in the armour of their gallant but irascible Colonel. None knew that better than Marcel himself; but to-day—to-day of all days—the Colonel had been so hard, so fierce, so utterly, unreasonably cranky—truly it smacked of a hidden motive. A hidden motive? Exactly; but what?

Marcel was still revolving this conundrum, when re-entering the court of the quarter to view his company going past, he chanced to stop near his chief, at the moment talking to the sergeant-major.

"Then," said the latter, listening respectfully, "you go to-night, Colonel?"

"Yes, to Mans, to shoot partridges. I shall not be back before Monday morning."

Marcel smothered a cry of joy; a ray of light had pierced the darkness.

Could he get himself excused from the weekly "call" and fly to Paris by the seven p.m. express, he would still be in time for Zoe's entrance; next morning he could return before the mess hour and no one would ever suspect his little trip.

Drill hour over, Marcel wasted no time in getting to his room; he lathered himself with rice-powder, sketched with burnt cork and a wad of cotton a consumptive circle under each eye, and then, with a last satisfied glance at the mirror, betook himself to the yard where they were grooming the horses.

The officer of the day, a good soul risen from the ranks, was there inspecting the process.

"Heavens, lieutenant," he cried, as he caught sight of Marcel, "but you have a face on you!"

Marcel groaned dismally, responding feebly: "Headache, captain, and a regular corker——"

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"The sun this morning, doubtless. Better go in again, utenant, and lie down a while——"

"Lie down! To get up again immediately?"

"For the 'call,' you mean? Oh, I'll excuse you. Go , go in, I say, man; I order you. A good night's sleep ill cure that head of yours."

And Marcel, inwardly delighted, obeyed, explained to his orderly that if they came to ask news of him, he would be "sleeping" profoundly till eleven the next morning, then dressed himself leisurely and arrived at the station just in time to leap into the train. He had encountered no one; seven o'clock was the dinner hour, and besides, it was already quite dark.

At the first stop they made he got out, lighted a cigar, and began to pace the platform, glancing carelessly as he passed at the interior of the coaches. Suddenly he stopped, stared, and sprang back as if confronted by a ghost. There, by the open door of the coach at his elbow he had seen the face of Colonel Belpoygne, who was sleeping peacefully.

By what strange hocus-pocus did Colonel Belpoygne, who had gone to shoot partridges at Mans, lie sleeping in the express for Paris? Had he found out his —Marcel's—absence and taken the train to catch him? Was he really asleep now, or only feigning? But why, if chasing Marcel, should he be in a dress-suit? And in a dress-suit the Colonel certainly was, as anyone could see through the open buttons of his pearl-grey top-coat —a top-coat that he wore only on state occasions.

Marcel, deeply curious, returned to his own compartment, not to leave it again till Paris was reached and he had seen the Colonel pass before him at a smart walk, valise in hand.

More and more curious and puzzled, Marcel, in his turn, started off at a run, dined at a noted café, and at half-past nine sharp entered the circus building. The scene, in spite of the season, was a brilliant one. A tour of the stable assured him that Zoe had just arrived and had gone to her room to dress. So he strolled out into the corridor to glance over the hall.

A painful surprise awaited him. There, facing him in the front row, the "bald-heads' row" the world over, Colonel Belpoygne and his pearl-grey top-coat were majestically established. This second appearance of the Colonel dumfounded Marcel; decidedly the old gentleman was tracking him. And yet, how came he possessed of a stall—a stall on a Saturday evening, at that? Evidently he had engaged the stall, and having engaged the stall, as evidently he had premeditated the trip. Something was behind all this. Meanwhile it was prudent to make his escape and to warn Zoe, just then coming from her boc to answer her "call."

"I'll be caught, you know, dearest, if I stay," said he, explaining breathlessly; "my Colonel's here; meet me after the performance at the waffle-man's stand." And he hurried away with a heavy heart.

Not that she was so very beautiful, this little Zoe, whose hair was neither brown nor blonde, neither curly to the eye nor soft to the touch; whose mouth was wide and filled with teeth of a dazzling brilliancy; whose limbs—rare things in circus women—were marvels of symmetry as well as suppleness; and whose skin, of a clear milky whiteness, had given her the name, "the little white monkey," by which she was "billed" throughout the city. Droll, frolicsome, irritating, charming, Venus herself would gladly have exchanged her straightest lines for Zoe's captivating angles.

Prompt to the minute at the appointed place, Marcel saw a coupé draw up to the kerb and a little hand emerge from it, apparently beckoning him. He hesitated a second; this carriage, so different from the modest fiacre that habitually carried Zoe, confused him slightly.

"You did not wish to come with me, then?" Zoe cried reproachfully. "Am I late, and are you vexed? But truly, truly, Marcel dearest, it was not my fault—I could not get away from him."

"Him?"

"An old stupid who worries me half to death—but wait, not now, I'll tell you all later."

"No, no, now, Zoe; tell me now. I cannot wait. How does he worry you so?"

"The same old story—love, riches, money, this coupé, everything I want, in exchange for—myself. But let's talk of other things—of to-morrow, how we shall spend it, you know. At home, I think, quietly; then, on Monday, the races, which I'm crazy to see."

"Ah! If we could, Zoe; but I must be at barracks by eleven to-morrow. I told you that I had run away; that the Colonel had refused me leave—forbade me, in fact, to come."

"What! Your Colonel is as selfish as that, yet comes himself to Paris to enjoy the circus?"

"A feather would have floored me when I saw him there—he, the Colonel, with his horror of all women!"

"Eh? Of all women?"

"Of all women. 'Inferior, mischievous beings,' he calls them, and refuses to admit that others may think differently."

"And your weekly leaves of absence?"

"Are at an end—done for."

Zoe began to laugh.

"The animal! The stupid, hard-hearted, hard-headed old—old goose!" she cried. "But don't worry yourself, Marcel, you'll get your leaves. Rest easy, we'll see what we'll see!" And Zoe began to laugh again.

Next morning, as Marcel sat gloomily thinking how little that evening was going to resemble the last, his room door opened and the waggon master handed him a letter. It was from Zoe, and ran thus:

"Arrange, Marcel, dearest—no matter how—to be in Paris, Thursday next, and at my house at nine a.m. sharp; there a note will tell you what to do. You will be free to return at noon, if you wish. Should they refuse you leave, come without; you must, for on this depends all our good times to come. Find inclosed a thousand kisses.

"ZOE."

This strange missive greatly perplexed Marcel. What in the world was the little monkey up to? Had she taken it into her head to arrange an interview for him with the minister of war? One thing was certain, if she had, she would have the interview, for, somehow or other, she always had her own way.

So Thursday morning at the hour named—written leave of absence in hand this time—Marcel found himself bowling comfortably along in a little uncovered cab to Zoe's house. Suddenly, just ahead of him, he recognised the form of Colonel Belpoygne. He again! This was decidedly unnatural!—and, with a word to the coachman, Marcel made up his mind to follow his superior officer, who was mounted, like a centaur, on a splendid cob, built like a bull, but which, all the same, bowed a trifle under the Colonel's two hundred pounds. He presently dismounted, called the stableman at the door of the circus to take his mount, and passed into the building by the private entrance.

Digitized by Google

"By George!" cried Marcel, staring, "can it be a rendezvous? Pooh, nonsense! Some horse-trade, doubtless." And Marcel drove on, while the Colonel was asking of the Cerebus at the door, "If Mdlle. Zoe had arrived yet?"

"Not yet, monsieur," the man responded, evidently well acquainted with the applicant for admittance; "she has a new act, and practises late to-day, you know, Colonel. Come in, sir, please, and wait a while."

Crossing the passage, the Colonel seated himself, as usual, in the front row of the empty circle, and to kill the time, mechanically began to inspect the curious spectacle that a circus presents of a morning. A stirring scene it is, too, especially when, as now, a "new act" was to be tried. Everyone, workers and idlers, comes in to see it, eager to know how the other will do, and from eight in the morning till one there is an endless, perpetual going to and fro, of artisans and players, clowns and jugglers, horses and riders, and, high over all, the vicious snap of the ring-master's guiding whip.

Colonel Belpoygne, interesting himself in the varied accoutrements—the hoops, banners, swings and trapezes—giving advice upon a thousand and one things that he had never before heard of, was beginning, nevertheless, to find the time long, when presently Zoe appeared. He rushed to meet her.

"At last!" he cried.

"I know—I know I'm late," she answered, red and breathless with hurry; "but I met someone and——"

"And forgot with this 'someone,'" broke in the Colonel with plaintive reproach, "the poor friend so ardently and anxiously awaiting you here?"

"On the contrary, I thought of you all the while he detained me."

"Truly?"

"Truly. But I must go and dress; it won't take me a minute."

Zoe reappeared, droll and charming in her working costume; tights of sky-blue, a short blouse of blue merino, clasped at the waist by a band of flexible silver; her short, frizzled hair floating free; her fresh, white, eighteen-year-old skin—ah! But the little white monkey was indeed a pretty sight.

Dazzled, open-mouthed, the poor Colonel stared at the strange little creature; never before had a woman affected him as this one did. He started, trembled, and made wild dabs at her, as, from time to time, she passed before his chair, whirling and gaily pirouetting on the back of the old white horse that served her as a practice steed.

"Look out!" he cried; "take care—you'll fall!"

"I fall? Never!" Zoe responded, quitting the rail of the circle upon which she had just jumped. "Truly, my Colonel, it isn't at all dangerous; you know how perfectly our horses are trained. To prove it, try yourself!"

"Try? Try what?" cried the Colonel, affrighted.

"Standing up on a horse."

"I—on a circus horse! Never in the world!"

"I insist on it."

"Impossible! My dear Zoe, think what you suggest!"

"I do, perfectly. You ask a favour of me. Well, favour for favour, you know, and the one condition upon which I consent to your wish. Besides, there's the safety-belt—you shall have that on"—Zoe sunk her voice to that tender, coaxing cadence so irresistible to a lover's heart—"and you will do this for me—to give me a pleasure—who loves you so much! There isn't the slightest danger, I assure you. The belt—the belt, Mr. Clarke, and bid them bring Jules, please."

"Jules?" murmured the Colonel, nearly swooning in his shoes; "who is—Jules?"

"Oh, the old ring 'hack' that all, even the children, ride, and kick and thump as much as they please."

"But, Zoe, if I lend myself to this madness, you swear——"

"I swear, yes," cried the little monkey, slipping her hand into the Colonel's great palm, but neglecting to specify as to what she swore.

Jules, a great roan thoroughbred, was still a tolerably superb ruin. Humiliated at first by his descent to the ring, he finally submitted. He had resigned himself to bear everthing but—the Colonel. He was the unexpected, the unforeseen; and when he mounted, with the assistance of the riders, to the pad on his back, Jules squatted and spread out his legs, believing that his last hour had come.

The people shouted, the Colonel groaned; after which they began to put him through his exercises; first, the tour of the ring, seated at a gentle trot. Then, with her own hands, Zoe adjusted the safety belt—a girdle, with a ring through which ran a cord to a swinging pulley; the rider held one end, the cord swung with the horse, and the rider, by its support, was able to recover his balance should he slip, and thus avoid a fall.

Here, however, the Colonel rebelled. "Halter his legs in that cursed string!" He swore he never would—swore it—then did it at Zoe's whisper—Zoe inundating him with glances full of promise, and murmuring pleadingly in his ear:

"One hoop, just one hoop, Colonel—one hoop and a banner!"

"One hoop and a banner," was it, that Zoe had said? Why one—two—four—eight—ten—twelve, the Colonel counted hastily; the entire garniture topping off with a yellow paper moon, was blocking the way. Yes, blocking it absolutely, with Zoe whispering now in his ear: "All of them—all of them, Colonel—hoop, and banner, and——"

Well, whatever it was she told him, it turned him as red as a poppy, and set Jules off again in slow, cadenced gallop round and round the ring, a groom running at his head and Mr. Clark pulling sturdily on the safety rope, to the end of which swung easily the Colonel's stalwart form.

How was it done? Heaven knows! A leap, a scramble, a clutch of the man, the banderolles were passed, and for Zoe's victim there remained but the big yellow moon, one side of it in the grasp of the clown, the other——

There was no time to see him; the moon was on him, the Colonel's head through the tissue, Jules at a standstill, and a voice, calm, polite, respectful—the voice of Marcel, the clown's vis à vis with the moon—solicitously murmuring at his elbow: "I trust that you have enjoyed yourself, Colonel?"

It was playing for high stakes; but Belpoygne was a man of spirit, and he took his punishment like a soldier.

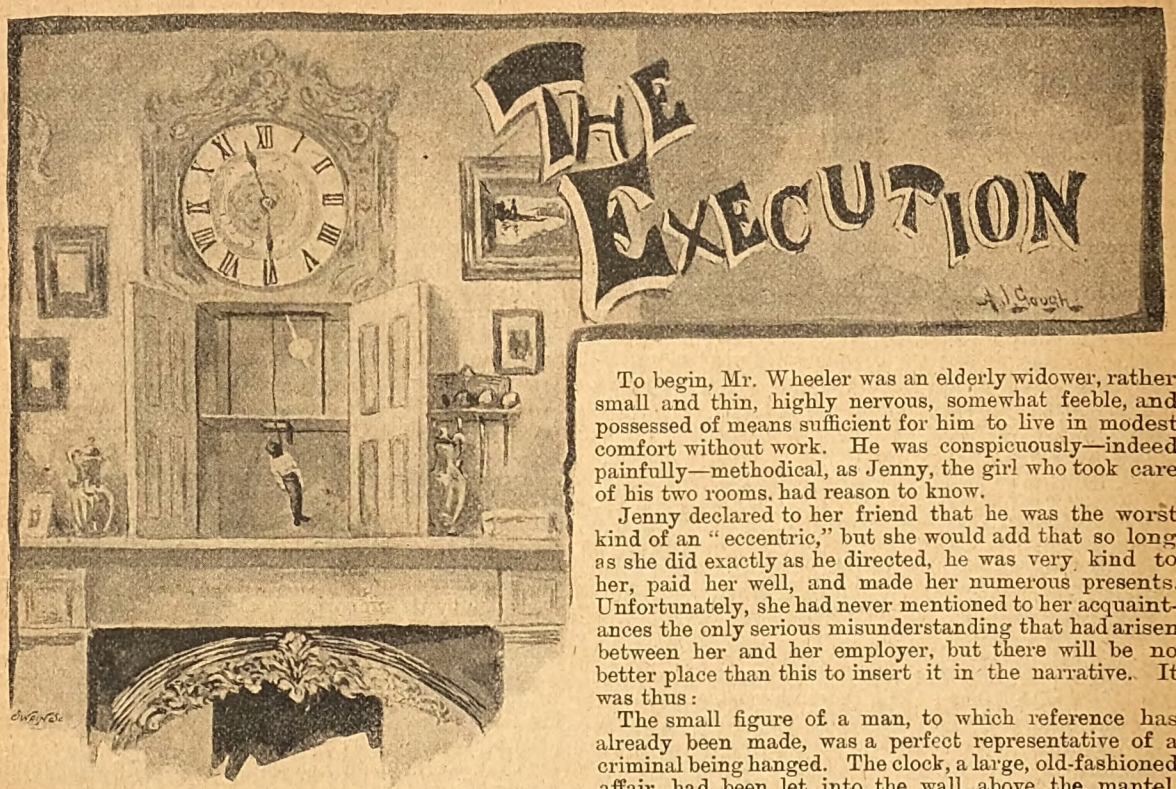
"My dear child," said he, turning to Zoe, "if you meant to teach me a lesson, you have succeeded."

"My dear Colonel," the white monkey responded sweetly, "I wished only to show you that women are not 'inferior beings;' also, how needless is the pain you give us both when you refuse Marcel leave of absence."

Which, I need not add the Colonel, whether from prudence or a better motive, did not refuse again.

LE VIER.

Digitized by Google



Mr. Austin Wheeler was startled out of his ten o'clock nap by a peculiar cry of distress from Theophilus, his cat. Wise in the ways of cats, and experienced in all the vocal expressions of Theophilus, Mr. Wheeler had cause to feel alarm when, upon opening his eyes, he saw the cat staring straight past him, every nerve in the large brindled animal's body on the strain, the hair along his spine upright, his tail slowly swinging to and fro, his ears rigidly fixed in listening, his eyes glowing with an unwonted light, and that low note of alarm, caution, or distress—perhaps all three in one—filling the chamber with its uncanny effect. It was such a sound as you may have heard cats give when worried by dogs.

Mr. Wheeler was wide awake in a moment. At first he supposed that the cat was looking at him; but when, in straightening himself from a reclining position, he had brought his face some two feet out of the cat's line of vision, and observed that Theophilus kept his gaze steadily as before, and, moreover, gave no heed to a call, Mr. Wheeler sent his glance in the direction of the cat's, and, as nearly as he could judge, found it to rest upon the clock. Instantly he made the startling discovery that instead of sleeping ten minutes, as had been his unbroken custom for years, he had really slept two hours, for the hands of the clock indicated midnight. More than that, he noticed that the little figure of a man which hung by the neck just below the clock was still quivering, as though it had but that moment dropped to the end of its string, whereas it should have been perfectly still.

That the nature of the shock which these discoveries gave Mr. Wheeler may be understood, it is necessary to explain one or two things.

To begin, Mr. Wheeler was an elderly widower, rather small and thin, highly nervous, somewhat feeble, and possessed of means sufficient for him to live in modest comfort without work. He was conspicuously—indeed painfully—methodical, as Jenny, the girl who took care of his two rooms, had reason to know.

Jenny declared to her friend that he was the worst kind of an "eccentric," but she would add that so long as she did exactly as he directed, he was very kind to her, paid her well, and made her numerous presents. Unfortunately, she had never mentioned to her acquaintances the only serious misunderstanding that had arisen between her and her employer, but there will be no better place than this to insert it in the narrative. It was thus:

The small figure of a man, to which reference has already been made, was a perfect representative of a criminal being hanged. The clock, a large, old-fashioned affair, had been let into the wall above the mantel, bricks having been removed in number sufficient to make the face of the clock flush with the wall. The ragged edges of the mural incision had been smoothed with plaster, which made a neat juncture with the wooden frame of the clock. The excavation had been extended below the clock, forming a narrow niche for the reception of the figure. In this niche, attached to the bottom of the clock, was a miniature gallows with beam, trap-door, cord, trigger, and the other essential mechanical devices employed in executions, everything being concealed by doors.

At half-past eleven o'clock every night, the mechanism of the clock would open the doors and spring the trigger, whereupon the trap-door would fly open and the little figure would fall through and hang suspended by the neck. The figure was neatly dressed in black, with a white shirt; its arms were strapped to its sides, its hands to its thighs, and its knees and also its feet together. To complete the picture, a hangman's black cap was drawn over the head, concealing the face.

Having accidentally opened the doors and seen the figure one day, Jenny cherished an uncontrollable curiosity to see the face. It so happened that she had never seen the figure hanging, for that was always at half-past eleven at night. For that matter, she did not know that the trap ever opened. All that she had ever seen was the figure standing rigidly on the gallows waiting to be hanged. But the gruesome picture of the little man standing there had always fascinated her, even after her original sentiment of horror and repulsion had passed. Accordingly, one day, when she knew that Mr. Wheeler had left for a stroll and to give her opportunity to put his room in order, and when experience with his ways made her sure that he would not return for two hours, she cautiously began an investigation.

Digitized by Google

Finding that the figure stood squarely upon its feet, without lateral support, she gently lifted it from the trap-door and drew it out as far as the cord would permit. She carefully loosened the noose, which was outside the cap and which pressed it closely against the neck, and then slipped off the cap. That which she then saw gave her so terrible a fright that she dropped the figure, screamed with all her might, and dropped in a senseless heap to the floor. There she lay unconscious for two hours, and there her master found her. Upon seeing at a glance what had happened, he became pale, and a look of singular ferocity and malignity distorted his features. With his foot he contemptuously turned the girl over, in order to get her out of his way, readjusted the cap and noose, and restored the figure to its original position, and then picked up Jenny, laid her on a lounge, loosened her clothing, sprinkled water in her face, and brought her back to consciousness.

After she had remembered what had happened, and had seen the hard, reproachful glance with which Mr. Wheeler was regarding her, she began to cry and to plead for forgiveness.

"Had you forgotten," he asked, "that I had particularly cautioned you never to touch that figure?"

"Oh, sir," she sobbed, "I am so sorry! It was very wrong of me, sir. You have been so good to me! Won't you forgive me, sir?"

The end of it was that he did forgive her, and that she promised faithfully never to tell any one what she had seen. But it was many a day before she could again enter that room without fear and shudderings. The slow, measured ticking of the clock was terrible, and the little figure standing behind its closed doors was a silent and formidable mystery. A thousand times did she wonder what it all meant—what dreadful history is illustrated. For months all her dreams were haunted by that terrible realistic little face, every detail of its strangely handsome features, distorted and discoloured though they were by death from strangulation, being impressed ineffaceably on her memory. In a vague fashion there had come to her certain stories of a strange tragedy far back in the life of her master—something about a beautiful young wife many years ago, and her death, and her husband's terrible revenge; but what all that had to do with the ghastly little figure in the clock, if anything at all, Jenny could not imagine.

When Mr. Wheeler, after having been awakened by Theophilus, saw that he had slept two hours instead of ten minutes, and that the body of the litt'e figure was still quivering, as though it had but just fallen through the trap, he was thrown into alarm and consternation. He had never overslept a moment before. Exactly at ten o'clock every night he had taken a nap of ten minutes in his chair, had read till eleven, and then had turned to face the clock and steadily watch the hands as they slowly went round to thirty minutes past eleven, when the little doors would spring open and the figure would drop to the end of its cord, and there sway awhile, turn slowly about as a man would in its place, and finally come to rest; then Mr. Wheeler would slowly replace the figure, close the doors, and go to bed.

On this night of his great surprise, Mr. Wheeler, at first unable to trust the evidence of his senses, felt his pulse, and, finding it bounding with alarming violence, concluded that he was ill, and that his illness had caused him to oversleep. But what explanation could be found for the singular conduct of the cat and the swaying of the figure? Mr. Wheeler examined the doors of his rooms and found them locked—no one could have entered. No draught which might have made the body sway after it should have been still nearly half-an-hour was discoverable. Nothing that might have caused the cat's uneasiness was visible. Could it be possible that some supernatural agency was at work?

Mr. Wheeler was too hard-headed a man to entertain that idea for a moment. So he finally tried to satisfy himself with the explanation that he had been taken ill in the first minutes of his slumber; that Theophilus had become uneasy at his long sleep and this violent breach of his habits, and, associating the clock with his master's movements, had regarded it as the cause of the irregularity; and that as for the swaying of the figure it might have been caused by a fly or some other insect, and that this untimely swaying alone might have accounted for the cat's uneasiness. Mr. Wheeler, forced to take that explanation to bed with him, had an uneasy night in its company.

He was so full of the affair the next morning that he made a close examination of the clock, and found it in perfect order. Although he had no watch, he observed that his clock was exactly in time with the tower clock which he could see from his window, and that was as it should have been. After puzzling over the whole problem some time, he decided that he could only go on as formerly, depending upon the future to solve the puzzle.

That day he went about matters as usual. Loss of sleep and the shock to his nerves had been injurious,

Mr. Wheeler examined the doors of his rooms.

but he might retrieve all that. Everything proceeded in the old orderly way until the time came for him to take his ten o'clock nap in the evening. At first he had thought of dispensing with it for a night or two, that he might watch for a repetition of the strange occurrences; but after reflecting that it would be unwise to break into the regularity of his habits he decided to take his nap. Accordingly, he composed himself in his chair, saw that Theophilus was sound asleep on the rug, and in a moment, being very tired, he was slumbering.

Digitized by Google

It seemed to him that he had not been to sleep a minute when the same distressed cry from Theophilus roused him into alarmed wakefulness. Again was Theophilus gazing strangely at the clock. Quickly turning his glance in that direction, Mr. Wheeler saw that the hands again pointed to midnight, and that the little figure was swaying as though it had but just fallen through the trap. This was more than the wretched man's nerves could bear quietly. He trembled, and a perspiration damped his forehead. These things, happening once, made a situation strange enough. A repetition of exactly the same kind—three extraordinary elements entering into it—made a coincidence which was terrible.

Mr. Wheeler found his pulse bounding as before. He examined the clock, and saw that it was in perfect order. He felt that he had not slept two hours, but on a matter of that kind, he knew that no man's judgment is reliable. He replaced the figure and sat for a long time in deep thought and anxiety, at the end of everything he went to bed. His sleep again was uncertain; but, if he had slept for two hours, how could he expect sound slumber? Still, it seemed to him that if he had slept two hours in a cramped position in a chair, he would have felt the strain on his muscles, and yet there was none whatever.

On the third night he threw aside his custom of taking a nap, and decided to watch the cat and clock. At ten o'clock, anxious though he was, the habit of falling asleep came upon him so strongly that he had to resort to various artifices to keep awake. Ten minutes later, he had lost his drowsiness. The cat slumbered quietly on the rug, and the clock and the figure gave no sign of irregular behaviour. Eleven o'clock arrived. He took up his familiar position facing the clock. Slowly he came under the influence of the old spell; his face paled and hardened; he became rigid. In two seconds more the doors would fly open and the execution would occur. A second passed. Then the clock stopped. At the same moment the cat, which had been asleep on the rug, sprang to his feet; the hair arose along his spine, his tail swung to and fro; his eyes, glowing with a strange light, were fixed upon the clock, and he gave a cry of distress and alarm.

It was some time before Mr. Wheeler could get his courage in hand. When he had done so he went to the clock, opened it, found it properly wound up and otherwise apparently in order, and then started it again. The pendulum swung easily, the little doors opened, the execution went forward with the accustomed precision, and the clock attended to its business without any further ado. Mr. Wheeler pushed forward the hands seven minutes, after consulting the illuminated dial of the tower clock, and then sat down, weak and ill, and watched the clock from his chair for the rest of the night. Nothing further went amiss.

In the morning, his hands trembled, his knees were unsteady, his eyes were bloodshot, and his face was haggard and white. Theophilus behaved strangely. This wisest, most complacent, most decorous of cats, exhibited an unusual conduct in divers ways, all ascribable, undoubtedly, to apprehension. Although he no longer paid attention to the clock, he strode about the room stealthily, his tail swinging, his ears erect, and his whole bearing indicating the presence of strange sounds. Mr. Wheeler himself, attentively as he listened, could hear nothing peculiar. Yet the conduct of the cat alarmed him. He strained every sense to catch the least uncommon happening. He examined the walls inch by inch, putting an ear to them now and then, watching Theophilus and the clock meanwhile.

Presently the time arrived for him to take his breakfast; but as he was ill and had no hunger, he fell into a chair and groaned. In a little while the Frenchwoman came in, and started in fright when she saw his face.

"Oh, monsieur!" she exclaimed, "you eel! Ah, what a peety! I bring you some coffee, quick, monsieur."

"If you please, madam," weakly responded the wretched man.

Afterwards he felt a little better; but a violent headache came on, and it seemed as though his temples would burst. He forgot all about his morning walk, and, lying back in his chair, could only watch Theophilus. He had not let any light into the room, and that which managed to get through the blinds, though to him seemingly so brilliant that it burnt him, was insufficient for Jenny, who, a few minutes before her accustomed time, burst into the room in extraordinary excitement.

"I'm sure it was the same," she gasped breathlessly, speaking to herself, and supposing that her master was away; "but I'll see."

Not observing him crouched in his chair, she hastily threw up the blinds, went straight to the clock, and pulled open the little doors. Then she drew the figure from the little trap, with fierce eagerness loosened the noose and removed the black cap, and then, letting the figure fall to the end of its cord, she staggered back to the mantel, clutched her throat, and panted, her wide-staring eyes fixed on the distorted features of the figure.

"Jenny!" called her master.

She screamed and sprang away. Her excitement must have been great for she exhibited neither shame nor contrition for being caught in the act of violating her master's orders. On the contrary, as soon as she could realise that it was he that was present, and not some dreadful thing that evidently she feared, she ran to him and threw herself on her knees at his feet, seizing his hand and clinging to them for protection. Every one of her features and movements expressed terror. Her throat was filled with sobs and gasps. She swayed and writhed in an effort to speak.

"Oh, Mr. Wheeler," she finally found voice to say, "I've seen him—the same as that!" pointing to the figure.

Mr. Wheeler's face became livid, and his eyes seemed to sink back into his skull.

"Where?" he whispered.

"Out there. He was slipping away from your door. His face frightened me so that I ran, and he caught me, and twisted my wrist, and asked me what I was afraid of. He is a young man. I don't know what I said—it was something about a rope around his neck. He said that if I said a word about having seen him, he would kill me. And there was murder in his face!"

Mr. Wheeler shrank deeper into his chair; and there he sat in complete collapse, his jaw hanging, his eyes rolled up and half-closed, and his breathing hardly perceptible. His appearance alarmed the girl, who feared that he had died. She shook him and called him by name, but his response was only a faint and petulant groan. She ran and brought the French woman, and together they chaffed his hands, and placed him on a lounge, and covered him heavily, for he was cold. Sooner than might have been expected, and before the arrival of a physician who had been summoned, Mr. Wheeler's face began to brighten, and his pulse and breathing to become strong. He refused to eat anything, and directed the women to leave him alone, taking occasion to whisper to Jenny a request that she should say nothing to anyone about what she had seen.

Digitized by Google

He got to his feet and looked round anxiously for the cat; Theophilus was sleeping peacefully on his rug. Then he staggered to the clock and carefully readjusted the figure on the trap, taking a great deal of time, for his hands were extremely weak and uncertain. Then he sat down, trembling. The Frenchwoman presently brought him a tempting little meal.

"Thank you," he said. "That is just what I need—I am very hungry."

Threw herself on her knees at his feet.

But as soon as she was gone he gave Theophilus the food to pretend that he himself had eaten. Meanwhile the colour in his cheek had deepened and the light in his eyes became brighter; worse than that, he began to talk, and as Theophilus, to whom he had often talked before, was his sole audience, Theophilus had to listen to him.

"Theophilus," he said, "it is a lie. The girl is mad! Do you understand that? How could he come back, when I myself hounded him to the gallows, when I myself had the last glimpse of his living face when the black cap was drawn over it, when I, myself, after it was all over, saw that same devilishly handsome face all swollen and purple, just as I afterwards reproduced it there, Theophilus?" pointing towards the clock with a meagre, trembling hand. "And yet, Theophilus, she saw something, and that something has come to life and has taken up its abode in my clock, Theophilus."

Theophilus, each time that his name was called, blinkingly opened his eyes and then drowsily closed them again.

"Thirty years ago, Theophilus. Let me say, twenty-nine years, four months, and eleven days. Three hundred and sixty-five times twenty-nine—but where do the leap years come in? Nine times five, forty-five, eight, thirty-two, seven thirty—ten thousand, five hundred and something; hundred and twenty, eleven; ten thousand and—ten thousand and—ten thousand and—more than ten thousand times. Theophilus! He's been hanged by the neck ten thousand and something times, Theophilus! Think of that! Isn't that sufficient to kill a man? What a fool that Jenny is!"

The feeble man rose in his excitement and reeled about the room, his face crimson and his eyes aflame.

"When, thirty years ago, she listened to his smooth voice and lying tongue, and he stole her away from me—oh, Theophilus, had I been born a cat! And in less than a year he was beating her like a dog."

By this time the poor man was reeling wildly about the chamber, stumbling over chairs and tripping over rugs.

Digitized by Google

"Beat her like a dog, and I knew nothing of it! Like a dog, Theophilus. Do you understand that? And that wasn't all."

His husky voice fell to a whisper. Half-stooping, half-crouching, he halted in front of the cat, and, with outstretched arm and a finger pointed at the cat, he hissed:

"He murdered her one day—murdered her! And for that, Theophilus," he straightened himself, threw back his head and shoulders, raised both arms triumphantly above his head, and passionately exclaimed in a loud voice: "for that I drove him to the gallows; and I saw him fall through the trap, and I saw his purple face when the cap had been lifted."

He slowly drooped after that outburst, gradually settled into himself, and then sank groaning into his easy-chair, where he sat staring vaguely at the clock.

At eleven o'clock that night, Mr. Wheeler, so weak that he could hardly move, composed himself as usual to watch the execution. Had not his senses become so dull, and had it not happened that Theophilus was without the range of his vision, he certainly would have noticed that strange occurrences were on the march. It is true that about twenty minutes past eleven he heard Theophilus give voice to alarm and distress; but he only laughed foolishly at that, and in a thick, maudlin fashion tried to reassure the animal, knowing nothing of the stealthy entrance of a man through the door.

"That's right, Theoph—Theoph—Theoph—what's your name, Theophilus? What's your name, hey? He's all round here, old fellow, all round here. Can feel him—smell him. You afraid, Theophilus? Don't be afraid, I'm not afraid. Ha! Don't do that, Theoph—Theoph—Theoph—what's your name, Theophilus? What's your name? Six minutes more. Keep an eye on the doors up there. Theoph—Th—Th—ophilus. Gracious me! what a name for a cat! Ha, ha! What a name for a cat! Theos—Theoso—phy. Oh, what a name for a cat! Four minutes more. Keep an eye on the doors up there—doors up there."

And thus he rambled on until the little doors flew open. One more swing of the pendulum, and then the execution. Mr. Wheeler had nerved himself to witness it—to drink in the sweetness of it. His dull eyes and deathly pallid cheeks had taken on new life, and with suppressed respiration he had leaned lurchingly forward, his mouth drooping and his head nodding as with a heavy palsy.

But before the pendulum could swing once more and release the trigger, the dark form of a young man uprose between him and the clock, and shut off his view.

For a little while, Mr. Wheeler could not understand what had happened. The stranger had brought his face directly before Mr. Wheeler's, and the wretched man stared helpless and speechless at the apparition. "Well," said the stranger, his hard voice comporting well with the sinister cruelty on his face; "well, I have brought you to this much sooner than I expected. You are more nervous than I thought. And now, after torturing you thus far, I dare carry it no further, for fear that I shall not leave sufficient life in your miserable body to treat you as my father treated your wife and as you treated him. It is all a delicious revenge. You had forgotten all about me, eh? Perhaps you did not know that she gave birth to me before my father put an end to her. Well, I am his son and your wife's son, and I inherit my father's spirit. Do you understand all that."

The stranger roughly seized him by the shoulders.

It was not clear that Mr. Wheeler did. He still stared in that hopeless way, not knowing that the execution had regularly occurred, or, perhaps, believing that the figure had stepped forth from the clock to punish him. He tried to mumble something. The stranger roughly seized him by the shoulders, and that roused the sinking man. With a tremendous effort, Mr. Wheeler staggered to his feet, pitifully weak. Then in a burst of life, he threw his arms aloft and cried:

"He was a coward and a murderer, and I hanged him nine times five, forty-five, eight, ten thousand——"

* * * * *

The stranger, once again in his own room (which adjoined that of Mr. Wheeler), looked up at the wall.

"I don't think they will ever find that opening behind his clock," he ruminated, as he made final preparations at midnight to leave, "for I have closed it as carefully as possible." He regarded his hands, which appeared to have been badly scratched. "Hang the brute!" he exclaimed. "Who ever heard of a cat fighting for its master's life?" He drew on a pair of gloves and quietly slipped away.

REGINALD BAIRD.

Digitized by Google

THE REAR-GUARD.

A Sketch.

A GENERAL in command may order a retreat to secure a stronger line, or because he fears disaster, or for several other reasons which might be termed goodly policy by a court of inquiry, but there is peril in any backward movement. So long as the lines are standing firm, so long will men die bravely. Even if a wing is being beaten back and the fact is unknown in the centre, men will die with their faces to the foe.

An army corps is an anomaly. It will charge into the face of death time and again. Every man will obey like a machine. No man knows what fear is. That is because it is at least holding its ground if not gaining something. Let the order run down the lines for a retrograde movement, and there is a panic observed at once. Have other corps been defeated? Has the enemy pierced the centre? Has the battle been lost? Men ask these questions of each other in cowardly whispers, and within ten minutes four-fifths of the command are ready for flight.

All veterans have experienced this sensation more than once, but no man can explain it. He was there to die. To stay was to be killed. He could fear death only in running away. It wasn't that he was running away to save his life, but from some menace which he could feel and yet not understand. An army of 40,000 men, bravely pushing ahead and feeling victory in the air will leave its dead at every wall and fence and ditch, and on every stone, and cheer and cheer as it pushes on. The same army, if withdrawn for any reason, will be so worked up within half-an-hour that the bursting of a shell will break the formation of a whole brigade.

It is the rear-guard a general looks to with deepest concern when compelled to withdraw in the face of the foe. It is the post of honour for someone seeking death. It is the place of all to try the nerves of the oldest veterans. A victorious army is jubilant and aggressive. A defeated one is nervous and fearful.

The rear-guard steps in between the wolf and its prey. It must retreat, but it must fight as it falls back. There will be dead men, but they will not even be moved aside to escape the wheels. The wounded may be placed in the fence corners or dropped into the ditches, but there will be no time for gentleness.

Here we swing into the main road, up which the last hurrying, straggling company has disappeared. There is a swamp with a long causeway between us and the enemy's advance. Up the road they are trying to save the waggon train. We must give them half-an-hour. First comes the enemy's cavalry. Our two guns are planted to sweep the narrow road, and never a man lives to get within pistol shot. Then he pushes forward a column of infantry. They fill the road and overflow into the swamp, where ooze and water are hip deep. We shell them—we change to grape and canister—we fill the black waters of the swamp with dead men. But there are 5,000 men forming that living, moving wall—a thousand of us.

They push forward from tree to tree, and from bush bush, and we are driven back. It is either retreat or annihilation. We leave our dead and wounded and fall back. The enemy cheers again as he advances, and we turn and fire and push on again. Here are wounded men sitting by the roadside or lying at full length on the grass. Some rise up and hobble painfully after us; others beg for water and fall to weeping. We cannot be burdened. We cannot even be merciful. We are the rear-guard—not here to save a hundred but thousands.

At the foot of the hill are two broken waggons, an ambulance with a wheel off, a heap of knapsacks and muskets thrown away by weary and fearful men; half-way up the hill more abandoned waggons and two or three dying horses; at its crest a caisson and more spoils for the enemy.

"Halt! Here we check them again!"

The guns are planted and the infantry positioned, and we can see that the highway clear back to the swamp is a mass of moving men. Thirty to one, perhaps, but we must fight. It is only when they overflow into the forest and field and are on our flanks that the guns are limbered up and we fall back. We have given them another heap of dead to bury, more wounded to care for; but, alas! we dare not stop to count our own loss.

Across a plain for half a mile, past a farmhouse and its barns and orchard, and the highway turns to the left and enters the forest. We halt at the turn. There is just time to draw a long breath when the head of the wild beast, scenting our bloody footprints, comes into view. Our shells scream down the dusty highway and mingle blood with dust. They rend, they tear, they maim and kill, but the living wall is not checked. Then grape and canister whirr and whistle and scream, and the muskets of our infantry blaze and crackle, but we cannot stem the tide. Even as we are ready to fall back, one of our guns is dismounted, and we must help the horses to draw away the other. There are more dead and wounded—only a skeleton command to stagger back and look for another position.

Here the highway leaves the woods and ascends a strong hill. The afternoon has waned, and the sun is disappearing. Half-way up the hill the last horse falls in his tracks, and we drag the gun and its caisson up by hand. It is our last stand. The army is safe and can ask no more of us. As we bind up each other's hurts, we can hear the foe cheering down the road. Five minutes later the last shell is fired. There is no more grape, no more canister. Gun and caisson are overturned into the ditch.

We hold the hill for ten minutes with a fire of musketry which leaps up against the evening sky like a great bonfire, and there comes a sudden silence. We have the order to retreat. Leaving the wounded to groan and pray, leaving the dead to grow cold as the red sunset fades away and the stars come out, we glide away like shadows into the night, and like shadows are swallowed up and lost to view.

We were fighting for night to come. It is here. The pursuit is ended.

RICHARD SIBERT.

Digitized by Google

IGNATIUS BINKS, TRAGEDIAN.

HE was a familiar figure at the Thespis Club, was Ignatius Binks—and a very impressive figure, too, in his own estimation. When you saw his card (and he always handed them out with a lordly air, from a dilapidated case) you would readily surmise the character of the man, even had you never seen him before in the course of your life.

There was something so absurdly comical in the combination of Ignatius and Binks, when the two names belonged to one individual, that you felt an irresistible inclination to smile the moment your eyes rested on them. Poor Ignatius! He was, if you credited his story, an unrecognised genius. If, on the other hand, you felt disposed to believe the statements of those whom he deemed worthy his notice—a waggish set—he was a "crushed tragedian," and had endured all the sneers and heartaches which that questionable term implies.

He had studied every character in Shakespeare, from the waiting lady in Macbeth to Hamlet, and of each character he had his own original conception. These conceptions, it may be said, were decidedly novel. Fortunately for the public, Ignatius never had an opportunity to air them on the stage.

One day he came home—his countenance betraying mingled sorrow, disgust and anger—flung himself into a chair, dropped his head into his hand, and looked pensive. Mrs. Binks, a bustling, common-sense little woman, who had formerly played minor parts in various companies, glanced at her liege lord and sighed. It might be mentioned, in passing, that Ignatius's passiveness and the sigh of his wife, were matters of daily occurrence in the Binks household. To-day, however, Ignatius appeared even more depressed than usual, and his wife said sympathetically: "Some new trouble?"

"Yes," he murmured wearily, "and each new trouble is an insult."

"What has happened?" the little woman asked.

"Happened!" thundered Ignatius furiously, rising from the chair after the method of a stage king. "This is what has happened! To-day I met Bagsby of the Gaiety, and he offered me a part in a new piece—a part of thirty lines—think of it, and in a farce-comedy. Thirty lines in an odious concoction which will be an outrage on an intelligent public! And I—well, fortunately my wrath did not appear on the surface—you know, Clara, my love, I am a believer in repressed emotion, and it was simply a merciful Providence which prevented me from strangling the presumptuous ignoramus on the spot."

Ignatius took six Hamlet strides across the apartment and would undoubtedly have taken more had not the space been unpleasantly limited. Then he turned suddenly, folded his arms, and with downcast head, murmured:

"That it should come to this! But"—with gaunt arm pointing towards the ceiling—"behind the clouds the sun waits to burst into splendour. Even so do I wait. Rest, quiet, my ambitious soul; your day will come—it must!"

Ignatius took six strides more which brought him to a dilapidated sofa, and thereon he threw himself in deep dejection.

"Binks, darling," said his practical better-half, "what salary did Bagsby offer you?"

"The beggarly pittance of one pound a week," groaned the disciple of Shakespeare, adding: "merciful heavens! how my soul cried out in direst agony at the insult!"

"What was your answer?" continued Mrs. Binks.

"Answer!" yelled Ignatius, again rising and assuming the attitude of a man about to quell a howling mob. "I spoke not to him in words. I merely looked at him—aye, gave him one searching glance, and then strode forth into the world, to forget my woes amid its bustling activity."

"Well, you did a very foolish thing," was the comment of Mrs. Binks.

"What would you?" responded Ignatius tragically. "Think you, I would have so degraded——"

"Listen, Binks," interrupted his wife. "One pound weekly will be a great blessing to us. Don't look at it so slightingly. Accept Bagsby's offer."

"But, Clara, my love," groaned her spouse pathetically, "think of it—a farce-comedy. Dost fancy I can bring my soaring soul to grapple with such rot?"

"You must, my dear," decided Mrs. Binks. "As I said before, accept Bagsby's offer, and wait patiently for the triumph which, I trust, the future will bring."

"But my soul, my artistic soul, rebels," moaned Ignatius.

"Let it rebel," answered his wife, "and conquer it. That will be a victory for you. Recollect, Binks, dear, that we are almost penniless, that we scarcely know where the next meal is coming from. Do you want your wife and child to go hungry?"

"Ah, Clara, good angel of my life," cried the crushed actor, throwing himself on his knees at Mrs. Binks' side, "you have suffered much for my sake. It shall be so no longer. You have asked me to make a sacrifice. I will make it. For the sake of you and our helpless little one, I will silence my proud soul, I will away at once to that infamous Bagsby. Let me not tarry a moment, lest my courage forsake me."

Digitized by Google

Ignatius seized his battered umbrella, straightened himself as if for a mighty effort, pointed theatrically towards an imaginary spirit, and muttered solemnly:

"Lead on, oh cruel fate. I follow thee!"

Then he was gone. He did not, however, go to Bagsby's. On the contrary, he went to a neighbouring public-house, took a seat in a secluded corner, ordered an inexpensive beverage, and as he drank it, much as a stage villain quaffs imaginary wine from a gilded wooden goblet, he gave himself up to reflection.

As an outcome of his meditations, he drew from an inner pocket a small roll of manuscript, and surveyed it disdainfully. It was the "thirty-line part" in the new piece. How came it in his possession? In this wise. He had really told Bagsby that he "would consider the matter," and he had taken the part to look it over. It will, therefore, be seen that he had not adhered strictly to truth in the conversation with his wife.

Ignatius's soul had revolted at Bagsby's offer, but he had acted wisely, nevertheless, foreseeing what the result would be if his wife discovered that he had declined an opportunity to earn a pound per week. Still, he could not lower himself to the level of farce-comedy without a strong protest. Hence the scene with Mrs. Binks.

Ignatius having finished his beverage and his meditations, returned the manuscript to his pocket, threw down a very small coin, with a magnificent air, and again sought the Binks hearthstone, vouchsafing to his wife only these words, which were spoken as if wrung from a tortured soul:

"Bagsby has had his hour of triumph. The part is in my pocket. Henceforth let me hide myself from those who have known me."

The first night of the new piece came, and Ignatius did all in his power to so disguise himself that his friends, if any were in the audience, should not recognise him. The mental torture which he endured while on the stage for his one brief scene is indescribable. He played a serious rôle, and yet the spectators persisted in laughing at his every word and move. It was wormwood, gall—the bitterest of gall—and when his duties for the evening were over he strode homeward with a countenance which, to one unfamiliar with his character, was indicative of murder.

"Clara, my love," he cried wildly, bursting in upon his wife, "hide me—hide me from my fellow creatures. Let the world not look upon me again. Oh, the agony, the humiliation I have endured this night. I was laughed at—actually laughed at, my loved one, by the audience. Aye, Ignatius Binks was laughed at! Oh, heaven! let me not think on't or I shall go mad!"

He took six strides forward, six back, flung his arms about wildly and threw himself upon the sofa.

"My love," said his wife joyfully, "I see it all. You have hitherto mistaken your line of business. You are a comedian."

Ignatius rose to his feet like magic, his eyes blazed, and his face wore a marvellous expression of contempt.

"A comedian!" he yelled in tones of awful disgust, "I might have expected such an insult from Bagsby, but scarcely from the lips of one who should have consoled me in the hour of my mortification. Madam, good-night!"

The next morning Mrs. Binks bought a penny paper, and looked over the criticism of the new piece. Alas! it was voted a failure, but her eyes danced as she read it. Ignatius had made a hit. The leading part, that of an erratic and impoverished author, referred to as a rôle of the strongest possibilities for an eccentric comedian, had fallen flat owing to the incompetency of the actor who had attempted to portray it. The criticism went on to say that with a proper representation of the principal rôle the comedy would undoubtedly prove highly successful. Mrs. Binks sighed. The piece was probably a failure, and in a couple of weeks Ignatius would again be out of an engagement.

A cry from the baby in the cradle caused her to drop the paper. She took the little one in her arms, and as she did so it moaned piteously. It had been ailing for some days, but had not seemed seriously ill until this moment. Mrs. Binks grew suddenly frightened at the pale face nestling against her bosom. She knew what was wrong. The child was suffering from lack of proper nourishment, lack of fresh air, lack of almost everything that such a tender life needed. The mother was powerless to remedy the ailments of her little one, and hot tears came into her eyes at the thought of her helplessness. A quick rattle of cab-wheels, stopping below her window, broke in upon her grief. Then there were hurried steps upon the stair, followed by an impatient knock at the door. She laid the child gently in its cradle and admitted the visitors. Great was her amazement to discover in them Mr. Bagsby and the author of the new play.

"Is this Mrs. Binks?" asked the manager blandly.

"Yes," returned the astonished woman.

"Where is your husband?" was the next question. "We must see him at once. He has made the hit in the new play, and I am prepared to make him a splendid offer. Our leading comedian has proved a fizzle, and to save the piece from failure, we must replace him at once. Mr. Binks is the only man for the rôle. Last night he proved himself an eccentric comedian of marvellous ability and we want him to study the principal character immediately, so as to appear in it to night. This is the opportunity of his life. Where is he?"

"I will send him to you," replied Mrs. Binks, talking as if in a dream.

She went to her husband, lifting the sick child in her arms before she left the apartment. Ignatius sat alone in a little room which he called his study, his face expressive of grave concern. His wife submitted Bagsby's proposition to him. He rose to his feet at its conclusion, drew himself up to his full height, and was about to plunge into a violent speech, when Mrs. Binks went to his side, and said gently:

"My dear, look at the baby's face. Our darling is dying for need of many things which only money can procure. Are you going to jeopardise her life by throwing aside this golden opportunity? Sacrifice yourself for the baby's sake."

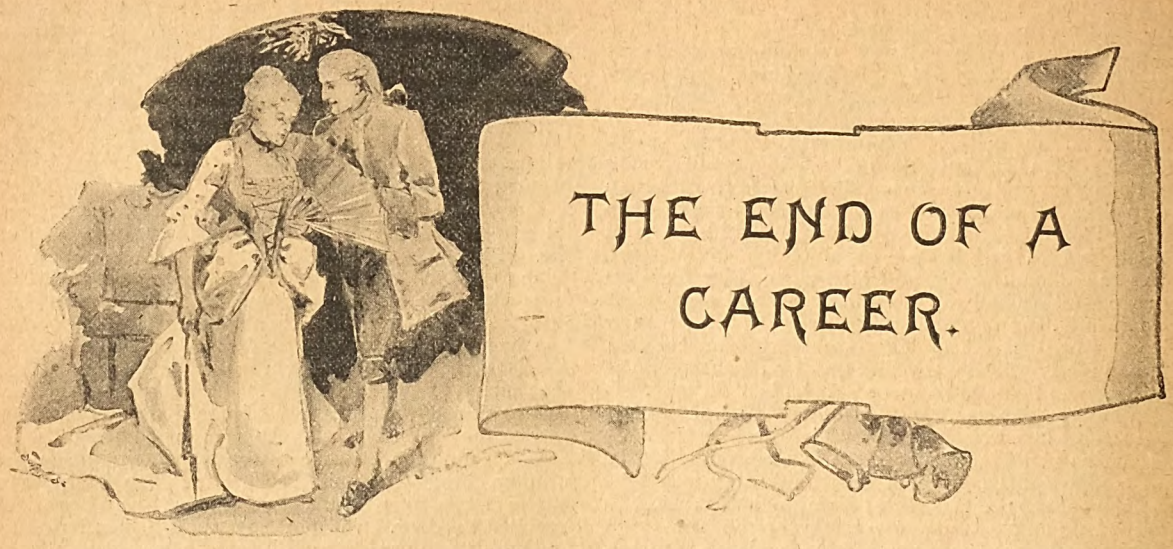
Ignatius looked at his child's face, then he kissed the pale little cheeks, while tears stood in his eyes. He saw all the dreams of his life going from him. Hamlet, Macbeth, Julius Cæsar and a dozen other immortal creations seemed wailing a last farewell to him, and in their stead he saw only a farce-comedy hero. The baby's face conquered, but it was pathetic after all. The death of an ideal is always so.

* * * * *

Ignatius saved the new piece. To-day he is well known as a delightful comic actor, and his bank account has assumed pleasurable proportions. He always feels, though, that he is in the wrong groove, and that cruel necessity deprived the stage of a brilliant tragedian.

HORACE LEFTWICH.

Digitized by Google



THE END OF A CAREER.

A man was sitting at his writing-table in some chambers at Pump Court, Temple, where he occupied two squalid rooms in the attics of one of the oldest and most dismal houses of that blighted quadrangle. The room was low and ill-lighted, and a great whitewashed beam, festooned with cobwebs, crossed the dirty ceiling from one end to the other. It was barely furnished, though the walls were covered with well-filled bookshelves, containing not merely standard works on law, but also a large number on philosophy and other miscellaneous subjects. There was as well, a fair proportion of the poets, and classical writers, both of dead and living languages. The carpet was faded and worn, while the curtains, rent and discoloured, hung limply over the streaky windows, which looked on to the gloomy houses on the opposite side of the court.

The man was leaning over the table with his head in his hands as though in pain. The photograph of a woman in a costly frame was before him, and also a pile of letters in a delicate feminine hand, which he had evidently been reading.

On the sideboard was lying, by an open case, a rusty gun, and two cartridges were on the hearth, as though put there to dry.

Presently he rose languidly from his seat, and, picking up the bundle of papers, went over to the fire and put them on the mantelpiece. Taking the letters one by one, he carefully read each through, and then thrust it into the grate. With some he did this hastily, as though anxious for their destruction; with others, and one especially, with lingering reluctance. As they were slowly consuming, his face grew paler and more careworn, and his features were drawn and contorted as though with some painful emotion. When all were burned he went back to the table, took up the photograph, and, going to the window, gazed at it long and earnestly. As he did so, his dim eyes filled with tears, and the great salt drops rolled down thick and fast; some fell upon the beautiful face of the portrait, blurring and disfiguring it out of all recognition.

At last, with a deep sigh, he raised it gently and reverently to his lips, and, again approaching the fire, put it hurriedly between the bars, as if he were afraid his resolution might relax, unless he acted without time for reflection. He watched it with hands clasped, and lips tightly pressed, as it first smouldered and shrivelled, and then burst into flame.

The fire soon dried the tear stains, and as it slowly sank into the glowing embers and the flames reached the face, the eyes of the photograph seemed, to his fevered fancy, to shine through the mist once more with almost living brightness, and its contraction, as it curled and shrunk under the influence of the heat, gave to the lips a wierd motion as though they were about to speak. With a half cry he tried to withdraw it, but it was too late; and in another instant it fell with a dying flicker into a hollow of the fire, and nothing but a piece of charred and blackened paper remained. He covered his face with his hands for a moment as he leant upon the mantelpiece, and then returning to his desk, took a pen and a sheet of paper and wrote as follows:

"When you get this, the last letter I shall ever write, I shall have taken that great leap into the dark, and solved those secrets of another world, on which we have so often speculated.

"During the last month—ever since my wife's death, in fact—I have felt the certainty of this day being close at hand, growing upon me with irresistible force, and I know now that the hour of my deliverance has come. It will hurt no one. I am quite alone. No tear will be shed on my dishonoured coffin: no mourner will follow it to the grave; and no stone mark my final resting-place.

"I did not realise at first that you intended to give me up so completely. You said we should be friends always, and that, if separated by necessity, you would write to me and give me comfort. But I fancy women do not regard a promise as so sacred that to break it is dishonourable. So, you see, it is the wisest thing I could do, as I can bear my desolation no longer. It is folly to struggle against the dictation of a natural impulse, which must be the surest guide in all matters beyond the ken of human reason. I have no more to say, only good-bye and may God for ever bless you! Remember the last words of a doomed man. In the hour of death, as in life, I love you, and if the soul is imperishable, so will my love also be eternal!"

He put the letter in an envelope, stamped and directed it in the careless, slovenly hand which was characteristic of the man. He then looked at his watch and, putting on his hat, went downstairs and out into the court, through the mouldering old archway, across the lane to the pillar-box opposite, into which, after looking again at the direction, he dropped his letter.

Digitized by Google

It was a raw February day, and he shivered as though the cold pierced him to the marrow.

An old beggar woman came shuffling down the lane in quest of some one careless or humane enough to purchase a half-filled box of damp matches. As he stood, looking up at the lowering sky, he at first paid no attention to her whining appeal. Then suddenly he seemed to notice her, and, struck more with her destitution than her deserts, put his hand in his pocket and drew out everything it contained. He did not count it, or even look to see what it was, but gave the whole handful of mixed coins to the bewildered mendicant.

He went slowly back to his dreary chambers, and as he entered them the clock at the Law Courts struck the hour of four. He sat down at his writing-table and emptied all its drawers of papers, glancing carelessly at some, but consigning most of them to the fire.

His eye fell on an old briar pipe on the mantelpiece, which he took up and regarded fondly, as though it were an old friend. Pulling a tobacco pouch from his pocket, which contained, however, only a little dust in the corners, he scraped what there was together, and, filling his pipe, lit it, and sat down in the old armchair to ponder dreamily for a few minutes, with his feet upon the fender.

Above the incessant roar of the two contending currents of street traffic, the discordant cries of the newsboys in the Strand were quite audible, though it was impossible to distinguish what exciting headline they were shouting. The smoker, after listening for moment, went to the window, and, opening it, learnt that the episode in the evening papers was the death of an eminent barrister in court. He smiled grimly to himself. "I wonder who it is?" he said. "I've half a mind to go out and get a paper just to see."

He felt in his pocket as though to extract the necessary copper, but, finding nothing, laughed and went on:

"That settles it at any rate. Well, well, he chose a better place and company to die in than I have; I wonder whose court it was in?"

He shut the window with a bang, and, after knocking out the ashes of his pipe, looked for the first time at the gun on the sideboard. It was a handsome breech-loader, though in a somewhat neglected state, as if it had not been used for some time. He took it up and put it to his shoulder two or three times as though aiming at some imaginary bird and exclaimed:

"How well it comes up. I don't believe there is a better-balanced gun anywhere, and it has done me some good service in its day, but never so good as on the last time I shall ever use it."

He slipped in the cartridges, and snapped the breech to, as calmly as he had ever done in field or covert. Then he stirred the fire into a cheerful blaze and sat down in the armchair again, with the gun across his knees. His hands played idly with the hammers, while he stared in a ruminating, dazed way at the leaping flames.

He looked at his watch. It was five minutes to five. Still he did nothing but glance from time to time round the room, as it was fitfully illuminated by the flickering firelight. There was a heavy mist outside, and it was already almost dark.

Presently the great clock in the Strand boomed out the first of the four quarters. He started slightly. His face was ashen white, but quite calm, although on his forehead there gathered a few drops of glistening moisture, as he pushed back the hair from his eyes. As the clock sounded the first stroke of the hour he turned the gun round with the muzzle close against his mouth. Then he waited, with his head thrown back and his feet carelessly crossed. His hand was quite steady and the gun never shook.

As the slow and solemn tones of the hour-bell tolled the knell of his unhappy union with the world, the time between each stroke seemed interminable. On the fourth his breath grew deeper and more hurried as he fixed himself with greater rigidity in the chair.

On the first vibration of the last stroke its full sound is lost in a loud report.

* * * * *

At about eight, footsteps are heard running upstairs. The outer door being shut, a paper is thrust into the letter-box, and the patter of feet again sounds on the stairs, gradually dying away in the dark and deserted court.

The next morning the door of the room was broken open.

The man's name was known, but there were no papers whatever to confirm his identity or throw any light upon his history. No motive for the deed was discovered.

An unopened telegram lying on the floor, passed into the hands of his landlady. It contained these words:

"You will have heard that my husband died this morning of heart disease in the Court of Appeal. Much upset. Will write soon."

There was no signature, and the landlady, who attached no importance to the words, consigned it to the fire.

That same day a woman was sitting alone glancing through the evening paper. She scanned through the mystery in the City, until she came to the name of the suicide.

Long afterwards she was found in a dead faint on the floor.

R. B.

A NEW SERIAL COMMENCES IN "SHORT STORIES"

dated May 23rd, and published on Tuesday, May 19th. It is called

"The Wythecombe Mystery,"

And is from the pen of Mr. JOHN K. LEYS, whose work is already known to readers of SHORT STORIES as the author of "The Tenth of June," and other tales.

THE STORY WILL BE ILLUSTRATED BY MR ST. MAR FITZGERALD.

Digitized by Google

THE GHOST AT THE PRIORY

CHAPTER I.

SIR SIMON WYNYARD.

IT was a wild winter's night. The strong westerly wind drove the heavy rain in gusts against the windows of the old Priory. The trees bent and swayed in the gale, their few remaining leaves torn off, flying and whirling through the air. In the old gardens the late marigolds and straggling mignonette gave up the contest in despair, and were beaten hopelessly; the chrysanthemums held down their dripping heads; even the purple pansies in the sheltered corner by the south wall had much ado to keep themselves from being broken into the wet earth by the heavy drops.

Even as the wind lulled, for a fresh outburst, the ear was aware of another sound above the roar of the storm—a steady, pulsing, unvarying rush—the husky voice of the mill-wheel as it strove at its task of grinding the wheat.

For how many generations had the mill-wheel worked? It had ground the bread of monks who once dwelt at the Priory. had seen those monks scattered abroad by Henry the Eighth, and the Wynyard family take their place. It had been turning the great mill-stones, and groaning at its task like a chained giant, when a horseman galloped along the road, and drawing rein on the opposite bank, shouted across to the miller the news of the sighting of the Armada. Still it strove, and worked, and sang when the Cavalier owner of the Priory fell at his own gate, struck down by a Puritan bullet; and later, when his Jacobite grandson lay hidden among the sacks in the mill while the soldiers searched the Priory for him in vain.

And, as the mill-wheel turned and turned through the years that followed, the broad lands beside the river passed into other hands, leaving but little for the descendants of Cavalier and Jacobite. Yet mill and Priory faced each other like faithful friends through all the changes, and the husky song of the turning wheel was the most familiar sound of life in every Wynyard's ears.

To-night the wheel toiled steadily through the storm, and in the darkness the pale pillar of white spray glimmered fitfully, and the fierce rain lashed the clots of foam floating away on the black water.

There were lights in the mill, and the fantastic shadows of the miller and his men wavered and flickered on walls and ceiling. There were also other lights gleaming here and there in the stormy darkness, and others still gleaming from the Priory windows, answering as it were the friendly beams from the mill. Further on were two cottages, then a small house, where the parish clerk lived, then the rectory, and the little church; these few dwellings made up the village of Lulham.

"It's a wild night!" said the miller, as a fresh gust swept past the mill, and drowned for a moment the groaning of the wheel; and that same thought must have fled over the river on the wet wings of the wind into the Priory drawing-room, where Mrs. Wynyard, the widow of the last owner, sat with her two daughters, for, as the gust tore through the garden, and shrieked against the panes, she sighed, and said, gently:

"It is a wild night!"

And Bridget, the younger, looked up from a book, adding, with laughing eyes:

"A night for Sir Simon to walk!"

"Don't, Bridget!" said her sister; "you make me feel quite creepy. I wish you would not speak of him."

"Don't you like feeling creepy? It is the only excitement we have in this place. What would Lulham be without Sir Simon? I'm proud to think that he was our ancestor—dear, wicked old thing! Now, Cynthia, confess that you, too, are proud of Sir Simon."

"No, I don't think I am. He was quite horrid!"

"Certainly, he shows a odd taste in preferring to walk abroad on stormy nights." This from Mrs. Wynyard.

"Oh, mother, wild weather is so much more picturesque and suitable for him," cried Bridget. "A ghost of Sir Simon's calibre needs a stormy night for his rambles. Moonlight ghosts belong to love tragedies."

Cynthia laughed.

"Bridget is learned in ghost lore."

The two sisters were much alike. Both, fair, blue-eyed, with a clear, fresh, wild-rose bloom. Cynthia's hair however, was a silken yellow, like coiled sunshine; Bridget's, a soft nut-brown. Both girls were lissom, willowy, altogether charmingly attractive, and their mother regarded them with pride and regret, for who would ever see their beauty while they remained in Lulham? and, alas! they were too poor to leave it.

Bridget held up her finger.

"Listen! I can hear the mill-wheel now. The wind has lulled for a moment. Will the spell hold Sir Simon under the wheel? Or has he escaped, and set off on his travels? Perhaps he is walking about the garden—his garden? Suppose he takes a fancy to call upon us—his descendants! Suppose ——"

Digitized by Google

Here there came a sudden, thundering knock at the hall door, and Bridget—valiant, ghost-loving Bridget—thus interrupted, gave a loud scream.

"I wasn't frightened," she protested, recovering herself, and laughing, "only startled. That knock arrived just at the right minute. Who can it be?"

"It cannot be the carrier," suggested Mrs. Wynyard, doubtfully. "We have not ordered anything."

"I hope Jane will not open the door without putting the chain on," said Cynthia nervously, hearing the maid's footsteps in the hall.

Bridget sprang up.

"Why, Cynthia, you are quite pale! I'll see who our visitor is."

She looked back as she ran out of the room, adding:

"If it is Sir Simon, nothing will keep him out but a strong form of exorcism. Isn't there one in 'Ingoldsby'? Better get the book ready, Cynthia!"

The hall was wide, lofty, and full of shadows, being lighted only by a small lamp on a carved bracket. As Bridget's high heels click-clacked over the flags, the maid opened the heavy front-door; a strong gust blew in, and the lamp-chimney cracked and fell, extinguishing the light.

"Fetch another lamp, Jane, quick!" said Bridget, hastening to the door.

"It's a man, miss," replied the maid, in a stage whisper. "But he can't get in, whoever he is, for the chain's on."

"Really, I'm quite harmless," said a laughing masculine voice outside—a pleasant voice. "My name is Medlycott—George Medlycott. I am an Australian. My mother is an old friend of Mrs. Wynyard's, and wished me to call at the Priory when I passed through Lulham."

"I know your name very well. Mother will be delighted to see you," said Bridget, reassured by the voice, and trying to peer through the darkness. But the rain beat in upon her hair and face, and she could only see the dim outlines of a tall, muffled figure. "You must excuse your reception. We could not imagine anyone coming to see us on such a night."

Here Jane reappeared with another light, and the stranger, being admitted, glanced round with an air of pleased curiosity.

He was a tall, dark, young fellow, with bright eyes and a frank manner.

"I have heard so much of this old place," he said, apologetically, "I have often wished to see it. And you are Cynthia—or Bridget?"

"I am Bridget," leading him into the drawing-room. "Mother—Cynthia—this is Mr. Medlycott, from Australia."

Mrs. Wynyard's face brightened as she welcomed the young man. He was the son of her oldest friend and schoolfellow, and his presence carried her back to her girlhood's days, before sorrow and poverty had dimmed the brightness of her life.

"You are very like my old friend, your dear mother," she said. "I should have known you from the photograph she sent me of you."

"That is fortunate," he replied, smiling, "for, otherwise, you might think me an impostor. But I have brought credentials," pulling some letters out of his pocket.

"We took you for a ghost," said Cynthia, "the ghost of Sir Simon, who strolls about on stormy nights."

"Does he?" George Medlycott evidently took as much interest in ghosts as Bridget herself. "What for? I mean, what is his particular woe or crime?"

"Bridget will tell you; she is the family ghost-lover. I must see about supper. I am sure you want something to eat."

She slipped softly out of the room—Cynthia always seemed to glide about the house as noiselessly as a fairy—and the Australian's eyes followed her regretfully.

It was a quaint, oblong room into which Medlycott followed his hostess shortly afterwards; a cosy room,

There came a sudden, thundering knock at the hall door.

the firelight shining on deep-red hangings and many bookshelves, and gleaming on Cynthia's yellow hair as she stood by the table, lighting the crimson-shaded lamp.

"This is surely a part of the old Priory?" George remarked, looking up at the groined ceiling.

Cynthia turned her smiling blue eyes upon him.

"Yes, you are right. Tradition says that this was the Prior's parlour. The walls are so thick that you can scarcely hear the storm."

"The house grows more interesting every minute," and Medlycott surveyed the ceiling again as he sat down. "I don't know how I shall wait till to-morrow to begin exploring. Please put me in the haunted chamber, if there is one."

"There is no haunted room; but the cellars under the new part of the house have an uncanny reputation. The floors are paved, and the walls partially built with old tombstones—a kind of sacrilege, you see. And there is always a wind blowing there, however still the day may be. People say it is only draughts. It makes a curious sort of wailing chant, which a legend says is the monks singing masses for the souls of the dead."

"I shall enjoy hearing them. Are any of the inscriptions on the tombstones legible?"

"I don't know," Cynthia confessed, with a little, soft laugh, and a faint increase of colour. "You will think me very silly, but that chanting makes me feel so creepy that I have never stopped in the cellars a minute longer than I could help. Bridget has, though."

George laughed, a kindly, amused laugh, and said to himself that Cynthia's face was the loveliest he had ever seen with those summer-blue eyes, and that changing, wild-rose colour.

"Many of the inscriptions are quite clear, and very interesting," said Bridget, in answer to his glance of inquiry. "I've read heaps of them over and over again. I'll take you down there first thing to-morrow morning."

Digitized by Google

Cynthia.

"If this wind continues I should think the monk's chant will be a positive howl."

"Oh, no, the sound never varies in the least. It is always the same."

"Is it?"

Medlycott looked puzzled, and Bridget triumphant.

"Ah," she said, "you will soon be as scared as Cynthia. I am a most splendid ghost-cicerone. I will make your hair stand on end."

That was a merrier meal than had been eaten for a long, long time in the old Priory. Even poor Mrs. Wynyard, depressed by loneliness and poverty, felt her spirits grow lighter under the cheering influence of the Australian's presence. He seemed so buoyant, so happy, so thoroughly interested in them and their belongings.

Few people took any interest in the Wynyards. Cynthia's soft loveliness, and Bridget's brilliant beauty were weighty reasons why their parents' old friends should conveniently forget them. Handsome and portionless girls are apt to attract sons, and spoil daughters' chances.

Mr. Wynyard had died when his children were mere babies, died partly from anxiety caused by heavy money losses; and the girls had grown up in this secluded village, seeing no one. No wonder that this friendly stranger cheered the quiet household.

When they retired to the drawing-room, Bridget undertook to relate the legend of the family ghost.

"The wind is not quite so high," she cried, drawing back the heavy curtains from before the window. "You can hear the mill-wheel now."

And the steady, pulsing sound came clearly to Medlycott's ears through the hiss of the rain.

Bridget dropped the curtain, and drew a low chair close up to the fire.

"In the days of the Stuarts," she began, stretching out one small hand with a dramatic gesture—"lived our ancestor, Sir Simon Wynyard. He was a mean and cruel man. Rather than pay the new poor-rates, he pulled down all the cottages in Lulham save two, turning out the villagers in the depth of winter to find homes wherever they could. A great snowstorm came on, and many lost their way, and were frozen to death. But Sir Simon cared nothing, and the years went on. At last he died, I think, of some kind of ague, for in his illness he was constantly shivering. Nothing would keep him warm. Of course, people said that the cold of the frozen villagers had seized him—it was Heaven's vengeance. At the last moment he repented, and sent for a priest; but, as the holy father crossed the threshold, Sir Simon died—unshriven. Therefore, his spirit could not rest. When mass was said for his soul in the Priory chapel, on the eve of his burial, a great wind swept through the chapel, and extinguished the candles; and, that same night, Sir Simon was seen in the village, wringing his hands with loud cries of despair. After that, he constantly walked over the sites of the cottages he had pulled down, stopping at each one and lamenting. Then the Lulham people called upon the Protestant vicar to lay the ghost. It was intolerable that the slumbers of good Christians should be disturbed by the vain lamentations of a wicked spirit. The vicar consulted the bishop, who came to Lulham with a goodly following of clergy, and armed with the strongest possible form of exorcism. He solemnly laid the spirit of Sir Simon under the mill-wheel, granting him permission to walk about only on stormy nights, when his cries would be unheard in the roar of the wind."

Bridget stopped, and, in the momentary silence, the dull, even beat of the mill-wheel throbbed steadily through the whistling of the gale.

"Couldn't they consign the poor chap to Purgatory?" suggested Medlycott. "I should think that would have almost have been a more cheerful place of sojourn."

"They could not send him anywhere out of this world—there was the difficulty," replied Bridget, solemnly. "Of course, Sir Simon is abroad to-night. I was just telling Cynthia that, perhaps he would call upon us, when you knocked."

"And Bridget screamed," added Cynthia softly.

"Yes, I did," Bridget admitted; "but only because the knock startled me. It came so opportunely."

"I am sorry I attacked the knocker with such unnecessary vigour," laughed George. "I thought if it didn't make a noise, you would never hear me in the storm."

"In the days of the Stuarts," she began.

They talked on till late, Mrs. Wynyard wishing to hear all news of her old friend, and the girls listening to the young man's glowing description of the Australian bush in Leichart's Land.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER II.

SIR JOCELYN'S TOMB.

THE next morning was clear and sunny, a golden November day. The river ran swollen between its banks, the mill-wheel churned heavily the turbulent volume of water that dashed through it, and foamed away to rejoin the river. In the Priory garden the chrysanthemums were trying to lift their rain-laden heads, and a robin sang on a leafless bough, as though the time were spring.

Before lunch, George Medlycott went round the village with Cynthia and Bridget, and into the old church, where many Wynyards lay side by side. The monuments fascinated the Australian, and, with the girls' assistance, he spelt out most of the nearly obliterated inscriptions on the tombs and brasses.

"We must come here again," he said, looking back as they passed out of the west door. "I have not half seen the place yet. Now for the mill-wheel. Whereabouts is Sir Simon deposited?"

"Just under the wheel," Cynthia pointed to the whirl of foaming water that rushed upward from beneath the churning wheel. "The bishop and clergy stood where we are standing now, and the wheel was stopped till the concluding words of the service, then it was turned on again."

"I should think the poor old boy must be thankful for a stormy night, when he can get out and take a walk. How mossy those stones are!"

Medlycott spoke of the sandstone blocks that held back the bank on either side of the wheel. They were of irregular shapes, and here and there tiny ferns, withered now, nestled in the crevices, and tufts of long, fine grass hung down, trailing in the swift rushing waters.

There was a cheerful stir about the mill. Fowls were pecking about; the miller, dusty with flour, came out for a moment, took off his hat to the Wynyards, looked curiously at the stranger, and went in again. Then the dog strolled out, barked and wagged his tail; the bark was for Medlycott, the tail wagging for his companions.

"The history of the mill is all mixed up with the history of the Priory," said Bridget. "I will tell you about it this evening after you have seen the house."

"And the cellars where the monks chant?" said George. "You see, I have not forgotten those cellars. I am expecting to make all sorts of discoveries there. I shall find out the cause of the chanting."

"No," Bridget shook her head emphatically, "you will not discover that."

"Bridget would be quite sorry if you did," laughed Cynthia.

November days, however fair, are short; therefore, lunch was no sooner over than Medlycott was taken by winding passages and down crooked flights of worn stone steps into the Priory cellars, Bridget leading the way, her sister and their visitor following.

"You will come, too?" George had asked. "I really am an efficient protector against a league of phantom monks."

And Cynthia had smilingly assented, saying she wished to observe the effect of the chanting on a stranger; though whether a less pleasant stranger than the Australian would have induced her to descend into those ghastly precincts is a matter of doubt.

They went down the last and most crooked of the steps, through an archway, into a wide, stone-flagged and stone-walled chamber.

Then Bridget stopped, and said:

"Hush!"

The sound that fell upon their ears, might have been mistaken for distant chanting. It might be described as a low, monotonous wail, rising and falling, yet not falling below a certain level of tone. It filled the chamber, and was heard equally from every part of it, yet it seemed to be far away.

They passed through another arched doorway into a chamber similar to the first, but rather smaller. Here, as in the other, the monotonous wail filled the air with its unceasing lament, just so loud, and no louder—just as far away.

"It is very singular," said George, looking around him with a puzzled expression. "I am not surprised at the belief in the monkish chanting. It is like the singing of many voices in unison."

"As when one stands outside a church, and hears the murmur of voices within." This from Cynthia.

"Yes, that is it. As the sound is the same in both cellars, I think it must be caused by a current of air passing exactly between them, either below the floor or above the ceiling."

"I suppose it must be something of that sort," said Cynthia as she glanced upward to the top of the archway; "but you cannot pull down the house to look!"

Bridget stopped, and said, "Hush!"

"And probably if I did, the act of pulling down would destroy the conditions necessary for the working of this mysterious Æolian harp, still, I do not acknowledge myself beaten. I may yet discover the cause."

"I am determined to believe in the monks," said Bridget gravely. "Now, look at the pavement and the walls. Here are whole histories for you."

She was right. Walls and floor were alike composed of gravestones, whole and broken, and carved fragments of monuments; the inscriptions clear and legible on some, on others defaced by time and carelessness.

"When most of the Priory was burnt," continued Bridget, "this new part was built as much as possible with the ruins of the old. The chapel roof fell in, and part of the walls fell, too, so a great deal of the chapel is here. Some of the monuments are from the church. I don't know why they should have been taken; but, in Queen Anne's days, people do not seem to have had much respect for antiquity, or anything. They simply helped themselves as appeared convenient."

"I never dreamt of anything half so extraordinary as this!" exclaimed Medlycott, going from one stone to another, and deciphering, with Bridget's assistance, the worn sentences thereon.

Digitized by Google

Even Cynthia began to be interested, and, like her companions, wondered and guessed at the life-stories of the long-dead men and women, whose memorials were here so strangely packed away.

"This," said Bridget, pointing to a broken slab, "is part of the tomb of Sir Jocelyn Wynyard. He went to the Crusades with Edward the First, and, on his return, did great penance for some unknown crime, desiring that he might be buried plainly in the Priory chapel, with no effigy such as was usually sculptured of a Crusader. You see, he beseeches all people not to remember him by his 'defaulte.' I wonder what his 'defaulte' was."

Medlycott slowly read the curious old spelling.

"Pray you alle. Praye for the soule of Jocelyne Wynyarde Knyght whyche departed out of thys world the iii daye July the yere of our Lord MCCLXXXIV. (illegible) whyche cors was layd in a faire chest (illegible) stone afore the west door. Remembre not myn defaulte myn orgultye and myn (illegible) onlie myn dolorous deth and repentynge. On myn soule God have mercye . . . ."

Beneath the inscription was a rough carving, somewhat resembling a cross-barred grating.

"I have often wondered whether that portcullis carved beneath the words bears any reference to the crime. Perhaps it is meant for a prison grating, not a portcullis," said Bridget.

Medlycott stooped down to examine the carving more closely.

"It is of much later date than the epitaph. You can tell that by the comparative clearness and sharpness of the cutting. It is not obliterated anywhere, as many of the words are."

Bridget looked.

"I never noticed that before."

Cynthia looked, too, over her sister's shoulder.

"But why," she asked, "should that portcullis, or whatever it is, have been added long after? And it is unfinished. Some of the spaces have knobs in them, others not."

"Very odd. I don't understand it," Medlycott spoke, slowly, reflectively. As you say, it may represent a grating—a grille. "Ah!"—a light seemed to break upon him—"perhaps that is it! A grille! Where is a piece of paper?"

He pulled several letters out of his pocket, and, unfolding them, tried them on the carving. They were far too small to cover it.

Both the sisters had stood for a moment bewildered. Then Bridget exclaimed:

"I understand! I will fetch some drawing paper!"

She ran off, and Cynthia turned to the Australian.

"What is it you are going to do? What is a grille?"

"This carving," he explained, touching the graven stone, "this that we have been calling a portcullis, may, I think, have been intended to point out certain words of the inscription. There are, as you noticed, knobs in most of the squares formed by the crossing lines. Only a few of the spaces, perhaps, fit to words of the epitaph. So I propose to put paper over the carving, trace it, cut out the blank spaces, and then fit the paper over the epitaph. Then we shall see if my surmise is correct."

"But if the carving is of much later date than the inscription, as you thought—and, indeed, it looks newer and fresher than the letters—how can it have anything to do with Sir Jocelyn's epitaph?"

George looked puzzled again.

"True; that certainly goes against my theory, Yet I can hardly believe that the sculpture has been accidentally left unfinished. The more I look at those spaces, the more they appear to have been left blank on purpose. Still, this may be mere fancy."

"No, no! I'm sure there is a wonderful discovery in it," cried Bridget, arriving breathless, and overhearing the last words. "We shall find Sir Jocelyn's history, or a hint of it. Here are pencils and scissors, and I've brought a whole roll of drawing paper."

The tracing was quickly made, the blank squares carefully marked and cut out, the paper placed over the worn, half-defaced sentences, when, through the cut-out spaces, appeared the words:

"The iii . . . stone . . . afore the west door."

"What can it mean?" ejaculated Cynthia.

"The third stone before the west door?" repeated Bridget. "That means the chapel door, because Sir Jocelyn's tomb was in the chapel, a raised tomb. This slab was the end of it."

Medlycott removed the paper, and once more the words stood out:

"The iii . . . stone . . . afore the west door."

He sprang up.

"Shall we examine this third stone? Where is the chapel?"

"The chapel is in ruins. It was burnt at the fire, you know. How unfortunate!" and Cynthia clasped her hands.

George's face fell. He was feeling the ardour of an antiquary and explorer combined, and a check was trying.

"But the pavement is there," interposed Bridget, "and part of the walls still standing, and the west doorway, though the door is gone. I am sure we can find the stone."

The chapel was picturesque in its ruin. The roof was gone, and of the walls only the north and west were standing, and these were partially destroyed. But ivy had crept about, and lichen and wallflowers had found a footing here and there, and through the great arch of the west doorway one looked across the slope of the garden on to the shining river and the old mill. The monotonous drone of the wheel was filling the air as Medlycott and the two girls counted and re-counted the mossy slabs beneath their feet.

"One—two—three! I am sure this is the third stone that is meant. It is in a direct line from the middle of the doorway."

"But, Bridget, the stone might be the third sideways, against the wall, you know—this one;" and Cynthia touched a cracked slab with the tip of her shoe.

"Or this one," said George, indicating a third stone, exactly opposite Cynthia's, "unless a third stone in the wall was meant."

This was a new idea. They scanned the massive archway and its adjoining walls with eager eyes.

"There are dozens of third stones in the walls, taking both sides," said Bridget dolorously.

"Well, suppose we begin with the pavement, as we have not much choice there," suggested Meddlycott. "Where can I find tools?"

"There is a spade in the corner. Perhaps that will not do?"

"It might; I'll try. At which stone shall I begin?"

"At Bridget's, I think," said Cynthia; "after all, I believe she is right."

The rain and dew and frost of a century had made many a crack in the once smooth pavement, and emerald blades of grass had sprung up in those crevices forcing up the loósened stones, so that Medlycott found little difficulty in raising the slab.

Digitized by Google

"There is nothing!" exclaimed Cynthia; "only the wet earth. Look, Bridget!"

"We may find something if we dig," said George, pausing with the stone half raised. "Will it matter if I throw this over and perhaps break it?"

"Not in the least. Why, nearly all the stones are broken already."

The slab fell over with a thud, unbroken; and George began digging cautiously.

The spade struck something that gave out a sharp click. What was it?

He carefully moved away the dark, moist earth—the girls watching with breathless interest—and brought out a small, covered metal goblet. The lid was difficult to open, so rusted was it by its long interment in the damp earth.

Within was a roll of discoloured leather, out of which fell a narrow strip of parchment, closely written.

Medlycott picked it up and handed it to Cynthia, saying smilingly:

"I must not pry into family secrets."

"I am sure it does not matter," she replied. "Besides, the writing is so faded I can hardly read it. Can you, Bridget?"

Bridget looked over her sister's shoulder, and slowly read aloud:

"On the twentieth day of February, in this unhappy year of 1643, wherein I have seen Sir Peter Wynyard slain by his own gateway, and his only son driven out of England by ungodly men; I, Anselm, Priest, thinking that no longer could I with safety retain the jewels and monies intrusted to my care by Sir Peter, did, with the ayde of the miller, John Fenn, put all the said jewels and monies into an iron boxe, and did conceal the said boxe in the earth, behind the stone which is in shape somewhat like a heart, on the right side of the banke, by the mill-wheel. This I did, seeing that the mill-stream did seem to be the one only place of security, so that the miller, John Fenn, could always faithfully overlook the place. But this I write by reason of the sudden and lamentable death of that worthy man and good friend, the miller. For that I cannot wholly trust his son, I herewith have sent to France, by a faithful brother, that he should enjoin the young Sir Simon to study well the tomb of his ancestor, Sir Jocelyn, for thereon have I written a message which it behoves him to look unto. But if, by any evil chance, it happen that Sir Simon return not, it is my hope that some of the family may be led so to note the message on the tomb, and thus be led to discover this which I write, and so regain that which I have secured from the grasp of the evil-doers."

Bridget paused and gasped.

"It can't be true!"

"Why not?" asked George. "We'll look. It would be grand to find that box. Have you read all?"

"There follows a list of the things hidden. I wonder if they are as valuable as they sound. Here they are," and Bridget read out the names of the treasures, which included several gold church ornaments of immense value.

When her sister had finished Cynthia glanced at the displaced slab. "Don't you think that stone ought to be put back? Of course, the chapel is ours; but, perhaps, it is well not to excite any curiosity as to what we have been doing, and the maids come here sometimes."

Medlycott agreed as to the wisdom of this, and smoothing the earth, restored the slab to its former position; after which, the three carried their great news to Mrs. Wynyard.

"Think, mother! we shall be rich if this box is found," murmured Cynthia's soft tones; "and all owing to Mr.

Bridget looked over her sister's shoulder.

Medlycott. Now, how shall we get the box? I am longing to see whether it is really there or not. I feel quite nervous about it!"

"The miller would stop the wheel, I am sure," said Cynthia; "he is a very good-natured man. Then some one would have to wade in, unless the stone can be reached from the top of the bank."

"That some one would be me," said Medlycott. "What a singular thing it is that the miller who helped to conceal the box should have died! Had he lived, you would never have heard of the treasure. He would have told his heir on his return. By-the-way, is that Sir Simon the ghost?"

Bridget nodded.

"Yes, he's the ghost. When the Puritans killed his father, he escaped to France, and came back at the Restoration."

"Everyone who knew the secret seems to have died," Cynthia remarked thoughtfully; "the miller, the priest, and the priest's messenger. Had they lived, Sir Simon would have got the treasure; then, perhaps, he might not have turned out the villagers."

"And not have been a ghost doomed to keep the box company under the mill-wheel," said Medlycott. "I fancy the proximity of that box must rather annoy him. He must be continually reflecting on the uses to which he could have put its contents."

Mrs. Wynyard had been reading the strip of parchment. She now laid it down, and said:

"I'm afraid, girls, that even if the box is still by the mill-wheel, we should have some difficulty in claiming the ownership."

Digitized by Google

"But there's the evidence!" Medlycott pointed to the parchment.

"I am not sure of the law in these matters," she continued. "The land on which the mill stands does not now belong to the Wynyards. It did once, but was sold about fifty years ago. I fear the box could be claimed as treasure-trove by the present owner of the soil."

"Impossible!" ejaculated the Australian. "I, too, am ignorant of the law here, yet that parchment appears to me conclusive."

"Yes," hesitatingly; "but we should be obliged to prove our claim, and litigation is so expensive."

"Sooner than put all these lovely things into a lawyer's pocket, I'd leave them where they are!"

And Bridget's sentiments were fully shared by the others.

"One may surely steal one's own property," said Medlycott, after a pause. "I will steal this box for you. I am certain I can manage it. The wheel stops on Sundays, of course. I will go at dusk."

Cynthia looked doubtful.

"I'm afraid the miller and his family would see you. The house is so close to the mill. Also all the village—if Lulham can be called a village—is more alert on Sundays. People have nothing to do but to notice their neighbours, and, naturally, anything unusual would attract their attention more readily than on any other day. There are, including ourselves, just twenty-seven human beings in Lulham, and the mill-wheel being such a feature of the place, the twenty-seven pairs of eyes often glance towards it. I fear Sunday evening is not a very good time for exploring."

"On week days the wheel often works till quite late, and there is a tiresome moon now," finished Cynthia, as a climax to the various difficulties she had enumerated.

"The moon will wane," said Bridget oracularly, "and I really believe, Cynthia, that if we had another of our family ghost nights like last—I mean one of Sir Simon's favourite dark and stormy nights—Mr. Medlycott might search by the mill-stream for hours, and never be noticed by anybody. If anyone did catch a glimpse of him, they would think it was Sir Simon and run away."

"The river is swollen on stormy nights," objected Cynthia.

"But not the mill-stream. When the wheel is still, that is quiet and shallow enough for anyone to wade in if they wish."

The Australian was deep in thought. Mrs. Wynyard sat studying the parchment. There was a minute's silence.

"I have it!" he exclaimed triumphantly. "I will be mistaken for Sir Simon. I will wait for a dark night, and I will go down to the mill-stream dressed as Sir Simon. Have you any old coats of that period? If not, I'll run up to London and get one. Then, if I am accidentally seen, I shall be merely a ghost taking his usual exercise."

"Splendid," cried Bridget. "Mother, have we any old clothes of Sir Simon's time?"

"Not of so early a date as that; but in the blue garret I think there are some of the time of the first George, or, perhaps, of Anne. Will not these be quaint enough, if you really mean to try this scheme, George?"

Mrs. Wynyard smiled on the young man as she spoke. She liked him, and, therefore, was ready to fall in with any idea that he suggested; but this notion seemed to her a mere freak of youth. It might, she thought, amuse him and the girls. As for the box, she did not believe it was there. Doubtless, it had been removed by the priest, and squandered by Sir Simon.

"Oh, yes, I shall certainly try, Mrs. Wynyard," Medlycott replied. "The very first stormy night will see me personating your family ghost, if you will pardon the liberty?"

"You had better ask Sir Simon to excuse you," said Bridget, laughing.

"Suppose we should see both of you, the real and the sham ghosts, walking together up the garden? Ugh! how deliciously horrid!"

"I wish you had no such creepy fancies!" But, notwithstanding her protest, Cynthia laughed with the others.

They were merry enough, too, when they trooped up to the old blue garret, startling the spiders, and disturbing the dust of years.

"Why haven't we come up here long ago, Cynthia?"

Bridget made this remark in meditative surprise as they opened ancient trunks and pulled out garlands of bygone days.

"I did come once, but there seemed to be nothing very pretty. I did not look in all the boxes, though. This is a smart coat!" holding up a mulberry-coloured satin that goldsmiths might have worn.

"Won't that do? Suppose I try it on?"

Medlycott threw off his own coat, and struggled into the mulberry satin. It had been made for a smaller man than the Australian.

"When I begin digging for that treasure," he remarked, giving a pull to the lapels, "this gorgeous garment will split across the back!"

"That will not matter," said Cynthia. "You are supposed to be Sir Simon, and it will not be wonderful if his clothes show signs of wear, considering that he has walked about in them for more than two centuries."

"And in such weather!" chimed in Bridget, and their laughter rang through the old attic, little used to such merriment.

"If I had a hat of some odd sort, I should do," pursued George, surveying himself in a cracked mirror. "On a dark night nobody will notice my nineteenth-century waistcoat and trousers."

Bridget rummaged in the old trunk.

"There must be a hat somewhere! Oh, yes! here is a red one, three-cornered, and turned up with gold lace!"

"The very thing!" Medlycott put it on. "Now I am complete!" He regarded himself in the mirror with much satisfaction. "Had I not better take this brilliant attire to my own room, ready for the first stormy night?"

"Take care the servants don't see the things," Cynthia warned him, "or your ghostship will be discredited."

"I'll lock them up. I wish we knew the Finnish charm for rain and wind; we would get up an especial storm. I'll find that box, if I spend whole nights in the mill-stream in company with Sir Simon."

CHAPTER III.

THE TREASURE.

NEARLY three weeks elapsed before Medlycott could put his idea into execution—three weeks of mild, sunny weather; spent by the Wynyards and their guest in joyous wanderings about the country during the short golden days. And how happy the long, cosy evenings were! Poor Mrs. Wynyard brightened visibly under the stimulus of the young man's presence.

Digitized by Google

"How dull we shall be when you are gone!" Bridget exclaimed one day.

"Not at all," he promptly responded, "I mean to take all three of you back with me. I have arranged the programme. I find that hidden treasure; I wait till you have settled matters, then you come on a long, long visit to my mother, and probably you end by remaining altogether in Australia."

It was not the first time he had said this, smiling confidently. Mrs. Wynyard would smile, too, but shake her head. Bridget was quite ready to go, but doubtful as to whether she would remain. Cynthia made no comment, yet the Australian did not seem abashed by her silence; rather the reverse, for her sister observed that he addressed his remarks more particularly to Cynthia than to the others.

At last came a dark night, with gusty showers, and Medlycott announced his intention of setting off as soon as the sound of the mill-wheel ceased. He had carefully noted the stones built in the bank on the right of the wheel, and was sure he had detected the one "in shape somewhat like a heart," and would be able to find it in the dark.

The mill-wheel ceased its song at seven o'clock that evening; but Medlycott resolved to wait till Lulham had gone to sleep.

It was nearly eleven when, attired in the mulberry satin coat and gold-laced cocked hat, and carrying a spade and mattock, he stole out of a side door into the shrubbery path leading to the river.

"How it rains! do take an umbrella," whispered Cynthia.

Whereupon both he and Bridget burst into smothered laughter, restrained lest their mirth should attract the notice of any chance wayfarer.

"Am I not incongruous enough already?" he whispered back. "I'm the ghost of a roystering cavalier, dressed in a Victorian shooting suit, a coat of Queen Anne, a hat that might have been worn by Butcher Cumberland, and I am carrying a mattock and spade. Must I add an umbrella?"

He disappeared in the darkness, still laughing, and the girls returned to the Prior's parlour, where Mrs. Wynyard sat by the fire, prophesying failure.

The night was not particularly cold; the west wind was mild, despite its violence. It rushed shrieking through the trees and whistled and moaned over the river.

Medlycott glanced back as he crossed the little bridge. There was no light in any house, save that gleaming from the Priory. He looked up at the mill, it was dark and silent; the miller's house dark likewise. Here, at his feet, was the great wheel, quiet now in one of its brief pauses from labour; here, also, was the soft lapping of the checked stream, so different from the swollen rush of the river at his back.

He let himself cautiously down into the water, it was not deep, he had ascertained that. Not daring to strike a light lest the glimmer should be observed, he felt, for the heart-shaped stone, and proceeded to dig it out of the bank. Owing to the darkness, his progress was slow. By-and-bye, he heard the church clock strike twelve. Steadily he worked on; the stone was becoming loose. He dug harder; the fragments of earth slipped down into the water; then a heavier splash, and the stone was gone!—lying at his feet in the stream.

He felt in the hole: there seemed to be nothing but earth. Carefully he put in the spade, it struck something hard—metallic; and in a minute or two more, Medlycott had dug out a square, heavy box. He could scarcely refrain from uttering a shout of triumph as he clambered out of the mill-stream.

His head and shoulders were just rising above the bank, when he was startled by a yell of affright from the bridge, and saw in the dim light a boy running wildly back towards the village.

They opened the ancient trunks.

Wondering what could have brought the lad out so late, George took to his heels with as much alacrity as the boy had done, and ran across the bridge into the Priory grounds as hard as he could, fearing the shout had roused the miller's family.

The side door had been left unlocked, and he and a gust of wind and a shower of rain drops all burst in together.

"Well!" cried the girls in concert, rushing out of the Prior's parlour to meet him.

"I've got it!" holding out the box triumphantly; "and as I was scrambling out of the stream a boy on the bridge raised a blood-curdling yell, enough to wake the whole place; so I've had to run for it!"

"And you are so wet!" exclaimed Cynthia, perceiving that he was already standing in a little pool that had dripped from his garments.

"I'll give this to Mrs. Wynyard, and then change my clothes. I'm not fit to come into a room."

Mrs. Wynyard's astonishment on beholding the box—a real, tangible iron box—was extreme; but after the first moment's amazement, she recovered herself, and said:

"How clever and good of you, George! I fear however, it will be found empty. That man whom the priest did not trust—the miller's son—you know, probably emptied it and replaced it."

Digitized by Google

The girls' faces elongated; but Medlycott said cheerfully:

"It is too heavy to be empty, Mrs. Wynyard."

"Ah," lugubriously. "Then he filled it with brickbats. Do go and put on dry things, George, or you will be ill. There is some hot coffee ready for you."

He laughingly protested against the brickbats, and disappeared upstairs, while the girls debated the question of brickbats versus jewels.

"To find a treasure is too good to happen to us." Yet even as she uttered these gloomy sentiments, Mrs. Wynyard's face gleamed with a faint hope that the rusted box might contain release from the poverty which kept her daughters hopelessly immured in Lulham Priory.

She clasped her hands tightly when Medlycott returned and applied himself to opening the chest. Inside, in bags, and wrappings, were the money and jewels of the good priest's list.

"Now, who was right?" asked Medlycott. "No brickbats here, Mrs. Wynyard! Here are the two thousand angels," pouring the coins out on the table.

"And the standing-cup of gold," said Bridget, pulling off its coverings.

"And the gold image of St Katherine garnished with three sapphires and thirty-seven pearls," said Cynthia, holding up the statuette. "Mother, are they not lovely? What a pity that we must sell all these things."

Perhaps it was a pity, but one must be wealthy to retain such jewels for the mere pleasure of looking at them. The contents of the box realised over five thousand pounds; a sum sufficient, added to what they already possessed, to give the Wynyards that key to the outer world which they so much desired. Henceforth, they were not obliged to live in Lulham; and as though Fortune must needs give with both hands, it occurred to a wealthy man that the Priory, being situated within reach of two packs of hounds, would suit him as a hunting-box. Whereupon he bought it; and the money, though not a large sum, made a further and welcome addition to the Wynyards' income.

George Medlycott helped to settle all these matters.

"What can I do to express our gratitude to you?" said Mrs. Wynyard to him one bright February morning. "You have been like a son to me."

"That is what I wish to be," he replied, smiling. "Cynthia has promised to return to Australia with me. We hope to persuade you and Bridget to accompany us."

Again was Mrs. Wynyard boundlessly astonished—delightedly amazed.

"Did you know anything of this, Bridget?" she asked her younger daughter, when they were alone.

"Of course, mother. I saw it from the first. Cynthia wishes to be married at Lulham church. There will be just time for the wedding before we leave the Priory."

The village, consisting of the inhabitants of the two cottages, the mill, the rectory, and the clerk's house, was much excited by the news of Cynthia's engagement, and the Wynyards' intended departure.

"Ah," said the miller to Bridget, "we'll be sorry to lose ye; but we might ha' known ye were bound to leave the place afore long. One bad night in December, Joe Tyler's lad wur coomin' to my missus past midnight fur to borrow peppermint cordial fur his grandam, when he see Sir Simon as plain as life, arising from under the mill-wheel, wheer he wur laid, as ye know, Miss Bridget. Th' lad wur that scared he run whoam, an' his father had to coom fur th' peppermint instead. An' the next morn a big stone wur gone out of the bank theer"—the miller pointed to the right of the splashing wheel—"leaving a big hole, too! I got it up, and put it back, thinkin' it wur accident. But I see now it wur Sir Simon a-burstin' out, ready to go wi' ye. That's what it wur, Miss Bridget; he wuldna' be left behind, no matter how tight they'd laid him. Though I'd an idea he wur right under the wheel," added the miller reflectively; "but happen he wur bound to coom out sideways loike."

Which speech of the miller's gave Medlycott extreme delight when Bridget repeated it to him.

So the belief lingers in Lulham that Sir Simon broke his ghostly bonds to accompany his descendants to Australia, where Cynthia Medlycott sits in a verandah, heavy with stephanotis and bougainvillea.

Mrs. Wynyard lives with the Medlycotts; but Bridget has married the great traveller, Kent Laidlaw, and they have set off to explore the ruined cities of some of the South American countries.

"I do not believe, George," says Cynthia to her husband, "they will ever find anything so exciting as that grille you discovered on Sir Jocelyn's tomb."

C. L. A.

TO PRETTY GIRLS ALL!

ISOBEL'S HOME NOTES is quite the best Penny Paper for Ladies. It is published every Thursday, and may be obtained of any newsagent throughout the kingdom.

It is profusely and artistically illustrated, and contains, besides a good serial novel and a short story, articles on "Health," "Cookery," "The Management of Children," "The Toilette," and a variety of interesting articles and poetry by the best writers.

Isobel's Fashions for Children
Published on the 15th of each month.
Price 1½d., Post Free 2½d.

Isobel's Dressmaking at Home
Published on the 1st of each month.
Price 1½d., Post Free 2½d.

EVERY COPY OF THESE TWO PAPERS CONTAINS A FREE PAPER PATTERN.

Digitized by Google

RURAL HEROES.

A Story of the Franco-German War.

FROM THE FRENCH OF LABARRION.

CHAPTER I.

JEAN PEGOLAN, owner of a farm in the village of Eyvettes, is in high good humour this evening.

About him the dry leaves are dancing in the melancholy autumn wind and the sun is darting long, reddish rays through the bare boughs; above, the sky is blue as blue can be; and from the woods rises a pungent, aromatic odour. Jean Pegolan, sentient through his tough hide, of some small part of all this poetry, this serenity of nature, whips up the grey with a will and turns her head homeward.

It is quite true, to be sure, that the Prussians are marching on Paris, that here they have sacked a village, there burned a farm to the ground, and further on shot some poor, inoffensive creatures dead. But, I ask you, what difference can that possibly make to Jean Pegolan? Neither his house, nor his cattle, nor his crops, have suffered in the least from the invasion. He saw some of the enemy at the neighbouring town, where he has just been to sell some of the produce of his farm, and, dear me, he has not found that they are such monsters. They are men like any others.

When he has passed the Green-Cross and sees the village before him, with its church steeple of grey slate and the gilt weather-vane shining in the sunset, our honest farmer has a vision of the steaming dish of soup which awaits him on the table at home, that brings the water to his mouth.

"Hi! Get up!" But instead of "getting up" the grey comes to a sudden standstill.

A Prussian estafette, in passing, has seized her bridle, and sharply turns her out of the way. Then as Pegolan is too slow in making room, he raises his whip and slashes it across the farmer's face, from ear to ear.

Certainly, Jean Pegolan has always expressed the greatest respect for the conqueror, but, this time, rage gets the better of him. He rises to his feet, seizes one of the benches of the cart and the Prussian rolls off his horse the next moment, with a broken skull.

The shadows are growing deeper across the road, the woods are very still, the moon is creeping up the horizon half-hidden behind a transparent veil of clouds.

Pegolan, who is now trembling in every limb, looks furtively about him. No one has seen the deed. His Prussian lies there in the ditch, kicking convulsively, face downwards. As for him, he will assuredly tell no tales!

"Come, get up! Hi!"

And the grey starts off at a gallop.

CHAPTER II.

THEY have all been pushed and locked into the church like a flock of sheep. There they are, sitting in groups in the nave, some very pale, others very red, all silent, their throats contracted by fright. A crude white light falls from the windows of unstained glass and throws large pale squares on the peasants' blue frocks or illumines pitilessly some faces upon which abject fear may be read in the drawn mouth and pinched nostrils. In the back of the sanctuary, over the altar, with an unlit taper on either side, a large plaster crucifix hangs—the tortured limbs stretched and racked, the outspread arms seeming to implore pardon and pity for all. Faint heavy odours of autumnal foliage come from the neighbouring cemetery, and one hears the chirping of the sparrows disputing among themselves amidst the gravestones.

The night before, a Prussian patrol had found, near the Green Cross, the body of a murdered soldier. It is necessary to make an example. And so, since dawn, a battalion of chasseurs have invaded the village and, by order of the commanding officer, have imprisoned within the church walls every able-bodied man in the community. That morning—until the stroke of noon—has been given them to point out the guilty one or to make personal confession; that hour has passed, one of the men will be picked out at random, and the village burned.

And now it is 11.30 o'clock.

Oh! If they only knew the murderer, the assassin, the bandit, who has brought all this upon them, while they were vegetating along tranquilly in the midst of the ruins of their country, how gladly and quickly would they, good people, denounce him! If necessary they would wreak vengeance upon him with their own hands. But they do not know him; and meantime the minutes hurry on, and none dare take the initiative, none assume the responsibility of singling out the criminal.

He who could solve their perplexities, who might cry: "I am the murderer, the assassin, the bandit!"—he, Jean Pegolan, is very careful not to breathe a word.

He sits in the shadow of the confessional, with his sealskin cap drawn over his eyes and his heart beating wildly within him, and thinks of his wife, who is so dainty and so kissable; of his cows, who are comfortable in their stalls; of his hay, all well stowed away in his lofts, and he tells himself that to die would be to leave all that to all eternity, that one only dies once, that he would be very much of a fool to give himself up to justice, and that after all, he never killed the Prussian intentionally. The reasonings suffice to quiet his conscience. If the choice happens to fall on an innocent man—well, my faith, it cannot be helped. Everyone's surely bound to look after himself in this base world.

Hark! the clock, a quarter to twelve. Only a quarter of an hour left.

The last stroke dies away in slow vibrations and silence hangs again under the high vaulted ceiling like some invisible presence. The heavy rhythmic tread of troops approaching, then stopping, sounds from without. A hoarse cry of command, next, multitudinous guns strike the ground, with a dull thud.

A decision must be reached—and at once.

Some one speaks a name—in a whisper only—yet everyone heard it.

Then, hastily, hurriedly, with the feverish eagerness of people who dread death, everyone repeats it. Jean

Digitized by Google

Pegolan, the Eyvettes farmer, draws a long breath. The name is not his.

It is that of a poor devil, half-woodcutter, half-poacher, a Red Republican, who voted a "nay" at the last elections.

He has a sick wife and three little children, the eldest of whom can but barely walk, and these will be left without bread by his death. But that cannot be helped. Perhaps the fellow did not do the deed. But then he was quite capable of doing it. Besides, he is only a poor wretch, while they are all comfortable farmers, in easy circumstances. Justice above all things.

In vain does the poor wretch protest his innocence. The evening before, he was ailing—a wrench he got in felling a tree. He had been on his bed without stirring, all day. They could make inquiries. They would see he had not been out of his house. All in vain does he throw himself at their feet, his voice choked with anguish and fear. All in vain does he invoke their pity. What is to become of his children if he is to die? His wife will never be equal to the task of providing for them.

No one answers. Pegolan, in his corner, sits in a cold perspiration, fearing some change of opinion, some sudden relenting. But the others are only too happy to have come to some conclusion. They ask but one thing now, to be speedily rid of this man who moans before them, tearing his hair, and reproaching them for their ferocious egotism, their monstrous cruelty.

The door is thrown wide open and beyond it rises a forest of bayonets filling the small square, and nearer to the threshold the group of men charged with the execution have gathered, and the fatal instrument of death shines again in the warm, white light of noon.

And twelve o'clock strikes.

There is a cry broken by a detonation, and the smoke clearing away, the body of the woodcutter and poacher is seen lying on the steps of the church, and stiffening there, while one by one those men pass out beside it, the blood staining the soles of their feet. And the Prussian officers, with looks of speechless contempt, turn away revolted.

CHAPTER III.

Jean Pegolan has gained his own abode once more.

Heavens! But it is pleasant to be safe at home again after such an adventure! The chickens are clucking and scratching about in the barnyard, the pigeons are cooing on the roof, the ducks are waddling around a tiny pond that shines softly in the sun; from the stable, where the Prussians have not entered, comes the mellow lowing of the milch cows, and the grey's strident neighing forms a response. Sheaves of wheat are piled up with a golden luxuriance, in the coach-house, and the hay in stacks, shows at all the windows of the loft.

The farmer shakes himself; his clothes are still moist with perspiration. He enters the house and sees his wife in tears on her knees beside the bed. She starts up at the sound of his step, and stands before him, white as a spectre.

"What!" in a shrill voice. "You are not dead?"

Pegolan, stunned by this reception, stares mutely.

"It was you who killed the Prussian at the Green Cross! Don't deny it! I saw the blood on your blouse this morning!"

"Sh!—sh! It's true—but—don't denounce me, for pity's sake!"

"Ah!" cried the woman with unutterable disgust. "You needn't be afraid now! You know it's too late, and you have allowed another man to be shot in your place!"

"It isn't my fault, is it? I didn't say anything. It was the Mayor who picked out the other one."

"So! Well, do you know what, Pegolan? You're a blackguard! Good-bye!"

Pegolan lets himself drop into a chair, with flaccid legs, and something like remorse seizing him inwardly. For one moment his infamy is borne in upon him by the lightning flash of conscience. Good Lord! One isn't perfect. And as the carriage that is bearing away his wife to her father rolls out of sight he is still sitting there, all upset.

But these impressions wear away, little by little. Evening comes on, and the Prussians have left village with fifes and drums, abandoning to their fate the three children and the wife of the woodcutter, who will die of hunger. And Jean Pegolan has recovered all his good spirits!

What will you?

His farm is safe!

RESULT OF PICTURE PUZZLE COMPETITION.

A very large proportion of those readers who entered for the Picture Puzzle Competition announced in Short Stories for April 25th succeeded in putting the squares together correctly. It has been decided to award the prize of £10 to the competitor who forwarded the neatest correct solution, and the fortunate person is Miss M. Belchier, 50, Avenue Road, South Tottenham, N.

The fifty readers whose names appear below have each been sent a gold-plated pencil-case as a consolation prize for the correctness and neatness of their attempt:

W. Hood, 16, Broadway, Stratford, London.
Miss E. Scarborough, 1, Palace Crescent, East Molesey, Surrey.
J. Waller, 18, St. John's Hill, Clapham Junction.
J. H. Hudson, 15, Tivoli Road, Crouch End.
M. E. Turner-Newton, 19, Queen's Road, Brighton.
C. H. Fisher, 127, Mornington Road, Leytonstone.
G. Bawyard, 163, Gwyder Street, Mill Road, Cambridge.
A. Hook, 9, Canterbury Place, Lambeth Road.
Miss A. Pugh, 10, Willington Road, Landor Road, Stockwell.
W. Martinyant, 212, Algernon Road, Ladywell.
W. Cater, 28, Palmerston Road, Forest Gate.
A. E. Bowles, 35, Weston Street, Bradford, Yorks.
B. C. Smythe, St. Anne's House, Lewes.
Mrs. Armstrong, 17, Elm Grove, Eccles New Road, Manchester.
A. Sproat, 1, Elm Grove, Eccles New Road, Weaste, Manchester.
J. Ward, 227, Tonge Moor Road, Bolton, Lancashire.
E. J. Embleton, 60, Victoria Road, Aldershot.
G. K. Stubbs, 29, Park Street, Macclesfield.
L. Carletti, 89, Malpas Road, Brockley.
Mrs. M. Gatsell, 61, Ravensworth View, Rectory Road, Gateshead.
Miss M. Clarkson, "Swinfield," Cantilupe Street, Hereford.
S. H. King, Laurel Cottage, Great Berkhamsted.
Miss L. Adair, 21, Crawford Square, Londonderry, Ireland.
W. H. Jones, 7, Llewelyn Street, Sketty, Swansea.
Mrs. H. J. Callander, 6, Brunton Terrace, Sunderland, Durham.
W. Mills, Percy House, Old Trafford, Manchester.
S. V. Key, West Brom Street, Oldbury, near Bingham.
F. E. Sparrow, 80, Burns Road, Harlesden, N.W.
Miss A. Winter, Albert Villa, Bishopston, Bristol.
A. Wake, 6, Chesham Road, Brighton.
Mrs. G. Archer, 5, South Terrace, Bury Street, Lower Edmonton.
W. H. Barrett, 178, Tindal Street, Balsall Heath, Birmingham.
F. H. Bottom, 190, Brooke Road, Clapton.
Mrs. S. J. Peacock, 72, Oxford Street, South Bank, Yorkshire.
H. Walker, 18, Cottrill Road, Dalston Lane, Hackney.
E. Newman, 2, Thanet Villas, Hanworth Road, Hounslow.
T. W. Lewis, Oswald Road, Oswestry, Salop.
H. W. Tinsley, 46, Rye Lane, Peckham.
N. G. Chambers, Belle Vue House, Durham.
J. A. Raven, 59, Alvington Crescent, High Street, Kingsland.
F. Santaubien, 11, Inverness Terrace, Burlington Road, S.W.
Miss F. Nuttall, 10, Stretton Road, The Fosse, Leicester.
R. Byford, 112, Caledonian Road, N.
J. R. Bell, 8, Great College Street, Westminster.
J. Needham, Lea Road, Gainsboro'.
S. M. Anderson, 5, Eldon Place, Barres Bridge, Newcastle-on-Tyne.
W. Robinson, 3, Landseer Street, Battersea Park Road.
G. T. Leake, 8, Rauleagh Road, South Belgravia, S.W.
G. Taylor, 28, Ernest Street, Rhyl, North Wales.
C. E. Warburton, Stocks View, Flixton, Manchester.

Digitized by Google

LEGENDS OF WOLFVILLE.

BY "DAN QUINN."

Wolfville is a Cattleman's Settlement in Arizona, and the Characters in these Legends are Cowboys.

No. 10.—The Racial Antipathy of Mr. Enright.

"If my memory's dealin' a square game," remarked the old cattleman, as he moved his chair a bit more into the shade, "it's some'ers over on the foothills of the Floridas when Enright vouchsafes why he hates Mexicans.

"'Not that I loathes so much as I deplores 'em,' says Enright, the time I speaks of. 'However, I don't aim to be held as indorsin' of 'em or excusin' their existence; none whatever.'

"Enright's tellin' of this tale arises outen a trivial incident which a Mexican is the marrow of. We're out on the spring round-up an' we're combin' the draws an' dry arroyas over between the cow springs an' the Floridas, when one night a Mexican runs off a passel of our ponies.

"The hoss-bustler is asleep, I reckons, at the time this Mexican stacks in. He says himse'f he's layin' along the back of his bronco gazin' at the stars when the robber jumps at the ponies an' flaps a blanket or somethin,' an' away patters every hoof in the band.

"This yere Mexican don't run off with only about a handful. I takes it he can't round-up no more in the dark. When you stampedes a bunch of ponies that way they don't hold together like cattle, but plunges off diffusive. It's every bronco for himse'f, disdainful of all else, an' when it's sun-up you finds 'em spattered all over the scene an' not regardin' of each other much.

"But this yere Mexican, after he stampedes 'em huddles what he can together, as I says, mebby it's a dozen—and p'ints off into the hills.

"Of course it ain't no time when the sun shows the tracks till Enright, Jack Moore an' myse'f is on the trail. Tutt an' Dan Boggs wants so many from the round-up.

"It's one of the stolen ponies tips this greaser's hand. It's the second day and we all loses the trail, mebby it's fifteen minutes, an' we're smellin' along a canyon to find it agin, when from over a p'int of rocks we hears a bronco nicker. He gets the scent of an acquaintance which Moore's ridin' that away an' says 'How?' pony fashion.

"Thar's no need goin' into wearyin' details. Follerin' the nicker we comes surgin' in on our prey an' it's all over in a minute. Thar's two Mexicans, our criminal trackin' up with a pard that mornin'. But, of course, we all knows he's thar long hours back by the tracks, an' so it ain't no surprise.

"This yere second Mexican is downed on the go in. He shows a heap of interest in our comin' an' takes to shootin' us up mighty vivid, with a Winchester at the time, an' so Enright, who's close in by him, stretches him. He don't manage to do no harm, nohow, more'n he creases my hoss a little. However, as this yere hoss is some slothful an' bein' burnt that way with a bullet across the laig sorter livens him up a heap, I don't complain none. Still, Enright's all wise enough to copper the greaser for thar ain't no sayin' what luck the felon has with that little gun of his if he keeps on shootin'. So, as I observes, Enright downs him, an' his power-burnin' an' hoss-rustin' stops immejit.

"As for the other Mexican, which he's the party who jumps our ponies in the first place, he throws up' his hands an' allows he cashes in his chips for whatever the bank says.

"So we all ropes out our captive; sorter hog-ties him hand an' foot, wrist and fetlock that night, an' goes into camp all comfortable, where we runs up on our game.

"'Whatever be we goin' to do with this yere hoss-thief prisoner of ours?' says Jack Moore to Enright, the next day when we're saddlin' up an organisin' to pull our freight. 'He's shore due to bother us a lot. We're plumb sixty miles from Tutt an' the boys, an' ridin', herd on this yere saddle-coloured gent a-keepin' of him from lopin' off, is mighty likely to be a heap exhaustive. I knows men,' Jack remarks at the close, lookin' wistful at Enright, 'as would beef him right yere an' leave him as a companion piece to that capadre of his you downs.'

"'Natures as would execute a prisoner in cold blood, which I don't mean they is low, neither but it's speshul inconsiderate that away to go an' ca'mly kill a prisoner an' no court or committee authorisin' the same. I never knows of it bein' done but once. It's Mexicans who does it then; which is why they ain't none popular with me since.'

"'It's shore you calls a mighty indurated play, some he'pless man you've took that away, but as I states it's due to bein' a heap fatiguin' keepin' cases on this yere Mexican till we meets up with a quorum of the committee. Still it's our dooty an' of course we don't deal double nor put back cards on what's our plain dooty.'

"'What you states,' says Enright, 'is to your credit. but I'll tell you. Thar ain't no harm mountin' this yere marauder on a slow pony that away; an' bein' humane sufficient to leave his hands an' feet untied. Of course, if he takes advantage of our leniency an' goes stampedin' off to make his escape some'ers along the trial I reckins you'll shorely have to shoot.'

"Well, it shore turns out this yere Mexican is ornery enough where the trail skirts the river to turn sudden an' go plungin' across. But Moore gets him in mid-stream. As he goes over the bronco's shoulder, hat first, he swings on the bridle long enough with his dyin' hand to turn the pony so it comes out agin on our side.

Digitized by Google

"'Which I'm glad he lives sufficient to head that hoss our way,' says Moore. 'It saves splashin' across after him an' wettin' your leggins a lot.'

"It's that night in camp when Moore brings up what Enright says about the time the Mexicans downs a prisoner an' fixes his views of 'em for good.

"'It's a long time back, this yarn to any excessive degree, even yet. It draws the cinch some tight an' painful, an' I don't teach my mind to dwell on it no more'n necessary.

"'This is all when I'm a boy; mebby I ain't twenty years yet. It's durin' the Mexican war. I gets a stack of white chips an' stands in on the deal in a boyish way. All I saveys of the war is it's agin the Mexicans, which, while I ain't got no feud with 'em personal at the time, makes it plenty satisfactory to me.

"'It's down off two days to the west of Chihuahua one day, an' seven of us is projectin' around seein' whatever can we tie down an' brand, when some Mexicans gets us out on a limb. It ain't what you calls a square deal; still I reckons it's square enough, too; only it's what you calls strategic, which is offensive an' sneakin' as a play.

"'This yere Lieutenant who's leadin' us 'round permiscus, looks like he's some romantic about a young Mexican female, who's called the Princess of Casa Grande, which the repoote of this yere princess woman is bad, an' I strikes a story several times how she's that incensed agin Americans she saws off a dose of loco on a captain in some whisky he's allowin' to drink, an' he goes plumb crazy an' is led away home, where he dies.

"'But loco or no loco, this yere princess person is shore that good lookin' a pinto pony don't compare thar with, an' she gets her black eyes on this Lieutenant, an' that settles it. We rounds up her hacienda an' goes into camp.

"'Besides the Lieutenant thar's six of us. One of 'em's a shorthorn, just my age, which his name's Willis—Jim Willis.

"'Now I ain't out to make no descriptions of the friendship which goes on between this yere Willis an' me. I sees a show one time, when pesterin' round back in St. Looey—an I'm yere to remark I don't go that far East no more—which takes on about a couple of sports, who's named Damon an' Pythias. These two people's all right, an' game square folks; an' they shore deems high of one another. But at the time I sees this yere Damon an' Pythias, I says to myse'f, an' ever since I makes no hesitatin' assertion tharof, that the brotherly views them two gents entertains ain't a marker to Jim Willis an' me.

"'This yere Jim I knows since we're yearlin's. We jumps outen the corral together, an' goes surgin' off into the Mexican war like twins. An' bein' two boys that away among a lot of men, I allows thar ain't nuthin' before, then, nor after, which I loves like Jim.

"'As I observes, Jim an' me's in the outfit, when this yere Lieutenant comes trackin' around that Princess of Casa Grande which her love for him is a bluff an' a deadfall; an' the same gets all of us before we're through. An' it gets my Jim Willis speshul.

"'Mebby it's the third mornin' after we all meanders into this nest of Mexicans an' the Lieutenant lines out for that Princess of Casa Grande. We ain't been turnin' out early nohow, thar bein' nuthin' to turn out about; but this third mornin' somebody arouses us a heap vigorous, like they aims to transact some business with us. Which they shortly did; it's an outfit of greasier guerillas, an' we-all ain't nuthin' more or less than captives.

"'The ornery an' ongrateful part is that the Princess sends one of her own peonies scoutin' round in the hills to bring in this band of cattle-eaters on to us.

"'When the Lieutenant hears of the perfidy of this Princess female he's that mortified he gets a pistol the first jump he makes, an' blows off the top of his head.

"'Which, if he only blows off the top of hers, it would have gone a heap further with the rest of us. If he'd consulted any of us, it would shorely have been advised. But he makes at impulsive play that away, an' is that sore and chagrined, jest as I spreads it before you, he grabs a gun in a frenzied way, an' cashes his chips abrupt.

"'No, as I states,' says Enright, musin' to himself, 'if the Lieutenant had only downed that Princess who plays us in as prisoners so smooth an' easy, it would have been regarded he could have gone caperin' over the brink after her with the bridle off the next second an' we still talk well of him.

"'As it is, however, this riotous female don't last two months. Which it's also a fact that takin' us at that time must have been a heap onlucky for them greasers. Thar's nine of 'em, an' every last one dies in the next five months; an' never a one, nor yet the Princess, knows what the're against when they quits; or what breeze blows their light out. I knows, because me an' a party whose name is Tate—Bill Tate—never leaves them hills till the last of that outfit's got his heap of rocks piled up, with his little pine cross stickin' outen the peak tharof, showin' he's done jumped this earthly game for good.

"'This Bill Tate an' me breaks camp on these greasers together, while they're tankin' up on mescal, mebby it's two days later; an' they never got their lariats on us no more.

"'"You ain't got no dates; no speshul engagements with nobody in the States, have you?" says Tate to me when we're safe outen these Mexican hands.

"'"No," says I, "whatever makes you ask?"

"'"Oh, nuthin," says Tate lookin' at the sky sorter black an ugly, "only since you has the elegant leesure, what for a play would it be to make a long camp back in these hills by some water-hole some'ers, an' stand pat ontil we downs these yere greasers—squaw an' all—who's had us treed? It oughter be did; an' if we all don't do it none, it's a heap likely it's goin' to be neglected an' overlooked complete. It's too easy as a play; every horse thief of 'em lives right in these yere valleys, for I hears 'em talk. All we has to do is sa'nter back in the hills a whole lot, make a camp, an' pains we bushwacks an' kills the last one."

"'The way I feels about Willis makes the prospect mighty allurin', an' tharupon Tate an' me opens a game with these Mexicans it takes five months to deal.

"'But it's dealt plumb out, an' we win. When Tate crosses the Rio Grande with the army goin' back, he shorely has the skelp of every Mexican concarned.

"'But I wander from Willis. Where was I when I bogs down? As I says, this Lieutenant nabs a pistol an' goes flutterin' from his roost. But this don't do for these greasers. They puts up a claim that some American track up on one of their outfit an' kills him off, they says five days before. They allows that breakin' even on the deal one of us is due to die. Tate offers to let 'em count the Lieutenant, but they shakes their heads till the little bells on their sombreros tinklen, an' declines the Lieutenant emphatic.

Digitized by Google

"'They p'ints out this yere Lieutenant dies in his own game, on his own deal. It's no racket of theirs an' it don't go to match the man they're shy.

"'One of us six who's left has to die to count even for this greaser who's been called in them five days. Tate can't move 'em; all he says is no use, so he quits, an' as he's been talkin' Spanish, which the same is too muddy a language for the rest of us, Tate turns in an' tel's us how the thing stacks up.

"'"One of us is shorely elected to trail out after the Lieutenant," says Tate. "The rest they holds as prisoners. Either way, she's goin' to be a hard deep crossin' an' one's about as rough a toss as the other."

"'After a brief pow-wow the greaser who's actin' range boss for the outfit puts six beans in a buckskin bag. Five is white an' one's black. These greasers are on the gamble bigger'n wolves, an' they crowds round plenty gleeful to see us take a gambler's chance for our lives. The one of us who draws the black bean is to line out after the Lieutenant.

"'Sayin' something in Spanish which most likely means "Age before beauty," the Mexican makes Willis an' me stand back while the four others searches one after the other into the bag for his bean.

"'Tate goes first an' wins a white bean.

"'Then a shiftless, no-count party whom we all call "Chicken Bill," reaches in. I shorely hopes, seein' it's bound to be somebody, that this Chicken Bill acquires the black bean. But luck's agin us, Chicken Bill backs out with a white bean.

"'When the third turns out a white bean the shadow begins to fall across Jim Willis an' me. I looks at Jim, an' I gives it to you straight when I says that I ain't at that time thinkin' of myse'f so much as about Jim. To see this yere deal, black as midnight, closin' in on Jim is what's hurtin'; it don't somehow occur to me I'm likewise agin the iron myself.

"'"Looks like this yere amiable device of them greasers is due to run its brand on to one of us," says Jim to me, as I looks at him.

"'An' then, as the fourth man finds a white bean in the bag, an draws a deep sigh an' stands back, Jim says: "Well Sam, it's down to us."

"'Then Jim looks at me keen an' steady a whole lot; an' the Mexicans rather enjoyin' of the situation, ain't goadin' of us to hurry up none.

"'Now, when it's to Jim an' me they select me as the one to p'int up the next bean. Jim's still lookin' at me hard, an I sees the water start in his eye.

"'"Let me have your draw, Sam," he says.

"'"Shore," I replies, standin' a step off from the bag. "It's yours too quick."

"'But the Mexicans don't see it that away. It's my turn and my draw, an' Jim has to take what's left. So the Mexicans tells Tate to send me after my bean agin.

"'"Hold on a second, Sam," says Jim, an' by this time he's as steady as a church.

"'"Sam," he goes on, "thar's no use you all gettin' the short end of this. Thars reasons for you livin'; which my case is void tharof. Now let me ask you; are you up on beans? Can you tell a black from a white bean by the feel?"

"'"No," I says, "beans is all a heap the same to me."

"'"That's what I allows," goes on this Jim. "Now yere's where my sooperior knowledge gets in. If these Mexicans had let me draw for you I fixes it easy, but it looks like they has scrooples. But I listen to what I tells you, an' you beats the deal as it is. Thar's a difference in beans sames as in ponies. A black bean is rough like a cactus compared to white beans, which said last vegetable is shorely as sleek an' smooth as glass. Now here's what you does. Jest grope an' scout 'round in that bag till you picks out the smooth bean. That's your bean; that's the white bean. Cinch the smooth bean an' the black comes to me."

"'When Jim says all this it seems like I'm in a daze an' sorter woozy. I never doubt him for a moment. Of course I don't take no advantage of what he says.

"'I recalls the advice my old mother gives me; it's long enough ago now. The old lady says: "Samyul, never you let me hear of your weakenin'. Be a man, or a mouse, or a long-tail rat." So, when Jim lays it off about these two beans bein' smooth an' rough that way; an' the white bein' the smooth bean, I nacherally searches out the rough bean, allowin' she'll shore be black, which shows my intellect's can't cope with Jim's none.

"'The bean I bring to the surface is white an' pale as a ghost. My heart wilts inside of me, an' I feels white as the bean where it lays in my hand. Of course I'm some young them days, an' I feels white as the bean where it lays in my hand. Of course I'm some young them days, and it don't need so much to stagger me.

"'I recollects like it was in a dream hearin' Jim laugh.

"'"Sam," he says, "I reads you like so much sunshine. An' I shorely fools you up a lot. Don't you reckon I allows you'll double on the trail, p'int south if I says no'th at a show like this? The white bean is allers the rough, sandy bean; allers was an' allers will be; an' never let no one fool you up agin. An' now, Sam, adios."

"'I'm still standin' lookin' at the white bean. I feels Jim grip my other hand, as he says, "Adios," an' the next I hears is the bang of the Mexicans' guns. I starts up, some wild an' locoed, so Tate tells me, when the guns goes off. But Jim's dead then. He's out in a second, never bats an eye nor wags an ear.

"'Which now,' says Enright at the end, as he yanks his saddle 'round so he makes a piller for his head, 'which now you all is fully informed why I appears averse to greasers, I reckon I slumbers some. I never sees one I don't think of that boy Jim Willis, an' I never thinks of Jim but I wants to murder Mexicans.'

"Enright don't say no more; sorter rolls up in his blanket, drops his head in his saddle, an' lays a long time quiet, like he's asleep. Jack Moore an' me ain't sayin' nuthin', jest peerin' into the fire an' listenin' to the coyotes, without heedin' of neither. At last Enright raises his head off the saddle some.

"'Mebby it's twenty years ago when a party over on the Rio Grande allows as how Jim's aimin' to deal himse'f a hand from the bottom of the deck, when he onfolds to me about the habits of them beans. It takes seven months, a iron constitution, an' three medicine sharps, an' each as good as Doc. Peets, before he's regarded as outen danger.'"

Digitized by Google

The Great Middlewick Bank Robbery.

CHAPTER XIX.

At the same time that Alfred Taylor was talking to Miss Denton, his friend Burton was walking towards the Middlewick Bank. It was past ten o'clock, and he was confident of finding the Manager there. He wished to see him. Having resumed the disguise he wore when first he came to Middlewick he was recognised as the trusted watchman chiefly concerned in capturing the criminals—and had, it may be said, become the hero of the town. It was impossible for him not to hear the complimentary remarks continually made about him as he went along.

Here and there he saw groups of people talking together, their admiring looks and gestures leaving no doubt that he was the subject of their remarks. He caught some of the observations of those whom he met face to face and was obliged to acknowledge the salutations of smiling townspeople whom he never remembered to have seen, but who insisted upon claiming acquaintanceship.

It will be understood therefore that when he entered the bank he was respectfully greeted and no questions were asked when he walked towards the Manager's room. Of course, everyone now understood what it meant when he took the position of watchman to the bank. It was to secure a chance which could best be gained by that little subterfuge.

Jack Burton was one of the cleverest detectives in London. To him belonged the credit of outwitting and imprisoning four of the most desperate criminals of the day, for the news had spread that he had lodged another, and the last, in goal. Jack Burton, as we shall continue to call him for a short while longer, encountered a slight disappointment; when he knocked and then pushed open the door of Mr. Bryant's room, the latter was empty.

He returned and spoke to the cashier.

"Do you know when Mr. Bryant will be in?"

The cashier glanced at the clock on the wall.

"We're expecting him every moment. I can't imagine what detains him."

"I will wait a little while."

"Won't you step into his room?"

"No, thanks, I'll take the settee, that is if Warren doesn't come in and claim it," added Burton with a smile, going over and sitting down.

The visitor hoped that the Manager would not arrive for a little while. He had secured a good point of view and wanted to look around him also for a few minutes, not forgetting also to use his ears.

Rutherford was busy at his desk. He cast a glance at the visitor and then bent over his work again. That single turn of his head revealed a distressed countenance which told of an almost intolerable load he was bearing on his young shoulders.

Business was brisk for a time and then came a lull, such as is occasionally seen in similar concerns. Rutherford turned his head again, but this time it was towards the cashier, to whom he spoke so quietly that but for the unusual silence Burton would have been unable to overhear the words.

"I think I must have a rest this afternoon, Stewart."

"You don't look well," was the cashier's sympathetic response. "What's the matter, influenza?"

"No, not that, but I've been out of sorts some days now. I hope a quiet afternoon will put me right again."

"Why wait till after lunch? Go home now and get the benefit of the day."

"It sounds tempting, but it wouldn't be fair to you, with so much to do."

"I can manage very well without you."

"Thanks all the same, but I'd really rather wait till midday," and to signify the question was settled, the bookkeeper turned to his work again.

Burton arose, and with a semi-military salute to the cashier said:

"It's hardly worth while my waiting longer for Mr. Bryant. I can drop in later, when he will be here."

"I'm sure he will be glad to see you," replied the cashier, returning the salutation.

At the next corner, Burton saw Mr. Bryant walking towards the bank. He had only to cross the street to greet him, but this he took care not to do. It looked as if, like his friend Taylor, he had changed his mind about wishing to meet the head of the bank.

Between two and three o'clock on the afternoon of that day, Rutherford, who had returned home under the plea of illness, came out of the door of the modest cottage with his coat closely buttoned and swinging a small cane in his hand. He walked slowly, as if with considerable suffering. He looked nervous and in need of the fresh spring air.

As he walked, he glanced to the right and left, but seeing no one in whom he was interested, moved in the direction of Mr. Bryant's residence, moderating his pace still more as he passed it, and looking up at the same window to which he had signalled some nights before.

The eyes, roving along the handsome front of the dwelling, were rewarded by a sight of Miss Denton, who was expecting him. She smiled and waved her hand; he lifted his hat in reply, and passed on. She stood at the window, gazing fondly after him as long as he was in sight, but he did not again look behind him.

At the first corner young Rutherford turned to the right and quickened his pace. The noticeable fact about his course was that he was now facing the open country and thus leaving the little town of Middlewick behind him. The further he went, the more rapidly he walked. It did not take him long to get out of Middlewick, when he struck out like a pedestrian training. He swung his light cane jauntily above his head, occasionally whipping the branches of some overhanging trees at the side of the road.

A colt was cropping the grass so close to the fence that Rutherford reached over and gave him a smart blow on his side. The startled animal, wheeled, let fly with both heels at the offender and galloped a hundred yards away in the pasture, when he stopped, faced him and snorted angrily at him as if challenging the young fellow to climb the fence and have it out. Altogether the book-keeper of the Middlewick Bank behaved like any person except an invalid.

A light farm waggon clattered along the road over the same course as that taken by Rutherford. The vehicle seemed in the last stages of dilapidation, and the single horse between the shafts made spasmodic attempts at a trot, urged thereto by the blows of his driver, the jerking of the reins, and some vigorous language. Such bursts of of speed were not continued long before the animal dropped abruptly to a walk again. This being slower than the pedestrian caused the farmer to fall behind, while the occasional spurts lessened the space between them.

The driver's appearance was in keeping with his horse and waggon. His shaggy hair fell about his shoulders from under his ragged hat. His clothes were old and of the fashion of years gone by. He sat on the right side of the single seat, holding the reins in his left hand, while his right was busily employed with the whip, which produced little effect upon the bony horse.

For half a mile the highway led through an attractive region with well-kept farms on either side. It was just the sort of spring weather for work, and numbers of boys and men were in the fields, but less than a mile away. Rutherford made another turn in the course he was following. This took him into a less frequented road and left towards a long stretch of rocky woods, which rose into hills of several hundred feet elevation beyond.

Digitized by Google

The ground being somewhat hilly and the distance to this point having been rapidly traversed, the young man showed signs of fatigue. He slackened his pace from the moment of entering on his new course. It was then that he looked searchingly around him. If he was hunting for anything, he did not find it, which fact it is to be assumed was not displeasing to him.

Meanwhile the old farmer who was having such a laborious time with his nag, turned into the less frequented road, though, as he expressed it, he was obliged almost to "almost saw his head off." Rutherford looked back with an amused expression, but gave the farmer and his animal no further attention.

At a distance of probably a quarter of a mile, the road entered the woods alluded to, where there was no fence on either side, and the ruts showed that days had passed since any vehicle had traversed the route. Rutherford had slackened pace again and had not penetrated far among the trees when he turned for the last time, moving at right angles to the highway.

On this occasion he did not follow any particular path, but passed among the trees as if guiding his steps by means of some landmark. The farmer had forced his steed to a trot once more and he went by the point where the foot-passenger had turned off with a fine display of speed. The figure of the pedestrian was seen now and then amongst the trees but they soon entirely hid him from the sight of anyone in the road. He did not look round at the waggon but walked straight on. A little way ahead the road made a turn to the left. The farmer did not go far along this, before he drew up to one side, so that he and his waggon would be out of the way of anyone passing along the highway. The horse was then forced among the trees when, with surprising nimbleness, the driver leapt out and hastily tied the halter to the limb of a tree.

Anyone studying the old man while thus engaged would have observed that his corduroy trousers were tucked in the top of his heavy boots, while the slouching coat descended to his knees and was secured in front by a single button, all the rest being gone. The observant spectator would have noticed another thing, that same frowsy farmer was well-formed and evidently was not only active in movement, but exceptionally powerful.

After securing the animal in a grassy patch, the man started diagonally in the direction taken by Rutherford a short time before. This course, if continued, and provided the other followed a straight line, must bring them together ere long. He walked like one accustomed to that kind of exercise, and was on the look-out for the young man who had turned off in the woods before he pulled up his horse at the side of the highway.

Burton, for the farmer was no other, had followed Rutherford all the way from Middlewick and he did not intend to lose him now, when it was evident that the one in advance had not the slightest suspicion of the trick which was being played on him.

"That young man can't be far off," he muttered as he advanced cautiously, "and I must be careful."

Despite the skill with which he moved, he narrowly escaped making a fatal blunder. The path wound in and out among the trees in such a way that it was impossible to see more than a few paces in advance. He was moving forward, as guardedly as possible, when he caught sight of his man a little in advance. But for the fact that Rutherford's back was towards him, he must have been discovered.

The startled Burton dodged behind the nearest tree, large enough to shelter his body, and removing his worthless hat, peered stealthily from his point of vantage.

Rutherford had also made use of a similar shelter, although it was not as large as that of the watchman, and he too was peeping at something apparently but a few feet away. Whatever it was, the thickness of the trees prevented its discovery by Burton. There must be a change of position before anything could be accomplished. This came about sooner than the watchman anticipated. Evidently Rutherford was dissatisfied with his post, for he stepped softly behind the tree and moved stealthily along the path, as if fearful that his footsteps would arouse someone in the vicinity. Suddenly he looked round and then resumed his advance in the same guarded manner as before. The winding path soon hid him from sight, and, at that moment, Burton emerged from behind his tree and followed him.

This peculiar course continued for but a few minutes, when the result was all that the watchman could desire. The path led into a natural opening clear of trees, though rocks and boulders were numerous. Rutherford had again sheltered himself and the man in the rear lost no time in doing the same.

The opening was less than half an acre in extent and standing near the centre was a third person, well-dressed, though fully as old as Jack Burton. The attitude of this individual was peculiar. His two hands were thrust into the pockets of his light overcoat, thus causing the end of his cane to project upwards behind his shoulder. He wore a tall silk hat, and his attitude and manner were those of a person meditating a step which he hesitates to take. He was upright, and kept glancing searchingly around him. Once he took several steps forward, then abruptly stopped and retreated again. This advance brought him close to the largest rock in sight. Something about that interested him. Rutherford was so absorbed in watching this person, that there was not the slightest chance of his looking behind him. The shifting, vacillating action of the third party, brought his countenance as distinctly into view as that of Mr. Bryant himself. Burton saw it, and it was so impressed upon his memory, that it will remain with him through life.

The singular hesitation could not last long. The person must decide one way or another. As if impatient with himself, he roused his energies, walked to the side of the rock, looked furtively round, and was in the act of stooping, when he abruptly stopped.

Frank Rutherford, in his agitation, had betrayed himself. He stepped from behind the sheltering tree, and as he did so, the man by the rock discovered him.

CHAPTER XX.

Rather singularly, Jack Burton very nearly committed the same blunder. Had he stood as near to the third man as did the younger, he would have been seen at the same moment; but he was sufficiently alert to return to his hiding-place in time to avoid detection.

"I wouldn't be in that book-keeper's shoes for something," was his conclusion. "There's safe to be a row."

The elder man, upon discovering that he was being watched, assumed an upright position and stood for several seconds staring at the young man. The conduct of the latter, under the embarrassing circumstances, was not lacking in a certain dignity. Instead of seeking to screen himself from recognition, he calmly walked forward and confronted the alderman.

"You scoundrel!" thundered the latter, with his cane upraised. "What do you mean by following me?"

The tones were so loud that they could have been heard considerably further away than where the watchman stood. But Rutherford's reply was in such a quiet tone that the listener did not catch a word of what was said.

"You have no business to follow me," continued the irate third party. "I'll thrash you within an inch of your life. What do you mean by such conduct?".

Again came the answer was so softly uttered that not a syllable reached the listener's ear. The stranger was gesticulating earnestly.

Digitized by Google

"If I could only get near enough to learn what is going on, it would prove worth listening to, I suspect; but that is impossible. They would be sure to detect me, and then their combined wrath would descend upon my head."

For ten minutes the couple stood close together in the path, engaged in a low but exciting conversation. By-and-bye the observant watchman saw that Rutherford was doing nearly all the talking. The other listened attentively, but answered by shaking his head, swinging his cane, and shifting the weight of his body from one foot to the other as a person is apt to do when under great mental excitement.

Presently they turned round and began slowly walking along the path towards the highway where the watchman had left his horse and cart.

This brought them so near to the eavesdropper that he dared not peep out from his hiding place. Nor was the risk of discovery counterbalanced by the distinctness with which he could overhear their conversation. Apparently each was so busy with his own thoughts that not a word passed between them until they had gone so far down the path that they were quite out of hearing.

Instead of following them, Burton waited till they had disappeared behind a curve in the path, when he turned towards the open space near him.

Meanwhile the others, following the winding trail until they came into the highway, when once again, and for the last time, they halted. For half-an-hour or more they faced each other, and talked like men deciding a question of life and death. The beauteous spring day drew to a close, the sun went down behind the hills, and the twilight gathered over forest and meadow, and still they talked and argued, grew angry, and then became cool, then one was sullen and then again each became interested.

But with the coming of night, the long-deferred decision was reached. Whatever the cause of dispute, it was settled between them, though apparently on the strange condition that Rutherford should leave the other to return to Middlewick, his companion remaining behind—for that was what took place.

The young man emerged from the deeper gloom of the wood into the open country and walked towards the town. The person from whom he had parted remained at the side of the highway gazing after him. His attitude was that of profound reverie.

Suddenly a waggon rattled along the road, journeying towards the town. The man instinctively stepped aside to allow it to pass, but paid no further attention.

"Hi, there, is that your team up yonder? If it is you'd better make a move, for the old horse has been standing there for hours."

The farmer who called to the other sat in an ordinary country waggon, and spoke in a voice loud enough to be heard a hundred yards away. The individual addressed looked up at him, but made no answer, and the farmer drove on, wondering what strange business could be going on so near his own home.

Night was now fairly well advanced, and the moon was shining. The person in the road unfolded his arms, heaved a deep sigh and turned into the woods. He was following the path over which he had already passed twice. Avoiding with care the dense overhanging vegetation, he followed the narrow trail until he once more stood by the rock in the clearing where he had discovered he was being watched.

Stooping down, he slipped his arm beneath the rock in search of something. The next moment he straightened himself, pressed his hands to his temples, and staggered like a drunken man.

"Heaven help me! it is gone," he moaned. Then, wildly hoping that some mistake had been made, he sprang back to the rock. "No, no! it cannot be! it cannot be! It was a mistake!"

He was now furiously scrambling with his hand under the great stone, as though he would overturn the enormous weight in his fierce effort to find something.

"No, it is gone. It has been stolen. I am ruined! I am ruined!"

CHAPTER XXI.

As Burton walked towards the highway, after leaving the two men, all sorts of conjectures flitted through his active brain.

"There can be no doubt that something is hidden under that rock," and he was about to bring it forth at the moment he made the discovery that another was watching him. That caused a change of purpose, and he made for the young man with the intention of giving him a hiding.

"I can't understand why he didn't. Rutherford must possess a persuasive tongue thus quickly to soothe his wrath. But the appearance of the other is so striking, that he may have attracted the attention of some one else beside the book-keeper and me. Well, I declare!"

It was at this point of his soliloquy that the very peril Burton had in mind appeared. Two forms were observed moving on the other side of the opening, and it hardly needed a second glance to identify them as a couple of tramps.

"They have seen the other and suspect the business that brought him here," was the conclusion of the watchman; "but they do not know where to look for the package. Had the visitor taken it from under the rock, they would have robbed him of it; but they expect him back, and then they will have a chance of getting it."

Convinced that he was right in his surmise, the question arose as to what he should do under the new conditions. Should he also wait, and warn the imperilled man. That would never do, for the ensuing complication would overturn all the plans he had formed; the whole scheme, in fact, would be spoiled. Of all the ideas that suggested themselves, there seemed but one thing to do. This required nerve, but that had never yet failed Burton.

He emerged from the shadow of the wood and made his way at a timid pace toward the rock which was such an interesting object to three persons just at this time. He paused every few steps and glanced furtively about as if afraid of being noticed. He showed no knowledge of the presence of the tramps, who, on catching sight of him, made haste to dodge down out of view. But Burton knew that two pairs of bleared eyes were watching his every movement.

Every feature of the forest opening was fixed so clearly in his mind that it was impossible to make a mistake, even in the gathering twilight. He halted at the precise spot where he had seen the other man stand, when about to stoop for a purpose that was self evident to the watcher. With a hurried glance round Burton dropped upon his knees and pushed his hand under the rock. Beneath it was a sufficiently large space to feel about with ease, but only a few seconds of groping were necessary, when his hand came in contact with something.

He recognised the touch of paper, and with a suppressed exclamation drew out an oblong package five or six inches thick, somewhat longer and not so wide. Instead of being tied with tape or twine, it was bound round with several strong elastic bands which held whatever was within in the smallest possible compass.

It was hardly the time, in view of what he knew about the tramps, for him to make an examination, but he could not resist the temptation. He deftly shifted enough of the bands to allow him to pull away the heavy paper from one end, and to gain a glimpse of what was within. He raised the end and looked at several of the oblong slips.

"I've got it!" gasped the finder. "Here is the whole £20,000 that was stolen from the Middlewick Bank several nights ago!"

Only the recollection of the two vagrants crouching among the rocks and boulders enabled Burton to retain his self-possession. The package of money was a big one, but he could handle it without difficulty. Under his flimsy outer coat was another one, strong and well made. Opening the front of this, he pushed the bundle carefully in to an inner pocket and buttoned the garment over it.

As he anticipated, he had hardly faced about, with the appearance of retracing his own steps, when the tramps rose from their hiding-place. A collision was inevitable, and Burton was prepared for it. He paused, as if startled, and stood still as they approached.

Digitized by Google

The couple were edging towards Burton with a purpose too manifest to be mistaken, and he saw that it would not do to trifle with them.

"Look here, guv'nor," said the more disreputable of the two threateningly, "if you don't give me back my package you took from under that there rock, my pal and I'll have to help ourselves. It's hard if a honest man can't leave his own in a safe place."

"Go along," was Burton's gruff reply. "The stones aren't yours. I put them there myself."

"That yer didn't! we did, we——"

"That proves the package isn't yours then, for it doesn't contain stones at all, and if you don't clear off, I'll shoot," said Burton, with a sudden change of front, seeing only too plainly that the tramp's threat was no idle one.

The moon had risen while this little affair was going on in the forest opening. The foremost tramp had just prepared for a leap upon the supposed farmer when he recoiled at the sight of the gleaming pistol, whose muzzle almost touched his nose. More than that, one of the chambers was discharged, the bullet nipping his ear, while a second whistled by the crimson countenance of his companion just behind him.

"That's just to let you know I'm ready for you," remarked Burton. "The next time I shoot, I'll kill you."

Without waiting to see whether or no he would carry out his threat, the two men dashed out of sight with ludicrous haste. Although their flight proved beyond doubt that they were defenceless, save for their own brute force, Burton yet took every precaution against giving them the slightest clue to his movements. With the utmost care he began a withdrawal from the spot, changing his course so that his enemies could not keep track of him, provided they did not hear the rustling of the leaves.

It was not necessary for him to go far before resuming the direct course to the highway. The straining ear detected no sound like that which had warned him of his peril, and he became confident that he had thrown the vagrants off his trail. This was unquestionably a great point accomplished, for when he repeatedly stopped and listened, he failed to hear anything alarming. Finally he dismissed all apprehension and advanced with less care than before.

But in thus protecting himself against one danger, Burton fell into an unsuspected dilemma. The several changes of direction, with no beaten path or landmark to guide him, resulted in a confusion of the points of the compass, as is inevitably the case with the most experienced ranger of the woods.

When certain that he had travelled far enough to reach the highway where he had left his horse and waggon, he was still among the trees, enveloped in gloom and with no idea of where he stood.

"I believe I am lost," he said with a shiver of dread, "and, if that is so, there's no chance of finding my way out before morning."

While the prospect was anything but pleasant, there was nothing in it, after all, to cause misgiving. The wayfarer found some consolation in smoking a cigar. By keeping the glowing tip free of ashes he was able to use it as a tiny lamp, now and then, and thus save himself some unwelcome experiences. But soon the weed was consumed, and growing tired of the enjoyment, he flung away the stump.

"I'll try a little longer—helloa!"

It was the neigh of a horse that caused this exclamation. It sounded to his left, not in the direction, as it seemed, of the highway; but, remembering his mistake, he turned towards the point, and had not gone far when, to his delight, he came across the horse and waggon with which he had come from Middlewick hours before.

So far as could be perceived in the darkness, the beast had not attempted to stir from his position since Burton had tied him there. But, remembering the interval had been long enough for him to become hungry, the man quickly unfastened the horse, climbed into the waggon, and took the reins and whip in hand. There was no need, however, of the latter, for, to the amazement of the driver, the animal instantly broke into a gentle trot which he seemed disposed to keep up the entire way home.

Shortly after turning in to the main road, Burton discerned a man ahead of him, walking quite rapidly. By this time the moon was well up in the sky, and he could see so distinctly that he recognised him as the one that had stood in the clearing and was about to take the package of money from under the rock when he desisted because of the presence of the book-keeper of the bank.

This individual, having partly rallied from his shock, was hurrying towards the town. He was in the middle of the road, but on hearing the rattle of the waggon behind him, stepped aside to allow it to pass.

As he came up alongside of him, Burton checked his horse.

"Have a lift, sir," he asked, looking down at the man.

"No thank you. I prefer to walk."

"I am going straight to Middlewick, and it will save you some time, for this animal, as you see, is a good goer."

Thus urged the pedestrian accepted the invitation, climbed nimbly up beside Burton, who once more started his horse at a trot.

It seemed like running a great risk, for he could not be certain that his passenger would not recognise him. Brief as had been his stay in Middlewick, he had been there long enough for many of the inhabitants to learn who he was.

It need hardly be said, however, that when he assumed the guise of a farmer, on applying at the livery stable for this wretched turn-out, he donned something in the nature of a disguise besides his shabby garments, while in keeping with his assumed character the watchman imparted a broad and peculiar accent to his voice while speaking to his passenger. But the latter was in no mood for talking. His responses, when there were any, were so curt that the pretended farmer soon gave up the attempt.

It was a strange situation indeed.

Arrived at the outskirts of the town, the passenger requested Burton to allow him to get out. He courteously thanked the supposed farmer for his kindness and disappeared along the main street, while the driver turned in the direction of the livery stable, where, after considerable difficulty, he had managed to hire the outfit.

It was not very late in the evening, and he managed to restore himself to something like his original appearance without attracting attention to the process. His old hat, with the hair and chin-whiskers attached, was slipped into his coat pocket; he smoothed down his trousers, and folded the shabby coat and carried it over his arm. This was so effective that when he presented himself at his lodgings he was admitted without question.

When certain he was quite alone, he unbuttoned his coat after carefully locking the door, drew out the package he had extracted from beneath the rock, and opened and counted the contents. There was exactly £20,000, the very amount stolen from the Middlewick Bank, and here it was in his hands, ready to be restored to the rightful owner.

He recalled the peculiar circumstances under which he had recovered it. If he chose he might retain every penny of it, and no suspicion could ever attach to him. Not a living soul besides himself knew that he had visited the woods and taken it from under the rock where it was hidden. Even if the tramps chose to tell their story, it could not turn the eye of the law to him. The farmer, who was the chief actor in that little drama, had gone out of existence.

(To be concluded.)

Digitized by Google

THE BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

Two Prizes of £1 1s. Each.

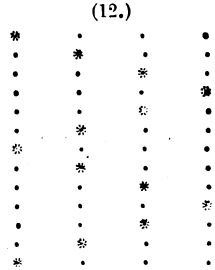
BELOW will be found the second batch of ten problems in the new series of "THE BRAIN GYMNASIUM." Two prizes of a guinea each is offered weekly to those competitors who answer correctly the greatest number of these problems. Consolation prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

RULES:

1. All solutions to be written on one sheet of paper.
2. Don't write the questions. Simply put the numbers and the answer against each.
3. Each set to contain the £100 coupon (found on second page of cover) for the current week.
4. All attempts to be in by Monday, May 18th.
5. Mark your envelope "Gymnasium."

(11.) Example: Behead "to put over" and leave "not under." Solution: C-OVER.
Solve the following problems in the same way:
(a) Behead "to dry" and leave "wet."
(b) Behead "a grain" and leave "frozen water."
(c) Behead "trifling" and leave "not heavy."
(d) Behead "to stop up" and leave "a curl."
(e) Behead "to draggle" and leave "a noisy crowd."
(f) Behead "a blow" and leave "the blues."

(12.)



Place the words defined below one on top of the other in their proper order, and the letters which fall on every asterisk on the above diagram will form a word signifying "additional."

1. A piece of music.
2. A kitchen utensil.
3. To be dull.
4. A stinging insect.
5. A high wind.
6. To repair.
7. To pull about.
8. A family quarrel.
9. Poison.
10. A sudden squall.
11. A small insect.
12. To worship.
13. To couple.

(13.) Place the words defined below—each of which consists of four letters—one on the other.
1. To tie together.
2. A loud sound.
3. An operatic air.
4. Voluble.
The initials, read downwards, signify to boast.
The initials, read upwards, signify clothing.
The finals, read upwards, signify a poet.
The finals, read downwards, signify a colour.

(14.) The number of periodicals issued from this office in the course of a year is about 36,034,476. How long would it take the editor to carry them, a quire of 26 copies at a time, to Messrs. Smith and Son's premises, assuming that each journey there and back occupied 23 minutes? Give the answer in years, weeks (not months), days, hours, minutes, seconds, and a fraction of a second, if necessary.

(15.) MIXED VERSE.

I cedrpetae nda rteamicep teh lolfy
Fo vignig dewding serpents lal teh hilwe,
Het lapn sah euaesd a testled lamholeyen
Ot drobo herwe cone herte saw a leapings limes.

Yin refidns, ti messe, rea swalay tegting ramried,
Heirt diewndgs ot my rovingsees wef vige swing,
Ym cavant spure oto goln het dola sih racdier
Fo yubgin rof hetm reptyt, sucsels singth.

(16.) The initials of the words defined below spell the name of a well-known novel, and the finals the pseudonym of the author.
1. The surname of the hero of one of Sir Walter Scott's novels.
2. To obstruct.
3. The foundress of Carthage.
4. Misfortune.
5. A heavy piece of timber.
6. To instruct.
7. A collection of wild beasts.
8. A naval officer.
9. A biblical word meaning "a master."
10. A precious stone carved in relief.
11. A Prince of Denmark.

(17.) The letters of what word on this and the preceding page may be transposed the greatest number of times to form other words, every letter being used in each case? Give the transpositions.
Example: TIMES. Smite, mites, items, etc.

(18.) The first letter of the word forming the solution to this problem is contained in the word "cape" but not in "coat," the second in "wheat" but not in "oat," the remaining letters being disposed of in the following words:
In "pen" but not in "paper."
In "candle" but not in "taper."
In "wink" but not in "nod."
In "plaice" but not in "cod."
In "jam" but not in "honey."
In "cash" but not in "money."
In "drake" but not in "swan."
In "lover" but not in "don."
In "rough" but not in "smooth."
In "salvation" but not in "Booth."
The complete word represents the name of a class of manufacturers whose work is well-known to the readers of our papers. What is the word?

(19.) Those who succeed in making the best anagrams out of the following titles to pieces of music to be found in MELODY will be counted correct:
1. Dear Mother England.
2. March of the Little Tin Soldiers.
3. Awake Sweet Love.
4. Shepherd of Souls.
5. The Hour of Love.

(20.) The word forming the solution to this problem is the name of a county in England. The numbers indicate the relative position of the letters contained in the word.
Example: FORTH. 1, 2, 3, 4, spell "a fortified place."
Problem:
1. 1, 4, 5, 10, spell "finished."
2. 6, 7, 2, 1, spell "a hovel."
3. 7, 8, 9, 10, spell "to borrow."
4. 6, 7, 8, 5, spell "a part of the leg."
5. 1, 4, 3, 2, spell "a bird."
6. 6, 7, 4, 5, 2, spell "did shine."
7. 9, 4, 1, 10, spell "did ride."
8. 9, 10, 5, 1, 2, 9, spell "to inflict."
9. 7, 4, 5, 10, spell "a sharpening stone."
10. 10, 3, 2, 5, spell "level."

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery.

The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley.

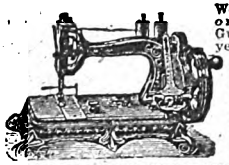
Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents, And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Pinsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 97, Strand, London.

Send 4 Stamps and receive pair FOLDING SCISSORS, PATENT PENKNIFE, and Amusing Novelty Catalogue, post paid. VARIETY COMPANY, DALSTON, LONDON.

"JUNO" CYCLES

Are the Very Best.

JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb. JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C. N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full natural perfect Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment, approved and recommended by the medical profession. Success guaranteed. For particulars free, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J." Oriental Toilet Co., 67, Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (.50 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Store, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 183, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

NOSES

NOSE MACHINES

(PATENT) for UGLY NOSES. Radical CURE (THE ORIGINAL) for Red Noses, 3/9. Red Nose Advice Pamphlet, 1/-. POST FREE, SECRETLY PACKED. For particulars (private) send stamped envelope to—LEES RAY, SPECIALIST, WAVERTREE, LIVERPOOL.

AFTER. BEFORE.

GOVERNMENT ARMS, ACCOUTREMENTS, CLOTHING, STORES, etc.

Government Clothing.—Great Coats, 7/6; Scarlet Tunics, 1/8; Jackets, 1/1; Grey Capes, 1/10; Glengarries, 1d.; Waterpr. of Hoods and Capes, 10d.

Police Clothing.—Great Coats, 5/6; Trousers, 1/9; Leggings, Lanterns, etc.

Arms as actually used by the French during the Franco-Prussian War.—Chassepot breech-loading Rifles, 8/- each; Swords, with brass handles and steel scabbards, 1/-; Lances, 4/-; Navy Boarding Pikes 2/-, etc.

British Government Camp Equipment.—Army Bell Tents, 40ft. in circumference, with pole, pegs, peg mallet, and lines, in bag complete, ready for use, 17/6 each; Brown Army Blankets, 7ft. by 5ft. 8in., 1/6; Waterproof Sheets, 3ft. by 6ft., 1/6; Mess Tins, 3d., etc.

British Government Harness.—Heavy Cart Harness, £1 15s. 6d.; Gear Harness, £1 18s.; Troopers' Riding Saddles, complete, 12/6 each; Bridles, 2/3; Head Collars, 1/9; Leather Surcingles, 1/3; Nose Bags, ventilated, complete with buckle and strap, 3d., etc.

New Harness.—Full-size Gig, complete, £3 15s.; Demi-Horsekin Riding Saddles, complete, £1 5s., etc.

Curtains, Carpets, etc.—White Lace Curtains, 3yd. long, 50in. wide, 2/4 per pair; Carpets, 2yd. by 3yd., 3/- each; Rugs to match, 8d., etc.

Illustrated Price List Free on application to

JARDINE, NOTTINGHAM.

RED NOSES

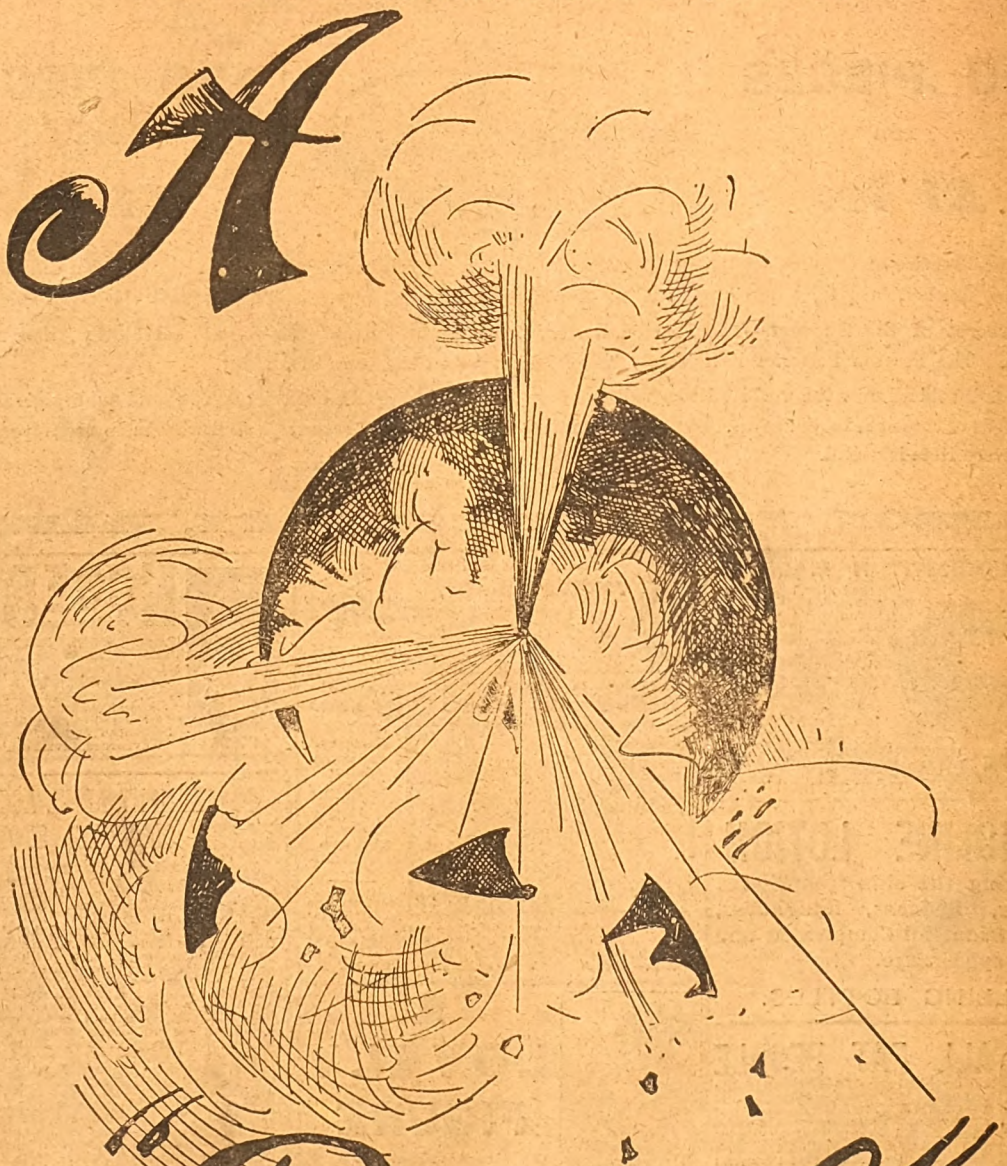
Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

DON'T BE NERVOUS

Nor trembling, nor go about in timorous mood, filled with unreasoning dread. A few doses of

BEECHAM'S PILLS

will so effectually tone up the nervous system and fortify the general health, that you would be able to remain unshaken in the presence of



A Bomb"

Digitized by Google

A POWERFUL NEW SERIAL COMMENCES IN THIS NUMBER.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 386. FOR WEEK ENDING MAY 23RD, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

1896 PROCLAMATION.

Grand Pioneer Reduction Sale

By Messrs. F. HODGSON & SON, The Well-known Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds, will take effect on sight of this advertisement.

OUR NEW VENTURE! Yes, Two Different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright).

Whereas, in launching forth our New Production, THE "PRUDENTIAL" CARPETS AND HEARTHRUGS, we beg to state they will have a Rich Turkish and Persian Design on one side, and on the reverse he elegant and costly designs of Wilton make. The advantage thus gained is great, as they can be utilised in various rooms at one cost. This is a valuable step in economy.

PRODIGIOUS SALE OF THE

"PRUDENTIAL" Reversible CARPETS

(Registered.)

Reversible, with a different pattern on both sides, woven throughout with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in 10 sizes only. These carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian with the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down and cannot be excelled in durability.

	Each.		Each
6ft. by 9ft., Reduced Sale Price	4/9	9ft. by 15ft., Reduced Sale Price	12/6
7½ft. by 9ft. " " "	5/11	12ft. by 12ft. " " "	12/9
9ft. by 9ft. " " "	7/6	12ft. by 13½ft. " " "	14/6
9ft. by 10½ft. " " "	8/6	12ft. by 15ft. " " "	15/9
9ft. by 12ft. " " "	9/6	12ft. by 18ft. " " "	19/6
10½ft. by 12ft. " " "	11/6	12ft. by 21ft. " " "	22/6

When ordering please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

"Neal Lodge, Upper Norwood, S.E., January 18th., 1896.
The Dowr. Lady Abercromby is pleased with the 'Prudential' Carpet she ordered."

Blairquhan, Maybole, N.B., August 3rd.
Lady Hunter Blair writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son send her another 'Prudential' Carpet, same as before, crimson and gold, dimensions, 9ft. by 10½ft. Cheque inclosed."

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Reg)., to match above Carpets, sent for 1s. 6d. extra, size 2 yards long, and 1 yard wide.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Hearthrugs for 4s. 3d.; or 6 for 8s.; or 12 for 15s. 6d.

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ALARM" CARPETS

(Registered). GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Sale Price 2/11 EACH.

This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. We will forward direct from the looms to any address on receipt of amount, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, the largest ever sold at the Price.

Suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. A Rug sent with Carpet, 10d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER. 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs ... ... 7s. 3d.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly Examine and Compare these Carpets.

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON, 23/5/96.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

F. HODGSON AND SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants,

WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Telegraphic Address—"Eclipse, Leeds." Telephone No. 948.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 2d.; 1lb., 2s.; 2lb., 3s. 9d., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MRS. LAWRENCE

A Farmer's Wife, writes from Mid-Rasen, Lincolnshire: "For a long time I suffered severely from

INDIGESTION

And WIND IN THE STOMACH, and had to call in the doctor. Having prescribed for me some time he said, 'I can do nothing more for you.' My husband urged me to try your WIND PILLS; he brought me a box and I took them. In a few days I was quite well and able to get up, and now enjoy excellent health. Publish my name and address."

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills

Being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, Mild, and Tonic, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

ALL SUFFERERS from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND ON THE STOMACH, BILIOUSNESS, SICK HEADACHE, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, etc.,

should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

Of all Chemists, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for Price from PAGE WOODCOCK, LINCOLN.

"JUNO" CYCLES

Are the Very Best.

CASH OR CARRIAGE PAID

JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb. JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C. N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

CAN YOU WRITE?

Of course you can! Why not then emboss your Notepaper, etc., with a pretty Monogram? using the

Patent Pocket Monopresse

Every Initial and Monogram of two letters kept in stock. Monogram of two letters, 1/1; Initials, 10d. each, post free. Apply—

CHAS. ROMPLER, 7, New Basinghall St., London, E.C. Agents wanted.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 21
May 23, 1896.
S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted, sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

Swift Gold Medal
KNITTER.

KNITS Stockings ribbed or plain, Gloves and Clothing in Wool, Silk, or Cotton. Instructions Free. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals, for the "Harrison" and "Sun" Machines.

Harrison Knitting Machine Co., Ltd. Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

ORGAN

4s. Monthly.

WALNUT CASE.
KNEE SWELL.
SPLENDID TONE.

10 Years' Warranty. 72 Page List Post Free.

ALPHONSE CARY, NEWBURY, BERKS.

ARMSTRONG'S

Lady's & Gentleman's, from £5 10s., carriage paid. Prompt delivery, lists free.

SPORTING GUN DEPT., Collingwood Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

"KEEPUMDRIE"

WATERPROOF GARMENTS.

Marvels of Cheapness and Durability.

		FROM
CHESTERFIELD, SCARBORO'	Men's	7/6
INVERNESS	Boys'	5/-

Illustrated list and patterns post free.

ANDREW POTTER, LONDON WORKS, READING.

HIGH-CLASS TAILORING

Every Garment cut to measure.

DIRECT from the Manufacturer, Saving all Middle Profits.

LADIES' TAILOR-MADE COSTUMES

In all the present Shades, From 10/6 to 70/-. Value Unequalled. Fit Guaranteed.

MEN'S SUITS 18/6

Better Qualities, 22/6, 25/6, 31/6, 37/6, 45/-, 52/6, 63/-.

Cycling Suits from 12/6.

BOYS' SUITS.

Pieces for mending sent with all Suits.

See our New Patterns before ordering. It will pay you to do so.

Hundreds to choose from. Fashion plates and measure forms free on application. All Goods Carriage Paid.

Factory Clothing Co.

Manufacturing and Ladies' Tailors,

117K, ALBION ST., LEEDS.

Digitized by Google

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

No. 386.] For the Week ending May 23rd, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

A Porcelain Cup.

ONE morning as I was strolling through the streets in the neighbourhood of the Opera, I stopped in front of a shop of curiosities and antiquities and ran my eye over the different articles displayed in the window, of which the majority were old acquaintances, and some of which had passed through my own hands.

As I was about to pass on, the door of the shop opened and who should come out but my friend Octave Ducrozel, whom I had not seen for several months. The moment he saw me, he came forward, and I noticed that he seemed annoyed, and his hand trembled in a way that I had never known before.

"What has happened?" I inquired. "You look worried?"

"Oh! those women, those women!" he growled in a voice that seemed addressed to his own reflections rather than to me. "Do not trust their promises, do not place any confidence in their vows! It's enough to make a man blow out his brains!"

"I'll see that you don't do that," I said; "I shall stick to you like your own shadow."

"If you only knew," continued the poor fellow. "And it is only five years ago. I was in love, head over heels in love. I loved with all the passion and intensity of a first love. It was with a beautiful young girl at Batignolles. She was staying with her mother, and in order to remain by her side as long as she lived, she had refused many offers of marriage. Louise Audry was as lovely as she was noble in her devotion to her mother.

"You know how the heart loves to adorn the object of its affections with all the graces and charms imaginable. I was fortunate enough, too, to prove not displeasing to Louise, and before long we had formed the delighful plan of uniting our destinies and getting married. We decided to wait two or three months before taking the final step.

"Unexpected events, however, caused a different disposal of our plans. Compelled to take a long journey, of which the termination seemed doubtful, I found myself obliged to postpone the wedding until my return. When we said good-bye, Louise gave me a faithful promise to wait for me as long as events might make it necessary.

"As a token of my tender affection I begged her acceptance of an extremely beautiful porcelain goblet that had been left to me by my grandmother, and which I cherished as the apple of my eye. Louise was delighted to possess an article that would constantly remind her of me, and promised that whatever might happen she would not suffer it to leave her possession.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"Those were her last words. Shortly after they fell from her beautiful red lips I started on my journey.

"Four years passed, as you know, before I returned to France. During that time I was in the centre of Africa, conducting explorations, and practically exiled from the world, receiving no news and able to send none.

"As soon as I arrived in Paris I hurried to see Louise, to whom I had telegraphed from Marseilles. Alas! what a cruel deception was in store for me!

"The house she used to live in had been torn down and removed by the construction of a new street. No one knew where Madame Audry and her daughter had gone to live, and all my efforts to trace them were ineffectual and vain.

"Several months have gone by since then without bringing any news to change the unhappy state of affairs.

"This morning, while looking through the shops to find a birthday present for my sister I went by chance into the shop where you have just met me.

"While searching about for something that would make a present a little out of the ordinary run I walked up and down the shop in front of the show cases and let no corner escape my attention. In this way I found myself at length in front of a tall case with closed glass windows, beside which a young girl was sitting with some embroidery work in her hands.

"And in this glass case, just about the height of my eyes, what should I see standing on a shelf behind the shining glass pane but the old porcelain goblet that I had given to Louise. Yes, the very same it was! The exquisite piece of Sèvres that had such deep significance for me and with which so many tender memories and associations were linked.

"At first I was inclined to doubt my eyes, but on looking closer it was no longer possible, for I knew every detail of it by heart, and I recognised them all beyond the possibility of being mistaken.

"There was a wreath of flowers so finely and delicately worked in with threads of gold and silver, forming a crown work in which alternated harmoniously a superb rose cluster, with leaves and buds and a bunch of dainty little flowers, red and blue! I could not mistake it. There, too, was the artistic mounting that I knew so well, with the three bronze supports representing the heads of animals peering forth out of dense foliage, and chiselled by the hand of a master.

"My surprise speedily gave place to indignation, as you may well understand. This treasure of my heart in a shop! This gem linked with so many family traditions and representing the faithfulness of my first love, exposed to the public eye of the chance and ordinary buyer.

"In spite of her solemn oath she had sold the goblet—and forgotten me who gave it her. Oh! woman, woman, woman, all and always the same, you are the personification of inconstancy and the lie!

"Naturally, you will understand, I had only one thought in my mind—to buy the goblet back again. I asked the price.

"'Ah! Monsieur,' answered the clerk, 'the precious objects in that case are in special care of Madame Burnard, the proprietress, and she alone attends to any business connected with them. Madame Burnard has just gone out, and I can't say nothing about them. Perhaps mademoiselle has some instructions.'

"'No,' answered the young girl thus addressed, putting down her embroidery and raising her eyes to me. 'Mother takes charge of all in the case, monsieur, and I have not even the key. My mother will return at six o'clock and monsieur will, perhaps, look in again to-night.'

"I said that I would do so and left the shop."

"Eh, bien! My dear Octave," I said, interrupting my friend in his tale, "we will both go there together, for I do not mean to leave your side until this matter is cleared up."

"Cleared up!" he exclaimed impatiently; "there's no clearing up about it. The solution is evident and obvious. I am forgotten and my token has been thrown away and sold."

Poor Octave! His heart was full of bitterness. Apparently disappointed and deceived in his first love, he was ready to curse the whole sex and to class them one and all as false, faithless, and cruel.

At six o'clock we returned to the shop. Octave entered alone and I walked up and down outside waiting for him and looking in at the shop window. I had to wait a long time, nearly an hour. Evidently the interview was not hurrying on with winged feet.

At length my friend came, his face radiant.

"Well," I cried, "have you got your goblet?"

"Yes, no; that is to say, I have it and I haven't it! Ah! my friend. I hardly know what I am saying, I am so upset, so happy! Ah! do you know that women are angels? Don't you understand me?"

"I must confess that—er——"

"Well, I'll tell you all about it. The moment I entered the shop the little girl with the embroidery met me and said her mother had just come in.

"I followed her to the farther end of the shop, where, in the semi-darkness I saw a woman coming to meet me.

"'Madame,' I said, 'there is in your show-case an article that I feel disposed to purchase.'

"'Yes, monsieur, I know,' she answered quickly. 'You refer to the old porcelain goblet. I regret it exceedingly, monsieur, but it is not for sale. It is only here to be kept for the one person who has the right to reclaim it and to whom it belongs.'

"'And how do you know, madam, that I am not the person?'

"At this moment the clerk lit the gas and we found ourselves suddenly face to face in the strong light.

"'Louise!'

"'Octave!'

"This unexpected meeting naturally caused long explanations. These Louise gave me frankly and freely. When their house was pulled down Madame Audry and her daughter left Batignolles to live in Paris. A short time after there was a financial catastrophe which made a great stir and ruined many people, among them Madame Audry. The old woman shortly afterwards died of grief and disappointment.

"Without news of me and in a condition of hopelessness and despair Louise found herself at the end of her strength and resources, when an old friend of her mother, a M. Burnard, who kept a curiosity shop, turned up to help her. He was a widower, over sixty years of age, and with a young daughter on his hands he found himself rapidly going into a decline.

"Anxious to find some one who would be a friend to the girl after his death, and knowing the kind heart of Louise, he offered her his name, his house and his home.

"That is how Louise became Madame Burnard and was called mother without being a mother; how the goblet always remained in her possession, and how I have the pleasure now to announce our approaching marriage, at which I trust you will do me the honour to be best man."

Honor Lucelle.

Digitized by Google

IN * THE * DARK.

The darkness was intense, and it had a singularly depressing effect on me as I groped along, stealthily following the rustling sound of a woman's dress. In the pursuit, I had climbed many stone stairways, and at last I found myself walking on a narrow ledge, scarcely wide enough to afford a safe footing. With my cane I reached over the ledge, but not far, as I could touch nothing, and a feeling of dread came over me lest I should lose my balance. To my left was the wall, which arched so low as to compel me to stoop in walking.

The associations surrounding the uncanny place added to the horror of my situation. The building was in a deserted quarter of the city of Mexico. The massive pile had for many years been abandoned by all reputable persons and pursuits. Its labyrinthine interior was a safe refuge for a horde of murderous marauders. Many a brave officer of the law, while searching for a criminal, had been stabbed to death by a hand suddenly thrust from one of the dark recesses.

Only the week before, a prominent and respected citizen had been murdered within these dread precincts. His beautiful daughter, Dolores, had formed an attachment for a handsome and dashing young fellow, named Manuel Lopez. He was the leader of a band of free-booters who made their headquarters in the building.

The father took some determined steps and thought he had broken up the affair; but one day a rumour reached him that Dolores often met her lover in that retreat.

One night he followed her, and, to his intense grief, found that the rumour was true. He awaited the meeting, and then rushed at Lopez with the fury of a tiger. The next instant the father fell with a fatal knife-thrust in his heart. The funeral took place amid general lamentations, and a large reward was offered for the apprehension of the murderer.

A number of mounted officers scoured the neighbouring country; but from the first I was convinced that Lopez had not left his den. From what I could learn of the girl, I was also certain that she had not even yet entirely deserted her lover.

My watch of seven days and nights was now rewarded by the reappearance of the girl in the building, and, notwithstanding my fears, I cautiously followed the rustling sound of the dress in the darkness before me.

By an occasional glimmer, it was evident that the girl had a faint light to guide her steps. Fortunately she moved slowly, and I was enabled to follow closely by carefully feeling my way with my cane and outstretched hand.

Suddenly I was checked in my pursuit by a startling incident. The girl stopped, the glimmering light entirely disappeared, and I heard a voice, low, but vehement with rapturous delight:

"Dolores, my darling! I knew you would come to me, that your love would show you that I was not to blame. And it was not my fault, I swear to you. He sprang at me like a wild beast, and not knowing what I did, I drew my knife in self-defence—and killed him. I acted on the swift impulse of the moment, and surely you cannot blame me."

"I do not blame you," the girl said slowly and with infinite sadness in her tones; "but we must part for ever. I came to-night to bid you a last farewell."

"Ah, do not say that, Dolores!" came the man's voice, in desperate pleading; "see, I could not act otherwise. For your sake, I would never have harmed him—yes, I could even have fought for him; but he came upon me like the wind, he gave me no time for thought—I knew only that one of us must die. Consider, how would it have been had he lived, had he killed me? Could you have been his child again? No; you had chosen me and I but served your love when I preserved my life. Think, dear one, you were mine by Fate's decree, and are you the less mine that I have taken the only course against a man who would have killed me?"

"It cannot be, it cannot be, Manuel," moaned the girl hopelessly; "my father's blood is upon your head, and we must part for ever."

"Come, come, Dolores, be not too hasty. You must take time to think. Come, let me lead you to a seat. Why do you draw back from me? I know every foot of the way here, and can find my way as easily in the dark as in the light. Besides, would it be so great a harm if we should fall over this ledge—we, whose love is greater than love of life itself? It is many feet to the stone floor of the court below, and I have heard it said that before falling half the distance, one's breath is taken away and death comes as peacefully as sleep to a babe. Come, Dolores, come!"

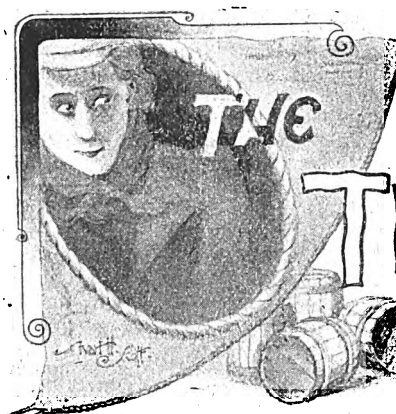
There was a sound as if the girl were being half led, half dragged over the stones. She uttered an entreating moan which thrilled me through and through with horror. Little wonder that she was frightened and unwilling to follow her lover; his pleading earnestness had changed to a desperate, despairing tone. I felt that he was about to commit some other dreadful deed, but I was powerless to interfere. The ledge along which I had been feeling my way ended abruptly, and my cane failed to touch a further footing in any direction.

Suddenly the noise of dragging, intermingled with moans from the girl, ceased, and the next instant from below I heard a terrible shriek, followed by sounds as if falling objects were striking against projections in a rapid descent. Then all was still again.

I peered into the darkness for a moment till I heard a murmur of voices. At last a lantern was brought. It revealed a group of horror-stricken men gathered round two prostrate forms which lay on the stone floor far below. They were the mangled bodies of Manuel Lopez and Dolores, fallen upon almost the same stone where the father had poured out his life's blood a few nights before.

Clara Megandel.

Digitized by Google



THE TRAGEDY of the "MERRYLEGS"

I HOLD it ain't right for a woman to make eyes at a man when he's scarce half her age—not that I want to draw a line at when I consider a woman has no business to be thinking about making love; that's not my meaning.

But when the chap's eighteen, and soft as butter and the girl's thirty-five, and hard as nails, it don't seem to be the square thing.

This business grew out of nothing, right under my nose, and I never see it till all the fat's afire. Here am I, skipper of the Merrylegs, as tidy a craft as ever nosed her way through the "Swatch." And there, living in Rochester, is my Lucy and her mother. Then here, aboard with me, is my mate, Jacob Faithful—so named after that chap of Marryat's, for want of a better, by them as found him when a kid bellowing on the workhouse steps.

It's the voyage after I'm married. Lucy is sailing with me for the first time. I don't know about anything else.

So the morning we're ready for sea I go up to the office for orders.

The Guv'nor thinks he will walk down to the wharf to see me off. He knows a thing or two, for his age, does the Guv'nor.

It's about half-past ten and high water when we reach the wharf. The Merrylegs is lying off in the stream all ready for up and away when we sighted her as we come out of the street.

"Hallo, Merton!" says the Guv'nor, "who have you got aboard?"

"Lumme!" says I, "I know the Missis is there, but that ain't her." Lawd! you might have knocked me down with a corn plaster, for just as I spoke Lucy comes up the kebbin steps and waves her hand to me, and the other one turns about and waves hers, too.

"Sir," says I—for I'm bound to give him an answer—"it's her mother; she's coming round to Dover to show Lucy the ropes."

"All right!" says the Guv'nor sharp like. "Get on board and look slippery while there's a slant!" So I row on board in a kind of fluster, wondering where in thunder we're going to stow the old lady in a bawge that's only got one kebbin.

However, as it's Lucy's mother, I suppose I've got to put a good face on it. But I says to myself as I row off:

"Tom, that old lady's your mother-in-law. If you don't fix her off she'll be sailing with Lucy to teach her the ropes more days than you care about. Tom," I says, "you don't want Lucy to know the ropes. She's very well as she is. Besides, there ain't any teaching as you can't teach." So I pull alongside, make the boat fast, and jump on board. I've made up my mind to do the polite thing by the old lady.

"Good-morning, Mother!" says I, goin' up to her, "glad to see you."

Then she turns round, and I see it's not Lucy's mother at all, but a party I don't know no more than Adam.

"Missis!" says I, gulping down my feelings—which was for cussing—"and what may you want with the Merrylegs?"

"I think you are very rude!" she answers pert as you like; "ask that gentleman."

That gentleman's the mate, and he's blundering acrost the hatches in big sea boots and guernsey, looking as sick as a stuck sheep.

"It's all right, Skipper," he says, "she's a friend of mine; I've promised her a sea trip to Dover."

"Faithful!" says I, "is it a widder? 'cos if so bring her up wiv a round turn!"

"Skipper!" says he, "I——" then he stopped short as a run down clock and she takes up the running.

Digitized by Google

"Captain," she says, smiling at me for all she's worth.

"Don't be angry with Jacob—I am very sorry if I am incommoding you, but Jacob and I are old friends; you'll let me go, won't you?"

"You've got to go," says I, "for we'll be under weigh in ten minutes."

As I look at her, and then at Faithful, standing there so sheepish, I remember that yarn about him being nobody's kid in particular, and the workhouse steps, so I says to myself: "Tom, you're treadin' on somebody's corns more nor a trifle. Up mud hook and away!"

So I turn to the mate: "Heave short, my son!" says I, "and trundle that main sheet aft as you go along."

Then I turn to my lady, and I says: "Missis, I've got to take you willy-nilly. There's my guv'nor standing on the wharf. I'm late now. It's more than my berth's worth to stop and put you ashore, even if that was your wish."

"Oh, well!" she says, "I hope you've got something to eat; it's hungry work at sea, I hear."

"As for that," I answered, "there's a brace of pheasants, anyway."

"Pheasants?" says she. "Now that will be a treat. Where do you keep them?"

"They are hanging over your head, Missis," I says, as I'm hauling aft the main sheet. "Cawn't you smell 'em?"

"Them!" she says, looking up.

"Aye, Missis, that's my meaning! Anchor away there, Faithful!"

"I call 'em bloaters!" she sniffs out disdainful, getting up and going to the kebbin scuttle.

"It's all right, Skipper."

"A trifle of difference in names, Missis," says I. "Up fores'l; look slippery, my son!"

With that, Lucy, who has been standing in the waist, watching, comes aft to me, and tucking her arm through mine as I stand at the wheel, looks up and says:

"Tom, what's the matter with Faithful?"

"Faithful, lass?" I asks; "why, what's adrift?"

"He's queer, Tom; he does nothing but heave sighs."

"Heave crab-winches he may, lass," says I, "or the windlass for that matter; but sighs—lumme! who ever tell of 'em? Maybe it's a pint of four 'alf he's thinking of."

"Captain, may I come down?"

"Na—a—a!" says Lucy, smiling and dodging away from me, "it's something softer than that."

By this time the mains'l is drawing, so the mate slips the bowline, kicks the foresheet down to leeward, and comes aft.

"Take hold here, Faithful," says I, "and keep your eyes lifting; I'm going below."

When I get into the kebbin Lucy's getting ready a bit of grub.

"When did that party come aboard, lass?" I asked.

"I don't know, Tom. The mate says she's his girl."

"That's as maybe, lass," says I, as I climb on the lockers to take a squint out of the skylight, for I'd heard a sound of giggling. "Anyway he's hugging her pretty close now, lumme! I must go on deck, else we'll be head first into something along of his foolin'."

Whether they heard me speaking or what I don't know, but just as I'm going up the kebbin steps, my lady comes tripping along lively as you like, and smiling down at me, says: "Captain, may I come down? I should like one of those pheasants you were speaking about."

"Pheasants is off!" says I, short like, for I had a notion she was fooling me, "but you may come down if you like an' have a bit of what's going."

So down she comes, as daintily as you wish, showing just a glimpse of as pretty a foot and ankle as you—well, there. There's no two ways about it, she was all a toff, although what's coming may give that statement the lie.

"Captain," she says, smiling very prettily at the pair of us, "I'm so sorry to be in the way. I had no notion you were just married—newly-wed couples ought to be left in peace." With that she sighs as though her heart would break.

"As for that," says I, savage like, and looking at Lucy's face going crimson, "we'd as lief have been without you."

"Oh, you dear, outspoken man," she says, smiling for all she's worth; "I do love to hear one speak one's mind without any beating about the bush. Now I suppose you want to know what brought me here?"

Digitized by Google

"It's a matter as wants a trifle of clearin', Missis," says I.

"Well," she goes on quite amiable, "I live at Dover, but I've been staying in London. Yesterday I came down to Rochester to do some sketching, and had all my money stolen whilst I sat in the Castle grounds. I had not a farthing left. I was in terrible distress and wandered about hopelessly searching everywhere for my bag."

"Lucy, lass!" I whisper, "look here."

"You might have gone to the police, Missis," says I, "they'd have telegraft for you."

"Captain," she says, shuddering same as if she'd seen a rat, "I did think of it—I tried to do it, but I couldn't. Men look with suspicion on ladies in such predicaments as I was in."

"There's something in that," says I.

"So I was out all night, Captain, all the weary, cold, dark night."

"Which was warm enough, Missis," says I.

"Aye!" she answers wistful, "for you—for you and your sweet wife—but for me—oh! it was awful!"

"Well cheer up now, anyway," says I. "We'll put you ashore at Dover."

She was silent a while, then went on.

"But the curious part of it is, that when I met the mate, he reminded me most forcibly of a dear friend of mine at Dover. He told me something of his sad history, and wonderful as it may seem, I believe I shall be able to find his mother for him. Her little boy was stolen when he was but a few weeks old. The nurse disappeared at the same time."

"Faithful seems to have fell on his feet all round the shop" says I. Then, as breakfast was ready, we fell to, and for a toff, I think that party took the cake. She got outside of more grub than me and Lucy put together; which was laying it on pretty thick, seeing she's only a lodger.

There's a light westerly breeze all down the Medway, and I stay at the wheel till we get off the "Spaniard." Then I go below. It's four o'clock when I come on deck again.

I step up the ladder and take a look. The mate's at the wheel and my lady's standing beside him looking into his face with that queer smile of hers.

"Lucy, lass!" I whisper, "look here."

"'Tain't fair, Tom," says she, squeezing up beside me, and gripping hold of my arm. "She's foolin' him!"

"Think so, lass?"

"Sure, Tom; she's not for the likes of him!"

With that I slip on deck, and get a glimpse of the gossoon's face before he sees me. He's staring at her like a screech owl blinking at the daylight, and there's a flag flying on the mizzen-truck.

"Have done this foolin', Faithful!" says I; "what's the flag up for?"

"Oh, I asked him to hoist it," says my lady, "I think it makes the ship look quite gay."

"This ship's a bawge, Missis," I says, "and don't need to look gay. Haul it down, mate!"

I take the wheel at this, and we go sailing down the coast over a sea that's dancing in the sunlight astern like a sheet of glawse.

There's a lot of yachts about with their pretty white sails and tapering spars, looking for all the world like the butterflies they are.

One of 'em, a smart cutter of about forty tons, came cruising past us as though she's a steamboat. My lady, who's sitting on the hatches forward of me, pulls out her handkerchief and waves it to the chaps on board.

"What's that for, Missis?" I asks, for she seems to me to be bossing the whole show.

"Captain!" she laughs, "why not? Who could help wishing them luck?"

"If that's all—there's an end!" says I, "and no harm done."

After that we crept on quietly till about five o'clock, when as we are making no head against the tide, we drop the kellick (anchor) about a couple of miles this side of Mawgit Hook.

When night comes on, I'm for fixing up a spare lodging in the kebbin for my lady, but she won't hear of it. She'll stay on deck wrapped in her rug. Well, I don't like to press the point, so it's as she says.

It draws on to about nine o'clock, and as fine a night as ever the stars blinked down upon. There's no moon yet, and I'm sitting dozing over my pipe on the kebbin lockers, when I see a kind of sickly glare stealing down the skylight. It's not fire. I know that. It's some thundering mystification having to do with my lady.

I crawl up the ladder quiet as you like. The whole decks, rigging, spars, and everything are standing out in a blaze of sickly shimmering light. Only for a second though. Then there's a hiss, and all is as dark as you like.

Out on deck I go, savage at being too late.

"What's up there, Missis!" I yells; "who are you wishing good-bye to now?"

"Me!" cries my lady. "Why, Captain, how you frighten one; I was fast asleep!"

Digitized by Google

'Didn't see no blue lights, I suppose?"

"Blue lights? what's that?" she questions, simple as a child.

"You saw a blue light!" says I, turning and running for'ard to Faithful, who's lying down in the folds of the fores'l.

"Na-a-a," says he, "I were asleep, Skipper."

This set me adrift. I know I'm half asleep myself and may have been mistaken. So after a while I get aft again and down into the kebbin.

I'm terrible wakeful all the rest of the night. At times I doze on the lockers—for I never turned in—and dream of blue lights, blue women, blue devils. At last, towards two o'clock, I wake with a start and spring up quickly with the feeling of something ghostly creeping past me. But there's nothing there only the kebbin and the darkness. But across my ears comes a sound that isn't born of the night. It's a sort of rasping noise I don't understand. Rousing Lucy, an' telling her to dress quickly, I'm up the ladder like a shot, blaring out into the darkness like a fool. Presently I make out a shadowy outline of sails stealing quietly past. I look for'ard—there's three lights on our bow-board.

"Faithful!" I shouts, "is it Bank Holiday and midnight illuminations of the Gawdings, or what's up?"

But there's no answer, only the scuttling of chaps getting into a boat in a hurry.

"Lumme!" says I, "if this here bawge ain't gone mad, chalk me up for a fool."

Then I got for'ard as quick as may be. As I go along there's a splashing of oars alongside, and a boat rows away into the night. I see no more, for a blinding flash leaps out of the darkness, and I fall to the deck like a dead man.

But I'm not hit, I'm only stunned by coming down against the fore-hatch. It's Faithful that's hit, and lies like a heap of old clothes acrost the hatch combings.

* * * * *

It's an hour from then to when I come too. Then I pick myself up and see Lucy bending over me with a face as white as the dead. Faithful is still acrost the hatches, and the dawn's creeping up over Mawgit sands astern. Away out there in the blink of the sun, a yacht is stealing quietly away, pretty near hull down. And here on the deck is a group of coastguards standing watching us all.

"Feel better, skipper?" says the officer. "What's been adrift?"

"Lumme!" says I, "it's all adrift, along of them petticoats. Ask Faithful, maybe he knows."

But Faithful don't know anything for some while yet. The chaps are busy patching up the wound he got—it's not much, but it bleeds fast and has to be stopped.

On the deck is a group of coastguards.

"Captain!" says Faithful presently, speaking weak as a licked dawg, "better look what's in them casks."

"What casks?" says I, then I turn and see two lying on the deck beside the windlass, and that some of the hatches is off.

"Cement's in them, mate; what are they got up for?"

"They've taken away two; you came up and stopped the rest."

"Taken away two?" says I; "Faithful, that's more than your week 'll come to!"

"Skipper!" says he, "it's like this. We're loading at the wharf, and the day before we sail, that female party that's just cleared out came down to the bawge and persuaded me to let her stow four casks aboard, fore side the cargo. I see no harm in this—she's wanting to go to Dover Well, I let her. She made a point of finding mother at Dover for me. She's a swell, and she knows her quite well. Skipper! it was that as done it, that, and the twinkle of her bright eyes. Then comes the night we're sailing. Down to the wharf she comes and diddles me out of the way whiles her chums slip on board. It's too late to make a song about it, and I think they're just wanting a trip to Dover, too, and say nothing.

"To-night I was for calling you when I see that yacht coming down and her burning blue lights. But she puts her arms round my neck, and they's so soft, skipper—and the blather of her finishes it."

"Roll those casks here," says the coastguard officer. "Knock their heads in!"

"It's broaching cargo," says I.

"Fiddlesticks!" says he.

In a few minutes they are opened and the stuffs pouring out on deck.

"Cement!" says I.

"Turn 'em out!" says he.

"Cement—cement," says I. "Bloody cement!" says he, and then—a foot—an arm—a leg—head, trunk and all came trundling across the deck smothered in cement dust.

"That cawsk was for overboard!" says Faithful; "they were at it when you come!"

Then we capsized the other, and it's silver—plate they called it—and jewels—some in boxes, some stowed in paper—enough to stock a shop!

"Lumme!" says I, "if this ain't a start, chalk me up a fool!"

And a start it is before we've done with it, what with chasing that yacht and losing her, and inquests, and trials, and judges, we get it laid on pretty thick. For there's been a burglary at a big house back of Rochester, and murder thrown in. It's all in the papers whiles we are at Dover. And this chap as they were going to cremate was the butler that tried to save his master's property and got fixed up like jugged hare by that pawty as came their game on Faithful.

EDWARD NOBLE.

Digitized by Google

A SAINT.

SHE walked her daily path with the calm eyes of a Madonna. "Mrs. Chetwynd," the old permanent gossips would say to the new, temporary, or come-to-stay gossips. "Why, don't you know? The English Consul's wife. Oh, she is a saint. No one ever says a word against her." The last clause was invariably spoken in a way to give the impression that possibly other "hers," might have words said against them. And this, of course, was true. That little tropical mountain capital 5,000 feet up from the rank and steaming vegetation of the coasts on either side, held an English-American colony whose chief pastime was the destroyal, attempted or effectual, of reputations. Everyone professed to have his or her favourites and intimate friends; there were several cliques, according to superstitious or self-asserted social position, and each clique hated all the others.

Of course, there was a little English chapel in the town; the Spanish Catholic tolerance smiled upon it. And in this chapel, Sunday after Sunday, the English speaking colony was wont to meet, kneel, rehearse the Litany, and listen to a sermon read—usually—by the English Consul. Sylvia Chetwynd, the English Consul's wife, was in her pew sabbath after sabbath, with a face of faultless regularity of feature, and Greville Chetwynd, her husband, led the service as best a layman might. Greville was half-way popular. His Sunday face was just a little different from his weekday face. On week-days he bought and sold coffee and did an exchange business, with rasping and grasping care to have the latest one half per cent. rise on the right side, generally his own. On Sundays he was affected and mincing, some people said. A traveller for a Scotch firm of whiskey exporters dared to wonder aloud one morning in the Hotel Cantina, how Mrs. Chetwynd had come to fancy such a man. And a great silence fell on the idle crowd and shut him off. "Oh, she's a saint. No one can say anything about her," was the verdict.

Lorrimer Dewitt therefore held his peace. He was a sober fellow, tasting as little as possible the wares of the house he represented. He travelled a good deal with various other lines of goods, and he had found that nothing paid him so well as that which went to allay the beautiful—and universal—thirst in the land. Therefore he continued in this line. Not remaining in one spot very long, he could well afford to remain neutral and friendly to all the various cliques, not uniting his interests with any in particular.

Of course he had to cut some figure in the English speaking colony, however, and of course he would naturally meet now and then, the English Consul's wife. He rarely went to the consulate, but Mrs. Chetwynd went about a good deal. She had the excellent custom of visiting the orphan asylums, of carrying books and papers to the hospitals, of gracing with her presence various charity entertainments, such as concerts and fairs, provided they did not occur on Sunday. She was indeed a saint.

Lorrimer Dewitt admired her cold, calm beauty, the purity of her oval face, the large angelic blue eyes.

And yet she impressed him curiously. Was it merely the coldness, he caught himself wondering. Sometimes he fancied he had seen such a face before. But where? The idea was too vague. She was always courteously amiable to him—nothing more. She seemed ever to insist upon a certain distance between herself and others—especially men.

Of this, of course, he approved. A woman cannot be too careful. There was that little Mrs. Maclean, the civil engineer's wife—always in trouble, always doing things—always causing talk! Lorrimer liked Mrs. Maclean, in an honest, straightforward way, and thought it a pity that her husband was such a peculiar tempered, uncertain sort of fellow. Yet he couldn't deny that Mrs. Maclean often did imprudent things.

Dewitt had begun to think of leaving for the north. It was a soft-skied, cloudy day in June, early in the rainy season. His sales had been good, and he had a fancy to go back home.

Bob Maclean had spoken of going. Dewitt was not over anxious for his company, yet, since no one else was likely to sail, thought he would find out if it were true. One evening he strolled over to the little house opposite the Cathedral Plaza, where the Macleans had apartments. It was a two-story house, a doctor had the ground floor, and a staircase led from the patio, full of glorious jessamine and yellow roses. On the staircase, almost at the top, Lorrimer Dewitt paused, hesitating and in trepidation. Sobs—surely a woman's sobs. If poor little Mrs. Maclean were unhappy he must not commit the indiscretion of an intrusion. But, on the other hand, how to withdraw without being heard? Irresolute he halted there. Then some one came out of a room on the long landing above. Dewitt coughed, and was relieved to hear the voice of Bob Maclean:

"That you, Mr. Dewitt? Come along up. Glad to see you. I'm all alone."

Dewitt grasped at the fiction with satisfaction.

"Yes, I thought you were alone. I believe I saw Mrs. Maclean with—with Mrs. Chetwynd over on the other side of the square."

Maclean looked at him with a blank sort of pallor or a pallid sort of blankness.

"With Mrs. Chetwynd? No. I hardly think so." He tried to laugh. "They are not very good friends."

"No?" said Dewitt carelessly. Then he changed the subject. "Have you decided about going home yet?"

"Yes, I'm going."

"Will Mrs. Maclean accompany you?"

"No; I believe she will stay here. You see I'm making a sort of flying trip. Coming back."

"You'll go down to the port by the Friday train, no doubt?"

"Yes, not sooner. It's a nuisance waiting over even one day in the coast heat. I don't see why the trains can't connect better."

There was an uneasy silence for a few seconds. Then Dewitt rose.

"I won't stay longer since we are to be voyage companions. I'm rather busy, making up accounts. Please give my respectful regards to your wife. I'll see you to-morrow, of course. Anyway, Friday. Good-night."

Digitized by Google

Dewitt returned to his hotel, wondering what Maclean's poor little wife's latest trouble had arisen from. He did not go to bed at once, but sat in the narrow covered balcony smoking. It was Wednesday night. Three nights more and he would be at sea—he and Bob Maclean. Susie Maclean would be alone, and probably ears deep in her 999th indiscretion. She was a good little woman, thoroughly pure-minded, he knew in his heart, but she would do wild things. The mountain atmosphere seemed constantly to have gone to her head.

He sat smoking there until after midnight. Finally he ceased to smoke, and sat half inclined to doze in the warmth of the night, which seemed to lave him like a warm, perfumed bath. In the shadow of a post he sat motionless and unobserved. Two figures passed below, slowly, quietly. The streets were deserted and noiseless. He could hear the words of the couple—a man and a woman.

"Yes, of course—but I must go. There is no help."

"You will not take her?" The woman spoke between her teeth in a curious mandatory tone.

"No, I have told you."

And they passed on.

The voice of the man was Bob Maclean. But whose voice was the woman's?

An hour later, retiring into his mosquito canopy, Lorrimer Dewitt was still uneasy over the question.

He had heard no voice like that save one—pshaw! Absurd. The voice of the wife of the English Consul!

"A saint, they call her!" He dozed off to sleep.

The next day he forgot about the Macleans until evening. Then he chanced to pass their house. The little woman was at the street door. She looked sad and heavy-eyed.

"You will be lonely," he said, moved by some sudden impulse. "Why don't you make your husband bring you along?"

"Oh, he doesn't want me," she answered, forcing a laugh.

Dewitt did not linger; he knew too well the gossip that might result.

He was at his hotel and in bed early that night, having arranged to be called at six the next morning for the early train to the port.

About midnight a commotion in the house aroused him. He got up hastily and partly dressed, fearful of fire or earthquake. Then he went out in the upper corridor and there met someone.

"What's the matter?"

"They sent to awaken Dr. Adair, Dr. Garcia was away."

"Some one ill?"

"Why, it was at Mr. Maclean's. It seems there was an accident with his pistol, and he is shot—dying, they think."

Dewitt went back to his room. He trembled with a nervous chill as he hastily put on his clothes—not omitting an overcoat.

Within ten minutes he had crossed the plaza. The house was alive with people. And Maclean was dead.

From the man-servant Dewitt managed to obtain a few coherent particulars. Maclean had shot himself while cleaning his revolver preparatory to packing it in his bag. He had been getting ready for the early morning start. There was a letter for Mr. Dewitt. The servant thought it was something about the luggage. It was sealed and addressed, and Mr. Maclean had spoken of wanting it sent round very early.

"Get me the letter," said Dewitt hoarsely. He was trembling violently now.

The servant returned and put it in his hand. Dewitt left the house, returned to his hotel, and there in his room, with his door locked, broke the seal.

It was brief.

"You are an honest man and a gentleman. Be a friend to poor Susie. Life is become unendurable for me. Susie is blameless, but she is not legally my wife. The woman who once bore that name is still alive, and is here in this place. No one suspects her. She deserted me. I thought her dead, and married Susie. I never thought to meet the first one here. The world is round and small—too small. She holds a threatening hand over me, and I am desperate. I simply cut it all. She is cold, cruel, fascinating, wicked. I have been wild about her. I might be so again—her power is great. Poor Susie! I spare her. I am wild and sick of life. I trust you."

Lorrimer Dewitt sealed up the letter, and put it carefully away among his things.

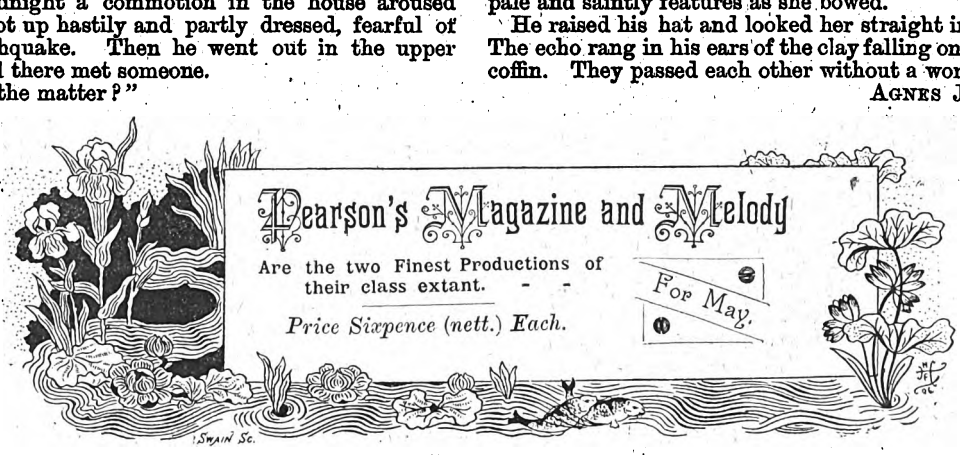
He did not take the early train. He remained to try and look after his dead friend's widow.

The funeral took place that afternoon, with necessary tropical haste. Only men—according to the country's custom—accompanied the remains to the grave.

Returning from the cemetery, he met the wife of the English Consul going to the hospital, her arms full of books and flowers. A courteous smile came over her pale and saintly features as she bowed.

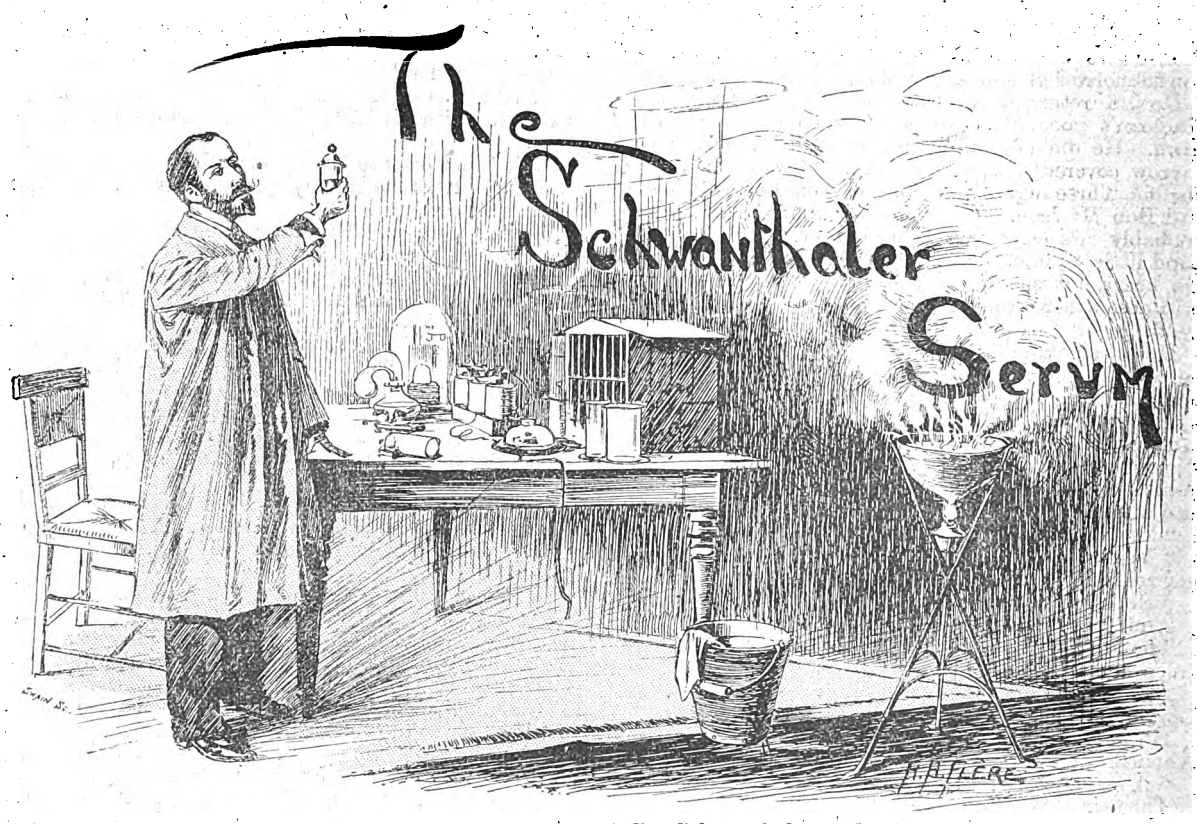
He raised his hat and looked her straight in the eyes The echo rang in his ears of the clay falling on Maclean's coffin. They passed each other without a word.

AGNES JEWLEY



Digitized by Google

The Schwanthaler Serum



For at least a week Dr. Cornelius Schwanthaler had been in a state of great excitement; which, in the circumstances, was not at all surprising. Fired by the discovery of the "X" rays, and animated by the desire to do something which should make his name known to the same extent as that of Professor Röntgen, he had set to work to discover some method of giving the eye the power of seeing through opaque bodies without the use of cumbersome apparatus; and he had succeeded in producing a serum—which he intended to call the Schwanthaler Serum—with which the eyes were to be inoculated, and thereby receive the power of seeing through non-transparent substances.

He had tried it on guinea pigs, and by close observation of their movements he had been led to believe that his serum was a success; nevertheless, there was still an element of uncertainty; a supreme experiment was necessary; it must be tried on the eye of a human being.

He had been in such a confused state of mind during the past week that he had neglected everything, even his fiancée—for the learned Doctor, who was not quite forty, had only lately become engaged. He could think of nothing but his experiments and the grand scientific discovery with which his name would for ever be associated.

The supreme experiment! Upon whom was it to be made? Think of the marvellous results which would be obtained were the serum proved to be all that he believed it to be. In surgery, the Röntgen Rays would be nowhere compared with the power given by the Schwanthaler Serum; while the latter would be of valuable assistance in scores of ways in which the former could be of no use.

Dr. Schwanthaler meditated at great length. He had devoted his life to science hitherto; why should he not go a step farther and inoculate his own eyes? Why should he not be the first to reap the benefits of his own labour? Yes, he would do it!

He took up the little syringe, filled it with the serum, adjusted the platinum needle, and walked to the window to have more light. Then he paused and reflected for a few seconds. It was not necessary to inoculate both eyes for the experiment. No! He would try one eye at a time; it should be the left eye.

He nerved himself for the ordeal, and boldly plunged the needle under the crystalline lens. It was all over! The eye had been inoculated. It was six o'clock in the evening, and he threw himself on the bed, closed his eyes and endeavoured to go to sleep. Overcome by the strain of work and excitement, he soon dropped off into an uneasy slumber.

When Dr. Schwanthaler awoke on the following morning he was conscious of a smarting pain in his left eye, and also a general drowsiness which he could not understand. He dressed himself mechanically, hardly knowing what he was doing; and when he had finished his toilette he sat down in a chair, buried his face in his hands and tried to think.

Just then there was a knock at the door and the landlady entered with his breakfast. The familiar sound of the landlady's voice acted upon him like a charm, as he himself would have expressed it; he remembered all as he sprang from his chair, shut his right eye and looked at her with the eye which he had inoculated with the serum on the previous evening.

Dr. Schwanthaler recoiled, partly with horror, partly with pleasure. Instead of the plump features of Mrs.

Digitized by Google

Decker he beheld a skeleton head—or, rather, something like a skeleton head. All the bones were plainly visible, as were the brain and the other inner portions of the human head, while the eyes, twinkling in their bony sockets, had a transparent appearance which allowed him to see all the various parts, such as the retina. Mrs. Decker's arms and hands were also (apparently) devoid of their fleshy covering.

The savant clapped his hand to his left eye to shut out the sight, and looked at the woman with the untouched optic. He recognised the comely features and fat arms. There could be no doubt about it now; he had made a grand discovery which would be of incalculable benefit and immortalise his name.

He made a hasty breakfast, experimenting all the time by looking at his own hands. The result was not quite so satisfactory at he had anticipated; he had hoped to be able to see through all opaque substances, but he could only see through flesh. Nevertheless, he hoped to obtain better results later on.

After breakfast he dressed himself for his morning visit to the hospital. But he must first make a shade of some kind for his eye; it was confusing to see one thing with the right eye and another with the left, and he did not wish to see the interior arrangements of every person he met. At last he found an eyeglass, which he smeared over with some black substance; sticking this in his eye, he made his way to the hospital.

He was a well-known man, and the townspeople and students stared, as he passed with his eyeglass. But Dr. Schwanthaler paid no heed to the remarks which he overheard; he had a grand mission in life, and could afford to smile at such idle talk.

When the doctor arrived at the hospital, he found his colleagues, surrounded by students, in the midst of an operation. A poor fellow had been shot at by burglars; three bullets had entered his body, two of which had been extracted, but the third could not be found. The doctors had probed for it three times without success, and were just thinking of giving it up for that day, when Dr. Schwanthaler came on the scene. Simply as a matter of courtesy, he was asked if he could assist.

Taking his eyeglass from his left eye, he looked at the man and was able to locate the bullet without hesitation. Picking up the probe, he inserted it and the bullet was quickly extracted.

His colleagues were amazed; they were also envious. They had been trying hard to find the bullet and had been baffled; Dr. Schwanthaler had located it at once. It was too annoying.

The benefactor of mankind remained outwardly calm, although inwardly full of exultation. He soon took leave of his colleagues—he was anxious to get back to his laboratory. He took out his eyeglass to shade the left eye, but by some means he let it slip; it fell on the ground and broke into little pieces. He uttered an angry exclamation under his breath, but there was no help for it.

He tried to keep his left eye shut as he walked homewards, but it was useless; he could not resist the temptation of experimenting as he went along, in spite of the fact that it was in no way pleasant to see a smiling face with one eye, and an unrecognisable fleshless head with the other.

As he pursued his way it seemed to him that not only was the sight of the inoculated eye becoming stronger—so that he could see through other substances, but also that the untouched eye was becoming affected in like manner. In spite of his devotion to science, his desire to immortalise himself and confer an immense benefit on mankind, Dr. Schwanthaler's hair nearly stood on end at the prospect of possessing this extraordinary power with both eyes.

The landlady entered with his breakfast.

He could not wear darkened glasses over the two, that would be equivalent to blindness; yet it was not pleasant to think of passing the rest of his days in continual contemplation of the internal organisation of his fellow creatures and everything around him—never to be able to see things as they are.

Here were two people just in front of him. They had that moment met, and he saw two skulls approach and knock together. It was a kiss! He shuddered and turned away. He looked around. The trees had a transparent, leafless appearance, although it was summer; the walls of the houses were not opaque, he could see dimly through them; everything, in a word, was unnatural.

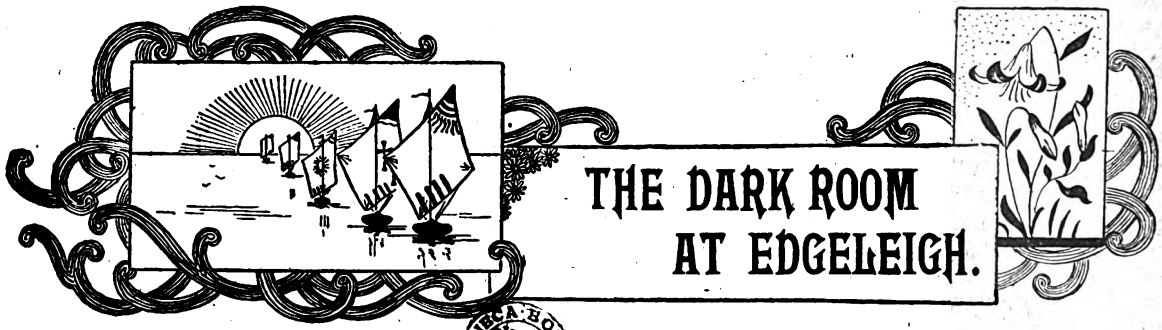
He rushed home and flung himself into a chair. He tore his hair and lamented the day when he decided to make the experiment; he flung the vial of serum far into the river which flowed at the end of the short garden; and he destroyed the syringe and the various preparations he had used, and then fell senseless.

A fortnight later, when he had sufficiently recovered from an attack of brain fever to be able to act sensibly, he found that he was quite blind in the left eye, and that the right eye was normal. And he heaved a sigh of relief that he was freed from that terrible power.

But he has abandoned his investigations and intends to keep secret the composition of his serum. So the world will never be enlightened on the subject of this great scientific discovery.

G. Day.

Digitized by Google



THE DARK ROOM AT EDGELEIGH.

BIBLIOTHECA HOLLANA

CHAPTER I.

Miss Mardyn's Secret.

Mr. Pitcairn, tall, handsome and robust, dismounted at the gate and walked resolutely up the walk to the house.

On the verandah sat Miss Mardyn, the handsome housekeeper at Edgeleigh, reading a book, or pretending to do so; and now, as Mr. Pitcairn ascended the steps, the book was closed gently and laid upon her knee, and the lady looked up with a rather dreary smile.

You may see a very pretty face, and might go far to find a prettier; but is there not something just a little mysterious in the eyes and about the mouth—in the general expression, to tell the truth—something not absolutely repulsive, but cruel, perhaps, and even somewhat sly?

If anything of this, Mr. Pitcairn did not observe it. Stroking a grey moustache nervously, he threw himself into an oaken chair, and said:

"Avice, you see I am agitated, and yet you don't ask why. Are you afraid of me?"

Her smile became even more languid than before, and she answered.

"Why should I be? Yes, I see that you are a little agitated. No bad news, I trust?"

"Yes, bad news. Cyril Cuthbert is coming here this evening. I have a letter from him in my pocket. He comes to ask me for Mary's hand again, although he has already had my answer. Gentlemen did not use to do these things when I was younger."

And now Miss Mardyn really laughed—rather ironically, it is true; but sweetly also.

"Now, do you know, I rather suspect Mr. Cyril Cuthbert would elope with Miss Pitcairn if he thought there was no more honourable way to win her."

"Elope!"

"Lochinvar, he would call it, and perhaps view it quite as a joke altogether."

Mr. Pitcairn stood up and began pacing the verandah, brows knit and eyes flashing.

There was no more said.

Avice Mardyn descended to Mary Pitcairn, who was walking in the garden; and while they were yet talking among the flowers, who should come galloping up the avenue but Mr. Cuthbert himself.

He was a fine-looking fellow, brawny and muscular, dark and daring. Behind him rode a servant, for in those days no gentleman was without his valet.

And so Cyril dismounted, and came up to the ladies, hand out, smiling and frank.

"Here almost as soon as my letter, I'll wager! And how are we all? Never better, if one must judge by looks. Well, Miss Mardyn, you see I have not forgotten my promise—here is the book you asked me to bring."

He produced a small, shabbily bound volume from his breast-pocket.

Its title was: "The Philosophy of Dreams."

The housekeeper at first did not apparently recollect; but presently she said:

"Oh, yes. Thank you so much, Mr. Cuthbert; and now I shall know everything about——"

But he cautioned her with a look. To Mary's surprised glance he answered:

"Only the oddest little secret between Miss Mardyn and myself, which you shall know in good time. You would not think that Miss Mardyn is greviously and peculiarly afflicted, would you? And yet it is so." And then he took Miss Pitcairn's hand as if to dissipate any little jealousy she may have felt, and added tenderly: "We will explain all in good time, dear."

CHAPTER II.

Plans for Flight.

Presently Miss Mardyn, leaving the lovers together, returned with heightened colour to the verandah. Mr. Pitcairn was still sitting there, moody and bitter.

"Lochinvar has come," said the lady.

"But he will go away without his bride," answered the old man. "I have thought of a better way than turning him out of the house. No one was ever thrust from my door yet. I shall play a diplomatic game, and cry checkmate first."

Miss Mardyn was honestly puzzled.

"He will ask for my daughter's hand, and I shall refuse him. He will then attempt an elopement with her to-night. Do you know how I am to prevent that?"

"By strict surveillance."

"Precisely. She shall sleep in the Dark Room."

"The Dark Room!"

"No one has occupied it for years, Avice, as you know. My dressing-room forms the only means of entrance or escape, and we shall see now if Mr. Cyril Cuthbert will successfully play the rôle he contemplates. I shall confer at once with Mary, or will you give her the message, Avice?"

The Dark Room! thought Avice Mardyn. Truly enough, it had been unoccupied for years. It was said to be haunted—someone had committed suicide there.

Digitized by Google

And how gloomy a place it was—aptly named! But one window, and the light kept from that by two great trees outside, swaying and creaking in the windy nights.

At this point Cyril Cuthbert and Miss Pitcairn approached.

The young man was greeted coldly by the master of the house; but he took it not amiss.

Avice drew Mary into the long, dim hall.

She told her there Mr. Pitcairn's orders.

The young lady, pallid and frightened, heard attentively. Hands clasped and eyes upraised into the somewhat cruel face of the housekeeper, what were her thoughts?

Meanwhile frank and direct young Cuthbert lost no time in coming to the point with the master of Edgeleigh. Despite his entreaties, the old man was inexorable.

"Well, be it so," said Cuthbert finally. "In time you may learn to know me better and to regret this—this injustice."

And so they turned, a little constrainedly, to other topics. Cuthbert had evidently made up his mind. All that he now desired was to see Miss Pitcairn for five minutes alone.

She returned, and then he thought he detected something else—this interview could not be had.

Miss Mardyn was resolutely in the way. By whose direction? It needed no ghost to come out of the grave to answer that.

For the first time he found out what Mary Pitcairn had known from the first—that this woman was not his friend, and in business of this sort he wanted her as his friend—she was to be his enemy. A great many things just now recurred to him, and he could fit together what might otherwise have been a puzzle very well.

Miss Mardyn was, as we know, very handsome, and she was also accomplished, clever, and a woman of the world. Now, it is not safe to slight a woman like this, especially if she is as unscrupulous as comely; and so Cuthbert felt at length what it was beginning to cost him to have preferred so boldly another, younger, and by many degrees less gifted in certain senses.

However, he accepted the situation resignedly. He thought that he held a trump card.

Avice Mardyn, in a weak moment, when they first became acquainted, had confided to him a secret. It could not be dishonourable to use his knowledge for a purpose of his own now; for is not all fair in love? And he suspected something also—Miss Mardyn would not object to be mistress of Edgeleigh.

Luckily Mr. Pitcairn soon left the verandah for his study. Cyril sauntered over to the housekeeper, who was pensively contemplating the just rising evening star.

"We are playing chaperon to-night, are we not?"

She turned, her face for an instant flushed.

"Do you think so?"

"I know so. Mr. Pitcairn has directed you to prevent any private word between Mary and myself. I used to believe you were too good a friend of mine to league against me."

"You forget that duty is a higher claim than even friendship," said the lady, perhaps with faint sarcasm.

"Well, let us understand each other. Your duties, my dear Miss Mardyn, would quickly end here, I fancy, if my good friend Pitcairn knew that you had once upon a time taken a human life—your husband's."

She laid her hand upon his arm quickly, and her breathing was quick and fast.

"You will not betray me, Cyril?"

"Betray? Nonsense! I learned part of your secret by accident; the remainder you told me of your own free will. A short time ago, while stopping here at Edgeleigh, I happened, while enjoying a quiet midnight pipe upon the lawn, to meet a lady walking in her sleep. I awoke her, and found her to be Miss Avice Mardyn. She, the next day, while suffering from the reaction of opium, which she used habitually, though in secret, confided to me that she had once been known elsewhere as Mrs. Powys, and in a somnambulic trance had involunarily stabbed her husband. Nothing incredible in all that; but a useful thing to know, as I find now. I am very well aware, in addition, that you still use opium."

"Cyril, mercy!" she whispered.

Mary Pitcairn sat some distance from them, perhaps wondering at Cyril's want of gallantry, but she could hear nothing of this dialogue.

"Mercy, on condition that you give me ten minutes' speech alone with the young lady at the other end of the verandah."

"Yes, yes! But for my sake—and yours, too—no more than ten minutes."

Cyril gave Mary his arm, and they descended into the grounds.

There is a beautiful grove just to the right of Edgeleigh and thither they went.

An oak, long since shivered by lightning, gave them a seat, and here, Mary's hand in his, Cyril laid his plan.

"Darling, you must leave this place with me to-night. I have brought both my horses, and they must have fleet steeds who follow," quoth this young Lochinvar.

"But it is impossible, Cyril. I am to sleep in that dreadful Dark Room. Papa's dressing-chamber is the only means of entrance or exit."

Cyril laughed lightly.

"Do you forget who once lived here, sweet? My mad uncle, Byron Cuthbert—as great a rake as his namesake. The Dark Room is an enigma of which your father's dressing-room is not the only key."

"What do you mean, Cyril?"

"Only this—that there is a secret door to the Dark Room, by which to-night I mean to enter and carry you off. You remember the portrait of Miss Eleanor Digby at the right of the bed?"

"Yes; with the falcon on her finger, and in that stiff, high-necked dress."

"There are nine gilt circles in the frame, apparently ornaments; but one of these is useful likewise. The secret door can only be opened from the other side; but by pressing the upper part of this gilt circle—the fifth from the bottom—it will divide and form a sort of bolt. In that case the door cannot be opened at all."

"Oh, how strange, Cyril!"

"There is a staircase hidden—I will not tell you just now where," he added in a low voice, glancing round. "But when you retire to your room, dress for your flight, darling. I shall come, be assured; and do not fail in being ready."

"Oh, Cyril, I am so afraid!"

"Nonsense! To-morrow you will laugh at fear. We shall then be safely married, you know, and I've no doubt but we shall see penitent papa riding up to my gate—our gate—soon afterwards; and then, you know, reconciliation and the fatted calf and the champagne, and all the rest of it, eh?—over the return of the prodigal parent."

"What time will you come to-night, Cyril?"

"At twelve," he said.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER III.

The Figure Emerges from the Secret Door.

In front of the mirror over the bureau in the Dark Room stood Mary Pitcairn, dressing for contemplated flight that night with Cyril Cuthbert. Two tall candlesticks and the candles lighted gave dismal light at either hand.

No wonder the place was called by its gloomy name, for it was truly gruesome and murky as a hermit's cave.

Miss Pitcairn every now and then paused in her silent labours to glance at the door at the far end of the chamber, or to steal a peep at the portrait of Mistress Eleanor Digby, with her falcon on her prim finger, from behind whom we know what apparition was soon expected to step forth.

By that tiny watch lying on the bureau, and ticking away so cheerfully, we see that it is nearly half-past eleven o'clock. The wind is moaning outside; for, winter or summer, it always moans here; and the two great trees are wagging their gigantic heads at the window, and seemingly trying to peer in; but with this one exception there is a mournful silence.

Pallid and nervous, Miss Pitcairn continued her preparations. Just as she gave the last touch to her hat, she was startled by the turning of the knob of the door that led from her father's dressing-room.

The next instant Mr. Pitcairn was in the room.

There was something so dreadful in his countenance that the girl was frozen with terror where she stood. He was in his shirt sleeves. In his hand he held a revolver.

His lips were white and shrunken, like those of a man in mortal sickness, and his eyes were bloodshot; but he looked like a fiend. He had taken off his shoes, and was in his stockings, and now he walked over and sat down.

Mary Pitcairn recovered something of her strength, and threw herself at his feet.

"Papa, what is the matter?" she cried wildly. "What are you going to do? Why don't you speak to me—to your own Mary who loves you, papa? How you terrify me when you stare so! What have I done—only tell me what I have done, papa?"

"You were overheard to-night," he said huskily. "I know all. You are dressed, I perceive; but you will not leave Edgeleigh as soon as you anticipate."

"Oh, forgive me, darling papa! Indeed, he loves me—and—and—you would not consent to our marriage—and all this is my fault—indeed it is. He is not to blame."

"Not to blame? Humph! Wait."

He still kept his eyes fixed upon the portrait, the pistol grasped in his firm hand.

"Oh, papa, what are you going to do? I never saw you look so before," wept the poor girl distractedly. "You will not injure him. Punish me. It is I alone who deserve your anger, papa. I swear it is not his fault."

"Avice Mardyn overheard everything. She found out the entrance to the hidden staircase. Clever Avice!" he laughed horribly. "I shall marry her for this, and make her mistress of this place."

But in uttering these words he did not once glance at the child kneeling before him. It was a kind of soliloquy. He stared steadfastly at the picture.

"Oh, papa, you mean to do something dreadful. I see it in your face. You mean to kill him! But you have no right—you have no right. He has done nothing as yet—nothing at all. It will be murder!"

"I have the right to kill the man who enters my daughter's room secretly at midnight, and, by the Heaven above us, I mean to use it!"

Her hysterical pleading was like the despair of the Last Day. But she spoke to marble. Perhaps he pitied her—it would be hard to believe otherwise—but his purpose was inexorable.

And now she stood up, her hands crossed upon her distracted head. What could be done? A thought flashed upon her—the fifth gilt circle from the bottom! If she could press this unobserved her lover was saved.

"I don't believe there is a secret door," she suddenly broke out, in a changed tone. "This is some dull jest to frighten me. You, papa, and Cyril, have laid this plot, but I am not to be so deceived."

She went over to the portrait and began to beat against it with her small hand. "It is solid—it is," she said. "I knew there was no door. A pretty thing that none of us should ever have heard of it before to-night! Listen to that—solid as masonry. And see this frame, too; it can't be moved the eighth of an inch."

All the while her eyes were counting the gilt circles from the bottom. She came to the fifth. Her fingers pounces upon it in a second, and she was about to press the upper part. At the same moment another hand—her father's—writhed across her shoulder and clasped her own.

"Let that be. Sit down in that chair," he said, pointing to a crimson Pompadour by the bureau.

There was something awful in his tone—so terrible that she yielded at once. But she knew that all was over now. The hands of the watch wanted three minutes to twelve. She hid her face in her hands, but had not even the relief of tears.

Pitcairn went over to the chest of drawers and blew out the candles. A soft ray of moonlight stole in at the window, sufficient to illuminate the portrait.

He crossed back again to his seat, and held the pistol upon his knee.

In another minute there was a light step. With a creak and a groan something was pushed aside. A draft of cold and musty air blew into the room. A figure emerged from the shadow into the moonlight.

There was a shot and a scream.

Pitcairn cried, "Good God!" and he hastily relighted the candles. The atmosphere was heavy with the smell of powder and smoke.

He went over to the body on the floor, and found he had shot and killed Avice Mardyn, walking in her sleep.

Through the secret doorway Cyril Cuthbert, top-booted and hat on head, ready for riding, now appeared.

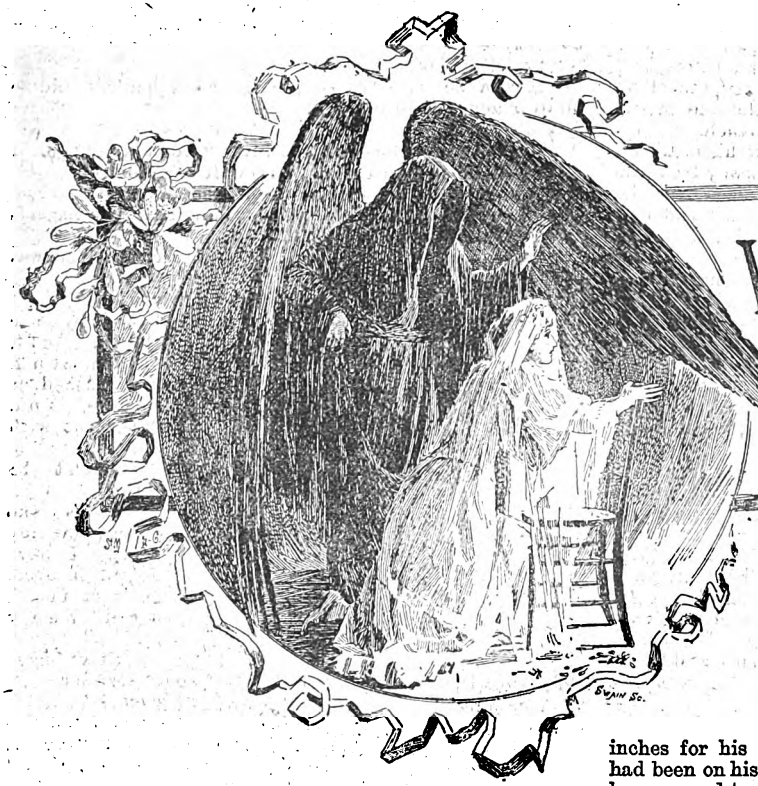
"You have murdered her for me, Mr. Pitcairn," he said quietly; and then in a few words he told of the dead woman's secret habit—opium eating—and how she sometimes wandered about in trances produced by the drug.

Pitcairn stared like a man who had lost his senses. Presently he began groping about the room, and muttering incoherently to himself. He left the chamber and shut himself up elsewhere, and nothing more was seen of him that night.

Next day he was taken ill. He lingered for many weeks in a state of delirium; but one evening, about sunset, all his faculties returned to him. He called Mary Pitcairn and her lover to his bedside, and gave them his blessing; and then, with a sigh, he closed his eyes and was no more.

Horace Adler.

Digitized by Google



THE WYTHECOMBE MYSTERY:

A ROMANCE.

By J. K. Leys.

Illustrated by S. Mar. Fitz-Gerald.

CHAPTER I.

'Twixt Life and Death.

"Can I risk it?"

The young man lay on the edge of the cliff and peered down. Nine or ten feet below him was a narrow ledge, covered with short grass, perhaps two feet wide. Towards his left, that is, to the north-west, the ledge continued till it reached the corner of the cliff. The sun had set, and the clouds opposite were already glowing in gorgeous colours—gold, and amber, and crimson—but it seemed as if that part of the horizon which was invisible, hidden by the projection of the hill on the left, must be even more glorious than the part that could be seen. The young fellow lying on the edge of the cliff was an artist; his sketching materials lay on the ground at his side; he had climbed far up the hill in the hope of being able to catch the sunset at its finest; and it was intolerable to him that he should after all miss the best part of the magnificent spectacle.

"Can I risk it?" he said to himself again. "I think I might. The ledge seems broad enough. Once down there I could make my way to the corner easily enough. But the getting up again? Ah! I have it!"

Rising to his feet, he quickly undid a leather strap which was round his portfolio, and passed it round the trunk of a small mountain-ash that grew near the edge of the precipice. Then, without giving himself time to think—for Launcelot Vere was painfully aware that his nerves were not the steadiest in the world—he grasped the free end of the strap in his left hand, and let the lower half of his body slide over the edge. Lower still he descended, supporting himself by his elbows. Down—down still—lower yet—till he was hanging by his fingers.

Then he dropped.

A cry of agony pierced the air.

The outer edge of the grassy surface had broken away under the weight of his left foot, leaving less than twelve inches for his support; but the chief part of his weight had been on his right foot, and, with one desperate struggle, he managed to get his left knee on the narrow shelf, and clinging convulsively to the breast of the rock he drew up his left foot, and stood upright.

Vere was a slightly built man, not particularly robust, and untrained in gymnastics. For him to have done even what he had done under any less pressure than the prospect of instant death, would have been a sheer impossibility.

After pausing a moment to recover his breath, he let his eyes wander over the rocky wall in search of the strap. It was hanging, as he knew it must be, within easy distance of his left hand; and he speedily grasped it.

Then he looked slowly around to see whether there was any better way of escape than scrambling up the few feet of rock in front of him. It soon became evident that there was not only no better way, but no other way whatever. Below there was only the naked precipice, he knew that. To right and left the broken ledge was not merely narrow and sloping, but manifestly unsound. He must climb up. It was not a great distance. The rock was rough enough to afford him some foothold, and, above all, he had the strap.

He grasped it as high up as he could, and gave it a hard pull.

To his horror it came away in his hand!

One moment he stood speechless, absolutely dumb with terror. The next, a cry to heaven for mercy went up from the hill, then a wild scream for help.

Help? How could help come to him on that lonely Welsh hillside? But he would not think it impossible, for it was his only chance. Death now stared him in the face. Already the constrained position he was standing in made him feel cramped and sore. To stay there till morning would be impossible. To move to right or left was equally impossible. Again and again his shouts rang out. Oh, how weak, how pitifully weak they sounded in that solitude! The grim rock above him shut in his cries, making it almost absurd to hope that they could be heard.

There was no answering cry. He hardly expected that there should be; and yet he strained his ears to listen time after time. The minutes seemed hours, and he fancied it was already getting dark. A feeling like despair came over the poor fellow; he shouted more madly than before, and then, putting his fingers to his lips, he whistled, schoolboy fashion, sending the shrill notes far along the side of the mountain, much farther than his voice could reach.

Digitized by Google

The mere effort to do this seemed to relieve his faculties. Another thing, he managed to ease his toes away from the rock a little without allowing his heels to project over the abyss; and the relief to the muscles of his back and legs was considerable. He put his arm on the rock, leant his face on it, and tried to think.

No; there was nothing he could think of—nothing he could do. He must husband his breath, and shout at intervals as loud as he could, on the chance that some shepherd coming down the hill might hear him. For the rest, he must hold on to that narrow shelf of ground, from which, every now and then, he heard a morsel crumble off and fall away down—down—with a sickening rattle far away below. "God grant," he said to himself, "that I may not go mad before the end comes."

Slowly the light faded out of the west, the gorgeous hues turning to pale yellow, green, and grey. The foliage of the rowan-tree which he could just see overhead became more and more indistinct. Launcelot was conscious that his strength was going fast. The strain was so frightful that he felt as if merely to sit down and rest on the shelf he stood on, knowing that he could never recover his upright position, would be a relief so sweet that it was worth his life to have it.

His limbs were beginning to tremble, when he suddenly started, and bent his head to one side. He was not deceived.

Faint and clear, like a bell of a mountain goat, came a voice from above:

"Where are you?"

"Here! Here! For God's sake come! Come quickly. My strength is failing."

A minute of silence, and again he called out. A third time he cried in his agony: "Come! For God's sake come quick."

And the voice answered: "I am coming as fast as I can."

The cramp was almost unendurable; but the poor fellow waited in silence—waited for what seemed at least half-an-hour (in reality not five minutes)—and then the voice hailed him once more. This time it was directly over his head.

"Are you down there? I can't see—— Oh, good gracious, yes!"

Vere was there, clinging like a fly to the face of the cliff; and above him there peered over the edge a girl's head. He could hardly distinguish it in the darkness from a man's; but he knew by the voice that it was certainly a woman who was looking down at him.

Then—

"How on earth did you get down there?"

"Easily enough. The question is how I can get up again. I am standing on a ledge of rock so narrow that I can barely keep my footing. If you can't help me I must perish."

"I will run and bring someone to help you," cried the girl; and the head was suddenly withdrawn.

"No! No! No! For God's sake stay where you are. You never could find the place again in the dark; and long before you could get back from the village I shall have dropped over. The cramps are already more than I can bear."

"But what can I do? I can't reach you."

"No; and if you could it would be of no use. I should only pull you over. Haven't you got a cord of any kind about you?"

"A cord? No!"

"Or anything of which a cord might be made?"

"No! Oh, I wish I could help you. I wish I could help you. It is dreadful!"

"There is a strap here. The buckle gave way, or I should have been able to climb up. If I could pass it up to you—but that is impossible."

"Do let me go for help."

"It is of no use—not the least. I tell you it would be all over long before you could get back."

A silence.

"Wait!" cried the girl suddenly. "Don't lose hope. I have thought of something. Just wait one minute."

A white arm waved for an instant, and vanished.

Vere set his teeth, and began to count, that the seconds might seem to pass more rapidly.

Three minutes passed, and the sweet, clear voice was heard once more.

"Look—I am letting something down to you!"

And the next instant Vere found his head swept by some thick, soft, woollen stuff. He brushed it aside, and grasped it with one hand.

It came away in his hand!

"What is this?"

"It is the skirt of my dress. I have ripped it open. It is of tweed, and very strong."

"How have you secured the other end?"

"I have doubled it to make it stronger, and put one end round this little tree, and I am sitting on it."

"I shall not trust my whole weight to it," said Vere after a little pause. "But it will be enough to steady me and balance me as I scramble up. There are rough places on the rocks that will give me a little foothold. One spring will do it. Only promise me one thing."

"What is it?"

"That the moment you feel the cloth slipping from under you, you will roll off on the grass, and not attempt to hold it."

No answer.

"Do you promise?"

"I can't promise that. If it slips I shall press on it more heavily."

"Then I won't come up at all."

"But that is madness!"

"I don't care. I won't endanger your life as well as my own."

"Yes; I promise."

"Here goes, then! Sit tight!"

Vere clutched the thick folds of the tweed with one hand, bent down as low as he dared, then sprang upwards—missed grasping the top of the cliff with his right, as he had hoped to do, but caught the cloth instead, swung half round, and for one dread moment his whole weight was on the dress. But it did not tear; and the next instant his toe caught in a slight projection of the rock and relieved the strain. Then, working his way upwards inch by inch, he managed to get the fingers of his right hand hooked over the edge of the rock.

Digitized by Google

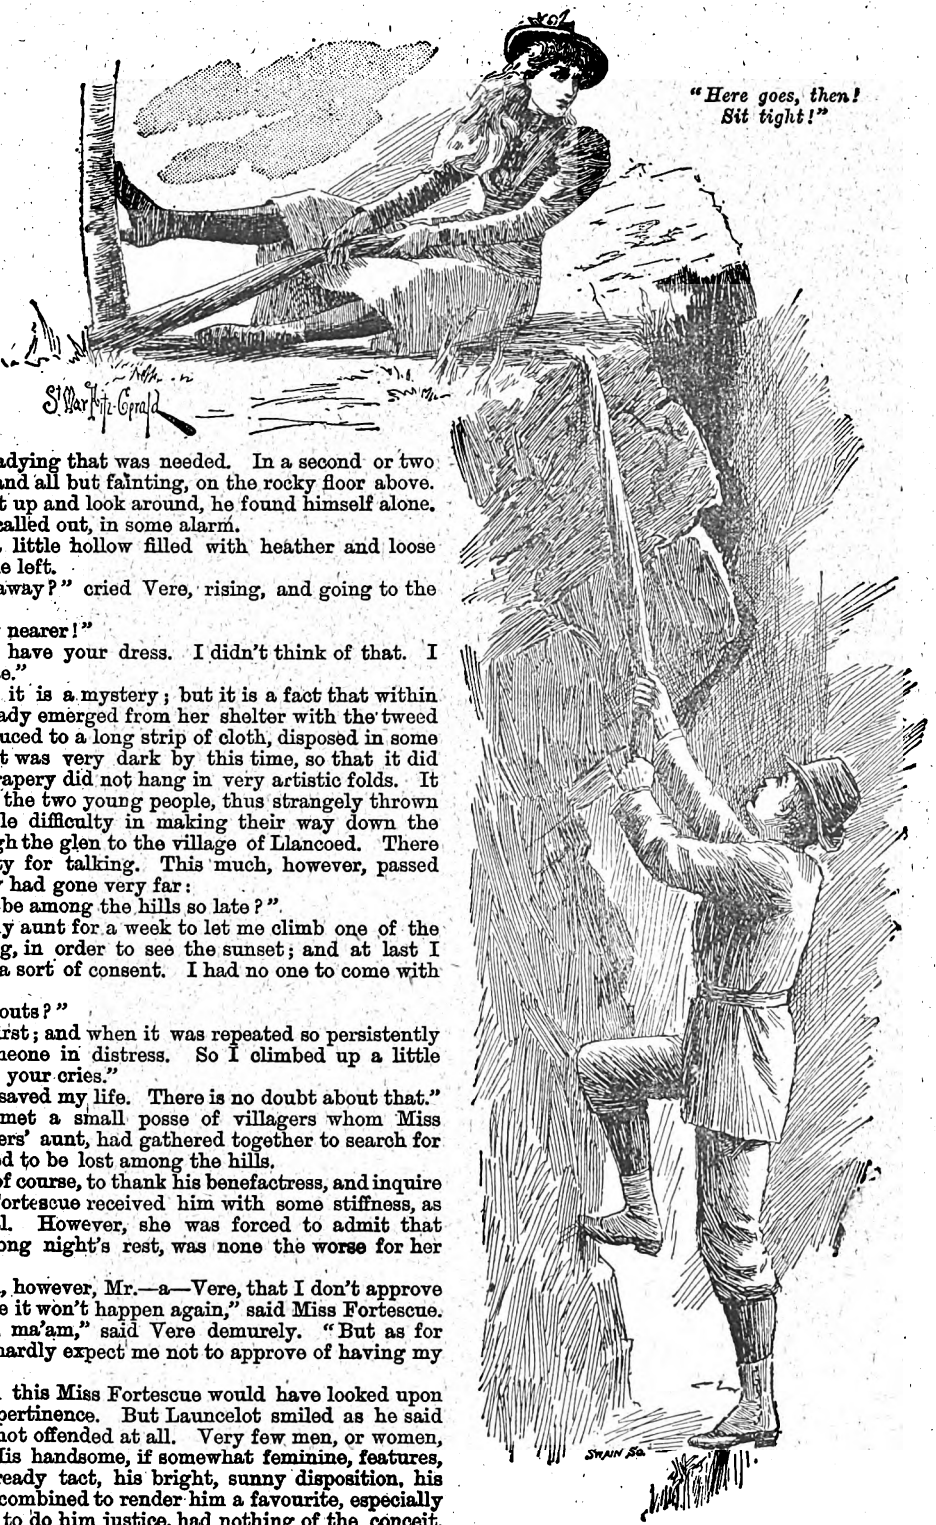
Now his knees grasped the cloth, and his left hand slid up a little way; then his right elbow got on the top; and so, straining and panting, he reached the summit. The moment it was practicable he let go the tweed and trusted to his elbows. It would have fared badly with him then, had not two strong girl's hands caught him by one shoulder. That gave him just the balance and steadying that was needed. In a second or two he was lying breathless, and all but fainting, on the rocky floor above.



"Here goes, then! Sit tight!"

When he was able to sit up and look around, he found himself alone.

"Where are you?" he called out, in some alarm.

An answer came from a little hollow filled with heather and loose boulders a few paces to the left.

"Why have you run away?" cried Vere, rising, and going to the spot.

"Please don't come any nearer!"

"Oh, you mean that I have your dress. I didn't think of that. I will bring it to you at once."

How she accomplished it is a mystery; but it is a fact that within five minutes that young lady emerged from her shelter with the tweed skirt, which had been reduced to a long strip of cloth, disposed in some way about her person. It was very dark by this time, so that it did not matter much if the drapery did not hang in very artistic folds. It was so dark, in fact, that the two young people, thus strangely thrown together, had considerable difficulty in making their way down the rough hillside, and through the glen to the village of Llancoed. There was but little opportunity for talking. This much, however, passed between them before they had gone very far:

"How did you come to be among the hills so late?"

"I have been teasing my aunt for a week to let me climb one of the lower hills in the evening, in order to see the sunset; and at last I worried her into giving a sort of consent. I had no one to come with me, so I came alone."

"And you heard my shouts?"

"I heard you whistle first; and when it was repeated so persistently I thought it might be someone in distress. So I climbed up a little further, and then I heard your cries."

"God bless you! You saved my life. There is no doubt about that."

At Llancoed the pair met a small posse of villagers whom Miss Fortescue, Winnie Denvers' aunt, had gathered together to search for the girl, who was supposed to be lost among the hills.

Next day Vere called, of course, to thank his benefactress, and inquire after her health. Miss Fortescue received him with some stiffness, as was perhaps but natural. However, she was forced to admit that Winnie, having had a long night's rest, was none the worse for her adventure.

"You must understand, however, Mr.—a—Vere, that I don't approve of such things, and I hope it won't happen again," said Miss Fortescue.

"I sincerely hope not, ma'am," said Vere demurely. "But as for approving of it, you can hardly expect me not to approve of having my life saved."

If anyone else had said this Miss Fortescue would have looked upon it as a piece of great impertinence. But Launcelot smiled as he said it, and the old lady was not offended at all. Very few men, or women, could resist his smile. His handsome, if somewhat feminine, features, his fine dark eyes, his ready tact, his bright, sunny disposition, his careless unselfishness, all combined to render him a favourite, especially with women. And Vere, to do him justice, had nothing of the conceit, the self-complacent priggishness of a lady's man. He seemed utterly unconscious of their regard for him.

Before he left the house that morning, he had gained the right of calling again; and he quickly availed himself of the privilege.

Digitized by Google

Of course, under the circumstances, Launcelot could not do less than fall in love with his preserver; but it is only fair to add that he could hardly have helped falling in love with her under whatever circumstances he had met her. Winnie was a trifle under the middle height, fair, bright-eyed, and decidedly pretty. If her mouth was a shade too wide, if there was here and there a suspicion of freckles on her white forehead, Vere never noticed these slight blemishes, or he considered them to be additional charms.

The courtship proceeded with marvellous celerity; Miss Fortescue took the alarm, but just too late, and by the time Winnie's visit was at an end, the fateful words had been spoken, and she was in a state of palpitating, strange, delightful, semi-delirium.

"I shall be very anxious until I hear how your father takes it," said Vere in a graver tone than usual, as he leant on the window of the railway-carriage which was to carry his love off to her home in Devonshire.

"Papa will be quite pleased when he understands how happy I am," answered Winnie with a blush.

Vere did not feel so sure. A country rector, with some hundreds a year of his own and a good living—Mr. Denvers was rector of Wythecombe—likes to know who he is giving his daughter to; and Launcelot Vere had nothing in the world beyond a half-formed reputation as a clever artist, both in landscape and portraiture. It was characteristic of him that he gratefully accepted the girl's offer to break the news of the engagement to her father. "I can always manage papa," said Winnie with some pride; so Vere stayed his hand, and the intended letter was not written.

"Why have you run away?" cried Vere.

But the Reverend Mark Denvers fairly took his daughter by surprise. He first pooh-poohed the whole wonderful story. "What, my dear? A strolling artist? Pooh, nonsense, my love. You ought to have more self-respect than hint at such things, even in jest."

Winnie was distressed, mortified, bewildered. But she persevered in saying that it was quite true; and presently a letter came from Vere which proved to the Rector that something serious was contemplated. Of course he peremptorily forbade the whole thing, but that did no good. The lovers continued to correspond; they had no intention of giving one another up; and the Rector was secretly unhappy. Then a speaking likeness—really a charming picture—of his daughter arrived from London, and being timidly presented to the Rector by Winnie, went far to soften his heart. At length Mr. Denvers gave way. He caught up his sad-faced little girl one day, kissed her, and told her she might send for that wonderful lover of hers whenever she pleased.

Vere came down, and submitted to inspection, and the Rector was forced to admit that he was a gentleman, and a very pleasant person to talk to. After that, his opposition was but half-hearted; and, finally, it was arranged that the wedding should take place in the following September.

In August Launcelot paid a second visit to Wythecombe Rectory, and stayed for some days, during which all the details were settled. The young couple were not to take a house at first, but live in furnished rooms (and save money) for the first six months, and the Rector promised to help with the furnishing later on. The bridesmaids were chosen, one of them being Winnie's bosom friend, Katharine Dale. Katharine lived with her widowed mother in a small house not far from the Rectory.

Launcelot had one friend in that part of the country, a man called Harold Kenyon, the manager of a branch bank at Darnport, a small seaport town about three miles from Wythecombe. Kenyon was one of Vere's oldest and most intimate acquaintances, and he readily promised to act the part of best man.

But amid all the pleasant fuss and bustle of the coming marriage, there was an uneasy consciousness among the Rector's daughters—Mrs. Denvers had been dead for some years—that their father did not really approve of the match. The fact was, that he had wished Winnie to marry some local squire, a substantial, genial soul, with no nonsense of cosmopolitan culture or feminine refinement about him—some man who would live quietly at home from Yule to Christmas, and never want to take his wife anywhere outside the county boundaries.

Vere was in many respects the antipodes of the ideal husband he had thought out for Winnie. He had consented to the marriage because he could not have his pretty daughter going about the house like a ghost; but he yielded to her entreaties with a distinctly bad grace, with many a half-smothered growl, and with an irrepressible inward misgiving as to the result of such a union.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER II.

A Strange Disappearance.

There was a pleasant stir about the pretty Devonshire village on Winnie Denvers' wedding morning. Groups of women assembled on the Green to discuss the event in all its bearings; many of the farmers had given their men a holiday, and the two public-houses were well filled. By eleven the church was crowded.

Just as the clock in the weather-beaten stone tower overhead struck the hour, the vestry door was flung open, and the bride came into the church leaning on her father's arm. Everybody turned and craned out his or her neck to get a good look at her. And indeed the sight was one worth looking at—the slender, fairy-like figure all in white, her yellow hair glinting through the cloudy lace veil that covered it, while her father, a portly, well-preserved man of sixty, stalked along by her side.

After them came four bridesmaids.

A heavy frown came over the Rector's face as he surveyed the people sitting near the chancel steps. The bridegroom was not there.

"Where is Launcelot?" he said to his daughter in an angry whisper, as if she were already responsible for the sins and shortcomings of her future husband. Then, recognising the absurdity of blaming his daughter, he added: "Bad taste to keep you waiting even for a second, my darling."

"He will be here immediately, I am sure, papa," whispered the bride in reply. "Perhaps the church clock is a little fast."

Now, any expression cast on the accuracy of the church clock was like smoke in the Rector's nostrils; but he made no reply. Only, he shut his lips tight, wheeled round to the altar, and contemplated with magisterial severity an angel flying heavenwards, as depicted in the east window.

Meantime the tiny hand that lay on his arm trembled a little. But Winnie did not look round. She was at once too proud to seem anxious for her bridegroom's coming, and too shy to face the crowd of curious eyes. Her gaze was fixed on the marble pavement at her feet. But her ears were on the stretch, listening with all their might for the well-known step.

Still she heard it not.

The vestry door moved. It was slowly opened, and the Rector threw a quick glance towards it. But he was speedily undeceived. Instead of the pale, delicate, refined countenance he hoped to see, he beheld a cloud of billowy white, and above it a red face terminating in a pink cranium, which was bounded on either side by a hedge of stubbly white hair. This was Canon Drake, the Rector's chief friend and ally, who had come to perform the marriage rite.

The Rector shuffled uneasily, shook his head, and finally frowned in so fierce a manner, that the Reverend Gabriel Drake precipitately retreated. The vestry door closed after him with a bang.

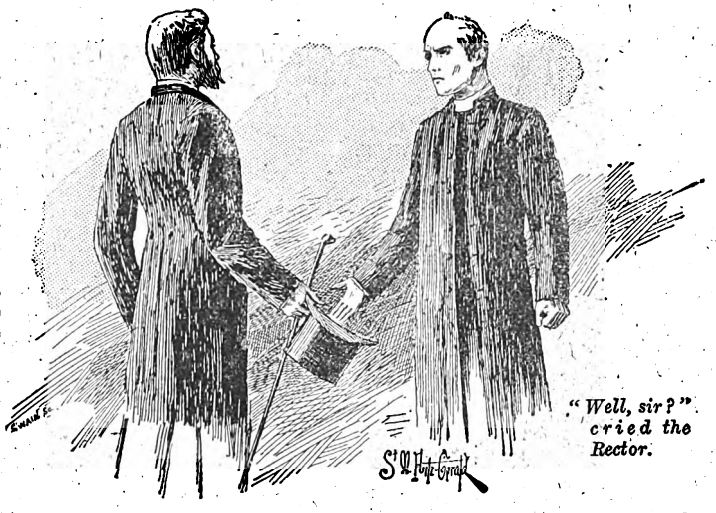
Then swiftly, without a word of warning, the Rector walked up to the vestry door, carrying his daughter with him, and followed by four blushing and wondering bridesmaids.

One by one the little party passed through the narrow door and disappeared.

Everybody in the church stared at his neighbour. Some of the spectators looked concerned; but most of them were grinning. Here and there one could hear a titter.

Hardly had the vestry door closed behind the last of the bridesmaids, when the Rector's wrath burst forth like a fiery torrent.

"Monstrous! Intolerable! The puppy! The—hem!—the insolent puppy! To dare to treat my daughter in this way! But I wash my hands of him. Never shall that fellow be son-in-law of mine!"



"Well, sir?" cried the Rector.

"My dear Denvers," put in the Canon, "consider. The poor fellow may have been taken ill suddenly; or he may have got into a wrong train; or there may have been some delay on the line. A thousand things may have happened which he could neither foresee nor prevent."

But this attempt to quell the storm only made the Rector more angry. He turned on the red-faced clergyman as if he had been the cause of Launcelot Vere's unaccountable behaviour.

"Sir!" cried his reverence, "I say a man ought to be at the altar at the hour named, whatever may happen."

"Even if he happened to die?" retorted the Canon with a smile. The next moment he repented his ill-timed jest. The bride, who had overheard him, turned white to the lips, and all but fainted. Two of the bridesmaids rushed out to seek for a glass of water. The other two supported her in their arms.

"I am better now. It was very foolish of me," she said with a faint smile.

"Come home, my darling," said the Rector tenderly. "It is long past the hour——"

He stopped, for the door leading to the churchyard had been hastily opened, and a young man in correct wedding attire, but with an anxious troubled expression on his face, burst into the room. They all knew him. It was Harold Kenyon, the best man, a special friend, as we know, of the missing bridegroom.

"Well, sir?" cried the Rector, turning on him fiercely.

"I have been to the station," panted the young man, for he was breathless with running. "He didn't come by the last train, and the train wasn't late. And I have been to the post-office. No telegram has come. I can't understand it."

"Neither can I," said the clergyman coldly, as he offered his arm to the bride. She rose and took it. "Come, girls," he said to the bridesmaids. "You may tell your friend," he added to Kenyon, "that he need not trouble to come again to the Rectory. If he does, the door will be shut in his face."

Winnie, hearing this, fairly burst out crying; and the bridal party set out for the Rectory, which lay just beyond the churchyard. Kenyon threw an imploring look at the last of the four bridesmaids, a tall girl with pale beautiful features, and a coronet of black hair coiled on the top of her head. This was Katharine Dale. She felt that he was looking at her and blushed slightly. Then, just as she passed him, she met his gaze.

"May I speak with you?" he said in a low tone. In reply she glanced in the direction of the Rectory, and nodded. Kenyon understood her to mean that he would have an opportunity of seeing her as she left the house, and he walked on towards the other end of the churchyard, where a wicket gate gave access to the Rectory garden.

Digitized by Google

Sat down on a flat tombstone.

As he passed the church porch he paused to allow a stream of people who were leaving the church to pass him. The children, released from their long waiting, were rushing noisily about.

"Where's the schulemistress? Why don't she keep the young uns in better order?" asked somebody.

"She's gone away!" cried one of the boys gleefully.

"Where's she gone?" asked one of the crowd.

"I dunno. Nobody's seed ur sin the day afore yest'day," answered the urchin, scudding off across the flat gravestones.

"Sarves th' parson's lass right, takin' up wi' a middlewit like thicky Vere; they say he's only a painter man," said one of the lads.

"He's a proper ape, makin' a vule o' her afore all the parish," chimed in his sweetheart.

Harold walked on to avoid hearing more. It was not surprising that these simple-minded folks should resent the slight cast on their parson's daughter; nor was it to be wondered at that they set down the pale Londoner, with his delicate artist's face, as an effeminate good-for-nothing. But it pained him to hear such talk, when, for all he knew, his poor friend might be stark and dead. He knew Launcelot Vere well; for years they had chummed together in London lodgings; and Kenyon thought he could have sworn that nothing but death or mortal sickness could have kept him away from Wythecombe that day.

Soon Harold reached a secluded part of the churchyard, from which he could observe the gate through which Katharine Dale, the girl he wished to see, must pass, and sat down on a flat tombstone.

He had not long to wait.

He heard the latch of the little gate click, and his heart beat painfully, beat so that for the instant he could not have spoken.

A sad smile was on the girl's face as she approached.

"You wanted to see me?" she said gently.

"Yes. I want some one to tell Miss Denvers that I am certain it is not Vere's fault that he is not here. I would stake my life on it."

"But you have only your own belief to offer; you have no evidence."

"True, I have no evidence; but I know Launcelot Vere as well as I know myself. He is weak in some respects, but he is incapable of staying away deliberately. Something must have happened to him. He may have been run over in the street, for example, and taken to a hospital."

"It would not comfort Miss Denvers much to suggest that to her," said Kate.

Her companion scarcely heard her. His eyes were fixed on a lad who was coming up the lane, whistling—a lad with a brown envelope in his hand.

Harold rushed up to the boy and snatched the telegram from him. Kate, watching his face as he read the message, saw it suddenly change. It grew pale, then hard and stern.

"It is not from Vere," he said abruptly. "It is from a friend to whom I wired this morning, begging him to call at Vere's rooms and make inquiries. This what he says—

"'Called at Vere's. He has not been at his rooms since Tuesday afternoon. Left no message. Shall I inform police?'"

"This is very strange," murmured Miss Dale. The young man was staring at her with his clear, brown eyes, but she did not feel offended, nor did she shrink from his gaze as she had done lately. She saw that he was not thinking of her at that moment.

"Miss Dale," he said in a voice that was hoarse with excitement, but perfectly firm, "either poor Launcelot is dead, or has met with an accident or foul play of some kind. I am going to look for him, and I shall look till I find him. I shall start for London at once, and you will tell Miss Denvers that——"

"Don't let me interrupt your conversation," said a voice close by. The speaker's steps had not been audible on the thick turf of the grassy lane. Katharine blushed furiously, but did not look round just at once. Harold, looking up, saw a good-looking man, just over the middle height, physically strong, dressed in correct morning costume—a man with a sallow complexion, fine dark eyes, hair, whiskers, and moustache all cut short, no beard. A pince-nez dangled from his waistcoat button. His age might have been anything between thirty and forty. His air was quiet, pleasant, distinctly that of a gentleman.

"How d'ye do, Mr. Shenstone?" said Harold rather stiffly.

The new-comer returned the salutation rather more cordially, lifted his hat with a smile to Miss Dale, and held the hand she offered him a second or two longer than was necessary. This was only natural, as the two were engaged to be married.

"We were speaking about Mr. Vere's strange absence," said Kate. She spoke to her fiancé, but kept her eyes fixed on Kenyon's face. "Mr. Kenyon thinks something must have happened to him, as he has not been heard of at his rooms for the last two days."

"You don't say so!"

"Yes. Mr. Kenyon has just had a telegram. He is going up to London to make inquiries."

"Oh, indeed—yes. Of course, some of Mr. Vere's friends ought to make inquiries."

"He has no relations—none in this country, at all events; and I believe no nearer friend than I."

"Yes; you would be the very person. But won't you find it difficult to get away from the bank? If you like——"

At this moment a housemaid came running down the garden-path with a message for Miss Dale. "Miss Winifred," she said, "was in a very sad way, and would Miss Dale go back and sit with her a bit?"

She turned at once to go, her lover walking as far as the garden gate by her side.

Kenyon waited for him to return.

"You were going to say something," he said when Shenstone came back.

"Yes; I was going to say that if you could not spare the time to conduct this search—it may take a good while, you know,—I would go in your place. But I fancy you would rather go yourself."

"Yes, I would rather go myself, thanks. But there is something else on your mind, isn't there? You have an idea about Vere's disappearance? What is it?"

Digitized by Google

"An idea has occurred to me—it would occur to anyone—but I could not speak of it before Miss Dale. Have you heard that Miss Unwin is missing too?"

"Miss Unwin? Yes, I did hear some one say that she was not at the church this morning—that she had left home. But you don't imagine—you don't for a moment suppose that she and Vere have run away together! Ha! ha! ha! Excuse me, but the notion is too ridiculous." And, more from the excitement under which he was labouring than from anything superlatively funny in the idea, the young man laughed long and loudly.

"My dear fellow," remonstrated the other, "don't say I said they eloped. I only say it is odd that the two disappearances should have taken place at one and the same time. It may be only a coincidence, but these things generally are not coincidences."

"The girl may only have gone home for a day or two."

"Possibly; but it is odd that she did not tell any one where she was going. She left on Tuesday morning."

Tuesday morning! And the telegram had said that Vere had not been at his rooms since Tuesday afternoon! The thought staggered Kenyon for a moment.

"How do you happen to know this?" he asked sharply.

"The Rector told me," answered Shenstone. "He sent to ask me to play something on the organ this morning, as Miss Unwin had bolted—that was his expression, I think." Shenstone's tone was mild, so much so that Harold took it as a rebuke.

"You must excuse me, Mr. Shenstone," he said. "This affair has upset me so that I hardly know what I am saying. But I cannot believe that my friend has eloped with a woman like Miss Unwin, when he was on the point of being married to a lovely girl like Winnie Denvers."

"It certainly does seem odd."

"Odd! It is impossible! Why, I don't suppose he even knew of Miss Unwin's existence."

"There you are mistaken at all events," said Paul Shenstone quietly.

"How do you know?"

"Simply because I was in Dr. Luxton's waiting-room one day when your friend was down here—not the last time—the time before—and I happened to be looking out of window, and saw him meet Miss Unwin. Whether the meeting was accidental or not I can't, of course, say; but it was friendly enough. He smiled; she blushed—you know the sort of thing—they shook hands, and he turned and walked with her till they passed out of sight."

A housemaid came . . . with a message.

"It is not true!" cried Harold passionately. "That is, I mean, it can't be true. You must have been mistaken."

"My dear fellow, the thing happened in broad daylight. Others must have seen it as well as I."

"Then he must have met her somewhere before. There may be a perfectly innocent explanation—"

"Oh, certainly! I only mentioned it because you seemed to think the two had not been acquainted. But what do you mean to do?"

"I shall go first of all to the schoolhouse and ascertain all I can about Miss Unwin's departure—find out whether it really seems to be an elopement or not."

"You could not do better."

"Then I shall go up to town this afternoon, and to-morrow I shall visit or send to the hospitals, the police-stations, the houses of all his acquaintances. Is there anything else you think I might do?"

Shenstone paused for some seconds.

Shenstone paused for some seconds, and when he did speak it was in a hesitating way, as if to speak were an effort to him.

"I don't want to hurt your feelings," he said; "but if you really wish to hear tidings of your friend——"

"Yes?"

"Well, Miss Unwin left this place yesterday morning."

"So it is supposed."

"In that case, if she went to London she would arrive at Paddington about six. I should inquire there if any of the railway people noticed her, and ask whether anyone met her at the station."

Harold turned almost angrily on his companion.

"If you mean that Vere may have met her at the station, I don't believe it for one moment!" he cried.

"I daresay you are right," replied the other in a soothing tone. "I beg you not to imagine that I am accusing your friend of running off with the schoolmistress. I only say it is queer that he and this Miss Unwin should have disappeared on the same—about the same time; and that common sense suggests that if you want to find him you should try to trace the lady's movements."

"It is a thousand chances to one that anyone should have noticed Miss Unwin at Paddington—supposing she went to London."

"Quite true. I'm afraid it's a poor chance. But when you have exhausted all other means of finding Mr. Vere, it might be worth trying—that's all."

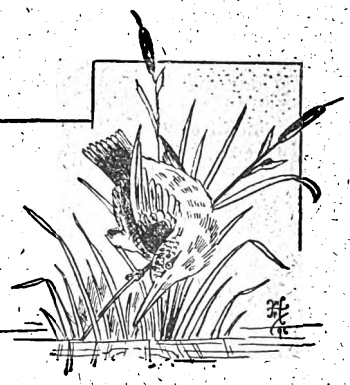
Upon this the two men parted, and Harold, as he walked rapidly on to the village, told himself that he had been unreasonably angry.

He was quite aware that he was considerably prejudiced against Shenstone, because he was to marry Katherine Dale; but that was no reason why he should resent Shenstone's drawing an inference from the facts which many people would consider a very probable one. So he resolved to try to master his prejudice and meet Kate's successful lover in a more friendly way the next time chance threw them together.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

THE PITY OF IT.



They were two jolly girl bachelors. For several years they had worked together, lunched and dined and breakfasted together, shared one another's heart secrets and been inseparable companions. Men who knew them called them ideal women. When one felt sad and heart-sick and given over to the little moods that make a girl wretchedly, miserably woe-begone, the other was always there to comfort or laugh the tears away.

No. 57, Lauder Buildings, with its tiny corners filled with downy sofa cushions was the resting place for more than one weary friend, who would drop in during the evening for a cup of fragrant tea and a comfortable chat. The little brass tea-kettle would hum a busy roundelay and join in the arguments as sturdily as if its fat little body contained a fairly good pair of lungs.

Margaret was the elder of the two girls. She was always the same good-natured, laughing Margaret, but was, nevertheless, a young woman with ideas of her own and any amount of wilful determination. Their men friends raved over Margaret's pretty face, but she sadly lacked the graceful, pretty ways that so soon disappear when a girl enters the busy world of business. Her whole appearance was that of a well-informed, independent young woman who was quite content with her masculine manners and airs of a happy girl bachelor. As to Dorothy, the other girl—well, she wasn't what one would call a pretty girl. Her nose was a trifle too saucy and her mouth could have been smaller. But she had wonderfully soft and fluffy hair that curled round her ears and then tied itself in a silky knot on the top of her head.

Her eyes were always bright and were of that tender brown that one so seldom sees.

During her working hours she was modestly demure, and would never have been noticed at all, but for the reason that she wore such plain and unassuming dresses. But at home she would dress herself in marvellous costumes of white material, with many ruffles of filmy lace, and knots of pale tinted ribbons.

They were so unlike, these two girls, yet they drifted through life, each firm in her belief that no other girl lived who was quite so unselfish, so sweetly dear and so thoroughly good as her friend.

"We must be nice old spinsters, Margaret, dear," Dorothy used to say. "Or cross old maids with corkscrew curls and plenty of cats and parrots, you know, because if you were to marry and leave me I'd die from loneliness, and I'm sure you couldn't live without me."

"Indeed I could not," Margaret would answer. "But I feel sure that you will be the first one to desert our little nest."

"How can you say such dreadful things?" and Dorothy's mouth would pucker up in a most melancholy manner.

Secrets were unknown to them. Love letters were always read and commented on and considered the rightful property of both girls. Simple Dorothy would dilate at great length over her love affairs, and many a laugh did they both have when Jack Ryerson took it into his head to fall in love with her.

Jack was an artist. Not at all like the fascinating fellow in the story books, who wears velvet coats and lives in a dusty and romantic studio, but a well-built man who was employed in the art department of a commonplace publishing house. He recognised Margaret's stately carriage and her well-chiseled features, but his artist's soul was quite enraptured with Dorothy's quaint little figure and dainty manners.

"Sometimes I think that Dorothy isn't a real live girl at all," he once remarked to Margaret. "When she stood there in the doorway a moment ago, with her head tilted to one side and her hair looking so pretty, I couldn't help wondering if I were not actually looking at some old painting."

Dorothy was very fond of Jack. They used to have jolly times when she posed for his pictures, and in fact Jack Ryerson's sketches of pretty girls were unrivalled and the envy of all his fellow-workers. After each of their little sketching séances, Dorothy would tell Margaret all about what Jack said, and how he said it and what she said back. But one evening after Jack had gathered up his crayons and departed, Dorothy marched off to her own room without the customary chat. Margaret was alarmed, she brought out the mandoline and sang in the hopes that Dorothy would emerge from her den to have her ruffled spirits smoothed down. But no Dorothy appeared. It was after midnight and Margaret has been asleep for some time when she is aroused by a white robed figure that glided silently to her side, slid two very cold arms around her, and with a dismal little tremble, sobbed:

"Maggy, darling. I'm so wretched and unhappy!"

"Dorothy," Margaret gasped, "you'll catch your death; go back to bed and go to sleep."

"Sleep?" queried Dorothy. "I can't sleep. I haven't slept for a week. I got some powders from Dr. Hall to-day and he said that I was just nervous and tired out and needed rest, but he doesn't know anything. He——"

"Is it Jack, Dolly?" and Margaret looked into the fine brown eyes that shone in the moonlight.

I don't know myself," Dorothy doubtfully replied,

Digitized by Google

"but I presume it is. I feel as if I hadn't a friend in the world when he's not with me, and I am too happy to breathe when he's here." Margaret smiled just then. "And that's what makes me cross and that's what makes me hate myself so. He probably says all those pretty compliments to every woman he meets. I know that he is one of those dreadful men that makes love to a girl just because he likes to and because it's as natural as breathing to him. And I loathe him. I loathe everybody but you ——" and then, with her heart unburdened and her face all damp, she buried her head on Margaret's shoulder.

* * * * *

Things were never quite the same after that. Somehow Margaret seemed less sympathetic, and Dorothy felt that she was no longer interested in her foolish affairs. Jack and Dorothy began to find comfort in their little quarrels that only those who are in love indulge in.

At last, one day their argument ended most unfortunately and, although Jack wasn't really serious, Dorothy felt sure that he was, and was quite broken-hearted.

"You do make me so unhappy," she pouted. "I almost wish that you'd go and drown yourself or hang yourself—do anything so that I'll never see you again. You keep me perfectly miserable all the time."

"Dolly! Sweetheart!" Jack pleaded. "Forgive me, I was only teasing you. I love you with all my heart!" Then noticing her sneering smile, he said desperately: "But you don't believe it."

"No, I don't," Dorothy answered pettishly. "How many girls have you said that to? How far down on the list do I come? Really, now, but doesn't your conscience trouble you when you think of all the feminine hearts that you have broken? But I presume you have become hardened to it," and then Dorothy started up a series of hysterical bursts of merriment.

"If I could only prove it, dear, I would," Jack ventured.

"Of course you can't prove it," Dolly gasped between laughs. "It is quite impossible to prove anything that is not true, you know."

"Dorothy, I can't understand you," was all Jack said, and slowly gathered together his scattered pencils, and put them in his pockets and departed without another word.

As he went out into the shadows of the street he was half inclined to rush back and entreat her to believe him. He did love her. To be sure, he had told other girls that he had loved them, but his regard for them had never been just like the affection he had for Dorothy. He would give his life for that moody, tearful bit of femininity that he had left curled up in a big arm-chair. He kept saying to himself in an insane sort of fashion: "Will you, Dorothy; I love you."

Then when he found that he had wandered for half-an-hour with the chill air cutting his face and making his ears tingle he laughed silently and said: "But I'll tease her. I'll pretend to make love to Margaret. By Jove! Why didn't I think of that before?"

A few days after that Dorothy was missed from her desk at the office, and for the first time since the beginning of their friendship Margaret lunched alone. During the long hours Dorothy wandered about Lauder Buildings, now plucking leaves from the geraniums in the window, now standing before the large mirror in the wardrobe smoothing her white cheeks, brushing back the curls from her damp forehead and studying her eyes that appeared to have grown suddenly larger. She would smile pityingly as she looked and laughingly whispered to the image that mocked her every movement. "He doesn't love you! How could he? He doesn't! He says that he does, but he really doesn't!"

And then she would wander back to the little desk and turn over the envelopes addressed to Margaret in the writing that she knew quite as well as her own.

But when Margaret went home that night Dorothy was like her old self. There was a bright spot on either cheek, and Margaret thought she had never seen Dorothy look sweeter. After dinner they sat down before the fire, Dorothy with her head in Margaret's lap and Margaret's arms round her. They talked over every happy hour they had spent together. And when the time came to say good-night, and Dorothy had kissed Margaret as was her custom, Margaret puzzled over the tear that had fallen on her hand.

Dorothy had planned it all that afternoon. Three powders, Dr. Hall had said, would cause the death of a ten year old child, and she had all the powders that he had left with her—there were ten at least. He had cautioned her so carefully, for the medicine was very strong, and an overdose would surely prove fatal. Yes, she felt that she was wicked. Jack loved Margaret. He didn't love her, with her plain face and moody ways. It was Margaret. How could she have been so blind? He knew that she, Dorothy, loved him, so he said all those pretty things to comfort her.

She slipped into the pink eiderdown gown that Jack so admired. She did her hair after the fashion that he professed to have liked best. Mechanically she folded and put away all the stray garments that were lying about the room. From her glove box she took a package that contained several folded bits of paper. Her gloves! They had never looked so pretty before. Her fan, too—but then Margaret could use it.

How her temples throbbed! What made her choke so? Her hands were damp and her heart seemed bursting with grief. Oh, yes, she had almost forgotten. She must say her prayers—she had never neglected them—so she knelt down beside the white bed. For some reason she couldn't frame the words. She could get as far as "Thy Kingdom come," and then she would seem to forget and would mutter:

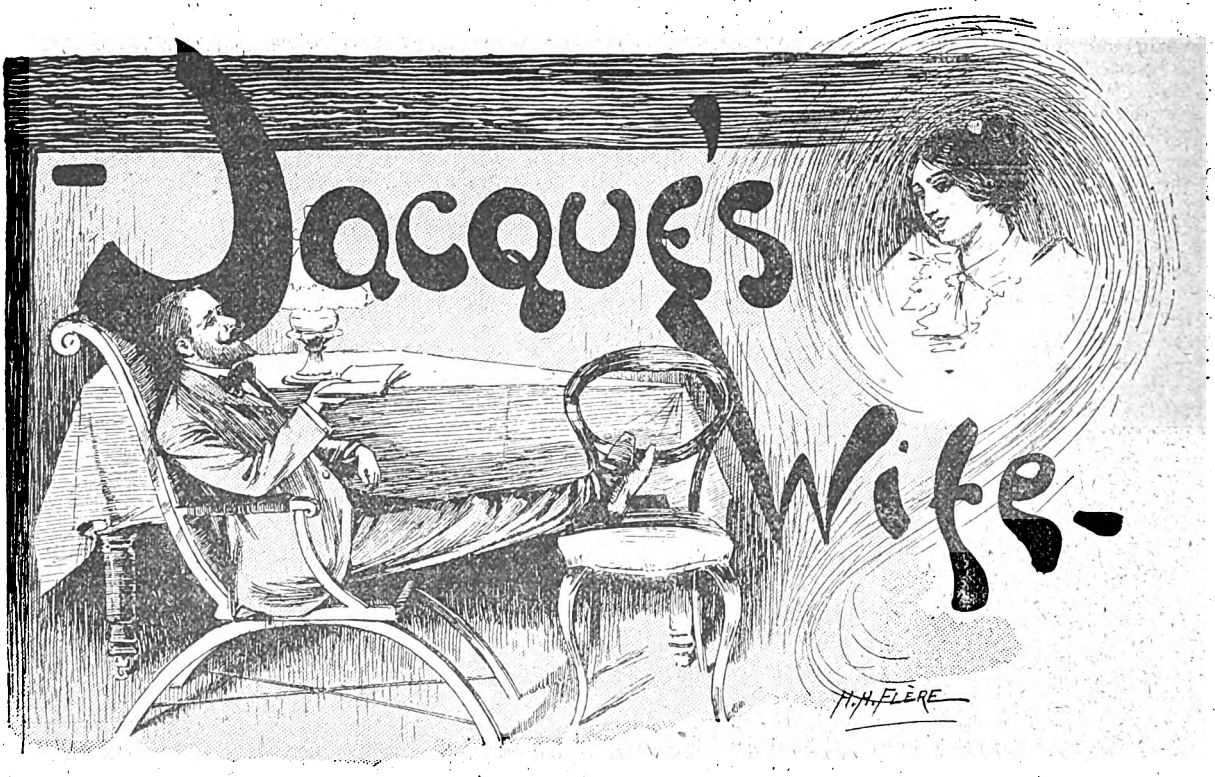
"Dear old Jack! When I am dead you can marry Margaret and forget all about silly Dorothy. I would not love you if I could help it, and I don't want you to love me because you are sorry for me."

At last she arose. How cramped her limbs were. There were the powders. Taking the cover of her porcelain powder-box, she emptied the contents of all the white papers in it. Her hands trembled when she raised it to her lips, but she grew strong, and in a moment was staring vacantly at the little cover with its feathery coating of powder. The bed seemed so far away. She tottered towards it. How soft the pillows felt! She was sleepy, too. What sweet music she heard, and who had brought all the flowers that were floating through the air?

There was an odour of jasmine—Jack was so fond of Jasmine. Jack! Why, there was Jack! Dear Jack! He did love her after all. It wasn't Margaret at all. If she could only run her fingers through his hair, but somehow she couldn't move her hands. Ah! Jack came closer then. Yes, yes, it was really Jack. She felt his warm breath against her cheeks, but she couldn't see him any more. Everything was so blue and dark. And as Jack's lips met hers, he knew that never now could she be his wife.

MADGE MORRIS.

Digitized by Google



Dismissing his servant for the night, Jacque shut himself up in his library, where a clear wood-fire was burning briskly, and, slightly lowering the flame of the lamp, he was soon absorbed in a book.

The little clock on the mantel struck ten silvery strokes, and in the silence that followed, the ringing of the street bell sounded shrilly through the apartment. As he was not expecting anyone, he did not stir. A second peal sounded, and this time he arose and, taking the lamp, went to open the door.

A dark form awaited him in the vestibule. In the light thrown sharply out by the lamp-shade, Jacque recognised his wife.

"You!" he stammered.

She did not move, she did not speak, but stood silently waiting.

Above them opened the shaft of the stairway, down which the single jet of gas cast a softened light, as of dusk. The sound of voices ascended to them from a lower floor.

"Come inside," he said.

He led the way to the library and made her sit down in an easy-chair, and then they looked at one another. It was five years since he had seen her. One evening she had left him; coming home, he had found the house empty, with a note on the table—two lines of farewell hurriedly scrawled in pencil.

Now, after five years of absence, she had come back, she was there opposite him, handsome still, but with an intangible suggestion of extinguishment, of dejection, of being faded, revealed in her air of weariness and suffering. She was dressed in a simple black gown, so worn that it shone at the elbows, and the seams were white. A strand of silver showed among the brown tresses on her brow. It seemed to Jacque as if something within him were sealed up, dead, for he was not at all moved.

Then, as he did not question her, she told him in a few words, without pretence of shame, that, abandoned in her turn, she had been alone since the evening before, that she had spent the entire day crying. She had eaten nothing, had gone out in the evening, wandered aimlessly about, found herself at his door, and had come in.

Still he said nothing, and in the chill silence five years of their life passed before their mental vision, his five years for him, and her five years for her.

When she had left him, when he had found the house empty, it had been the destruction of all his joys, the shattering of his happy life; he had thought he could never recover from the blow, and he had lived on like a broken thing, feeling his reason totter. That had lasted six months—a year. No news of her had come to him, and the hope that kept vigil in the ruins of his home died, too. Then he had ceased to think, had let himself drift like a wreck, like a lost thing. His home, a luxurious little nest, had redeemed him: he had been recalled to himself by being in his accustomed rooms, surrounded by familiar furniture; forgetfulness had come to him as it comes after all great griefs, as it comes at the end of all things, and Jacque had settled down to the even, satisfied life of an old bachelor.

She who had deserted him to run after what is thought to be happiness, had imagined herself happy, a queen, for six months, a year, just the time he had spent in lamenting and suffering. But the awakening had been terrible. Her passion satiated, she had judged in cold blood the man she had chosen, for whom she had broken all restraints, braved the conventions of the world, and denied her vows. He was small, mean, not to be compared with her husband, and the life of which she had serenely dreamed, a life of joy and unalloyed delight, had become her crucifix.

Digitized by Google

For five years, tied to that man, she had tasted drop by drop the bitterness of that loveless, faithless, sunless life, until the day when she knew the desolate despair of dead passions. Then money had been lacking, chilling misery had come, and the bond had worn till it broke. In her turn she had found herself abandoned, weeping in misery and alone.

And now life had brought together again this husband and this wife. He grew stout, commonplace comfortable; she weary, conquered, miserable.

In the silence between them, the noises of the street below sounded distinctly in the room. A cab rattled by, a shopman put up his shutters, a passer-by coughed, and the sound re-echoed in the distance. Jacque moved his keys in his pocket, and their sudden jingling roused him. He recalled his wife's last words.

"You are hungry," he said and he went to the kitchen.

There was some soup still warm, and the remains of a chicken, which he brought in. He served her on one corner of the table, where he spread a napkin, and as she ate, he made another trip to the kitchen and brought back a bottle of wine, from which he filled her glass.

He watched her eat now, saw the colour return to her cheeks, and her hunger satisfied, a sense of content gradually pervade her whole being. When she had finished, they began to talk.

"I have met you twice," she said, almost at ease under the influence of food and warmth. "The first time was three years ago, in a shop. You passed so near, you brushed against me. I turned pale as that napkin, but you went on without seeing me."

He seemed surprised.

"The other time," she continued, "I think you did see me. It was raining, and I was waiting for an omnibus. You came along, and I immediately hurried off, but you followed me. I walked very quickly, but I could hear your steps behind me. Then you lost track of me, for I looked back and you were no longer there."

He did not recall the incident; he was quite sure he had never seen her.

She went on to tell him that she lived quite near by in the same quarter; and he was astonished that, living so near her, he had been entirely unaware of her existence.

Now she settled back cosily in the chair, feeling relaxed, grown tender. She found this armchair just as she had known it before; she found all the things about her in their old places. Nothing was changed; the hangings were the same, the furniture, the ornaments—all had a friendly air, an air of welcome. It was good to be in this home, of which she was taking possession again after five years' absence. For did not this dinner on the corner of the table attest their reconciliation? The lamp on the table was the same that had lighted them when they kissed each other in the old days. It was all at an end now—that equivocal existence, the misery and disgust of those five years of slavery. She would resume her place in her home beside the husband who forgave her; she would make many happy days for herself after this leaf which was torn from her life.

"You!" he stammered.

Jacque considered her calmly, without anger and without tenderness. There came to his lips no words of pity. The woman seated there was an entire stranger to him. The other woman, she whom he had loved, the wife, no longer existed; his love was dead, and it seemed to him he could feel its ashes under his restless fingers.

Without a word he went into another room, and returned with a piece of paper—a bank-note for one hundred francs — which he handed to her.

"You have need of money," he said, "and if you should be in want again, pray let me know."

He took up the lamp and waited for her to rise. As one in a dream, she looked at him, followed him. At the door, as he opened it, she comprehended that her dream was ended, that he was sending her away, that she should return to the black street, to her cold, bare lodging, that he was implacable.

Her eyes implored him. Jacque opened the door as if he did not see her. When she was in the vestibule he held his lamp aloft, flooding her with light, as when she entered, and repeated in a calm voice that seemed to have a casual gentleness in it:

"When you are in need, pray let me know."

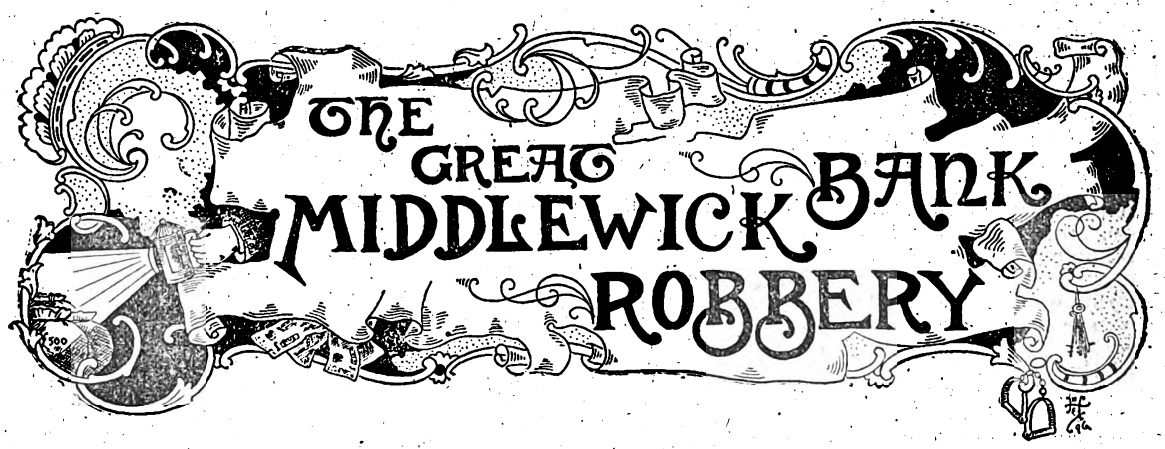
And the door was closed upon her. In the silence he heard her tottering steps descend the stair.

Louis de Robert.

"AN INDIAN DRUG"

is the title of a powerful new serial commencing in the next number of SHORT STORIES. The writer is "Huan Mee," author of "In Masquerade," "Alan Lindow's Wife," etc., etc., which in itself is a guarantee that the story will be of more than ordinary interest.

Digitized by Google



CHAPTER XXII.

THE next morning, after a hearty breakfast, Burton went round to the hotel where he knew Taylor to be anxiously awaiting him. When the door was locked and the two were alone, Burton asked:

"Have you any news to communicate?"

"No, I spent the evening, or rather a part of it, in completing my preparations for leaving Middlewick."

"Yes, we are both off to-day, having finished the saddest task either of us ever performed."

"I strolled past 'Glenmora,' also Rutherford's place, last night, but think both he and Mr. Bryant were out."

"Yes."

"I am waiting, Phil, for the particulars."

Thereupon Jack Burton, beginning at the point when he assumed the character of an innocent, unsuspecting farmer driving homeward with a miserable animal, related everything that had taken place while he was playing that part.

"There is the whole story," he concluded, "and the question is what is the next thing to be done?"

"Our work was to discover who stole the twenty thousand pounds, and that has been done. The episode of the four burglars has resulted badly—that is, for them. Since they are disposed of, they need no further consideration."

"Yes, that is so."

"The money having been recovered, all that remains is to restore it to the bank."

"But how? Suppose you or I go down there and hand the package to Mr. Bryant, what sort of story shall we give by way of explanation?"

"Simply that we have succeeded in recovering the funds but we cannot give particulars."

"That course was so direct that it is the one which instantly occurred to me, but fatal objections are in the way."

"Why not tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth?"

"That is, I know, usually considered the safest plan, but there are exceptions, and this is one of them. Reflect, and you will see the consequences are likely to be of the gravest character."

There was silence between the two men for a few minutes, and then Burton said:

"The first thing, I think, is for one of us to go and see Mr. Bryant at his private house. You came here in response to his request for a detective. He has known you as such all the way through. I simply play the part of watchman to the bank, and he still looks upon me as nothing more than a watchman. That fact will serve as a barrier between us, and, therefore, I consider you are best suited to interview him, as the utmost confidence must exist between Mr. Bryant and the one who takes the money to him."

"All right, then, it shall be as you wish. The sooner we begin, the sooner will come the finish—come in," in answer to a knock, and quickly unlocking the door. A page boy stood outside with a card, which he handed to Taylor. The latter glanced at it, and telling the lad to wait outside, closed the door again.

"What do you think of that," asked Taylor, passing the card to his friend, who read:

"Miss May Denton."

Underneath her name the young lady had written in pencil:

"Must see you at once, on a matter of the utmost importance, otherwise I should not take the liberty of calling."

"She'd better come up, I suppose, but what's to become of you meanwhile?" said Taylor.

"I'll wait in my room till she's gone. She hasn't asked to see me, and would probably resent my presence."

That question settled, Taylor instructed the boy to show the visitor up, and Burton went to his own room.

A few minutes later a timid knock sounded at the door, in answer to which the door was thrown open and Miss Denton was ushered in. One glance at her countenance told of the anguish that had prompted so bold a measure. She was pale, and her lips quivered, despite the brave effort she made to repress her agitation.

"There is no danger of our being overheard?" was her first question, when she was seated.

"Not unless we raise our voices, which I hardly think either of us proposes to do."

It was his manner rather than his words which reassured the young lady. She had come with the intention of trusting him fully, as indeed it was important she should do.

"You were surprised to receive my card, Mr. Taylor?"

"Yes, I will not deny that it startled me at first, but I may say that when I came to think things over my surprise passed away. I expected to hear from you to-day."

"Yes, but hardly in the shape of a reception here."

"Perhaps not, but reflection again showed me the best of reasons for that request. I would have been glad to have called at your house, but you could not have guaranteed that we should be wholly alone there, there is no certainty of privacy in the parlour of an hotel, and it was imperative you should see me alone, so this is the only place—that surely is sufficient explanation."

Digitized by Google

"May I ask," he added, "before you tell me your errand, whether you are prepared to trust me fully?"

"Quite."

"Thank you. Be assured that that confidence shall be respected to the last degree."

"Do you know my errand?"

"Yes, and if it is any encouragement, let me further assure you that I know all."

She looked him in the face, and in a low tremulous voice, hardly above a whisper, said:

"Then I come to plead for mercy."

CHAPTER XXIII.

NOTHING could have exceed the gentle courtesy and delicate consideration which the detective showed towards Miss Denton during this most painful interview. To convince her that he was truthful in declaring that he knew all, as he had asserted, he told everything that he had learned concerning the robbery of the Middlewick Bank.

Then when she began to plead for mercy, he raised his hand in protest:

"Say no more, Miss Denton."

"Oh, how shall I ever thank you," she exclaimed, her face aglow with happiness, "I shall bless you as long as I live. Can it be true, or am I dreaming?"

He repeated his assurances, and a few minutes later escorted her downstairs, saying, as he bade her good-bye, that he would call upon her uncle later in the afternoon.

"And now," he asked, as he rejoined Jack Burton and related what had passed, "shall it be you or I who will visit 'Glenmora'?"

"You are the man."

"As you think best. You will stay in Middlewick until the thing is through?"

"Yes, I may be needed, but I doubt whether Bryant will care to meet me when he knows all."

At the hour named by the banker, in response to Taylor's request for a private interview, the detective presented himself at the door of "Glenmora." The banker himself received him in the hall and led the way to the library, after having given instructions that under no pretext was he to be disturbed.

Taylor's experienced eye was quick to note the pale face and nervous manner of his host. He could not help knowing the subject which was to form the theme of the conversation, but it was impossible to conjecture all that was coming. Nothing was to be gained by circumlocution, and after the briefest preliminaries, the visitor came to the point:

"Mr. Bryant, as you are aware, less than a week has passed since the robbery of the Middlewick Bank. Twenty thousand pounds was taken from its vault, and carried away by someone whom it is evident knew the combination by which the lock was opened. That much you told me yourself, but had you so willed you could have told me more, for you and I both know only too well who that man was. When you saw the twenty thousand pounds placed in the vault of the Bank your temptation came, you who had scarcely ever entertained the thought of dishonesty now decided to steal that money; it was the supreme crisis of your life, and you fell.

"But with all the facilities at your command for doing this great wrong you saw the necessity of preventing suspicion, you displayed the cunning of the most accomplished scoundrel that is now serving time in any gaol."

There was no mistaking this language, but Mr. Bryant compressed his lips and nodded his head, saying:

"Very true."

"You had every facility," I say, "but even then it would not do for you to blunder at any point. The watchman, John Warren, was incorruptibly honest; even if he were not, you wanted no partner in crime, for a partner would compel a division of the plunder, and that did not suit your ideas.

"For years Warren has been troubled with rheumatism, and, as he admitted, has been accustomed to sleep away part of his nights on duty. But he was liable to awake, and it would not do for you to be seen, even though he had no right to question your actions. So you gave him a bottle of medicine for his rheumatism, with instructions to take it early in the evening. He did so: it contained a drug which forced him to sleep like a log for ten hours——"

"How do you know that?" interrupted Mr. Bryant, starting with alarm. "It is true, but how did you find it out?"

Easily enough. The fact that the man slept so soundly was suspicious and he was questioned. He still had the remainder of the medicine you so kindly gave him. Its odour betrayed the presence of laudanum. He had no suspicion, nor will he ever have, of the trick played on him."

"Where's the bottle now?"

"Smashed to fragments and the contents gone."

"Thanks—thanks for doing that."

"It is not I who did it, but another. One of the truest friends you ever had. He managed it so well that Warren will never have room for an inkling of the truth."

"But who is this man—this friend, as you call him?"

"One moment. Having disposed of Warren, you went to the Bank at midnight, opened the outer door with your own key, did the same to the vault, took out the money and went home.

"In order to more effectually throw dust into the eyes of others, you applied to Mr. Philip Cairns, Chief of the National Detective Agency, for help in tracing the burglars and recovering the funds. You supposed he sent but one detective here—myself—when he really sent a couple."

"Who was the second?" asked the astonished man.

"He came to you as Jack Burton, highly recommended by a banker friend of yours, so highly recommended indeed that you engaged him off-hand as watchman."

"And he is a detective," repeated the amazed host.

"Rather," replied Taylor with a smile, "and a pretty good one too, for he is Philip Cairns himself."

Mr. Bryant started, as well he might, at this announcement, for no suspicion of Jack Burton had ever entered his mind.

Taylor paused a moment, that the full effect of his words might not be lost, and then he proceeded:

"Philip Cairns is my superior in every respect, and he had not been down here very long when he suspected the truth, i.e., that only one person was concerned in the robbery of the Middlewick Bank, and that that person was its trusted Manager. It was one thing, however, to suspect, another to prove, and to establish that suspicion became his special work and province."

"What first directed suspicion to me?" asked the host, growing interested in the narrative, despite himself.

"Several things. The first, perhaps, resulted from the fact that you were one of the two to whom the secret of the safe combination was known, although, indeed, it was quite probable that Rutherford had discovered it for himself.

"A study of those three individuals led us, at first, to suspect your book-keeper, but Mr. Cairns was not fully satisfied. I may say that when you first called on the new watchman, I was with him, and hid in the cupboard. We were in the front of the building when we saw the white gleam of the letter as it was pushed under the door, Cairns hurriedly opened the door and told me to follow the person whose stealthy footsteps we plainly heard. I tried to do so, but was a minute too late."

"Do you know who that man was?" asked the Bank Manager with a grim smile.

"Yes, I am talking to him now. Neither of us saw you, but although you ran very quickly for a man of your years, your new 'watchman' afterwards learnt your identity.

"Once we suspected that Rutherford was associated with you in the crime, but that letter convinced us of our error. In the first place you began to grow uneasy over the fact that the services of a detective had been solicited by you. You proposed the compromise, hoping you could bring it about and secure the majority of the plunder without further danger to yourself, but it is fortunate for you, Mr. Bryant, that your proposition was not acted upon. The discovery of your guilt would have followed, and have become known to the whole community. It was for that reason that Mr. Cairns suppressed it; but he thought you were too good a man to have your life spoiled by a moment's weakness."

Digitized by Google

"Great Heavens! Why should he think that?"

"You will recall that I came here some days ago with the request for a specimen of Rutherford's handwriting. You gave it to me, but it was really a sample of your penmanship that I was instructed to obtain."

"I never dreamed that you had any purpose in asking for that draft of my letter."

"That obtained, Mr. Cairns and myself sat down and made a careful study and comparison of the two, and the disguised hand in the obviously mis-spelled missive that was pushed under the door of the bank. The conclusion that I reached was that Rutherford wrote the proposition, ostensibly coming from the burglars; I observed many similarities between the two.

"Mr. Cairns, however, formed another opinion, from which he could not be moved. He admitted the resemblance I pointed out, but proved that you laboriously made them for the very purposes of misleading experts in handwriting into the belief that it was written by your book-keeper, anticipating as you did the test to which it was subjected. That, Mr. Bryant, is the one act connected with this affair for which I can find neither palliation nor excuse, for it has none."

The Manager leaned his head upon his hand and groaned.

"But the very two who would have suffered most, had your plan succeeded," went on the detective, in cold, even tones, "are they who, knowing the truth, are most anxious to shield you. Your niece was more observant than you suspected. She attributed your strange conduct after the robbery to something more than worry over the loss of the funds."

"Rutherford was convinced," continued the detective, "that you would visit the hiding place of the money, whether you intended to return it or not. He followed and saw you when you halted by the rock with the intention of satisfying yourself that the packet was where you had placed it. Unfortunately, however, his interest became so absorbed that he betrayed himself. In answer to your angry threats he met you calmly and began an earnest expostulation and plea. Finally he exacted your solemn pledge to return the funds, and went home in the early dusk of last night."

"But," faltered Mr. Bryant, "when did he tell you this?"

"Neither Mr. Cairns nor I have exchanged a word with him. There was a third person who witnessed your interview. He dared not draw near enough to overhear what was said, but it was easy for him to judge from your actions what passed between you."

"With so splendid a chance before you, you were still weak, and for some little time after Rutherford left you, you stood irresolute."

"You are not precisely right," said the banker with a sigh. "When you saw me hesitate, it was not because I faltered in my promise to return the money to the bank, but rather was I trying to decide how to do it and still keep the truth hidden from others."

"I am glad to hear that, and I may say it was not I, but Philip Cairns, who was the third person present. When at last you stooped down to remove the notes, you found——"

"They were gone!" broke in Mr. Bryant, jumping from his chair and pacing up and down the library, overcome by excitement. "Yes, they had been taken by someone else, and now it is obviously beyond recovery."

"Stop, stop! This is too grave a matter for trifling; hear me through, I beg of you. After you left the opening in the woods, with Rutherford, Cairns, who was hidden among the trees, and who read aright the meaning of your action, went to the rock and drew out the package of notes intact——"

"WHAT!"

"It is as I tell you," interposed the detective, motioning him back to his seat.

Taylor slipped his hand into his breast-pocket. At this question he drew it out and tossed the package over to the banker. "There it is; not a penny missing. Gracious, man! Don't faint."

With a perceptible effort, Mr. Bryant regained his self-control, and said:

"But—Mr. Taylor—how—shall I explain the return of the money?"

"Tell the directors that the detectives secured it, but will give no further information. I presume they are like the average bank directors, and will be so pleased at the recovery of the funds that they will care little about bringing the criminals to justice, especially as they will save a goodly sum by not making the attempt.

"Our firm will send you an account for the services of Mr. Cairns and myself, so good-bye."

With a hearty handshake the two men parted, and so ends the great mystery of the Middlewick Bank.

THE END.

A BRILLIANT SUCCESS.

A VERY successful Melody concert, in connection with the new Musical Magazine, was given on Saturday at St. James's Hall, the most interesting feature, perhaps, being the presence of the distinguished French composers, Gabriel Fauré and Gabriel Pierné, both of whom conducted their own works, for which a special orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Arthur Bent, had been engaged.

The vocalists comprised Miss Esther Palliser, who sang in her usual finished manner Godard's "Hour of Love," Fauré's "Notre Amour," and Weber's "Softly Sighs." Mdlle. Landi's fine voice showed to perfection in Fauré's "Chanson du Pêcheur" and "Les Roses d'Ispahan," and in the second part in Gounod's "Mignon." Mr. Edward Lloyd enchanted everybody, and was encored in Godard's "Angels Guard Thee" and F. Clay's "Shades of Evening." Mr. David Bispham's cultivated style was heard to advantage in Gounod's devotional song, "Rest in Peace," and Adela Maddison's two songs, "Liebe" and "O, That 'Twere Possible."

M. Johannes Wolff played in his usual masterly manner two pieces by Pierné, "Berceuse" and "Serenade;" Saint-Saëns' "Serenade" and Wieniawski's "Valse," the latter of which received a well-deserved encore, and was responded to with Fauré's "Berceuser."

The first part concluded with a "Pavane" by Fauré, a most graceful and finished composition, in which Miss Esther Palliser, Mdlle. Landi, Mr. David Bispham, and M. Bagès took part.

The orchestra played Sellenick's "Marche Indienne" in a most spirited manner, their other items being Cowen's "Language of Flowers" (three numbers), and Sullivan's Incidental Musical to "Henry VIII." ("Processional March" and "Graceful Dance"). We must not forget to mention two characteristic pieces by Pierné which made a marked impression, the one being "The Vigil of the Guardian Angel," and the other, "March of the Little Tin Soldiers," the latter of which is sure to achieve popularity, and which appeared in Number Two of Melody.

The majority of the songs and instrumental pieces rendered at this concert will be found in the numbers of Melody already published. Melody appears on the first of every month, price Sixpence nett, and its contents consist of a variety of delightful pieces for the piano, violin, mandoline, and other instruments, besides various songs by eminent composers.

Digitized by Google

THE TALE OF A CAT.

When I first met George Herne he impressed me as being a remarkable man. He was well educated, even learned, yet in conversation he imparted his knowledge without a suspicion of pedantry. He was an omnivorous reader, was ever ready to converse on any subject that came up, and his conversation was brilliant. Withal he was a good fellow. I never met a man that took such complete possession of me on so short an acquaintanceship. When I had met him half-a-dozen times I counted him among my best friends.

Most men that are graduates of two universities and have improved their time at each are oppressed with a sense of their own erudition, and are anything but good comrades. Not so with George Herne. Though he had made the most of his time at Oxford and afterwards at Heidelberg, and at the latter university had dipped deep into German philosophy, his intellectual training had not caused him to lose the faculty of enjoying life, nor the power of contributing to its enjoyment by others. Among men of the world he was a man of the world, and a delightful one; among his friends that chose to draw him out he was an entertaining philosopher. However, his talk was so frequently illuminated with flashes of imagination, that I often thought that he believed, with Hamlet, that there were more things in heaven and earth than were dreamt of in his philosophy.

I had known him less than a year when one day, while strolling along Piccadilly, I encountered him as he was leaving his club.

"Come," he said, putting his arm in mine, "let us go for a walk in Regent's Park. It is a beautiful afternoon and everybody will be there."

I acquiesced. When we reached the Zoo, we paused for a few minutes to look at the animals, in which my friend seemed to take a great deal of interest.

"Do you know," he said, "I never look at animals without thinking of the doctrine of metempsychosis, and wondering whether or not their bodies contain souls that once inhabited human forms. Oh, you needn't laugh," he added, in answer to the smile I could not suppress. "Look at that camel's face. See its expression now. Is it not like your friend Jameson's?"

I had to admit it was like Jameson's.

"Well, why may not the soul of one of Jameson's ancestors be in that camel?" he continued. "And then look at the monkeys. Are not their faces grotesquely human?"

I agreed with him as to the monkeys, but said that they did not convert me to a belief in the doctrine of metempsychosis.

"Well," said my friend musingly, "I confess that I am a good deal interested in the doctrine, notwithstanding the poor repute in which it is now held. It has always had an extraordinary fascination for me. I could tell you of a strange adventure into which I was led through my interest in it."

"Tell me," I said. I began to be interested in this new phase of my friend's character, for he had never before spoken to me in this strain.

As we continued to stroll northwards in the park he related his adventure.

"One afternoon," he said, "I had been poring over some old books and indulging in speculations in regard to the transmigration of souls until my brain was in a whirl. I tried to dismiss the subject from my thoughts, but in vain. To get rid of the confusion of ideas that was making a maelstrom of my mind, I started in the evening for a walk along the Embankment.

"The moon, which was full, was coming up, and its light gradually brought into relief the objects about me. Even the shapes of the hieroglyphics on the obelisk were distinctly outlined. Of course, Cleopatra's Needle turned my thoughts to Cleopatra. I wondered if the soul of the fair Egyptian still haunted the earth, and if so, whether or not she ever came to look at this monolith, so long associated with her name. I wondered in what form she now appeared. Had her soul, I asked myself, suffered transmigration into an animal of a lower order, or had it been reincarnated in a human body?

"While musing thus my eyes were fixed on one of those great black mythological figures that support the obelisk at its corners and maintain its balance on its pedestal. Suddenly the figure at which I was looking seemed to move, and to spring from the pedestal, alighting on one of the stone flags only a few feet away from me. I expected to see the obelisk tumble. The figure, however, had not stirred, but a large black cat that had been crouching within its extended claws had jumped down and stood there in the moonlight gazing at me with great flaming eyes. She was the most graceful creature I ever saw. There was neither fear nor anger in those feline eyes, but a strange, fascinating look, that seemed to say, 'Follow me,' as the cat, with an easy movement, went down the Embankment and walked toward Charing Cross. 'It is Cleopatra!' I exclaimed.

"You think the idea absurd," continued Herne, as he caught my look of amused incredulity. "But you would not smile if you could understand the feeling that possessed me at the time. I was as firmly convinced that the cat was Cleopatra as I am that we are sitting here.

"Impelled by an irresistible influence, I followed the cat. Athough she moved faster than I, she paused now and then, and, turning to look at me, waited until I drew near. Then she moved forward again. When she reached Charing Cross she led me off into Leicester Square, and went down one of the streets leading out of it. I followed, keeping the cat in sight. At last she ascended the steps leading to a handsome brown-stone house. She paused, watching me approach her. When I was only a short distance from her she leaped into a little balcony in front of the parlour floor, and entered the house by an open window.

"When I tell you what I then did, perhaps you will say that the cat had hypnotised me. I myself have never been able to account for my action nor for the strange incident to which it led. What I did was to ascend the steps and ring the door-bell. The door was opened by a small copper-coloured, Oriental-looking man in livery. My intent was to inquire about the cat. What I said was: 'Is Cleopatra here?' A peculiar smile flitted across the visage of the servant as he replied that she was. Mechanically I asked if I might see her, and again the servant replied in the affirmative. I was ushered into the parlour, and then the door was closed.

"If some supernatural power had suddenly whisked me through the air and dropped me into a house in Cairo

Digitized by Google

my surroundings could not have been more Egyptian than they were. Everything in the room, from the furniture and the draperies to the smallest piece of bric-à-brac, reminded me of Egypt. To make sure that I was not dreaming I pinched myself. I was awake. Although I was in the room into which the cat had disappeared from the balcony, I could see nothing of her.

"Presently the door opened and a beautiful woman appeared. She looked like a daughter of the Ptolemies. Her natural Egyptian appearance was intensified by her costume, which might have come from one of the bazaars of Alexandria. I stammered an excuse for my presence, relating the incident of the cat, and saying that I had a great desire to know her history, and, if possible, to purchase her. My words surprised the fair Egyptian, who said she had no cat, and had never seen the animal I described. I learned from her that she was known among her acquaintances as Cleopatra, and she said that when I asked for Cleopatra, she supposed I was one of her friends. She told me her real name, and I remember that a friend of mine had spoken to me of her as an interesting and eccentric woman. I made further excuses for my unceremonious visit and retired.

"I afterwards met Cleopatra at a reception, and was formally presented to her. She invited me to call on her, and I have since been a frequent visitor at her house. I confess that I have become deeply interested in her. However, she is a greater mystery to me than ever. She tells me that she supposes she is an Egyptian, though she knows nothing of her parentage. She is supplied with a large income from an unknown source. She has tried to learn whence it comes, but in vain. Two of her servants, a man and a woman, are Egyptians, and have been in attendence on her as long as she can remember. They know, or pretend to know, as little as she in regard to her parentage.

"The cat that was the cause of our meeting is as great a mystery to me as Cleopatra. I have learned from one of the servants that although the cat has never been seen in the house when the mistress was there, she has often appeared when the mistress was absent. The servant accounts for this from the fact that Cleopatra has a great aversion to cats, and says that the cat undoubtedly understands it. But I sometimes think there is more than that in it."

As he said this Herne drew out his watch and, glancing at it, added: "It is nearly time for her to appear."

"Who?" I asked.

"Cleopatra, of course," replied my friend. "She drives in the park every pleasant afternoon, and usually passes about this time. There she is!" he exclaimed, pointing to a handsome equipage.

In the carriage sat a beautiful, dark, low-browed woman, who turned her eyes on Herne, whom she recognised with a gracious bow. As her carriage disappeared amid a hundred others that were dashing up and down the drive, Herne said: "Is she not beautiful?"

"Very beautiful," I replied.

* * * * *

A few days after Herne related his adventures to me I was called from the city and remained away over a month. On the evening following my return I went to his club. Not finding him, I inquired of one of his friends in regard to him. I was astounded with the information that he was in an insane asylum. It was said that he entertained the strange hallucination that he had been engaged to marry a woman in whom the soul of Cleopatra was reincarnated, and that the engagement had been broken off because he accused her of being a witch and transforming herself at times into a black cat that haunted the obelisk on the Embankment.

On the other hand, several of Herne's friends intimate that he was declared to be insane through the instrumentality of relatives who conspired to get control of his property. I know not what to believe. I know that my friend was eccentric, but I never thought him insane. I have begun an investigation of the case, and have learned that everything he told me in regard to the woman he calls Cleopatra is true. I shall continue the investigation, and if I am convinced that Herne is unjustly detained, I shall do everything in my power to restore him to freedom. Still, I know not what to believe.

ALLEN GOODMAN.

PICTURE ✣ PUZZLE ✣ PRIZE.

No. 6.

£10 TO BE GIVEN AWAY.

On the opposite page is a puzzle picture composed of 88 squares. If these squares be rearranged in a certain order they will form a real picture.

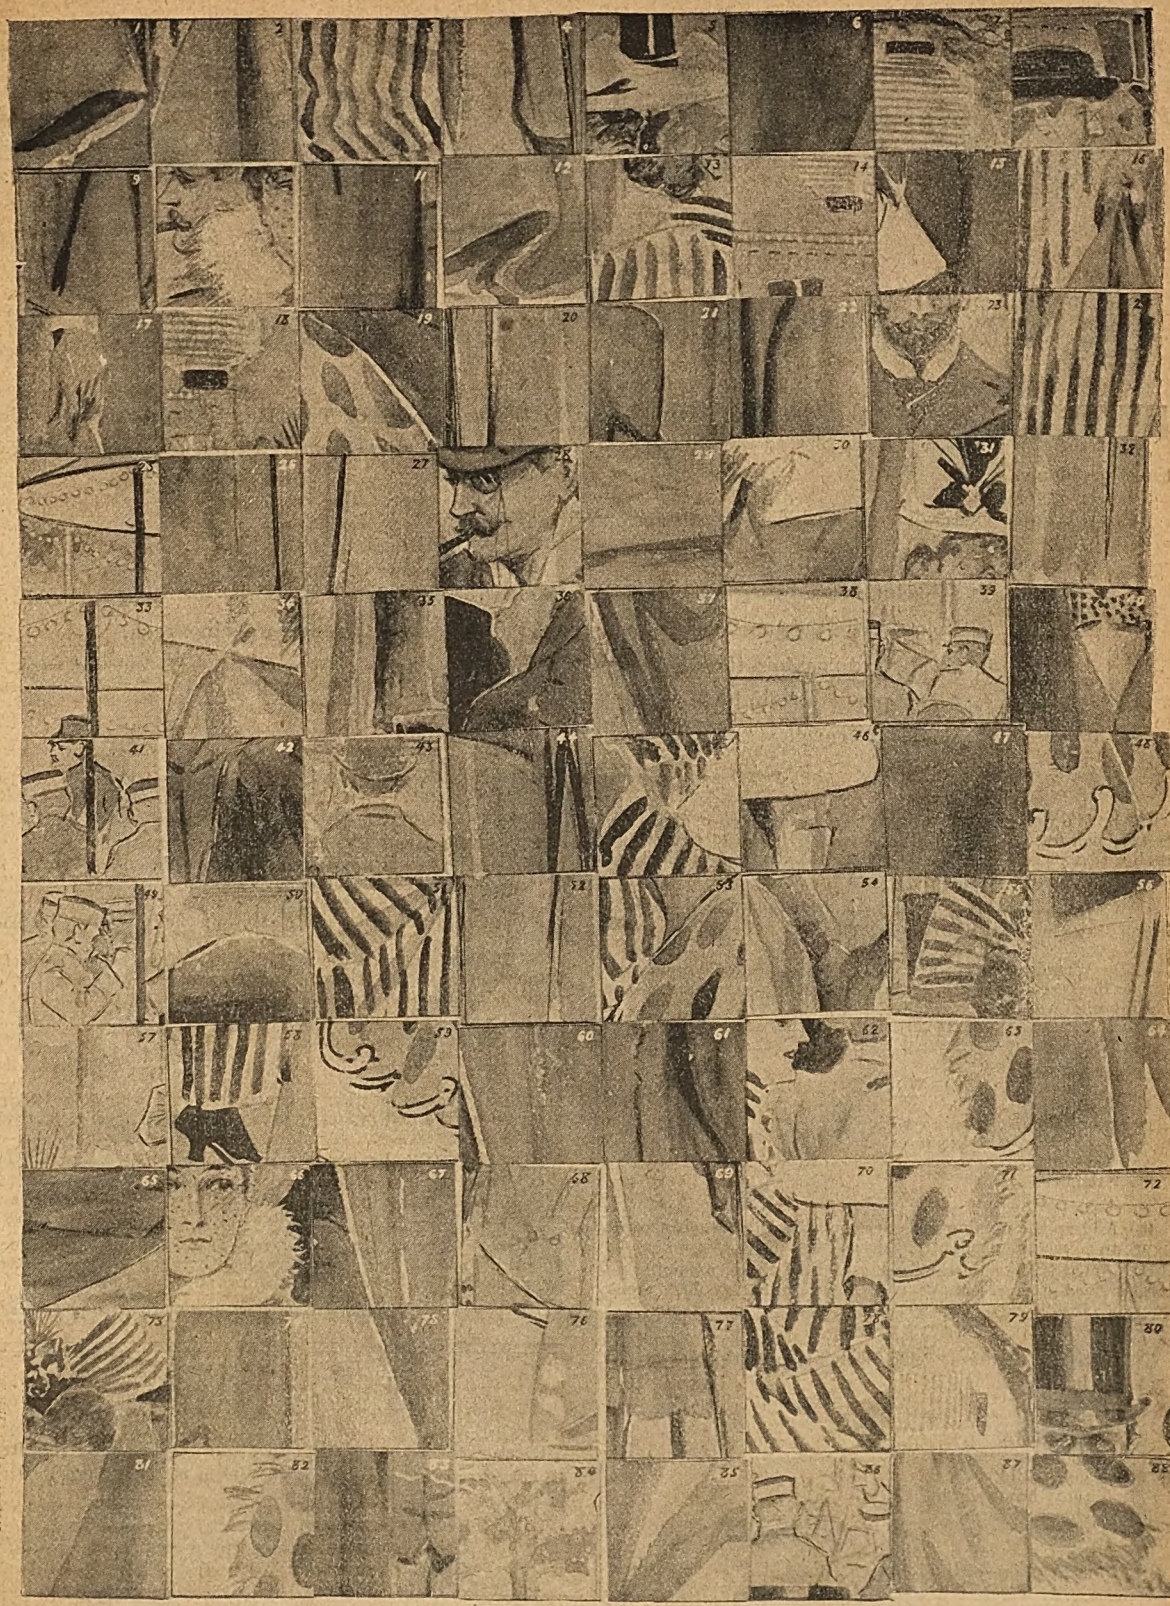
We offer a prize of £10 for the correct solution. In order to give readers in all parts of the United Kingdom as equal a chance as possible, none of the solutions received will be opened until Thursday, May 21st, when all those received will be considered together. In the event of two or more correct solutions being included up to this time, the prize will either be given to the sender of the neatest one, or will be divided amongst the correct competitors at the discretion of the Editor. Consolation Prizes will also be awarded.

If no correct solution be received on or before Tuesday, May 26th, 1896, the Ten-Pound Prize will be given to the sender of the solution then to hand which is most nearly correct.

Pictures should be packed flat or folded, not rolled, and the outside wrapper must be marked "August."

N.B.—To make the puzzle more difficult some of the squares have been turned upside down, others sideways.

Digitized by Google



Digitized by Google

THE BRAIN GYMNASIUM

NEW SERIES.

TWO PRIZES OF A GUINEA EACH.

BELOW will be found the third batch of ten problems in the new series of THE BRAIN GYMNASIUM. Two prizes of a Guinea each are offered weekly to those competitors who answer correctly the greatest number of these problems.

Consolation Prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

RULES:

1. All solutions to be written clearly on one sheet of paper.
2. Do not write the questions; simply put the numbers and the answer against each.
3. Each set to contain the £100 coupon (found on second page of cover) for the current week.
4. All attempts to be in by Monday, May 25th.
5. Mark your envelope "GYMNASIUM."

(21.) If a reducing glass, when held at a distance of an inch from a picture, diminishes its size to $\frac{15}{16}$, to what size will it reduce that picture—at the same ratio of reduction—if held at a distance of $8\frac{3}{4}$ inches.

(22.) How many (1) illustrations and (2) photographs are there in the May number of Pearson's Magazine.

(23.) When the necessary letters are placed to occupy the dashes in the following lines, the whole will form a sentence containing nine words:

H—R—E—E—T—A—L—F—N—A—O—P—R—U—I—Y
—O—D—S—L—Y—N—T—E—R—E—O—S—

(24.) WORD SQUARE.

1. To bestow.
2. One who competes in running.
3. A family of wingless insects.
4. Vigorous.
5. Salvers.

(25.)

(a) Add up the number of figures on this page, each separate figure to count independently, thus: 274 = 13; $\frac{15}{16}$ = 13.

(b) What is the monetary value of the whole, assuming the total arrived at represents pence. Thus: Total, say 705; money value £2 18s. 9d.

(26.) ACROSTIC.

The initials of the words defined below signify athletic exercises.

1. A luminant.
2. Besides.
3. Middle.
4. A negative.
5. A fool.
6. A male child.
7. Twenty hundredweight.
8. A chemical term.
9. A fish.
10. To turf.

Each word consists of three letters.

(27.) CHARADE.

My first is to chatter.
My second is an implement for catching fish.
My third is an expression of surprise.
My fourth is a gas measurer.
My whole is an instrument to ascertain the force of magnetism.

(28.) The letters of the following anagrams when correctly transposed spell the titles of articles in the May number of Pearson's Magazine.

1. I weld some tools.
2. Her hat is fun, Fred.
3. Her tail.

(29.) Discover on this page those words which by taking away either the first or last letter will have their meaning entirely changed.

Examples: (S)unbrowned, (s)lumber, son(g).

(30.) The following sentence when reconstructed forms a sentence to be found in the May number of Pearson's Magazine.

Africa to urging for us the regions of expeditions let such undesirable advantages turn the unhealthy upon emigration have to our most attention with neighbours and done of ever, our.

The punctuation marks are in their correct relative positions.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery.

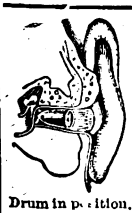
The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents, And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.



DEAFNESS

And Head Noises Relieved by Using Wilson's Common-Sense Ear Drums. A new scientific invention, entirely different in construction from all other devices. Assist the deaf when all other devices fail, and where medical skill has given no relief. They are safe, comfortable, and invisible; have no wire or string attachment. Write for Pamphlet. Mention this Paper.

Wilson Ear Drum Co. Agent: D. H. WILSON,

Drum in position, 7, Newington Road, Edinburgh.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free.—Address, H. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simples, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

Every Young Man can positively and speedily cultivate a HEAVY, HANDSOME MOUSTACHE,

By a few applications of Knowles' "Esauline," the newly-discovered Hair-Forcing Specific. Success guaranteed. "ESAULINE" thickens the growth of the Moustache, is an infallible cure for falling off of the Hair, weak or thin Eyebrows, Premature Baldness, etc., and as a general Fair Producer and Restorer is absolutely unrivalled. Will not stain or injure the most delicate Skin. Highly recommended for Children's Hair. From all Chemists and Hair Dressers.

Post Free, Prices, 1s. 6d., 3s., or 5s.

T. KNOWLES & CO.,

330, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

Send 4 Stamps and receive pair FOLDING SCISSORS, PATENT PENKNIFE, and Amusing Novelty Catalogue, post paid. VARIETY COMPANY, DALSTON, LONDON.

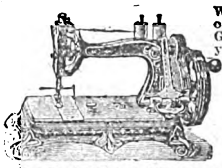
FREEHOLD LAND.

PLOTS or ACRES. Sales Every Week. LEIGH, SOUTHEND, RAYLEIGH, ROCHFORD, HERNE BAY, and MEDSTEAD. Shoebury & Goring Land Co., 67 & 68, Cheapside, are always selling good cheap land. Easy terms. Deeds free. Plans post free.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (350 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Store, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 183, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 183, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full natural perfect Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment, approved and recommended by the medical profession. Success guaranteed. For particulars free, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J." Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 97, Strand, London.

AJAX CYCLES FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN

ARE RICH VALUE. 25 to 30 per cent. saved and carriage paid.

IMMENSE STOCK, NEW AND SECOND HAND.

Easy Terms from 10s. per Month. Lists free.

Now Open.—LARGE CYCLING SCHOOLS at LONDON and LIVERPOOL. Addresses—

BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING COMPANY,

42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W., and 45, Everton Road, Liverpool.

Digitized by Google

GIVEN AWAY £5,000!

GRAHAM & CO.'S

MONSTER GIFTS.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—Messrs. GRAHAM & CO. intend to present their Customers with a Monster Parcel as a means of advertising their celebrated

EGYPTIAN GOLD JEWELLERY.

For the small sum of 6s. 6d. we will send as follows:—

NOT A TOY

WE GIVE YOU A WATCH.

	Our Price.
One Gent's Egyptian Gold Albert, or one Lady's Egyptian Gold Albert	2s. 6d.
One Seal or Locket for Chain	1s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Ring, or one Lady's 5-stone Diamond Ring	3s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Scarfpin, or one Lady's Fashionable Brooch	2s. 6d.
One Pair of Cuff Links, or one Carbon Diamond Bracelet ...	2s. 6d.
Total	12s. 6d.

FOR 6s. 6d.

In addition to the above Every Purchaser will be Presented Free of Charge with one of our handsome

KEYLESS WATCHES.

USUALLY SOLD AT HALF-A-GUINEA.

Read what is said by those who have purchased.

WANTS A SECOND PARCEL.

Lowick-by-Aleale, Northumberland, August 17.

GENTLEMEN,—Received to-day your second parcel of jewellery, with which we are immensely pleased. We really wonder how you can do it. The watch itself is worth more than the money charged for the whole. Many thanks for punctuality.—Very truly yours, WILLIAM McISAAC.

GOES BETTER THAN HIS £15 WATCH.

11, North Street, St. Peters, Tunbridge Wells.

GENTLEMEN,—Some few weeks ago I sent to your firm for the jewellery and advertised watch, of which I am surprised; the watch is a beautiful timist. I must admit, in fact, it goes better than my £15 gold watch; and for the jewellery it is astonishing value. I think you must lose money over such gifts, as I term it. The watch alone is worth double the 7s. I enclosed. I have shown it to several of my friends, and they were astonished. You can add this to your testimonials if it will be of any service.—I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully, LEWIS C. RHODES.

GUARANTEED TO KEEP CORRECT TIME.

Any Watch not received in going order will be exchanged.

Every Watch is Carefully Examined, Timed, and Guaranteed a Correct Timekeeper. Call and see them.

We do this to save the enormous cost of advertising, preferring to give our customers the benefit. As we lose money on each parcel we cannot supply more than two parcels to one person. If you cannot call get a P.O. at once, and send for this wonderful parcel. Orders will be executed in Rotation. MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

NOTE.—The entire parcel will be sent for 6s. 6d. (post free, registered, 7s.). Each customer will receive gratis one of our HANDSOMELY ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES. Be sure and call or send to-day for the

6s. 6d. Monster Presentation Parcel including the Handsome Keyless Watch.

S. S. GRAHAM & CO., 277, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A POWERFUL NEW SERIAL HAS JUST COMMENCED.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 387. FOR WEEK ENDING MAY 30TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

1896 PROCLAMATION.

Grand Pioneer Reduction Sale

By Messrs. F. HODGSON & SON, The Well-known Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds, will take effect on sight of this advertisement.

OUR NEW VENTURE! Yes, Two Different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright).

Whereas, in launching forth our New Production, THE "PRUDENTIAL" CARPETS AND HEARTHRUGS, we beg to state they will have a Rich Turkish and Persian Design on one side, and on the reverse the elegant and costly designs of Wilton make. The advantage thus gained is great, as they can be utilised in various rooms at one cost. This is a valuable step in economy.

PRODIGIOUS SALE OF THE

"PRUDENTIAL" Reversible CARPETS

(Registered.)

Reversible, with a different pattern on both sides, woven throughout with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in 10 sizes only. These carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian with the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

	Each.		Each.
6ft. by 9ft., Reduced Sale Price	4/9	9ft. by 15ft., Reduced Sale Price	12/6
7½ft. by 9ft. ,, ,, ,,	5/11	12ft. by 12ft. ,, ,, ,,	12/9
9ft. by 9ft. ,, ,, ,,	7/6	12ft. by 13½ft. ,, ,, ,,	14/6
9ft. by 10½ft. ,, ,, ,,	8/6	12ft. by 15ft. ,, ,, ,,	15/9
9ft. by 12ft. ,, ,, ,,	9/6	12ft. by 18ft. ,, ,, ,,	19/6
10½ft. by 12ft. ,, ,, ,,	11/6	12ft. by 21ft. ,, ,, ,,	22/6

When ordering please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

"Neal Lodge, Upper Norwood, S.E., January 18th., 1896.
The Dowr. Lady Abercromby is pleased with the 'Prudential' Carpets she ordered."

Blairquhan, Maybole, N.B., August 3rd.
Lady Hunter Blair writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son send her another 'Prudential' Carpet, same as before, crimson and gold, dimensions, 9ft. by 10½ft. Cheque inclosed."

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Reg)., to match above Carpets, sent for 1s. 6d. extra, size 2 yards long, and 1 yard wide.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Hearthrugs for 4s. 3d.; or 6 for 8s.; or 12 for 15s. 6d.

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ALARM" CARPETS

(Registered). GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Sale Price 2/11 EACH.

This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. We will forward direct from the looms to any address on receipt of amount, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, the largest ever sold at the Price.

Suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. A Rug sent with Carpet, 10d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER. 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs ... ... 7s. 3d.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly Examine and Compare these Carpets.

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON, 30/5/96.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

F. HODGSON AND SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants,

WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Telegraphic Address—"Eclipse, Leeds." Telephone No. 948.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle: or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 6d.; 1lb., 2s.; 2lb., 3s. 6d., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

THE

REV. C. HAVERGAL

(Nephew of the late Miss Frances Ridley Havergal)

Writes from 14, Alroy Road, Ansfield, Liverpool: "I can thoroughly endorse the statement of 'A CLERGYMAN,' whose testimony to the efficacy of your WIND PILLS for affections of the STOMACH, BOWELS, and LIVER, appears in The News. I shall be happy to recommend your Pills as I have opportunity. By all means publish my communication."

All sufferers from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND ON THE STOMACH, COSTIVENESS, SICK HEADACHE, NERVOUS DEBILITY, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, BILIOUSNESS, etc., should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

☞ The WIND PILLS being Purely Vegetable, Tasteless and Mild, and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

Of all Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for price, from

PAGE WOODCOCK, Lincoln.

7/6 SALOON GUN WITH 100 BALL CARTRIDGES. 7/6

TAKES BALL, SHOT, AND NOISELESS CARTRIDGES.

This gun is the cheapest in the world. It is not a toy, but a practical well-made Saloon Gun, 37½in. long, weight about 4½lb. 100 Birds or Rabbits can be killed with it at cost of 1/6 only with shot cartridges, or 6/- per 500. Will penetrate a deal board 1in. at 50 yards. Can also be used in the house as a Target Rifle. This gun is fitted with a beautifully finished stock, nickel-plated fittings, etc., etc. Price 7/6 with 100 Ball Cartridges. Each gun is tested, regulated, and proved before sent to customer. The "Union Jack" Pistol (Registered), with 100 Ball Cartridges, price 4/6, or pair for 8/-. Block Action Saloon or Garden Guns (very superior manufacture) with 100 ball cartridges. No. 1 Bore, 12/6; No. 2 Bore, 13/6; No. 3 Bore, 15/6. No. 3 Bore at 15/6 will kill a bird on the wing at 35 to 45 yards. Send for Price Lists of Air Guns, Saloon Guns, sporting novelties and ammunition. If you cannot send to-day, cut this advertisement out, and write some other time. ADDRESS—W. R. JACKSON, Wholesale Arms and Ammunition Dealer, Tottenham, MIDDLESEX.

(Mention this Paper.)

Send 4 Stamps and receive pair

FOLDING SCISSORS, PATENT PENKNIFE,

and Amusing Novelty Catalogue, post paid.

VARIETY COMPANY, DALSTON, LONDON.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S £100 COUPON.

No. 22

May 30, 1896.

S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

ONE BOX

OF

Dr. Mackenzie's Improved Harmless Arsenic Complexion Wafers

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire; clear, fresh, free from blotch, blemish, coarseness, redness, freckles, or pimples. Post free for 1/6.—S. HARVEY, 5 Denman St., London Bridge, S.E. Half boxes 2/9. Use Dr. MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL TOILET SOAP. 1s. per Tablet; No. 2 unscented, 6d. per Tablet. Made from Purest Ingredients and Absolutely Harmless.

Beware of the many imitations.

HAVE DR. MACKENZIE'S OR NONE.

TRILENE REG'D TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

"KEEPUMDRIE"

WATERPROOF GARMENTS.

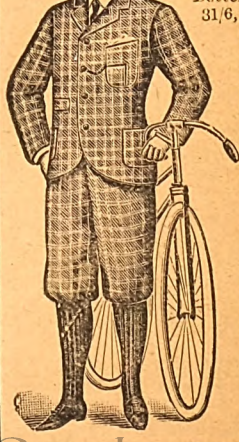
Marvels of Cheapness and Durability.

		FROM
CHESTERFIELD SCARBORO' - -	Men's	7/6
INVERNESS - -	Boys'	5/-

Illustrated list and patterns post free.

ANDREW POTTER, LONDON WORKS, READING.

HIGH-CLASS TAILORING



Every garment cut to measure. DIRECT from the Manufacturer, saving all Middle Profits.

MEN'S SUITS, 18/6

Better Qualities, 22/6, 25/6, 31/6, 37/6, 45/-, 52/6, 63/-.

CYCLING SUITS

From 15/-.

Value Unequalled. Fit Guaranteed.

BOYS' SUITS

Pieces for Mending sent with all Suits.

LADIES' TAILOR-MADE COSTUMES

From 10/6 to 70/-

See our New Patterns before ordering.

It will pay you to do so.

(Hundreds to choose from), Post Free on Application.

All Goods Carriage Paid.

Factory Clothing Company,

Manufacturing and Ladies' Tailors,

117K, ALBION ST., LEEDS.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

Edited by C. Arthur Pearson.

No. 387.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending May 30th, 1896.

THE POTTER'S WHEEL.

"VOILÀ! Jeanne," said M. Damasin, the foreman, "here is your fellow workman. He will keep your clay moist and make the lumps ready for your pretty fingers, and you must teach him yourself how it is done."

The wheel stopped, and Jeanne Carteret glanced up from her task at her future help-mate. Her grey eyes had a preoccupied look, but when they fell upon the quaint figure standing apologetically before her they forthwith danced with merriment. For lo! he was none other than the strange, mystical M. Personne—M. Personne, about whom every tongue in the little village had been wagging for many a day, and who was in himself a veritable enigma.

For in the springtime, when all the world was young and Nature laughed aloud in sheer delight at being there, a stranger strode into the little township of Arranches (which lies, as all the world knows, just across the Swiss frontier under the shadow of the Jura). He was very tall and thin, and though his face was strangely refined and his eyes gentle and luminous, his hair beneath the shabby hat was long and unkempt and his beard was ragged. His clothes he might have exchanged with the first scarecrow to the detriment of the latter. His boots were travel-stained and worn, and he carried in his hand the attenuated valise with which a Frenchman would start to the North Pole; he had evidently walked far and was very weary.

A strange apparition, truly, and one which scarcely recommended itself to mine host of the "Three Squirrels," where, in a singularly soft voice, and with a bow that would have befitted an ambassador, the wanderer requested a bed for a night and some supper. The landlord hesitated, but the casual production of a little bag of golden louis allayed his apprehension, and convinced him that his guest was, after all, one of those strange people with whom the outward evidences of respectability carry little weight. So the enigmatical stranger found shelter.

Not for one night only, but for many days he continued to stay at the "Three Squirrels," paying each evening for the charges for the day, and exciting an interest in the little town, of which he was fortunately in nowise cognisant.

For, curious as was his appearance, his mode of life was no less unconventional. At noon each day, he emerged from the inn, mounted the steep hillside behind the town, and, shading his keen dark eyes, scanned the glazed, white roads that lay right and left in endless perspective. Then he would press his hand upon his forehead, heave a sigh of relief, and return to the porch of the "Three Squirrels." He gave no name, hence the gossips in the village christened him M. Personne; nor did he once betray whither he was going, or whence he came; but his scant store of linen was of exquisite texture, and his shabby brown wide-awake hat bore the name of a Paris manufacturer. He talked to few and only when forced into conversation. His remarks upon intellectual generalities, when, for example, chatting with the village Curé, were brilliant and instructive; but of the subjects in which most are interested—contemporary politics, literature, and the like—he was strangely ignorant. But to all alike, rich or poor, he invariably evinced the most exquisite courtesy, and the children of Arranches simply worshipped him. Thus matters went on for several weeks, until the landlord of the "Three Squirrels" had long since ceased to trouble his busy brain about the mysterious M. Personne, or to doubt that the store of golden louis was not inexhaustible.

This condition, however, of beautiful trustfulness was doomed to be rudely shattered, for one morning M. Personne entered the landlord's little office and said very simply:

"My good landlord, I fear my most agreeable sojourn is at an end. I have but ten minutes left unless—unless," he added hesitatingly, and looked half pathetically at the landlord's face.

But the latter did not give his luckless guest time to state the hypothetical alternative.

"He was désolé—completely désolé. He loved monsieur greatly; monsieur was good and kind. But times were so hard, and the Communal taxes so high,

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

and the phylloxera had so ravaged the vineyards, that, in fact——"

"So be it, friend," said M. Personne sadly. "I will wander forth once more with ten noble louis in my purse, and sweet recollections of little Arranches and the 'Three Squirrels' in my heart. Yet gladly would I stay," he continued, and he darted a quick glance down the long road, and gave an involuntary little shudder. "I am very happy. Could I not earn some money somewhere—somehow? I am strong, though I am so thin, and once on a day knew something—at least, I fancy so."

The landlord shook his head. These white hands had never done manual labour; there was no demand for such intellectual skill as M. Personne undoubtedly possessed. And yet what a customer he had been!—four francs a day, and always paid at nightfall. And so gentle, and so magnanimous in the matter of "extras." It would be a pity to lose him.

Now it so happened that on that very evening there came to the "Three Squirrels" M. Damasin, the foreman of the pottery works which form the industry in Arranches. They were but poor little works, wherein was made just simple ware in use among the peasants of the district. But M. Damasin was a prescient and ambitious man, and foresaw possibilities of greatness in the Arranches pottery.

The little town had already been discovered by the globe-trotting English, whither they sought shelter from the scorching heat of Geneva; and wherever English people go they buy things. The clay of the district was singularly good. And, lastly, M. Damasin had discovered that he possessed among his work people one true artist, whose exquisite skill, recognised by himself alone, was wasted, but who could be depended upon to rise to her opportunities. This girl, Jeanne Carteret, had for the last two years "thrown" most of the pottery in the Arranches works—that is to say, hers was the task of molding the lump of wet clay as it lay upon the potter's wheel into the cup, saucer, ewer, or whatever was being made—a delicate art truly, and one for which the poor peasant girl was rarely gifted.

Her control over the plastic mass as it was whirled upwards on the revolving disc was complete, the manipulation of her fingers most dexterous; above all her sense of form was poetical and true. The command in the works of labour was as yet limited, and hitherto Jeanne Carteret had herself apportioned the lumps of clay ready to be cast on the potter's wheel.

For the future this was to be changed, and she was to apply herself entirely to the one branch of art for which she, though but a poor peasant, was so exceptionally endowed. To find an assistant, however, was no easy task. The knack of exactly forming the lump to suit the intended article, so that the oven be not encumbered with superfluous clay, was an intuitive faculty granted to few—certainly not easily to be discovered among rough-handed ouvriers, so, at least, said M. Damasin to a select audience that evening at the "Three Squirrels," as he disclosed to their wondering ears his cherished scheme.

But his difficulty was the landlord's opportunity. Why not give the mysterious M. Personne a chance? He was clearly a man of education and refinement. His hands were strong and lithe. He was an honest man and not such a fool as he looked, and—he desired immediate employment.

M. Damasin was astonished at the proposal; he liked not mysterious strangers; but then, after all, a workman's value depended on his skill, not his antecedents, and the more he turned it over, the more reasonable did the proposal appear, and so eventually he decided to grant the cadaverous stranger a trial. Thus it was that the wandering scholar and the simple peasant girl sat side by side at the potter's wheel.

"And now, monsieur," said Jeanne, on the very first morning of his education, "what am I to call thee?"

The stranger started, placed his hand across his forehead, and thought. Then his brow grew dark and his eyes troubled, and he said: "Ah, mademoiselle, what you will. It is all so strange—so strange!"

"Then," said Jeanne, with a merry laugh, "I shall call thee what the children do—M. Personne."

"Do they call me that?" he replied, with a sad little laugh. "M. Personne; it is well, then. I fancy I was once some one, but now—well—I am—nobody."

"And now, Monsieur Nobody, thou must do just what I tell thee, and I will teach thee how to make lumps of clay, which is a beautiful art in itself—at least so M. Damasin says, and Jeanne stole a look at M. Personne's bewildered face, and laughed again.

And he, when he saw her sweet, piquant face and merry smile, also laughed, a laugh so soft and musical that Jeanne wondered thereat, as do they who hear for the first time a very sweet melody.

And forthwith she taught him the rudiments of his trade, the consistency at which he was to constantly keep the clay, and the approximate size of the lumps for each particular vessel, and so apt did he become under her gentle tutelage, and so nicely did his long white hands adjudge the weight of clay, that many a day Jeanne had done her allotted task while yet the sun was high in the heavens. And then, when enough of the rough ware had been thrown as could be baked and glazed, she would bring forth the beautiful designs of Etrurian and Pompeiian lamps which M. Damasin had brought her from Paris, and work till closing time for sheer love of art.

And the kindly-natured manager danced with ecstasy as the beautiful form grew into shape round the long, prehensile fingers, and the graceful neck flew upwards from the outward compression, or a dexterous little tap made the soft-lipped mouth. Moreover he had ever a kind word for her strange assistant, whose workman's blouse so belied his gentleness of speech, and whose labour was ever so ungrudgingly proffered. Then in the eventide M. Personne would escort his workmate to her home, and, leaving her with a profound bow, would betake himself to the little garret which the good-natured landlord of the "Three Squirrels" had placed at his disposal.

"Mon Dieu!" said Jeanne to her friends, "but he is droll! When he hands me the clay he does it like a Grand Duke; and his bows! and his 'Bonsoir, mademoiselle; may the angels protect thee!' Ah, had I not to work, work, work, I could laugh all day."

But the day came when Jeanne no longer laughed. For, chancing to ask him some trifling question about a vase, he began to tell her many strange things of that world of art of which she was so ignorant, and yet, with artistic instinct, craved to know. And then, again, how strange was his method of imparting this delightful knowledge!—that in itself was interesting. For sometimes he would talk with freedom of beautiful things he had seen in Rome or in Florence, and then suddenly he would stop, make the gesture she knew so well of pressing his hand on his forehead, and then relapse into silence.

That he had travelled much she could see, but much of what he related was vague and inconsequent and yet, oh, so absorbing! So no longer did Jeanne laugh at him and make fun of him in a workroom, but rather, when all around were jesting, she would strive to draw out the treasures of that capricious, inexplicable mind. His courtesy, too—so out of place in the rough workroom—no longer moved her merriment, but became a sweet accompaniment of her life, and the hours he sat beside the potter's wheel a tender interlude in her sordid surroundings. Above all, she felt that beautiful protective sense that good-natured women, however lowly born, feel for those who are weak or suffering.

Digitized by Google

And so it happened that when summer changed to autumn, and the shadows on the hill-side grew daily shorter, and the leaves fell apace, Jeanne began to feel a strange aching void when the ragged M. Personne was away, and a sweet calm when he was by her side.

"Thou, too, wilt be the Grand Duchesse, petite," said the other girls. "Ah! take care, Jeanne; lovers who come from nowhere ride away to nowhere."

And Jeanne would blush and make light of their jesting, and in her own tender heart cherish her simple secret. Would he ever know? thought she. Ah, no; she was but a poor peasant girl, and he was surely a great gentleman, for all his ragged clothes. And so every day she bent over her wheel, and beside her on his settle sat the man she had grown to love.

But one morning he did not come; the hours passed, and the clay remained unformed, and at last the strange ws arrived that, the night before, two men had come the "Three Squirrels," and carried away with them M. Personne. The landlord would tell nothing; but the good folk of Arranches knew full well that no one can be removed by force unless the law permits, and they made strange remarks which cut Jeanne to the very heart, and the girls laughed and reminded her of their prophecy.

She said little, but worked and worked all day with desperate intensity. At first she used to cry silently, and her hot tears fell one by one upon the wet clay, but not for long. One cannot indulge in the more tender emotion on twenty francs a week and only one good meal a day. And, after all, there was always the strange hope, to which all women cling, that he would some day come back to her. But her face grew thin and wan, and her grey eyes larger than ever. And good M. Damasin amented the day he admitted the white-handed scarecrow into his works, and he resolved to distract her thoughts from her hopeless love.

"Jeanne," said he one day, "we have taught you all we know, and there is no scope here for further improvement. We are going to extend the works next year, and in the meantime I will send you to Paris, so that you may learn to 'throw' really artistic work before that time comes."

And so in the springtime Jeanne Carteret left her native home and went out to the great world of Paris, and though her heart still ached she felt a restless longing for the new life of art and toil.

Now, it happened that one Sunday in May the kind, good landlady with whom she lived suggested they should go into the Bois de Boulogne, and see all the grand folk go to the races. Jeanne was nothing loth, and so they went forth and watched the stream of carriages and horsemen. One by one they drove by, and Jeanne looked and wondered at the prancing horses and the beautiful dresses of the ladies. Then suddenly a splendidly appointed carriage dashed by them, and Jeanne felt her heart beat, and the blood surge in her cheeks. For sitting in it by the side of a beautiful lady was M. Personne. He was dressed in the height of fashion, his beard was trimmed, but Jeanne recognised him in an instant.

"Madame," cried the poor girl with an effort, "who is that—that gentleman there with the lady? See, he is bowing to the officer on horseback?"

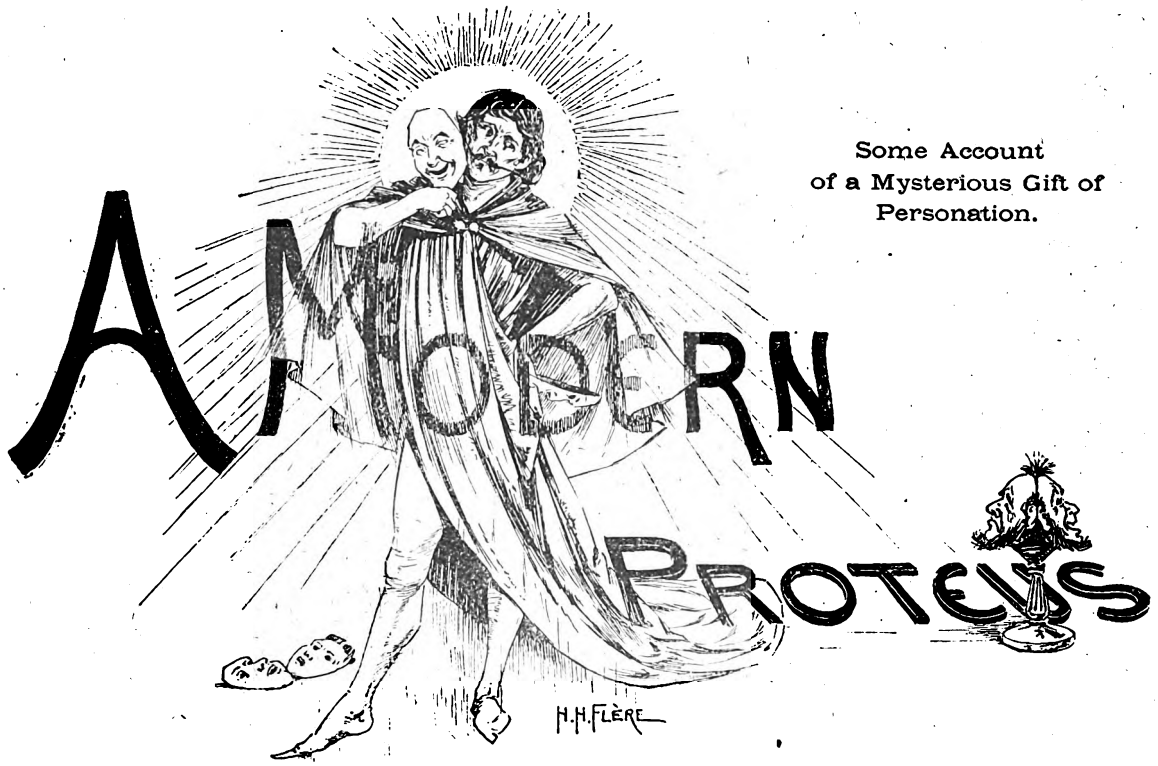
"Oh, that poor droll—that is the Duc de Champfleury; the mad duke they call him. Five years ago he was the most promising man in France, the most noble gentleman, and the most accomplished; but he was hurt in the great railway accident at Basle—his brain was affected and he lost his memory. For some time he was under restraint, not, indeed, that he was ever violent, but because he scarcely realised where he was, or, indeed, who he was, and unprincipled people could influence him for harm; but he escaped in a very wonderful way, and for many months eluded his keepers; they could not discover his whereabouts, but now they say he is almost well again, and his wife, the lady beside him—why, Jeanne, my child, are you fainting? Ah, mon Dieu! it is the sun!"

It was not the sun, nor did Jeanne Carteret faint. She merely pressed her hand against her beating heart, and returned home sorrowing.

LE VIER.

To Lady Gardeners! Likewise to Gentlemen! You should get a copy of Home Notes for this week. It contains a most Instructive Article on the "HOME CULTURE OF FLOWERS."

Digitized by Google



Some Account of a Mysterious Gift of Personation.

IT is now a little more than a week ago since a company of gentlemen were sitting and talking in a certain club—I am not at liberty to say which—in this city. The company numbered some eight or ten persons, three of whom were strangers. I forget how the conversation turned upon the mysterious and occult. I think, however, now that I consider the matter calmly, that the subject was led up to, with a definite purpose, by one of the gentlemen present who had, as it turned out, a very definite object in doing so. At any rate, the topic is one possessing a certain charm for the average human mind, and each of the company was contributing his quotum of information or idea to the general fund.

"Now, take your theosophists," said Robson. "If one can only credit what they claim, they must be possessed of powers which ought to make them masters of any situation, either for good or evil. But what have they done practically in either direction?"

"But then," objected Harding, "one of the conditions of their acquiring control over matter, it must be remembered, is a course of training which practically robs them of the desire to use that control."

"And," put in Thurman, "this course of training is said to so elevate the moral and intellectual nature, as to render an adept incapable of doing an evil action."

"Madame Blavatsky," remarked the cynical Cook, "is, I suppose, a case in point. I am of opinion, for one, that all of her miracles were well arranged and preconcerted tricks."

"Whatever may be the case with Madame Blavatsky, gentlemen," put in one of the strangers who had been introduced as a Mr. Wharncliffe, "I do not think that anyone who has visited India, and seen the performances of the native jugglers, can apply the same strictures to them. I have myself witnessed some most strange and unaccountable feats in that mysterious country."

The speaker was a tall, dark, fine-looking, bearded man, of perhaps forty or thereabouts, on whose skin tropical suns had evidently done their work, of a rather grave and serious aspect, and distinguished air. Beyond these features, which are not so rare as to be extraordinary among polished and travelled gentlemen of any country in the world, there was another, which at once withdrew him from the conventional type I have depicted. That was the eye. It was an eye with a bright, black, dazzling pupil, which would have served to render its owner singular in any company. It was an eye, too, that seemed to lack, when I first saw it, what I shall term soul, and depth, and calm. Not that it was forbidding, but, on the contrary, attractive, and the longer I looked at it, the more pleasant and attractive did it seem to become.

"My friend, Mr. Wharncliffe, here," explained Harding, who had introduced him, himself a member of a large mercantile house, "is recently from the East, and can give us, I doubt not, some interesting points on the occult from his own personal experience."

The stranger waved his hand deprecatingly, and assured us that his knowledge was confined merely to what he had seen. He was not prepared, he said, to philosophise upon causes.

"You have, all of you," he went on, "doubtless read of—perhaps some of you have seen—those feats, or tricks of legerdemain, performed commonly by Hindoo jugglers of the better sort; such as planting a seed in a flower-pot, wherefrom rises a plant before your eyes; producing bowls of water, when there was apparently no possible place of concealment for objects of such dimensions; and all this with no stage paraphernalia, such as our modern conjurors, who imitate these tricks, have ready to their hand, but simply upon the open ground, the spectators standing round. But, perhaps, the most marvellous of these tricks, or deceptions," he proceeded, "is that in which the juggler plants a wooden pole in the soil, up which he successively sends a cat, a monkey, and several other small animals, each of which disappears on reaching the top—vanishes, so to speak, into thin air. Not a vestige of them is afterwards seen."

Digitized by Google

"May it not be," suggested someone, "that this miraculous effect is produced by exerting some sort of influence, akin to mesmeric, upon the eyes of the spectators—that the juggler really sends no animals at all up his pole, but merely makes the spectators think he does?"

"Just like that power," remarked someone else, "with which some mediæval necromancers were supposed to have been gifted. Scott uses it, if I remember right, in his 'Lay of the Last Minstrel'—the glamour, I think it was called. The Lady of Branksome sends someone she does not wish to be recognised from the castle—or was it the hobgoblin, Gilpin?—but, anyhow, as he passes the warder at the gate, he casts the 'glamour' over him, and the warder avers that nothing passed the gate but a 'a wisp of hay.'"

"I think, gentlemen, I can give a little reminiscence which may, perhaps, serve to throw some light upon this matter," said a voice in somewhat diffident, hesitating tones, which were more noticeable as they broke the pause which had succeeded the argument of the last speaker.

I turned like the rest to see who had spoken, as the voice was unfamiliar. It was a middle-sized, grey-haired, and grey-whiskered old gentleman, with a benevolent aspect, who beamed modestly at us through his spectacles, and like Harding's friend, Wharncliffe, had been brought to the club that evening by one of the members, and introduced to us as Mr. Johnson, a retired merchant.

"I hardly know, gentlemen, whether I am justified," resumed Mr. Johnson, with an apologetic air, "in taking part in the discussion of a subject of which I know so little, and have myself no personal experience. What I purpose telling you, if you will allow me, are the experiences of another, and you must judge for yourselves what they are worth. I should not, in fact, have intruded them at all upon your notice, had they not seemed to me to be peculiarly opposite to the present discussion. If you care to hear them, I shall be proud to serve you, and I can confidently assure you that the recital will not take long."

We encouragingly gave assent to Mr. Johnson, who thereupon told the following story:

"The scene of my part of the experience, gentlemen, if it can be called a part at all, was laid in the recently demolished prison of Pentonville. I, for a considerable time, held contracts for supplying a certain line of commodities to the prison, and as my business naturally took me there upon many occasions, I naturally became acquainted with many of the officials connected with the institution.

"About five or six years ago, while there to transact some business, which I found would entail my waiting for an hour or two, owing to the absence of the person it was necessary for me to see, and while I was sauntering about to kill time, I fell into conversation with Inspector Coulter, the well-known detective officer, who proposed that we should make a tour of the prison, he volunteering to be my guide. While I flatter myself that I have no taste for spectacles of misery, yet, having nothing better to do, I gladly availed myself of the kind offer of my able mentor, and an able mentor he proved himself to be.

"We passed through gallery after gallery, till we arrived at a portion where the securities seemed to be extra strong. The structure of the cells, fortified as they were by all the skill that can be brought to bear upon steel and iron, seemed to offer an impassable barrier to the criminals confined within, however daring and ingenious they might be. The cells situated in that part of the building, my guide explained, were reserved for the most dangerous and desperate class of criminals.

A repulsive-looking old man.

"At length we paused before one of the most forbidding of the sepulchre-like cells, and the Inspector asked me to look through the little square orifice in the door, which seemed to serve at once for the passage of food, air, and light to the wretched prisoners inside. I did so, and crouching in a corner, I beheld a grey and repulsive-looking old man, his hair and beard long, unkempt, and straggling.

"He took not the least notice of our presence, though he must have been, I think, aware of it. I was unprepared, however, for the—as I thought—heartless conduct of my guide, the more so, as he had spoken kindly and sympathetically to many of the prisoners we had passed.

"Absolutely unaccustomed as I am to the use of slang language and averse as I am to being the medium of its delivery, even in recounting it, truth compels me to say that upon this occasion Inspector Coulter, after stepping up to the orifice before referred to, and, actually making mouths at the poor, cowering wretch within, said:

Digitized by Google

"'Come, brace up, old man. None of these fakes. You can't play it on me. Why can't you give us something better than that? Make yourself the Prince of Wales or Mr. Gladstone, for instance. Have some style about you.'

"I confess I was shocked at this heartless tirade against an old and defenceless prisoner, who, however, took not the least notice of us, and presently we passed on.

"'That,' said the detective, 'is the most dangerous, the most elusive, and most inexplicable criminal that it ever has been my good or bad luck to come across. I saw you were surprised at the way I treated him, but if you knew about him what I know, you wouldn't think so.'

"I became interested to know what could have given this apparently innocuous old man such distinction in the detective's eyes, and upon our return in the officers' quarters, as I had still some time to spare, I reverted to the subject and questioned my friend regarding him and what he had done to make him such an object of official aversion and to necessitate his subjection to such rigorous treatment.

"'What has he done?' returned the Inspector testily; 'the question should rather be, what has he not done? Heaven only knows what unknown villainies, with his peculiar powers, and his peculiar opportunities for mischief, that man, if he can be called a man, has perpetrated. His is the most extraordinary and incomprehensible case that has ever come under my notice,' he continued, shaking his head. 'Nobody can make head or tail of it. No one really believes me, when I tell them what has come under my notice. They imagine that I am labouring under a delusion, and had it not been for a piece of peculiarly good fortune, and I may add, some very hard and close work of my own—' (You see, gentlemen," remarked Mr. Johnson parenthetically, "the whole affair impressed me so much that, having naturally a good memory, and my friends being pleased to credit me with being something of a raconteur, I am enabled to give you the story pretty much as Inspector Coulter gave it me)— 'the fellow never would have been brought to justice at all.

"'Even when I had him "dead set," as we call it, he would have escaped, if I had not nailed him by a ruse. Would you believe it, if I told you,' here the Inspector sunk his voice almost to a whisper, and spoke slowly and impressively, at the same time looking me straight in the eyes, 'would you believe that the old man you saw in that felon's cell is no more old than I am—at least, such is my firm conviction—and I am only forty-five? Would you believe that that man possesses the miraculous faculty of changing his appearance at will, not by a clever manipulation of disguises like your ordinary cracksman, or even like some members of my own profession, but by some mysterious power which seems to be innate in him? Would you believe that that grey and decrepit old man, if he were once outside his cell, could and would walk coolly and easily out of gaol, under the noses of all the warders and officers of the prison; yes, even under my own nose. did I not possess an infallible mode of detecting him and compelling him to resume his natural form. Yes, sir, he could walk out of that prison in the semblance of the governor himself if he so desired—at least, that is my firm conviction, though, unfortunately, it is nobody else's. Well, I hope they will not find out its truth some day to their cost.'

"I did not know, gentlemen, what to make of these words. Here was one of the most astute members of the metropolitan detective force, a man whose reputation and whose deeds put him at the head of his profession, giving expression to a theory so utterly at variance with common sense, that I did not know what to think.

"'He would have to be a very skilful actor and possess something of a wardrobe to do such a thing,' I at last remarked.

"'That is what they all say,' returned the detective impatiently. 'That is the way they all account for this man's powers—if, in fact, they give him credit for any; for there are many members of the police, and many reputable citizens outside, who still consider him a victim of mistaken identity; and, as I said before, had it not been for the direct testimony I was able to produce, together with my own unimpeachable reputation, this incomprehensible villain would never have been convicted.'

"'But what did he do?' I asked; 'what was the charge against him? and of what crime is he now convicted?'

"'Grand larceny,' returned my friend, 'and, thanks to me, he has got the full extent of the law. His time will not be out for a good many years yet, and, by that time, I hope to be able to restrain him in confinement by some means or other, by convincing the public of his true nature. He will, at any rate, be kept under surveillance.'

"'But surely,' I said, 'what he is enduring now is very rigorous treatment for such a comparatively simple offence as grand larceny.'

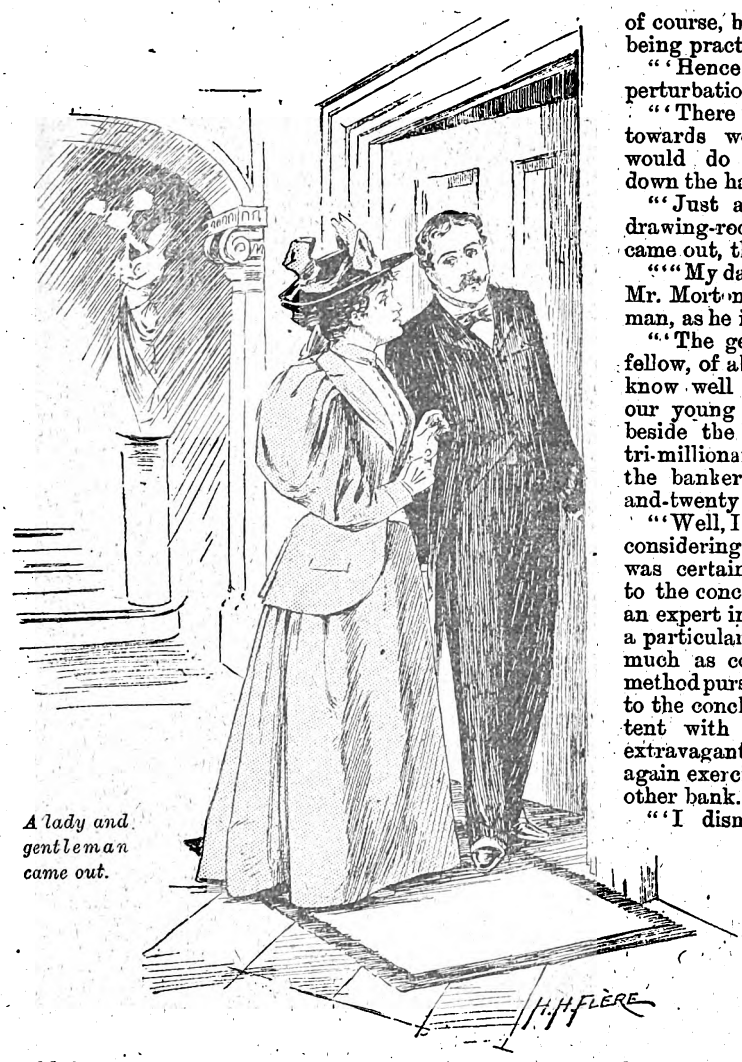
"'My only object is to prevent his escape,' explained the Inspector. 'Apart from his being subjected to such confinement, his treatment in the matter of everything else is on a par with that of criminals of his own class. I have been the means of putting him where he is, and consider that I was perfectly justified in doing so.'

"I shuddered to think of the misery in store for any one who might be so unfortunate as to incur the displeasure of Inspector Coulter, and wondered whether after all, the prisoner I had seen might not owe his wretched condition to some delusion on the part of the great detective himself—the brightest minds, it is said, are sometimes subject to such.

"'But the best thing I can do is to give you a brief history of the case,' continued the Inspector, 'and then you can judge for yourself. Something over a year ago, I received a letter from old Mr. Chisholm, senior partner of the well-known banking house of Chisholm, Moffat and Co., requesting me to call upon him immediately, and, as it was after banking hours when I received the dispatch, I concluded to call at his house. I found the old gentleman in a very perturbed state of mind. He told me that his bank had been robbed that forenoon in a very mysterious manner. He had gone out, as was his custom, about eleven o'clock, and while he was absent, a person, got up to resemble himself, had used this disguise to secure a considerable sum of money.

"'It was Mr. Chisholm's custom to leave the bank at eleven o'clock, and to be gone for about half-an-hour. So methodical was he in this respect that the clerks were surprised when, scarcely two minutes after he had left, he returned, and walking to his private office, immediately summoned his confidential clerk by bell. He then told him to bring him a thousand pounds in gold, in two bags. The clerk returned with the money, which Mr. Chisholm then put in his coat-tail pockets, a bag in each pocket, and immediately left the bank. Though the proceeding was somewhat unusual, and though Mr. Chisholm had forgotten to leave a memorandum of the sum drawn, nothing more was thought of it. He again returned at his customary hour, and it was not until the day's balance had been made up that the cashier reminded him of the morning's incident.

Digitized by Google



A lady and gentleman came out.

"'To say that Mr. Chisholm and his clerks were surprised is to give no expression to the general state of feeling, Mr. Chisholm affirming that he had not returned to the bank, as was stated, and had drawn no money that day, while the clerks were as positive that he had; two of them averring they had seen him receive the money and put it in his pocket. It then dawned upon him that he had been so cleverly personated that his clerks had all been deceived, and this became more apparent, as his personator was said by his confidential clerk to have spoken in low and unusual tones, briefly ordering the money to be brought, and evidently had not dared to write a receipt for it, as his writing would, of course, have at once exposed the deception that was being practised.

"'Hence my peremptory summons and the banker's perturbation.

"'There certainly was not much to go upon towards working up a case, but I told him I would do what I could, and we walked together down the hall towards the front door.

"'Just as I was leaving Mr. Chisholm's house, the drawing-room door opened, and a lady and gentleman came out, the former in outdoor dress.

"'"My daughter, Inspector Coulter; Inspector Coulter, Mr. Morton—my prospective son-in-law," said the old man, as he introduced us.

"'The gentleman—Mr. Morton—was a fine-looking fellow, of about five-and-thirty, or thereabouts, whom I know well by sight, and also by reputation, as one of our young millionaires. I rather envied his position beside the banker's daughter, as, besides being a bi- or tri-millionairess (if I may be allowed the expression) as the banker's heiress, she was a very pretty girl of five-and-twenty or so.

"'Well, I said "Good-bye," and walked down the street, considering the chances of discovering the thief. It was certainly a very pretty piece of work, and I came to the conclusion that the fellow who had done it was an expert in that particular line. One thousand was not a particularly big haul, I reasoned, but it was about as much as could be conveniently carried away in the method pursued, without exciting suspicion; and I came to the conclusion that the thief would not be long content with this small sum—that class of gentry is extravagant—and that it would not be long before he again exercised his talents in the same way upon some other bank.

"'I dismissed all idea of his appearing again at Chisholm, Moffat and Co.'s, that being the last place he would now be likely to visit.

"'When I considered the matter further, however, I saw how slim my chances were of catching my thief by watching the various banks. Even had I possessed an accurate description of him, there were just as many chances as there are banks in London to one against my being at the identical bank he meant to operate on at the time he entered it, supposing that I remained there during the business hours of a whole day. But when I considered that, in addition to this, I had no description to go upon, and that he could have no object in personating Mr. Chisholm again, I saw how useless it would be to watch aimlessly for him, besides entailing a heavy loss of valuable time. Still, I determined to chance a day or two on it, if only for Mr. Chisholm's satisfaction. He would personate, I argued, the manager of a bank, as in Mr. Chisholm's case; probably, too, an old man, as he had already been successful in that rôle.

"'So I looked about for a bank with a manager of that description, and having selected one which seemed to possess the requisites, I awaited developments. For three days I watched the manager go in and out; watched narrowly to see whether his exit would be followed by the entrance of anyone else of similar appearance. Then I reasoned with myself how foolish I was, and on the third day I started about noon to Mr. Chisholm's house, as I heard he was somewhat indisposed, to tell him that our sole dependence must now be placed on the work of my deputies, two of whom I had put immediately on the case, with the faint clue of tracing the thief by a certain stamp on the bags in which the coin was put up.

Banged the door to with a "Where to now, sir?"

"'As I neared the house, at a distance of, perhaps, fifty yards, I saw Mr. Morton, the young lady's lover, emerge from the doorway, and descend the steps. He came toward me, and nodded as we passed each other.

"'I walked on in the direction of the house, which was a corner one, and as I neared it, saw a figure crossing the street, and evidently also making for the house. I mounted the steps and rang the bell, and just as the servant opened the door, I heard steps behind me. On turning, what was my astonishment to see Mr. Morton, whom I had passed upon the street about a minute before. Now I distinctly recollected looking down the street in the direction I had come, just before mounting the steps, and there was one within the distance of the street. I was morally certain that the gentleman beside me was the one I had seen crossing the street. This train of thought occupied but a second.

"'"You have made a quick return, Mr. Morton," I remarked, as he brushed past me, muttering something I did not catch.

"'Mr. Chisholm, the footman said, was not in, but would I wait? He was liable to return at any moment. I said that I would, and was shown into a little study, where I had had the interview with him before.

"'I am a man of quick perception—my profession has had something to do with making them so. I could not account for the reappearance of Mr. Morton. Could it be a brother? That must be it. And certainly a twin brother, by the remarkable resemblance. I was roused from my little reverie by the sound of voices in rather an excited key. They came from the partition door which separated the study from the adjoining room.

"'"I tell you, Clara, it will be best for all parties," said a male voice with a decided inflection.

"'"But, oh, Harry, it will break papa's heart," pleaded a female one.

"'The voices grew indistinct. I made up my mind that they were those of the gentleman who had just entered, and Mr. Chisholm's daughter. He was evidently trying to persuade her to do something to which she was averse. And she called him Harry—Henry, I knew, was Mr. Morton's name. Then it was Mr. Morton I had met upon the street. But how—here the voices became distinct again.

"'"But why this sudden change of mind, Harry? When you left here, scarcely ten minutes ago, you were so loving and so contented that we should wait till the day that had been fixed upon—and it is little more than a week, dearest!" cooed a dove-like voice that a man must have been a brute to resist.

"'"Yes; but Clara," returned the male voice in tones far more harsh and imperative than endearing, "it must be as I say. There are grave reasons for it, which I will explain later on. I will guarantee to satisfy your father later on of the necessity of the step. But not a word now. And, Clara, remember if we do not take this step now, it may be years before I can call you my own—it may be never."

"'A passionate burst of tears was all the answer to this.

"'Ha! thought I, it is an elopement they are planning. But what could be Morton's object? Was he in difficulties? And if he was, how could eloping with his lady-love help him? And what difference could a week make—for had not Miss Chisholm said that the day had been fixed for a week hence? There was some mystery which demanded explanation. There was something crooked evidently, which I then and there determined to straighten out.

"'Again the male voice became audible.

"'It is now one o'clock, Clara. I shall go down to the bank and draw some money. I will return at two sharp. Have everything ready by that time. We must catch the afternoon express for Dover. Good-bye, dearest,' and the dialogue ended with what I thought a rather perfunctory kiss.

"'My mind was at once made up. Hastily scrawling a line to the banker, and leaving it on the table, I emerged from the door just as Mr. Morton was crossing the street. At the corner he paused and raised his arm. He was evidently signalling for something. Half-way down the street stood a cab with nobody on the box. I instantly grasped the situation. It was neck or nothing with me now, as there was not another vehicle in sight, and I was determined to see the play out. So, when Morton started to walk for that cab, I followed him swiftly, and, just as he reached it, ran the last few steps and came up puffing and blowing, opened the door, with a "Sorry to detain you, sir, but a friend ——" banged it to with a "Where to now, sir?" jumped on the box, and was whirling off to the City, before the poor driver, who had doubtless stepped in somewhere for a moment for a glass of beer, reappeared to realise his loss. We detectives are sometimes as free in the conversion of property as your veriest thief himself, when occasion calls for it, but then it is only temporary, you know; the owner finds the property at Scotland

Digitized by Google

Yard in the morning, and gets well repaid for any loss he may have sustained by its appropriation.

"'Mr. Morton gave me the simple direction, "Fenton Street," and when I reined up at the corner, got out and told me to wait until he returned, which he said would be in a few minutes. I pretended to acquiesce, but immediately gave the cab in charge to a lounger, and followed him closely, though unseen. He sauntered leisurely along the street, finally taking a good position where he could command a good view of the entrance to the Carsell Bank. Presently he looked at his watch, and seemed to be growing impatient. After a minute or two I saw his eye light up, and looking across the street, I saw the manager of the bank—I knew him perfectly by sight—leaving it in close conversation with another gentleman.

"'I will not say what my thoughts were when I saw Mr. Morton, after a lapse of a minute or two, cross the street and enter the bank. I was unavoidably crowded back by the throng, but certainly did not enter the building more than five seconds behind him. I looked round but he was not there. Had he escaped me? or—a strange suspicion floated across my mind. What if I had chanced after all upon the solution of the very mystery which I had given up in despair that very morning?

"'I kept my eyes fixed upon the door leading to the manager's office, took up a position behind an angle of the counter where I would not be seen from that direction, and waited. In about five minutes the door opened and there issued from it a figure that I could have sworn was the manager of the bank whom I had seen pass down the street a few minutes before. The same style of clothes, the same hat, the same trim, close-cropped white beard and whiskers—all were there. I had evidently found my man. But the idea of finding this expert criminal in the millionaire, Mr. Morton! Should I arrest him on the moment? I could easily have done so, but admiration for his admirable get-up deterred me.

"'We detectives you know entertain a sincere admiration for criminals who know their business. We look upon crime as a profession; it can be raised even to the dignity of an art. We are the critics of that art, and as critics cannot help admiring a thorough artist. I accordingly did not act on my first impulse; but, knowing now that I had my man whenever I wanted him, I felt supremely easy for the outcome. A great load had been taken from my mind, and the cheerful smile with which I bustled up to the cab a few moments after my fare got there, was not forced but real. So was the deferential bow with which I greeted the fact that between the bank and the cab he had, while walking, as thoroughly rechanged himself from the manager of the Carsell Bank to Mr. Morton as he had originally done from Mr. Morton to the manager of the Bank. For, it must be remembered, I had not even then dreamed of the true nature of the transformation. There were sufficient points of dress resemblance between personator and personated upon the present occasion as to make, to my mind at that time, the personation possible.

"'After my fare had got in I very gingerly steered my way through the thronged street, with the express purpose of gaining time to come across one of my co-workers, to whom I could give instructions on the case, there being none of them in sight when I started. Luckily, before I had gone far, I espied one of my deputies to whom I signalled, and who, in ten seconds of whispered conversation, knew all that was required. Well, I made such good time on the drive back that Mr.

His daughter shrieked and fainted.

Digitized by Google

Morton was able to come within a very few minutes of keeping his appointment with Miss Chisholm at two o'clock. As I opened the door of the cab for him I stood so that he could not pass me without brushing against me, and I then became aware that at least one of his pockets was well loaded with something solid and heavy. I gave him a short start, but reached the door and entered the house but little behind him. Mr. Chisholm was now at home, and to him I briefly explained as much as was necessary of the day's experiences. He heard me in amazement.

"'"Mr. Morton a bank robber!" he exclaimed. "Why, the thing is preposterous. He does not need it. Besides, he banks with that very house."

"'"But the man closeted with your daughter at this moment," I replied, for his overcoat was hanging in the hall, and I knew very well where he was, "is not Mr. Morton at all."

"'At this moment the door of the drawing-room opened—Mr. Chisholm and I were standing in the hall—and Mr. Morton and Miss Chisholm came out, the latter, as before, in walking dress. Mr. Morton took his hat and overcoat from the rack and proceeded to put them on.

"'"Pardon me, Mr. Morton——" I began.

"'"Why, I paid you!" he said, recognising me as the cab-driver.

"'"Yes, but I am now in a different character," I said. "Don't you remember being introduced to me the other day as Inspector Coulter of the detective police?"

"'His countenance fell, but he said:

"'"Well, sir, what of that?"

"'"Simply that I must detain you," I said, "on suspicion. There have been two bank robberies committed lately, one at the Corsell Bank to-day, and the suspicion of having committed them rests on you. No doubt you can clear yourself of it completely, but I must nevertheless detain you."

"'"Why, what is the meaning of all this, Mr. Chisholm?" exclaimed Morton, while Clara clung to his side. "Will you allow me to be insulted in your house, and in the presence of your daughter? I have just come from the Corsell Bank, where I drew a considerable sum in gold. Here it is in my overcoat," slapping his pocket, "and for this I am to be accused of robbery!"

"'Of course, I had no proof of any crime having been committed, and was acting simply upon instinct; but just then the door bell rung, and, to my satisfaction, two officers entered, according to instructions, one of whom brought the news that the Corsell Bank had actually paid a thousand pounds a short while before to someone personating the manager, and the other, a warrant for the arrest of John Doe as the perpetrator of the crime.

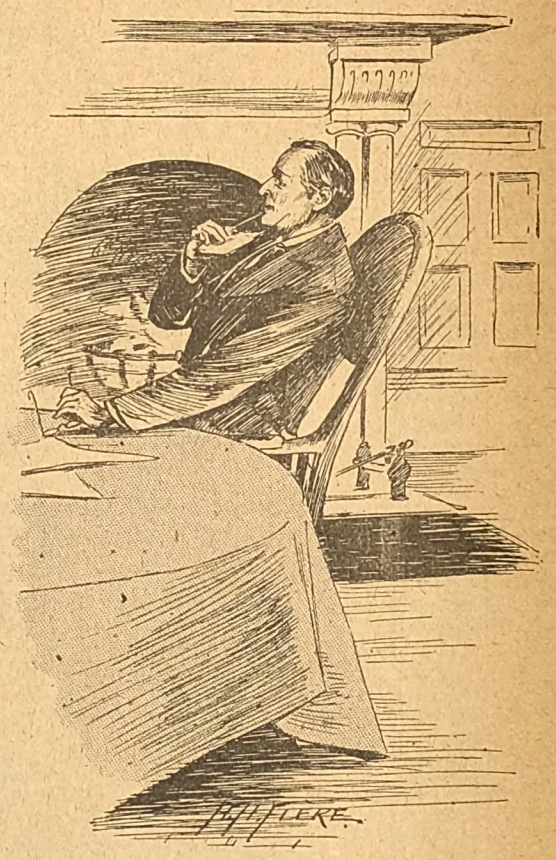
"'Mr. Chisholm was thunderstruck. His daughter shrieked and fainted. But I was accustomed to such scenes, and left them to the care of the household, while I handcuffed Mr. Morton and bundled him into a cab, which took us swiftly to Scotland Yard. I may state parenthetically that two hours afterwards, as I heard, Clara was in the arms of the real Mr. Morton, but does not to this day believe that he was not unjustly arrested and afterwards released. She always regards me with aversion when we meet.

"'Well, to make a long story short, though the bank officials swore that the accused in court was not the man they paid the money to, they identified the sacks, and my direct testimony, and the fact that the money was found upon his person, of course, convicted him. Since his confinement he has thought fit to assume and preserve the shape in which we saw him in his cell to-day. And now,' concluded Inspector Coulter, 'I ask you whether I am justified or not in treating, as I do, a man who, should he escape, possesses such untold capabilities for mischief?'"

* * * * *

"Well, gentlemen," went on Mr. Johnson, addressing us, "it was scarcely a month after that when I met my friend, the detective, in Regent Street. He had a troubled look on his face, and, as he shook my hand, said:

"'Well, he has escaped.'



Taking off, first his spectacles, then his trim, white beard.

"'What! Morton?' said I.

"'Yes the fellow we called Morton. He never gave us any name. He cut through his cell door, strong as it was, and the rest was easy. Yes, he's at large. But I'll get him again.'

"'How?' I asked curiously.

"'I have one infallible sign to go by,' replied the detective impressively, 'his eye. Under all his transformations he could never change that. I'll come across him yet.'"

During Mr. Johnson's recital of his experience in Pentonville Prison our little party, which was lounging about on chairs in no fixed order, had been very attentive listeners; so attentive, in fact, that it had hardly noticed the advent of a messenger toward the conclusion, who delivered a large-sized envelope to the third stranger of the party. That gentleman, I noticed, simply took the envelope without a word, so engrossed was he, apparently, with the story, and put it in his pocket.

Digitized by Google

Just as Mr. Johnson concluded, however, and while there was the usual buzz and hum of approval which follows any story of any length, bad or good, two gentlemen got up simultaneously from their seats, stretched themselves and sauntered towards the door, which was open, and led to the main apartments of the club. I did not, and I do not think anyone else did, even notice who they were. One of the gentlemen got to the door, it seemed to me, a little before the other, closed it, locked it, and put the key in his pocket.

This remarkable action had an electric effect upon the company. Everyone sat rooted to the spot and looked at the door. Surprise was still further depicted upon their countenances when they looked round and observed that two of the strangers who had been introduced that evening were not now in the room, and that the gentleman who had just locked the door and put the key in his pocket was a well-known detective, and that the other was a well-known club-man whom I shall call Mr. Wharton. It was further observed that Mr. Wharncliffe, the gentleman from India, who had been introduced by Mr. Harding, had disappeared. It was unaccountable. Nobody had left the room, nobody had entered it but the messenger. Mr. Johnson broke the suspense by coolly taking off, first his spectacles, then his trim, white beard and whiskers, and saying:

"Gentlemen, the story which I have just been telling you is so true that you will presently have practical proof of it. I am not sure, however, that I would have made it so long, or, in fact, have told it at all, if I had not wished to gain time, so that my friend, Mr. Hogan, might receive the warrant for the arrest of the gentleman who stands near him at the door. Gentlemen, the facts are these: I am Inspector Coulter, of the detective police force; that gentleman beside Mr. Hogan is the man Morton, who escaped from Pentonville; I have traced him to this city, where he has been about a week; to-day one of your prominent banks was robbed of ten thousand pounds. I recognised Morton in Mr. Wharncliffe by his eye.

"The money was paid late in the afternoon, and taken away in a cab, Morton, as usual, successfully personating the manager of the bank. Now he is, I suppose, personating someone else."

We had clustered excitedly to the door before Inspector Coulter had finished speaking. There, beside the detective stood the well-known Mr. Wharton, to whom, as I afterwards learnt, Wharncliffe had been introduced that day, protesting vigorously against his detention, and demanding to be told what all the trouble was about. We should all of us have taken oath that it was he, but Inspector Coulter held otherwise.

"Look at his eye!" he said as he slipped handcuffs on his wrists.

And in truth, though Warton's eye is clear and black, I never saw it with such an evil, dazzling glitter as I saw then. The process was perfectly legal, even if it had been Wharton, and so the club was treated to the spectacle of that popular and respected member being ignominiously conducted through its apartments and down its stairs, handcuffed and unceremoniously bundled into a cab. When the real Wharton came in an hour afterwards, he was the butt of the most annoying questions regarding his prison experience, and is a most mystified man yet.

As for Morton, he is now in prison, though no charge has been entered against him on the books, and but few know of the presence of so mysterious a character there. The reason that his name is not on the books is that no one knows where he has concealed the ten thousand pounds he obtained from the bank. There is a chance that he may be allowed to go free if he restores this money, and if so Inspector Coulter had better look sharp after him. As for the scientific diagnosis of the case, Doctor Martineaut and others—he is secreted, by the way, in the receiving hospital—are puzzling over it unceasingly.

They have discovered that so long as he is awake he has power to appear in almost any human shape he desires to all those in reach of his wonderful eye; but that when he is asleep, or under the influence of chloroform, he always looks the same, and that is the sinister, crafty character he is. One can hardly escape the conclusion that this mysterious gift of personation lies wholly and solely in some mysterious magnetic or mesmeric power, which affects the perceptive faculties of all brains that come within reach of his influence, and moulds their perceptions so that they can only appreciate such forms as are imagined in his own brain and projected upon theirs through the rays that dart from his dominant eye and are received by their subjective ones. This, however, must be left to our future psychological science to elucidate.

ROBERT DUNCAN MILNE.

How can the Sixth Number of Pearson's Magazine, published on the 1st of June fail to be of the greatest interest, when it includes among its literary and artistic contributors such names as those of Stanley L. Wood, C. J. Cutcliffe Hyne, George Griffith, Harry Furniss, Hal Hurst, R.B.A., Sydney Cowell, Robert Barr, Charles May, Sir Walter Besant, etc., etc.?

Digitized by Google

ALMOST A TRAGEDY.

Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth. Charles Raymond's young wife was the happiest woman in the world until one fine day when she stood at the window watching him come up the avenue.

"Dear, noble fellow, how handsome he is," she said in a wifely rapture, as she watched him hurrying home. His beauty was purely of an imaginative type—he was near-sighted and his legs bowed a little, but to one woman he was a hero without a flaw, and that one woman was his wife.

"Dear boy, he must be starving," she further soliloquised. "He hardly ate a mouthful for breakfast. Why, what is that he is tearing up—must be a bill that he doesn't want me to see."

Mr. Charles Raymond had suddenly taken a folded paper from his pocket, glanced hurriedly at it, and then torn it into infinitely small bits, which he threw to the winds, which in their turn deposited them in a vacant piece of ground. There was a falling barometer in the Raymond family that day at noon. The social sun went under a cloud and stayed there. A gloom permeated the household atmosphere. It was not evolved by Mr. Raymond for he had come home in almost jubilant spirits. These went down correspondingly with the low pressure in the domestic area, and remained stationary at freezing point. His wife's spirits registered below zero.

A cold meal, a hurried embrace that was not returned, and the young man went back to his business, wondering what had caused the home weather to change so suddenly. When he was out of sight Mrs. Raymond put on her cloak and went out. She walked rapidly until she came to a vacant piece of ground that was in sight of the house. Here she stopped, looked up and down the street, scanned the windows of the houses in the neighbourhood, and said aloud:

"I'll do it. There's no harm in it, I am sure. It is my duty to know, as a wife, if Charlie has any bills to be troublesome. He has been economising lately, now I come to think of it. I can help him if he is in trouble, and I will."

Then she began searching over the ground like the veriest rag-picker, until she had collected a dozen or more small scraps of paper, not one of which was larger than the size of a single word. With the quick intuition of a woman, which is more like instinct than judgment, she saw that these scraps were not the remains of a bill, but of a sheet of note paper that had been closely written over in a bold masculine hand.

* * * * *

Locking herself in her room, Mrs. Raymond, seated at her desk with a sheet of blank paper and a bottle of gum before her, proceeded to restore the paper scraps to their relative positions. She worked long and patiently, developing at the same time every emotion in the human calendar. Anger, jealousy, indignation, scorn, and a consuming curiosity by turns possessed her. At times her face expressed incredulity, which was instantly followed by a dreadful certainty. She cried a little, but she was almost too angry for tears. Oh, to have been so deceived by one she had loved with her whole heart since she first knew him! And the honeymoon was scarcely over! Then she re-read the miserable letter. It was written by Charlie's chum, a man she had not yet seen, and who professed to be a woman-hater.

This was the letter:

"Dear Charlie,—I saw your divinity to-day. (Here Mrs. R. wept.) She is a beauty, and you're a lucky dog. ('Oh, the wretch!') She looked awfully swell in her pretty togs, and does your good taste credit. There's a lot of us fellows want to know the new beauty. ('I'll scratch her eyes out, the good-for-nothing!') Do you intend to let your old friends meet her, or do you want to keep her all to yourself? But we'll be on our good behaviour, Charlie, honour bright. She's a darling, and we want you to trot her out, and give us a regular introduction, and we'll get up a little supper after the theatre."

"An actress? Yes, Charlie does admire actresses, and his new 'divinity' is an actress! Oh, Charlie, Charlie, you have broken your wife's heart."

After a flood of tears Mrs. Raymond read a few closing lines, which were of no consequence, and the name signed to it "Reginald Newcombe." Then she took counsel with herself, with the result that she came to a sudden conclusion.

"I'll do it! 'I'll beard the lion in his den, the Douglas in his hall.'"

And Mrs. Raymond dressed herself in her prettiest costume and went out.

* * * * *

Reginald Newcombe, lawyer and commissioner, was in his office, the air of which was thick with tobacco smoke, when his confidential clerk—a seedy student in a shabby suit—plunged in from the outer room.

"Lady," he gasped, "dressed to kill! After divorce most likely. Where shall I——"

But this speech was cut short by the entrance of a beautiful young woman dressed in the height of fashion. The lawyer unlimbered himself from the table and stood up to gaze at the apparition.

"Could I speak to you a moment in private, sir?" she asked, smiling sweetly.

Digitized by Google

"Yes, madam, come into my private office," he replied as pleasantly as was consistent with his gruff nature, while he said to himself: "Charlie Raymond's wife? H'm! Wonder if she is going to engage me as her lawyer. Be seated, please," and he dropped into a chair himself and began to brace up for the occasion. But Mrs. Raymond did not sit down. She remained standing, and had changed from smiles to tears, which coursed down her lovely cheeks in rivulets.

"Read that, sir, it is signed with your name," she said desperately.

"I don't know what you mean, my dear madam," said the lawyer impatiently. "Is this patchwork document——"

"Read, read. Every word is there. It is a communication from you to my husband, and your name confirms the infamy."

"Infamy? Oh, I see! May I ask," stiffening to meet the charge that he saw was coming, "if Charlie—Mr. Raymond—gave you this letter to read?"

"Oh, no, sir. He did not betray the confidence of his noble friend, certainly not. I—I—no matter how I became possessed of the letter—there should be no secrets between husband and wife."

"What do you wish me to do? Deny or confirm the authenticity of these scraps of paper?"

"This! Tell me the name of his divinity—the woman who has taken my h—h—husband's love from me. Let me see her that I may——"

"Murder her?" inquired the lawyer.

"No, that I may plead on my bended knees to give him back to me."

"Madam, you have conquered. I will call at your house to night and, in the presence of your husband, give you the information you have asked."

"Oh, thank you, Mr. Newcombe, you have a kind heart, after all. Forgive me for this intrusion, but you do not know the depth of a wife's love."

"No. Thank goodness, I don't," mumbled the bachelor under his breath. Then aloud he said:

"Do not speak of this to your husband until I come this evening. Good-bye, Mrs. Raymond," and he showed her to the door.

When she was gone, he went back to his den, sat down in his chair and laughed until his face was purple.

"Jealous!" he roared. "The best joke of the season! Jealous of—oh, ha! ha!"

* * * * *

Charles Raymond had not passed one unhappy hour during the blissful three months of honeymoon which had promised to extend themselves into years. The shy bird of happiness had descended on his roof-tree and seemed to make a refuge there. And now in one brief moment she had opened her wings and soared away. What had frightened her? He did not know, and his heart was heavy within him. If this was a woman's caprice, then he was learning another phase of his wife's character and one that sorely disappointed him. The chill which had struck to his heart at noon that day continued with him. It was there when he went home at night. He tried to throw it off and act as if nothing had happened. But his wife repulsed his attempt to kiss her.

"What is the matter, Netta?" he asked anxiously, for he loved her very dearly.

"You ask me that—you—Charles Raymond. Oh, the wicked duplicity of men!" she said, with a withering scorn.

"Netta," said Charlie coolly, "I don't know why you are angry, but my conscience is clear. I have done nothing to deserve this treatment. Will you have a chop?" The servant had brought in the dinner.

"Chop?" repeated Netta in a heartbroken voice. "I suppose a man would eat if the whole house were tumbling about his ears."

"We will postpone any further discussion," suggested Charles quietly, as he did not wish to have domestic afflictions rehearsed in the kitchen.

So they ate in silence, and then went, by a common consent that had become mechanical, to the library, where they usually had music and a chat, when not interrupted by callers.

It appeared they were not to be alone. The bell rang loudly, and a voice was heard inquiring for Mr. and Mrs. Raymond. Charlie jumped to his feet, frowning angrily.

"Reggy Newcombe—what brings him here? Netta, I do not wish you to meet him—I——"

* * * * *

"Too late, old fellow," said a resolute voice. "I have called to pay my respects to Mrs. Raymond, and to apologise to you, Charlie, for a letter I wrote yesterday concerning your excellent wife, and——"

"My wife did not see the letter or know that it was written," said Charlie stiffly. "I had too much respect for her to tell her that you dare allude to her slangily as you would speak of a horse or dog. I tore that letter up into scraps, and intended to have it out with you as soon as we met."

"You did, eh? Now, my dear Mrs. Raymond, will you kindly listen to me a moment, as I consider an apology is due in this matter, and I want you to intercede for me. Charlie doesn't know what a staid individual I am, but seems to think I am one of the boys. I assure you that the head and front of my offending is the letter in question, which he was so discreet as to tear up. I had seen his wife and had dared, not meaning any disrespect, to write to him and speak of her beauty—pardon me—and refer to her in what I can see myself was quite too demonstrative a style. But I am an old bachelor, an orphan—a disgruntled, disappointed man, and unbearable. If you will forgive me, my dear madam, I promise to reform."

"Then the letter was about me," began Netta, stammering.

"Yes, madam," said the lawyer, frowning awfully at poor Netta, "I was most unprofessionally diffuse, and—pardon me—raved over your beauty and style in a manner that might have tempted your husband to call me out if I had not been such an old friend of his."

"Oh, it's all right, dear," said Charlie. "I didn't let you see the letter, but tore it up as I came home."

"I saw you," said Netta coolly, but with a radiant face, "and I wondered what you were tearing up so viciously."

"You saw me?" echoed Charlie; "thereby hangs a tale, I imagine. Did you think I had a secret from you, dearest?"

Netta glanced cautiously at the face of the lawyer. It reassured her, and she answered without hesitation.

"You couldn't have a secret from me, Charlie. I shall always trust you. And now perhaps your friend would like a little music," and as her fingers ran over the keys on the piano Netta thought serenely:

"I wonder how I could have been so absurd as to make myself wretched about—that other woman."

ESTHER NOANES.

Digitized by Google

AN INDIAN DRUG

BY HUAN MEE,

Author of "The Czar's Diamond," "In Masquerade," "Alan Lindow's Wife," "Philip St. Voullé's Understudy," etc., etc.

CHAPTER I.

A DEADLY POISON.

ESTLIN GODFRY carefully selected an oblong case from the secret drawer of his writing cabinet, and extracting from it several small bottles, covered with curious Eastern inscriptions in red, yellow, and black characters, similar to those that adorn strips of genuine Indian ink, gazed at them with the eye of a connoisseur.

Gazed at them with the eye of a connoisseur.

Estlin Godfry had only been back in England three weeks, and had devoted that time to the unpacking and arranging of a multitude of curios that he had gathered in India. These he had distributed about his sanctum or had given to intimate friends, and had enlarged and expatiated upon them with the loving eloquence of a traveller, but the tiny little packet he was now examining had not yet been shown to anyone, for the reason that none of his acquaintances in the thriving and populous little town of Maythorn were sufficiently interested in the matter of curious drugs and unique poisons to appreciate a concoction so deadly that instant death was the portion of anyone who should taste a single drop of it.

Why did he purchase it from the Indian Fakir? He did not know, he had no desire or necessity for possessing such a power of life and death, and yet there was a strange unaccountable fascination in having in that tiny glass phial a drug unknown in England; a poison that had no antidote, that brought death sudden, swift, and painless, and left no trace behind, no trace beyond utter paralysis of brain, heart and nerve system. It would be an interesting experiment to test the power asserted to be possessed by this colourless drug that glistened limpid and innocent in the phial.

He had seen animals killed in India by the primitive puff and dart, they had dropped dead almost without convulsion when they were hit, and this, he was told, was the kind of poison that had killed them.

He slipped the bottles in his pocket, and taking his hat and stick left Merton House, the residence of his uncle, Joseph Monro, and went to the town to the shop of his old friend, Walter Shenfield, chemist, a man who was really wasted upon a country town, no matter how large its population, whose constant researches in the fascinating fields of chemistry were carried out merely for his own pleasure, and whose discoveries, small though they were, might with more prominent surroundings have been turned to the benefit of mankind.

As Estlin Godfry traverses the half-mile from Merton House to the town, let us look a little at his career. Adopted by his uncle, Joseph Monro, at the age of five, his early tuition and college education were well looked after, and there had only been one cause of disagreement between the nephew and the man who all the gossips rumoured intended to leave him a fortune, and the cause of that disagreement was—a woman. During a stay that Estlin Godfry made in London some two years previously, just at the age of twenty-one, he became enamoured of a lady whose connection with the variety stage was not a recommendation in the eyes of staid Joseph Monro, who at once gave Estlin the alternative of relinquishing all thoughts of an alliance with the lady or of forfeiting the position that he held in his uncle's house, and in order to render the severance from the lady the easier, Monro, in his usual generous way, offered to send Estlin on a trip to India, which had been the long cherished wish of the young man's heart.

Digitized by Google

After all, the love that Estlin fancied he held for the lady was no more than a transient fascination, and against this was thrown into the scale the fulfilment of a lifelong desire to travel in the East. With genuine thanks he had accepted the offer, and the change of scene and the new life of the Eastern world had removed the infatuation from his mind, a process of obliteration which had been very much assisted by the announcement, in a marked newspaper that reached him, of the marriage of the lady to the good-for-nothing son of a sporting peer.

The shop of Walter Shenfield, chemist by examination, was deserted upon that autumn evening; the demand for pennyworths of violet powder, tooth-brushes or cakes of scented soap had ceased. The enormous red Cyclopean eye that glared as though a warning danger signal of the poisonous drugs in those black bottles with large hooded caps on the top shelves, threw a stream of ruddy light across the narrow pavement.

Walter Shenfield, in the glass screened-off corner of the counter where he compounded prescriptions, was hard at work upon one of his endless experiments, the flame under the fragile test tube was boiling the purple fluid into a sea of bubbles and a golden foam was forming on the top. The eyes of the chemist glistened as the success of this experiment seemed assured, when with a sharp snap the tube cracked, and for the fifth time wrested success from the hand of the experimenter at the very acme of its fulfilment.

With an impatient exclamation he blew out the spirit-lamp, and, glancing at the clock, recognised with satisfaction that it lacked but a quarter of an hour to his usual closing time.

He closed his books, cast aside the damaged tube, replaced various bottles of crystals and acids in their accustomed niches on the shelves, and as he finished, the figure of Estlin Godfry crossed the flood of light, which bathed him for a moment as in a stream of blood, and entered.

"Good-evening, Shenfield."

"Ah, good-evening, Estlin."

"Trade seems dull."

"Beastly dull in this hole; there's no chance for a man of science. He never gets beyond a shilling bottle of physic. If it were not for my experiments, I should go melancholy mad."

"Ah, my boy, you ought to go to India. Bombay, or Calcutta would suit you—and you could get jolly good prices for your stuff. Why a man told me he——"

"No good, my boy, I'm a native plant, not an exotic."

"Well, how are the experiments going?"

"Only pretty well; five times I have tried one combination, and five times just at the very point of success the tube has cracked."

"What is the latest?"

"Oh, another antidote."

"It seems to me a most extraordinary thing, Shenfield, that so much time and trouble, so much research and labour should be devoted to the discovery of antidotes. The obvious moral is, don't take the poison and you won't need the antidote, and if a man wants to commit suicide, why not let him?"

"But accidents."

"Oh, they're rare, and even then nine times out of ten a fellow would be dead before you could give him the needful remedy."

"Well sometimes, but it's an interesting study. Now, you've been to India and no doubt have seen deaths from snake bites; surely you applaud the research that found remedies like strychnine—one poison counteracting another?"

The eyes of the chemist glistened.

"That's all very well, but a man can't carry a chemist's shop about with him on every sporting expedition, and then there are poisons so fatal that there is no time to administer any antidote—the man takes them—accident or design, or it may be a wound from a poisoned weapon and it's all over."

"Myths, my dear boy. Myths, nearly all of them, there's sure to be an antidote—only you've got to find it."

"Well now, look here, Shenfield," and Estlin produced three curiously inscribed bottles from his pocket, "here's some stuff I got in India—why the deuce I bought it I don't know, unless it was to give it to you. The copper-faced heathen who sold it assured me that as little as could be conveyed on the point of a pin was instant and painless death." Estlin handed over the bottles to Shenfield who cautiously removed the skin covering the cork of one and opened it.

"Do you really believe it?" he asked at length after a careful scrutiny of the fluid as if he almost expected it to announce its deadly nature.

"Well, I don't know. Try it!"

"What!"

"Not on yourself. Try it on a mouse or a rabbit. You're pretty fond of experimenting upon those little animals. Really, Shenfield, I believe you're callous enough in the pursuit of science to go in for vivisection."

For answer Shenfield opened the door leading to the room behind the shop and returned with a diminutive rabbit, which he gave to Estlin to hold.

"Half a minute," remarked the latter, "you'd better shut the shop up first."

While Estlin nursed the victim destined for sacrifice, Shenfield and the boy he employed to take home the occasional mixtures compounded from hereditary prescriptions, shut up the establishment, and closed the ruby eye that glared in solitary loneliness across the deserted footpath. The boy, dismissed for the night, went off with a whoop, and the experimenters turned their attention to the rabbit. Estlin held the animal, and Shenfield dipped a thin glass rod into the opened bottle and touched the tip of its tongue with it. Almost instantaneously the animal became rigid and its heart seemed to cease its beating. Estlin, with a perceptible gesture of repugnance, laid the little body down upon the counter.

Digitized by Google

"That's quick enough," he remarked.

"Yes; a deadly poison."

Suddenly, with a convulsive twitch, the rabbit rolled over on its back, tipping over the open bottle as it did so, and spilling the rest of the liquid. It was stone dead.

"He's upset it now," remarked Estlin.

"And a good riddance, too," rejoined Shenfield. "It beats prussic, silly; you had better let me put the other two bottles out of harm's way," and without waiting for consent he took them from the counter and locked them in a small cupboard. Then wiping the counter down with a sheet of tissue paper, he threw it and the empty bottle behind the blazing fire of the inner room.

The dead rabbit was buried in the garden, and the incident soon forgotten, as Estlin recounted some stirring episodes of his Eastern trip, to which the chemist listened with attentive ears.

CHAPTER II.

Found Dead.

It is the day of the wedding, the day upon which Miss Ethel Sedwicke is for ever to throw aside the name she has held for some twenty-five years, and become Mrs. Monro, and the heir expectant until to-day, Estlin Godfry, is surprising even his greatest admirers with his geniality, and evident satisfaction at the whole proceedings.

Estlin gazes anxiously at the unconscious figure.

He is "a good fellow," so everyone owns, and seems to have no more thought of the fortune that is passing away from him than he has for cigarettes which he lights regularly every five minutes, places down for a moment, and then forgets altogether.

Not a spark of jealousy or temper is apparent in his manner, although, as is patent to everyone, this wedding must make so grave a difference in his position.

Up to the time his uncle met Miss Ethel Sedwicke he had been his adopted son, and his guardian had made no secret of his intentions.

Estlin was to be a rich man, his uncle's sole heir, and he was therefore to prepare himself for that enviable position by learning the use, and not the abuse of riches.

Nothing that he had reasonably desired in his youth had been denied him, and never had they quarrelled upon the point of money, or disputed upon minor matters. Estlin was his adopted son, his heir; he was to fit himself for a Parliamentary career, and satisfy the livelong desire of his uncle. So it had always been understood, and Joseph Monro had laughed to scorn the oft-repeated suggestions of the younger man that a new heir might one day come upon the scene and supplant him in the course of time.

And now. Well, now the unexpected had happened, Joseph Monro had fallen in love with all the fire and ardour of a much younger man, and as the townsfolk whispered to each other, "It was all up with young Estlin." He would find that Merton House was not quite so comfortable a place when under the supervision of a young woman, however pretty she might be, and as the lady critics maintained, a good deal too pretty to be cast daily in the company of Estlin Godfry. The unanimous votes of the ladies' tea-parties of the town had decided this for him a month at least previous to the wedding, and therefore, as naturally follows when ladies take anything in hand, the whole question was settled at once. The people directly concerned in the matter did, nevertheless, exactly as they liked, and, moreover, Estlin seemed as completely satisfied as his uncle and his pretty young fiancée.

Still the society of the town of Maythorn had decided that it was very hard upon young Estlin, and, of course, there was no appeal, though everyone seemed to suffer more acutely than those chiefly interested.

"Estlin, my boy," Joseph Monro exclaims, on the morning of the wedding, placing his arm about his nephew's shoulders. "You understand this house must always be the same to you, as in the past, and we must be as we have always been, father and son."

"The house can never be the same to me," Estlin replies, and then, as he notices a shade of sorrow cross his uncle's face, with a laugh continues, "it will be infinitely more attractive with such a charming addition."

"Then you are not jealous, Estlin?"

"Jealous, yes, I am completely overwhelmed; I am jealous of your good fortune."

"And nothing else?"

"Absolutely nothing."

A hearty hand-shake adds weight to his fervent protestation, and then Joseph Monro says:

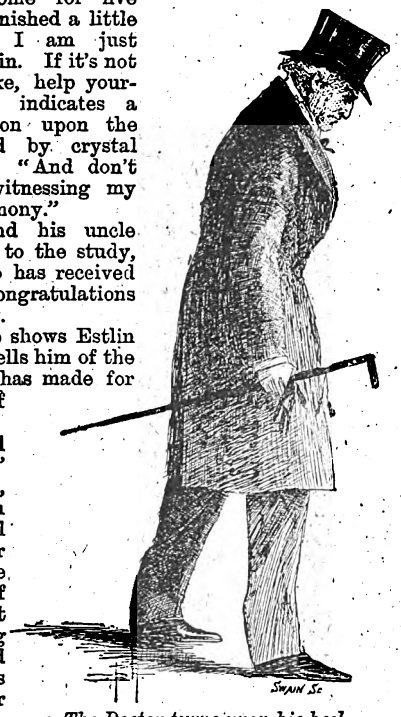
"I cannot ask you to witness my new will, Estlin, for you are not altogether forgotten, but I have a few words to say to you I would rather say alone, if you will come to my study for a few moments."

Estlin is about to follow his uncle when a sharp professional rat-tat-tat announces the arrival of the first of the invited guests, and in a moment the servant ushers in Monro's oldest friends, Doctor Hill, the best man, and Arthur Grindley, his solicitor.

Digitized by Google

"Ah, good-morning, Benedict; congratulations, since you will do it," is the salutation of the Doctor, who is as confirmed an old bachelor as Maythorn possesses.

"Good-morning, Hill; morning, Grindley; well, make yourselves at home for five minutes till I've finished a little private business I am just settling with Estlin. If it's not too early to smoke, help yourselves," and he indicates a smoker's companion upon the sideboard flanked by crystal bottles of spirits. "And don't forget you are witnessing my will after the ceremony."



The Doctor turns upon his heel.

Then Estlin and his uncle mount the stairs to the study, and Joseph Monro has received the first and last congratulations of his wedding day.

In the study he shows Estlin his new will and tells him of the provision that he has made for him, an annuity of £1,000 a year.

"And now, God bless you, my boy," he says; "leave me, Estlin, and go down and entertain Hill and Grindley for five minutes while I write a couple of letters. I shall not be longer, then bring them up here and we'll have a glass of wine together before we start."

"My uncle," says Estlin, as he re-enters the morning room, "will be pleased to see you in his study to take a glass of wine with him in five minutes' time; he has a couple of letters to write now, if you will excuse him."

The clatter of horses' hoofs and the roll of wheels without announce the arrival of the carriages, and Estlin is detained making final arrangments below, while Hill and Grindley proceed together to Monro's study.

As Estlin stands at the window in the bright morning sunlight several of his acquaintances in the town pass by chatting on their way to the church, and their conversation is of Estlin Godfry, the only loser by that day's festivities. Of course he is remembered in the will, but they have seen this kind of thing before. The middle-aged man marrying the young woman and spending the rest of his life in legalised adoration. Estlin no doubt is still left a considerable sum, but of course, there will be half-a-dozen more wills made before the final one is read and then he'll only get a mourning ring or a paltry fifty pounds. Oh, yes, they have seen this kind of thing before, and the hybrid society of a country town never makes a mistake in its estimation of human nature—Never!

Then the lawyer returns to the morning room, but does not enter; he stands at the door until Estlin, looking his way, walks, in response to his glance, towards him.

"We are quite ready," says Estlin.

"Do you know any woman who is not a fool?" the lawyer asks him in his gentlemanly brusque style, and Estlin ventures to suggest that he has the honour of the acquaintance of such a female paragon.

"Then send her to the bride's house and let her distract her thoughts and quietly tell her that Mr. Monro has been taken unwell and will not be able to leave yet awhile. When you have done that come up to the study."

Estlin rushes out to fulfil the lawyer's instructions, and ten minutes afterwards, trembling and flurried, returns and ascends to the study, only to pause, with his limbs shaking under him, as he sees the two men standing upon the threshold, looking grave and serious, awaiting him.

They step aside to allow him to enter. His uncle is seated in his usual chair, his arms hanging by his side, his collar and tie loosened, and the doctor's stethoscope lies upon the table.

Estlin gazes anxiously at the unconscious figure, and his breath halts at the oppressive stillness. What has happened? He turns again to the two men who have followed him into the room and asks:

"How is he now?"

They do not answer him, and Estlin takes the limp hand in his own.

"He has fainted," he says; "it is excitement. He will soon recover."

"He will never recover," Doctor Hill rejoins. "Your uncle is dead!"

CHAPTER III.

A Mystery.

It is the night of the wedding day, and the bridegroom, who should have left the house with his bride, followed by the hearty wishes of all who knew him, has departed alone upon that cold, dark road, the only path from earth to eternity.

The room where he had laughed and talked that morning is vacant, save for that something lying on the bed. Something covered with a sheet, a stretch of white with hideous elevations at its either end, and that is all.

Suddenly as a lightning flash, the news had spread amongst the invited guests. What use condolences or idle words. The horror of the catastrophe, the greatness of the loss, numbed them to silence; and silence was the best.

In the library three men are sitting, with white faces, in which deep lines show the excess of that emotion which men may not give way to, earnestly conversing.

"He was dead before I entered the room," the Doctor says, addressing Estlin, "it happened in the few moments that elapsed between the time you left him and we followed to his room."

"And this will is now waste paper," the lawyer snaps, picking up the unsigned document from the table.

"It represents his wishes, and shall be the same to me as though it had been made a year ago," Estlin replies gravely.

"Tush, you talk like a boy. His last will in which you are——"

"It is not seemly to discuss this matter now," the Doctor sharply interjects, and Estlin wearily places his hand to his throbbing brow. "There are graver matters which must be settled. It is impossible for me to give a certificate with regard to your uncle's death," he continues, turning to Estlin, "absolutely impossible. There must be an inquiry."

"It will be anguish to his friends," Estlin replies, "let it be kept secret. If he had a weak heart, surely you, as his physician, are justified——"

"For his death to have occurred from heart failure is impossible, or at least so improbable that I cannot consent to take any other course than that which my duty indicates. It is next to impossible that he should die so suddenly from natural causes. He was a strong, healthy man, and one I would have given, knowing him as I did, at least another twenty years of robust life. I say, with the full knowledge of the gravity and importance of my words, he did not die a natural death."

Estlin starts in amazement to his feet, and the lawyer, aroused from his habitual composure, turns and stares open mouthed at the Doctor, who returns the glances of the two with a look of meaning, and tapping the table to emphasise his words, sharply repeats:

"He did not die from natural causes."

Digitized by Google

"Not die from natural causes!" Estlin gasps at last. "Doctor Hill, you cannot mean that he——" he stammers and breaks down, and then in a moment slowly continues: "You must explain your words, I cannot understand them."

For answer the Doctor rises to his feet and moves towards the door, turning on the threshold towards the two who gaze at him with faces expressing nothing but bewildered consternation.

"I cannot discuss what are at present simply assumptions," he says stiffly, addressing the younger man, "but I think that I have said sufficient to indicate my intentions. A patient of mine has suddenly died under circumstances of so mysterious a character that I emphatically refuse to pretend to account for a death which to the best of my knowledge and belief should not have occurred. My duty is to make the necessary communications to the proper authorities, and that duty I shall unswervingly carry out. Gentlemen, I wish you good-night." With a formal bow the Doctor turns upon his heel, leaving the two facing each other and completely nonplussed at his behaviour. The legal mind is the first to recover itself.

"You don't look well, but you haven't altered much."

"What the deuce has the old fool got in his head now?" the lawyer gasps. "Surely there is enough misery in the house without the matter being made worse by the madness of a dispenser of castor oil. Bah! the idiotic old fool! but it must be stopped; it shall be, too, or my name's not Grindley. There, there, my dear fellow," he continued hastily, clutching Estlin Godfry's hand, "I must be after him. Heaven only knows what he'll do if I don't stop him," and with a rush he departs, cursing vehemently the whole medical profession, and his greatest friend, Doctor Hill, in particular.

With all anxiety to dissuade him from bringing the family further trouble, the good-natured but irascible lawyer hurried after Doctor Hill; but his pleadings were futile, and understanding at last that the medical man was not acting under any other influence than that of his own impressions and belief, he was reluctantly obliged to content himself with the thought that Doctor Hill was dealing honestly and in good faith, and only doing his duty to his friend who had so mysteriously passed away.

Twenty-four hours have flown before Mr. Grindley meets Estlin Godfry again, and then he has only gained his object by almost forcing himself into the house.

He has been refused admission, but impatiently scorning the message that "Mr. Estlin Godfry is engaged," literally hurls himself into the library where the young man is sitting, weary and worn, a ghost of what he was two days ago.

"My dear Godfry," he snaps, as Estlin wearily rises from his seat, "why shut yourself up like this; you will go mad if you continue in this style much longer."

"Have you heard?" Estlin hoarsely inquires. "Have you heard the horrible news that my uncle was poisoned, murdered? My God, who was the fiend who chose such a moment to strike his blow! Oh, it is horrible, horrible."

"Horrible, yes, but murder, no! It must have been a fearful accident."

"It could be no accident. A man does not play with poisons on his wedding day. It is murder, cruel, heartless, monstrous."

"No, no, my dear Estlin, you are filled with morbid ideas through shutting yourself up so much. Poor Monro must have felt overcome by excitement, taken a sedative to attempt to quiet his nerves, and overdosed himself. There can be no other solution."

"If he had taken a sedative there would have been a phial upon the table, and besides, such drugs do not act in such a manner. They do not mete out death in the twinkling of an eye."

"But your uncle had not an enemy in the world."

"He had one. It rests with us to find him."

"My dear boy, heaven forbid that I should wrong the dead, but——"

"Yes, yes, you would suggest as others do, that it was suicide." Estlin rises and impatiently paces the room. "Does a man who intends to commit suicide wait until the morning of his wedding-day to do the deed? And you were one of his greatest friends."

"It is a mystery."

"The inquest is to-morrow."

"Yes, I have heard. How is she?"

"She! Who can say? She is scarcely conscious of her grief as yet. Oh, what are we to do?"

"Do! We can do nothing. It is one of those mysteries that will never be solved."

"It must and shall be. Leave me, Grindley, leave me; you can do nothing now," Estlin exclaims at last, after a lengthy pause, and the lawyer, sobered and melancholy, can but wring his hand and depart. As he leaves, Estlin again buries his head in his hands and thinks, tortures his brain as he has done for hours, searching for the key to this inscrutable mystery. It is useless. He is brought face to face every time with the terrible facts that seem to defy interpretation. He must give it up; no one will ever solve the mystery. But stay, it flashes upon him as a flood of light. There is one man who may perchance help him. Years ago a man who had chambers in the same building in London as himself. He was not a marvellous detective who could forge a whole chain from a shattered link, for he had neither the patience nor the stability to follow a series of circumstances bit by bit, and yet, by marvellous good fortune, Estlin remembers the man had in the old days so often amused him by instantaneously snapping the answer to a seemingly impenetrable mystery that he had laid before him. It was a gift, not of deduction, but what was more like an exaggerated intuition. The gift of the Gods to woman.

To think is to act, and late that evening Estlin hurries up the stairs of his old chambers, hoping against hope to find that his friend Sidney Larrance has not left the neighbourhood.

Digitized by Google

Busy with his own thoughts Estlin knocks at the outer door, and in a moment finds his arms being nearly wrenched from his body by a ferocious individual attired only in his shirt and trousers, while a hearty voice growing louder with every word ejaculates.

"Estlin Godfry by all that's wonderful!"

In the grasp of the giant, Estlin is dragged into the room, thrust into into a chair, a stiff brandy-and-soda dashed into his hand, and then Sidney Larrance condescends to speak again.

"You don't look well, but you haven't altered much, Estlin. You can guess what I'm about by my costume. More paper staining. The only thing that puzzles me is that editors don't accept my yarns, but then genius must not be trammelled. If I write, let me write with freedom. Do not bind me with collars, coats or vests, let me be free, untrammelled. Free as the wave that beats upon the beach."

Suddenly Larrance pauses and saves himself from suffocation by taking a long deep breath, and then, noticing Estlin has not altered his position and still gazes moodily before him, deals him a Nasmyth hammer-like blow on the shoulder and fiercely asks:

"What's up?"

"Haven't you seen the papers?"

"No, the worst thing a man who writes can do is to read the papers. It lowers his estimation of himself. Either they have not condescended to notice his latest triumph, or they have unmercifully "slated" it. I revenge myself upon them by ignoring their criticisms, and dwell ever in the flattery of my own opinions."

"Sidney Larrance, you're the same good-tempered old cynic as ever."

"Estlin Godfry, I'm neither a cynic nor good-tempered. Simply a selfish old brute who chatters like a fool, when his friend has come miles to ask his opinion on a matter of the greatest moment.

"Forgive me, Estlin, drink your brandy-and-soda like a man, and forget that I've wasted the first five minutes of your time."

"You know that I have come to consult you, Sidney? Did you know before I arrived?"

"My dear fellow, no. When will you appreciate that I am not a prophet, a soothsayer, or a spiritualist?" He rears his gigantic frame aloft. "Do I look like either? My mother was a woman of the ultra-sensitive type, and I have inherited her neurotic temperament. Nothing more, I assure you.

"Sometimes, I know not how, I can jump at the correct solution to a mystery, but that is all. I know no more of your visit than the paper's opinions of my latest novel.

"But go on, my dear chap, go on; I'm afraid with the nerves I also inherited the family tongue."

For a quarter of an hour Estlin speaks without interruption, and then, as he finished the history of all that has occurred, sits back and anxiously watches his old friend.

He breaks the silence again and asks:

"Can you help me?"

"My dear Estlin, I'm sorry to say 'No.' My mind is at present a blank, but do not despair, I will come back with you and perhaps—" he hesitates, and then slowly continues: "but do not rely upon me. Personally, I am as helpless as you. I do not pretend to possess abnormal gifts of second sight, but by examining the scene of the tragedy something may arise to help us."

He gazes thoughtfully and pityingly at the young man a moment and then, with a sigh, envelopes himself in the remainder of his clothes and a gigantic overcoat, and together they leave the house and walk towards the station.

(To be continued.)

RESULT OF PICTURE PUZZLE COMPETITION.

No. 5.

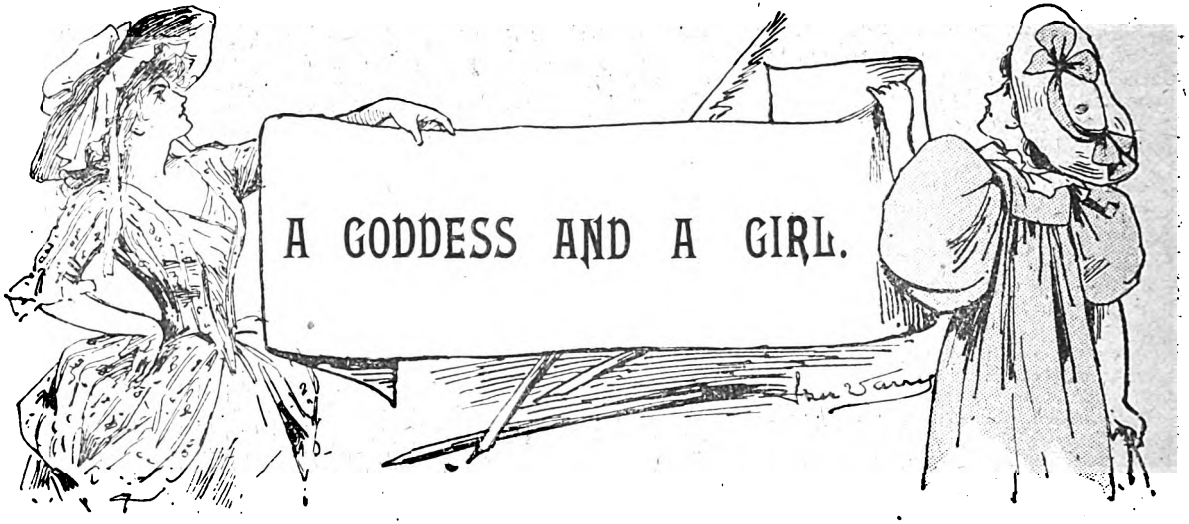
24	81	70	9	36	79	57	56
72	67	35	78	59	30	6	88
80	26	94	50	83	86	85	14
18	84	1	20	8	44	54	47
32	69	21	60	34	42	13	2
16	52	82	12	41	43	77	64
40	27	17	25	73	01	28	48
63	8	71	37	45	51	99	39
31	11	4	33	22	68	65	62
7	74	29	23	61	94	55	94
87	53	38	9	91	58	69	61

A very large proportion of those readers who entered for the Picture Puzzle Competition (No. 5) announced in Short Stories for May 9th succeeded in putting the squares together correctly. It has been decided to award the prize of £10 to the competitor who forwarded the neatest correct solution, and the fortunate person is Mr. Joseph Baker, 9, Argyle Street, Darwen, Lancashire.

The fifty readers whose names appear below have each been sent a gold-plated pencil-case as a consolation prize for the correctness and neatness of their attempt:

G. Somerville, 14, Musard Road, W.
Mrs. Bimnoll, The Cottage, Lyncombe, Torquay.
G. Leake, 9, Greencoat Mansions, Francis Street, S.W.
H. Harris, 21, Genoa Road, Anerley, S.E.
A. Hodge, 1, Springfield Gardens, Upper Clapton, N.E.
Miss Smythe, St. Anne's House, Lewes, Sussex.
A. Buckland, 36, Hanover Street, Peckham.
A. Watson, 27, Dora Road, Small Heath, Birmingham.
Mrs. Peacock, 72, Oxford Street, South Bank, Yorkshire.
Mrs. Pritland, 1, Herbert Terrace, Alexandra Road, Plymouth.
H. Anderson, Naval Ordnance Office, Woolwich Arsenal.
Miss A. Beer, 2, Keppel Terrace, Stoke, Devonport.
J. Cross, 34, Bently Road, Kingsland Road, N.
Miss Swanwick, High Bank, Lymm, Cheshire.
W. Martinnaut, 212, Algernon Road, Ladywell.
Mrs. Jones, 36, Castlewood Road, Clapton Common.
A. Murray, 6, Campbell Terrace, Rodney Street, Hull.
H. Reading, 249, Kingsland Road, N.E.
Miss W. Sparkes, 32, Queensdown Road, Hackney Downs.
Miss F. Bellett, 35, Manor Road, Stoke Newington.
G. E. Fisher, 127, Mornington Road, Leytonstone, Essex.
W. Nichols, 41, Bird-in-Bush Road, Peckham.
H. Noble, Park House, 8, Falkland Road, Hornsey.
Mrs. Ayers, Winchester Villa, 86, Birkbeck Road, Leytonstone.
W. Carey, 124, South Bank, Lister Lane, Halifax.
T. Edwards, 262, Cambridge Road, N.E.
Miss N. Jackson, 7, St. James' Square, Bradford, Yorks.
Miss Hallam, 12, Avenue Road, South Norwood.
A. Clegg, 86, Warren Road, Leyton.
A. Lisle, 9, Maude Terrace, Walthamstow, Essex.
A. Bowles, 35, Western Street, Bradford.
G. Coote, 126, High Street, Guildford.
Mrs. Braud, 9, Newton Road, Urmston, near Manchester.
Miss Passmore, Devon Villa, Saffron Walden.
W. Johnson, 14, Penypeel Road, Canton, Cardiff.
Miss L. Wakefield, Clevemont, Silverhill, St. Leonards-on-Sea.
J. Chapman, Jubilee Cottage, Union Place, Stonehouse, Devon.
Mrs. Porter, 32, Queensdown Road, Hackney Downs, N.E.
J. Alexander, 2, Astbury Road, S.E.
W. Hood, 16, Broadway, Stratford, E.
Miss E. Young, 4, Driffield Road, Bow, E.
E. Howard, 1, Lansdowne Gardens, South Lambeth.
A. Withers, 31, West Wymer Street, Norwich.
J. Hughes, 15, Royal Place, New Cross.
T. Barber, 11, Strand Hotel Buildings, Holywell Street, W.C.
F. Louis, Fairleigh, 33, Thurleston Road, West Norwood, S.E.
J. P. Tucker, 19, Langton Street, Chelsea, S.W.
W. Woolston, 6, Hampden Street, Imperial Park, Beeston, Notts.
Max Raeder, Great Stanmore, Middlesex.

Digitized by Google



He set his face against the sun, drank through his eyes into his soul the crimson glory, turned his glance to the right, to the left, where wood and sky and a sea of measureless splendour lay; and then, with a rigid, vigorous, upward fling of the arms, called into space:

"I'm done with ye! Shine on in your false, treacherous beauty! Majestic, self-satisfied, supreme as you are, I despise you! No longer can you torment, no longer can you drive your fragrances, your alluring smiles, and your siren music through my veins—for I put you away, I renounce you—I pass on to darkness."

As he turned toward the brink of the precipice and hurried forward with his wild windswept head bent down, a figure pressed through the cool leaves of the wood and barred his progress with a strong, white arm. He raised his face again and met the steady, clear, azure gaze of a woman.

"I hate you!" he snarled.

"Why?" she asked softly. "You never saw me before. How do you conjure up hatred so instantly?"

"You annoy me. You obstruct me. I wish to get on till I pass over the edge of that sharp jaw of rock and fall down to forgetfulness—and peace."

"What an absurd egotist you are," said she, her red lips curling into a disdainful, beautiful smile.

Her word struck him like an icy spray and took the deadly heat out of the passion that was burning through his brain and heart. Standing as he had stood a moment before, scorning the whole earth, casting the contempt of his soul straight at the full beneficence of God; putting behind him, like a martyred hero, the defeats and disappointment of a profitless, dreary, black career, and reeling madly towards death, as a bewildered beast leaps into consuming fire, he had palpitated with desperate, defiant pride. There was then a roaring voice within him that said he had done his best, and said that he had done too well, and that the earth was too mean to comprehend him. He had felt that he was tossing the world aside as a maturing child would spurn a toy theatre, and passing on to an oblivion that was the only possible state of happiness for one of his mental and moral dimensions. And now before him stood a woman, a young woman, with a wide, white brow, quiet, cool eyes, and a voice that was the music of perfect repose. A wave of humiliation swept rather sickeningly through him.

"Who are you?" he muttered.

"Well, call me Patience," she replied. "The name is as good as any."

He looked at her from head to foot. She was like a marble statue, except that a mantle of fluctuant, glistening hair swept in semi-transparent profusion around her shoulders.

"Patience!" he repeated. "Patience!"

"Yes," she returned, smiling, as a rose might smile if it had a heart. "I am known by that name to some. Others have called me—Stupidity."

He brushed the hair back from his eyes and brow, and looked intently upon her. She seemed marvellously white and pure as she faced him there in the sunshine. There was a soft, golden haze mingled in the blue of her eyes, and a moisture lay on her lips like dew on a flower. She clasped her hands behind her head, and gazed through her drooping lashes at this young man who was bent on self-destruction.

"Poor, weak fellow!" she said. "You no longer care to live? You find no beauties here on earth worthy of your admiration?"

"None," he replied.

"Well, well! That long green valley off there, with the sun on it, is not good enough for you. The vast blue and gold of that sky above us bores you. The majestic trees with their glittering multitude of leaves, and with the birds singing rapturously through them are dull, uninteresting things in your eyes. Ah, me, what wonderful men are born! You are a very wonderful man, sir!"

He glared at her.

"You are presumptious to make game of me," he muttered.

She smiled again.

"Are you a poet?" she asked.

"The world says I am not," he replied bitterly.

A little laugh rippled from the woman's throat.

"Unappreciative and deplorable world!" she said. "You have laboured in vain to prove yourself an inspired bard?"

"For eight years," he made reply, "I have sung the best songs that surged within me."

"It was a noble, glorious music that you made?"

"It was the best I knew."

"And it was not victorious?"

Digitized by Google

"No."

"Therefore——"

"Therefore—I am weary, and wish to pass from this dream that we call life to that other that is surely sweeter—death."

She turned her eyes away and looked down into the peaceful, radiant valley.

"This is the strength of man," she mused to herself.

He studied the movement of her curved lips angrily.

"Nearly all," she went on, "are like this puny, dejected, limp mortal. They make one strong fight, and then descend to earth and beat their lazy wings with despair. Another race of men must follow this one of cowards and drones. These have not the hearts that deserve the myriad that heaven showers upon them. Humanity is a failure."

She ceased her musings, and again turned to the man.

"It might be better had I advised you to tumble over that precipice, as you were bent on doing. I should judge that you were of no use to yourself or the world, and to silence you would possibly be a boon to mankind. It is however, my duty to guard humans, so far as I can, from the consequences of their own madness. I live on the earth only for the purpose of encouraging moderation, gentleness and common sense, and I am bound to oppose foolhardiness wherever I meet it. Personally I might enjoy abandoning you to your fate, but I must not. So I say to you, go back. Seek once again in the world the contentment and peace of mind that are possible to all. If you have striven eight years to acquire fame, and failed, then smile at your own lack of fortune, and strive eight years more, and then eight years more, and so, on and on, till the hand of death takes yours unsought; and even then smile and thank God that he has been so merciful to one so mean."

She had risen, tall and glorious above him, pointing upward to the arching vault of heaven as she spoke, her eyes dilating, and the firm, commanding force of divinity shining in her face. He cowered under the fierceness of her gaze, shielding his eyes with his arms. When he looked again she was gone. On the low branch of the birch tree, whose leaves had almost touched her golden locks when she stood before him, a bird with a critical brown eye and an opaline throat scrutinised him curiously for a moment and then flew up towards the sun, and he was alone.

He went back to the haunts of men and began life anew.

* * * * *

It was a ball in Mrs. Hooper's house, that great mansion in the square, with a domed ballroom, in which beauty acquired a fairy fineness against a background of white and gold, and garlands of frescoed roses. The dance was at its height when Mrs. Hooper, standing on tip-toe and shading her eyes with a white ostrich fan, gazed in one particular direction for a moment and then uttered a little exclamation. She had discovered someone whose appearance surprised her. It was a tall, pale, good-looking young man who stood on the threshold of the ballroom, and towards whom Mrs. Hooper sped, as a gorgeously-plumaged bird would half fly and run across the lawn.

"Why, you dear fellow," she cried, catching the new-comer's arm. "However did you get here? I had no idea you'd come. Why, you haven't shown yourself at a dance for years."

The young man smiled.

"I've decided to go into the world again," said he. "I'll only look and not dance. I've never been in this new room of yours before. Isn't it beautiful——"

He stopped speaking and caught spasmodically at his hostess's hand, which still lingered lightly on his sleeve.

"Who—is that—that girl?" he whispered.

Mrs. Hooper followed his gaze and laughed.

"Oh, of course she would catch your eye. But, my dear boy! You are positively as white as a sheet."

"Who is she, who is she?" he asked again impatiently.

"Why, Patience Endicott, to be sure."

He turned such a wild gaze upon Mrs Hooper that that lady suddenly feared he was mad, and shivered.

"Patience," he gasped. "My God! Is that her name?"

Mrs. Hooper was now sure that something was radically wrong with him. She dreaded a scene, and cast a quick glance about to see if any trustworthy aid could be summoned without alarming the company.

"What ails you, what is the matter?" she murmured, trying to turn the young man about, with the intention of getting him into the hall. He suddenly seemed to realise he was acting wildly.

"Pardon me," he said in a natural voice. "I owe you an explanation. I have been strangely moved, Mrs. Hooper, by the sight of Miss Endicott. I am quite sure that I never met her, but she is like someone I knew. I cannot explain to you now why the shock at seeing her affected me so. Might I meet Miss Endicott?"

"By all means," laughed the hostess, at once reassured. She hastened over the ballroom floor, with the young poet in her wake.

"Patience, dear, let me introduce an old friend, Mr. Carleton—Geoffrey, this is the nicest girl in or out of paradise, Patience Endicott."

The same azure eyes, suffused with a golden haze and shadowed by long, velvety lashes were turned upon him, and he quailed under their steady, calm gaze.

"We have met before," he found voice to say.

"No, I think not," she replied in even tones, slightly elevating her brows.

"On the brink of a precipice," he went on. "Did we not stand there together one day, not long ago, and you told me I was an egotist?"

"No," she said softly. "The circumstance you mention is wholly strange to me."

He straightened himself and looked down upon her with troubled eyes.

"It is true then," he said sadly, "that I am not myself—that there is something wrong—here," tapping his forehead. "Miss Endicott, it seems to me that my mind is clear, and to me it is all rational and right, when I tell you that I once before now looked on your face, heard your voice, and—thought you sublime. The words you uttered to me swerved me from a terrible purpose and saved me from destruction. It was but a dream—an hallucination—and I am, indeed, in a sad, forlorn condition. My mind has given away—I am mad. And I thought I had found patience."

* * * * *

"Simply brain fever, my dear Mrs. Hooper," said old Doctor Trevelyan, as he warmed his coat tails in front of the fire in the big library. "He was morbid, overworked, and, I think, dissipated. Drank too much brandy, slept about three hours a night, and fairly defied Nature. Oh, that idea of his about the girl? It's nothing at all. It might have been anything else. He might have raved over blue monkeys trying to strangle him, or told you of taking a trip along the bottom of the ocean and drinking afternoon tea with a mermaid. That scene with Patience on the edge of the precipice, and the confusing of the figure with your friend, Miss Endicott, was an instantaneous, lightning-like fantasy that flitted across his brain just as he stood looking on the real girl for the first time. Her placid beauty intimidated and awed him. It reminded him of his own fevered state and rebuked himself.

Digitized by Google

"And yet, by Jove! what a peculiar sermon was in that dream of his! Now that he is all right, I hope that, in his limp and passive condition, he may dwell upon and profit by the beauty of the fine flash of sanity that blazed through his madness. For one instant he saw the futility and unwholesomeness of selfish, ill-regulated, and unbridled ambition, and was made to understand the sweet virtue of patience. My dear Mrs. Hooper, patience is a virtue. We find very little of it in these days. We are living very fast, and the most excitable of us cannot stand the pace. We must all of us beat our neighbours in all that we attempt, or else we grow morose and discontented. This young man was unusually sensitive. He was an egotist, in the highest acceptance of the term. After labouring several years he expected to find the world at his feet, and when he did not accomplish this end, he grew bilious and defiant. Then, through brooding and irregular life, he became ill, and the fever took possession of his brain. Well, he was lucky to have had such care. It was eminently humane of you and your husband to put him to bed here when he fainted in the ballroom. A more practical and less tender woman than yourself would have sent him to a hospital. Good-day, madam. Let no one see the patient, except, perhaps, Miss Endicott."

* * * * *

Upon the side of a russet hill, and overlooking a valley sparkling with frosted verdure, through which a narrow, white river is threaded, is a small stone house with a spacious sweep of verandah on three sides. It is November, and a genial-looking young man in corduroys, who has just clambered down the path of the hill, swings a string of partridges from his shoulder on to a rustic table, stands his fowling-piece in a corner, and calls:

"Hey! You unequalled beauty—where are you?"

There is a light step within the house, a swish of skirts, and a very beautiful woman stands smiling in the doorway.

"Lucky again, Geoffrey," she says, glancing at the heap of birds.

"Always lucky," he replies, advancing to her and throwing his arm about her waist.

"How could I be anything else? You bring me luck. Now, what have you been doing while I was in the woods, you luminous angel?"

"Oh, I've been ruling all the red lines under the stage directions in your manuscript, and I couldn't help reading a lot of the dialogues as I went along, Geoffrey. It's wonderfully bright. The play can't help being a great success."

Geoffrey quietly lighted a cigar, smiling in an utterly contented way while doing it.

"Well, if it fails—what harm? I'm sure I don't care," he said.

He threw the match down the slope towards the valley.

"Failure," he said contemptuously. "Let the madman rave at failure! As for me"—drawing his lungs full of fresh air—"why, the world is mine, because"—crossing to where his wife stood, and taking her hands—"because Patience at last is mine!"

Edith Summers.

RESULT OF FIRST BRAIN GYMNASIUM COMPETITION.

A large number of competitors entered for this competition, and the majority of them came very near answering all the problems correctly. One of the guineas goes to Mr. John A. Read, 1, Florence Villas, Cavendish Road, Merton; the other guinea goes to Mr. W. H. Deeble, 25, Arwenack Street, Falmouth. Consolation prizes in the shape of gold-plated pencil-cases have been sent to fifty of the competitors whose attempts are considered to be sufficiently meritorious.

Key No. 1.

An express train often travels at the rate of sixty miles an hour, and then signals will be passed every four minutes, and it can readily be understood that an engine travelling at that high rate of speed will require constant attention.

Key No. 2.

(a) Cap, lap, law, low. 3 moves.
(b) Slow, slot, soot, loot, lost, last, fast. 6 moves.
(d) Pound, pour'd, pours, pouts, bouts, boats, boars, bears, beans, peans, peons, peony, penny. 12 moves.
(There are other ways of doing these, equally short. They have been counted correct).
(It is not possible to do "c" and "e," under the conditions of the competition).

Key No. 3.

N—ine.
O—bey.
R—oar.
T—ees.
H—ard.
P—ill.
O—pen.
L—imb.
E—arn.

Key No. 4.

1— 9 Mirth.
2—10 India.
3—11 Racer.
4—12 Alter.
5—13 Bukki.
6—14 Ewers.
7—15 Arago.
8—16 Union.

Perimeter... ... Mirabaue.
Hub... ... .. Harrison.

Key No. 5.

Competition.—Numerical Value = 157.

Key No. 6.

MINISTERS MANKIND BREAD
ODE
A
ADA
CIDER VILLAIN MUTTERING

Key No. 7.

Run—Fifty-two different meanings.

Key No. 8.

Coldstream.

Key No. 9.

(a).

T	R	I	M
R	O	S	E
I	S	L	E
M	E	E	T

(b).

M	E	A	N
G	L	U	M
L	O	R	E
U	R	S	A

Key 10.

"Dear my Lady Golden Hair,
Why averted glances?
Why disfavour, lady fair?
Tell me how it chances."

As she shakes her head there flies
Golden mist that shrouds her eyes;
Still as other rosebud's tips
Stay my lady's folded lips.

"Tell me how I fell from grace,
Tell me where I stumbled,
Oh! do not keep a frowning face,
See how I am humbled!"

Digitized by Google

The Brain Gymnasium

No. 4. NEW SERIES.

TWO PRIZES OF A GUINEA EACH.

BELOW will be found the fourth batch of ten problems in the new series of The Brain Gymnasium. Two prizes of a Guinea each are offered weekly to those competitors who answer correctly the greatest number of these problems.

Consolation Prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

Rules:

1. All solutions to be written clearly on one sheet of paper.
2. Do not write the questions; simply put the numbers and the answer against each.
3. Each set to contain the £100 coupon (found on second page of cover) for the current week.
4. All attempts to be in by Monday, June 1st.
5. Mark your envelope "Gymnasium, Number 4."

(31.) Charade.

My first is the meal of a certain cereal boiled.
My second signifies space.
My third is an edible fungus.

(32.) How many words can be made out of "conceivable" without altering the arrangement of the letters? Give the words, and the total against each.

Example: Wards—war, wad, was, as. Four moves.

(33.) The initials and finals of the words defined below spell words which signify:

(a) Warbling, (b) Bearing leaves like grass.

(a) Departure.
The fruit of the oak.
A Jewish doctor.
To snarl.

(b) An animal of the dolphin family.
A piece of verse.
A term in music.
A farinacious food.
Pertaining to an inauguration.
A messenger from the Pope.
A leaf inserted between leaves.

(34.) Example: Curtail "a piece of music" and leave "a male child."

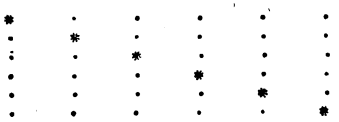
Solution: SON—G.

Solve the following problems in the same way:

1. Curtail "dirty" and leave "fierce."
2. Curtail "yours" and leave "lean."
3. Curtail "a bone" and leave "an expression of surprise."
4. Curtail "a mock pearl" and leave "a fruit."

(35.) Supposing you paid a 1d. for every capital letter on this page; 1½d. for every seven digits; and 1¾d. a dozen for the ordinary letters. How much would you pay for the whole?

(36.) Each of the dots below represents a letter, and those letters which fall on the asterisks will spell a word familiar to our readers.



(37.) The following sentence is written in cypher. Translate it.

Thfrf js cpnsjdfrbbly lfss trpvblf jn brrbngjng b cyphfr sfntfncf thbn thfrf js jn fjndjng b splvtjpn tp jt.

(38.) The following letters, when arranged in their proper order, form three sentences. The punctuation marks are in their correct relative positions.

1. a b c c c e e e e i k k l l n o p r r ' s s t u w y.
2. a a c d d e i j m n o o o r r ' s s t.
3. a a d e e e e e f h h i i l m n o o o r s ' s, t t t u v.

(39.) The following sentence, when reconstructed, forms a readable sentence:

Early delayed by his already long, courier next letter walking on to pouch lett leather quickly, and the destination and more too been this day he was with one in for had he too letter the to reach ought forwarded first be if its it.

(40.) What word on this page has the greatest numerical value?

i = 20. j = 50. m = 1. d = 47.

Digitized by Google

The Rural Postman.

I.

He was a fine young fellow. Big, strong, and well built, he carried his head high—a head as fair as that of a child, with frank and direct blue eyes, a mouth around which a smile always played, and a red moustache jauntily turned up at the ends.

Everyone saluted him, as he passed, with a nod or a friendly "Good-day," and the peasants often invited him into their cottages to eat a morsel and to drink a glass of their light wine. He ate and drank standing, with his eyes fixed on the clock that was rarely missing from the sitting-rooms; and when it was time to go, he would always set out with a song on his lips.

Everyone knew him and everyone liked him, from Mougy to Salves; and when people spoke of him, they said: "He is a brave man."

And so he was. An army medal, as brilliant as on the day that he received it, glittered on his chest, throwing, as it were, a ray of glory upon the humble blouse of the rural postman. He was proud of it, too! At any rate, it showed the world that he had served his country, and that it was away in some far land, in battle, that he had lost his right arm. For he was maimed, poor fellow, and the sleeve of his blouse, doubled up, stopped just at the height of the medal.

"Good-day! Good-day!" the country folk cried to him when they saw him pass their house or their field. It was always a kindly greeting, and the brave fellow well deserved it.

II.

It is a hard life, a rural postman's; and when one thinks of it one pities the fate of these unfortunate men, who, in all weathers and all seasons, through the heat of summer and the cold of winter, up hill and down dale, traverse the woods and the ravines, climb the mountains, and sometimes cover miles at a stretch in the sweltering heat or the driving snow in order to carry to some cottage a bit of paper which takes up so small a space in their haversack.

It is a hard life, indeed, and withal so ill-paid. Some £30 or £40 a year with which to keep from starving, and for that to walk from morning till night, growing foot-sore, tearing oneself with the brambles in the wood, heating one's blood in the fire of June and freezing it in the frosts of January.

Well, in spite of all its drawbacks, Pierre Ladello loved the life, and would not have changed it even had he been offered double the salary for less toilsome work. He loved it, and nothing frightened him—neither the rain which soaked him to the skin, nor the snow which enveloped him in its shroud, nor the wind which hurled itself against him; he feared nothing, he dreaded nothing.

The reason was that, half-way between Salves and Mougy, there stood a little red-tiled house, a poor, isolated building, on the threshold of which a sweet-faced girl awaited him as he passed on his rounds. He always entered the house and rested a few minutes in the sitting-room, which was shady and cool in the summer and in the winter filled with a brightness shed from the hearth. He would talk a few moments with the mother kiss the girl on the forehead, and then set out again.

She was his fiancée. They were to be married one fine day in the coming April—the month that fills the trees with song, and gives to the delicate wild roses their dawn-coloured dress. And they looked forward to this sweet month of April with great impatience, they spoke of it in all their vows, and already formed many projects for the future.

How happy they would be in their humble home! They would have more of joy than the rich and powerful, for they would possess peace of heart, tranquility of mind, and their mutual love. Despite their poverty they would not suffer; the good God Who watches over all His creatures, from the highest to the lowest, would come to their aid. With His help work would not fail them, and He would recompense them according to their worth. At night they would rest from the fatigue of the day's journey and the day's work, with a grateful hymn of praise in their hearts and a prayer on their lips.

All this would come at the time when Nature renewed herself, in the first month of the spring, which made the flowers grow, and the name of which sounded in their ears like delicious music:

April! April!

III.

April returned and cried abruptly: "Behold me!"

At once, in order to make way for him, the snow which still covered the country disappeared, and he could at his pleasure throw flowers among the grass, hang up nests in the trees, and laughingly show his suncrowned head above the spring foliage.

He brought with him the grateful warmth which gave comfort to man, and made the plants grow, and he put more music still in the hearts of Pierre Ladello and his promised bride.

You should have seen with what nimble steps the rural postman now covered the roads, freed at last from the frost and ice, and with what a radiant smile Suzanne received him. They were to be married at the end of the month, and already the young girl was making her wedding dress—a beautiful dress of blue cashmere, to the body of which she meant to pin a spray of orange blossoms. Pierre had ordered a new suit which would afterwards serve him for Sundays and holidays.

And the mother prayed to God from the depths of her heart to bless their projects and their coming union.

IV.

But the April they had awaited with such impatience came to bring mourning. One day Pierre arrived later than usual at the residence of his fiancée. If the sun had made the flowers grow, it had also melted the snows, and now the streams were converted into little rivers. One of them in particular, which ordinarily ran dry, was suddenly swollen at this point to such an extent that the rural postman had had to make a wide detour. He found Suzanne anxious because of this involuntary delay on his part. She did not even smile in her customary fashion; that was due, no doubt, to the fact that, having spent more time en route, he could now hardly stay a moment by her side.

Digitized by Google

One kiss only for his fiancée, and already he was off again. Must he not arrive exactly at the hour fixed for the arrival of the courier? As it happened, he had only one letter to carry, but it was pressing, and had been paid for.

"Here, my boy!" an old peasant had cried, as the postman had passed his house, "take that for me, will you? You will save me a journey to the town."

"Very well, father Marienne."

"And take care that no one steals it on the way. There's a good bit of money inside, you know," he continued, handing Pierre the envelope, on which the address was scrawled in a bad handwriting.

"Oh! Don't be afraid!" replied the postman. "There are no brigands in this neighbourhood that I know of, and besides, I have my toy. See."

He showed a revolver, which never quitted his side during his long rounds.

"That's right!" said the peasant. "That satisfies me. To-night, when you return, you shall have a drink; I will wait for you. Ah! I forget. It is sure to reach early to-morrow, that letter?"

"Yes, certain."

"It's for my son, you see."

"That will be all right," was the postman's reassurance.

And he left with this one letter in his leather pouch, walking more quickly, for he had already been delayed too long, and the letter ought to be forwarded on by the first courier if it was to reach its destination early the next day.

V.

SUZANNE watched him afar off. She loved him so much, this dear creature, that in spite of his disablement, no man was so handsome in her eyes; and she thought "Soon I shall be his wife!" with an indescribable joy.

All at once a resounding cry reached her ears.

Pierre heard it too, far he turned round quickly, thinking, perhaps, that it came from the house; but, seeing Suzanne at the door, he continued on his way, still listening.

Hardly had he advanced a few steps when another cry, a despairing call for help again arrested him, and he asked himself whence it came.

But Suzanne was already running towards the stream that passed near the house, and of which one could see the footbridge in the neighbouring meadow.

"Pierre! Pierre! It's here!"

He rejoined her in less than two minutes, and both leaned anxiously over the water, which had become muddy and deep at this spot, and very rapid.

"Well," he said, "someone cried out. Perhaps it was not here."

"I am sure the voice came from this side," she replied; "and—look!—see, there, Pierre, what is that floating on the water? It looks like—it is a hat!"

He leaned more forward still, and, with the aid of a switch, succeeded in drawing up out of the water a child's hat, which Suzanne at once recognised.

"Ah! good Heavens!" she murmured. "It is little Toine Marchand who has fallen in. I saw him pass just now, and I know this is his hat. But, what are you doing, Pierre? Are you going to——"

He did not give her time to finish the sentence.

"Take my bag, quick, Suzanne, and carry the letter on if necessary," he said. "I am going to save the child."

Before she could even hold him back or cling to him—for it was a real danger for Pierre to hazard himself thus, maimed as he was—he threw himself into the water without reflection, with this one idea present to his mind—he must save the little one.

Could he reach him! Ah, yes, he did that; but how to remount to the surface, with one arm missing and the other paralysed by the grip of the struggling child.

If only he had two arms! He wrestled, made superhuman efforts; but the child, in the spasm of agony, perhaps, clutched, clutched! The unfortunate young man could not even make him lose his hold, and felt his strength going. He was exhausted, and was being carried away by the current.

"Help! Help!" cried Suzanne.

But the countryside was deserted, the houses were far off, and no one heard her.

"Help!" she repeated.

Alas!

She remained there, with her terrified eyes fixed on the water, and counted the seconds by the beating of her heart. But the seconds—the minutes, succeeded each other, the time passed on, and her unfortunate lover did not come to the surface.

Then, thinking that perhaps he would re-appear farther down, she commenced to run along the bank of the swollen stream.

"And—the bag?" she thought suddenly.

She retraced her steps, and picking it up, pressed it to her bosom, to cherish the warmth that is still retained of the beloved body that had now disappeared. Then she resumed her hopeless quest.

By-and-bye, as she met nobody who could come to her aid, and as she could no longer deceive herself as to the fate of Pierre, she ran on, almost without stopping, to the town; and the clerks at the little post-office saw her enter among them, her appearance scared and her eyes haggard.

"Here!" she said, holding out the bag. "There is a letter inside that Pierre spoke to me about; it is paid for, as—as he is dead—drowned. If I had not brought it, they—might have thought—perhaps, that he was—gone with—this letter. I—did not want—them to think that!"

They made her sit down, they questioned her, they endeavoured to reassure her; and, the alarm being given, a search was at once made, which resulted in the discovery of the unfortunate young man's body not far from Mougy; and that of the child Toine as well, for the boy still clung to the arm of the drowned man.

It is some years since this happened. Suzanne still lives, but she remains faithful to the memory of her dead lover; and in the house where he stopped each day as he pursued his rounds, she grows old, religiously guarding in the depths of her heart the remembrance of the poor rural postman.

JEAN BURANCY.

Digitized by Google

The Wythecombe Mystery

By JOHN K. LEYS, author of "The Tenth of June," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

WHILE on a sketching tour in Wales, LAUNCELOT VERE gets into a dangerous position on the face of a precipice. His life is saved by WINIFRED DENVERS, to whom he becomes engaged. On the wedding morning LAUNCELOT fails to put in an appearance at church, and no news can be heard of him. Miss UNWIN, the village schoolmistress, has disappeared at the same time. HAROLD KENYON, a friend of LAUNCELOT'S, determines to leave Wythecombe in search of his friend.

KATHERINE DALE, A young lady with whom HAROLD KENYON is in love.
PAUL SHENSTONE, Engaged to KATHERINE DALE.
REV. MARK DENVERS, Rector of Wythecombe, and WINIFRED'S father.

CHAPTER III.

THE SEARCH BEGINS.

HAROLD KENYON was a thorough Englishman—plain featured, though of pleasing expression, stoutly built, energetic, unimaginative—a complete contrast to his friend, Launcelot Vere, and both in appearance and (in many points) in character, a contrast to him. They had known each other first in London, when Vere was a poor and struggling artist. The young painter's better fortune dated from an acquaintance he had formed with a Mr. Pascoe, a wealthy man who had known Vere's father. This Mr. Pascoe was now dead; but he had been of great service to the artist, taking him down to stay at his house at Richmond and paint pictures for him there, and introducing him to his friends, men of substance, who occasionally purchased Vere's canvases.

To write a hurried note to Miss Dale.

Kenyon remembered those bygone days as he strode along towards Miss Unwin's cottage; and he remembered, too, that never once had he heard this woman's name from his friend's lips. But seeing that (according to Shenstone's account) Vere certainly knew her, this was not much to build upon. It was the fact that the two had disappeared almost simultaneously that troubled Kenyon.

His face was grave when he knocked at Miss Unwin's door. It was graver still when he turned away. The schoolmistress had left home suddenly on the Tuesday morning, leaving the assembled children to wait for her in vain. She had given no notice of her intention to anyone; and she had taken with her the greater part of her belongings. Surely, thought Kenyon, if she had been called away for any legitimate reason she would have sent a message to the Rector.

Kenyon only remained in the village long enough to write a hurried note to Miss Dale.

"I am going up to town this afternoon," he wrote. "If possible I shall be back by Sunday, and as soon as I return, I will call and tell you what I have done. Of course, if I hear any good news, I will telegraph immediately."

"Good news!" he said to himself as he sealed his note. "What good news can I expect? Either Launcelot is dead or seriously ill, or he has played the part of a scoundrel."

For a few seconds he stood with the sealed note in his hand, wondering whether it was not taking a liberty to send it. Kenyon's relations with Miss Dale were somewhat peculiar. When he first met her he had been greatly struck, not merely by her beauty, but by her manner and bearing. There was nothing haughty, still less anything affected, about the girl; yet she seemed to belong to a sphere quite above that in which she was placed.

Unknown to himself, Harold was already deeply in love with her when he learned that she was engaged to be married to Paul Shenstone. From that time he had avoided meeting her, yet they had occasionally seen each other; and once—once only—Harold had seen a look in her face which made his heart beat as if it would suffocate him—a look which seemed to tell him that if he had wooed her before her hand was promised to another, he might have won her.

But after that day she had treated him with a marked coldness; and he hardly knew whether she would not be displeased at his writing to her. Yet she was his only channel of communication with Miss Denvers, for he did not know the family at the Rectory, though he was acquainted with the Rector; and he was anxious that Launcelot's bride should know that something was being done to clear up the mystery that had darkened her life.

Digitized by Google

So he despatched the note and set out for Darnport at once. He had only time to throw some things into a portmanteau, snatch a few mouthfuls of food, and catch the afternoon express for London.

Early next morning Kenyon rang the bell of a house in Cumber Street, the house in which Vere had rented a flat. He hardly expected to learn any news of his friend, but he thought he might possibly find in his rooms something that would give a hint as to what had become of him.

Vere had not come back, nor had he sent any letter or telegram.

The deserted studio was in the utmost disorder—pictures, draperies, packing-boxes, and "properties" were huddled together in confusion.

"At least," said Harold to himself, "this does not tell of a premeditated flight."

In the sitting-room things presented much the same aspect; and after some hesitation Kenyon began to search for something—anything—which would help to throw light upon his friend's disappearance.

A large leather portmanteau lay in one corner half-packed. That, thought Kenyon, seemed to make it clear that there had been no elopement. But then he noticed, shortly afterwards, that a smaller bag, which had often accompanied Vere and himself in their holiday rambles, was missing. This looked odd.

The bookcase was almost stripped of its contents; but on a shelf where it had evidently been concealed when the books were in their places, Harold noticed a large phial. He took it down, uncorked it, and smelt it. It had contained laudanum.

For one moment the wild thought troubled him—could Vere have destroyed himself? Then he remembered that a year or two before Vere had told him that he had been suffering a great deal from neuralgia, and had been in the habit of taking opium to deaden the pain; but had, after a struggle, given it up, because the drug was gaining too great a hold on him. Most likely, thought Kenyon, the phial was a forgotten relic of that period. Its appearance proved as much, for it was covered with dust.

On another shelf Harold found an empty case, lined with red velvet. It looked as if it had been made for a revolver. He closed the case, and put it aside, and then turned to the writing-table. Among the various objects that lay scattered over the table was a small pocket diary. This he snatched up eagerly. The day that had been fixed for the wedding was marked with a cross. But there were no entries that seemed likely to be of any service, except one. In the division marked Tuesday, in the same week Launcelot had written: "Beaumont, 8 p.m."

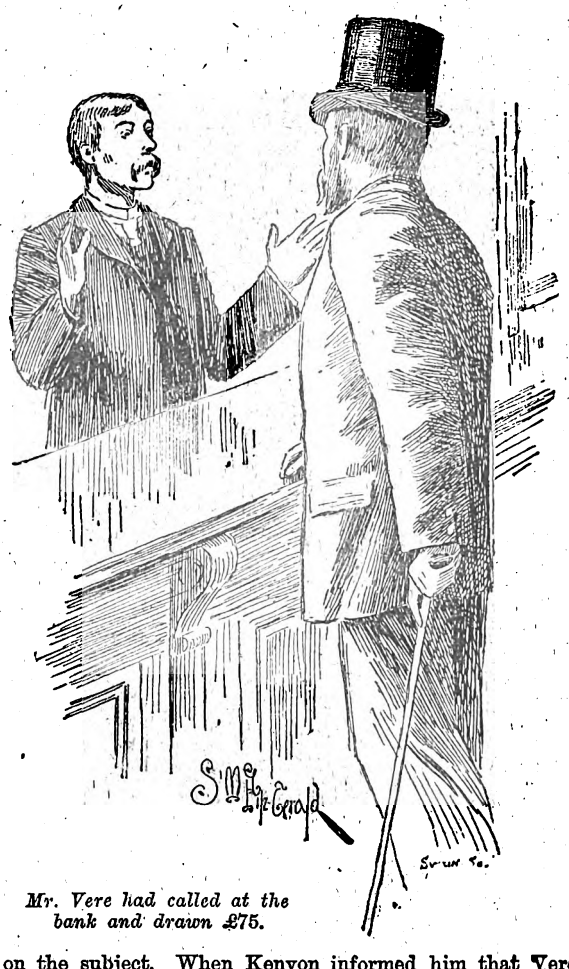
Kenyon thought he had heard his friend speak of an acquaintance named Beaumont. He fancied he was a solicitor, or a solicitor's clerk. But the diary contained no hint of the business which was to be the subject of the interview that Tuesday night, nor any clue to Beaumont's address. However, Kenyon made up his mind to see this man. He slipped the diary into his pocket, and began hunting among the papers that were strewed about the table. Not one of them was of the slightest importance; not one of them gave the smallest hint of any intention on Vere's part to take any extraordinary step.

After a moment's hesitation Harold tried the drawers of the writing-table. They were all unlocked, and the few papers they contained revealed nothing.

There was nothing more to be done; but before going away Kenyon questioned the people of the house a second time. All they could tell him was that Mr. Vere left the house on Tuesday afternoon about five o'clock, without saying where he was going or when he would return. He had no luggage with him. He wore the ordinary morning dress a gentleman wears in London; and he also had on a light grey overcoat, as it was a wet afternoon.

Kenyon stowed away these scanty details in his memory, and having left his address that a telegram might be sent to him the moment anything was heard of the missing man, he drove straight to Scotland Yard.

The case was duly entered, but the superintendent on duty did not feel called upon to offer any advice or remarks



Mr. Vere had called at the bank and drawn £75.

on the subject. When Kenyon informed him that Vere had been on the eve of his marriage when he disappeared, he nodded sagaciously, as much as to say that that fact might of itself account for everything. But when Harold went on to inform him that a young woman who had been living in the village where the marriage was to have taken place, and who was known to Vere, had left her home at the same time, the superintendent's features relapsed into a grin.

"Seems to me that may be the explanation of the gentleman's conduct, sir," he remarked with a confidential air.

"There is nothing to show that the two events are connected in the slightest degree," said Harold sharply.

"There is nothing to show anything as yet," remarked the official. "But take my word for it—if you hunt for the young woman and find her, you'll find the young gentleman not far off."

Shenstone's words came back to Kenyon's mind. The policeman had put the thing more coarsely; but it was evident that it would be absurd to resent the insinuation.

"I know Mr. Vere, and I am sure you are wrong," he said quietly. "Will you see that a description of the missing gentleman is sent to all the police stations?"

The superintendent promised that this should be done, and added that it would be well to visit the hospitals.

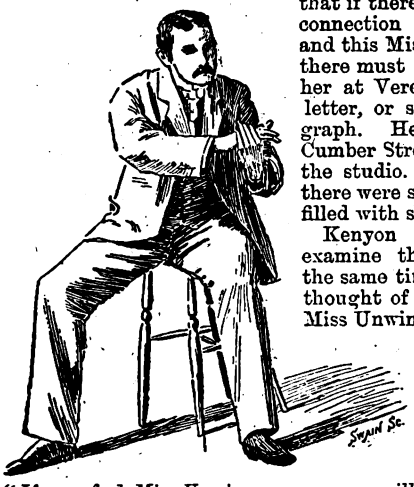
Digitized by Google

This Kenyon had already resolved to do. He visited the nearest hospitals and telegraphed to the others. But it was all in vain. Vere had not been admitted to any of them; and when he had ascertained the fact Kenyon hardly knew whether he should be glad or sorry. In spite of himself he was beginning to think that Shenstone and the superintendent of police might perhaps be right. Miss Unwin might have had a hold on Launcelot which he could not shake off. She might have learned some secret of his, and insisted on his marrying her as the price of her silence. But it was all dim conjecture—fruitless guessing.

In the afternoon Kenyon called at the bank at which Vere kept his account, where he learned that on the Tuesday morning Mr. Vere had called at the bank and drawn £75, which sum was paid to him in gold and notes.

"That looks as if he had not run away; the sum is too small to last any time," said Kenyon to himself as he left the bank, "and yet, I don't know, he might think it enough for the time being."

As Harold turned his steps westward it occurred to him that if there really was any connection between Vere and this Miss Unwin, surely there must be some trace of her at Vere's rooms—some letter, or sketch, or photograph. He went back to Cumber Street, and entered the studio. In one corner there were several portfolios filled with sketches.



"If you find Miss Unwin . . . . you will find our friend, too."

Kenyon set himself to examine them, wishing at the same time that he had thought of inquiring what Miss Unwin was like. Two of the portfolios were full of sketches of landscapes. But the third contained a series of heads in outline. Amongst them Kenyon came across a sketch which struck him as being remarkable.

It was the head of a woman—not a girl, but a woman of, perhaps, five or six and twenty. It was a singular face—very long for its breadth, dark, handsome, yet not altogether pleasing. The eyes looked out from under heavy eyebrows; there was a severe look, that was also one of pain, about the mouth. The next sketch Kenyon turned over was a drawing of the same head. The attitude was different, but the face was the same. The next sketch to that, and the next, and the next presented the same features. Nor was this all. Among the pictures Kenyon found a carefully-finished portrait of the same woman. It was easy to see that it was a good likeness, and that much labour had been spent on it. The dark eyes looked as if they held some painful secret. One hand—not plump and smooth, but thin and muscular—rested on the breast, as if it were crushing down some words that were not to be uttered. Was this a portrait of Miss Unwin? "If so," said Harold to himself, "she is no common woman."

After thinking a moment he selected one of the sketches, wrapped it up, and carried it away with him.

There remained one person who must be seen—Mr. Beaumont, the man whose name Vere had jotted down in his diary.

This gentleman's name was in the law list—Kenyon's memory had been accurate on that point—and he had an office in the city. But it was too late to call there that night. There was nothing for it but to wait till the next day, and Kenyon spent the night at the Great Western Hotel.

Next morning he presented himself at Mr. Arthur Beaumont's office. He was not kept waiting. Mr. Beaumont was too young a lawyer to have many clients.

He was a short, stout, florid young man, with small brown eyes, a rough yellow moustache, and a wide mouth. He remembered his engagement with Mr. Vere very well. But Mr. Vere had not kept it. He was rather surprised, he added, that the appointment had not been kept.

"May I ask why?" put in Kenyon.

"Well, you know," said Mr. Beaumont with a little nervous laugh, "the fact is, your friend and I belong to the same club; and one night he won some money from me at poker."

Kenyon gave a slight start.

"Oh, you needn't be alarmed! It was only a matter of ten pounds. Vere is no gambler in the proper sense of the word. But I wanted my revenge; and Vere said he would come to my rooms on Tuesday evening and let me win my money back if I could. I was surprised that he did not turn up, that's all."

"You have not seen him since?"

"No, as it happens, I have not."

"You are aware, of course, that he was to have been married last Thursday?"

"Married? No! He never told me."

Harold's heart sank within him as he heard this.

"You are an intimate friend of Vere's, I suppose?" asked the lawyer.

"I think I may say I am his most intimate friend. But I have not seen much of him for the last two years. Perhaps you can tell me——. Did he ever speak to you of a Miss Unwin?"

Mr. Beaumont's face changed. Harold saw it and his heart again misgave him.

"I see you know the woman's name," said Harold.

"I do know her name," said the other, speaking slowly and keeping his eyes fixed on a paperknife which he was twirling in his fingers, "but I'm afraid I can say no more."

A pang shot through Kenyon's breast. Vere had told him nothing of Miss Unwin. This new friend had, apparently, been told everything.

"He told you——?"

"I fear I must ask you to excuse me, Mr. Kenyon," said the lawyer decisively.

"But surely if you can throw any light on his disappearance——"

"His disappearance?"

"Don't you know that he has not been seen or heard of since last Tuesday?"

"Impossible!"

"But it is true."

"I never heard of it. How could I?"

"I forgot. I ought to have told you. But it is true. His marriage was fixed: the bride was actually at the altar. He never came. He has disappeared, without saying a word to any one, without leaving a trace behind him. And—and Miss Unwin has disappeared also—at the same time—on the very same day!"

"Ah!"

"Now, Mr. Beaumont, will you tell me what you know?"

"My dear sir, I know nothing—absolutely nothing!"

"I don't suppose that you know where they—where either Mr. Vere or Miss Unwin is to be found," said Harold; "but you know something of the footing on which they stood with regard to each other. You are aware that Vere was well acquainted with this girl?"

"Yes, I knew that."

"Do you think it likely that they have eloped together?"

"Well," answered the lawyer, with a smile, "neither I nor anyone else can speak with certainty on such a point; but if you ask me what I think——"

"Yes?"

"I think that if you find Miss Unwin—isn't that the lady's name?—you will find our friend, too."

Digitized by Google

The superintendent's opinion, given almost in the superintendent's own words!

Harold paused a moment.

"If I thought that, I should trouble myself about him no more," he said; "but I do not believe it."

Mr. Beaumont smiled.

Harold did not like his smile. But there was no more to be said. He left the lawyer's office, and went to Scotland Yard.

The police had learned nothing.

Weary and dejected, Harold went back to Paddington, and set out on the return journey to Darnport.

CHAPTER IV.

An Unwilling Bride.

"Surely I have waited long and patiently, Kate," said Paul Shenstone to his betrothed.

"Not very long—it is not so long since we were engaged," she answered.

"It seems a century to me. You said last May that our marriage might be in September."

"I—I thought so then; but I could not be married while Winnie Denvers is suffering such an agony of suspense. Poor girl! It is pitiful to see her."

"But if Launcelot Vere chooses not to return at all, am I to lose you altogether?"

"You know very well I did not mean that."

"But you promised me that you would fix some day in September. 'The latter half of the month or towards the end'—these were your very words."

"Yes; but—but I did not think you meant to hold me to them so strictly. We have made no preparations, or hardly any."

"That does not really matter. The great thing is that we should be married."

Kate did not answer.

"I thought you had some respect for your word," said Shenstone, piqued at her silence.

The girl's face flushed at this; yet she did not seem angry. In truth she was too much preoccupied, too anxious, to get angry.

"Mr. Shenstone," she began.

"Mr. Shenstone!" echoed her lover, in a low tone of protest.

Kate disregarded it.

"You must surely have noticed a change in me lately," she went on, her face blushing as she spoke. "The truth is, I do not wish to marry. I would rather—much rather—remain as I am. You know I look on an engagement as a very serious thing, only inferior in sacredness to the marriage tie itself. I do not think that, as a rule, one can be justified in breaking a promise of that kind simply because one's mind has changed. But I confess that I do not love you as I ought—as a wife ought to love her husband. The fault, I admit, is entirely mine. You have never failed in your duty to me—never given me the slightest cause to reproach you in any way. But—oh, Mr. Shenstone! I do wish you would release me from my promise!"

Kate's hands were clasped on her lap, and a proud yet supplicatory look was on her face.

Her lover had turned very pale. He opened his lips; but no word came from them. When he did speak, his voice was low and soft.

"I do wish you would release me from my promise."

"Kate," he said, "we have talked of this before. It seems a pity to recur to the subject. I told you that my very love for you prevented my giving you up voluntarily. It seems to me that it is not fair to ask it. Of course, I am in your hands. I cannot force you to marry me. But really I fail to see the difference between deliberately breaking your promise, and pressing me to give you leave to break it. I love you too well, Kate—I cannot give you up."

The girl made no reply. She sat still, with her hands clasped in front of her. She dared not say a word, for fear of bursting into tears.

Shenstone went on, speaking yet more gently.

"I cannot pretend to be ignorant of the reason for the change in you. But I am convinced that——"

A look from Katharine stopped him. Almost immediately, however, he resumed. It took a good deal to abash Mr. Paul Shenstone.

"Your mother—any person of experience, will tell you, my dear, that the one cure for all those fancies is to get married. If only you would allow me to fix a day! Shall we say the first of October?"

"I am afraid, Paul, our marriage will not be a happy one," said Katharine.

"I think you are mistaken. At all events, nothing shall be wanting on my side to make it a happy one for you. Do you not believe that I love you?"

"Yes; I do believe it."

"Then I will be satisfied with as much as you can give me in return. Love will come after marriage; and it will be a far more solid and enduring affection than the kind of thing that often goes by the name."

Digitized by Google

Kate saw that it was useless to prolong the struggle. She was beginning to understand that one might as well try to upset Snowdon as to turn Paul Shenstone from his purpose. Unless she were to violate her promise, she must yield to him.

"Will you promise me, dearest, that our marriage will take place in the first week of October?" he asked after a few seconds.

"Oh, no, no! Not so soon as that."

"Some time in October, then? You consent? Thank you, dearest. May I say in the first half of the month?"

"No—yes—if you wish it—what does it matter? What difference can a week or two's respite make?" was her unspoken thought.

This conversation had taken place in Mrs. Dale's garden. Shenstone, having gained his point, moved towards the gate; and as Kate saw one of the Rectory servants approaching, she walked on to meet her, thus avoiding a tête-a-tête parting with her betrothed. The girl had been sent to say that Miss Winifred would be glad if Miss Dale could come up to the Rectory for half-an-hour.

These messages had been frequent during the last three days. Katharine was so strong, so patient and sympathetic, that Winnie leant upon her, as she could lean on no one else.

Winnie knew that her father loved her dearly; but she could with difficulty keep from showing how his presence, the mere sound of his voice, was to her like a blister on a tender skin. The same thing was true, to a less degree, even of her mother and sisters. They all execrated Vere, and she knew it. They all looked upon her and treated her as the victim of a false, unworthy man. It would have been greater kindness to assume that some misfortune had overtaken him—that Winnie was to be comforted, but not pitied as one who had barely escaped being married to a scamp.

"Kate," she said, "this suspense is more than I can bear."

Kate never made this mistake. She never spoke as if Launcelot were in any way to blame for disappearing as he had done. Indeed, she spoke but little to Winnie at any time. The poor girl seldom cared to talk. It seemed enough for her to sit with one of her friend's hands in her own, sometimes gazing wistfully in her face.

"Kate," she said, as Miss Dale came to her that afternoon, "this suspense is more than I can bear. It will drive me mad. Do you think—he can be alive, Katie? Don't you think, dear, if he had been alive, he would have written to me?"

"Certainly, if he could. But you know, my dear, he may be alive, and yet not able to write. I have been thinking—perhaps he met with an accident and was picked up and carried, not to a hospital, but to the house of some charitable person to be nursed. He may be quite unable to write and yet not seriously injured."

"Do you think so, really, in your heart? But surely he might have got the nurse or some one to write for him."

Kate sighed, and pressed her friend's fingers in silence.

"And oh, Kate, think—if news should never come! If weeks, and months, and years should pass, and no light were to break on my darkness—if I should never hear from Launcelot again, never know what had become of him!"

"My darling, don't think of such a thing. Why torment yourself by picturing the worst. Perhaps, after all, this is merely some freak of Mr. Vere's——" Her voice stopped; the hypothesis was too absurd.

"Do you know, Kate, Miss Unwin has left home suddenly; and papa fancies that Launcelot and she have gone off together! Isn't it too ridiculous?"

"I should think it was the last thing he was likely to do," said Kate evasively.

"Even if he had done so I would forgive him, Kate. Oh, I think I could forgive him anything, if only I knew what had become of him!"

Kate's face grew dark and stern. Her heart bled for her friend; and she was beginning to think hard things of Launcelot Vere.

"But I know all about Miss Unwin—Lance told me."

Kate started.

"He met her at Richmond, at Mr. Pascoe's, you know. She is a daughter (or a niece—I forget which) of Mr. Pascoe's housekeeper. When Lance's friend died, Mrs. Unwin found another situation, and the girl came here to be schoolmistress. Lance was quite surprised to see her here; it was quite a coincidence, he said."

Kate found it difficult to make any reply. In her secret mind she had always suspected that her friend's lover had eloped with this Miss Unwin, and the fact that he had spoken of her to his betrothed bride seemed to make things worse, if he were guilty.

After a time she bade her friend good-night. As she came downstairs the Rector met her, and drew her into his study.

"I'm afraid, Miss Dale, there can be no further doubt," he said.

"Have you had news of Mr. Vere?" she asked quickly.

"No; but I have had a letter from Mrs. Unwin. She has heard nothing from her daughter, and is very anxious about her. She seems to have heard of Vere's disappearance, and—but you can see her letter for yourself."

Kate ran her eye over the letter; it seemed to indicate, she thought, that Mrs. Unwin believed that her daughter had eloped with Mr. Vere.

Digitized by Google

"It seems to me," said the Rector, "that I ought to insist upon this engagement being definitely broken off. I am surprised that Winnie, poor girl, does not see the matter in the same light. One does not like to insist, you know. But Mr. Shenstone, who seems to be a man of considerable knowledge of the world, with plenty of sound common sense, agrees with me that there is no reasonable doubt about the case. And if that is so, it seems much better that the engagement should be considered at an end. Don't you think so?"

"Don't you think it might be well to wait a few days longer?" suggested Kate. "I don't think Winnie should be troubled at present."

"Then you and Mr. Shenstone don't agree on the subject?"

"I have never discussed it with him," said Kate, blushing a little. "All I say is—Winnie has not yet lost faith in her lover. Do not insist on her repudiating him, dear Mr. Denvers, as long as her trust in him survives. If I might make a suggestion I would say: Do not allude to the subject in any way, and send Winnie away somewhere for a change as soon as she can be persuaded to leave home."

"Perhaps you are right," grumbled the Rector. "But it is very annoying. I should like to be able to tell our friends that we are done with the fellow for good and all."

CHAPTER V.

A Practical Hint.

On Sunday afternoon Harold went over to Wythecombe, and called at the High Cottage, as Mrs. Dale's house was called, to report what he had done in London. He asked for Miss Dale, and was told that she was in the drawing-room.

When he was ushered into the drawing-room he found Mr. Shenstone there before him; and if he could have done so he would have turned on his heel and gone away. He had not yet succeeded in schooling himself so as to endure the sight of these two together with perfect equanimity, and he did not care to discuss the affairs of his own most intimate friend before one who was comparatively a stranger.

Shenstone, however, showed himself to be not wanting in tact. He became interested in a portfolio of engravings at one end of the little drawing-room, and left Kate to talk to her visitor.

"I have learned nothing," said Harold in a low tone, "except that Vere left without luggage. On the other hand, he seems to have had quite enough money with him, for he drew £75 from the bank that day, Tuesday; and I found none in his room—indeed, there was no drawer or desk locked up that I could see. One of his portmanteaux was missing; but possibly Vere parted with it some time ago. He had an engagement for Tuesday night, which he failed to keep. It is as great a mystery to me as ever."

As he had been speaking, Harold had been stripping a flat parcel he carried with him of its covering.

"Do you know that face?" he asked, holding a sketch before Miss Dale.

"It is the schoolmistress, Miss Unwin. Where did you find that? In Mr. Vere's studio?"

Harold nodded.

"I fancy that may be explained," said Kate; and she proceeded to tell him that Miss Unwin had at one time been an inmate of Mr. Pascoe's house. "It is quite likely," she added, "that Mr. Vere met her there, and got her to sit to him as a model."

"Then they may have become intimate. That looks rather as if—Miss Dale," he cried suddenly in a loud tone, "I can't and won't believe it."

"You shouldn't speak so loud if you are talking secrets," said Shenstone in a pleasant tone from his corner.

"I am talking no secrets," said Harold gloomily. "All the world may hear me say it. I don't believe that my friend, Launcelot Vere, has eloped with Miss Unwin. Weak he may be, but he is not a scoundrel. I could understand his being infatuated enough to run away with the girl. But that he should have done so on the very eve of his marriage, and without a word of warning to his bride—that Vere should commit an outrage of that description—no. It is not possible."

"Did you meet with any success in your inquiries?" asked Shenstone politely.

"None at all."

"I wish I could help you, for Miss Denvers' sake for—"

"I thought you were of opinion that the match should be definitely broken off," interrupted Kate.

"Speaking as a friend of Miss Denvers' and of her family, certainly I think so. Mr. Vere's conduct seems to me inexcusable. Even Mr. Kenyon will agree with me in that. But it would be a satisfaction to him, and to us all, to know exactly what had become of Vere; and I shall be very glad to help in clearing up the mystery."

Kate ran her eye over the letter.

"Well, if you can make any suggestions, I shall be happy to act on them," said Kenyon bluntly.

"You have advertised for news of your friend, offering a reward for any information?"

"No. I don't see how it could do any good."

"It could do no harm, and it might elicit something. I should certainly advertise."

"I will. I ought to have done so sooner. Thank you for the hint. Does anything else occur to you?"

"Well, you know what I suggested before," said Shenstone with a smile—"find the woman."

Digitized by Google

"Perhaps you are right," answered Kenyon, after a moment's pause. "I will find Mrs. Unwin's address, and see her at once."

"My dear fellow," said Shenstone, with an amused look on his face, "when a young lady runs away, one does not go to her mother's house to look for her."

Kenyon reddened a little; and Kate came to his relief by saying:

"I fancy Mrs. Unwin is in a situation as housekeeper, or something of that kind, and she does not know what has become of her daughter; she is very anxious about her. Mr. Denvers showed me last night a letter he had from her. She seems to think that—that the circumstances are suspicious."

Harold said nothing, but sat gloomily staring at the carpet.

"Did you make inquiries at Paddington?" asked Shenstone.

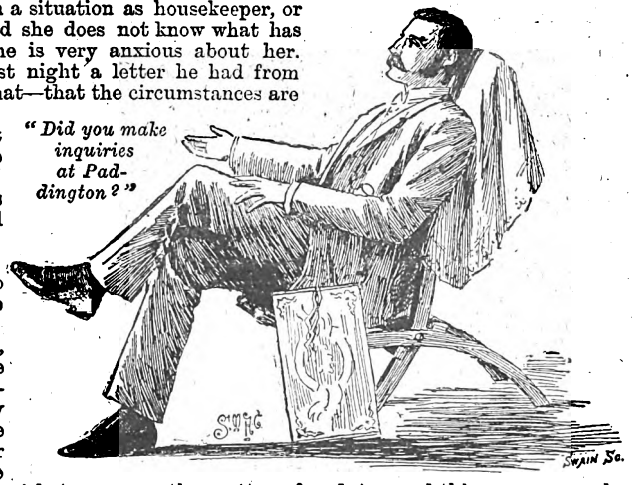
"No."

"It might be well to do so—if you wish to ascertain the truth."

There was a suspicion, only a suspicion of a pause in the middle of the sentence; and Kenyon threw a sharp glance at the speaker's face, to see whether he meant to insinuate that he, Kenyon, did not wish to pursue the matter of Vere's disappearance too closely. But Shenstone's face wore its usual composed look, and Harold looked down at the carpet once more.

"I will advertise for news of this Miss Unwin at once," he said.

"Don't you think—I merely throw out the suggestion—that that would be a little premature?" asked Shenstone. He spoke in a hesitating, deprecatory way, as if he feared to give offence by interfering too much. "You see," he added, as Harold looked at him inquiringly, "such an advertisement ought to come from her, Miss Unwin's, friends. If she can account for her absence in an innocent, natural way, she might be greatly offended, perhaps injured, by the advertisement. Then the two advertisements, one for Mr. Vere and one for her, appearing together, would be awkward."



"Did you make inquiries at Paddington?"

"True: I did not think of that," said Kenyon.

"I should make inquiries at Paddington, or find out the guards of the trains and question them; or, if necessary, print a few handbills, offering a small reward for information, and circulate them among the railway officials."

Kenyon thanked his rival, and, feeling that he had stayed long enough at the Cottage, he took his leave. He hoped that Katharine would say something about his coming again to report the result of his fresh inquiries; but she either forgot to do so, or purposely omitted to give him any invitation.

"What a clever fellow that is! He thinks of everything," said Harold to himself, as he went down the hill. "It would never have done for me to advertise for Miss Unwin. But I can find out what train she travelled by on Tuesday. I had better do that now."

He turned down a lane which led to the railway-station about a mile from the village. Having reached it, he found a porter on duty; and this man remembered Miss Unwin's leaving on Tuesday forenoon.

"Took a ticket for London, she did," said the man grinning; "and I fancy the guard, a man of the name of Martin, might tell 'ee some more about her. Leastways I heard a man say he believed Martin had been heard talking about her. They do say Martin was a bit sweet on her hisself," added the man with another grin.

"Where can I see this man Martin?" asked Kenyon impatiently.

"You'll have to go to London to see him, sir; for they've given him a small station on the Wycombe branch."

Harold handed the man a trifle and turned away, telling himself that at last he was about to put his finger on the key of the mystery.

(To be continued.)

TO PRETTY GIRLS ALL!

ISOBEL'S HOME NOTES is quite the best Penny Paper for Ladies. It is published every Thursday, and may be obtained of any newsagent throughout the Kingdom.

It is profusely and artistically illustrated, and contains, besides a good serial novel and a short story, articles on "Health," "Cookery," "The Management of Children," "The Toilette," and a variety of interesting articles and poetry by the best writers.

Isobel's Fashions for Children
Published on the 15th of each month.
Price 1½d., Post Free 2½d.

Isobel's Dressmaking at Home
Published on the 1st of each month.
Price 1½d., Post Free 2½d.

Every Copy of these Two Papers Contains a Free Paper Pattern.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON. at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery. The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

"JUNO" CYCLES

Are the Very Best.

JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb. JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

CAN YOU WRITE?

Of course you can! Why not then emboss your Notepaper, etc., with a pretty Monogram? using the

Patent Pocket Monopresse

Every Initial and Monogram of two letters kept in stock. Monogram of two letters, 1/1; Initials, 10d. each, post free. Apply—

CHAS. ROMPLER, 7, New Basinghall St., London, E.C. Agents wanted.

Swift Gold Medal

KNITTER.

KNITS Stockings ribbed or plain, Gloves and Clothing in Wool, Silk, or Cotton. Instructions Free. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals, for the "Harrison" and "Sun" Machines.

Harrison Knitting Machine Co., Ltd. Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

SIMPLEX TYPEWRITER.

Prices 12/6 and 14/6 delivered free. 84 letters and business signs. Type equal to that of a £20 machine. Illustrated particulars on receipt of addressed envelope.

ATKINSON & Co., 17 Elmwood St., Leeds.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

ARMSTRONG'S

Lady's & Gentleman's, from £5 10s., carriage paid. Prompt delivery, lists free. SPORTING GUN DEPT., Collingwood Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

ARE YOU FAT?

DR. GORDON'S Elegant Pills are the only Safe and Lasting Cure for Stoutness, Abdominal or General. State height, weight, and send 2/9, 4/6, or 11/- to Dr. Gordon, 24, Hart St., London, W.C.

READ! READ! READ!

Miss Roberts, "Brooklyn," Spotland Road, Rochdale, says: "I am 21in. round waist—before taking your Pills, 27in." Mrs. Cox, "Hazelhurst," Brondesbury Road, N.W.: "The last supply reduced me 14lb. in month without change of diet." P. Bendelow, 59, Dorset Street, Bolton: "Your Pills greatly reduced my weight." H. I. Cooper, 57 Somers Road, Southsea, says: "Your Pills reduced me 2stones." Mrs. J. Mastery, of Shirley, Derby: "I have lost nearly 3 stones in weight." Miss Nappey, Wood Lane, Headingley: "I have lost 18lb."

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full natural perfect Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment, approved and recommended by the medical profession. Success guaranteed. For particulars free, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J." Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

ORGAN 4s. Monthly.

WALNUT CASE. KNEE SWELL. SPLENDID TONE.

10 Years' Warranty. 72 Page List Post Free.

ALPHONSE CARY, NEWBURY, BERKS.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20

See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 189, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

Every Young Man can positively and speedily cultivate a HEAVY, HANDSOME MOUSTACHE,

By a few applications of Knowles' "Esauline," the newly-discovered Hair-Forcing Specific. Success guaranteed. "ESAULINE" thickens the growth of the Moustache, is an infallible cure for falling off of the Hair, weak or thin Eyebrows, Premature Baldness, etc., and as a general Hair Producer and Restorer is absolutely unrivalled. Will not stain or injure the most delicate Skin. Highly recommended for Children's Hair. From all Chemists and Hair Dressers.

Post Free, Prices, 1s. 6d., 3s., or 5s.

T. KNOWLES & CO.,

330, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

HOW TO PATENT AN INVENTION.

Book giving full particulars as to Cost, Forms, &c. Post Free. CASSELL & CO. (Patent Agents), 22, Glasshouse Street, Piccadilly Circus, London. Inventors assisted. Consultation and Advice Free.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

GIVEN AWAY £5,000!

GRAHAM & CO.'S

MONSTER GIFTS.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—Messrs. GRAHAM & CO. intend to present their Customers with a Monster Parcel as a means of advertising their celebrated

EGYPTIAN GOLD JEWELLERY.

For the small sum of 6s. 6d. we will send as follows:—

NOT A TOY

WE GIVE YOU A WATCH.

	Our Price.
One Gent's Egyptian Gold Albert, or one Lady's Egyptian Gold Albert	2s. 6d.	FOR 6s. 6d.
One Seal or Locket for Chain	1s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Ring, or one Lady's 5-stone Diamond Ring	3s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Scarfpin, or one Lady's Fashionable Brooch	2s. 6d.
One Pair of Cuff Links, or one Carbon Diamond Bracelet ...	2s. 6d.
Total	12s. 6d.

In addition to the above Every Purchaser will be Presented Free of Charge with one of our handsome

KEYLESS WATCHES.

USUALLY SOLD AT HALF-A-GUINEA.

Read what is said by those who have purchased.

WANTS A SECOND PARCEL.

Lowick-by-Neale, Northumberland, August 17.

GENTLEMEN,—Received to-day your second parcel of jewellery, with which we are immensely pleased. We really wonder how you can do it. The watch itself is worth more than the money charged for the whole. Many thanks for punctuality.—Very truly yours, WILLIAM McISAAC.

GOES BETTER THAN HIS £15 WATCH.

11, North Street, St. Peters, Tunbridge Wells.

GENTLEMEN,—Some few weeks ago I sent to your firm for the jewellery and advertised watch, of which I am surprised; the watch is a beautiful timist. I must admit, in fact, it goes better than my £15 gold watch; and for the jewellery it is astonishing value. I think you must lose money over such gifts, as I term it. The watch alone is worth double the 7s. I enclosed. I have shown it to several of my friends, and they were astonished. You can add this to your testimonials if it will be of any service.—I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully, LEWIS C. RHODES.

GUARANTEED TO KEEP CORRECT TIME.

Any Watch not received in going order will be exchanged.

Every Watch is Carefully Examined, Timed, and Guaranteed a Correct Timekeeper. Call and see them.

We do this to save the enormous cost of advertising, preferring to give our customers the benefit. As we lose money on each parcel we cannot supply more than two parcels to one person. If you cannot call get a P.O. at once, and send for this wonderful parcel. Orders will be executed in Rotation.

MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

NOTE.—The entire parcel will be sent for 6s. 6d. (post free, registered, 7s.). Each customer will receive gratis one of our HANDSOMELY ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES. Be sure and call or send to-day for the

6s. 6d. Monster Presentation Parcel including the Handsome Keyless Watch.

S. S. GRAHAM & CO., 277, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A POWERFUL NEW SERIAL HAS JUST COMMENCED.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 388. FOR WEEK ENDING JUNE 6TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

BE SURE TO KEEP IT WELL.

WONDERFUL BARGAINS!

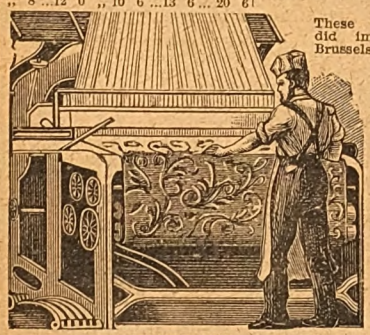
IMMENSE REDUCTION IN PRICES OF OUR WORLD-RENOWNED

BRUSSELETTE CARPETS.

ADMITTEDLY THE CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD. Seamless, Woven, and Reversible, Rich Turkey Patterns and Colourings, Superior Quality, with Handsome Border to match, a Marvel of Excellence and Beauty.

SIZES AND PRICES.

	ft.	in.	ft.	in.	Sale Price. s.	d.	Former Price. s.	d.
No. 1	3	0	by 6	0	5	6	9	0
,, 2	3	0	,, 7	6	7	0	11	6
,, 3	3	0	,, 9	0	8	6	13	6
,, 4	3	6	,, 7	6	8	9	13	9
,, 5	3	6	,, 9	0	10	0	15	6
,, 6	4	0	,, 9	0	11	6	18	0
,, 7	3	6	,, 10	6	12	0	18	6
,, 8	4	0	,, 10	6	13	6	20	6
No. 9	4	0	by 9	0	14	3	22	6
,, 10	4	6	,, 10	6	15	3	24	0
,, 11	4	0	,, 12	0	15	3	24	0
,, 12	4	3	,, 12	0	17	0	27	0
,, 13	4	6	,, 12	0	19	0	32	0
,, 14	4	6	,, 12	0	22	9	36	0
,, 15	4	6	,, 12	0	26	0	42	0



These Carpets are splendid imitations of Real Brussels Carpets, the designs having been carefully copied from the originals, both as regards colourings and patterns, so that when in use it is almost impossible, except by close scrutiny, to detect the difference. They have gained a world-wide reputation for magnificence, cheapness, and utility, having no equal. All designs are registered and deservedly considered works of art.

THIS ADVERTISEMENT.

GIVEN AWAY.

As an advertisement for the introduction of these goods to all readers of Short Stories, we have decided to give away to every purchaser of the above goods, enclosing cutting from this advertisement, a very handsomely woven Hearthrug, 6ft. long and 3ft. wide, to match carpets in colours, etc.

Thousands of Repeat Orders and Unsolicited Testimonials have been received from our Customers.

Hurst Wood, near Maidstone.
Mrs. Thatcher writes: "Sir, please to send me two Carpets, etc. I had two from you three years ago, and they have given great satisfaction."

Police Station, Larkhill, Lanarkshire, N.B.
Mr. L. Annand writes: "Would you please forward me another Brusselette Square, same as one received on Friday last. I must say it far exceeds my expectations. I am simply delighted with it."

All goods despatched same day as order received. SATISFACTION GUARANTEED OR MONEY RETURNED. Cheques and Postal Orders to be made payable to J. HARGREAVES, Secretary, and crossed "Union Bank." Established upwards of Twenty-five Years. Address:

THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.,
31, OLD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PAY YOU WELL.

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS
For the Immediate Production of
BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's
EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE
IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:
Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

"JUNO" CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb. JUNO Ladies' Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

N.B.—Every JUNO Guarantee MENTION PAPER. ed.

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Direct from the Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in the world, have secured beyond a doubt the ADMIRATION OF THE WORLD. Being Absolutely Without an Equal Anywhere for Stylish Appearance, Durability, and Actual Money Value. 10/6

TWO GOLD MEDALS AWARDED.

These Costumes have received the highest praise from the leading journals of the day, and are justly regarded by all purchasers as Even Better than Advertised.

Each Costume scientifically cut, tailor-made, and beautifully finished in an exceedingly smart mode, as illustration. The design consists of full wide Godet skirt with belt, also very neat bodice with full front and broad box-pleat down centre, trimmed bold silk cord and three large buttons. Collar and cuffs outlined silk cord; saddle and sleeves lined.

Price complete only 10/6. Safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

Sizes in stock fit figures measuring 34, 36, or 38 in. round bust under arms, skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front; larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

THE JOHN NOBLE

COSTUMES FOR YOUNG MISSES

are made in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, and trimmed military braid as illustration. A large box-pleat down the centre of the lined bodice, and a fancy pocket at each side of the skirt, complete a charming design at these prices: FROM 8/6

Lengths	35	38	42	46	50 inches.
Prices	8/6	9/6	10/9	12/-	13/6 each.

Each costume safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS

are also supplied in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, with saddle top, long full sleeves, and pocket, at following prices: FROM 1/6

Lengths	21	24	27	30	33	36	39	42	45 in.
Prices	1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-	5/6 ea.

Postage 1½d. extra. Lengths stated above are from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front.

COLOURS: Any of the above garments can be supplied in Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Bronze Green, Electric Blue, Ruby, Dark Cinnamon, Fawn, or Grey.

The JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE in which the above garments are made is a fabric of world-wide fame and durability, measuring 52in. wide. The full Dress Length of Six Yards can be supplied for 7/6, or any length at 1/3 the yard. Colours as above. 7/6

PATTERNS, also FASHION SHEETS of numerous other designs in Ladies' and Children's Costumes, etc., sent Post Free to any reader of "Short Stories" on application to

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

MRS. LAWRENCE

A Farmer's Wife, writes from Mid-Rasen, Lincolnshire: "For a long time I suffered severely from

INDIGESTION

And WIND IN THE STOMACH, and had to call in the doctor. Having prescribed for me some time he said, 'I can do nothing more for you.' My husband urged me to try your WIND PILLS; he brought me a box and I took them. In a few days I was quite well and able to get up, and now enjoy excellent health. Publish my name and address."

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills

Being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, Mild, and Tonic, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

ALL SUFFERERS from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND ON THE STOMACH, BILIOUSNESS, SICK HEADACHE, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, etc.,

should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

Of all Chemists, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for Price from PAGE WOODCOCK, LINCOLN.

Every Young Man can positively and speedily cultivate a HEAVY, HANDSOME MOUSTACHE,

By a few applications of Knowles' "Esauline," the newly-discovered Hair-Forcing Specific. Success guaranteed. "ESAULINE" thickens the growth of the Moustache, is an infallible cure for falling off of the Hair, weak or thin Eyebrows, Premature Baldness, etc., and as a general Hair Producer and Restorer is absolutely unrivalled. Will not stain or injure the most delicate Skin. Highly recommended for Children's Hair. From all Chemists and Hair Dressers.

Post Free, Prices, 1s. 6d., 3s., or 5s.

T. KNOWLES & CO.,

330, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

ONE BOX

OF

Dr. Mackenzie's Improved Harmless Arsenic Complexion Wafers

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire; clear, fresh, free from blotch, blemish, coarseness, redness, freckles, or pimples. Post free for 4/6.—S. HARVEY, 5, Denman St., London Bridge, S.E. Half-boxes 2/9. Use Dr. MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL TOILET SOAP. 1s. per Tablet; No. 2, unscented, 6d. per Tablet. Made from Purest Ingredients and Absolutely Harmless.

Beware of the many imitations.

HAVE DR. MACKENZIE'S OR NONE.

CAN YOU WRITE?

Of course you can! Why not then emboss your Notepaper, etc., with a pretty Monogram? using the

Patent Pocket Monopresse

Every Initial and Monogram of two letters kept in stock. Monogram of two letters, 1/1; Initials, 10d. each, post free. Apply—

CHAS. ROMPLER, 7, New Basinghall St., London, E.C. Agents wanted.

HIGH-CLASS TAILORING

Every Garment cut to measure.

DIRECT from the Manufacturer, Saving all Middle Profits.

LADIES' TAILOR-MADE COSTUMES

In all the present Shades, From 10/6 to 70/-. Value Unequalled. Fit Guaranteed.

MEN'S SUITS 18/6

Better Qualities, 22/6, 25/6, 31/6, 37/6, 45/-, 52/6, 63/-.

Cycling Suits from 12/6.

BOYS' SUITS.

Pieces for mending sent with all Suits.

See our New Patterns before ordering. It will pay you to do so.

Hundreds to choose from.

Fashion plates and measure forms free on application. All Goods Carriage Paid.

Factory Clothing Co.

Manufacturing and Ladies' Tailors,

117K, ALBION ST., LEEDS.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 23

June 6, 1896.

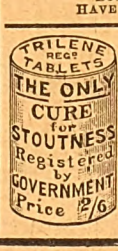
S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.



ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 388.] For the Week ending June 6th, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

GRASPED by Death.

I DOUBT if a more terrible thing ever happened to any man than that which happened to me in the autumn of 1889. The memory of it all is with me now as though it were but yesterday; and sometimes I wake shrieking in my dreams, and lie awake all night, oppressed with a great agony of fear.

I was a clerk in Burton's bank at Exeter. For some days I had been queer and out of sorts. More than once I had been conscious of what seemed to me to be a sudden numbness of the limbs. For instance, on two separate occasions I had been incapable of rising from my office stool.

My wife and fellow clerks noticed that I did not seem to be in my usual health, and my wife in particular had been urgent in intreating me to take my annual holiday without delay. But I had some complicated accounts to balance, which I was unable to leave undone; and that more especially since they had given me an infinitude of trouble, the sought-for balance being exactly the thing I could not get.

It was the evening of September 14th. It was a Friday. I had decided at the last moment to remain at the bank after the rest had gone, for I had arranged that if only I could get the accounts all right, I would start for Penzance the following morning with my wife.

It had been a hot day, that Friday—a terrible day—and all day long I had been conscious not only of a curious unwillingness, but of an absolute incapacity, to move. In some extraordinary way my limbs seemed, in a measure, to have passed from my control.

I suppose it was past six o'clock. I was all alone in the bank; the rest of the establishment had left a good hour ago. I was leaning forward on my desk, racking my brains to think where the error could be, when—shall I ever forget it?—in an instant—a flash of lightning—I became conscious of a singular sensation which was stealing over me. It was just as though some malevolent spirit had woven a spell, and deprived me of the power of motion. I was spell-bound, rooted to my seat, as helpless as though I had been struck by the hand of death.

The strangest part of it was, that while in that sudden awful visitation I had lost the use of my limbs, I had preserved my faculties intact. I could see—straight in front, that is—for not only could I not even close my eyes, but I could not even change the direction of my glance. I could only look straight in front of me with what I felt instinctively must be a fixed, horrible, glassy stare. But what there was in front of me, that I could plainly see. And I could hear; indeed my hearing seemed to be unnaturally keen. For instance, Burton's Bank is in the Cathedral Yard. Not only could I hear every footstep which passed even on the other side of the Cathedral—no slight distance for the sound of a foot to travel—but I could hear the traffic that went up and down Fore Street Hill and over the bridge, right away to St. Thomas's on the other side. And worse, for in the horror of all that followed it was of a surety the worst of all—I could think. My brain, like my hearing, seemed to become phenomenally clear. Instantaneously I knew what had come upon me. It was catalepsy. I was in a cataleptic fit.

I felt no pain—physical pain, at least. In that sense

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

I was like a man whose physical side is dead, but whose mind still lives.

And as I sat there hour after hour, dead, my agony of mind rose to such a climax that I cannot but think that it transcended whatever agony of body the most morbid imagination has at any time described.

It grew dark—so dark that my eyes became useless for any purpose of sight, and yet they would not shut. It became silent, too, the intense silence of the night.

But all at once, when the night was stillest, a sound struck on my ears—a peculiar sound, as of someone who walked with muffled steps. And then—could it be? Yes! A window was being opened.

I cannot doubt that the only thing which had kept me from promptly falling on to the floor when the fit had first taken me, was the fact that I was leaning so forward that the greater part of my weight was on the desk. So, leaning forward on the desk, I stayed.

Just in front of me was a glass partition, on the other side of which was the inner office, in which the safe was kept. It was the window of the inner office which was being opened now. By what I cannot but suppose was a providential accident, since I could not alter the direction of my glance, the safe was right in my line of sight. And so, although I could not immediately see who it was that entered, directly the intruder came between myself and the safe I could see him plainly.

It was Philip Morris, our head cashier.

At first all was dark. Then a light was struck, and someone, bearing a shaded lantern in his hand, appeared in my line of sight.

It was Philip Morris, our head cashier, and practically the manager of the bank!

I shall never forget my unutterable amazement when I perceived that it was he. What could bring him there at such an hour, in such a way? He wore a light dust-coat, which was unbuttoned down the front, so that I could see his dress-clothes beneath, and the diamonds gleaming in his shirt. He carried a small leather bag in his hand.

He took a bunch of keys from his pocket; with these he unlocked the safe. From it he took a quantity of notes—I could hear them rustle—and several bags of gold, which jingled as he dropped them in his bag. Then he turned right round, so that I saw him full in the face.

"If Wheeler could only see me now"—I should mention that my name is Wheeler. The allusion was to me—"I think he would soon unriddle the mystery of his accounts. Well, the game is up, I suppose. I had my fling, even if the result is penal servitude for life. I flatter myself that few men would have had the dexterity to carry it on for so long a time."

He came a few steps forward, the lantern in his hand, and suddenly stopped short.

His eyes were fixed on the glass partition. On his face there was an expression of the most awful, ghastly fear. His lips seemed parched. He gasped for breath.

For a moment I thought he would be seized with a convulsion; but he had sufficient control over himself to ward off that.

He spoke at last, and his voice was like the unearthly utterance of a strangled man.

"Wheeler! Wheeler! Is it you? For God's sake don't look like that! Your eyes are horrible!"

He covered his own eyes with his hand; I could see him shudder. Then he looked again; his mood was changed. With quick, firm steps, he advanced to the partition door, and entered the office in which I was.

"I suppose you think you have caught me?" he cried. "I congratulate you on your cleverness. But perhaps you have caught more than you think."

Suddenly he seemed struck by my immobility. He came a step nearer.

"Why do you sit there like a wooden block, you hypocritical old fool? Do you hear? Can't you speak? You think you have trapped me very neatly, eh?"

He paused. He came a step nearer.

"Can't you speak, you fool? Wheeler! Wheeler!"

He laid his hand upon my shoulder. He shone the lantern in my face.

Suddenly he gave the most dreadful shriek that ever I had heard.

"My God!" he cried. "He's dead!"

In his sudden fear the lantern fell from his hand with a crash. He gave me a push which sent me flying head foremost to the floor. And where I fell, like a dead man I lay.

* * * * *

I lay on my own bed in my own bedroom. Oh, what had I done to deserve the agony which I endured then?

There was my wife on her knees beside the bed, there was a candle which flickered on the chest of drawers, although daylight had already streamed into the room, and there was I, wrapped in the garments which enfold the dead.

How my wife wept! How she mourned in the sudden anguish of her woe! Now she called upon God for mercy and for strength, and now she got upon the bed and pillowed her head upon my breast, or bedewed my face with her kisses and tears.

Digitized by Google

"Richard!" she cried, "Richard! After all these years! My own! My dear!"

And then she wept as though her heart would break. Who shall conceive my agony as I lay there?

A little later there was this scene.

Five men came into the room. There was Dr. Leverson, my own medical attendant; Wilfrid Burton, the banker, whom, man and boy, I had served for thirty years; Mr. Fellows, the lawyer to the bank; Philip Morris, that accursed thief; and Philipson, the chief of police.

It was Mr. Burton who spoke first. His voice was dry and cold—very different from the kindly, pleasant voice I knew so well.

"Before we go any further, I suppose, Dr. Leverson, there is no doubt that this wretched man is dead?"

Dr. Leverson smiled a superior smile.

"Richard Wheeler is certainly dead. I have the certificate of death in my pocket. The funeral is already arranged. He died from valvular disease of the heart, a disease of whose presence I had long been aware." My brain reeled as I listened to the glib announcement. "Doubtless his death was accelerated at the last by a sudden shock."

"God," said Mr. Burton, with a solemnity, the unconscious irony of which was hideous, "saw fit to strike down the criminal at the moment of his crime."

I wondered what Philip Morris looked like as he heard the words. He was out of my line of sight.

"And now," continued Mr. Burton, "proceed to the business which has brought us here. I need not point out to you, Doctor Leverson, that all that passes here is in the strictest confidence." I presume that the Doctor bowed his head. "The bank has been the victim of"—the speaker's voice trembled, and I felt that my wife covered her face with her hands—"of the most terrible dishonesty. To what extent the affair has gone I have not yet been able to ascertain, but I fear we have been robbed to the extent of at least a hundred thousand pounds."

A hundred thousand pounds! No wonder I could not get the accounts to balance! That villain had robbed us of one hundred thousand pounds at least, and I lay speechless there.

"Mr. Morris will repeat the statement which he has already made to me. You, Mr. Fellows, will kindly take it down, and we will have it attested in the presence of Captain Philipson. Mrs. Wheeler you need not stop; it will only be painful for your feelings. Indeed, I think you had better go away."

"Sir," said my dear wife—oh, how her dear voice rang through my brain—"whatever Mr. Morris may have to say, I never shall believe that of my dear husband, who was a God-fearing man for nearly thirty years."

"Ah, Mrs. Wheeler, how appearances may deceive. I had to the full as much confidence in him as you. Before you think that I misjudge him, hear what Mr. Morris has to say."

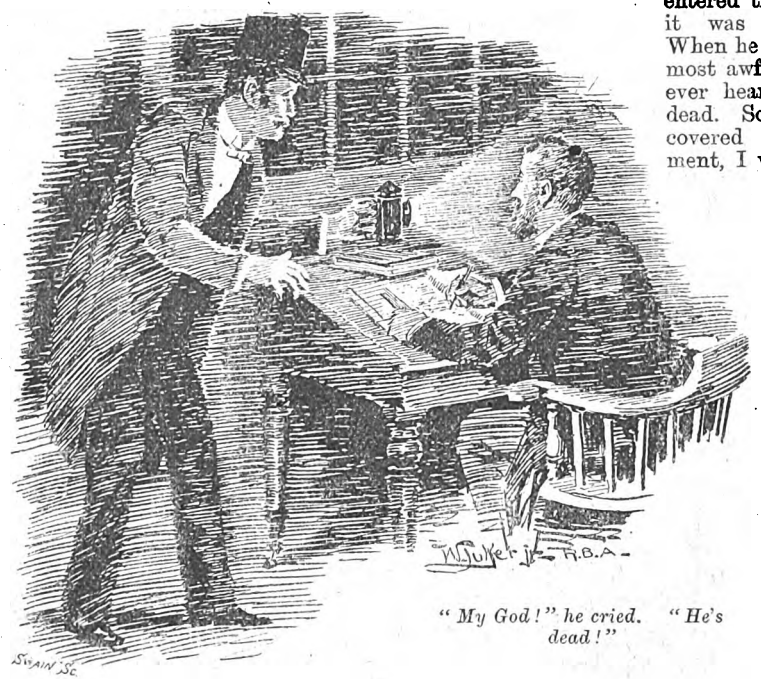
Philip Morris began his tale. It flashed upon me in an instant that he had availed himself of my supposed decease to fasten his guilt upon my head. But I had never imagined that anyone, in his circumstances, could have carried the matter through with so easy an air. There was even an affectation of pathos in his tone as he filled in the details of his horrid lie.

"I had been spending the evening at Mr. Fisher's"—Mr. Fisher was one of the minor canons, a bachelor, who was reputed to have a taste for whist, and for hours which were perhaps a little uncanonical—"I was returning home, when, on passing the bank, I noticed that there seemed to be a light in the office in which the safe is kept. The window, as you know, is but a few feet from the ground; I have often pointed out how easy it would be for a thief to get in that way."

"I know you have!" said Mr. Burton.

The hypocrite went on:

"To my surprise, I found it was unlatched. I opened it. Whoever was within was too much absorbed in his occupation to notice what I did. I looked through the open window, and saw that someone was in the inner office, but who it was I could not at first perceive. I climbed through the window, and went in. Directly I entered the man looked up; it was Richard Wheeler. When he saw me he gave the most awful scream I think I ever heard, and fell down—dead. So soon as I had recovered from my bewilderment, I went to the window and called for help. A constable, who heard me, came to my assistance. Together we examined the room. That is all I have to say. I only wish that I had not to say so much."



"My God!" he cried. "He's dead!"

"But there is more that must be said," Mr. Burton took up the strain. "In the grate were found the half-consumed fragments of the accounts, which if they had been suffered to continue in existence would inevitably have betrayed the dead man's crime. The safe was found open—it is still a mystery how he contrived to open it—ransacked of all the chief valuables it contained. On his desk was found a bag containing five hundred pounds in gold, and in his pockets notes for a thousand pounds. But notes and gold to the value of ten thousand pounds, and securities to a very large amount are gone. We have still to find out where. I am sorry to tell you, Mrs. Wheeler, that to search this house is one of the purposes which have brought us here."

Digitized by Google

"Wheeler!" he gasped.

"Sir," said my wife, "you need make no apology. You are welcome to search the house from basement to attic. You will find nothing that was not righteously my dear husband's own."

* * * * *

For five days I lay there—dead. Words cannot describe the agony I endured. Conceive it, if you can. Picture yourself in my position; conceive what you would suffer then. Far better had I indeed been dead.

On the second day they came and measured me for my coffin. Think of it—a living man! On the fourth day they brought it home, and I was placed within. There were two of them that brought it, and as they placed me in that narrow box they cracked their little jest.

"A tight fit, isn't he?" said one.

"Ah," replied his fellow, "they'd have given him as tight a fit if he had lived; four strong walls for life."

"Who'd ever have thought that old Dick Wheeler would have come to the gallows?"

"Well," again replied his fellow—how I loathed that man!—"I would for one. I never knew a psalm-singer yet that wasn't a robber and a thief."

When that choice pair had gone, my wife came in and looked at me as I lay in my last bed. She had a wreath in her hand, which she placed upon my breast, and a white rose, which betokened innocence, which she placed within the wreath. She stooped and kissed me on the brow; and, as she did so, she burst into a flood of tears.

"Oh, God!" she cried; "show that my dear husband was not a thief!"

The next day, the fifth, they came and screwed me down. Imagine that! I learned from what they said that they feared that if in that hot weather I was left for a longer time exposed, decomposition would set in. When they had already placed the lid upon my coffin, my wife came running in. I learned that they had come in her absence to shut me for ever from her sight. They imagined that if she were there she might object to what they did. Her appearance disconcerted them. She made them immediately remove the lid, and bade them withdraw from the room, so that she might have final solitary communion with her dead.

She knelt down by the side of my coffin and prayed. She expressed the most profound belief in the innocence of the man who had been her husband for nearly thirty years; and she besought the Most High that He would expound that innocence and make it clear to man. Then she stood up and kissed me on the lips—kissed me a last good-bye!

Then she left me, to the full as broken-hearted as she herself, and the undertaker's men returned and screwed me down.

How long I remained in that box, screwed down, I never knew. It seemed to me a hundred years. A dreadful thought came to me, not once, but again and again, with recurring force.

Suppose that I, indeed, was dead? Who knows the mysteries of death? Is it not conceivable that when the body dies, the mind, which has such a mysterious affinity with the soul, may live? If I were dead, and the shame should live! Was it possible that through the long cycle of the years, the æons which were still to come, my mind should live, and I be dead?

It is not strange that my pen should tremble as I recall the thoughts which racked then—racked me with such intensity that, even in my state of death, I feared I should go mad. And then? What then? Mad through the æons in the womb of time! Even dead, I thought my brain would burst.

I tried to scream. I struggled as with the issues of life and death for the power to give expression to the great agony of my fear and pain.

And then? What happened then? To this hour I cannot precisely say. I know that while, mentally, I struggled with inconceivable eagerness to cry out, I suddenly awoke. I know no other words to use. I knew I was alive—alive, and imprisoned in that box! And I do believe that for the first few moments of my resurrection—what was it else?—I actually was mad. I had a madman's strength, at any rate. I struggled like a madman, too—struggled to be free—and with such strength that I burst the box, forced the coffin's sides, and was a prisoner no more.

I stood upon my feet.

As I did so I discovered that my display of strength must have been a sort of frenzy, for, indeed, I was so weak that at first I could not stand. I sank back upon my bed. But only for a moment. There was that within me which gave me strength. I was filled with an overmastering desire to proclaim my innocence, and bring home to the criminal his crime. Wholly regardless of the clothes I wore, forgetful of them even, I went downstairs into the street, and ran to Mr. Burton's as certainly I never ran before.

I must have cut a pretty figure as I ran, but Mr.

Digitized by Google

Burton's great house was within a couple of hundred yards of my more modest residence; the hour was late, and I never met a creature on the way.

I was well acquainted both with the banker's habits and his house. I knew that often, when the rest of the household was fast asleep, Mr. Burton would sit for hours writing in the study which opened on to the lawn at the back. To this room I hastened.

It was as I supposed. There was a bright light within. I turned the handle of the French window; it yielded to my touch. Without pausing for an instant to reflect on what the consequence of my act might be, I burst into the room.

As I entered, Mr. Burton was sitting writing at a table. When he saw me he rose from his seat. He clutched the edge of the table. He gazed at me, speechless, unable to believe that what he saw was real.

"Wheeler!" he gasped at last; "Richard Wheeler!"

"Yes, sir, 'tis I! Not dead, but living. This is no ghost you gaze upon, but a creature of flesh and blood, to whom God has given strength to declare his innocence, and expose another's crime."

I poured out my tale. He was too bewildered at first to grasp the meaning of my words. It was all so unexpected and so strange, that he was unable to realise that he was not the victim of some dreadful dream. But it became plain to him at last.

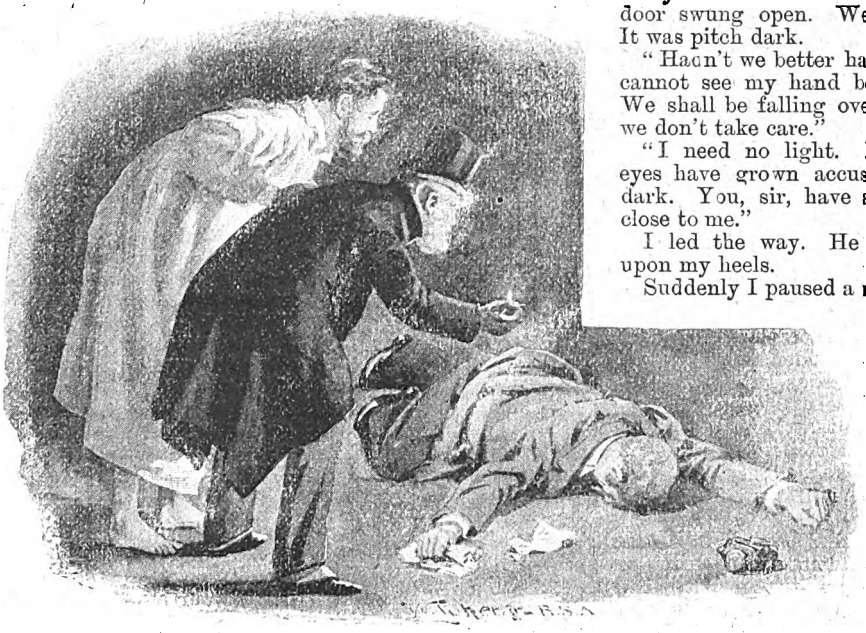
"How awful!" he exclaimed. "You make my blood run cold."

"But it is the truth; and things are revealed to me which to you are hidden."

I rose up, still in my grave clothes, trembling like a leaf. "At this instant the thief is at his work again, and tampers with the safe. Mr. Burton, I intreat you to come with me to the bank; his villainy shall be proved to-night."

"Come with you—to the bank—at this hour?"

But I had my way. The banker lent me some of his own clothes, and a great coat was thrown over my shoulders. The coachman was roused; a carriage was ordered out. Within a few minutes we were seated in it, and were being driven swiftly towards the bank, through the silent streets, to catch the criminal in the very moment of his crime.



We found him . . . lying in a fit upon the floor.

The carriage was drawn up some little distance from the bank. We got out. Mr. Burton had the key of the private door. We approached swiftly yet silently as well. Our chief object was not to give the alarm.

On the very threshold Mr. Burton paused.

"I am afraid that this is a wild-goose chase that you have brought me on. Some folks would even call it by a stronger name."

"Can you not hear him? Hark? He rustles a bundle of notes! They are those notes which were missing, and which you searched my house to find."

"Hear him, Wheeler? Are you mad? When he is in the private office—if he is anywhere at all—we are out in the street."

"I can hear him, if you can't. Give me the key or open the door. Every moment which we waste increases his chance of escape."

Hesitatingly—I believe he doubted my sanity even then—Mr. Burton put the key into the lock. Noiselessly it turned. Without a sound, the door swung open. We stood inside. It was pitch dark.

"Hadn't we better have a light? I cannot see my hand before my face. We shall be falling over something if we don't take care."

"I need no light. Remember my eyes have grown accustomed to the dark. You, sir, have always to keep close to me."

I led the way. He followed close upon my heels.

Suddenly I paused a moment.

"See; there is a light!"

Sure enough there was, in the inner room—in that inner room in which the safe was kept.

I caught Mr. Burton by the arm.

"Sir, come a little further, You shall see the criminal in his crime."

Then I stole by the outer door into the office in which I had been overtaken by that strange mockery of death. Through the glass partition, sure enough, I saw at a glance that Philip Morris, lantern in hand, was at his old work, busied with the contents of the safe. I leaned right forward on the desk, and tapped with my finger against the glass. He approached the partition; I saw him trembling as he came.

When he was quite close, in my grave clothes I rose straight up, and looking him straight in the face—his pallid, panic-stricken face—I raised my arm above my head, and in a loud voice, cried out:

"Thou thief!"

A wild shriek rang through the night; and sometimes in my ears I seem to hear it still.

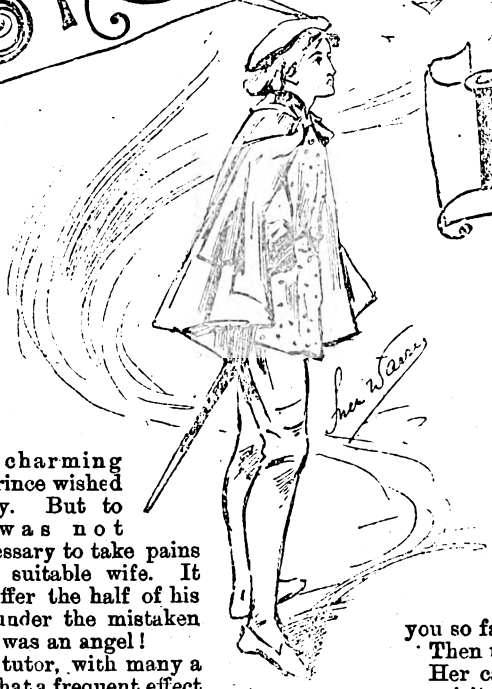
When Mr. Burton and I ran in, we found him stricken by a sudden agony of conscience-stricken fear, a bundle of bank-notes in the frenzied grip of his right hand, lying in a fit upon the floor.

M.

Digitized by Google

The Changing Butterfly

A Fairy Tale



I.

AVERY charming young prince wished to marry. But to wish was not enough; it was necessary to take pains in order to find a suitable wife. It would never do to offer the half of his throne to a shrew under the mistaken impression that she was an angel!

For the prince's tutor, with many a sigh, had told him that a frequent effect of marriage was the transformation of angels into shrews. The poor man spoke feelingly, for he was himself tied to a shrew, whom in her first youth he had certainly thought angelic.

The tutor's warnings were not thrown away upon the prince, but he could not decide on any satisfactory course of action. He resolved to take a little holiday in Scotland. Possibly the change of air might clear his brain and fortify his nerves for his onerous task.

To Scotland, accordingly, he went. There, one day, as he wandered pensively along the banks of a blue lake, he heard a scream and a splash, and saw something struggling in the water. It was a little old woman, who, while washing her linen in the lake, had leaned over too far and tumbled in head foremost.

The prince unhesitatingly plunged in after her, got her safely out, and placed her upon the bank, not, however, without having a sharp tussle with an enormous fish, which seemed desirous of devouring him and his burden.

II.

Now, the little old woman was a fairy. She was, of course, much obliged to the good prince, and said to him:

"If you had not been here I should inevitably have been devoured by that wicked fish. He is an enchanter, my mortal enemy, who has been lying in wait for me for the last nine hundred and ninety-nine years. I should like to reward you for your great kindness. Tell me what you wish for, and I will help you to obtain it."

"I wish, madam, to marry," replied the prince.

"Ha! ha!" tittered the fairy.

"But I would like to have some means of finding out the true character of my future wife—whether she be an angel or a shrew."

"That, my good friend, is a thing which none can be sure of beforehand. It depends a little upon the woman, and a great deal upon the man. However, I will keep my word to you so far as it is possible."

Then the fairy put a silver whistle to her lips.

Her call was answered instantly by a little, grey, yet exquisitely beautiful butterfly, which alighted upon her finger.

"You see this butterfly?" said the fairy to the prince. "When you have made your choice you have only to say to him: 'Come, fluttering butterfly, and flutter upon the forehead of my beloved!' and he will hasten to do your bidding. Mark well the result. If he become red, that is a sign that your sweetheart has a temper; if he turn green she is a coquette; if rose colour, she is greedy; if blue, she is a gossip. But if the butterfly become white, then she is a veritable pearl!"

With these words the fairy and the butterfly disappeared.

III.

FOR a long time the prince travelled about searching for a wife. He visited China, France, Germany, England, and America.

In all these countries he found hosts of charming girls who would have been proud to marry a prince, and who—every one of them—with their downcast eyes and ingenuous smiles, resembled so many little angels.

But invariably when, in obedience to the prince's summons, the fairy's butterfly fluttered upon the fair one's brow, it took sometimes one colour, sometimes another, but it never, never became white.

Upon more than one occasion it displayed all the colours at the same time. Whenever this happened the prince fled immediately to another country, there to renew his vain quest.

It proved, indeed, a most difficult task to find a woman who was neither greedy, nor coquettish, nor idle, nor talkative, nor passionate.

At length, however, the prince met a very beautiful maiden, the daughter of a rich lord. He felt that even if he failed to win her, he could never wed another. By which it may be perceived that he was very deeply in love indeed.

It was a delicious time for our young prince! The lady was not only beautiful but highly accomplished. She embroidered like a fairy, sang like a seraph, and was full of wit, grace, and good sense.

"I have a good mind to marry her without consulting the butterfly," though the enamoured prince.

Prudence prevailed, however, and the lover whispered very softly—half-hoping that the butterfly would not hear him—the usual formula:

"Come, fluttering butterfly, flutter upon the forehead of my beloved."

But the little grey butterfly, who was for the time the prince's slave, heard and obeyed.

IV.

AT the critical moment, the prince and the maiden were walking together in a lovely garden. Just at the instant when the butterfly made his appearance, and was about to alight upon the fair forehead, the girl cried out suddenly:

"Oh, I am so frightened! Is not that a serpent down there in the grass? Run, my friend, oh! run and see! and kill the horrible thing!"

Naturally, the prince, forgetting the butterfly, ran to the spot indicated. He found no serpent there, and returned to his sweetheart's side with the assurance that she had been mistaken, and that there was nothing to fear.

"Oh, I am so frightened!"

As he was speaking he raised his eyes, and could not repress a joyous exclamation.

For the butterfly was white as the wing of the whitest swan, white as the purest snow of the North Pole.

The same evening he proposed for the lady's hand, and eight days later the wedding took place.

And in fifteen days' time, the prince had made the disconcerting discovery that his wife possessed every possible fault, and that, therefore, he should not be anything like so happy as he had expected to be.

V.

MAD with disappointment, he returned to Scotland in order to find the old fairy, and acquaint her with his ill-luck.

After hearing his tale, the fairy conferred with her butterfly, and then remarked:

"Well, I don't know what to think! The butterfly assures me that as soon as he touched the princess's forehead, he turned all colours, and that they were very pronounced! I must believe what he says, for he always speaks the truth, and his judgment is infallible!"

"My sight must have been in fault," replied the poor prince. And there was nothing for it but to return to his fallen angel.

VI.

ONE day, when she was in a more amiable mood than usual, she and her husband were talking over old times. The prince took the opportunity of inquiring whether his wife remembered their stroll in the magnificent garden, and the strange terror that had seized her there.

"Oh, yes! I remember it well!" replied the princess. "as well as if it happened yesterday! How simple you were in those days! I was perfectly well aware that there was no serpent about; but having a moment before stolen a glance at my pocket-mirror, I had observed that my face was slightly red. Fearing lest this should displease you, I wished to put a little powder on it, if I could do so without being seen. And so—" She paused.

"And so?" prompted the now much interested prince.

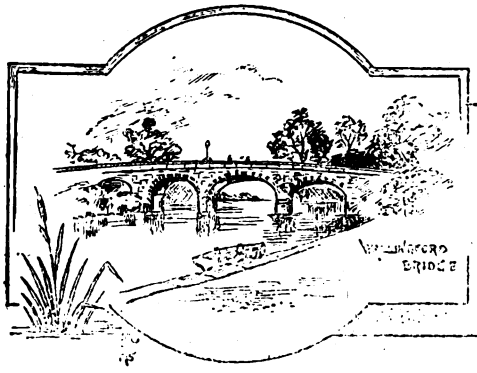
"And so I invented for you that small commission. See how retentive my memory is! I remember how at that moment a tiresome grey butterfly came fluttering about my head. I shook my powder-puff over him, and was extremely amused to see him turn as white all over as a painted clown."

EDITH SUMMERS.

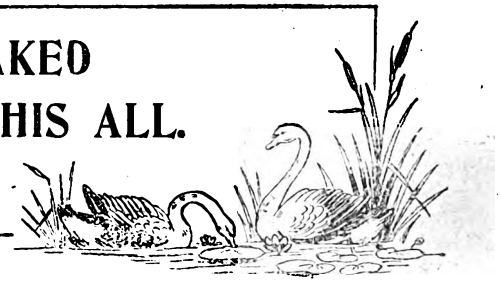
There are Many - - - - -

Less beautiful covers than that of "PEARSON'S MAGAZINE" for June. And the contents are consistent with the design on the cover—Refined and Good.

Digitized by Google



HE STAKED HIS ALL.



"That is the Princess," said an old diplomatist, referring to a beautiful woman just entering the room, "whose husband won her at cards. She is seventy years of age, yet her figure is as straight, and her complexion as fresh as that of a girl of twenty. I will tell you the story, using fictitious names, of course. It is too well remembered for me to do otherwise, and occurred during my embassy to the Court of St. Petersburg during the reign of Nicholas.

"Nowhere in the world," he continued, "do they gamble as they gamble in Russia. Not only is it a passion which has its frenzy, but a luxury which carries with it obligations. An officer who doesn't play is regarded as beneath consideration, and a man who doesn't from time to time risk his entire fortune at cards, as a churlish fellow only worthy of contempt.

"Maria Feodorowna, née Princess of D——, rich, beautiful, accomplished, and maid of honour to the Tsarina, married the Prince Tcheretzoff for love. He was unquestionably devoted to her. Tcheretzoff was a capable officer, a major-general at the age when one is usually a lieutenant, an aide-de-camp to the Emperor An intelligent and earnest student, with excellent qualities of heart and person; he had one fault—he did not gamble.

"'Why is it, General,' said the Tsar to him one day, 'that you do not play? Come, take a game of preference with me.'

"Such had been Tcheretzoff's aversion to gambling, however, that he was obliged to confess his ignorance of the game.

"'What!' cried the Tsar, 'not know how to play? Here, Augustinoff,' addressing one of his staff, 'as past master of the art, take the imbecile and give him lessons.'

"A command as positive as this was not to be lightly regarded. Tcheretzoff found himself forced to submit. The Prince Augustinoff, to whose teachings the command of the Emperor had consigned him, was undoubtedly the most skilful player in Russia—cool, prudent, master of the game and of himself, the best guarantee of success.

"The Prince Augustinoff devoted himself to the task with zeal, and was even prodigal of lessons and counsels. In a short time Tcheretzoff became, under his tuition, an excellent player. He played from inspiration, according to his humour, sometimes winning, sometimes losing, but always sufficiently well to establish an even balance, an equilibrium of chances, as it were, which soon gained for him the reputation of the best player of the season.

"It would have been better for him had he lost; perhaps he would then have escaped the passion against which he had so long defended himself. Success intoxicated him, and card-playing became the occupation of his life. He would be seized with what for want of a better name, we will call frenzies of gambling, during which, forgetful of everything, he would pay someone to play with him if an adversary could be had in no other way. Unfortunately, such extreme measures are rarely necessary in Russia; adversaries are only too plentiful for all who want them.

"One day Tcheretzoff had been sitting at the gambling-table since two o'clock in the morning, winning steadily. Accumulated beside him were his gains, 100,000 roubles, and this did not include 200,000 more in the I.O.U's of his companions.

"'I mean,' said he, abruptly addressing the party, 'to stake everything that I have won this evening upon the chances of a single game.'

"'How much is that?' asked a gentleman, at that moment coming into the room.

"'Three hundred thousand roubles,' answered Tcheretzoff, turning at the sound of Augustinoff's voice—for it was he who had entered—'but why? Do you wish to play.'

"'Yes—I'll accept the challenge.' And seating himself at the table the game began.

"Although their comrades were accustomed to high play, circumstances combined to make the coming contest the most extraordinory on record. The stake was simply enormous, the contestants the best players of the empire, and though of late he had withdrawn from the list of those who regularly gambled, it was well known that Augustinoff had made an exception in favour of the man before him, in order to teach him, as far as possible, his own skill. The struggle between master and pupil excited the liveliest interest. For a while the game was undecided—the chances and skill being about even. At last a bold stroke of Augustinoff won. Tcheretzoff pushed towards him the money and the I.O.U.'s won from his former adversaries.

"'Now for my revenge,' he said, as, this adjustment made and accepted, they returned to the game.

"'For what amount do we play now?' demanded Augustinoff.

Digitized by Google

"'The same—300,000 roubles.'

"'But——'

"'Isn't it enough?'

"'No! You have lost nothing as yet. The sums staked have been only the winnings of the evening; add more to it!'

"'Very well,' responded Tcheretzoff, 'I will add another hundred thousand roubles.'

"But this time Augustinoff lost.

"'We are not going to stop at that,' said he; 'I will play you for five hundred thousand roubles.'

"And fortune was with him.

"'Play on, play on!' cried Tcheretzoff hoarsely, the madness of the gamester shining in his eyes; 'I must have my revenge.'

"'As you please,' said Augustinoff quietly; 'but the stakes must remain at five hundred thousand roubles. I am in shape to-night and you will lose—I feel it.'

"Tcheretzoff was now in a terrible temper, a bad state of mind for a man who would win. Glass after glass of sparkling Cliquot, swallowed with feverish rapidity, instead of quieting him, served only to increase his irritable gloom. Calm, self-possessed, and trusting nothing to chance, Augustinoff opposed him with impassable phlegm—an impenetrable smile. Goaded to frenzy by this indifference, Tcheretzoff played wildly, losing game after game in quick succession. From the way things were going, not a kopeck of his immense fortune would be left.

"'Tis useless to urge me,' he replied, when they intreated him to stop; 'I shall remain until daybreak.'

"'So be it,' said Augustinoff; 'so be it. I will do likewise.'

"The struggle had now assumed a terrible aspect. It was no longer a simple game of cards, but a duel to the death. Each watched the other with the eye of a hawk, seeking to penetrate the secret of his play. Their looks burned, their hands trembled. Calculating chances, computing consequences, they fingered the cards with lightning speed, each striving thus to disconcert his adversary. A single mistake would have been irreparable. All at once Tcheretzoff paused and played hesitatingly. It was the beginning of the end.

"Before the light of day he had lost everything that he possessed, his Moscow palace, his beautiful lands in the central provinces, his magnificent château of Ukraine, the summer home of his wife, from which came the handsomest horses of the Empire. Everything had gone but the diamonds of the Princess Tcheretzoff, and these her husband knew well that he could not touch. His own jewels, even the jewels of his order, and a superb ring, a present from the Tsar, were already pledged.

"Staggering to his feet, Tcheretzoff paced restlessly up and down the hall. His body trembled, his muscles twitched convulsively; his appearance was that of a man in the throes of a mortal agony. Augustinoff, carelessly shuffling the cards and waiting for a new opponent to come and finish the game, still sat at the table. He rose, in astonishment, however, as Tcheretzoff, wheeling suddenly, resumed his place before him.

"'It is not daylight yet,' said Tcheretzoff quietly, as his adversary rose to go; 'the bond said until daylight.'

"'I know that, Tcheretzoff, but——'

"'Sit down, sit down, I say; you cannot go until daylight. Besides, I have something to say to you. Augustinoff,' said he abruptly, in a voice he struggled vainly to control, 'I believe that you love my wife. I know that you loved her as Maria Feodorowna—I believe that you love her still.'

"'Well,' said Augustinoff coldly.

"'I have nothing with which to maintain her, I stake her against all that you have won from me this evening. What say you? Shall it be?'

"Stake the Princess Tcheretzoff upon a game of cards! Augustinoff stood as if turned to stone. Tcheretzoff's misfortune had certainly driven him crazy.

"'What say you?' persisted Tcheretzoff. 'Shall it be?'

"'Yes,' said Augustinoff; 'yes, I accept.' And his eyes flashed like coals of fire. The cool impassive mask of the gamester dropped away—beneath it lay the secret of the soul 'I accept,' he repeated steadily, 'but upon two conditions: First, that I increase the stake upon my side; it is not sufficient. Second, you must pronounce the divorce and assume all responsibility Your wife is without stain, and not a shadow shall fall upon her.'

"'I agree,' said Tcheretzoff; 'and not a shadow shall fall upon her.'

"As they lifted the cards to begin anew, Augustinoff, seized with inexplicable emotion, hesitated. Should he re-open a combat where the woman he loved had been made the stake? Did he fear to lose her? Did he fear a disdainful refusal should the happiness of victory place her in his hands? Torn by these conflicting emotions he commenced the game.

"A profound silence reigned in the gaming-room, broken only by the rustling of the cards falling one upon another. Now and then a voice announced a point, and a counter glided softly upon the cloth to mark the play. Once in a while the adversaries stopped to draw breath, like wrestlers overcome with fatigue. Strength and skill seemed evenly balanced.

"All at once Tcheretzoff laid down his cards. The scale had tipped. A bold and hazardous stroke, which might have brought him victory, had only the more speedily determined his defeat. Then it was that this man, this reckless, desperate gambler, consumed for more than ten hours with the fever of play, resumed the dignity and nobility of the soldier.

"'You have won,' he cried, in a stifled voice. 'won all, but I hold to the engagement.'

"And stumbling to his feet, Tcheretzoff, saluting his opponent as they do when under arms, wheeled and passed from the room. The ghastliness of his face betrayed the torture that racked his heart, but neither he nor his companions dreamed of questioning the validity of the contract.

"The engagement was held to the end. Tcheretzoff was divorced, taking the responsibility upon himself, where it undoubtedly belonged, and the responsibility of the divorced husband in Russia is very great. Not only is he always fined, but frequently suffers imprisonment as well. His offence was great, but as the favourite aide-de-camp of the Tsar, Tcheretzoff was not imprisoned. He sought and obtained the privilege of going to fight the Caucasians. He went, but never returned."

"And the Princess Tcheretzoff?"

"Is now the Princess Augustinoff. Acquiescing in the act of her husband, she obeyed—perhaps with reluctance—the conditions of the challenge. And why not? The man who valued her enough to risk 12,000,000 of francs for her sake unquestionably loved and respected her more than the man who staked her upon a game of cards."

J. Gatesby Gale.

Digitized by Google

The Wythecombe Mystery

By John K. Leys, author of "The Tenth of June," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

While on a sketching tour in Wales, Launcelot Vere gets into a dangerous position on the face of a precipice. His life is saved by Winifred Denvers, to whom he becomes engaged. On the wedding morning Launcelot fails to put in an appearance at church, and no news can be heard of him. Miss Unwin, the village schoolmistress, has disappeared at the same time. Harold Kenyon, a friend of Launcelot's, determines to leave Wythecombe in search of his friend, and goes to London. He finds that the missing man has drawn £75 from his bank, and also discovers several sketches of Miss Unwin in the artist's room. Paul Shenstone presses his suit with Katherine Dale, who unwillingly agrees to marry him in October. Winifred is still convinced of Launcelot's innocence of any foul play.

Katherine Dale, A young lady with whom Harold Kenyon is in love.
Paul Shenstone, Engaged to Katherine Dale.
Rev. Mark Denvers, Rector of Wythecombe, and Winifred's father.
Mr. Beaumont, A solicitor, and friendly with Vere.

CHAPTER VI.

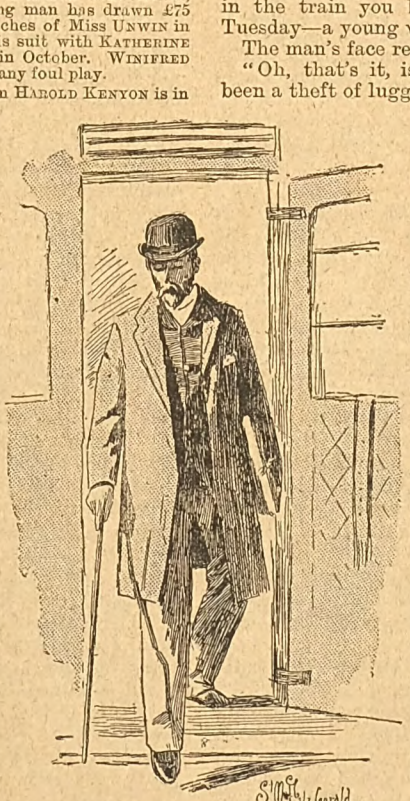
What the Railway Guard had to Tell.

Harold Kenyon could not have been more anxious to set out for London at once, if his own honour, or his own life, had depended on the story the guard had to tell. But duty demanded that he should be at the bank at Darnport on Monday morning and remain there all day. He knew that already he had spent three days in trying to penetrate the darkness in which his friend's fate was shrouded; and he feared that if his employers knew how long he had stayed away from his post they might be disposed to blame him.

But on Monday afternoon he felt free once more; and he travelled up to London by the afternoon train. Next morning he left Paddington at six o'clock, so that the day was still young when he alighted at the little roadside station, where he expected to find Martin, the late guard of the Great Western day express. He had provided himself with a small album, in which were several portraits, among them being a photograph of Launcelot Vere. He had also taken with him the sketch of Miss Unwin's head, which he had found in Vere's studio.

Kenyon could hardly wait till the train had quitted the station before he sought out the station-master.

"I have come all the way from Devonshire," he began, "to ask you one or two questions. A porter told me you could give me some information."



He alighted at the little roadside station.

The ex-guard, a tall, burly fellow, with a red, good-humoured face, looked serious at once.

"You used to act as passenger-guard on the main line, didn't you?"

"Until last Saturday night."

"I have only to ask if you observed one of the passengers in the train you brought from Exeter to London last Tuesday—a young woman of rather striking appearance."

The man's face relaxed into a smile.

"Oh, that's it, is it?" he said. "I thought there had been a theft of luggage, maybe, or something of that sort. Yes, I did notice a young lady. Would I know her portrait? Perhaps I might."

Harold unrolled the sketch of Miss Unwin and held it up.

The station-master nodded.

"You've got her there, sir; and as handsome a face, to my mind, as ever I saw. That's the young lady, sure enough."

"Where did she join your train?" asked Kenyon.

"At Exeter—at least, I saw her there first. She asked me how long there was to wait, and whether she would have time to send a telegram. I said she might, but it would be better to write it on a scrap of paper if she could, and I would send it to the telegraph office for her. There was a chance that she might miss the train."

"Did she write the telegram?"

"She did, sir. But may I ask the object of these inquiries?"

"Perhaps you have not heard. A friend of mine has disappeared, and——"

"Oh, I see!"

The station-master smiled, as if he now quite understood the situation.

"Do you remember the name of the person to whom the telegram was sent?"

"Well," said the ex-guard, in a hesitating way; "it seems to me rayther doubtful if I should give that information. You see, the young lady sort of confided in me."

"If it were not sent to my friend I have no concern with it," said Harold hastily. "Would you remember the name if I told it you?"

"No; I don't think I should."

"Nor the purport of the message?"

Martin smiled, and hesitated.

Digitized by Google

"I assure you," said Kenyon, "no harm of any kind is intended to the young lady. I have neither the power nor the will to injure her in any way whatever. If my friend has not eloped with her of course I have no concern with her. If he has—well, if he has, I shall have no further interest in either of them. Now do you feel at liberty to tell me what you know?"

"Perhaps your friend was a married man, sir?" asked the station-master, with a side look at his questioner.

"Something like it."

"I hope he wasn't the same gentleman, then, for her sake."

"Was the message something like this: 'I am coming by such a train'; or, 'Meet me at such an hour'?"

"Well, yes, I may say it was, sir."

"And you can't say positively whom the telegram was sent to?"

"No, I can't at this moment."

"When the train got to Paddington did anyone meet the young lady?"

Martin was silent.

Kenyon was almost beside himself with anxiety and impatience. But he controlled himself, and quietly assured the station-master that he was in no way connected with the young lady, and repeated that he had not the smallest desire to injure her. At last he succeeded in allaying the worthy man's scruples.

"I would be above playing the spy on any man, least of all on any woman," he said at length. "But I couldn't help noticing them. They came and stood close to where I was, and talked in a sort of whisper. Then they took a turn up the platform and back, still talking very earnest like; and then they came back and stood a little while, and then they went away together."

"In a cab?"

"No; walking. And now that's all I can tell, if you were to question me till doomsday."

"I can't tell you how sorry I am to give you all this trouble; but there is one thing more you can do for me. You noticed the gentleman, I suppose?"

Martin nodded, in an aggrieved kind of way.

"Will you kindly glance through these photographs, then, and see if you can identify any of them as his portrait."

Martin put his hands behind his back.

"It is only to ease my mind, and the minds of—the gentleman's friends. If you can't pick out a photograph, and say: 'That is the likeness of the man who met the young lady, whose portrait you showed me just now, at Paddington Station, and went away with her'—If you can't say: 'I can swear that is the man,'—I will at once trouble myself no more about the girl, but will search for my friend elsewhere. If you do recognise him, I will give myself no more concern about either of them."

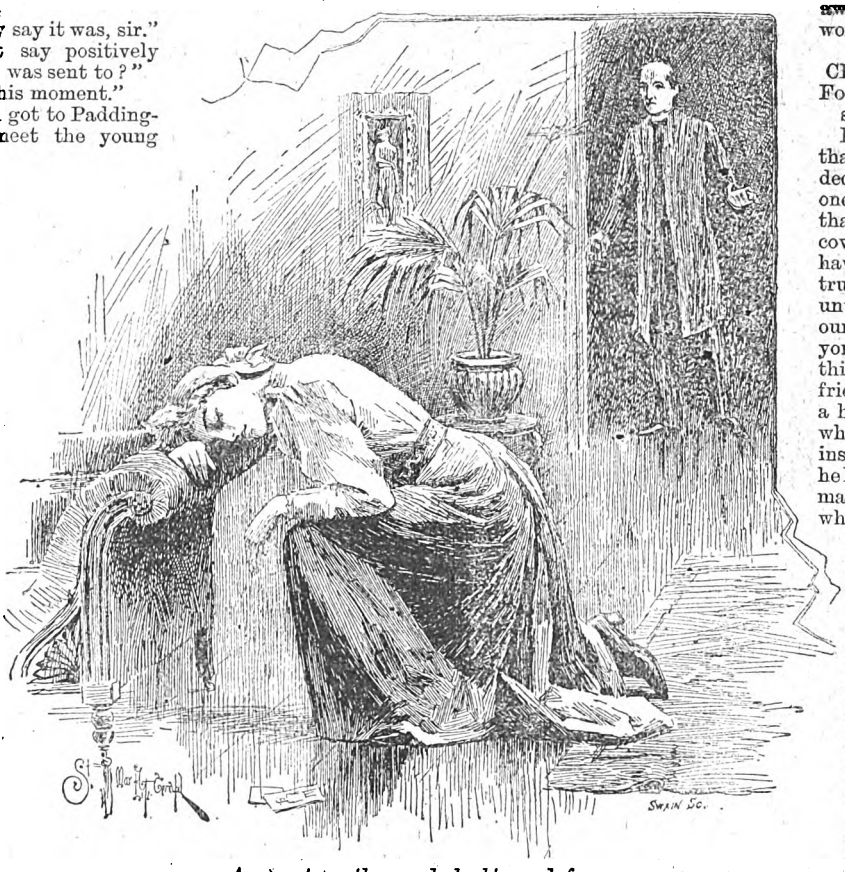
Thus reassured, Martin took the album. Kenyon's hand shook a little as he held it out to him.

One by one the leaves were turned, the eyes of both being fixed on the portraits as they successively came into view.

"That's the man!" said the station-master suddenly, pointing with his forefinger.

It was Launcelot Vere's portrait which he indicated.

Kenyon turned away without a word.



A prey to a thousand doubts and fears.

CHAPTER VII.

Found on Hampstead Heath.

It is sad to find that we have been deceived in any one, but it is more than sad to discover that one we have loved and trusted has been unworthy even of our regard. Kenyon could not think of his former friend now, but as a heartless wretch who had wantonly insulted the girl he had promised to marry—a coward who, rather than confess his pitiable weakness, had hidden himself away from his friends, leaving them to suffer whatever anxiety his conduct might cause them without a word of explanation.

And although he told himself that his own feelings were of no account, he could not but feel that Vere's disgrace was in some degree reflected upon himself. He had almost insulted Shenstone for suggesting that there might be a connection between Vere's sudden disappearance and that of Miss Unwin. He had in a sense made himself Vere's advocate. And now, what was he to say? How was he to face Katherine Dale or the indignant Rector? What message was he to send to the unhappy girl who was waiting for news, tortured by anxiety, and a prey to a thousand doubts and fears? Miss Denvers must be told the result of his inquiries, and she would, of course, draw the natural inference from the facts. Everyone must now advise her that the one thing she had to do was to strive to blot out Launcelot's image from her heart and his name from her memory. But, alas! would any such thing be possible for her now?

Before returning to London, Harold sent a telegram to

Digitized by Google

"Three-and-six to pay," said the man.

Miss Dale, stating the result of his inquiries, and leaving it to her to tell the news to Winnie Denvers or not, as she might think best.

There was one thing Kenyon thought he would do before he went back to Devonshire, and that was to write a note to Vere, saying that the reason of his strange disappearance was no longer a secret to people at Wythecombe. Vere would be sure to come or send to his rooms sooner or later; and if the note reached him it might have the effect of averting trouble in the future.

It was not an easy letter to write. Harold felt that he could not address his former friend as one addresses a stranger; yet it was not his place to heap reproaches on his head. After many abortive attempts, he penned a note without any formal beginning or ending. It ran thus:

"The cause of your absence last Thursday has been ascertained. You have chosen your own course, and it is not for me to upbraid you. I defended you as long as it was possible. Of course I can do so no longer.

"Harold Kenyon."

This note Harold put into an envelope, which he sealed and addressed; and as the hotel at which he was staying was not far from Cumber Street, in which Vere's rooms were situated, he thought he might call there and leave it. It was barely possible that something might have transpired there since his last visit.

As he drew near the house he saw that a man with a handbarrow was at the door; and just as he ascended the steps the man took something bulky from his barrow and carried it to the house. Harold threw a careless glance at it. It was a brown portmanteau—the very portmanteau he had missed when he had examined Vere's rooms three days before.

"Where did you fetch that from, my man?" he asked eagerly.

The man stared at him, and rang the bell in silence.

"Can't you tell me? It is very important that I should know."

Still no answer.

The door opened, and the tenant of the house, who inhabited the lower flat, presented herself.

"Three-and-six to pay," said the man, handing her the portmanteau.

"The gentleman's not at home. You'll have to come back again," answered the woman.

The messenger without a word turned away, carrying the portmanteau with him.

"Here! I'll pay the money," Kenyon called out. "But you must tell me where you come from."

"Bell and Watson, Long Acre."

"How did you get this portmanteau?"

"Fetched it from here on Saturday week to have a new lock put on it. It was to have been sent back last Tuesday but we forgot it; that's a fact."

"Strange!" thought Kenyon, as the man went away, "Poor Launcelot must have yielded to some sudden, uncontrollable impulse. He seems to have made no preparations for his flight, except providing himself with money. I thought he had taken the portmanteau with him, but it is clear that I was mistaken."

He hesitated a moment as to whether he should leave the note he had written for Vere; but finally he did as he had intended, and left the house.

From Donegal Street, Kenyon went to the City, and called at the head office of the bank which he represented at Darnport, intending to explain to Mr. Bonnington, one of the partners, the reason of his having deserted his post for the last two or three days. Mr. Bonnington, however, was not in town that day; and as Kenyon much preferred to confide in him, he decided to defer his explanation for the present.

He was leaving the bank when he heard his own name pronounced from behind, while a hand was laid on his shoulder. He turned and beheld a small wrinkled old man, dressed in old-fashioned black clothes, with a long black silk stock, of the kind fashionable fifty years ago, wound round his throat. The old man's figure was thin and bent, but his eyes were bright, and his lips had that firm expression peculiar to men of energetic temperament.

Harold knew him well. His name was Daunt. He was a solicitor, one of the old-fashioned, steady-going sort who tread the fertile furrows of a conveyancing practice, back and forwards continuously, to their lives' end. Mr. Daunt was one to whom men had recourse when they were in difficulty, and to whom men seldom had recourse in vain. He had held out a helping hand to Harold Kenyon when he was beginning the struggle of life, a fact which Harold gratefully remembered.

"Well, how are you getting on at Darnport?" he asked when the two had shaken hands.

"Pretty well, thank you. I have no reason to complain."

The old man looked at him with his shrewd eyes.

"You are in trouble about something, I see," he observed. "Not a love affair, eh?"

"I have been much perplexed about a friend of mine, who has gone off somewhere without a moment's warning on the very eve of his wedding."

"Repented of his bargain probably," said the old lawyer, with a grin.

Digitized by Google

"No," said Harold; "I don't think that was the reason."

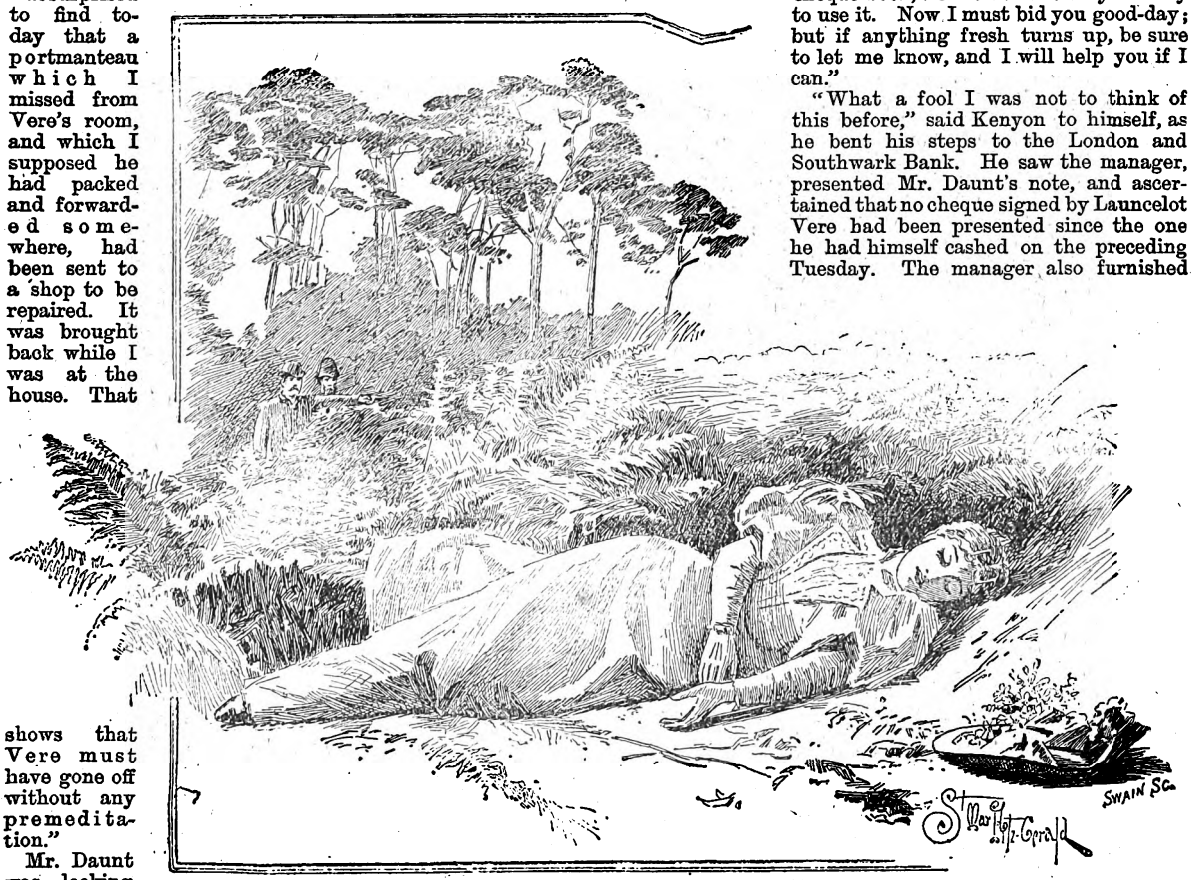
"Eh? What else could make him play a trick of that sort? Head over ears in debt, perhaps, and nothing to pay the honeymoon expenses with."

"No; he drew seventy-five pounds from the bank the day he disappeared."

"Indeed! Come up to my office and tell me about it."

Harold was only too glad to accept this offer. Mr. Daunt led him to a small room, furnished with queer old-fashioned hair-cloth chairs and Pembroke tables, and seated him by the fire. The narrative was not a long one, and Harold ended it by saying:

"The guard's testimony seemed to me conclusive; but I was surprised to find to-day that a portmanteau which I missed from Vere's room, and which I supposed he had packed and forwarded somewhere, had been sent to a shop to be repaired. It was brought back while I was at the house. That shows that Vere must have gone off without any premeditation."



The body of a young woman had been found on Hampstead Heath.

Mr. Daunt was looking steadily into the fire. He seemed to be weighing the matter over in his mind. He offered no remark.

"What do you think of it, sir?" Harold asked.

"I think nothing at all as yet," he said snappishly.

Harold waited in patience and in silence for some minutes.

"Has it ever struck you that your friend may have done something that made it necessary to hide himself?" he asked.

"Never! Launcelot was not a man to commit crimes."

"Hum! Or he may have met with foul play. If he had that seventy-five pounds in his pocket that would be temptation enough for many a London rough. Did you find a cheque-book among your friend's papers?" Mr. Daunt added after a short pause.

"No, I didn't."

"He probably had it in his pocket. You had better go to the manager of his bank. Do you know where he banked?"

"At the London and Southwark."

"Very good. I will give you a note to the manager. Ascertain from him the number of the notes paid to your friend on the day of his disappearance, and these numbers you can afterwards send to Scotland Yard. Find out also from the manager whether any more cheques have been drawn since that day, and beg him to let you know whenever another cheque comes in. If your friend is in hiding he will be sure to want more money before long. If he has been robbed the thieves will not have overlooked the cheque-book, and ten to one they will try to use it. Now I must bid you good-day; but if anything fresh turns up, be sure to let me know, and I will help you if I can."

"What a fool I was not to think of this before," said Kenyon to himself, as he bent his steps to the London and Southwark Bank. He saw the manager, presented Mr. Daunt's note, and ascertained that no cheque signed by Launcelot Vere had been presented since the one he had himself cashed on the preceding Tuesday. The manager also furnished Kenyon with the numbers of the notes handed to Vere on that occasion, and promised to communicate with him if any cheque purporting to be signed by Vere should be handed in for payment.

It was almost closing time when Harold left the bank. The street lamps were already lit, and the newsboys were shouting out the names of the evening journals.

"Murder of a woman on 'Ampstead 'Eath!" cried an urchin, thrusting his paper into Harold's face. Harold bought the journal, and turned into a restaurant to get some dinner. As he waited for his meal he opened the paper in his hand, and his eye fell on a paragraph headed

MURDER OR SUICIDE—WHICH?

He read it through without any special emotion. It was such a paragraph as one meets with too often in a London newspaper. The body of a young woman, well-dressed, and of attractive appearance, had been found on Hampstead Heath. It was impossible to say how many hours the poor girl's body had been lying there. A revolver was found beside it; and the natural inference would have been that the unfortunate girl had taken her own life, but for two circumstances. The first was that women very seldom shoot themselves; they drown or poison themselves when they are bent on self-destruction. The second was that the dress was not scorched, as it would almost certainly have been if the girl had held the pistol with her own hand when it was fired. There were no letters or other documents found on the young woman's person; but there was a photograph in a small leather case—the photograph of a gentleman. And the linen worn by the girl was marked J. U.

Digitized by Google

When he read these concluding lines, Harold started from his seat. J. U.! He did not know Miss Unwin's Christian name; but U. was an unusual initial. He must know at once whether this murdered girl was Miss Unwin or not; he felt sure he could recognise her from the sketches and the picture he had found in Launcelot's study.

Throwing the price of his untasted dinner on the table, Harold hurried from the restaurant, hailed a hansom, and was soon being rapidly carried to the place where the body lay.

A woman was sobbing in a corner of the room.

"Her mother, sir," whispered a policeman.

"Then you know the poor thing's name?"

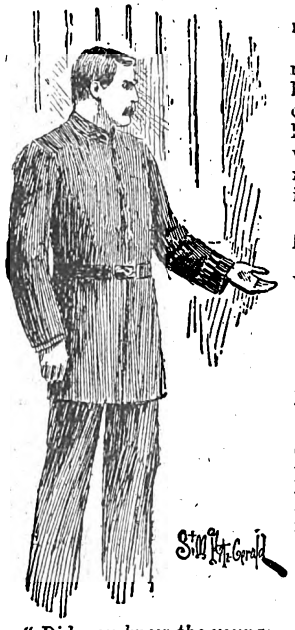
"Yes, sir. We know it now—Jane Unwin."

The man drew down a corner of the sheet, and Harold threw a pitying glance at the cold face that lay beneath it. It was the same face as that depicted in the sketches and the finished portrait which Harold had seen.

"Did you know the young lady, sir?" asked the policeman.

And Harold was glad to be able to answer:

"No; I never saw her to my knowledge."



"Did you know the young lady, sir?"

The constable turned to re-arrange the sheet; and as he did so Harold caught sight of a photograph in a brown leather case. The man's back was still turned; the weeping mother had hidden her eyes in her handkerchief.

Harold stole one look at the photograph.

It was Launcelot Vere, with a smile upon his face.

CHAPTER VIII.

At the Inquest.

Bewildered, sick at heart, Kenyon turned away and left the building.

He had searched in every corner for a plausible explanation for Vere's conduct—for something that might prove that he was not the unprincipled scoundrel people imagined him to be—and this was the result! He shuddered when he thought of that poor creature's lifeless body, lying there desolate and despised, mutely appealing for pity and for vengeance. He was glad to think that it would not be necessary for him to appear at the inquest.

When he got back to his hotel he found a telegram from the bank asking him to remain in town for another day or two, and, of course, he delayed his departure accordingly. Next morning, however, he was told, when he called at the bank, that his services would not be required until the following day.

"She is my daughter—my only child."

As Kenyon, with nothing particular to do, strolled slowly westward, he recollected that the inquest on the body of Jane Unwin was to be held that forenoon; and he thought it possible that if he attended the inquiry as a spectator he might learn something about Vere, and find out why he had chosen the eve of his wedding as the moment of his elopement. He no longer felt for Vere anything of the painful anxiety he had felt up to Tuesday morning. He believed—he could not doubt—that the man was a murderer. Yet he was curious, even anxious, to hear something about him. Had he been discovered, or was he still in hiding? If he had been found, would he be taken into custody at once on suspicion? Would he confess that he had shot the poor girl, or would he deny his guilt?

Harold, in spite of his changed feelings towards Vere, was naturally anxious to learn what had happened, and what might be expected to befall his former friend, and he determined to go to Hampstead and ascertain what was going on.

There were one or two things which he had to attend to before setting out for "The Spaniards," where the inquest was to be held. He had to send a message to the bank, and call for a moment at his hotel.

While in the hotel it occurred to him that he had seen an empty case, which might belong to a revolver, in Launcelot Vere's sitting-room. If he could get hold of the revolver that had been found beside Miss Unwin's body, and try whether it fitted this empty case, he would have a strong proof of Vere's guilt, or, on the other hand, a piece of evidence in favour of his innocence. From the hotel to Vere's rooms was but a step. Kenyon went there, took possession of the empty case, and slipped it into the outer pocket of his overcoat. Then he took a train to Hampstead.

When Harold entered the room in which the inquiry was being held, a tall, gaunt woman with iron-grey hair was in the act of taking the oath.

"Your name is Maria Unwin?" asked the Coroner.

The woman bowed.

"And you are a widow, I believe?"

The witness hesitated for a moment.

"I am not a widow," she said, "although I have passed as one for some years. I have lived apart from my husband and earned my own living."

Digitized by Google

"Well—you have seen the body of the deceased girl. Do you recognise her?"

"She is my daughter—my only child."

"Did she live with you?"

"Only when she happened to be out of a situation, or during the holidays."

"What was her occupation?"

"She was a schoolmistress. She had a situation as parish schoolmistress at Wythecombe, near Darnport."

"When did you see her last?"

"At the Easter holidays. I am housekeeper to a Mr. Gordon, and I got permission for my daughter to stay with me during the holidays."

"You are sure you have not seen your daughter since?"

"Quite sure, sir."

"When did you hear from her last?"

"About a month ago."

"Was there anything in that letter, or in her previous letters, to lead you to suppose that she was in trouble of any kind?"

Again the witness hesitated.

"I thought she was unhappy, but she did not tell me the reason."

"Do you know the reason?"

No answer.

"Come, now, Mrs. Unwin. I am sorry to press you; but really we must get at the truth. Had your daughter a love affair?"

"Not for some time—not since last year."

The Coroner paused a moment. He then took the photograph which had been found on the body of Jane Unwin, and put it into witness's hands.

"Do you recognise that face?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Whose portrait is it?"

"Mr. Vere's."

"Where does he live?"

"I don't know, sir."

"Do you know his Christian name?"

"Launcelot."

"Where did your daughter meet him?"

"At the house of Mr. Pascoe, my last employer," explained Mrs. Unwin, who answered the questions put her very straightforwardly.

"When was that?"

"Last summer—I mean the summer of last year. My daughter was in weak health, and she left her situation, as the work was too hard for her, perhaps two months before the midsummer holidays. She spent these two months, and also the holiday time, about three months altogether, with me. Of course, I had permission from Mr. Pascoe. She helped me with the housekeeping and needlework."

"Just so. Now, this Mr. Vere. Was he a relation of your employer?"

"No, sir. Mr. Pascoe had no relations that I ever heard of, except Mr. Abbot, his nephew. But Mr. Vere was a good deal about the house. He used to stay for two or three weeks at a time, especially if he had a picture to paint."

"Oh! Mr. Vere is an artist, then?"

"I burnt it soon after reading it."

"Yes, sir."

"Were he and your daughter thrown much together?"

"Not unless—only when she sat as a model."

"Did that happen frequently?"

"Pretty often. My daughter was handsome, and she had a fine figure. Mr. Vere drew her face dozens of times."

"Now, Mrs. Unwin, I cannot avoid asking you this: Was there any question of love or marriage between these two?"

At this plain—brutally plain—question Mrs. Unwin's tears burst out afresh. A more skilful examiner could have elicited all that was necessary without the slightest trouble; but the Coroner was a medical man, with very limited ideas as to the mode of conducting a judicial inquiry. For a time nothing could be heard in the room but the mother's sobs, with a running accompaniment of apparently impertinent questions, repeated over and over again in the harsh voice of the Coroner. By-and-bye she made answers of some sort, and the coroner obligingly pieced her answers together after this sort of way:

"So it comes to this, my good woman—Mr. Vere paid your daughter some attentions, and seemed to be in love with her. You began to fear that your daughter's good name would be compromised, or, at all events, that her peace of mind might be destroyed, and you insisted on her taking the post that was offered her at Wythecombe, so as to be out of harm's way. Is that what you would say?"

"Yes, sir. That's quite correct."

"Do you know whether your daughter and Mr. Vere corresponded?"

"That I can't tell."

"Or whether they had met lately?"

"I fancied, from a chance expression in Jane's last letter, that Mr. Vere had either met her, or written to her, not long ago."

"Have you the letter here?"

"No; I burnt it soon after reading it. It seemed unimportant at the time."

"Do you know when your daughter left Wythecombe?

"No, sir, I don't."

"Nor where she stayed the night before last?"

"No, sir."

"Do you know whether she has seen Mr. Vere since she left her situation?"

"I think——"

"Never mind what you think. Is there anything that you have seen or heard from which you could infer that they had met, or that they had not met?"

"Nothing whatever, sir. Jane was always rather close about her own affairs; I was left to guess at the state of matters between her and Mr. Vere. She never told me that he had said he loved her, or had promised to marry her; but I thought he was fond of her in a way."

The poor woman again broke down; and the coroner said the court would adjourn for half-an-hour.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

A MADMAN'S STORY.

I HAVE succeeded. This was very easy however. My purpose was this: to commit a crime, to profit by it and go unpunished, a concise programme that I have filled to the letter. I will relate it to you. I believe I am justified in saying I displayed some ingenuity.

First the crime, voici. I had espoused a girl without fortune. I was a simple employé at two thousand two hundred francs per year, but I was very content. My tastes were always modest. My wife, who was an orphan, had one sister. Marie and Blanche, two pretty names. I had espoused Marie. Blanche lived with us. All went well. At first a son, and then a daughter. My salary was increased to three thousand francs, and I had nothing of which to complain.

One day a notary wrote to me. I was greatly surprised. I had had, I avow, little relation with these honourable gentlemen. My surprise increased when the worthy notary informed me that a merchant of Calcutta, uncle to my wife and her sister, had died and left them a heritage of a million francs.

That is to say, five hundred thousand francs each—barabi—bibari—hold! why do I write this, now—bira—biba—a half million for my wife.

* * * * *

The inheritance was promptly arranged. I had an income of twenty-five thousand francs; that is a handsome figure, is it not? My sister-in-law had an equal share. We put the house on a good footing at once—domestics, carriages, etc. I have always loved the arts. I bought choice pictures and statuary. For the first time in my life I patronised a fashionable tailor. I had an air tout-à-fait distingué, I assure you. My hand is elegant, my foot is small, and all the ladies envied me my luxuriant locks. I am what is called a handsome man; only at the end of a very short time I felt profoundly vexed that half a million had fallen to my sister-in-law. It would have been a genuine satisfaction—I dissimulate not—to have the million entire, since I was charged with a wife and children, and this old woman had no one but herself to look after, don't you see?

Then the idea came to me to kill her. My wife was her sole inheritor. Her sister dispatched, the million would come to us intact and I could put it to good use. Voilà, that is what I said to myself that evening in chatting with the two sisters. Then I resolved to assassinate Blanche. Only, being intelligent, I searched means to commit this crime without any danger. I read all the collections of causes célèbres, and I soon came to the conclusion that assassins were almost invariably betrayed by the very care which they took to conceal their criminal intentions. Barabi—bibari. Singular, these syllables always running through my head and springing to my lips without my knowing why.

I have always had a weakness for reading scientific works, particularly those that treat of medicine. I read the "Manual of Hallucinations" of Brière de Boismont, "La Folie" of Movel, "La Crime et La Folie" of Mandeley. It was in the latter book that I found the outline of a plan very ingenious and very useful in my emergency. And this is what I did:

One morning I went to the office of Dr. Laussedat, the most renowned specialist in brain disorders of modern times. He received me very politely, and I said to him: "Doctor, I come to make a terrible avowal. I am rich; I am happy; I adore my wife and children. I have no cause to hate any person on the face of the earth. Nevertheless, I sometimes find myself in a frightful state."

I spoke in a dry sort of tone, the eyes a little widened, and my lips contracted at intervals.

"Proceed," he said.

I bowed my head, and in a hollow voice continued:

"Sometimes, when I am in the midst of my family, I am all at once seized with an insane desire to kill someone. There succeeds, within myself, a terrible combat. I feel my hands involuntarily attracted towards the knife that is beside me at the table. Whom should I wish to slay? I know not. My wife, my children, my sister-in-law? In my hideous nightmare I should not choose. I resist some time, fearing that one might read in my eyes the horrible secret that haunts me. I close my hands and bury the nails in my flesh to arouse myself.

"At the commencement a physical impression was sufficient to dissipate this hallucination. Without attracting attention I arose and went to my chamber. A dash of cold water on the forehead restored calm. The spectre disappeared and I returned smiling.

"But for some time now the attacks have been more and more frequent. I realise that resistance of will and reason becomes daily more and more feeble. I begin to fear that some fatal day I may throw myself upon one of those I love and plunge a knife into her heart. Doctor, I have come to you to make a confession—I fear myself—you are the only one that is able to save me."

M. Laussedat listened to me with the utmost attention.

"Tell me," said he, "have you not remarked some symptoms premonitory to these attacks?"

"Yes, indeed," I responded. "At first there is a heaviness of the head, as if my brain was too weighty, and rolled about in the skull, and after that a compression of the chest, a contraction of the heart, and other peculiar sensations."

"It is well," said the Doctor. "I assure you that your case is one that can be easily cured. Follow exactly the treatment that I am about to prescribe, and I will answer for the result."

He wrote a long prescription which I took away after thanking him in the most earnest manner. Bibari—babari—bu—ba—bi—Tenez! this refrain annoys me.

I followed punctiliously—in appearance, you understand—the instructions of the Doctor. My room was encumbered with phials. My wife became uneasy. I reassured her the best that I was able. But from time to time I fixed a haggard look upon her. She questioned me. I replied evasively. I allowed three months to pass. At the end of that time I sought the Doctor again.

Digitized by Google

"Eh bien!" he cried as soon as he perceived me. "I hope you have chased away the black butterflies."

I burst into tears. I was a victim of fatality. In place of being cured these attacks had become more and more frequent. Sometimes I shut myself up at home, sometimes I took long walks about the city, the fatigue aiding to calm me. But the wave mounted, mounted. I had something on the lips like the taste of blood!

"Monsieur," I finally said to him, "I come to ask you a great service."

"Command me," he replied in a tone of commiseration.

"I implore you to cause me to be inclosed in a retreat for the insane."

He seemed to be surprised beyond measure at my request.

"And to what end?" he asked.

"I know," said I, "I know that I am on the eve of a terrible crisis. The symptoms that I have enumerated to you are more violent than ever and more frequent. To-morrow, perhaps, I shall do some great harm, I feel certain. Order me to be confined. I shall be treated as one insane, by douches, the strait-jacket. I wish to be cured," I cried, sobbing. "Aid me—save me!"

The eminent practician was moved. This physiological subject interested him. I continued:

"Only, not to disquiet my family, I wish them to remain ignorant of the horrible extremity to which I am reduced. I will pretend that business requires a journey of two or three months. I will disappear during that period, writing home whenever the lucidity of my mind will permit. Then, when the treatment, energetic in the extreme, restores my normal condition, I will return home and resume my place at the family fireside, certain this time not to redden it with blood."

The Doctor felt my pulse, sounded my chest, and studied the play of my internal organs, and finally declared that I was right in my determination. I had no lésion of the brain; my case was simply an affection of the nerves that would speedily yield to seclusion and treatment. He consented to lend himself to the deceit I meditated. He would place me in a maison de santé, of which he was the chief director, feeling sure that in a few weeks my mental equilibrium would be restored.

I returned home and had no trouble in persuading my wife of the necessity for a journey. She had remarked certain inquietudes, certain bizarreries that change of scene and surroundings would dispel, she said.

The next day I entered the maison de santé—barabi—bibari. It was luxurious and well located. It was very expensive but—barabi. That cursed refrain! It maddens me! And why? why?

I remained there three months. At the end of a fortnight I simulated a violent excess of delirium. I threw myself upon one of the assistants and nearly strangled him. Afterwards I underwent the punishment of the douche, twisting myself about like a man in convulsions. Then I became calm, and little by little resumed my natural state. I was watched constantly for six weeks. Not one day did Monsieur Laussedat fail to pay me a visit, and soon he reported a sensible amelioration in my condition. I laughed a low laugh all within myself. Those wise doctors!

I knew he was very much flattered because the case fitted exactly with a pet theory of his regarding the cure of the insane by an exercise of their own will. He felicitated me on my energy, and encouraged me to persevere. For my part I exhibited an exemplary docility. I kept carefully in the current of the imaginary symptoms which pronounced my cure to be near at hand and definite.

One day the Doctor said to me that I could return to my family without apprehension. I asked that I might remain another month to make sure, and he granted my request, adding, however, that it was a useless precaution.

Finally I accepted my liberty and returned home. My wife and sister-in-law, my children and friends fêted my arrival. I avowed half the truth to them—told them I had gone to follow a treatment for an affection of the lungs, of which I had not spoken, fearing to alarm them, but that I was entirely convalescent. The fact was I never looked better in my life.

Hold! Where am I now? Barabi—bi—bu—ba—bibari—one, two, three—bibari! There is something the matter with my head.

* * * * *

Four months after I had resumed my place at the table de famille, my sister-in-law being seated at my left, I plunged a knife into her heart—then, raising frightful shrieks, I rolled upon the floor. The outburst endured—appeared to endure—five minutes or more, when I came to myself and began to weep.

I was arrested. No one except M. Laussedat was able to suspect the cause of my crime. Just at the moment of the catastrophe, for which I had carefully selected the hour, the Doctor was absent from Paris, so that the investigation followed its course.

To the question of the magistrate, I replied that I had acted without volition in the affair, under the impulse of a passion that I was not able to withstand. Naturally, it was responded that I simulated insanity. Then, as though yielding to shame, I spoke of M. Laussedat. He was hurriedly summoned.

With a loyalty that I had well counted on, he told all that had passed. He spoke of my frankness, of which I had given so many proofs, of the superhuman efforts that I had made to control the fatal malady, and of my voluntary sojourn at the maison de santé.

Homicidal monomania was only too evident. The great aliénists, Esquiros and Penel, had reported some observations identified with my case. (I knew it well, because it was upon these observations that I had constructed my plan.)

When the trial came on I was unanimously acquitted, only the Tribunal decided that, by way of precaution, I should be confined in a maison de santé during a period of whose duration the médecins aliénists should be the judges.

In the meantime, my wife had inherited from her sister. The million was ours, and no one dreamed how it was done!

M. Laussedat had declared to the Tribunal that, according to all appearances, the explosion of this crisis did not preclude a final cure, and I was shut up in a mad house.

Here I am—I laugh—they have kept me here nearly a year. A year for five hundred thousand francs? That is not much. Barabi—what signifies—bibari—bu—how I fooled them all. Hi! hi! hi biba—bara—I am thirsty—Hum! hum!—a frog!—the Doctor swallowed my story easily, didn't he?—barabi—Acknowledge that it was well conceived. Hé! hé! hé! bibi—babi—I fooled them with my pretended lunacy—courage—biba—is necessary—ribiba. Suppose the lunacy should—ribari—bib—what's that?—a dragon! a coiling cobra about to strike! Help! help! I'm mad! I'M MAD!

HONOR LUCELLE.

Digitized by Google

LEGENDS OF WOLFVILLE.

BY "DAN QUINN."

Wolfville is a Cattleman's Settlement in Arizona, and the Characters in these Legends are Cowboys.

No. II.—The Cactus.

"THE CACTUS" was the name bestowed upon her in Wolfville. Her signature, if she had written it, would probably have been Mollie Prescott, at least such was the declaration of Rosewood Jim.

"I sees this yere female a year ago in Tombstone," asserted that veracious chronicler, "where she cooks at the stage station, an' she gives it out cold she's called Prescott—Mollie Prescott—an' most likely she knows her name, an' knowed it a year ago."

As Rosewood was a historian of known petulance, no one cared to challenge either his facts or his conclusions; so the real name of "The Cactus" was accepted by the Wolfville public as Prescott.

"The Cactus" was a personable lady, comely and round, and her advent into Wolfville society had caused something of a flutter. Her mission was to cook, and in the fulfilment of her destiny she presided over the range at the O.K. Hotel. Being publicly hailed as "The Cactus" seemed in nowise to depress her, and it is possible she even felt a secret glow over an epithet which was meant by the critical taste that awarded it to illustrate those thorns in her nature which repelled and held in check the amorous male of Wolfville.

Women were jewellery in Wolfville, and on her first coming "The Cactus" had many admirers. Every man in the camp loved her the moment she stepped from the Tucson stage six months before. From the term "every man," however, a careful writer would except Rosewood Jim. That obdurate scientist, given as he was to the investigation of the inner workings of faro as a philosophy, had no time for such a soft and dulcet affair as love. Another thing, Rosewood had scruples of honour born of his business.

"Life behind a deal-box is a mighty sight too fantastic," quoth the thoughtful Rosewood, "for a family. It does well enough for single-footers, which it don't make much difference with when a player pulls his six-shooter an' sends 'em shoutin' home to heaven some abrupt. But there ain't no room for a woman with a man who turns cards as a pursoot. Priests and gamblers ain't got no business with squaws."

As time went on, the scores of lovers who sighed on the daily trail of "The Cactus" dwindled down to two. The rest gave out dispirited.

"I'm clean strain enough," said Bill Tutt, in apologetic description of his failure to persevere, "but I knows when I've got through. I'll play a game to a finish, but when it's down to the turn, an' my last chip's gone over to the dealer, why I shoves my chair back an' quits. An' it's about that a-way of an' concernin' my love for this yere Cactus girl. I jest can't get her none, an' that settles it. I now drors out an' gives my seat to someone else."

"That's whatever," said a personage known as Texas Joe, who was an interested listener to the defeated Mr. Tutt, "an' you can gamble I'm with you on them views. I loves 'The Cactus' myself to a frightful degree, an' thar's times I jest goes about whinin' for her; but yere awhile back I comes projectin' around her kitchen, an' 'bing!' comes a skillet at my head, an' that lets me out. You bet I don't pursoo them explorations round her no more. I don't want to get my rope on to no woman who is that callous as to heave kitchen bric-à-brac at a heart that's pantin' for her."

Two lovers still knelt at the shrine of "The Cactus." These were hailed by the men of Wolfville respectively as Rice Brown and Riley Brooks. A description of one would have been a portrait of the other. They were young, good-looking, of the breezy south-western type; tanned as to face, and lithe and limber as black snakes as to person. These still held the affections of "The Cactus" in siege and demanded capitulation, without, however, making much apparent impression.

Still it was possible that "The Cactus" was a shade less thorny in her treatment of Rice Brown and Riley Brooks than of any of the others. Perhaps she was becoming tired out. Be the reason what it may, these two persisted when the others failed, and at last were recognised as rivals.

"All I'm afraid of," said old man Armstrong, the head of the local vigilance committee, "is that these yere young bucks 'll take to pawin' 'round for trouble with each other. As the upshot of sech doin's would most likely be the stringin' of the survivor by the Wolfville committee on lariats, these yere nuptials, which now looks some feasible, would be clean busted an' the camp get a set-back jest that much. I wish this yere maiden would tip her hand in this to some discreet gent, so a play could be made in advance to get the wrong man outen the way. Whatever do you think you'se'f, Rosewood?"

"It's a delicate deal," said that sapient cardist, "to go tamperin' round a young female for the secrets of her soul, but I shorely deems it a crisis an' public interest demands somethin' is done. These yere boys is growing mighty hostile of each other, which I notes last night over in the Gold Mine Saloon, where they was paintin' up for war, an' onless we all interferes yere, it's my jedgment some of this yere love-makin' 'll come off in the smoke."

"Thar oughter be a nact of Congress," said Tutt the pessimist, "agin love-makin' in the Far West, an'

Digitized by Google

the East should be kept for sech purposes speshul, same as reservations for Injuns. The Western climate's too exyooberant for love-makin'."

"S'pose me an' you an' Tutt yere goes over to this young female, an' all polite an' congenial like, we ups an asks her intentions?" continued Armstrong, in an interrogative way, to Rosewood.

"Excuse me, pards," says Tutt, with sad earnestness, "but I don't think I wants cards in this at all. 'The Cactus' is a mighty spirited lady, an' you all recalls as how I've been pesterin' some 'round her in the past myself, for which reason, with others, she might take my comin' on sech errants derisive an' bang me over the fore'erd with a dipper or some sech objectionable play. So I reckon I better keep out of this yere embassy a whole lot. I ain't aimin' to shirk nuthin', but it'll be a heap more shore to win if I do."

"Tutt ain't onlikely to be plenty right about this," said Rosewood, "an' I reckon, Armstrong, we all better take this trick ourselves."

The mission was not a success. When the worthy pair of peace preservers appeared in the presence of "The Cactus" and made the inquiries noted, it excited the scorn and ire of that retiring damsel beyond the power of words to describe.

"What be you all doin' in my kitchen?" she asked, her young face flushed with rage and noonday cooking. "Who sent you all canterin' over yere to me with these insultin' questions, anyhow? I demand to know at ter once."

"And yere," said Rosewood, in relating the exploit in the Gold Mine Saloon immediately afterwards, "she stamps her foot like a buck antepole, an' lets fly a stove-griddle at us, an' all with a proud, high air, which reminds me a mighty sight of a goddess."

At the time it would seem the two attempted an apologetic explanation of their presence, and made efforts to point out to "The Cactus" the crying public need of some decision on her part.

"You don't want these two young male persons to take to shootin' of each other all up none, do you?" said Armstrong.

"I want you two men to get outen my kitchen," replied "The Cactus" vigorously, "an' I wants you to move some hurried, too. Don't never let me find your mocassin tracks 'round this yere water-hole no more, or I'll turn in an' mark you up a whole lot."

"Yere, you," she continued, as they were about to leave, something cast down by the conference, "you all can tell that Riley Brooks an' Rice Brown if they're blamed fools enough to go makin' a gun play over me, to make it and make it hard. Tell 'em I can pick my man out when the smoke blows away."

"Tutt's way right about 'The Cactus' bein' some spirited," said Armstrong, as the two walked away.

"She's shore spirited, an' that's a fact," mused Rosewood, in assent.

The result of the talk with "The Cactus" found its way about in Wolfville, and in less than an hour bore its hateful fruit.

The peaceful quiet of the Gold Mine Saloon, which, as a rule, heard no harsher note than the clatter of a stack of chips, was suddenly broken.

"You all who ain't interested yere better take to a lower limb."

It was the voice of Riley Brooks. The trained instinct of the Wolfville public at once fathomed the trouble, and proceeded to hide its many heads behind barrels, tables, counter, and any place which promised refuge from the bullets. All but one, and that one was Rice Brown.

He knew it meant him the moment Riley Brooks uttered the first syllable, and his pistol came to the front with a brevity born of long practice. His rival's was already there, and so the shooting began. As result, Mr. Brooks received a serious injury, which crippled his good right arm for many a day, while Mr. Brown was picked up with a wound in the side which even the sentiment of Wolfville, inured to such things and inclined to optimism at all times, admitted as dangerous.

"Well," said Armstrong, after the duellists had been cared for at the O.K. House, "yere we be again an' nuthin' settled. Yere we has all this shootin' an' all this blood-lettin', an' the camp gets all torn up; an' still thar's jest as many of these yere people now as there was before, an' most likely the whole deal to go over again."

"I shorely abominates things a-splittin' even this away," said Rosewood, "but Wolfville must b'ar its burdens same as other camps. It can't be he'ped none."

The next day the two duellists were still in bed. A new phase was given the affair when "The Cactus," clothed in purple and fine linen, and with two red roses in her straw hat, took the stage for Tucson. The management of the O K. House reported, in deference to the excited state of the Wolfville mind, that "The Cactus" would return in a week.

"Goin' for her wedding troosoe, most likely," said Armstrong, as he gazed after the stage.

"Let's drink to the hope she gets a red dress," said Tutt. "Set out all your bottles, barkeeper, an' don't leave nary man out. You bet red is my favourite colour."

No one seemed to know the intentions of "The Cactus." The shooting had in no wise disturbed her. That may have been her obdurate heart or it may have come from a familiarity with the evanescent tenure of human life born of long years on the border. Be that as it may, she experienced not the least concern touching the condition of her brace of lovers upstairs, and took the stage without even saying good-bye to them or anyone else.

"An' some fools say women is talkers," said Rosewood in high disgust.

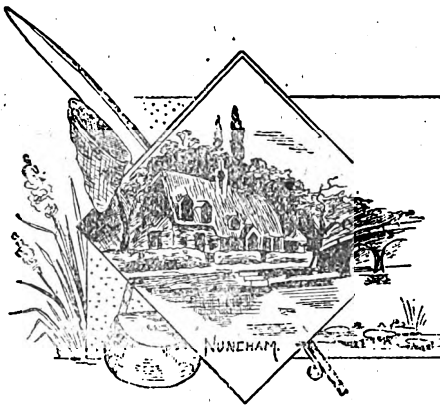
Three days later Old Scotty, the stage driver, came in with startling news. "The Cactus" had married a man in Tucson, and would bring him to Wolfville in a week.

"When I first hears of it," said Old Scotty, with a groan, "an' when I thinks of them two pore boys a-layin' in Wolfville, an' their rights being trifled with that a-way I shorely thinks I'll take my Winchester an' go an' stop them rites a whole lot; but, pards, the Tucson marshal wouldn' have it. So she nails him, an' I hears in a saloon over thar she's been aimin' to marry him before she ever hops into Wolfville at all. I sees him afterwards, an' he's a little, measly-lookin' prairie dog, an' from his looks he couldn't get a job clerkin' in a store."

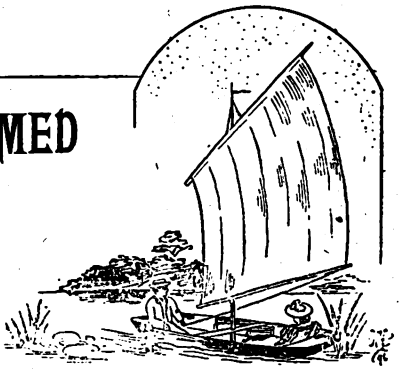
"Thar you be," said Armstrong. "Another case of woman's inhumanity to man. However, if 'The Cactus' has done gone a-fluttin' from her perch in this yere fashion, just the same we must prance 'round an' give her a high old time on her return. The honour of the camp bein' concerned, of course we whoops it up in style."

And they did.

Digitized by Google



THE DEFORMED FOOT.



The story I shall tell you was told me by an Italian lady. She had been showing me the work of her father, who must have been a sculptor of ability, her mother's head, which was lovely; her own, as a child; a Cupid, a Venus, and the sculptor's own bust.

"My father was murdered, you know," the lady said, when I asked her to tell me the history of that wonderful face. "He was a sculptor; his studio was a little building apart from the house, with a light properly arranged, and encircled by foliage. He often was quite alone there late at night. No one ever dreamed of danger.

"My father lay on the floor, foully murdered."

"One night he arose from his bed, told my mother he had dreamt of a face which he wished to reproduce, and went to his studio. My mother fell asleep. She woke in the grey dawn. My father was not yet in the house.

"Dressing herself, she ran to the lonely building among the trees. My father lay upon the floor, foully murdered. She did not survive the shock.

"The motive was evidently robbery. His watch and two diamond rings were gone.

"Italian girls marry early. Though my mother was but thirty, I was fifteen, and a woman at heart. I vowed to revenge my father. I, who was now rich, resolved to spend all my fortune, if necessary, in bringing to justice the murderer of both my parents. "'Vendetta,' I cried; 'afterwards grief, but first his punishment.' I had but one clue. Upon a piece of clay that had fallen to the ground remained the impress of a man's bare foot — a strangely deformed foot. All the toes between the great and the little ones were gone.

"The police knew no such foot among the criminal class: but I kept the mould and its cast carefully.

"Under a pretence of befriending the poor, I went into many a dwelling where I knew there was more sin than suffering, always with my old nurse, a venerable woman of great good sense.

"I practised my father's art, and also painted, that I might be able to beg suspicious-looking people to pose for my figures.

"My reputation for benevolence drew about me the riff-raff of Naples. I was known to be young, and was supposed to be foolishly generous. Still I found no one with such a deformed foot as the cast exhibited.

"My aunt lived in the house with me. She was a woman of middle-age, and a great matchmaker.

"One day she proposed an alliance to me. A nobleman from France had offered himself—a marquis, very, very rich. I declared I had no thought but for my lost parents; but she insisted that I should at least know the gentleman.

"At last I promised this.

"He came splendidly attired, courteous to the point of flattery. He spoke of great people he had known; of the Empress, then in her prime, who spoke to him as 'My dear Friend.' He showed us orders, tokens of esteem from people known all over the world, but I did not believe in him.

"He struck me as an imposter—a man who would not hesitate at crime; and as I noticed a curious awkwardness—not quite a lameness—in his gait, the one object of my life—my monomania, if you will choose to call it so—arose before me.

"'Pardon me,' he said as he trod on my aunt's train; 'I received a wound in battle which makes one of my feet trouble me somewhat sometimes. I nearly lost the favour of the Empress by the same accident. When I informed her of the cause of my awkwardness, she was gracious enough to reply: "One must pardon everything to a brave soldier."'

"'Bah!' I thought. 'You are telling falsehoods.' But my aunt loaded him with compliments until I was ashamed of her. She ended by asking him to sup with us I listened eagerly.

"'I hope you will come,' I added, with a smile. My aunt tapped me pleasantly on the shoulder with her fan.

"'It's not always that Irene seconds my invitation,' she said.

"'You are sensible, child,' she said, when he was gone.

Digitized by Google

'The marquis is a great catch. Not very handsome, certainly, and has a little limp, but it is the defect of a hero—a soldier's wound. It is really quite a charm when one thinks of that.'

"I interrupted her by asking if we might have five o'clock tea before the supper.

"'I wish to fill this cup for the Marquis,' I said, 'It is such a pretty attention—one a lady may offer with grace.'

"'I never saw you so charming,' said my aunt. 'Tea, of course, if you like it.'

"After this I waited with impatience for the evening of the promised visit. If I were to tell you what thoughts filled my mind you would think me mad. I scarcely slept. I ate only enough to keep me alive. My aunt laughed at me and told me I was in love. Oh, little could she read my heart? I had never hated anything as I hated that man.

"At last the day came. Dressed in white, with roses in my belt and one great red one in my hair, I greeted the Marquis with a smile.

"My aunt was charming; he all adoration.

"Occasionally my old nurse appeared at the door. I made her a little sign, which she understood. 'Not yet,' it said to her. The tea was brought in. I filled the cups, and replenished the pot. The Marquis emptied his cup rapidly.

"'Tea becomes nectar, made by such hands,' he said.

"'Let me replenish your cup,' I cried.

"I lifted the boiling pot, crossed the room, smiled as he held up the cup, and then the pot slipped, and its contents were emptied over the foot of our guest.

"He uttered a yell of pain. I flung the pot away. It was of fine porcelain, and shattered into fragments on the polished floor, beyond the Persian rug. I sank on my knees at his feet, ignoring the low oath he had uttered.

"'I have scalded the Marquis,' I cried. 'Let me do my best to repair the injury.'

"I pulled off the delicate evening shoe. He was weak with pain, but he resisted. I removed his stocking, while he panted:

"'Arrest the murderer of my father!'"

"'I beg, signora, that you will not trouble yourself.'

"And I saw what I had expected. My nurse had rushed in. I made her a sign.

"'The time has come,' I said to her, in this mute fashion. Then the room was filled with police officers.

"'Arrest the murderer of my father!' I cried.

"My aunt shrieked, but these men care little for women's cries or men's imprecations. They led the Marquis away, well guarded.

"He proved to be a man who had escaped from one of the French prisons—a man of twenty murders. He had stolen his orders and his letters of introduction from a master he had also robbed of money and jewels.

"His maimed foot filled the mould in the clay exactly, and precisely resembled the cast. Moreover, my father's watch was found on his person. He was tried and found guilty. He made a full confession before his execution.

"'The big diamond on the gentleman's finger tempted me,' he said. 'I never could resist fine diamonds—never! Then he wrestled with me, and his death became necessary to insure my life.'

"It is years ago," said the Italian lady, "but I never shall forget my strange and terrible joy in my revenge.

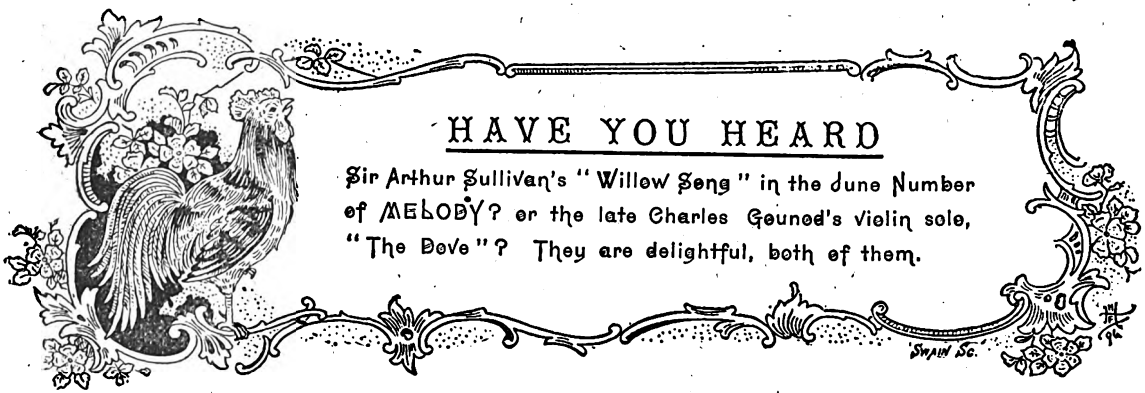
"The people cheered me in the streets. My story was told by the 'improvisatores,' and sung by the singers in the streets.

"It was a nine days' wonder. I wept, I laughed, I thanked Heaven.

"I was not seventeen but I had carried a vendetta to its bitter end.

"Since then," the signora said softly, "other things have come to me—love, a husband, children. I am more tender, perhaps not so determined, not so sure of my own instincts. Like all other people, I reason more, and have less faith in feeling. Still, I have never been sorry for what I did. I shall always feel that I was right in avenging my father's murder as though I had been a son."

MADGE MORRIS.



Digitized by Google

CARELESS LOVE.

THAT Jack Morrow had the finest ranch in all Texas everybody in those parts, from Paint Rock to San Angelo, firmly believed. That Jack Morrow was a perfect "fury" when aroused, everybody also knew. He was tall, dark and twenty-eight, and he went to Austin and took to himself a wife. This was the cause of all his trouble, as it has been that of many other men.

Rose Shannon was as pretty as the flower she was named after, and had long been a belle of Austin. Why she had married the tall, dark English man, rich in horses and cattle, when he came courting, she could not tell; but marry him she did, and into the San Angelo country she went to keep his big house on the Couché River.

It was all novel for the city girl away up there in central Texas. The long rides across the flat prairie with the attentive but somewhat silent husband, the glories of the new big house, with its balconies and stately rooms; the grand piano in the parlour, the army of servants at beck and call; all these things were new to the young wife, and time passed pleasantly for a while. Then little by little the long flat prairie, gay with flowers, became more tiresome to her eyes; little by little the rides grew tiresome, too. She got angry with herself, the country, her husband, and everybody else.

But Jack Morrow hated the city, moreover it was a long distance from his home. He had the best in Texas and the prettiest wife. He frowned down all her petulant little hints for a visit back to Austin, and the little bride, who thought a while ago that she was happy, sulked and held a half wish in her heart for another fellow.

One day the other fellow came to San Rosa. He was third or fourth cousin to Jack's wife, and if she had chosen to write to him of late, it was all in the family, and Jack took no notice.

Dick Thorn was twenty-two; he was good looking, accomplished, and as thorough-paced a young scamp as ever played poker in Austin or took the place of better men in women's hearts in all Texas.

Under Dick's auspices life began anew at San Rosa ranch. He gathered the country side at balls at the big house, played sentimental songs on the guitar, and beat Jack Morrow himself at poker and at a horse race on the big track Jack had on the ranch.

Maybe Jack Morrow left them too much alone; maybe it was just the inward evil in a wife well loved and a friend too kindly treated.

Anyway, it started—just as many other things do that end seriously—in fun first, and then sped swiftly from jest to earnest.

Dick had been playing the courtly kinsman. It was "Ma belle cousine," and a stately kiss upon the finger-tips at first. Things do not generally stay where they are started. It was "dear coz" now, and the kiss had reached the lips. The serio-comic salute upon the hand had been given in Jack's presence. The present plan was, somehow, postponed until Jack was going out among his men and cattle. Not that there was any harm in it, oh, no!

About this time someone had written a song. It was a good song, too, and Dick sang it. Perhaps it was this song that was the cause of it all—who knows?

He was singing one moonlight night, seated at the piano, and the two were alone. Rose was standing beside him turning the music, not that it was necessary, however, because it wasn't the song Dick was singing, and, if it had been, Dick had a way of throwing in extemporaneous verses of his own that were neat in their way, but generally foreign to the text, and made the music turning rather unnecessary.

It was the new song Dick was singing, and singing as only he could sing. It was the wail of some lone maiden who had loved and lost, and Dick was throwing a tenderness into the strain hardly its own.

> Careless love, careless love,
> 'Tis careless love like thine,
> That has broken the heart of many a girl,
> And has broken this poor heart of mine.

The hand turning the music trembled. Dick looked up. There was no reason why Jack Morrow's wife should have tears in her eyes.

"Rose," he whispered, "do you mean it?"

"Oh, Dick, Dick, your love is careless love."

"Not for you, Rose. I loved you before this man you married—carried you away."

* * * * *

This was the beginning of days that better for all had they never been.

Dick seldom rode about with Jack from that day. The song of "Careless Love" he sang no more. And so the summer sped.

* * * * *

When Dick Thorn went back to Austin, Jack rode to San Angelo, the nearest station, with him, and bade him good-bye with a smile.

"Come again, old fellow," he said. "You don't know how gay you've made San Rosa. We'll miss you much, and the place will be dull without you."

This was a long speech for Jack, and Dick replied in kind, and muttered, "the fool," as he waved his hat to him farewell.

* * * * *

Austin is a long way from the San Angelo country, and the post comes but once a week to San Rosa ranch. Yet Dick Thorn wrote a letter every week, always to Mrs. Jack, who handed the letters to her husband. They were calm and cousinly letters, and Jack liked to read them.

There might have been two letters in each, and Jack saw but one that was intended for his eyes, or if this was not always so, it was once—but that comes later.

A man named Adams had a ranch up the Couché, near Big Springs. He had tried Texas and cattle raising, and he did not like it. He wrote to Jack, saying he would like to sell his cattle, and Jack thought it would be a good investment, so he decided to go to Big Springs and see Adams, a journey of two weeks.

It was about this time that Dick Thorn had assented to Jack's invitation in each letter that his wife wrote, to come again to San Rosa. "He'll stir things up, sweetheart," said Jack.

So Dick was coming, and Jack was afraid that if he went to Big Springs, Dick might come without his having the pleasure of meeting him himself at the station, and riding with him home. However, Dick's last letter said he would not come for three weeks, and Jack decided to go to Big Springs, and see Adams.

Digitized by Google

He was booted and spurred, waiting in the hall to kiss his wife good-bye before he set out, when he espied the end of a letter sticking out of a book on the hall table.

"It's Dick's letter," he thought. "I saw Rose reading it and put it in here when she saw me coming, and then she ran upstairs." And for something to do while waiting, he pulled it out to read it over again, especially that part that read about "that fine old fellow, Jack." However, this letter did not read that way:

DARLING ROSE,—You say "the fool" is going to Big Springs, Wednesday next. Well, I leave here for San Rosa, Friday, then, and we can have things all by ourselves until he gets back. It will be easy to explain to him why I came sooner than I said in that letter which I always inclose as a blind for "dear hubby." I'll have a surprise for you, a big one. Be sure to get him to go, so nothing will be awkward if he should be at the ranch when I turn up three weeks ahead of time. I miss you so much, but wait till we meet again and the happy days of last summer will be renewed. Your own true love, JACK.

If any man had struck Jack Morrow in the face, if any man had wantonly insulted him to the teeth with the foulest epithets that human tongue could form, such an expression of hate could never have come to Jack's face, as was brought there by these few marks of ink and paper.

He saw it all—many trifles that he had not noticed at the last visit of Dick Thorn came back with confirmation strong as proof of holy writ.

With a calmness that he wondered at himself, he smoothed the crumpled letter and placed it back in the book. Already the wild resolve to blot out with blood the stain upon his honour, flashed through his brain. He had been wronged most cruelly, his vengeance would be full and ample, and it lay in one word: "Death!" From that moment Jack Morrow was insane—insane, but with the madman's cunning that plans a purpose and carries it to the end.

He kissed his wife good-bye; he laughed as he did so, and he rode away, pale and haggard. Mrs. Jack noticed how aged and grim he looked, and even simpered at the thought that his long journey might be fatal to him, for did he not look ill? And if she was a widow, why Dick—but pshaw, there was no such good luck.

It was Dick, Dick all day. She even opened the piano that had been shut long. She thought of the night Dick had sat there while the glorious Texas moonlight streamed through the window.

Half unconscious of what she did, she played the song of that night:

Careless love, careless love,
'Tis a careless love like thine,
That has broken the heart of many a girl,
And has broken this poor heart of mine.

Why did she shiver? A false note, like the wail of a lost soul, shuddered through the room. It was dark there. She called loudly for a light, and when the old negro woman brought it, she laughed at herself and wondered why she had been afraid.

Sunday night at last; Dick was coming. Since Friday one of the negro boys had been at the station at San Angelo with saddle-horses.

There was to be a big frolic among the darkies at the quarters, half-way across the ranch, and all the house servants had been given permission to go. It was a little lonely she thought, with a grim little smile, of the husband far away on his weary ride to Adam's ranch.

At San Angelo Dick Thorn hurriedly gave directions for the sending of his traps on, when the afternoon train left him at the station.

On horseback then, and the swift ride to the ranch began. It would be after dark when the ranch would be reached. But there would be a moon, and Dick ran his hand over the guitar strapped to his saddle. This was the surprise he wrote to Rose about. He would send the boy away to the frolic—he knew all about it—and silently gliding up to the house, would serenade Rose like a troubadour of old, and, climbing up the balcony, claim his reward—a kiss. Rather a silly idea, but silly women like silly ways, and none knew this better than Dick Thorn.

At nine o'clock the moon hung like a burnished shield on the walls of heaven; its rays poured down in hazy lines as light clouds crossed its glory; and on and on Dick Thorn rode to San Rosa ranch while the same moon looked down on the just and unjust. Ten o'clock; San Rosa reached at last.

The boy turns the horses into the corral and scampers away across to the quarters, and Dick Thorn glides likes a shadow to the house; it is all dark. The moon, that throws its angles into black lines of shade, makes it seem a house of shadows, dark as death.

The guitar is unslung from the shoulder, the quick fingers touch the strings. Beneath her window the soft tinkle of its tuneful strains arises:

Far off, far off, the river creeps
The stars shine down above;
All nature still a silence keeps,
The night was made for love.

The soft breeze stirs the sleeping flowers,
That tremble with the dew;
They wake but in the sunny hours,
Love lives the whole night through.

The frost will chain the river's flow,
The flowers die at its breath;
Nor frost, nor snow stay love, I know,
For love lives on, past death.

Dick's voice broke with emotion at the last word, "death." But he laughed aloud as a rose fell from the balcony and struck his arm—a rose as white as snow! Dick picked it up and stuck it in his coat. One hand touched the balcony post, the other followed, and Dick climbed up to claim the kiss the rose invited.

He reached the top, and threw himself across the rail. His foot touched something soft; he looked down—it was a bunch of flowers in a dead woman's hand, and the dead woman was Rose Morrow.

Love was stronger than death, he had sung; his fear was stronger than his love. Yet despite this, and the loud beating of his heart, was the desire to fly with a cry from this thing of horror—a woman in white, cold and still, with that gash across the throat!

"Rose, Rose!" he cried. "Oh, God, who has done this thing?"

"I!" A dark form stood beside him. "You played well; your sentimental song was not inappropriate. But come, the lover with his lute seems frightened at the way his mistress greets him." Then in sudden fury: "I tell you she lay dead, even while your silly song floated up to where she and I, the false dead woman and the husband who killed her, awaited you. A rose fell from her hand as if she threw it and struck you as it fell. It makes a fair mark on your breast. Take that, you dog!" and Jack Morrow's knife clove the rose the dead had given and the false, frightened heart that beat beneath it.

T. S.

Digitized by Google

RESULT OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM COMPETITION.

BELOW are published the solutions to the problems set in THE BRAIN GYMNASIUM in Short Stories dated May 16th. A large number of competitors succeeded in getting all but one or two correct, most of them stumbling over No. 14. The prizes have gone to Mr. George D. Taylor, 28, Ernest Street, Rhyl; and Mr. J. H Tripney, 50, Coniger Road, Fulham, S.W., Gold-plated pencil-cases have been sent as consolation prizes to the fifty competitors whose attempts the Editor considered sufficiently meritorious.

KEY No. 11.

(a) D—rain.
(b) R—ice.
(c) S—light.
(d) B—lock.
(e) D—rabble.
(f) T—hump (or B—low).

KEY No. 12.

S	O	N	G
J	U	G	S
M	O	P	E
W	A	S	P
[illegible]	A	L	E
M	E	N	D
T	A	U	L
[illegible]	E	U	D
[illegible]	A	N	E
G	U	S	T
[illegible]	N	A	T
P	R	A	Y
Y	O	K	E

KEY No. 13.

B in D
R oa R
A ri A
G li B

KEY No. 14.

Assuming that the Editor works 24 hours a day for 365 days in the year, that he takes as long to carry the odd ten copies as a full quire, and that leap years are taken into consideration, the answer is 60 years, 31 weeks, 5 days, 13 hours, 46 minutes.

KEY No. 15.

I deprecate and imprecate the folly
Of giving wedding presents all the while,
The plan has caused a settled melancholy
To brood where once there was a pleasing smile.

My friends, it seems, are always getting married,
Their weddings to my sovereigns few give wings.
My vacant purse too long the load has carried
Of buying for them pretty, useless things.

KEY No. 16.

M annerin G
I mped E
D id O
D isaste R
L o G
E ducat E
M enageri E
A dmira L
R abb I
C ame O
H amle T

KEY No. 17.

The word of which the letters may be transposed the greatest number of times on pages 511 and 512, is LIMES, on page 512, column 2, line 5.

LIMES.—Smile, miles, slime, misle, Selim.

Among the most popular words sent in by competitors were:

STOP.—Tops, pots, post, spot.
NAME.—Mean, mane, mena, Amen.
REINS.—Rinse, sirea, risen, resin.
RATES.—Aster, tares, tears, stare.

KEY No. 18.

Pencil-makers.

KEY No. 19.

The anagrams were not at all distinguished for their brilliancy. Among the best sent in were:

1. Grand! Do let men hear.
2. Rich Tom Holt eats fried lentils.
3. A two weeks' leave.
4. Serfs should hope.
5. Oh, vote for Hale.

KEY No. 20.

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10
D	E	V	O	N	S	H	I	R	E.

1. Done. 2. Shed. 3. Hire. 4. Shin. 5. Dove. 6. Shone. 7. Rode. 8. Render. 9. Hone. 10. Even.

PICTURE ✣ PUZZLE ✣ PRIZE.

No. 7.

£10 TO BE GIVEN AWAY.

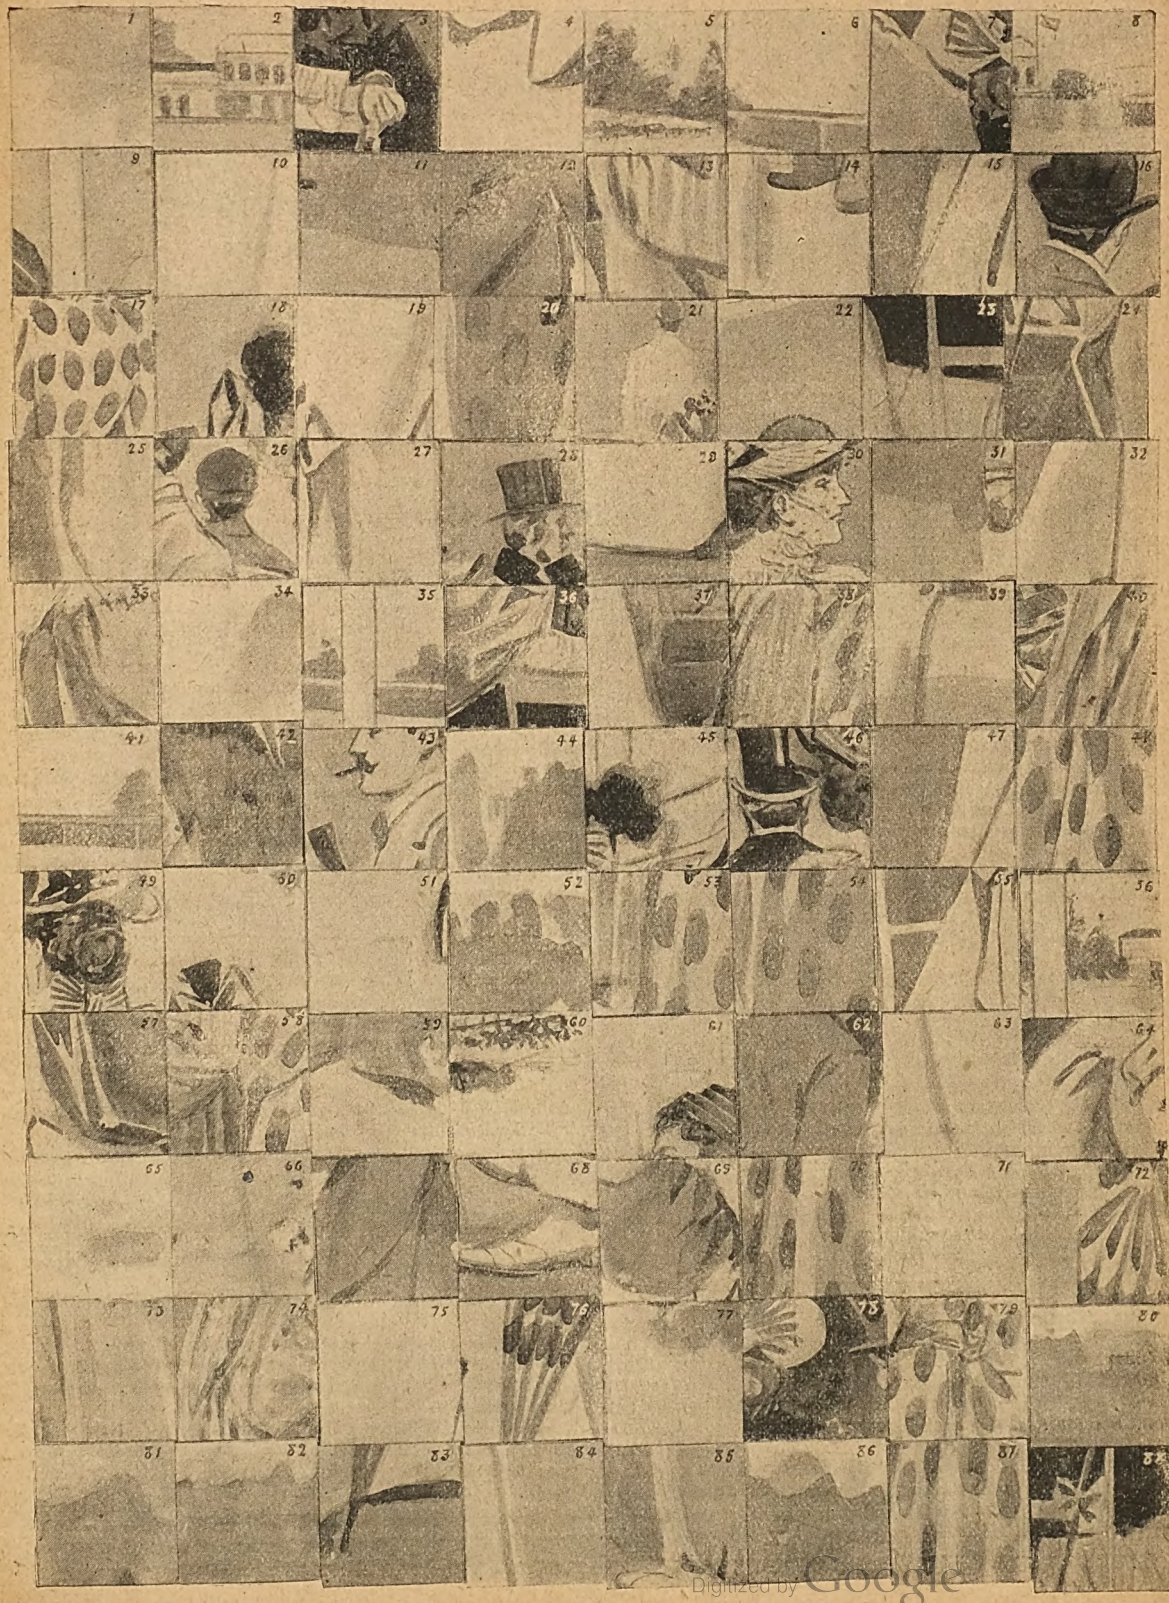
On the opposite page is a puzzle picture composed of 88 squares. If these squares be rearranged in a certain order they will form a real picture.

We offer a prize of £10 for the correct solution. In order to give readers in all parts of the United Kingdom as equal a chance as possible, none of the solutions received will be opened until Thursday, June 4th, when all those received will be considered together. In the event of two or more correct solutions being included up to this time, the prize will either be given to the sender of the neatest one, or will be divided amongst the correct competitors at the discretion of the Editor. Consolation Prizes will also be awarded.

If no correct solution be received on or before Tuesday, June 9th, 1896, the Ten-Pound Prize will be given to the sender of the solution then to hand which is most nearly correct.

Pictures should be packed flat or folded, not rolled, and the outside wrapper must be marked "Puzzle Number 7."

Digitized by Google



Digitized by Google

AN INDIAN DRUG.

BY HUAN MEE,

Author of "The Czar's Diamond," "In Masquerade," "Alan Lindow's Wife," "Philip St. Voulle's Understudy," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

ESTLIN GODFRY brings from India three bottles of deadly poison, with which his friend, Walter Shenfield, a chemist, experiments on a rabbit. Estlin's uncle, Joseph Monro, is about to marry Ethel Sedwicke, and should he do so, Estlin will no longer come into the estate. On the wedding morning, Monro is found dead in his room. Estlin goes to London and consults an old friend, Sidney Larrance.

CHAPTER IV.

SUSPECTED.

SIDNEY LARRANCE puts himself to an enormous amount of trouble to secure a vacant carriage in the train, and then, locking the door with a railway key which he takes from his pocket, rolls himself up in his rug, and lighting a cigar, gazes reflectively out of the window, while Estlin Godfry waits with ill-concealed impatience for him to enlighten him as to his thoughts.

For ten minutes not a word is spoken, and then with a sigh Larrance turns towards his companion.

"It's no use," he says, "I must know more of the details. I cannot make head or tail of it; let us talk of something else."

To decide to talk of other things is simple, but to do so is impossible, and they drift back to the same channel again before they are aware of it.

At last Sidney Larrance leans forward, and placing his hand upon his companion's shoulder, gravely speaks.

"Estlin, I am about to say something to you which will be a greater blow than all that has gone before, bear it like a man and understand that whatever I do it is in your best interests, to prepare you for a blow which would come with devastating violence if you had no previous thought of it."

"Prepare me for a blow!" Estlin gasps; "something more terrible than what has occurred—I cannot understand you!"

"When a man dies suddenly, mysteriously, dies from poison, one has to consider why that poison was administered. Suicide, murder or misadventure."

"Yes—but——"

"Wait, look the matter fairly in the face with me. Suicide we may put out of the question. A man who has no insanity in his blood does not choose the morning of his wedding to commit self destruction, and even if he does he leaves some sign, perhaps a phial in which the poison has been, and, nine cases out of ten, some word to those he leaves behind."

"Well?" Estlin hoarsely ejaculates.

"We will not, then, consider suicide. Now murder, what of that? To explain a murder one must look to revenge or some other strong motive. Forgive the suggestion but perchance the lady who was to have married your uncle may be able to give a clue. Had she as far as you are aware any previous history, say an entanglement, which might indirectly have caused her to commit the deed, or influenced say a discarded lover to take so violent a step?"

"No, no, Larrance, you are no nearer the solution. They were devoted to each other. She has lived her whole life in this part of the country, and my uncle was the only man who had ever attracted her. I can swear to it on my life."

"Well, I accept the position. Dismiss her from the question. She has nothing to gain by your uncle's death and all to lose."

"She loses everything; his new will, of course, could not be signed until after the ceremony."

"Then the whole estate by the old will, which now holds good, will come to you?"

"It comes to me by law, but I know his wishes by the unsigned——"

"One moment. Now as far as you know, is there anyone who will benefit from the fact that this later will is so much waste paper?"

"Not a soul."

Sidney Larrance occupies a moment in lighting a fresh cigar, then suddenly, and speaking quickly, almost harshly, resumes the conversation.

"Think again, Estlin Godfry, think again. Look at the case not from the point of view of your own personality, look at it as an outsider will look at it who reads the evidence of to-morrow's inquest. Who is the gainer by your uncle's untimely death?"

For a moment Estlin Godfry returns the steady gaze of his friend with one of amazement, and then there spreads over his face a crimson flame, which, fading, leaves him haggard and deathly. He clutches the side of his seat and tries to rise, and the arm of his companion is around his shoulders, as with the other hand he forces the cup of a drinking flask between his teeth.

"Drink it, man, drink it; thank heaven that part of my duty is over."

"But you, Larrance, you, surely do not imagine——"

"Of course I do not, and that is what made it so difficult for me to force you to see it in the light that all the world will to-morrow."

Estlin Godfrey stares blankly out of the window in utter bewilderment, and Larrance continues deliberately to put the whole crushing truth before him. Better, he feels, to hammer everything well home now, than to let him torture himself to madness as his own mind suggests the damning facts heaped up against him.

"By your uncle's first and now legal will you are his heir

Digitized by Google

at law," he continues. "Had he married, and then died, the old will would have become void by the English law, and his wife would have taken her proportion of the estate. Had he married, signed the new will and then died, the old will would of course, have become void, and——"

"I know, I know."

"Therefore you, Estlin Godfry, are his legal heir."

"Go on, go on; torture me to madness."

Sidney Larrance hesitates for a moment, bites his lip, and then gives the screw its final turn, "and you, Estlin Godfry, are therefore the only man who gains a single atom from his death."

"Then you assume that I murdered him," Godfry yells. "I did well to consult you. Curse you with your deliberate piling up of hypotheses. I would not trust a cur to your mercy," he breaks off with a hysterical laugh and then continues: "You have tried me in your egotistical judgment, Sidney Larrance, it only remains for you to don the black cap and sentence the unhappy prisoner to be hanged."

"It only remains for you to leave off being a fool, and listen to common sense," Larrance soothingly replies. "In discussing the second theory I have simply put before you the true position which you will occupy in the minds of the public to-morrow. If this blow had come in the open court, would it not have been a thousand times worse than from the lips of a man, a friend, who will not even break the thread of his learned discourse to trouble to tell you, what you know so well yourself, that you had nothing on earth to do with your uncle's death?"

"Therefore you, Estlin Godfry, are his legal heir."

Mr. Sidney Larrance's discourse does not however proceed smoothly, for, for a moment or two, there are earnest handshakes and profusions of apologies from his companion before he can recommence.

"To resume," he says at last, "we must look for the motive. We are satisfied that he did not commit suicide, we feel equally satisfied that he was not murdered—and yet perchance he had an enemy of whom you knew nothing, who chose the ripest moment for the deed. I must see everyone who can give me the least information. My intuition is at fault, let me endeavour to use the brains a prodigal Providence has bestowed upon me. I must see the lady who was to have been your uncle's wife."

"You cannot suspect——"

"Suspect no, but I certainly have an idea——"

What Sidney Larrance's idea was Estlin never knew; the train drew up with a jerk, the current of his thoughts was disturbed and together they alighted and walked along the deserted road into the town.

Estlin Godfry leaves Larrance that night deeply impressed by the seriousness of the position in which he is placed, but comforted by the thought that he has at least one man upon his side who will move heaven and earth to clear away the gloom that enshrouds him.

Suddenly there dawns upon him the remembrance of his actions on the very day before his uncle met his death. That Indian poison! Could it be possible in any way that his uncle had tasted the deadly drug from those curiously ornamented bottles—but no, it was absurd. Shenfield had them. He had two bottles, and the contents of the other one had been spilt. No, it was impossible that anyone could have touched it. Yet his uncle had died so suddenly, had been poisoned, and he, it would be known to-morrow, he had brought poison home with him from India. A fatal drug, instantaneous in its effects.

A cold sweat breaks out upon his brow as he realises that deadly circumstantial evidence is piling up against him, sufficient to brand him the blackest scoundrel, the most ungrateful villain that had ever trod the earth. So he passes the night, walking again and again the floor of his room, and ever searching for the key to the impenetrable mystery.

Sidney Larrance utilises the early morning of the day of the inquest in taking the first steps towards his inquiry. A glance at the windows of the study of the deceased man is sufficient to prove that access from without is impossible; a few words with one of the townsmen, staring open-mouthed at the house, places beyond all doubt the fact that the servants themselves are absolutely beyond suspicion. All natives of the town, they were too well satisfied with their easy position in a bachelor's household to wish for any change; and then he strolls through the town towards the house of the lady who was to have been the bride of him who is dead. He cannot settle for himself whether he ought not to risk everything and make an effort to see her and discover what light she can throw upon the mystery. He halts beside the house. Early though it is, a doctor's carriage is before the door, and a servant is standing by the gate.

"She hasn't been conscious for an hour together since that day," he hears the girl say. "Oh, what a horrible fate!"

What need to follow up such a clue. He turns reflectively away; his intuition is blind to lead him towards a key to the mystery, but not so dead as not to assure him that nothing in the shape of light can be thrown upon the subject by the woman, who has lost all by the crime, and now lingers between life and death. He walks towards the Court where the inquiry is to be held and joins the crowd already assembled and discussing with extreme excitement and appreciation the latest horror. It is as he, admirable student of human nature, had imagined. Estlin Godfry is already tried, sentenced, and condemned in the impartial court of public opinion.

Digitized by Google

"She hasn't been conscious for an hour together."

Of course he did it. It was obvious. If his uncle had married he would have lost all. He was a scoundrel with a fair face and dandified air, but a scoundrel all the same. But of course they all knew about it. One law for the rich and another for the poor. He'd get off right enough. What was that story a year or two ago, when Estlin Godfry was sent to India? Ah, that was a strange affair. Some theatrical girl. Oh! it was a bad business.

And so they gossip and gloat over the coming feast till the doors are thrown open, and they madly rush and fight for a seat to get a fair view of this latest free show in Maythorn.

CHAPTER V.

The Inquest.

At ten a.m. Mr. Coroner Rogers opened the inquest upon the body of Joseph Monro of Merton House, Maythorn. In addressing the jury he said:

"Gentlemen, you are already aware of the sad circumstance which has necessitated summoning you together today to inquire into the cause of the death of our well-known and respected townsman, Mr. Joseph Monro, of Merton House.

"The unfortunate event occurred under the most distressing circumstances, which were rendered all the more painful from the day being the occasion fixed for the wedding of Mr. Monro with Miss Ethel Sedwicke, to whom, I am sure, the jury will join with me in respectfully conveying our sincere and heartfelt sympathy in her bereavement. The circumstances of the death of Mr. Monro appear to be shrouded in dense mystery, and it will be your duty, gentlemen, by an impartial review of the evidence to be laid before you to decide whether the sad event is to be attributed to the hand of the deceased himself, or whether there is anyone who could from revenge or other motive have had any design upon his life.

"It seems beyond reason to suppose that Mr. Monro could have had any cause to take his own life. He was in a position that gave him no financial anxiety, his health was excellent, and he was not known to have a single enemy. Less than an hour after the time of the sad occurrence he was to have been married, amid the congratulations of his friends, to an amiable and accomplished lady. Gentlemen, with almost the sound of the joy bells ringing in his ears, with the acclamations of his friends showering upon him, the hand of death closed down, and those who were bidden guests to a festival came only to a house of mourning and of grief.

"It will be your duty to sift every possible atom of evidence to the bottom, and not to overlook any shred that may tend to throw light upon this terrible mystery. Whatever conclusion, gentlemen, a calm and careful revision of the whole of the evidence laid before you may result in, it will be for you to declare your verdict accordingly, whether it be one of suicide, or death by misadventure, or whether it be one of wilful murder."

The address of the Coroner was listened to in breathless and sympathetic silence by the crowded court, and then the first witness, Dr. Hill, was called.

The Coroner: "Will you tell the jury, Doctor Hill, the condition in which you found the deceased?"

Dr. Hill: "As an old friend of Mr. Monro's I was invited to be best man at his wedding, and on arriving at the house an hour before the time fixed for the ceremony, was asked by Mr. Monro if I would, later in the day, together with Mr. Grindley, witness the will that he had drawn up for his signature. I consented. While we were awaiting the carriages Mr. Monro retired to his study, having requested his nephew, Mr. Estlin Godfry, to follow him. In a short time Mr. Godfry returned to us, stating that Mr. Monro was busy writing a couple of letters that he had forgotten, and that if we would go to his room in five minutes he would like to take a glass of wine with us before starting. Mr. Grindley and I proceeded to the study a few minutes after, and found Mr. Monro sitting at his writing-table with his head resting upon his hand. I thought at first that he had fallen asleep or had fainted. I tried his pulse, but it showed no sign of life, and upon raising him, he fell back inert. I loosened his collar and tie, and applied my stethoscope to his heart, but there was no pulsation. He was stone dead."

The Coroner: "Did you apply restoratives?"

Dr. Hill: "Yes, I used every endeavour to restore animation although from the first I perceived it was useless."

The Coroner: "You have held a post-mortem examination?"

Dr. Hill: "Yes, I discovered that the death was due to poison, the whole of the organs of the body were in a normal state, and the heart and lungs were perfectly healthy."

The Coroner: "Were you able to discover the poison that had been used?"

Dr. Hill: "No, sir; it must have been a very powerful poison, but I cannot tell what. I should say that death had been instantaneous and painless."

Digitized by Google

A Juryman: "Did you notice any glass or bottle which could have contained the poison?"

Dr. Hill: "No, there was nothing upon the study table beyond a decanter of sherry—which I have analysed and found perfectly free from any poison—several empty wine glasses, and the two letters written and ready for the post, which he had intimated to Mr. Godfry he intended writing. The open will awaiting signature was also there."

The Coroner: "Could the poison have been taken in the form of a capsule?"

Dr. Hill: "I should think not, as there was nothing poisonous found in the stomach; it appeared to have been a poison that paralysed the whole system the instant it touched the tongue."

The Coroner: "You have never known a similar case in your experience?"

Dr. Hill: "No, sir."

The Coroner: "Or read of any such?"

Dr. Hill: "Not in England."

The Coroner: "Elsewhere?"

Dr. Hill: "I have read stories of Eastern poisons having these deadly effects, but they are unknown to us."

A Juryman: "You are quite certain that the condition of things you discovered could only have been brought about by some such poison?"

Dr. Hill: "Quite."

The Coroner: "There were no indications of heart disease or paralysis, nothing to cause death except the drug?"

Dr. Hill: "Nothing."

Mr. Grindley corroborated the evidence of Dr. Hill as to the condition in which Mr. Monro was found. There was no reason for Mr. Monro to take his own life that he was aware of. He had enjoyed the confidence of Mr. Monro and his personal friendship. He had acted as solicitor for him for twenty years. There were no financial embarrassments whatever in the deceased gentleman's affairs. He drew up the will that was lying upon the table in the study. That will left an annuity of £1,000 a year to Mr. Estlin Godfry, and the remainder of the property was exclusively and without restriction left to Mrs. Monro.

The letters found upon the table were then opened by the Coroner and read, but threw no further light upon the case, the one having relation only to some jewellery he wished forwarded to Windermere, where the honeymoon was to be spent, to arrive on the 30th August, Mrs. Monro's birthday, and the other to a personal friend absent in Scotland, thanking him for a congratulatory letter received that morning.

Estlin Godfry was then called and examined.

The Coroner: "You were the last person to see your uncle alive?"

Estlin: "Yes, I saw him not more than five minutes before he was found dead, when I went to his study at his own request."

The Coroner: "For what object?"

Estlin: "He desired to discuss some private financial matters with me."

The Coroner: "In regard to what?"

Estlin: "Chiefly in regard to his will. He told me that by the will, a copy of which was lying upon the table, he had left me the sum of £1,000 a year and that the rest of his property went absolutely to his wife."

The Coroner: "He didn't seem to you to be unwell, or suffering from any depression of spirits?"

Estlin: "No, never seemed better in his life."

The Coroner: "He didn't give you the impression of a man likely to take his own life?"

Estlin: "Certainly not."

The Coroner: "You were, I believe, on the best of terms with your uncle; your relations were cordial and friendly?"

Estlin: "Yes, sir."

The Coroner: "This proposed wedding had not proved a cause of estrangement?"

Estlin: "No, sir, my uncle had informed me that it would make no difference in the household and that I should be regarded as I had always been—his adopted son."

The Coroner: "Are you aware whether your uncle had any poison in his possession?"

Estlin: "I don't know."

The Coroner: "Was he a good sleeper?"

Estlin: "Fairly."

The Coroner: "Was he troubled with insomnia?"

Estlin: "Very occasionally, once or twice lately, he had not slept as well as usual, and in the course of conversation asked me if I knew of any harmless drug that would induce sleep."

The Coroner: "Did you recommend him anything?"

Estlin: "No, sir."

A Juryman: "Why should he ask you instead of his medical attendant?"

Estlin: "Perhaps because he thought I might have heard of something in my travels."

The Coroner: "You have travelled a great deal?"

Estlin: "I have been in India nearly two years."

The Coroner: "Have you any acquaintance with Indian drugs?"

Estlin: "Very little; I believe they have curious properties, but I have never tried them."

The Coroner: "Did you bring any specimens to England that your uncle by chance might have got possession of, and taken either accidentally or with intent?"

Estlin: "I did bring home some drugs, but my uncle could not have got possession of them."

The Coroner: "Why?"

Estlin: "Because the night before I took them away from the house."

The Coroner: "Why?"

Estlin: "To show to a friend."

The Coroner: "A scientific friend?"

Estlin: "Yes."

The Coroner: "Will you be good enough to tell the jury his name?"

Estlin: "It was Walter Shenfield."

The Coroner: "Thank you, that will do. Call Walter Shenfield."

The Coroner: "Well, Mr. Shenfield, you have generally supplied the late Mr. Monro with whatever drugs or toilet requisites he has used?"

Walter Shenfield: "Yes, sir."

The Coroner: "Have you sold him any poisons?"

Walter Shenfield: "Never to my recollection."

The Coroner: "If you had done so, you would have entered the record of the sale in your 'poisons book'?"

Walter Shenfield: "Undoubtedly, sir."

The Coroner: "You have that book here?"

Walter Shenfield: "Yes, sir."

The Coroner: "Is there any entry of ever having supplied Mr. Monro with poisons?"

The witness turned over the few written pages of the book—there were not many entries—and then replied in the negative.

The Coroner: "You know something of poisons and their action, of course?"

Walter Shenfield: "Yes, sir, I have made a special study of the matter."

The Coroner: "Why?"

Walter Shenfield: "Merely a hobby. It interests me."

The Coroner: "Indeed. You have heard no doubt the manner in which the deceased gentlemen was found. Have you ever had any experience of a similar case?"

Walter Shenfield: "No, sir."

The Coroner: "Estlin Godfry told us in his evidence just now, that the evening before the day fixed for the wedding of the deceased, he brought down to you several bottles of drugs."

Walter Shenfield: "Yes."

The Coroner: "Why did he do so?"

Digitized by Google

Walter Shenfield: "I do not know."
The Coroner: "Did he mention the nature and property of the drugs?"
Walter Shenfield: "He said he had been told they were deadly."
The Coroner: "How many bottles did he bring?"
Walter Shenfield: "Three."
The Coroner: "You have them still?"
Walter Shenfield: "Yes—that is, two of them."
The Coroner: "Two, what became of the third?"
Walter Shenfield: "It was opened by myself, and the contents accidentally spilled."
The Coroner: "Why did you open it?"
Walter Shenfield: "To test it."
The Coroner: "How?"
Walter Shenfield: "By giving an infinitesimal dose to a rabbit."
The Coroner: "Who suggested this?"
Walter Shenfield: "Mr. Godfry."
The Coroner: "What was the result?"
Walter Shenfield: "The animal died instantly." (Sensation in Court.)
The Coroner: "How was the poison spilled?"
Walter Shenfield: "In its dying convulsion the animal knocked the bottle over."
The Coroner: "Where was this?"
Walter Shenfield: "In my shop, on the counter."
The Coroner: "When?"
Walter Shenfield: "Tuesday night last."
The Coroner: "What was the time?"
Walter Shenfield: "Ten minutes to ten."

"The animal died instantly."

The Coroner: "Had you closed your shop?"
Walter Shenfield: "Yes."
The Coroner: "Your usual closing time is ten, is it not?"
Walter Shenfield: "Yes."
The Coroner: "You closed earlier than usual that night?"
Walter Shenfield: "Yes, ten minutes."
The Coroner: "Why?"
Walter Shenfield: "Because business was quiet, and I wanted a chat with Mr. Godfry, who suggested I might as well shut the shop."
The Coroner: "You have known Mr. Godfry a long time?"
Walter Shenfield: "Yes, many years."
The Coroner: "What became of the bottle that was upset?"
Walter Shenfield: "I destroyed it together with the paper with which I soaked up the spilt fluid."
The Coroner: "Had the bottle been opened before?"
Walter Shenfield: "No, sir."
The Coroner: "You are sure of that?"
Walter Shenfield: "Absolutely."
A Juryman: "How do you know?"
Walter Shenfield: "Because the skin covering the cork was intact, and the bottle was full."
The Coroner: "You have the other two bottles?"
Walter Shenfield: "Yes, safe under lock and key."
The Coroner: "Can you swear that Mr. Godfry only brought those three bottles home from India?"
Walter Shenfield: "No."
The Coroner: "Can you prove that he had no more?"
Walter Shenfield: "No, sir."
The Coroner: "You cannot give any reason why Mr. Godfry should bring these three bottles to you?"
Walter Shenfield: "None, unless it was that as a chemist I should naturally be interested."
The Coroner: "Have you sold any drugs or articles to the late Mr. Monro recently."
Walter Shenfield: "Yes, on Wednesday morning I sold him a bottle of Eau de Cologne."
The Coroner: "On Wednesday morning last?"
Walter Shenfield: "Yes, sir."
The Coroner: "That was on the day of the wedding."
Walter Shenfield: "Yes, sir."
The Coroner: "What time was that?"
Walter Shenfield: "Nine in the morning."
The Coroner: "Did you sell him nothing else?"
Walter Shenfield: "No, sir, nothing. I let him have half-a-dozen stamps, as he had not time to go down to the post-office—nothing more."
The Coroner: "He seemed in good health and spirits?"
Walter Shenfield: "Never better."
The Coroner: "Was he excited at all?"
Walter Shenfield: "A little, but not more than was to be expected under the circumstances."
The Coroner: "What circumstances?"
Walter Shenfield: "His wedding."
The Coroner: "Oh, of course."
A Juryman: "I suppose no mention was made by you of the visit over night of Mr. Godfry?"
Walter Shenfield: "No, there was no necessity."
The Coroner: "Did Mr. Monro enter into conversation with you that morning?"
Walter Shenfield: "Only a word or two in response to my congratulations."
The Coroner: "Did he mention his nephew?"
Walter Shenfield: "No, sir."
The Coroner: "Has Mr. Godfry ever discussed the question of poisons with you before?"
Walter Shenfield: "Yes, sir." (Sensation.)
The Coroner: "In what way?"
Walter Shenfield: "He has expressed wonder at my researches and experiments."
The Coroner: "In regard to poisons?"
Walter Shenfield: "Yes, sir."
The Coroner: "In what particular directions have your studies been?"
Walter Shenfield: "In the discovery of antidotes."
The Coroner: "Did Mr. Godfry know this?"
Walter Shenfield: "Yes."
The Coroner: "Was he interested in the study?"
Walter Shenfield: "Not very much; he did not seem to appreciate the utility of such discoveries."
The Coroner: "Why?"
Walter Shenfield: "I do not know."
The Coroner: "But you just said that he had discussed the matter with you."
Walter Shenfield: "Oh, only very slightly—nothing beyond saying that if a man wanted to commit suicide one might as well let him do so, and not bother about antidotes."

Digitized by Google

The Coroner: "He said suicide?"
Walter Shenfield: "Yes, sir."
Mr. Shenfield begins to look decidedly bewildered at the series of questions pointing directly to some connection between Mr. Godfry and the death of his uncle, and casts a furtive glance round the Court.
The Coroner: "Did you see Mr. Godfry on the day of the wedding?"
Walter Shenfield: "No, sir."
The Coroner: "Are you perfectly sure of that?"
Walter Shenfield: "Yes, sir."

"It looked black for Estlin Godfry."

The Corozer: "You have had no communication with him in regard to the bottles of poison you hold, since the sad occurrence?"
Walter Shenfield: "No, sir."
The Coroner: "That will do."
This concluded the evidence for the first day, and the Court was adjourned for a week.
There were not wanting wiseacres who sagely shook their heads as they discussed the evidence that night, and more than one sapient judge remarked that "It looked black for Estlin Godfry."

(To be continued.)

GUILTY GOLD

A Romance of Financial Fraud and City Crime.

By Headon Hill, Author of "Clues from a Detective's Camera," "Cabinet Secrets," "The Rajah's Second Wife," etc., etc.

Illustrated by Raymond Potter.

In handsome cloth binding, and with sixteen full-page illustrations, 6s.

VALDAR THE OFT-BORN

A Saga of Seven Ages.

By George Griffith, Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "Olga Romanoff; or, the Syren of the Skies," etc., etc.

In handsome cloth binding, and with sixteen full-page illustrations, 6s.

DO YOU WANT YOUR Photograph Enlarged?

Or possibly that of some much-beloved relative no longer with you?

In this case send the photograph, inclosing a postal order for 6s. 6d., to "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., not later than June 21st. If an acknowledgement is desired, an addressed postcard must be provided.

ALL PHOTOGRAPHS WILL BE RETURNED UNSOILED.

The following are letters which have been received in connection with these photographic enlargements:

Mr. E. J. Hallam, of 17, Godwin Road, Forest Gate, E., writes:

I beg to acknowledge with thanks the safe receipt of the enlargement of my child's photograph. I think it is only right that I should express my great satisfaction and admiration of the same. It is not only a marvellous likeness, but a really splendid production. Considering the small price you have charged, I must say I consider you have made a handsome gift to all those who availed themselves of your offer.

Mr. O. G. Quinn-Jones, writing from 2, St. Catherine's Terrace, Tenby, says:

I am exceedingly obliged to you for the very handsome enlargement of the portrait of my deceased brother, which I received this morning. It is, in fact, more lifelike than the original, and the most satisfactory work of the kind that I have ever met with.

Mr. W. G. R. Williams, Master Gunner, R.A., Dover Castle, writes:

I acknowledge with very much pleasure and an abundance of thanks, the magnificent pictures of my late father and mother, which came to hand safely on Friday last. They are "streets" beyond what I expected, being in every respect speaking likenesses. I have shown them to a number of friends who are unanimous in their praise.

Digitized by Google

The Brain Gymnasium

No. 5.—NEW SERIES.

TWO PRIZES OF A GUINEA EACH.

BELOW will be found the fifth batch of ten problems in the new series of The Brain Gymnasium. Two prizes of a Guinea each are offered weekly to those competitors who answer correctly the greatest number of these problems.

Consolation Prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

Rules:

1. All solutions to be written clearly on one sheet of paper.
2. Do not write the questions; simply put the numbers and the answer against each.
3. Each set to contain the £100 coupon (found on second page of cover) for the current week.
4. All attempts to be in by Monday, June 8th.
5. Mark your envelope "Gymnasium, Number 5."

(41.) The word forming the solution to this problem signifies "Examination." The figures indicate the relative positions of the letters contained in the word.

Example: CONSUME. 1, 2, 6, 7, spell "to arrive."

Problem:

1. 3, 5, 6, 7, spell "a party."
2. 10, 9, 7, spell "a negative."
3. 10, 5, 3, 7, spell "an abode."
4. 3, 5, 10, 7, spell "did send."
5. 10, 9, 7, 5, spell "a short letter."
6. 4, 5, 3, 7, spell "to plague."
7. 7, 1, 2, spell "a metal."
8. 3, 7, 9, 9, 4, spell "to bend down."
9. 4, 5, 10, 3, spell "writing implements."
10. 3, 9, 4, spell "to dip in liquor."

(42.) Charade.

My first is to exceed.
My second is granted.
My whole is remarkable for good properties.

(43.) If K=51½, L=½, M=2, P=37½, and Y=18½, what word on this page has the greatest numerical value?

Example: LAMPREY.

L = ½
M = 2
P = 37½
Y = 18½

58½

(44.) If a lady start on a tricycle from a given point and ride at the rate of eight miles an hour, how far will she have gone before she is caught up by a man riding a safety at an average speed of thirteen miles an hour, who starts thirty-three minutes after, and alights four times for refreshments, making an average stay of four minutes at each place?

(45). Word Square.

The words defined below, when placed one over the other, will read across and downwards alike:

1. To gather.
2. Otherwise.
3. Serpents of a poisonous kind.
4. A plague.

(46.) Acrostics.

The initials and finals read downwards and upwards spell "a subordinate."

1. To wallow.
2. Out of date.
3. A mediæval weapon.
4. The words of an opera.

The initials and finals spell "a government official."

1. A pirate.
2. A plant.
3. A form of competition.
4. Inhabitants of an island in the Indian Ocean.

(47.) The letters constituting the words which form the key to this problem are mixed up in even pairs of words commencing from the first.

Example: Tu abt ort pehapahe=But at the approach.

Problem:

Nhac denes wet lahy, esa h tootd seher, sin had den kane derti yesapec nik oto fan dully preach teadpeti fob tueay she liren.

(48.) Make an anagram out of the following sentence:
Grasped by Death.

(49.) The following paragraph appears in this number of Short Stories. What is it?

"Ax txe cxxxxxxxxxxt x pxxxxxxl ixxxxxxxxn wxs sxxxxxxxxt tx dxxxxxxxe txxs hxxxxxxxxxxxn. Wxxxxxt axxxxxxxxg axxxxxxxn x axxxe axd wxxt tx mx cxxxxxr. A dxxh ox cxxd wxxxr ox txe fxxxxxxd rxxxxxxd cxxm. Txe sxxxxxe dxxxxxxxxxd axd x rxxxxxxd sxxxxxg.

(50.) What word on this page contains the greatest number of vowels?

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to the

PEARSON POTTERY CO.

HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery. Thousands sold all over the world.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY CO., Hanley, STAFFS.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

ARE YOU FAT?

DR. GORDON'S Elegant Pills are the only Safe and Lasting Cure for Stoutness, Abdominal or General. State height, weight, and send 2/9, 4/6, or 11/- to Dr. Gordon, 24, Hart St., London, W.C.

READ! READ! READ!

Miss Roberts, "Brooklyn," Spotland Road, Rochdale, says: "I am 21in. round waist—before taking your Pills, 27in." Mrs. Cox, "Hazelhurst," Brondesbury Road, N.W.: "The last supply reduced me 14lb. in month without change of diet." P. Bendelow, 19, Dorset Street, Bolton: "Your Pills greatly reduced my weight." H. I. Cooper, 57, Somers Road, Southsea, says: "Your Pills reduced me 2 stones." Mrs. J. Mastery, of Shirley, Derby: "I have lost nearly 3 stones in weight." Miss Nappey, Wood Lane, Headingley: "I have lost 18lb."

ARMSTRONG'S

Lady's & Gentleman's, from £5 10s., carriage paid. Prompt delivery. Lists free. SPORTING GUN DEPT., Collingwood Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188a, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

ORGAN 4s. Monthly.

WALNUT CASE. KNEE SWELL. SPLENDID TONE.

10 Years' Warranty. 72 Page List Post Free.

ALPHONSE CARY, NEWBURY, BERKS.

Send 4 Stamps and receive pair

FOLDING SCISSORS,

PATENT PENKNIFE,

and Amusing Novelty Catalogue, post paid.

VARIETY COMPANY, DALSTON, LONDON.

7/6 SALOON GUN WITH 100 BALL CARTRIDGES. 7/6

TAKES BALL, SHOT, AND NOISELESS CARTRIDGES.

This gun is the cheapest in the world. It is not a toy, but a practical well-made Saloon Gun, 37½in. long, weight about 4½lb. 100 Birds or Rabbits can be killed with it at cost of 1/6 only with shot cartridges, or 6/- per 500. Will penetrate a deal board 1in. at 50 yards. Can also be used in the house as a Target Rifle, with NOISELESS Cartridges at 1/- per 100, or 5/- per 1,000. This gun is fitted with a beautifully finished stock, nickel-plated fittings, etc., etc. Price 7/6 with 100 Ball Cartridges. Each gun is tested, regulated, and proved before sent to customer. The "Union Jack" Pistol (Registered), with 100 Ball Cartridges, price 4/6, or pair for 8/-. Block Action Saloon or Garden Guns (very superior manufacture) with 100 ball cartridges. No. 1 Bore, 12/6; No. 2 Bore, 13/6; No. 3 Bore, 15/6. No. 3 Bore at 15/6 will kill a bird on the wing at 35 to 45 yards. Send for Price Lists of Air Guns, Saloon Guns, sporting novelties and ammunition. If you cannot send to-day, cut this advertisment out, and write some other time. ADDRESS—W. R. JACKSON, Wholesale Arms and Ammunition Dealer, Tottenham, MIDDLESEX.

(Mention this Paper.)

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full natural perfect Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment, approved and recommended by the medical profession. Success guaranteed. For particulars free, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J." Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

DEAFNESS

And Head Noises Relieved by Using Wilson's Common-Sense Ear Drums. A new scientific invention, entirely different in construction from all other devices. Assist the deaf when all other devices fail, and where medical skill has given no relief. They are safe, comfortable, and invisible; have no wire or string attachment. Write for Pamphlet. Mention this Paper.

Wilson Ear Drum Co. Agent:

D. H. WILSON,

Drum in position, 7, Newington Road, Edinburgh.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (250 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 189, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

NEW HARRISON Swift Gold Medal

KNITTER.

KNITS Stockings ribbed or plain, Gloves and Clothing in Wool, Silk, or Cotton. Instructions Free. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals, for the "Harrison" and "Sun" Machines.

Harrison Knitting Machine Co., Ltd. Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

AJAX CYCLES FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN

ARE RICH VALUE. 25 to 30 per cent. saved and carriage paid.

IMMENSE STOCK, NEW AND SECOND HAND.

Easy Terms from 10s. per Month. Lists free.

Now Open.—LARGE CYCLING SCHOOLS at LONDON and LIVERPOOL. Addresses—

BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING COMPANY,

42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W., and 45, Everton Road, Liverpool.

CLEAN OUT THAT SPRING.

"Tom," said my wife to me one morning at breakfast, "if you have time to-day I wish you would clean out the spring. The water doesn't taste just right, and there may be things in it that will make us ill. It's been running roily quite often lately, too."

Now that spring was about a quarter of a mile from the house, and the water came down through a pipe. We used it for everything—washing, cooking, and drinking. It was very soft and sweet, and practically the same temperature all the year round. But things would get into it, and so it was my job to give it an annual cleansing and scouring. Rather a wet and disagreeable task, but worth while; for after its purgation the spring sent out water clear as a diamond, and pure as Nature could brew it.

What flowing water is to the earth the blood is to the human body. Unless the blood is free from impurities you cannot be healthy. For that reason few persons are really in perfect condition, perhaps nobody. There is no such thing as curing any disease unless we can drive the germs or poisons which cause it out of the blood.

But how do impurities get into the blood? Through and from the stomach, for the blood is manufactured from the food in the stomach. When the digestion is perfect, or nearly so, the blood is virtually pure. It builds up the body, and gives elasticity, strength, and good spirits. When the digestion is bad the food ferments in the stomach and loads the blood with impurities, exactly as a foul spring or well sends out contaminated water. Take an example:

"In March, 1885," says Mrs. Ann Willis, of 51, Rigg Street, Crewe, "I found myself in a low, weak state of health. I ached all over, and was as weary and tired as though I had been working beyond my strength; yet that was not the cause. My appetite was poor, and after eating I was puffed and swollen at my chest and had a deal of pain. I was much troubled with maziness, and when out walking I feared I should fall down. My sleep was broken up and I felt as tired in the morning as when I went to bed. Then I got low and nervous. I couldn't bear company, and took no interest in anything. For nearly two years I was confined to my bed, under a doctor's care. It was in February, 1887, that a friend urged me to try Mother Seigel's Syrup. I got a bottle from the Co-operative Stores in West Street, and in a week I was greatly improved. I could eat better, and the food agreed with me. I was also brighter and in better spirits. I continued with the Syrup, and grew stronger and stronger, and able once more to do my work and enjoy my life. That is now eight years ago, and at this date, March 6th, 1895, I have had no return of the complaint."

"In the spring of 1889," says Mrs. Thomas Ward, newsagent, 276, Bridgeman Street, Bolton, "I felt strangely weak and ailing. At first I had a bad taste in the mouth, no appetite, and after eating I had weight and pain at the chest, and tightness around the waist. I had an awful pain at the pit of the stomach that never let up night or day, and made me irritable and wretched. After a time I got so bad I was afraid to eat—the food hurt me so. I became so weak that I almost fainted as I walked along the street. No medicine gave me relief. In March, 1890, after twelve months' suffering, my brother recommended me to use Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. He said he knew its virtues from a happy experience. I got a bottle from Mr. H. B. Pare, the chemist, in Lever Street, and it soon made me feel better, and in a few weeks it cured me completely. From that day to this (February 19th, 1895) I have been strong and well."

Thus we see it is as I said: to purify the blood we must do away with the indigestion, the dyspepsia; we must cleanse and tone the stomach, which (when diseased) is the foundation of all the mischief. This necessary task is done by Mother Seigel's Syrup, with a thoroughness that ensures a lasting and real cure. The whole body shares in the restoration, and so does the mind, whose powers rise and fall with the condition of the body. Now, as for the stomach-spring, don't wait for any set time to clean it out. Attend to it on the very day you perceive that it needs attention.

Digitized by Google

PEOPLE WITH BRAINS SHOULD TURN TO PAGE 640.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 389. FOR WEEK ENDING JUNE 13TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

RISING SUN STOVE POLISH
EASIEST, QUICKEST, CHEAPEST, & BEST BLACKLEAD IN THE WORLD

Risin' Sun METAL POLISH
Gives a beautiful soft brilliant polish to all kinds of Metal.

1 GREAT BOONS THREE 3

A sample of any one post free 2 stamps.
Name this publication
C. CHANCELLOR & CO.
London, E.C.

MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH
CONTAINS IN PROPER PROPORTIONS
GLOSS, BORAX, GUM, WAX, &c. &c.

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE

FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lb.	30/-
No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 50lb.	37/6
No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 55lb.	41/3
No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lb.	48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & Cos CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

THE REV. C. HAVERGAL

(Nephew of the late Miss Frances Ridley Havergal)

Writes from 14, Alroy Road, Ansfield, Liverpool: "I can thoroughly endorse the statement of 'A Clergyman,' whose testimony to the efficacy of your WIND PILLS for affections of the Stomach, Bowels, and Liver, appears in The News. I shall be happy to recommend your Pills as I have opportunity. By all means publish my communication."

All sufferers from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND ON THE STOMACH, COSTIVENESS, SICK HEADACHE, NERVOUS DEBILITY, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, BILIOUSNESS, etc., should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

☞ The WIND PILLS being Purely Vegetable, Tasteless and Mild, and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

Of all Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for price, from PAGE WOODCOCK, Lincoln.

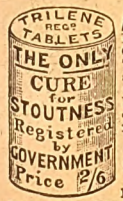
HIGH-CLASS CYCLES.

Ladies' and Gents'. Low Prices Best Materials. Finest Workmanship. Satisfaction Assured. Sent on Approval. Write for Lists.

J. LOFTUS, 58, Great George St., Liverpool.



ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

131, Victoria Street, London, S.W.—Mrs. Arthur Wegelin (the "Society" Celebrity) writes: "By simply taking the Trilene regularly, and without change of diet, I have lost 1st. 4lb. in 4 weeks."

Bretton West, near Wakefield.—"Miss L. Langfield has taken a box of tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.—Mr. J. Thomas writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17½st., and have got down to 15st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.—Mr. Wm. Usher says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

1-7, Ous Gang Lane, Old Radford, Notts.—Miss E. P. Parsons says: "I was 16st. before taking Tablets, and am now 15st.—going on nicely."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 24
June 13, 1896.
S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, Duke Street, Villiers Street, London, W.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

ONE BOX
OF
Dr. Mackenzie's Improved
Harmless Arsenic Complexion Wafers

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire; clear, fresh, free from blotch, blemish, coarseness, redness, freckles, or pimples. Post free for 4/6.—S. HARVEY, 5, Denman St., London Bridge, S.E. Half boxes 2/9. Use Dr. MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL TOILET SOAP. 1s. per Tablet: No. 2, unscented, 6d. per Tablet. Made from Purest Ingredients and Absolutely Harmless.

Beware of the many imitations.
Have Dr. Mackenzie's or none.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay.
Saves Extraction.
Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

HEADACHES, NEURALGIA, RHEUMATISM

CURED SPEEDILY with EVENIA CACHETS (Regd.). A Safe and Certain Remedy. Send 1/3 to-day for a box, post free. D. D. BUCHAN, Frockheim, N.B.

London Agents: F. NEWBURY & SONS, 1, King Edward Street, E.C.

ORGAN 4s. Monthly.

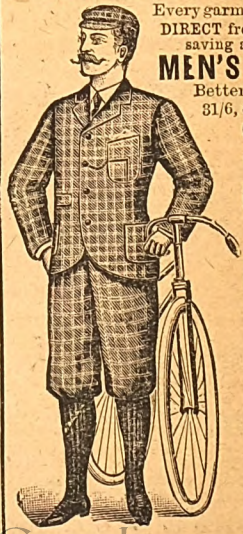
WALNUT CASE.
KNEE SWELL.
SPLENDID TONE.

10 Years' Warranty. 72 Page List Post Free.

ALPHONSE CARY, NEWBURY, BERKS.

HIGH-CLASS TAILORING

Every garment cut to measure.
DIRECT from the Manufacturer, saving all Middle Profits.



MEN'S SUITS, 18/6
Better Qualities, 22/6, 25/6, 31/6, 37/6, 45/-, 52/6, 63/-.

CYCLING SUITS
From 15/-.
Value Unequalled.
Fit Guaranteed.

BOYS' SUITS
Pieces for Mending sent with all Suits.

LADIES' TAILOR-MADE COSTUMES
From 10/6 to 70/-
See our New Patterns before ordering.
It will pay you to do so.
(Hundreds to choose from), Post Free on Application.
All Goods Carriage Paid.

Factory Clothing Company,
Manufacturing and Ladies' Tailors,
117K, ALBION ST., LEEDS.

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 389.] For the Week ending June 13th, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

CHAPTER I.

IT was Christmas Eve in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and sixty, when I first set foot within the mining camp of "Bungalow Bottom," situated on the most westerly border of California.

About three months previous to this important epoch, my father—a man of great principle and little mercy—had turned me out of doors in the most ignominiously neck and crop manner conceivable. Considering this, I could not doubt I was a very bad lot. True, I had never disgraced his house that he knew of, and moreover it is equally true, I had never disgraced any individual that I knew of.

But there it was.

"Go!" my father had said. "You won't work!"

This probably is the only mistake my father ever made in the whole course of his natural life. I would have worked had Nature adapted me so to do, but unfortunately she had not. Therein she wronged herself, my father, and me, and then burdened me with the blame. I did not condemn her on this account, for I am one of those enviable persons who believe that all things conspire, etc. One thing, however, struck me as being very remarkable, and that was—that I had never bathed in that tide of men's affairs, which if taken at the flood, etc.

On the day of my departure, my father had urged in response to my objections that my tide had flowed, and that I had failed to launch my lugger. This, he said, was when I was clerking at a retaining fee of seventy pounds per annum; but I couldn't see it that way at all. Hence his anger.

"Go!" he commanded. "Go away! Go anywhere! Go to the dogs at once, for that is your ultimate destination. You are of no use to man nor——" here he mentioned a supernatural Someone, for whom I entertain an honest and profound regard. Dutifully believing his latter statement, I proceeded to go to the dogs, choosing the route via Paris. Although generally the quickest way for a single young gentleman, it proved the reverse in my case; for something occurred there which laid the foundation of my narrative, influencing me at the same time to seek my fate by a more circuitous highway.

I was walking late one night amongst the deserted slums of the memorial city of Paris, when I was arrested by the sound of singing, at once sublime and earthly. It was too voluminous to suggest those spectral things that whisper to the sleeping poet, and it was too absolutely perfect to suggest anything so common as a prima donna of the earth—it was as little earthly as could be.

Lengthening my strides, I was thinking to pursue it when suddenly it burst upon me in all the beauty of it's thrilling magnificence. To my utter astonishment—though why, I can't say—the singer appeared before me, a veritable beggar. In the dim dark night, I could not determine her nationality, but I could see the threadbare clothing and unshod feet. I could see the voluptuous contour of her figure, despite the desperate endeavour of her ill-fitting garments to conceal it, and I could see the motionless human bundle at her breast, warmed by the fire of her gleaming eyes.

Seeing me, she stopped; both in her singing and passage. Likewise did I.

After a momentary hesitation I spoke to her in French, upon which she burst into a shriek of laughter, and whether she intended it or not, succeeded in mystifying me entirely.

Thinking perhaps that my accent was bad, or that my phrasing was badly turned, I threw all my genius and

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

education into another effort, but without avail. She merely repeated her performance in a higher stave.

Struck by a really clever idea, I attacked every tongue of which I was student, but upon each occasion her laugh encompassed more octaves, and eventually she had me spluttering amid the ruins of my unsanctified vocabulary.

Had I not heard her singing, I should have thought her dumb or hungry when she approached me, and made the very equivocal movement of wobbling her finger about inside her mouth. As it was I inferred she wished to suggest ignorance of my meaning.

Coming close up to me, she held her little hand palm upwards, nodding in its direction with a vigour that would have made my head ache for months, had I chosen to attempt the feat. Gathering that she wanted money, I placed a coin in her hand, and then, turning down the covering of her bundle, I kissed the child.

An irresistible shudder shook me with frightful force as I realised it was stone dead. Momentarily forgetting myself, I sprang back, crying loudly in English: "Your child is dead!"

Another burst of her inane laughter greeted my remark as she passed on.

Gradually the laughter resolved into the transcendent singing, and burning at the heart, I went on my way musing.

From that moment the course of my life was changed, and I was victim—as I afterwards discovered—to that subtle and soul absorbing whim—love.

The next month it was that I altered my route, seeking my destiny viâ California.

The singer appeared before me, a veritable beggar.

Some may wonder at my leaving Paris at all, being as I said before, in love. But then, at that time I was not heedful of the fact.

Anyway, 'tis the truth I'm telling, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, etc.

CHAPTER II.

As before stated, it was Christmas eve in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and sixty, when I reached my journey's end. It was on the morning of the eve, so that before the miners of "Bungalow Bottom" had pitched down their shovels in varying disgust and satisfaction, I was instituted as lodger in a highly popular and respectable canteen, to which they invariably resorted after business hours.

Wishing to place myself upon friendly terms with everyone (the only constant idea of my life), I connived with the host to afford my future fraternity a jolly reception.

Beer and beef, punch and pie, bent the benches beneath their indigestible will.

One by one the diggers lounged in; some on their feet, others on my feet; but all more or less hearty.

They looked at the benches, then at the landlord, and finally at me. Some of the comparatively hearty ones invoked silent blessings on my head—or at least I supposed so. Some of the superlatively hearty ones grasped me and shook me, and seemed like to weep on my neck.

At length, when all were seated, one gawky wag volunteered the information that "Romeo of Russia wasn't here!"

Simultaneous with this assertion, the door opened, admitting the most distinguished-looking man I had ever seen during the whole spell of my existence.

Knowing something of Californian mannerisms and customs, I had expected to see some shrivelled old fossil, either idiotic or drunk. As it was, the man before me came as a brilliant revelation.

The humourous designation of "Romeo" was distinctly appropriate in its application, and of his hailing from Russia there could exist no manner of doubt. Although arrayed in the conventional mining costume, he bore indisputable traces of high breeding and quality.

Dressed consistently I could have conceived him a head amongst royalty. His face was naturally hairless, an omission Nature had rectified by a lavish abundance on the head. He walked with eyes fixed upon the ground, maintaining a semblance of stolid inscrutability.

I could not, dared not, approach him, or ask him to accept of my bounty. Once when his eye caught mine, he started, and his gaze swept me from crown to toe. Then taking his mug of liquor, he betook himself into a corner, and languished in the shade. He never vouchsafed a word to anybody, but remained with downcast eyes passively fixed upon the floor. My interest had left the company, and as anguish is embodied by emotion, so was my mind entrapped by Romeo of Russia. At that time I could not determine whether his power was the fascination of madness or of physical beauty and bearing; but anyway he flung a mystic spell about me I could not escape.

By this time the miners had abandoned their different benches, and were now seated circuitously around the stove. I fancied their laughs were quieter, and the jests less coarse, since the entrance of the Russian. Presently—and for the first time—this individual perceptibly moved. He shook himself, beat his temples with clenched hands, rolled his eyes about with his fore-fingers, and disentangled himself generally. Raising himself altogether, he took a seat in the very midst of his brethren. He had been drinking heavily, and his eyes were sullen beneath a yellowish film.

Digitized by Google

He started speaking as it were unconsciously, and his low musical tones contrasted strangely with his peculiar taint of the western twang.

"Pards!" he commenced. "To-night I'm goin' to tell yer all about myself an' the mousetrap. I've a reason for so doin', as yer will afterwards diskivver."

The "mousetrap" I subsequently learnt was his poetical name for fate.

"I'm goin' ter divulge ter yer keepin' a secret thet none of yer have ever dreamt on!"

Here the gawky wag above referred to arose with significant haste, accompanied by a croak, and left the saloon. The other miners took heavy swigs of liquor, concluding by sweeping their hands across their mouths, with a noise like a score of kettles boiling over. Not a man spoke.

"Y'all remember that gal, Pamela the Pagan."

They intimated that they did remember.

"I've often let drop snatches of her hist'ry as connected with mine, but not one o' yer knows as much about that same connexion as would kivver the brain of a fly."

That the company knew little on this head was evidenced by its smart attention. Dull of comprehension though it was, it nevertheless detected some unwonted animation in Romeo, and each man intuitively knew something unusual was coming. None attempted to quit the room, and each suffered himself to be chained with awakening interest. In ever heightening tones, with vacant stare, but reddening brow, Romeo of Russia resumed:

"Y'all call me Romeo, because I loved that gal. I don't mind that. My langidge an' my likes is just as yer own. My langidge so, cos I knoo no English, but what I larnt here. Yes, I loved that gal from the first. I allus loved her, an' I love her now, whenever thet red mist leaves my mem'ry. But pards, it's growin' redder an' redder every day."

Here he swayed like one in a baffled frenzy, and in the mysterious zest of his agitation, he stopped, running his fingers wildly through his hair. A dozen mugs were extended towards him, and he quelled his fearful fire with the contents of one. Afterwards, he continued, coherently and jointedly:

"That gal," he said, "I met once before. It was in Russia. Who she was, or where she came from, I never knoo. I only know that I loved her on fust sight, from which time my whole self became wrapped, so ter say, in her. It was only a brief intervoo that I had with her, an I saw her no more, until one day she came to my father's house with a child in her arms. She said—well, never mind. Who the child akchully belonged to, don't matter to enyone here.

"Upon that my father kicked me out of house an' home in a puffek temper o' passion, an' I came here.

"Likewise y'all know, over an' above wot I'm telling, I met her here, shortly after I came; but none on yer knows wot passed between us.

"Recollectin' rightly you'll likewise remember how that same gal could sing. Y'all thought she wor an angel; I know yer did, wot with her little harp, an' her lovely voice.

"After that, yer know, the sensation when my sister came to see me, all the way from Russia, trying to get me t' return, an' receive my father's parding.

Taking his mug of liquor, he betook himself into a corner.

"But I says, pards"—and his voice rose higher—"yer don't know as how the Pagan got jealous of my own sister, an' addishunally, yer don't know as how my beautiful unsu'pektin' sister loved her. Yer don't know that one night the devil himself seized the lovely Pagan, fillin' her mind with all the wickedness of the shades.

"That awful night"—he went on with growing fire—"them two were together. I was a sittin' dreamy like, in another room, listenin' to my sister playin' the harp, while Pamela sang.

"I saw their two shadders on the flimsy curtins between us, an' I heard the Pagan say:

"'Let's do the "Red Assignation"!'

"This latter, pards, was a piece of music—descriptive so ter say.

"Her imaginashun of other worlds couldn't come nigh it. It was supernat'ral, heavenly, murderous, unearthly, unhuman, an' poetic, all in one.

"I was lost like. They played an' played an' played, until I b'lieve I lost my wits.

"When evenchully I came to, the music had stopped, an' I started up. Now pards, mark yer—mark yer, I say, there was only one shadder on the curtin, an' that dretful still. It was my sister's.

"Alarmed at the awful quiet, I parted the curtins an' went in to her,

"Oh, boys! There was a sight ter stab the very seein' from yer eyes. There was a sight at which an angel might have shrieked, an' stiffened like death itself. It was a sight which put a tongue in every thought of horror, an' deafened my senses with the noise of its hideousness.

Digitized by Google

"My poor sister lay on the floor, lifeless. A great red wound lay gaping hungry on her breast, eating its lovely whiteness with its crimson fangs. A fearful long knife still shivered about in her heavenly heart, mocking my pain so ter say with its devilish nods. In addishun to all this, I noticed that her finger tips, and the veins up her arms, were charged with a deep and bulky purple colour.

"Then I looked at the harp, and touched it. The strings were damp, and sort o' very sharp.

"Yer know when I was ill, pards? Well that wasn't so much the shock of the sight I saw, as the dampness of that infernal instrument.

"The only thing I wonder at is, that she had done it twice over, so ter say: the harp or the wound would have been enough to do anyone, even ef they'd been more than mortal.

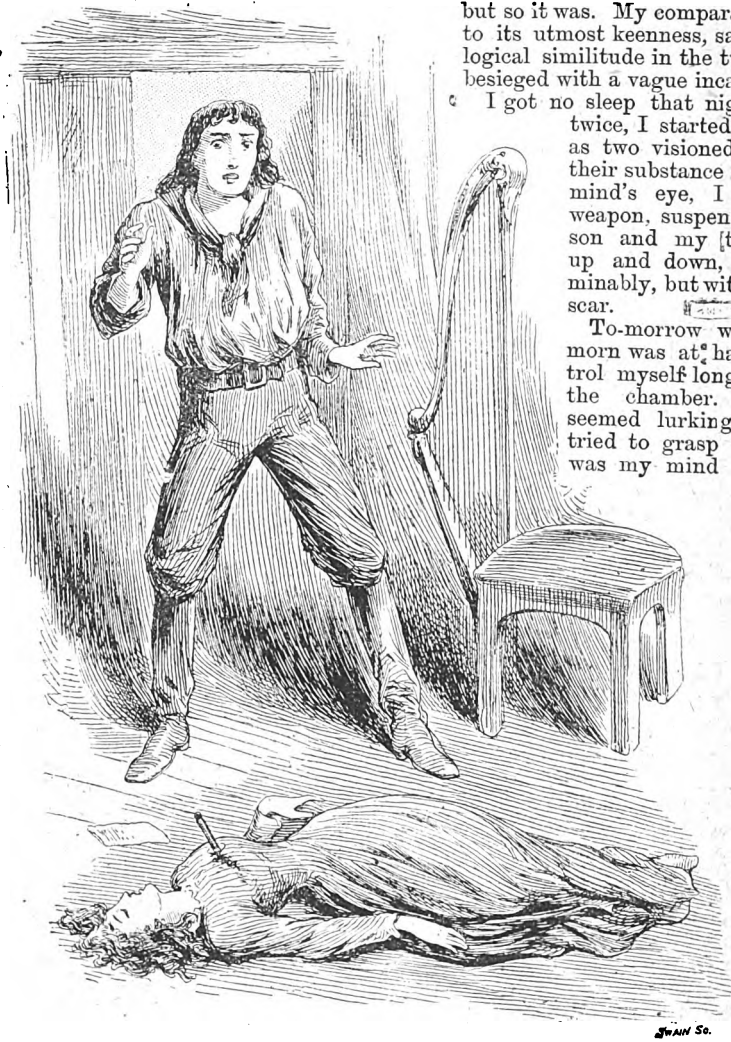
"Through all this I loved her—I couldn't help it; but there are times—well, never mind—she wor the mousetrap and I wor the mouse; but I ain't dead yet, am I?"

We signified a corroboration of this belief, and he continued with intensified power.

"Now p'raps yer a wonderin' why I have told yer this after keepin' silent so long! Wait a minit.

"By the side o' my dead sister, I found a bit o' paper, writ on in Russian. There wasn't much wordin'—only,

"'Christmas day, 1860.



"My poor sister lay on the floor, lifeless."

"That's why I tell yer now, pards. To-morrow's the day identical, an' I feel somethin's a hangin' over me like. What it is I don't know—I don't want to: it's awful, an' I am afeerd. Don't none o' yer touch me; don't speak ter me; but watch me, pards, for God's sake watch me!"

By this time his voice had risen to a perfect shriek, and, writhing from his seat, he fell face downwards to the floor, weeping like a child.

As one man the company rose without a word, left its mugs unemptied, and departed.

CHAPTER III.

I SOUGHT my chamber, beset with feelings I dare not describe. The Russian's painful narrative awoke in me a mysterious consciousness of some personal connection.

The woman whom he had described hung prominently on my thoughts, and somehow the likeness persistently blended itself with that of the strange unaccountable being I had met in Paris, carrying the dead child. Why this should have been so I could not imagine, but so it was. My comparative faculty, whetted to its utmost keenness, saw at least a psychological similitude in the two women, and I was besieged with a vague incalculable dread.

I got no sleep that night. Dozing once or twice, I started upright in my bed, as two visioned women commingled their substance and vanished. In my mind's eye, I saw a becrimsoned weapon, suspended between my person and my thoughts. It flashed up and down, wounding me interminably, but without physical pain or scar.

To-morrow was the day and the morn was at hand. Unable to control myself longer, I arose and paced the chamber. Nightly influences seemed lurking in every corner. I tried to grasp them, but no sooner was my mind about to encompass them, than they vanished: remaining impalpable as before.

Then, and not till then, did I realise the vast consuming volume of my passion for the woman I had met in Paris. My mind was ablaze. Each frenzied thought throbbed like lava through my brain, until I conceived it falling away, dissolved in the hissing current.

As the first dreary streaks of daylight came, I went out. Stealing about the camp like a wolf, I went to the door of every hut and listened.

Generally a deathly quietness reigned. At last, bent upon a rapid walk, I reached the extreme outskirts of the village, when suddenly my attention was arrested by a low moaning. Listening intently, I soon recognised the tones of Romeo of Russia, proceeding from a low, dilapidated shed before me. Selecting a hole in the most shaded corner of the boarding, I peered in.

The Russian was on his knees directly facing me. In the earthen floor he had scraped a large hollow, at the bottom of which lay embedded a rusty something I soon determined to be a harp. By his side lay a long, hideous knife, corroded with a substance I dared not think upon twice. Nearly sickened I turned away, pressing my hand to my forehead and trying to think collectedly.

Digitized by Google

The camp was stirring as I went back to my quarters. I tried to eat, but the attempt was a miserable failure; nothing could tempt me. Then I ordered some brandy, and under the comforting influences of this, I made a great determination.

"Woman or fiend," my spirit cried, "I love her still!" Upon this, I made rapid way to the diggings. Yes, there was the Russian working away as calmly and abstractedly as he had entered the saloon the night before.

Other miners, although it was Christmas, worked silently beside him. There was no noise, no coarse jest, no anything but work, work, work. Each man seemed impressed with something untold.

Impelled by my awful anxiety I hurried to the coach station. The weather was awful. Hail and sleet fell steadily and persistently. Burning within, and cold as death without, I waited on and on. Wet through and shivering I waited until night fell; aye and long after that.

The station was deserted: not a soul being in sight notwithstanding the fact that the coach was long overdue.

Seven, eight, nine, ten, eleven o'clock.

Half-past.

And then in the distance I heard a rumbling of wheels. With the faint refracted lights, the coach dashed up, bearing one solitary passenger, and that a woman closely veiled.

As one the weapons descended.

A shriek—a whoop—a hoarse cry, and the coach was gone. A great inconceivable thrill swept through me as the solitary woman brushed by me in the direction of the camp.

In a dozen strides I was at her side, with one hand upon her arm. With the other, and without ceremony, I tore off her veil.

Imagine my feelings then. Imagine my feelings upon finding my terrible premonition fulfilled.

It was she—the idol of my whole being—but how ghastly white! Her eyes flashed fiercely upon me, aggravating my every pulse to madness. Little wonder Romeo had fallen.

"Woman! Don't go—don't go!" I whispered. "You don't know what awaits you. Turn back whilst you have time—for God's sake turn back!"

Again those wondrous eyes flashed fiercely upon me, and muttering angrily, she passed on.

In another instant, an instant rife with all the madness of agony, I was beside her again.

"Fool!" I hissed. "Do you hear me? Don't go, I tell you. Treachery lurks in every breath of God's air to-night. Turn back! Come with me."

Again I laid my heavy, burning hand upon her arm, but with a sound more like the hiss of a serpent than the cry of a human being, she wrested herself away and literally flew into the mist. With a furtive pang of anguish I pursued her. She was upon the borders of the camp before I overtook her. This time I placed myself before her, exerting all my strength in the abandon of my love.

Catching her by the wrist again, I literally shrieked: "Out of the love I bear you, I urge you not to go further."

"You shall not—before heaven——!"

In less than a trice, she had a glittering weapon lifted high above me. It quivered on its downward course.

Simultaneously a figure, looking blacker than this blackest of nights, glided from out the shadow like the prong of a colossal serpent. It writhed swiftly between my breast and the glittering knife, at the same time poising its own corroded blade.

As one the weapons descended, thrust with a vigour equalling the trinity of Hate and Love and Despair.

A shriek which split the heavens like a thunderblast flew upwards, as the knives crashed to their hilts in the bosoms of Pamela the Pagan and Romeo of Russia.

NINEPENCE contributed to our FRESH AIR FUND will give a day in the Country to one poor child. All sums received will be acknowledged in the columns of P.W.

Digitized by Google

Two Wedding Rings.

SHARP and loud came the sound of the postman's knock, cutting the frigid winter air like a knife-blade.

I started up from the sofa, where I had been dreaming over the morning paper, with a cheery crackle of the wood fire close beside me, and the scent of my morning coffee steaming gratefully up from the chased-silver equipage on the little round table.

(The bachelor's mode of life is not altogether without its advantages, after all.)

"Mrs. Metcalfe," I called out, putting my head over the stair-rail (which hadn't been dusted that morning; boarding-house stair-rails never do get dusted until noon if you have ever observed it), "is there anything for me?"

An ominous silence. I knew as well as if I were on the spot that the landlady's daughter was reading my post-cards, holding my letters up between her eye and the light, and indulging in other proceedings peculiar to the genus "landlady's daughter."

"I say," I reiterated, throwing a little spice of exasperation into my accent, "is there anything for me?"

"Coming, sir! Coming!" And Miss Melinda Metcalfe shuffled upstairs with my correspondence on a japanned tray.

"Is there any news?" said I sarcastically as I took my letter, my two post-cards and my newspaper.

"Sir?" said Miss Melinda.

"I didn't know but that you were opening my post," said I blandly.

"Oh, sir, I shouldn't think of such a thing!"

And Miss Melinda went downstairs, tossing her head like an enraged Shetland pony.

One card from my tailor, to notify me of his change of business residence; one from Louis Durande to tell me that he could not keep a certain engagement with me, and a letter from Percy Wyncote, who had warmed his slippers at the same college fire with me scarcely three years ago.

"Dear Belton," so his epistle ran, "I claim your congratulations. I am to be married next week to the sweetest girl the sun ever shone on. There's surprise number one for you. And I wish you'd go to Goldluck and Glitterman's and get the wedding ring, size inclosed on a bit of paper. There's surprise number two. Seriously, old fellow, it will do me a great favour, for business matters here are complicated in such a way that I cannot hope to get down to London a day before the event. And of course I know that I can trust your taste and judgment equally with my own. Have the words 'Helen, 1896,' engraved on the inside, and please send by express without delay.

"Ever yours faithfully,
"PERCY WYNCOTE.

"P.S.—She is an angel.

"P.P.S.—She's for all the world the counterpart of that lovely girl on the cover of this month's Pearson's."

"Well," said I to myself, laying down my old chum's rapturous letter, "here's a pretty commission for a bachelor. An angel, is she? I don't believe she's any more angelic than Pauline Brookes. But every man thinks his own goose a swan. I pity the poor fellow I'm sure; he's clearly in a state of glamour that make him see everything couleur de rose. But I'm not one to desert a friend at a pinch—I'll buy his miserable wedding-ring with the greatest pleasure in life."

So I locked my desk, put on my seal-trimmed overcoat, and went straightway to Goldluck and Glitterman's.

Jones was behind the counter. I knew Jones; I had bought a gold bracelet of him for Pauline Brookes six months ago. Jones was a dapper little fellow, with a stiffly-waxed moustache, a cameo scarf-pin and hair bedewed with some ambrosial perfume or other.

"Wedding-rings, if you please," said I, plunging in medias res, without loss of time. "Here's the size," producing my slip of paper.

"Any inscription, sir?" questioned Jones, assuming so preternaturally knowing an aspect that I could cheerfully have pitched him in among the plated ware in the big glass show-case behind him.

"Helen," said I brusquely, "1896."

"H'Emma, sir?" Jones put his hand behind his ear.

"Helen!" I bawled out, painfully conscious that the eyes of the three pretty girls who were looking at turquoise lockets at the counter beyond were upon me.

"Very pretty name," simpered Jones, as he wrote down the order. "Any particular style?"

"Simple and solid," said I; "that's all."

"Yes, sir. It shall be attended to at once," said Jones.

"Shall I send it to your residence or——"

"I'll call for it to-morrow," said I.

"Pardon me, Mr. Belton," cried old Mr. Glitterman, who had overheard a portion of our colloquy, "but it wouldn't be taking a liberty to inquire whether you intend to keep house or board——"

"What?" ejaculated I.

"To keep house or board?" reiterated Mr. Glitterman. "Because in the former case we should esteem it a favour to supply the silver and tableware."

I muttered some not particularly complimentary

Digitized by Google

answer and went out of the shop, closing the door behind me with some emphasis.

* * * * *

"Going to be married, eh, old chap?" said Sniffins, familiarly thrusting his elbow into my side, as I strolled into the Monico for my lunch that day.

"No!" said I, taking up the carte.

"Oh, come, don't deny the soft impeachment," said Sniffins, with a wink.

"What has put such an idea as that into your head?" demanded I, somewhat indignantly.

"Name of Helen," said Sniffins, with an idiotic giggle. "Waiter, pâté de foie gras here! Let's drink her health, Belton, when——"

At this stage I pretended to see someone whom I knew at an opposite table, and bolted across the room.

* * * * *

Old Mr. Jessup was trotting across Piccadilly Circus, as I came out, with a brown silk umbrella under his arm.

"Eh?" said Mr. Jessup, turning upon me the moony glare of two spectacled eyes. "What's this I hear about you, my dear young friend? Accept my congratulations. Matrimony is always a blessed estate, and——"

"Oh, yes, I don't doubt it, sir," I hurriedly interrupted, "but—a—there's some mistake about it——"

"Miss what did you say," said old Mr. Jessup beamingly. "Call round this evening and tell us all about it, there's a good fellow. I haven't time to listen just now!"

I could have torn my hair with rage. Mr. Jessup was Pauline Brooke's uncle and guardian, and I knew that my chances in that direction would be all off if once the fatal story of the wedding ring got to Pauline's ears.

I hurried up Regent Street mentally gnashing my teeth, and in my impetuous haste had nearly stumbled over Pauline herself, just coming out of a florist's with a tiny boutonnière of violets in her hand.

"Pauline!" cried I rapturously. But Pauline drew back the least little distance in the world, thereby putting an invisible barrier between us that froze me like an icicle.

"Dear me, Mr. Belton, is it you?" said Pauline. "I congratulate you I am sure!"

"Upon what?" I demanded, growing desperate.

"Upon your approaching marriage, to be sure!" said Pauline, with a smile like auroral lights hovering over a snowbank.

"But I'm not going to be married," protested I.

"Oh, excuse me, pray! Gentlemen do not usually buy wedding rings without a purpose," interposed Pauline. "Only I should think you might have paid such old friends as we are the compliment of some slight intimation of your impending marriage."

"Pauline," said I—"Miss Brookes—hear me. There is only one woman in the world I would care to marry, and she stands before me now!"

Pauline's lips quivered—the tears sparkled into her eyes.

"Mr. Belton," said she, "you may regard all this as a very bad joke, but surely, surely, it is not necessary to add any more insult to it——"

"Do you mean that you don't believe me?"

"How can I believe you?" retorted she.

Driven to a sort of frenzy, I dragged Wyncote's letter from my pocket.

"Pauline," said I, "read that and you have a read solution of the mystery of the wedding ring."

Her face cleared up as she glanced over the contents of poor Wyncote's ecstatic missive.

"Poor fellow!" said she. "He's very much in love, isn't he?"

"Not half so much as I am," said I. And then in the smilax-bordered shadow of the florist's I pressed my suit.

"Dear Pauline, let me order another wedding ring?"

"For whom?" demanded my lady-love.

"For you. I have loved you this long time, but I never had the courage to avow my love before, dear Pauline."

"Hush!" said Pauline. "We musn't stand talking here."

"I won't stir a step until you answer me."

"What shall I say?" hesitated Pauline.

"Say yes."

I ordered the duplicate wedding ring that very night. Pauline said it was too soon, but I quoted the ancient proverb: "Delays are dangerous." And we are to be married in a month. And if it hadn't been for the providential interruption of Wyncote's wedding ring, I might still have been shivering on the brink of an unspoken proposal. "Blessed be wedding rings," say I.

JULIA SCHLOMM.

Digitized by Google

Merely A Dog

"WILL you come and dine with me to-morrow, Gregory?"

"Thanks, very much, old fellow; but the sixteenth of this month is always observed by me as a solemn day. It is the anniversary of Jack's death, you know."

"Jack! Might I ask who Jack was?"

"My little fox-terrier. I thought you knew."

"A dog. Do you mean to say seriously that you keep the anniversary of a fox-terrier's death as a fast day?"

"And why not? Jack's life was sacrificed for his master's. To his death I owe my existence. Shall I not at least keep his memory green by setting aside one day out of the year to his honour? Shall I tell you the story?"

"Yes; I should like to hear it."

"Well, then, we must go back ten years. I was then a clerk in the employ of a firm called Wilkins and Stokes. They were merchants in the Portugese trade—first class people, and, as the banks say, 'good for anything they might undertake.' But there came a panic in the trade. Some big firms in Lisbon and Oporto failed, and some of the leading London houses were dragged down with them. It became known that Wilkins and Stokes had become involved and were in difficulties, their credit was damaged, they were pressed on all hands, and finally driven into the bankruptcy court.

"My berth had been a good one, and I had fondly hoped that it was as secure as anything can be in the City. I had been a thriftless fool, and when I suddenly found myself thrown out of employment, I had nothing whatever to fall back upon. My parents were dead, and my nearest relative was an aunt somewhere in the country, a woman of slender means, of whom I knew very little. I sought employment diligently from morning till night, but without avail. The special knowledge that I had acquired of Portuguese business was of no use to me in the state of the trade, and there were hundreds of clerks possessed of a general knowledge of office routine, who were ready to snap up, at a moment's notice, any berth that might fall vacant.

"Month after month went on, and I was still out of work. I had borrowed from every friend I possessed, to keep body and soul together, until these sources of assistance were utterly exhausted. My clothes were so badly worn that they became a new obstacle to my obtaining a berth, and I was deep in debt to my landlady—a kind-hearted and long-suffering woman, of whom I felt it was cruel to take advantage.

"One evening in October—the sixteenth—I was utterly dejected and despondent. I had spent the day in making my usual tour of City offices, and in scanning the advertisement columns of the daily newspapers. But when night come, and I walked back to my lodgings, I felt as if all hope had departed from me. A great change seemed to have come over me that day. I no longer cared for what happened. I had a feeling that the struggle was over, that I had done my best, and could and would do no more. Such a life was not worth living. Why not end it?

"Never before that evening had I contemplated suicide, but now the idea possessed me, enslaved me. It was so easy, so reasonable, so complete a solution of all my difficulties. I had not asked to live. Why should I be forbidden to die? A man who had others dependent on him was a coward to put an end to himself; but I—whom did it concern what happened to me? One City acquaintance would say to another: 'You remember Harold Gregory—used to be with Wilkins and Stokes?—I hear he blew his brains out, or something of the sort. By the way, have you seen the new Gaiety burlesque?' That's all.

"Well, I went to my bedroom; I scribbled a note and left it on my dressing-table. I took my revolver from my drawer and placed it in my pocket. Telling my landlady that I should not return home until very late I stepped into the street and banged the door behind me.

"Turning round, I saw that my terrier, Jack, was beside me. During that terrible time of proverty and anxiety I had never parted with Jack. The faithful dog had been almost my only friend. Poor brute, he must not accompany me now. I stooped down and caressed him.

"'Jack,' I said, 'you must go indoors. You can't come with me to-night.' But he looked up at me with such pleading eyes. I verily believe that he knew what I was going to do, and he seemed to be saying: 'Let me go! If you must die, at least let me die with you!'

Digitized by Google

"I relented, and he kept by me all the way. It was a dark, chilly night, with a fine drizzling rain, as I walked along the slippery streets towards the park. A load seemed to have been lifted off my shoulders, and I felt that the battle of life for me would now soon be over. But my thoughts were more of Jack than of myself. I resolved that he should die first. It was better than that he should live to mourn his master and fall into cruel hands. And, perhaps, after all, the Indian, with his untutored mind, was right in supposing that in the happy hunting grounds 'his faithful dog should bear him company.'

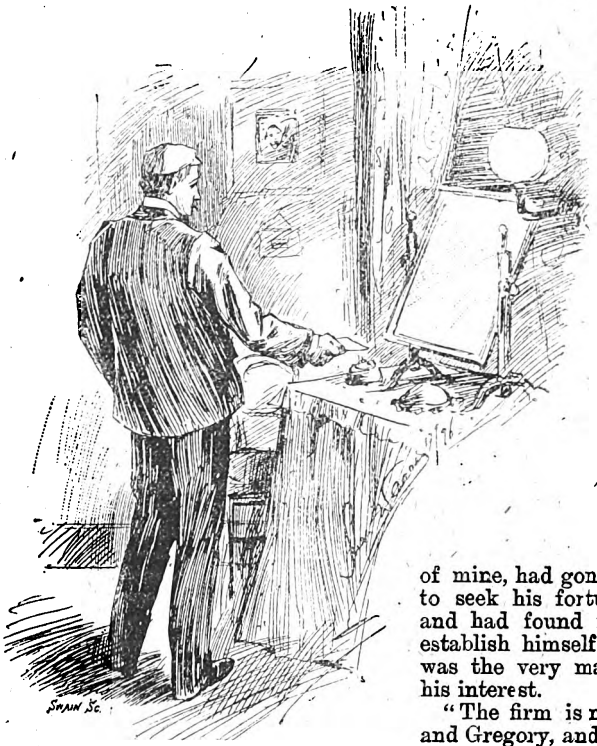
"When we got to the park, I sought a secluded spot, and halted. Taking the dog in my arms, I said: 'Jack, you have been a faithful dog. We will die together. I must kill you first; but I won't play you false, old fellow, the next bullet will send me after you. Good-bye, Jack! Dear old Jack!'

"I placed the muzzle of my revolver against his head. He did not flinch, but raised his trustful eyes to mine. I pulled the trigger, and the poor dog rolled over—dead.

"I did not hesitate a minute in next placing the revolver against my right temple. My hand was steady, and I felt no fear. I carefully judged my aim, and again pulled the trigger. There was no report! The chambers were all empty.

"I speak the truth when I say that my feelings were not of relief and thankfulness. I was simply enraged at my disappointment. For a moment I stood bewildered, then threw the weapon away into the darkness. I would not be foiled. Was there not the river, in which I could drown myself?

"Kneeling down first to take a hasty farewell of poor Jack, I made my way back into the street. I had not a penny in my pocket, so had to make my journey on foot.



"I scribbled a note and left it on my dressing-table."

In turning a corner a man stopped me to inquire his way. We passed beneath a lamp, and as we glanced into one another's faces there was an instant mutual recognition.

"'Gregory!'

"'Mansfield!'

"'Why, Gregory, old fellow, you are the very man I want. I have been trying to find you everywhere, but since Wilkins and Stokes smashed nobody could tell me where I might lay hands on you. I want—why, how ill you look! Been down on your luck, old boy? So I heard. Broke, I suppose. Well, come back with me to my hotel; I want to have a chat with you at once.'

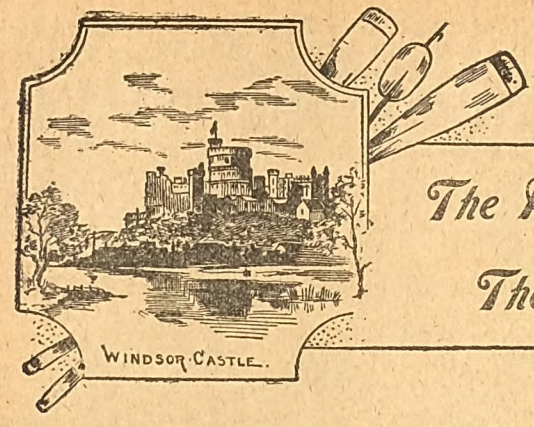
"Mansfield, an old chum of mine, had gone abroad many years before to seek his fortune—nobody knew where—and had found it. He had come back to establish himself in business, and he said I was the very man he wanted to look after his interest.

"The firm is now, as you know, Mansfield and Gregory, and I am very far from wishing myself dead.

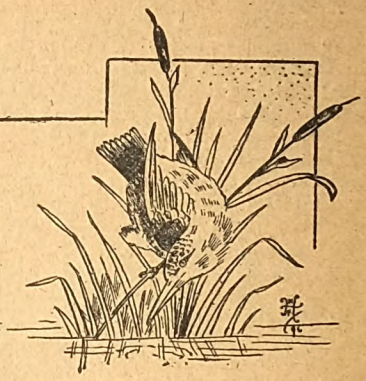
"But remember this: If poor Jack had not received that bullet in his brain, it would have entered mine. I played the poor dog false, after all, so the least I can do is to keep him in affectionate remembrance. And to-morrow is the 16th October."

MADGE MORRIS.

Digitized by Google



The Nightingale AND The Griffin.



It is very rare that a pretty woman in Europe possesses a harsh voice, while a musical organ is seldom unaccompanied by pleasant features.

As an abiding proof of the infallibility of a musical ear I well remember when I was living in Brussels, how my attention was attracted one summer evening by the sweetest voice I ever listened to.

My rooms were in a street at a corner of the place in which stands that Grand Hotel de Ville, with its arcades and its high roof perforated with innumerable mansard windows, and its gothic spire, which is only inferior to that of the cathedral at Antwerp.

As I said before, it was summer, just beginning, when roses are within every one's price, and the sun has not become too sultry during the day to make the evenings heavy.

Somehow or other I did not feel inclined to go in the Park, where there is a splendid orchestra, most inferior beer, and worse coffee; the theatres were all closed, and I had no wish to encounter the hordes of wandering tourists in the Galleries St. Hubert.

The chimes had just sent their last vibration echoing round the square when I first heard the exquisite voice of my evidently lovely neighbour opposite.

I had often scanned the two windows with their guipure curtains, their embroidered blinds—the Belgians are fond of an ornamental lace centre—and their rose-bushes in bright vermilion-painted pots upon the sills.

It was not affluence, but it certainly was comfort, added to a feminine taste, which argued with the voice, not only beauty, but culture: and to judge by the touch on the piano, an unrivalled education.

The first strains fell like heavenly melody from the sky for the voice floated up above me, as I fancied, and must have been sung by some wandering angel who had descended near us to catch the ancient chimes.

But soon through the tranquil air I thought I caught the words which were not likely to emanate either from Gabriel or Michael. "Comme à vingt ans," was not very new even then; but sung by such a voice, its sweetness was doubly thrilling, and I listened with open mouth and beating heart to verse after verse, as the sentiment changed from gay to grave and back again to patient resignation.

Such a young voice could only regret its twenty years for song's sake.

Sweet seventeen only thought of the charming melody, and cared little for the words; though the chastened melancholy of the refrain was well preserved all through.

Ah! I could see her, poor darling, all alone; for there was only one rigid old maid to watch over her; a griffin in a silver-grey alpaca dress, who flitted weirdly past the curtains and went periodical journeys to the markets for her young mistress.

When the voice was silent, I could hear the fingers recalling Chopin's tenderest mazurkas, or Mendelssohn's songs, till tears would start to my eyes as I sympathised with the caged nightingale.

When even the piano was no longer audible, I could not resist taking my violin and interweaving the melodies I had heard, with a strain which, I flattered myself, accurately expressed my respectful longing for the invisible cantatrice.

I fell asleep that night in a seventh heaven of harmonious æons, where archangels and houris played silver trumpets and golden zithers in a sort of Walkyr fuge, while one fair head in a glory of brilliant auburn hovered permanently over the divine orchestra. The annoying part of the dream was that the head had its back towards me, not a feature could I see.

Occasionally the griffin would come in with a trombone accompaniment, much to the discomfiture of Gabriel's trumpet call: but silver trumpets, golden zithers, and auburn halos were all forgotten by the time I went across the Place in the morning to get my early coffee.

As I crossed the street I saw the griffin, quintessence of repelling respectability, with her small key and her large basket, on her way to market; and I watched for the postman who brought my letters, and actually had the hardihood to look over his shoulders as he slipped a letter under my fair neighbour's door and there read "Mdlle. Blanche Rosat" in a fine Italian hand.

"Rosat" suggested summer, the Graces and Paphos, at the least, while the youth and virgin candour of her petit nom "Blanche" corroborated all my fancy had painted, and completed the perfection of my ideal.

There was some cruel mystery attached to my poor Blanche—she was my Blanche already, as I whispered in confidence to my violin. She was never allowed to leave the house unless, as I suspected, the griffin took her out when the night shades fell over the tranquil city.

Many a time I watched at my window when the voice and the instrument had ceased; many a time I stood at the corner of the street in sanguine expectation of catching a glimpse of the pretty prisoner and her sour-visaged gaoler; but all in vain. The griffin seemed to know when I was sentry, and took especial care to take her walks abroad alone.

I now knew exactly the hours when my Blanche sat down to her piano. I know she used to expect my presence, for the guipure curtains would shake, and the lace-embroidered blind would flutter, as if some hand were there and some eye at watch to note whether or not I was at my post.

Digitized by Google

At my post? Why, I used to run away from my table d'hôte if the courses were longer than usual, or the dessert later in arriving, rather than miss a note of the divine Blanche's song. I really believe I should have burst into tears if the song had not come or the piano remained untouched after I opened my window for my nightly audience.

By night and by day Blanche so possessed my thoughts that I was determined to risk even the overwhelming angers of the griffin; and, sitting down seriously to my desk with a sheet of pink paper, highly scented with some musky horror, I wrote the first lines my poetical soul dictated to me.

I could write French well, but I had never perpetrated anything in French verse, and I fear I mixed up voices and souls, and fading forms to such a perplexing extent that Blanche, if she ever read my lines, must have doubted much of my sanity, unless her young affections were as exercised as mine.

There was no answer to my lines. My hopes had risen, when I saw the griffin with a flushed face making rapid tracks for the melon stall. I fondly hoped some three-cornered note wrapped round a pebble might fly across the street from her window into mine.

I did not receive any answer, either that day or the next.

The voice seemed to become more plaintive, more pleading, as if there were something to forgive, something to excuse; but if that was a reply, it did not satisfy my ardent devotion, and I wrote again, not in verse this time, but in correct grammatical sentimental prose.

"The prayer of an ardent admirer, your devoted slave, who longs for the day when that sweet voice will command him. If I have as yet never seen your ravishing features, I believe that so lovely must be the soul which hides behind that divine voice, that any face it owns must be heavenly in my eyes; any form that of a goddess inspired by such a voice. Listen to my prayer, sweet divinity, and let me at your feet express the delight your sweet song has afforded me."

I felt that such words could only emanate from a heart absolutely and uncontrollably in love.

At last the answer came. Only a few words, in a long distinguished hand which breathed youth and affection in every line. "Live and hope" was all it meant, and almost all it said.

That night there was a bright sparkle in the clear, melodious harmony that came out on the air. It sang of life and hope for two young hearts which pined apart, and now at last were coming together.

I wrote again more daringly, more fervently. I adored her voice, and asked to be allowed to press the fingers which touched the piano I had so long listened to.

The answer came again, and this time I was promised an appointment for the next evening, when I should be allowed to meet Blanche, my adored Blanche.

All day my heart was too much for me. It fluttered and twitted and chirped in the most aggravating way; I could neither eat nor drink, and even my violin was forgotten.

I wandered among the trees of the park, down by the side of the canal, through the palace picture galleries, without noting a Rubens or a Schneyder; along the arcades without gazing into a single shop-window.

Oh! but it was an eternity to wait until seven o'clock.

As the clock of St. Gudule struck seven I was at her door, and, finding it open, I stepped upstairs to her room.

Blanche was waiting for me. I could hear the prelude to one of Schumann's songs, as her fingers ran lightly and lovingly over the keys.

The room was in half shadow, but all within and on the walls spoke of its young mistress's taste and love of art.

In the centre of the room, concealing the music-stool and the piano from me, stood the griffin, flushed, and with her eyes cast down.

"Ah! monsieur! who could help being touched by such devotion? I feared, I dreaded the meeting, but constancy like yours——"

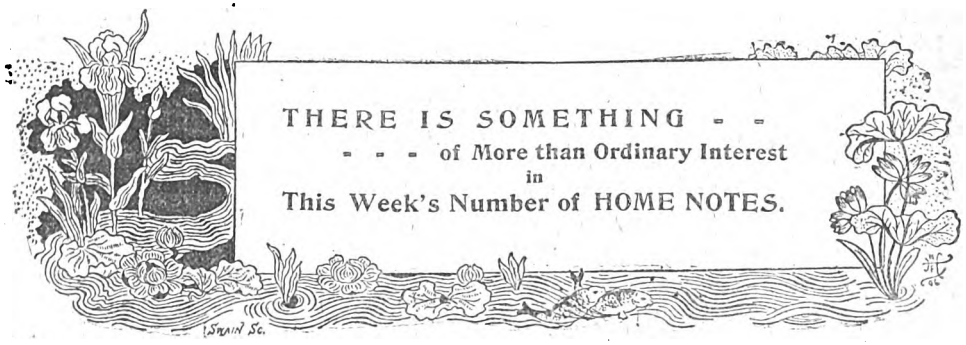
"Must be rewarded!" I gasped. "Oh! let me see my Blanche, whose angel voice has held such sweet communion with me. Bring me to Blanche!"

"She is here!" whispered the gushing griffin. "I am Blanche Rosat!"

* * * * *

It was rude, it was indeed most unfeeling, but I rushed from the room, dashed home, packed my violin into my hatbox, and left Brussels for ever. The griffin and the nightingale were one and the same. I shall never, so long as I live, trust a voice again.

M. M.



Digitized by Google

BY JOHN K. LEYS, author of "The Tenth of June," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

WHILE on a sketching tour in Wales, LAUNCELOT VERE gets into a dangerous position on the face of a precipice. His life is saved by WINIFRED DENVERS, to whom he becomes engaged. On the wedding morning LAUNCELOT fails to put in an appearance at church, and no news can be heard of him. Miss UNWIN, the village schoolmistress, has disappeared at the same time. HAROLD KENYON, a friend of LAUNCELOT'S, determines to leave Wythecombe in search of his friend, and goes to London. He finds that the missing man has drawn £75 from his bank, and also discovers several sketches of Miss UNWIN in the artist's room. PAUL SHENSTONE presses his suit with KATHERINE DALE, who unwillingly agrees to marry him in October. WINIFRED is still convinced of LAUNCELOT'S innocence of any foul play. KENYON interviews the guard of the train by which Miss UNWIN travelled to London, and finds that she was met by a man corresponding in description to VERE. On return to town he finds that Miss UNWIN has been murdered on Hampstead Heath, and the trial reveals the fact that she and VERE were at one time very friendly.

KATHERINE DALE,	A young lady with whom HAROLD KENYON is in love.
PAUL SHENSTONE,	Engaged to KATHERINE DALE.
REV. MARK DENVERS,	Rector of Wythecombe, and WINIFRED'S father.
MR. BEAUMONT,	A solicitor, and friendly with VERE.
MR. DAUNT.	An old lawyer, and friendly with VERE.

CHAPTER IX.

THE REVOLVER CASE.

WHILE Mrs. Unwin had been giving her evidence, Harold Kenyon had been exchanging signs of recognition with the Coroner's clerk, a young man named Tyler. He had been one of the junior clerks in the branch bank in which Kenyon had been employed before he went down to Darnport.

During the adjournment the two exchanged a few words, and Kenyon took the opportunity of saying:

"Wasn't there a revolver found beside that poor girl's body?"

"Yes," answered the clerk.

"Do you think you could get me an opportunity of looking at it."

"Don't know I'm sure. The police inspector has charge of it."

"Ask him for it. He will think the Coroner wants it, and give it to you at once. I only want to look at it."

Tyler did as he was asked. He got the revolver, and handed it to his friend.

The room was nearly empty; and Kenyon carried the weapon to one of the windows, that he might examine it at his leisure.

It was a dainty little thing, this murderous toy, hardly larger than the handle of an umbrella stick. Harold knew enough about small arms to see that it was of an uncommon pattern. Judging from the delicate workmanship one would have supposed that it had been manufactured on purpose to be presented to some one.

The case which Kenyon had found in Vere's room lay in one of the outside pockets of his overcoat. He drew it out of his pocket, and slipped the revolver into it. It fitted to a nicety! Every tiny projection was provided for by a depression in the soft velvet. It was only what Harold had expected; yet a shudder passed through his limbs, as he realised what the testimony of this dumb witness meant.

Suddenly a hand was laid on Harold's shoulder, and in an instant he recognised the madness of his conduct. But it was too late.

He looked up, and found a police inspector gazing at him curiously.

"That seems a very good fit. Just let me look at it, sir," said the man.

Harold thrust the revolver and case into his pocket, and confronted the officer of justice with set teeth and a frown on his face.

"If I'm not mistaken," said the policeman, "that's the very weapon I'm supposed to have charge of. I thought the Coroner wanted to have a look at it, or I wouldn't have let it out o' my sight. Let me see it for a moment. If it's not the right one I'll give it back to you."

To have hesitated longer would simply have brought Tyler into trouble without improving matters in the least. Harold disengaged the revolver from the case without drawing it out of his pocket, and then handing it to the policeman, walked hastily to the door.

"Not so fast, sir," said the inspector, making a sign to a comrade who stood by the door. "This is the weapon, sure enough. And now, perhaps you'll let me have a look at the case?"

Harold took time to consider.

The policeman had no right to arrest him, no power to search him and take the case from him. But the officer would immediately appeal to the Coroner, who, he felt sure, legally or illegally, would never let him leave the premises a free man till he had given up the case. Obstinacy could only result in his being committed to prison for contempt of court, and in that event the revolver-case would be taken by force.

He surrendered the case; and the inspector, telling his subordinate to keep an eye on Harold, carried it, with the revolver, to the Coroner.

Thirty seconds had not elapsed before the Coroner came into the room, an excited look on his face.

"Where is the gentleman? Oh, this is he! I presume you have come here to give information about this revolver."

"No, I never saw the thing before, to my knowledge."

"About the case then."

"No. It isn't mine."

"Who gave it to you? I see the revolver fits it accurately." Then, seeing that Kenyon made no reply, he added: "You need not trouble to answer. The jury will be back in five minutes; and when the court reassembles, I shall summon you as a witness."

Almost before he could frame a reply, a subpœna was thrust into his hand. In a few minutes he found himself at the table, the Testament in his hand. He laid the book down without kissing it.

Digitized by Google

"Stop a moment," he said to the Coroner. "You seem to be under a misapprehension. I know nothing whatever about this girl, or the manner in which she came by her death. I never saw her in my life. Nor did I ever see the revolver found beside her. I merely looked at it out of curiosity. It is true it fits a pistol case I had in my pocket; but that is merely an accident. Any other revolver—many revolvers, at any rate—would fit it equally well."

"Very true, perhaps," said the Coroner in a guarded manner, "but it is quite necessary that I should put one question to you."

"What is that, sir?" interrupted Kenyon.

"And that you should answer it upon oath. Be good enough to take the book once more in your right hand."

There was no escape; and Harold had time to reflect, as the Coroner arranged his papers, that the time for concealment had gone by. The more he fenced with the Coroner's questions and tried to screen his friend, the more would he arouse and strengthen suspicion. If he refused to answer, he would cause everyone to believe that he knew something more damning than even the possession of the case.

"Where did you get this case?" was the Coroner's first question.

Kenyon made no reply.

"I will give you a minute or two to make up your mind," said the Coroner.

For two minutes by the clock there was dead silence in the room. Then the Coroner spoke again.

"I can see that you are trying to shield some one, some friend, probably, and to a certain extent I sympathise with you. But, believe me, you are only injuring your friend's cause. Of course, if you persist in remaining silent, you will have to go to prison, and we shall get the information we want in some other way."

Before Kenyon could make up his mind as to how he should shape his reply, Mrs. Unwin, looking fixedly at the revolver, which lay upon the table in its case, said:

"That's Mr. Vere's revolver, sir. I'm sure of it. Now that it is in the case I can swear to it. He brought it down to Richmond, to Mr. Pascoe's I mean, to put it in a picture he was painting."

"Then your daughter may have borrowed it, may have had it by her all this time," observed the Coroner. And without giving the woman time to reply, he added, speaking to Kenyon: "You see that possession of the revolver-case cannot be conclusive evidence against any one. But we can easily find Mr. Vere's address; and if the case was his, some one must have seen it in his room. We shall be able to get corroboration of Mrs. Unwin's testimony independently of you. Come, now. Reflect that if your friend is really guilty you ought not to stand in the way of justice reaching him. If he is innocent, as I hope he is, his innocence will be made clear. You picked up that case in Mr. Vere's room, did you not?"

"Yes, I did."

The words were spoken at last, and Harold hardly knew whether he was acting the part of a true man or that of a false friend as he spoke them.

"What is his address?"

"Twenty-six Cumber Street."

"He must be sent for at once," said the Coroner, turning to a policeman.

"It is of no use," said Harold. "He is not at home. He has not been at his rooms since——"

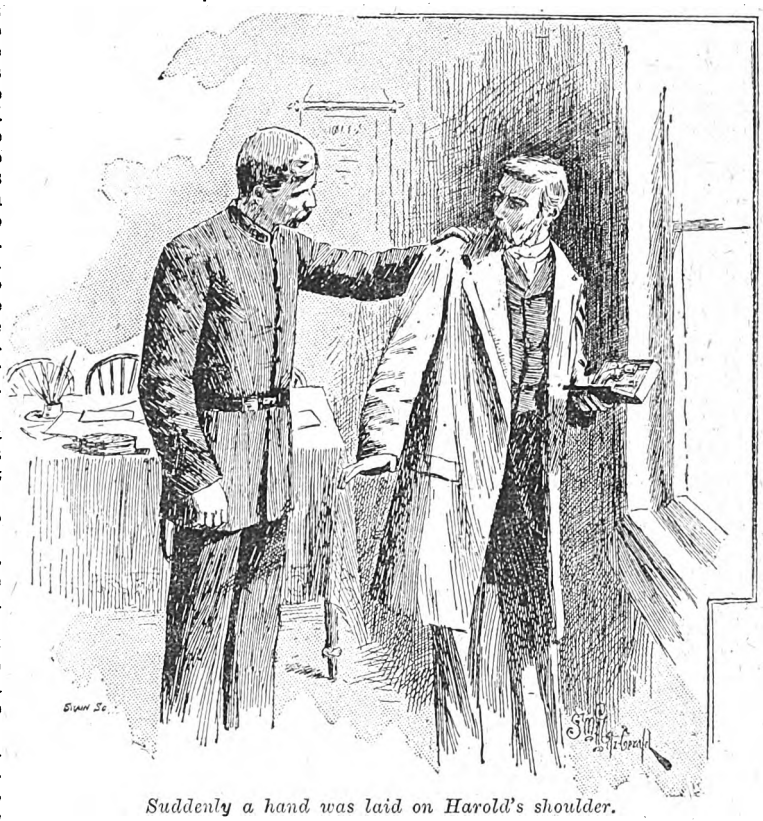
He stopped, terror-stricken. What new blunder had he been guilty of?

"Since when has Mr. Vere been absent from home?" asked the Coroner.

"We can easily find out by applying to his housekeeper or servants," he added.

This was true enough. A dozen people knew as much of Vere's disappearances as he did. "But oh!" thought Kenyon, "it is hard that I should be the one chosen by Fate to swear away my old friend's life!"

He resolved to say no more. Come what might he would no longer bear witness against Vere. He remained obstinately silent; and the Coroner adjourned the inquiry for a week. As he now had his finger on the clue he wanted, and had privately a good deal of sympathy for Kenyon, he did not take the extreme measure of sending him to prison for refusing to answer questions.



Suddenly a hand was laid on Harold's shoulder.

Next day's newspapers carried a report of these proceedings all over the country; and when the inquiry was resumed there was no lack of evidence. It was shown that the time of Jane Unwin's elopement exactly coincided with the time of Vere's disappearance; and—most fatal witness of all—Martin, the railway guard, came forward to tell what he had observed on the platform at Paddington.

Kenyon, who had returned to Darnport for the week, went up to town for the adjourned inquest. He felt as if he owed that much to the Coroner, who might have enforced his attendance in a very unpleasant way.

But he could not bring himself to enter the crowded court-room. He got a room upstairs, and waited there for the verdict.

Soon, terribly soon, it came——

"Wilful murder against Launcelot Vere."

And Harold Kenyon left the inn, feeling as if he had played the part of a traitor.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER X.

A Faithful Heart.

On the evening of the day when the verdict was delivered, two girls were sitting together in a small room in the upper flat of Wythecombe Rectory. They were Winnie Denvers and Katherine Dale. Winnie's bedroom had been turned into a kind of sitting-room, for there were few days when she felt strong enough to go downstairs.

It was a chilly evening, the day had been wet and gloomy, and a fire had been lit. The two girls sat before it, hand in hand, without speaking. They were generally silent, or all but silent, when they were alone together. Each had her own sorrow; and although Kate never spoke of hers, Winnie suspected it, and gave her an unspoken sympathy. Once or twice she had tried to make Kate confide in her fully; but she saw that the effort to speak would cost her friend too much.

"That's Mr. Vere's revolver, sir."

"The past cannot be undone," Kate had said once, with a look in her eyes that Winnie had never seen in any face before.

"No," said Kate decisively. "Better—" she stopped. "What does it matter?" she said, after a long pause. "We were not sent into the world simply to be happy."

Winnie was eager to say more; but the conversation was interrupted, and it had never been renewed.

Sitting there in the firelight Kate was wondering whether her companion's fate or her own were the hardest—to live in suspense as to the fate of one who is dearer than all the world, or to be forced into a loveless marriage, compelled to fly from what the heart hungers for.

A knock came to the door—a maidservant entered and put a card into Katherine's hand.

"For me! How can that be?" she said, as she took the bit of pasteboard. Then she flushed up, and said wonderingly: "At this hour! To have followed me here! I can't see him."

"It is not past—there is time yet to draw back," the younger girl had whispered.

"Who is it, Katie? Oh, Mr. Kenyon! You must see him—at once, Kate. Oh, go this moment. He may have news."

"There is little chance of that, I fear. If there had been good news he would have telegraphed. But if you wish it I will see him for a moment."

Katherine felt almost like a hypocrite as she said this; for although she felt that it was presumptuous in Mr. Kenyon to come after her to the Rectory, something in her heart cried out so loudly that she must see him, that she must hear his voice, if only for a moment, that she seemed to have no power to resist it. She moved slowly, but her feet longed to run; and Winnie, agitated and tearful, urged her to make haste.

Outside the door of the library—the room into which Kenyon had been shown—she paused, to obtain full command of her features; and in that moment of waiting she heard a sigh so sad and so profound, that it told her more of Kenyon's state of mind than he could have made known to her in hours of speech.

Softly opening the door, she went in. He was standing with his elbows on the mantelpiece, leaning his head on his hands. At the sound of her entrance he turned round, and smiled a little as he held out his hand; but his face, Kate noticed, was pale and haggard.

"You may be sure, Miss Dale," he began, "that I would not have intruded on you here, at this time of night, without some good reason."

"Have you news—of him?"

"Not in the sense you mean. But you know that Jane Unwin was found dead, and that an inquest was held?"

"Yes, we saw that in the newspapers. We are anxiously waiting for to-morrow's paper to see what the verdict is."

"I came here to-night to ask you to warn Mrs. Denvers not to let her daughter see the paper to-morrow."

"Why? What will be in it?"

"Do you think she—Miss Winifred—still cares for Vere?"

"I'm afraid there's no doubt of that."

"Then next morning's news will be dreadful for her to hear! Yet she must know it sooner or later."

"What is it?"

"The jury have found that Jane Unwin was—murdered—by Launcelot Vere."

"Great heaven!—You do not believe it?"

"Miss Dale, for days I have been asking myself that question. I cannot answer it. A month ago I would almost have staked my soul's welfare on Launcelot's innocence. I would have scouted the idea of such a thing being possible. But, alas! the proofs are so clear! They cannot have been manufactured. We know that Miss Unwin left Wythecombe suddenly, telegraphing to some one on her way up to London, and that she was met by Launcelot. They left the station together, and have never been seen since—never till the poor woman's body is found with her old lover's portrait next her heart, and his pistol lying at her side."

"She may have taken the pistol and shot herself with it!" cried Kate.

"That has been my sole ground for hope; but the doctors are very positive that the light clothes she wore would have been singed if she had fired the revolver herself. I am ready and anxious to hope to the last; but I confess that had I been on the jury I would have concurred in the verdict. We are not the first—I should say I am not the first—who has been ready to take an oath that a friend was innocent, only to find that the bitter truth was none the less true!"

"Are you speaking of Launcelot, Mr. Kenyon?"

Harold and Kate both started. It was Winnie. Kate had unintentionally left the door ajar, and they had not heard Winnie come in. Her impatience to hear what Kenyon had to say had driven her downstairs. Neither

Digitized by Google

Harold nor Kate knew what to say to her. She read evil tidings in their downcast looks, but she boldly repeated her question: "Are you speaking of Launcelot?"

Still no one answered her, and she went on:

"For, if you are, I can only say this, neither of you knows anything at all about him. You have been trying," she continued, turning to Kenyon, "you have been trying to find out what has become of him ever since—ever since—" her lips trembled pitifully, but she mastered herself and went on—"ever since he went away. And what have you found out? Nothing! I don't blame you for a moment. I am grateful to you; yes, I am grateful, for I am sure you did all that any could have done. But you have not discovered what became of Launcelot. And in the meantime I am not going to think ill of him, or to listen to anyone who believes ill of him."

Harold and Kate looked at each other in wonder, and then back to Winnie. The slight fair-haired little thing stood before them. Her attitude was entirely changed. Her figure was drawn up, her eyes flashing indignantly, her small white hands clenched.

"Very well, my dear, we will wait for news," said Kate soothingly; and she stepped forward to take her hand and lead her upstairs.

A maidservant entered and put a card into Katherine's hand.

"You know something," she said, drawing back from her friend, and turning to Harold. "I am not afraid to hear it. What is your news?"

Harold threw an appealing look at Kate, and remained silent.

"Was it not because you have heard something, some rumour perhaps, about Launcelot, that you came here to-night?"

Then suddenly her manner became harder, more defiant than ever.

"Have you come from London?" she asked. "Possibly. Have you any news of the inquest? Tell me if you have."

Again Harold's eyes sought Katherine's for guidance. And this time they said: "Speak!" She felt certain that Winifred would never be better able to hear the dreaded word "murder" joined with her lover's name than she was at that moment.

"There was a man named Martin, a railway guard," began Harold. He paused.

"Yes?" from Winifred.

"He came before the Coroner, and said he had seen Launcelot meet Jane Unwin at Paddington, the day she left here."

"Yes?"

"And so the jury thought he must be responsible for her death."

"But she committed suicide, poor thing, didn't she?"

"I cannot say. The doctors declare that she could not have done so."

"But some one else may have killed her."

"Perhaps so."

"Or it may have been an accident."

Harold was silent.

"Don't you think so?"

"I'm afraid that is impossible," said Kenyon, almost in a whisper. For a few moments there was silence in the room. Then Winnie began to speak again, her breast heaving with emotion.

"And they think Launcelot is responsible — how responsible?"

"Miss Denvers, don't ask me. We may be thankful now that I did not succeed in tracing Vere."

"What! They think he murdered her?"

A smile half of amazement, half of contempt, lit up her face.

"And perhaps you think so too? What was it you were saying when I came into the room—that others who had been ready to stake their existence on a friend's innocence had been deceived? That was Launcelot you were speaking of, wasn't it? And you think he shot the woman?"

"I hope, I pray it may not be true; but what am I to think? The evidence——" He stopped. Better, he thought, leave Winnie to believe in her lover's innocence if she could.

"And this is a man's friendship!" she cried scornfully. "A thing that goes by reason, and evidence; it is rational, sensible. It knows nothing of faith. It leaves folly of that kind to women, I suppose."

Harold said nothing. He was amazed—amazed that this tender and delicate creature should be capable of attacking anyone as she was now attacking him. Her cheeks and eyes burned with indignation. She looked as though the other two had offered her some mortal insult. And every word she uttered cut Harold Kenyon like the lash of a whip.

Digitized by Google

"You forget," he said, stung by her sarcasm, "that he was seen with her at Paddington."

"The man told a lie," said Winifred calmly, "or he was mistaken. It doesn't matter which."

"I think it is quite possible that he was mistaken," said Katherine.

"Oh, Kate! Kate!" cried the girl, throwing herself into her friend's arms, while her overstrung nerves found relief in a flood of tears, "I have been longing to ask you if you really believe Launcelot guilty"—she shuddered now as she spoke the words—"of murdering poor Miss Unwin, and I didn't dare. Because I was afraid you might say that you did believe it. And then—then we couldn't have been friends any longer, could we? I couldn't really love anyone that thought Launcelot a murderer. But I have you still."

She was sitting now on Kate's knees, one arm thrown round her neck. She turned to Harold, her sweet blue eyes still swimming in tears.

"We are not quite so irrational as you think," she said, smiling through her tears. "Do you suppose I have not thought over every circumstance, and balanced one thing against the other, as well as you? But you give too much weight to details. You think too much of coincidences, which may, after all, be purely accidental. And you don't give weight enough to what you know of a man's character."

"I did and I do give great weight to Vere's character. He is the last man in the world I should have believed guilty of such a crime. Even now I cannot think that he is guilty."

"But you fear that he is guilty?"

Harold said nothing.

"And I know he is not guilty."

Winnie's tones rang out strong and clear. She looked from Kate to Harold and back to Kate, as if she had determined to convert them both to her opinion.

"I suppose you would say that if Launcelot eloped with Jane Unwin it must have been he that shot her. But I do not admit that for a moment. What I feel, is that although he might conceivably have been weak enough to run away with her, it is not conceivable that he could be wicked enough to take her life."

"And perhaps you think so too?"

"Launcelot to take the life of a woman, a woman who loved him!" she cried. "It is impossible. It is not true! Ah! He must be ill, very ill, or he would write to me. And if I were a man, I would find him. Forgive me!" she cried suddenly, laying her hand on Harold's sleeve, and looking up in his face with the frank, fearless gaze of a child. "It was so thoughtless of me to say that, when you have been working so hard in your friend's cause. But I suppose a girl thinks she must win when she fights for the one she loves. You know," she added, with a winning smile, "you know I am almost Launcelot's wife."

"Oh, Kate! Kate!" cried the girl.

CHAPTER XI.

A FALSE STEP.

IT was now time for Kate to return home; and Harold offered, as a matter of course, to walk with her as far as her mother's door.

The two set out together, and walked side by side for some minutes in perfect silence.

"Thank God she can still believe him innocent!" cried Harold, evidently referring to the girl they had just left.

"It will lighten the blow for her wonderfully," answered Kate. "But I wonder whether she is right in thinking that one can be as sure of anyone as she is of her lover. Is it true that one human being can rationally say of another, 'I am justified in refusing to believe, against any conceivable weight of evidence, that this man committed such a crime?'"

"In some cases," answered Harold, "such faith would be justified by the result. But very often, I fear, it would not."

"I suppose you are right," said Kate with a sigh.

They were only a few yards from Mrs. Dale's house, when they noticed a figure on the road before them. A step or two more, and they saw it was Paul Shenstone.

"Is that you, Kate? What made you so late? Your mother is getting quite anxious, and begged me to come in search of you."

"I will bid you good-night, then, Miss Dale," said Kenyon. "Good-night, Shenstone."

"Good-night, and thank you so much for bringing Miss Dale home," said Shenstone with elaborate politeness.

Kate laid her small gloved hand in Harold's for an instant, but said nothing.

Kenyon's footsteps died away, and the other two paced slowly on together.

Kate shivered, not from cold, for the air, though damp, was warm.

Digitized by Google

"Did he bring any news?" asked Shenstone abruptly.

"The jury have found a verdict against Vere."

"Wilful murder?"

"Yes."

"I thought so."

"Paul, you do not believe him guilty?"

"I don't see how anyone can suppose that he is innocent, if evidence is worth anything. But it was not about that I wished to speak to you."

"Won't another time do, Paul? You said my mother was anxious."

"She is not so anxious as not to be able to wait while I have said what I have got to say," said Shenstone coolly. "It won't take long."

Still he paused for a minute or two, and Kate waited patiently.

"I don't like your seeing so much of that fellow Kenyon," he said abruptly.

Kate started. It had never occurred to her that Paul would be jealous, seeing that there had never been anything approaching intimacy between the young banker and herself.

She paused for a moment before replying. Then she said: "I do not think I have given you any cause for complaint. Mr. Kenyon was introduced to me in the ordinary way; and no one can say that he is not a person of good reputation. And I have seen very little of him. However, if you object to my seeing him at all, I shall drop the acquaintance. Of course," she added, "I don't mean that I shall deny myself to him, especially if he should ask me to help him in clearing his friend from the accusation he is lying under. Indeed, that is the only subject that has brought us together at all."

"Exactly," said Shenstone. "I don't think that is a matter you should be mixed up with in any way."

"I am not mixed up with it," said Kate, "except in the way of doing what I can to cheer poor Winifred."

"Of course she will have no more to do with Vere after this?"

"On the contrary, she persists that he is innocent, and considers herself as still engaged to him."

"But this is simply infatuation!"

"It shows great faith, certainly. And yet, I think she may be right. She must know best——"

"What nonsense!" burst in Shenstone. "As if a girl's fancies were to be weighed against facts! Of course she must take her own course, if her father is fool enough to allow it. But I object to your being associated in people's minds with her

It was Paul Shenstone.

"Fool that I am!"

and Kenyon as Vere's defenders."

"I understand," said Kate quietly, "I will do nothing to set myself up as either his defender or his accuser. And now I think I must bid you good-night."

They had been approaching the garden gate as they talked, and as Kate said these last words she opened the gate and passed inside, glad to have brought the conversation to an end without a quarrel, and without having absolutely promised not to see Harold Kenyon again.

Mrs. Dale was waiting, ready to open the door.

"I am sorry to be so late, mamma," said Kate, as she crossed the threshold; "but you need not have been anxious about me."

"I wasn't anxious, my dear. I knew one of the servants would see you home, or come to say that they had kept you over night at the Rectory."

"Didn't you say to Mr. Shenstone that you were getting anxious about me?"

"Mr. Shenstone? No. He called in the early part of the evening; and when I told him you were at the Rectory he went away, and I have not seen him since."

Katherine's lip curled with disdain as she went slowly upstairs. It was a small matter. Mr. Shenstone might easily have imagined himself to be saying that Mrs. Dale must be feeling anxious, or something of that kind. But Kate, who had an almost Quakerish scrupulosity in matters of truth or falsehood, felt offended and disgusted. Her mother's name had been brought in, without the least warrant, in order to make it appear that she had been to blame, when she had not in the least.

Meanwhile Shenstone was walking rapidly home, in a state of great anger against Katherine, Kenyon, and himself most of all.

"Fool that I am!" he cried out, clenching his fists savagely. "And the wedding day not fixed yet! I must apologise, eat humble pie; that always fetches women. I suppose I must give way about that fellow Kenyon—confound it. I may as well do so gracefully, for I see she would not obey me if I insisted on her not seeing him again. Well! She can hardly refuse now to fix an early day for our marriage, on the score of sympathy with Miss Denvers; that's one comfort;" and a peculiar smile flitted over Shenstone's features as this thought crossed his mind.

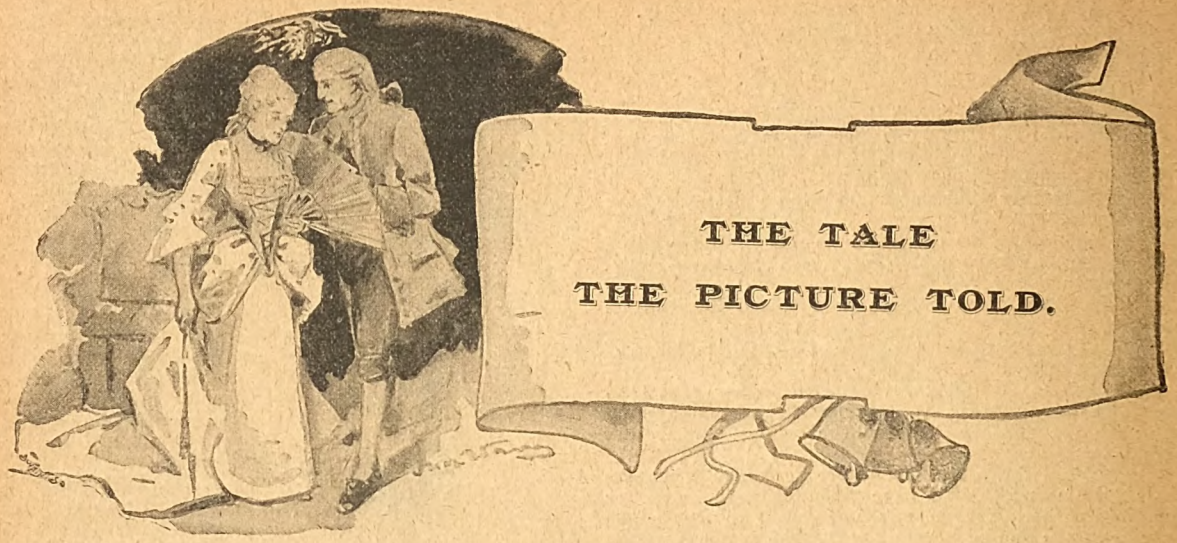
"I must see Kate to-morrow," he added to himself, "put myself straight with her, and, if possible, get her to fix the marriage day not later than the twelfth of next month."

(To be continued.)

IT IS NOT TOO LATE,

even now, to start reading "The Final War," in Pearson's Weekly. Every instalment is crammed with stirring incidents.

Digitized by Google



THE TALE THE PICTURE TOLD.

I HAD an adventure to-day. Can you believe that my diary is steeped in every page with the gloomy monotony of the last ten years? An adventure it terrifies me to remember, and yet it gives me strange thrills of joy—if it is joy. What experiences have I ever had of happiness that I should know the sensation when it comes?

"Happiness, content, pleasure!" I write the three words and look at them stupidly, wondering at their meaning, as if they were an unknown language. Are they not? Fifteen years ago my mother died, and two days afterwards my father blew out his brains because the bank in which all his money was deposited failed. It was a brave thing to do, to commit suicide, leaving me—a child of four years old—to find out what the world means by charity. I begged or starved, as the case might be, varying the programme by sobbing myself to sleep after being beaten.

When I was nine years old the hag who gave me a corner in a cellar for a bedroom, a crust for a meal, told me my uncle had come from France, and was going to take me away. Any change seemed glorious to me, and when two police officers took me to court, and I was formally identified as Editha Berri and as formally given over to the guardianship of my mother's brother, Gordon Willoughby, I put my hand in that of the stern man who claimed me, and actually imagined I was going to a better home than the corner of the dark damp cellar—a better guardian than the hag who had beaten me for four years. We came here.

Oh, merciful Heaven! what had I—a baby of nine years—ever done, to be brought here?

The house is immense, and I begged in a city long enough to know a big house when I see one. The grounds are extensive, and a high wall shuts us in on all four sides.

One grim woman keeps the rooms we occupy in order, and the garden and orchard run to waste. Two miles off there is a village, and five miles beyond that, a city.

Every week a man drives up to the gate from the city, and delivers the goods ordered the week before, taking fresh orders. And I notice that the name upon the packages is "Mr. Gordon," never "Gordon Willoughby."

My uncle taught me to read and write and gave me the key of the bookcases in the library, leaving me to finish my education or leave it unfinished, as I thought fit. There is a piano in the house, and I have learned to touch the keys and make a noise that pleases me. I wonder if that is music.

In the library there are about fifty novels, and I have read every one, and so I can picture the life other girls lead and contrast it with mine. In ten years I have never been beyond the tall iron gate that shuts me in this prison more than a dozen times. There is a stretch of seabeach beyond them, and a horrible line of cliffs overhanging the sea. I have walked there a few times, but I hate it! I hate the cliffs!

I think that is because of the picture. My uncle is a student and an artist, I suppose. He shuts himself up in his study all day, never coming to his meals, which are carried to him, while I eat mine in the kitchen with Anne. There, in his study, he reads and paints all day.

One picture was brought here when his luggage came, ten years ago, and was hung in the study, and I have seen him sit for hours and look at it with a glare in his eyes that was horrible to see.

This is the picture. Ugh! how I hate it!

In the very centre are the cliffs beyond the walls of this prison. Great cruel rocks rising from the sea, with a stretch of land at the top. Lying flat upon his face upon the highest rock, looking over into the hungry sea, is a man.

He is very handsome, with bright brown curling hair, and great blue eyes, and in his face is an expression of eager search—a look of terror.

Below him, holding to the rocks with torn, bleeding hands, and held by his clothing from the fearful fall that seems imminent, is a second man, quite out of the other's sight, under the overhanging shelf of rock. You can see that this one has fallen over the cliff, caught by his clothing to the ragged rocks, and then swinging under, holds on by his hands, quite hidden from the one above him.

And this second man is my uncle Gordon.

There is the same cruel face, narrow forehead, small mouth, large dark eyes. He is aged—now has long white hair and a heavy white beard, but the man in the picture is uncle Gordon, for all that, when he was young, and, in a cruel, stern fashion, handsome.

Digitized by Google

In his pictured face, too, is the same expression of malignant triumph I have seen there hundreds of times when he sat looking at the picture.

In one corner of this charming work of art, under the crest of an incoming wave, is the name, Gordon Willoughby, and a date twenty-five years old this year.

And this brings me to my adventure. It has been fearfully close and hot all day, and three or four hours ago I took my broad brimmed hat and went to the beach. I don't know why I walked to the cliffs, hating them as I do, but I did. I stood looking up at them from the beach, when I saw a man coming over the path leading to the sea, on top of the rocks. I do not often see people out there without scampering home, feeling how odd I look. But to-day I stood still and looked at the man, till he stopped and then lay flat on his face and peeped over the rocks, with his face as white as death.

I knew he would, because his face was the face in the picture, with brown curly hair and big blue eyes.

Yet the picture is twenty-five years old, and this man was younger than that, I am sure, though I do not see so many faces that I am a good judge of age.

I wonder what he looked for? I wonder if he has been twenty-five years seeking it? It gives me a feeling of wild terror to think of the picture, and then of the man I saw to-day.

He rose to his feet again while I stood staring at him, as I am sure no young heroine in any of my fifty novels would have stared, and then he sauntered off by the way he had come. How was I to guess he was coming down the path winding round the rocks to the beach? I never imagined he was near me till a voice close at my side said: "Pardon me!" and I turned to face him. I wonder what colour my face was? Green, I should judge by his cry of horror.

"You are ill?" he cried.

"No," I answered. "You startled me. We seldom see strangers in this out-of-the-way place."

He looked at me with a strange sort of pity in his blue eyes. Then he said:

"Can you direct me to a house that was called, years ago, Hilton Hall?"

I shook my head.

"I never heard of it. You had better ask in the village."

"I have done so. They told me I could see from the cliffs on old stone house, with a high brick wall around it. I can barely trace this place for the dense growth of trees. But, pardon me again, you came from the iron gate set in that wall, so I ventured to speak to you."

"I never heard the place called Hilton Hall," I said, "and I lived there ten years."

"The village people told me a hermit lived there named Gordon."

"My uncle."

"Gordon," he said, as if the name was familiar in his mind. "Well it is a common name."

I was about to tell him the rest of the name, and then paused, with the same terror clutching my heart that had seized it when I first saw his face. I wondered why?

He talked to me after that of the sea, and the views to be sketched near us, of which I knew nothing, and then he left me.

But he gave me a card with his name upon it, and asked me mine. I have the card here. The name upon it is: "Francis Hilton, Weasels Club, London."

Will he come again? Is it joy or fear that makes my heart beat so heavily, my hands so cold? I wonder if my uncle would look at the living face as he looks at the pictured one? If he did I should expect him to spring upon Francis Hilton, and tear him to pieces.

* * * * *

While Editha Berri wrote diligently in her diary, finding some relief from the dreary monotony of life even in the recording of her "adventure," Francis Hilton was walking briskly to the village. In the hotel there, he wrote a letter, and this was its purport:

"Dear Mother,—I think I am on the right track, but I cannot write much news as yet. I went to-day to the cliffs, and I am sure I found the spot. I knelt down and crept along, peering over the edge as if after twenty-five years the sea would give up its dead, or the rocks tell their secret.

"It is wild hope we are chasing, but I am sure to-day those dying words were more than mere delirious raving. Yet my clue is still faint. But I will tell you what I have learned.

"First, that ten years ago Hilton Hall was purchased by a man whose name is Gordon. That is curious—is it not? Gordon!

"Since he has lived there, no one outside of his household has ever seen his face. He sends his orders for food and necessaries to the city beyond here by a grocer's man, who has never been inside the gate, he tells me, but takes a written paper from an old woman and gives her the goods. You can easily understand that there are many stories told of this recluse. One man who was hired to unpack the books and furniture when the hermit took possession, describes him as a very old man, with white hair and beard and large black eyes that glare like a wolf's.

"To-day I was on the cliffs, and looking down upon the beach, saw a girl gazing up at me with an intentness that was very curious. She was the strangest figure I ever saw in my life, and I went down to look at her more closely.

"The path round the rocks brought me to her side unperceived, as she was facing the cliffs, and it came out upon the beach some little distance beyond them. She was still looking up at them—so absorbed, she did not hear me—and I could not help staring at her dress.

"It consisted of a long straight robe of brown cotton cloth, belted with a morocco belt, without collar, cuffs or one shred of trimming. Her hair, that is intensely black, hung in two heavy braids far below her waist, and upon her head was a broad-brimmed hat of the coarsest straw. Her shoes were of heavy leather, such as boys wear.

"When I spoke to her she grew so ghastly white that I was afraid she would faint, and in her eyes was a wild terror. Why should she be so afraid?

"After a little time she regained her natural colour, though she was constrained and shy. But she is gloriously beautiful. Think of beauty that could triumph over her hideous dress!

"With eyes as black as coals—large, deep eyes, fringed by long, silky black lashes—and with hair dark as a starless midnight, she has a skin as fair as your own, mother—and I never saw one more purely blonde than yours. There was no colour in her cheeks to-day, but I fancy they can bloom like twin roses. Her features are not small, but classic in regularity, and her mouth is simply perfect, grave or smiling, to show the rows of pearls the dainty little lips cover. She is tall and slender, but very graceful, and her hands are of rare beauty.

Digitized by Google

"Her name is Editha Berri, and she is niece to the mysterious Mr. Gordon, of Hilton Hall. Does that help you at all?

"To-morrow I shall try to gain admittance to this enchanted castle that holds so fair a princess.

"In the meantime, mother, try to ascertain if he had a niece and if her name was Editha Berri."

There was more in the letter—chiefly the loving questions of a son to a dearly beloved mother.

Having sealed, directed and posted it, Francis Hilton strolled about the village, chatting with all who were so disposed, but adding little to his meagre stock of information about the recluse of Hilton Hall.

* * * * *

How many years may one live in a week? It is just a week since Frank Hilton came here, and when I sit and count the hours I have spent beside him they seem to cover more of my life than the whole nineteen years I had lived before he came.

Lived! No—no, existed, stagnated, fainted! I have only lived in this great, glorious week. Every day I have met him on the beach, in the shadow of the cliffs that hang over some strange mystery in his life and mine—a mystery I dare not yet touch, but which must be revealed. I know that; I feel it, but I dare not help to tear away the veil.

Every day he tries to enter here upon one pretext or another. Only to-day he told me he was born here—here in this room where I am writing, and he wanted to visit the spot, and I promised to ask my uncle's permission.

But I dare not! He will kill him for having the face he so hates—the face in the picture. I am so afraid of my uncle. He never has given me a kind word in all these weary ten years. Even the old hag who used to beat me called me "Honey" when she was good-natured. But my uncle rarely sees me, rarely speaks to me, and my name drops from his lips, cold and stern.

He has fed and sheltered me for ten years, so I suppose he does not actually hate me, and, indeed, he never glares at me as he does at that odious picture I hate worse than before since the blue-eyed man sprang to life.

I have an idea that my utterly hideous dress might possibly be replaced by something better, and yesterday I plucked up courage and asked my uncle if Anne might order for me a pretty dress or two.

He looked at me as if he would strike me in another minute, and cried:

"You are a pauper—you are a pauper! and you shall dress like one!"

I ran away frightened at his voice and those horrible glaring eyes, and I ran against Anne.

She must have heard, for she said: "Don't anger him like that again. And never ask a miser for more than he gives, or he may take even that away."

So he is a miser. Now, I think of it, I don't remember that I ever heard Anne say so many words at one time before. Are we growing talkative, I wonder?

Although I was so frightened yesterday I made another descent upon my uncle this morning.

Oh, how my heart trembles to think of it!

I went into the study, and after saying "Good-morning!" and getting no answer, said:

"Uncle Gordon, was this house ever called Hilton Hall?"

Ugh! It makes me shiver to think now of the dead-white ghastly face lifted from his book. But his eyes were like coals of fire.

"Why do you ask?" he said, and then I was most thankful that I had prepared the first lie I ever told.

"Because I found this in the attic," I said, and put before him an old primer, upon whose first page was written: "Francis Hilton, Hilton Hall."

It was only the reason I gave for asking that was a lie. I actually did find the primer, having made many voyages of exploration in the house during the last week.

But my lie was nothing to his, for, regaining his self-possession with a jerk, he said:

"I only bought the house ten years ago. I know nothing of its former possessors."

He bent his head over the book again, and I was creeping out, thankful to escape so easily, when he called me back.

"Editha!"

I never heard this name softly spoken by my uncle, but it was hard then as iron smiting iron.

I looked into his face—set and stern, white as death.

"I thought your life would preclude all vulgar curiosity," he said; "but since that distinguishing characteristic of your sex has risen in your heart, understand that it must be fed elsewhere. Any prying into my life, my house, my affairs, will be followed by your instant dismissal from all of them. I took you from the gutter, and I can thrust you back again. Go!"

And he would do it. A week ago I do not think the threat would have moved me. There is at least freedom in the gutter. Beggars get a kind word sometimes with the penny charity offers. But here what is mine but mere food and shelter? I do not think there is a beggar alive who would give her clothes for mine.

Yet I cling to this life now, to this home, because the beach lies beyond, and on the beach I meet Frank. He tells me to call him so. And never were softer syllables than his voice makes of the name Editha.

The world that was so sombre and gloomy to me is bright and glad when he speaks. I wonder if love has come into my life, as it came to the heroines of my fifty novels! Every one of the fifty had a lover. But then every one of the fifty was wonderfully beautiful, and the rich one had trailing silks and glossy satins to wear, while even the very poorest had dainty calicoes and white ruffles and ribbons.

* * * * *

"Dear Mother,—Will you think I am utterly mad if I beg of you to join me here and to see the woman I love, and try to throw some sunshine upon her life? I write it again—the woman I love—or, rather, the poor, friendless, desolate child I long to gather into my arms and comfort.

"I dare to write so to you, knowing your firm belief that marriage is a sacred meeting of heart in which no worldly consideration should be allowed to enter. We have talked of it so often, mother, that I know when I tell you I love Editha Berri that you will come to me and tell me how to win her.

"Just one little week has taught me the sweet life lesson and to her it has come as well. She is not versed in any art that will hide her heart from me, and she loves me. When you hear the story of her life you will not wonder. I beg of you to come and snatch her from it.

"It did not seem to me honourable to try to steal her away till to-day, when she told me her uncle had called her a pauper. If she is a pauper I will take her away. In the village she is considered the heiress of a miser's hoarded wealth. But her uncle himself informed her of her poverty.

Digitized by Google

"Are you not glad we are rich enough to choose a pauper, if we wish, to share our home? I am. I will not tell you more until you come. Let me know when to meet you."

* * * * *

Three days more—oh, what dreadful days! All the mystery is explained, but at what a cost! Did I murder my uncle? I am alone in this room for the last time. To-morrow I am to be taken away to light, happiness and love. Let me write the story of these last three days.

To-day is Friday. It was on Tuesday I wrote here last. Wednesday was a glorious summer day, with the sunshine flooding everything, turning the sea to molten gold. I went out early, and Frank was on the beach.

In one hour I had ceased to envy my fifty heroines their silks and satins, their fine homes, balls and pleasures. For Frank loves me—loves me! In spite of my hideous dress, my want of early attraction, he loves me. He asked me to be his wife, and, strangest of all, told me his mother was coming to the village hotel on that same day to welcome me. Only yesterday he wrote to her, and to-day she telegraphed him to meet her by the train that comes to H—— at three o'clock.

So we arranged our plans. I was to tell my uncle that I was going to marry Frank Hilton, and walk straight out of the house to the beach, where at five o'clock Frank would be waiting to take me to his mother. He told me she would love me for his sake, and I thought my heart would break for joy.

I came home, determined not to speak to my uncle until just before five o'clock, so that if he was furious I would run away direct to Frank.

I opened the chest where I kept my possessions. In it I found one change of underclothing. I wonder what one of my fifty heroines would say to that. My one woollen dress and a big shawl Anne packed away in camphor. About my neck is a ribbon with my mother's wedding ring on it. Nobody gave me any more of her property and I was too young to take it. I do not know who gave me this.

I tied up the change of clothes in a towel, and wandered about the house till near five o'clock.

Then I went to the study. My uncle was reading—he always is reading. He took no notice of me till I mustered my courage and said: "Uncle Gordon!"

"Well!" he said harshly, as he was always harsh to me.

"I am going away."

His lips curled to an ugly sneer.

"Back to your native gutters?" he said.

"No; I am going to be married."

"To whom, may I ask? The grocer's boy is, I believe, the only person who has ever seen you."

"I am going to marry Frank Hilton," I said, and shrank back.

But he did not strike me; he did not speak. His eyes took their most frightful glare, rolled back in his head, and he gave a cry, such as I never heard, and fell headlong upon the floor.

Anne came to my screams—my terrible screams—and we lifted him and took him to the bedroom.

"Run to the gate! Scream to anyone passing to send a doctor!" Anne said.

I flew across the long path to the gate. Frank was there waiting for me. I only screamed: "Bring a doctor—my uncle is dying!" and then dashed back again, after seeing Frank start on a run towards the village.

Anne had loosened my uncle's collar and had tried to force brandy between his lips, but he was rigid and growing cold.

He was dead—quite dead. The doctor came, and before dark Frank came with his mother, but nobody could help my uncle.

Mrs. Hilton took me to my room—the room where Frank was born—but I know nothing of the long night. In the morning I saw a face like an angel's bending over me, with blue eyes like Frank's, and golden hair. Soft hands caressed me, a soft voice whispered: "My poor child!"

But I could not take comfort yet. I struggled to my feet and asked for Frank.

When the sweet woman had dressed me she led me downstairs to where Frank waited. I took his hand and dragged him to the study, where I tore open the shutters to let the sunlight fall upon the horrible picture.

"What does all this mean?" I screamed. "You are there—my uncle is there! Your name killed him! What does it all mean?"

"Is that your uncle?" Mrs. Hilton asked, pointing with a shaking hand to the man under the cliff.

"Yes. He was old—old, white-headed—but that is his face, and his name is there, under the waves."

Frank looked at the name.

"'Gordon Willoughby,'" he read in a strangely solemn voice.

"Thank God!" his mother exclaimed, falling into his arms and bursting into tears.

I stood quivering with excitement until Frank had quieted his mother. I was not accustomed to attention, to being considered, so I did not suffer as a more petty girl might have done. But I thought my brain would have burst.

After a time, that seemed a week to me, Frank put his mother in my uncle's armchair, and turned to me.

"Editha," he said gently, "twenty-five years ago my mother was married here—in Hilton Hall, and Gordon Willoughby, who had loved her, swore to be revenged upon my father, who had won the love he coveted. In those days, dear, this was a splendid home, and my father one of the richest and most popular men in the country. Just one week after the wedding day my father came to his home, white and awe-stricken, and from that hour was a changed man. Mother has told me how he became silent and sad where he had been the bright spirit of his circle of friends. He seemed ever to carry the weight of some terrible secret with him, and rarely left his home.

"Even my birth, one year later, did not rouse him from his gloom, and when I was but two years old he left his home and went abroad. We led a wandering life after that, until my father died, two years ago, in Paris. Upon his deathbed he told the secret that had stricken all gladness from his life.

"Upon that evening, a week after his wedding day, he met Gordon Willoughby upon the cliffs. They quarrelled, led on by the man who had vowed vengeance against Alice Hilton's husband, and from words they came to blows, and fought for life upon the cliff, each trying to throw the other over. At last my father shook himself free, and as he did so, pushed Gordon Willoughby over the cliff. From that hour he carried a murderer's inferno in his heart. And that was Gordon Willoughby's revenge," said Frank, pointing to the picture; "that he hid his miraculous escape from the man who would have given him all his wealth, his very life, to have known the truth.

Digitized by Google

"But upon his deathbed some unexplained intuition told my father what to-day proves to be true.

"He told me the story and implored me to come here to Hilton Hall and try to gain some clue to the truth. Again and again he told me he believed Gordon Willoughby lived, though he could not give one reason for such a belief."

That was the story, in many more words than I have written down.

We went to the room where my uncle's still figure rested. The undertaker's men had shaved off his ragged white beard, had cut his hair close, and his face was calm and peaceful. It was the face under the cliffs in the picture, and Mrs. Hilton recognised it at once as the face of her old lover, who had so faithfully kept his bitter vow of revenge.

I think we all breathed more freely when we were quite at the other end of the house in a great vacant parlour, to which Frank and Anne carried some chairs and a lounge. Then how strange it was to be coaxed to lie down, to be covered with a soft shawl and caressed and petted, to have Mrs. Hilton kiss me, and her tender voice call me "daughter!"

Oh, could I mourn for the unloved dead, then?

In the afternoon a dressmaker came from the village and Mrs. Hilton ordered my mourning. A little later a lawyer came from London, having been sent for by Frank, after he found his address in my uncle's notebook, an hour after he died.

I was not called upon for much questioning, but the doctor and Anne were summoned to answer all inquiries about my uncle.

Then the lawyer told me my uncle had long, long before willed me his property, and that I was very rich—even richer than Frank.

So we are to live here, though the house will be made cheerful. In a year Frank and I are to be married, and Mrs. Hilton will teach me all things for his wife to know. She will take me to-morrow to her own home in London, and Frank will remain here till the workmen know what is to be done to renovate the house, and make it a home, not a prison. This morning, just before the funeral, we took the picture down from the wall, cut it into fine shreds, and burnt it in the open grate.

All my uncle's papers are packed up and taken to the lawyer's office till we are ready to send for them, so we can leave here when we will.

* * * * *

Just a year ago I left Hilton Hall. To-day I came back again, Frank's wife. I look in the long mirror in my dressing-room and wonder if the tall, stylish woman reflected there can be the brown-clad girl who ate her heart out here for ten years. Frank assures me it is the same, and I gladly believe him. W. A. Holcomb.

WITHIN AN INCH OF ETERNITY.

If you have ever paid any attention to American affairs, the name of Auburn cannot be unfamiliar; it has about the same significance in the United States as Portland has in England. You must not imagine Auburn as an immense gloomy prison, a single large building, but rather a whole colony of criminals, a metropolis of the miserable outcasts of society. Inclosed by enormous walls, which rise menacingly to a considerable height above the plain, are a great number of single structures, houses which contain the cells of the prisoners, the residences of the warders, barracks, hospitals, and workshops, all desolate and dreary, with here and there a bit of turf, a row of trees, a bed of flowers, like an innocent memory of childhood among the evil thoughts of a criminal.

Circumstances, which I will not weary you by recounting, had led me, after completing my education, to America, and after a brief time in New York I found myself prison-surgeon in Auburn, which, as perhaps you know, is in the State of New York.

I had charge of a part of the prison which contained the worst criminals, men, or rather human hyenas, to whom blood had ceased to be a very special liquid, as Mephistopheles terms it. Two, who were condemned to lifelong imprisonment in the institution, and were distinguished among the others by great bodily strength, craftiness and intelligence, had, in consequence of repeated bold and cunning attempts to escape, been placed under more rigid oversight than the rest.

I had incurred their special hate because I had once caused the discovery of several iron tools, which—Heaven knows how obtained—they had concealed under their clothing, and on another occasion discovered that they were shamming, when, on the plea of illness, they desired to be placed in the hospital, probably because they hoped to find the conditions there more favourable for their plans of escape. The scoundrels were separated and heavily chained, but nevertheless one morning one, and a few days later the other, vanished, chains and all, without leaving a trace. About a fortnight afterwards I went to Cayuga Bridge on some private business.

It was noon when I reached the end of my ride; and I gazed with delight at the sunlit landscape before my eyes. Cayuga Lake, one of those which, with Lake Erie, form the network of inland lakes in New York, lay before me in its peculiar loveliness. Between rugged, rocky shores, confronting each other like sullen foes, the long, narrow sheet of silver, extended its clear surface as if striving to reconcile the two enemies, who had stared defiantly at each other for centuries. Across the lake, which is about forty miles long, and, at this point, a mile wide, the railway trains run on an immense wooden bridge, a marvel of American enterprise, which has a station at Cayuga Bridge, an insignificant village.

My business was soon completed, and towards evening I set out on my way home. Are you familiar with the pleasure of a ride on a summer evening? Cayuga Bridge is surrounded by extensive oak forests, through which I had to ride a considerable distance. The huge, lofty trunks cast long shadows, and the tops rustled so softly that one rather felt than heard them. As I passed beneath these woodland giants, sweet memories of my far-off home stole into my heart.

Absorbed in thought, I loosened the bridle of my horse, which trotted slowly forward. I admired the bewitching blending of colours produced by the rays of the setting sun as they shone through the dense, dark green foliage, and seemed to kindle the edges of the leaves.

Digitized by Google

Suddenly I was aroused from my dreams by a rustling in the underbrush on both sides of the road. I seized my pistol and turned quickly, but at the same moment received a terrible blow, which deprived me of my senses. True, I opened my eyes once more and fancied I saw indistinctly, as in a dream, one of the escaped criminals bending over me, then darkness shrouded my mind.

It must have been late at night when consciousness returned. I opened my eyes and saw above me in the deep blue sky a radiant moon. A dull, heavy sensation in the back of my head made me try to put my hand on the aching spot, but I discovered that I was bound hand and foot. Gradually I collected my thoughts, remembered the attack by highwaymen, and a terrible foreboding, which made my heart stop beating, darted through my brain. I felt that I was laid across two sharp parallel projections, which pressed against me most painfully, and, listening intently, I heard far below me a faint splashing noise. There was no doubt—I was lying across the rails of the Cayuga bridge, bound, unable to move, with the terrible, certain prospect of being cut into three pieces by the next train.

I almost lost consciousness again. But I soon recovered my composure. Then I tugged desperately at my bonds till they almost cut my muscles, shrieked, and at last cried like a child. I tried to roll myself into a different position, and remembered that an incautious movement would hurl me into the silent waves of the Cayuga—bound hand and foot, motionless as a stone.

I shuddered and lay still. But not long. The light of the large, to me, fearfully, brilliant moon, the splashing of the water below, the wind blowing softly, then the deathlike silence again, rarely interrupted even by the distant note of a bird—all became unendurable and inspired me with unspeakable terror. And the rails! The rails! My senses tortured me. I could not escape them. The wooden beams of the bridge trembled almost imperceptibly from the washing of the water. I imagine I felt the approach of the train and my hair bristled; the wind sighed a little louder, I fancied I heard the dull panting of the engine, and my heart stood still, only to throb the next instant with such dreadful speed that the pulsations were almost audible.

There are some things which are totally incomprehensible to me; one of them is how I survived that night. One thought stood distinctly before my mind. I must endeavour to work myself into another position—if possible, get into the space between the rails—if I was not, perhaps, the next moment, to become the victim of the most agonising death.

And I succeeded! I strained every muscle, every sinew to the point of breaking. I writhed, I twisted, I panted, my head seemed bursting, and, after tremendous exertion, which appeared to me to last an eternity, though perhaps it was only moments, I found myself in the hollow between the rails.

Was I safe? I had not time to consider or rejoice in my new hope, for all my vital powers were concentrated in the single sense of hearing. In the far distance I distinguished, at first vaguely, then more and more distinctly, the regular, monotonous, dull noise which is produced by the engine of a moving locomotive. The awful silence of the night merged minute by minute into the still more awful, confused jarring sounds, the rattling and groaning, rumbling and panting of the locomotive, which was rushing forward at a mad speed. A thousand feet more, five hundred—and all the terrors of the infernal regions assailed me, but not a muscle moved; I lay as if turned to stone. I tried to shriek, but did not even hear my own voice; how should it reach those on the train?

Now, for an indefinite brief space of time, I fancied that I saw a bright light, a blast of hot air fanned me, then suddenly darkness shrouded me. I heard a thundering roar as though the very heavens were falling.

Close, very close, barely an inch above, the monster dashed over me—I was safe. Still half unconscious, I heard a deafening rumbling and clattering, and saw shadowy masses flit by; there was another moment of mortal dread—the hook of a chain which hung lower than the rest caught me, dragged me along a few feet, and finally tore a large piece from the breast of my coat, releasing me, then every object danced around me, the moon, the bridge, and the high bank whirled in a giddy maze above and below me and my senses failed.

When I regained my consciousness I found myself in my bed, with familiar faces bending over me. To make the story short, I had been picked up the morning after that terrible night by a signalman, recognised, and taken to Auburn. A violent fever kept me for a fortnight within the shadow of death, but my strong constitution conquered. When, after my recovery, I looked in the glass for the first time, I saw what traces those moments had left upon me.

ARNOLD REES.

DO YOU WANT YOUR PHOTOGRAPH ENLARGED?

Or possibly that of some much-beloved relative no longer with you?

In this case send the photograph, inclosing a postal order for 6s. 6d., to "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., not later than June 21st. If an acknowledgement is desired, an addressed post-card must be provided.

ALL PHOTOGRAPHS WILL BE RETURNED UNSOILED.

The following are letters which have been received in connection with these photographic enlargements:

Mr. E. J. Hallam, of 17, Godwin Road, Forest Gate, E., writes:

I beg to acknowledge with thanks the safe receipt of the enlargement of my child's photograph. I think it is only right that I should express my great satisfaction and admiration of the same. It is not only a marvellous likeness, but a really splendid production. Considering the small price you have charged, I must say I consider you have made a handsome gift to all those who availed themselves of your offer.

Mr. O. G. Quinn-Jones, writing from 2, St. Catherine's Terrace, Tenby, says:

I am exceedingly obliged to you for the very handsome enlargement of the portrait of my deceased brother, which I received this morning. It is, in fact, more lifelike than the original, and the most satisfactory work of the kind that I have ever met with.

Mr. W. G. R. Williams, Master Gunner, R.A., Dover Castle, writes:

I acknowledge with very much pleasure and an abundance of thanks, the magnificent pictures of my late father and mother, which came to hand safely on Friday last. They are "streets" beyond what I expected, being in every respect speaking likenesses. I have shown them to a number of friends who are unanimous in their praise.

Digitized by Google

IN 1869, at the end of the Empire, a young man was seated in a kind of attic in the Rue Verte, Faubourg St. Honoré. In front of him, seated upon a chair, was the mistress of this dwelling. She was a woman advanced in years, with the real face of a sorceress. In truth she was a "chiromancienne," the name given to those who foretell future events by reading the hands of the clients who come to consult them.

The young man was holding out his right hand, and the old woman had the air of reading it as a banker reads his notes. Suddenly she stopped in her examination, looked her visitor in the eyes, and said, with an air of inspiration:

"Listen! Listen to me and answer!"

"I will, madam!"

"You are a widower?"

"It is true."

"Since six months?"

"Yes, madam."

"You are rich."

"I have enough."

"A million and a half francs."

"That is the amount of my fortune."

"You have no connections in the world."

"None at all."

"Very well, monsieur. Take heed of what I counsel you—never marry again."

Here the visitor could not help changing colour; ordinarily pale, he became pallid. Not marry again! Up to this hour, since the loss of his wife, he had never thought of such a thing; but he was still young—just entering his thirtieth year. What could prevent his forming a second alliance if he chose to, later on? Perhaps the interdiction so brusquely formulated by the sorceress irritated some secret desire hitherto hidden in the depths of his heart. He was seized with a feeling of revolt.

"Not marry again!" he said quickly. "Why not?"

"Because the lines of your hand oppose it, monsieur."

"But if I take no notice of it, madam?"

"If you do not obey the oracle," replied she, speaking as if she were at a loss for words, "well, great misfortune will come to you!"

He was not satisfied, and demanded that she should tell him more, at the same time showing her a piece of gold.

"That would be thrown away," the chiromancienne said. "If you were to offer me half your fortune I could not tell you another syllable."

She rose from her chair as if to let him understand that the séance was at an end. In spite of himself he was compelled to take his dismissal. Throwing a louis on the mantelpiece, he bowed and descended the stairs.

"Well, it is strange," said he, as soon as he found himself in the street again. "It is impossible to get that old woman out of my head, with her threats and her enigmatical talk; but it was equally ridiculous for one of my age and situation to come and ask an old woman about future events. It was a folly that can only be ascribed to a weak mind."

As he reached the Avenue Martigny, which leads to the Champs Elysées, feeling himself still a little shaken, he stopped a moment to regain coolness and to find an excuse for his folly in consulting the sorceress at all. He found it in things that he had heard when recently attending a soirée at the Turkish ambassador's. Among the guests there were several grand dames who had put all sorts of extravagances in fashion. Superstitious to excess, these pretty simpletons professed to believe in nothing, yet in truth had faith in everything. Each of them wore as a watch-charm a little pitchfork of coral to keep off the evil eye, and regulated their conduct by what they learnt from drawing the cards. They had spoken of the chiromancienne of the Rue Verte, and that she was endowed with the gift of second sight. One day the Empress herself and the Princess Metternich had gone to consult her, and returned with their heads full of the most astonishing things she had told them.

From that time on her reputation was established. She, the sorceress of the Faubourg St. Honoré, was as famous as Hone the spiritualist.

Now, in the run of success everybody in the fashionable world wanted to consult her, if only for five minutes. Our young man had but followed the example of the grand dames.

Tony Berthier was tall, thin, and decidedly distingué

Digitized by Google

in appearance. He was also rich, and could walk side by side with the most elegant of that epoch, renowned for its ostentatious style of living and dress.

After the death of his wife—she left no children—he had to begin his youth, so to speak, when he had nearly reached the autumn of life.

But he was an idler, and seeing the world to keep from dying of ennui was almost a duty with him. In leaving him a great fortune, his parents, following the French fashion, thought it would be derogatory to his position for him to learn any kind of business. What need has a millionaire of doing anything? It is enough that he takes the trouble to exist. So Berthier went home to breakfast. He fared sumptuously, as a rich bachelor usually does.

Several of the daily journals were lying under his hand. To help him to pass the time he unfolded them one after another. They all related to what was passing in the gilded world of Paris, and the world of Paris at the end of the Second Empire was filled with scandal.

At the house of the nobility even you could hear of nothing but husbands who left their wives before the marriage was fairly concluded; of lovers demanding that ties be annulled; of engagements broken. It was "clear the decks," and a general helter-skelter on all sides.

Berthier saw a young woman, seated alone.

"Ah, well," said Berthier, sipping his pineapple-ice; "this is a pretty time we are living in. The old sorceress was right. Instead of grumbling at her I should send her a diamond as a present, with my thanks. If I should not marry again she has rendered me a service."

He lit a cigar and started for a walk on the boulevards, going first to the Madeleine, then to Montmartre, and then to the Boulevard des Italiens, and back again to the Madeleine. He was like a squirrel in a cage.

Restless and bored, he tried the club, and from there to the Bouffes Parisiens, where they were giving an opera by Offenbach. But there he yawned, and determined, as a last resort, to go to bed.

Finally he arrived at the conclusion that he was bored, because the general situation was too tame.

"To-day resembles yesterday," he said; "to-morrow will resemble to-day. If we only had some stirring event!"

One day at the club he was talking in this way when someone—a journalist—brusquely interrupted him.

"You want a stirring event, monsieur? Wait, you will have it!"

"What is it you say?" said Berthier.

"Nothing is plainer, monsieur. The war is coming. We are going to measure our strength with Prussia. I have foreseen it for ten months. But what does it matter? It will do us no harm to have a little fight with our neighbours. You will see," said the journalist as he went away, "war with Prussia."

Tony Berthier, like all the young Frenchmen of his time, saw it from a distance as only another name for victory, accompanied by rolling drums and sounding trumpets, decorated with flags, laurels, and flowers. He heard already the chime of bells and the songs of triumph. Alas! how soon these illusions were dissipated! The bravest soldiers in the world cannot conquer when their commanders are both treacherous and incompetent, and beautiful Paris—the capital of the world—surrendered.

* * *

Berthier was brave, and he loved his country. He went to the Loire and joined a company of riflemen as soon as the invader came.

He did his duty nobly, and was many times decorated for his bravery before the enemy. At last, in an engagement at Mars, he was severely wounded and sent to the hospital. It was months after this that he returned to Paris. The terrible days of the Commune had come. The city was filled with blood, tears, and grief. All the horrors of the civil war were before him, and he could still see the smoke of the guns that Frenchmen had trained upon Frenchmen.

In the midst of this tempest of ferocious passions he could not understand which side was right—which was wrong.

"Let them blame me if they like," said Berthier. "I will have nothing to do with it. What have I to do with their quarrels? I am rich, I am well established. I will be an egotist and take my ease."

This was in May. One afternoon in July of the same year, Berthier deserted the Madeleine—too many political memories assailed him there—and went to smoke his cigar in the Tuileries Garden.

Digitized by Google

He blew out his brains.

Berthier lounged along the Alley of Leaves, came to the Place de la Concorde, descended the steps, and in sheer idleness wandered round the grand fountain.

Just then Berthier saw a young woman, seated, alone and thoughtful, before the statue of Meleagre.

She was tall, fair, and elegantly dressed, and appeared to be about thirty years of age. Her costume was somewhat severe in style, as was proper for a person well born, after the great disasters of the past year. On her black hat was a tuft of purple plumes and a veil of black lace, and she had black gloves and parasol. Berthier approached a little nearer, the better to see her face. She was very handsome; her face was pale, but lighted by a pair of great blue eyes.

A few steps off he found the old woman who rented the chairs.

"Do you know that young lady?" he asked.

"No, monsieur; I know that she comes to the garden nearly every day at the same hour, and I have been told that she is a widow, which is evident from her dress."

"Widow?" said the idler; "widows are always the most fascinating of women."

He threw a silver piece into the hand of the old woman to pay her for her information, and continued his walk. At the end of twenty minutes he returned to the terrace, hoping to see the beautiful unknown again, but she had disappeared.

"I will return to-morrow," thought he.

The next day, as soon as he had finished breakfast Berthier hurried to the walk near the statue of Meleagre.

"She is there," he cried, his heart beating with joy.

"Monsieur!" cried the chair-renter, running towards him, quickened by the hope of another piece of silver, "I have information of the beautiful lady—shall I tell you?"

"Yes, speak," replied Berthier.

"Well, monsieur, she is about thirty years old, and in a modest but independent position. Her name is Clelia Puyremy, and she is the widow of a colonel of the Commune of last May. Her husband, having been taken with arms in his hands, was shot here on this terrace in front of that statue, and she comes here every day to pass a half hour at the same place."

"Hold, madam! Here is money for you!" said Berthier, and he hid himself among the trees.

Thus the "stirring event" for which he had longed, mingled with his love of adventure.

This beautiful woman was the widow of a colonel of the insurrectionists. He no longer wondered at the purple plumes and the black veil. But why did she come every day to visit the spot where her husband was shot?

"It is evident she loved the man. Can I hope to make her love me?" he asked himself.

Then he remembered the episode of the Rue Verte, and the prediction and warning of the sorceress. But although he resolved to think no more of his present folly, he came every day to the garden of the Tuileries in spite of himself, and each time he saw Clelia Puyremy and loved her more and more.

One day he could contain himself no longer; he managed to speak to her through the old chair-renter, and a friendly acquaintance began between them.

Tony Berthier had at last found a cure for his ennui. A little later they were married at the church of St. Roch, the widow having obtained from the official bureau a certificate of the death of her husband.

It was said there never was a happier union than that of Berthier and Clelia. In 1877 a little girl was born.

Three years rolled by; 1880 came, and in July of that year the armistice. Summer and autumn passed, and one morning at the beginning of winter, Clelia was alone, arranging her music. Suddenly a servant entered and said a poorly dressed man asked to speak to Madame.

"Let him enter," said she carelessly.

The visitor was Colonel Puyremy, her first husband. Contrary to all that had been told, he had not been shot, but had been thrown upon the pontoons of Brest, and afterwards carried to New Caledonia. Profiting by the armistice he had returned, and was there to claim his wife. He did not want money—he wanted his wife.

Clelia did not try to struggle with the fatality which had so cruelly met her. She left her little girl and a note of explanation for Berthier, and went away for ever. She fulfiled what she thought to be her duty.

That day Berthier was hunting in the environs of Paris. On his return he found the note. He read it, and, in a moment of despair, blew out his brains.

The prediction of the sorceress had been verified!

LE VIER.

Digitized by Google

AN INDIAN DRUG

By Huan Mee,

Author of "The Czar's Diamond," "In Masquerade," "Alan Lindow's Wife," "Philip St. Voullé's Understudy," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

Estlin Godfry brings from India three bottles of deadly poison, with which his friend, Walter Shenfield, a chemist, experiments on a rabbit. Estlin's uncle, Joseph Monro, is about to marry Ethel Sedwicke, and should he do so, Estlin will no longer come into the estate. On the wedding morning, Monro is found dead in his room. Estlin goes to London and consults an old friend, Sidney Larrance. At the inquest it transpires that Godfry will benefit by his uncle's death more than anyone else.

CHAPTER VI.

The Verdict of the Jury.

There was a very crowded court upon the re-opening of the inquiry into the cause of the death of Mr. Joseph Monro, and some considerable excitement was evinced when the first witness was called and answered to his name, Zarto Slazar, and a tall dark Oriental entered the box.

The Coroner: "You are an Indian doctor who has had much experience in native poisons?"

Witness: "Yes, sir."

The Coroner: "You have examined the poisons contained in the bottles handed to you by the chemist, Shenfield?"

Witness: "Yes, sir."

The Coroner: "What do you find them to be?"

Witness: "I find them to be the most deadly poison known in India—a drug that is instantaneously fatal."

The Coroner: "There is no antidote?"

Witness: "Naturally."

The Coroner: "What are the conditions found in the body of an individual who has died from this poison?"

Witness: "They are identical with the state in which Dr. Hill has informed me he found the deceased."

The Coroner: "Is the poison a common one in India?"

Witness: "No, sir, the secret of its manufacture is only known amongst a certain set of fakirs."

The Coroner: "It would be difficult to obtain?"

Witness: "Exceedingly, because one would have to discover the sect itself and then find an unscrupulous man who would be willing to sell it."

The Coroner: "In your opinion then the late Mr. Monro met his death from taking poison similar to that inclosed in the bottles that Mr. Estlin Godfry admits having brought home from India?"

Witness: "I am certain of it."

The Coroner: "Have you experimented with the contents of the other two bottles?"

Witness: "Yes, sir."

The Coroner: "With what result?"

Witness: "I tried a single drop from one bottle upon a rabbit, and a drop from the other upon a dog, and in both cases the animals died instantly, without apparent pain."

The Coroner: "Thank you, that will do."

Estlin Godfry was then recalled.

The Coroner: "How many bottles of this poison did you bring home from India?"

Estlin: "Three."

The Coroner: "Can you prove that you only purchased three?"

Estlin: "No."

The Coroner: "Can anyone?"

Estlin: "No."

The Coroner: "You are aware that it is a very important matter that you should endeavour to do so?"

Estlin: "I am aware of that, but I can only give you my word."

The Coroner: "You cannot account for any possible way by which your uncle could have obtained possession of any portion of the poison however small?"

Estlin: "No, sir, he did not even know that I had it in my possession, and when I took the bottles from my private desk to take them to Mr. Shenfield the three seals were unbroken."

The Coroner: "Can you give us any reason why you purchased such a deadly drug?"

Estlin: "No, sir, unless it was a mere matter of curiosity."

The Coroner: "What did you pay for them?"

Estlin: "I gave the fakir a ring that I wore which had taken his fancy."

The Coroner: "Why did you take them to Mr. Shenfield on that Tuesday evening?"

Estlin: "Simply that being interested in poisons he might test them."

The Coroner: "Did he test the poison at your suggestion?"

Estlin: "Yes." (Sensation.)

The Coroner: "Why did you propose that he should close the shop?"

Estlin: "That we might not be interrupted."

The Coroner: "Now, Mr. Godfry, I ask you on your oath, was there any cause of disagreement between your uncle and yourself upon any point?"

Estlin: "You mean in regard to his wedding?"

The Coroner: "I mean upon any point."

Estlin hesitated for a moment and then in the straightforward manner which had characterised him throughout the inquiry, replied:

"Two years ago we had a very slight misunderstanding."

The Coroner: "That was before you went to India?"

Estlin: "Yes, sir."

The Coroner: "Was it the cause of your leaving England?"

Estlin: "Partly."

Digitized by Google

The Coroner: "What was the nature of the quarrel?"

Estlin: "It was not a quarrel—it was a difference of opinion."

The Coroner: "I must ask you to be more explicit."

Estlin: "I was desirous of marrying a lady to whom my uncle objected, and he gave me an opportunity of visiting India in order to forget the connection."

The Coroner: "Then this disagreement was the real cause of your visit to India?"

Estlin: "No. It had been a long cherished desire."

The Coroner: "By the death of your uncle before the marriage, and therefore before signing his new will, the whole of his property is, I believe, by a former will left to you?"

Estlin: "That is so."

The Coroner: "You were aware of this?"

Estlin: "Yes."

The Coroner: "You are therefore a greater gainer by his death now than you would have been later?"

Estlin: "In mere money I derive more, but the whole of the money is as nothing against the loss of a man who had been more than a father to me."

The Coroner: "Thank you, I do not think I need trouble you further."

The only other witnesses called were the servants of the household, who testified to the general goodfellowship which had existed between the uncle and the nephew.

The Coroner then proceeded to address the jury upon the whole case. He said that in all his experience a more distressing event it had never been his duty to inquire into, but he trusted that what at the present appeared to be a terrible mystery would eventually be cleared up. The jury had to consider, in the light of the whole of the evidence that had been laid before them, how the deceased met his death, and that resolved itself into one of three alternatives, either suicide, misadventure, or murder. To his mind, any idea of suicide was not tenable, for the few events of the unhappy day seemed to point to a man at peace with himself and all the world, easy in his financial circumstances, happy in his approaching matrimonial relations, and with a bright and prosperous future stretching out before him. Was that the kind of man to commit suicide?

And further, if he had desired to take his own life, would he have chosen a time like that and so plunged into grief and mourning the woman whom they must believe he had fondly loved? Death by misadventure seemed less likely still. There was no poison found in the wine in the study, the doctor testified to the death having been instantaneous, and yet they found no receptacle that could have contained poison and a most searching investigation of the contents of the desk had revealed nothing but private papers, cheque books, and such like possessions of a business man. The tourist tickets for the honeymoon journey were lying ready upon the table and a guide-book to the English Lakes was also found. There was nothing therefore to point to misadventure.

The only alternative then, was the black and ugly one of murder. Yet they could find no trace of any enemy. Mr. Monro had been a man esteemed and respected by all who knew him, open-handed and generous to a fault. In considering the probability of murder they had to look for motive, and motives generally divided itself into one of two things—revenge, or money. He could not think it was revenge for where could revenge arise when a man had no enemies? Then it must have been a murder for the most sordid of all reasons, for money.

He did not desire to lead the jury in any way, but simply to coldly recapitulate the facts. Those facts disposed in his mind of any theory of suicide or accident, and left only murder, foul murder. The evidence pointing towards murder was unfortunately very strong. They must bear in mind that by the new will Mr. Monro had made, and which he intended signing the very day that the drug of the poisoner took his life, diverted the bulk of his fortune into another channel than that of the former will.

They must also bear in mind that there had been a disagreement between himself and his nephew, which was the cause, or partly the cause, of the latter leaving for India, and perhaps, while still smarting under what he construed the injustice of his uncle's action, he purchased the fatal drug. Who should say? Then they find Mr. Monro himself proposed entering into a matrimonial alliance that would of necessity lessen the fortune to be left to the young man, and, for all he knew, rear up an heir to usurp his place.

The evidence of Shenfield, the chemist, told them of the visit of Mr. Godfry on the evening before the day fixed for the wedding, and of the experiment to prove the virulence of the poison, and the fatal results upon the rabbit. They had heard the opinions entertained by Mr. Godfry as regarded suicide, poisons and antidotes, and that gentleman could but give them his uncorroborated word that he brought home only three sealed bottles of poison. That Mr. Monro died from the effects of such a poison they had the sworn testimony of the Indian expert.

Those were the facts that presented themselves to his mind. Far be it from him to attempt to sway the jury but he felt it was his duty to dwell upon this series of circumstantial facts and then leave to their careful judgment and consideration the whole of this perplexing mystery. If they found that there was reasonable ground to assume Mr. Monro might have died from misadventure they would, of course, return that verdict. Painful as it might be, they would equally return a verdict of suicide if they could find anything to justify that view, but if after considering everything they were forced to believe that Mr. Monro met his death by the hand of another, then in the exercise of the duty that they were summoned to perform, they would as Englishmen do that duty and return a verdict accordingly.

The jury, after a brief deliberation, returned a verdict of "Wilful murder against Estlin Godfry," who, amid a scene of the wildest excitement, was committed on the Coroner's warrant to take his trial at the next assizes.

CHAPTER VII.

Hoping against Hope.

Estlin Godfry was committed for trial for the wilful murder of his uncle, Joseph Monro, and there were not wanting many who thought him guilty. It would not be saying too much to assert that nine-tenths of the population of Maythorn had already decided upon his guilt, and were equally certain as to what the result of the trial would be, but against them all there was the one staunch, true friend, who, with indefatigable energy, worked for the defence.

The best legal talent available was secured on behalf of the unfortunate young man, and from morning to night, and far into the night itself, Sidney Larrance laboured and thought. Confident in the innocence of his friend, he was equally conscious of the damning chain of circumstantial evidence that had wound itself around him. No intuition seemed possible in such a case as this. The facts marshalled themselves in such regular order, from the quarrel of the uncle and nephew two years ago to the sudden and awful death of the former on his wedding-day, that it seemed as though fate itself had decided that Estlin Godfry's race was run, and that what promised to have been a long life and a brilliant career was to end like the life of a malefactor, in the cold grey light of an October morning, with the tolling bell for a man not yet dead, the scaffold and the rope.

Heaven, it was terrible! To think that an honest man should be done to death, hanged like a dog, because there was no one to prove he was not a murderer. The voices of the crowd prated of the "circumstantial evidence." Yes, circumstantial, purely circumstantial, but yet how awfully it all fitted, fitted with horrible accuracy, and the learned counsel for the prosecution would take the pieces as a child takes a dissected puzzle, and join them together until the whole thing was complete, and then——

Digitized by Google

Haggard and worried, Larrance sits alone wondering and pondering over this mystery, and never getting on much further towards the solution. The more he considered it, the deeper he probed it, the more it pointed to the conclusion that the crowd had adopted already—Guilt! Guilt! Guilt! Estlin Godfry was doomed. There was no hope of a miracle to clear the man who Larrance knew was innocent, no hope, no hope.

For the twentieth time since he commenced to try and discover some clue to the mystery, Larrance goes down to the village and talks the matter over with Shenfield, who is as anxious as Larrance himself to discover some means that may save Godfry, for he cannot disguise from his mind that the evidence forced from him at the inquest must have gone a long way towards influencing the jury to return the verdict that they had.

"You are certain," said Larrance, "that no one could possibly have tampered with the bottles after you locked them up?"

"Only too certain," the other mournfully exclaims.

"And the third bottle was utterly destroyed?"

"Utterly; the night was chilly and I had a rather larger fire than usual. That bottle and the paper with which I wiped up the spilt poison I myself threw behind the fire. It is useless to thresh this out again and again, there must have been some other poison somewhere."

"But where? You do not suspect Godfry?"

"No, Heaven forbid, but this poison was the poison that killed Monro, therefore there must have been more."

"Ah!" the exclamation from Larrance is so sudden that Shenfield is startled.

"What is it?"

"I have a gleam of hope yet."

"Speak man, speak."

"What became of the poisoned animal? Could anyone have obtained the body and extracted sufficient poison from it?"

"Impossible, no one except Godfry and myself knew of the experiment, and Monro was dead the next afternoon, besides I buried the rabbit myself."

"Did you look if the ground had been disturbed?"

"No, of course not, the idea never occurred to me, and besides the quantity used was so minute it would have been impossible for anyone to have extracted sufficient poison from the body."

"You remember the spot?"

"Perfectly."

"Let us see."

They adjourned to the far end of Shenfield's garden, he pointed out the spot, and after a few turns of the spade, the box containing the rabbit was unearthed. It had never been disturbed, and the last shred of hope in the minds of both vanished.

Larrance then sought out the Indian doctor, who, courteous and obliging, could give no different view to that he had already formed. No other opinion than that he had sworn to in the Court, Joseph Monro had died from an Indian drug, the very drug that Estlin Godfry had brought to England.

For hours Larrance pored over books and records of circumstantial trials, read and re-read until the very printed lines swam before him. Then through and through the evidence of the witnesses at the inquest and ever ended with the same result. It all pointed to one man only, his friend, his innocent friend Estlin.

An interview with the bereaved lady who was to have been Mrs. Monro only strengthened his confidence in the innocence of Estlin. Miss Sedwicke shared in the belief, and her sorrow at the untimely death of Joseph Monro was intensified by the horrible suspicion attaching to the man, who, as she said, would to her have ever retained the position he had held in Merton House, the adopted son of Joseph Monro.

No, there was no light, not a glimmer, not a spark; it was an awful mystery, a dense impenetrable blackness with but one possible end. The dock, the condemned cell, the sudden, awful, ignominious death!

They were powerless, utterly, completely powerless. Waiting as one waited for an annihilating blow, knowing that it was certain, that unless something should spring as from the very stones of the streets themselves and speak, there was no chance for Estlin.

Never was there a harder worker in a forlorn case than Sidney Larrance, never did man worry and strive and fret his heart out as he did but all to no avail. The days went on. How they seemed to fly. The dawn came and the sunset followed and yet no nearer hope. Never! never! and daily the trial drew closer.

And Estlin, what of his frame of mind. At first the horror of the whole thing seemed as a dream, from which he would awaken, but as each day went on and nothing ever lessened for a single moment the fearful accusation hanging over him, he grew pale and thin and weary. He could not sleep, but paced up and down half the night through until sheer weariness of body closed his heavy eyelids for a space and then the terror of his dreams awoke him to living wretchedness once more.

Could it be possible, he asked himself a hundred times a day, that fate would let this wild chain of coincidences, this mesh of circumstantial facts, rob a man of his life, throw a net around him that his fellow creatures would believe him guilty of the crimes of murder? murder for money. Horrible, impossible! No, no, they could not think that, no human heart could believe that he would slay his benefactor and yet the world's records of crimes had shown still greater villainies. But Providence, Providence would intervene and prove him innocent; surely, surely it would not let an innocent man suffer. Suffer, and such a penalty. The last penalty of the laws of man. Death!

No, something would arise, yes, something, something. He would sleep and hope.

That was his safety, innocence, and so he dozes to sleep and then the cruel dreams tear his brain once more, and he wakes shaking and trembling as the words seem to ring in his ears. "Hope not, hope not, the innocent have suffered before now. Thy name, too, is written on the scroll of Death."

CHAPTER VIII.

Guilty or Not Guilty?

It is the last day of the trial. The day upon which the result of five days' continuous hearing of evidence will be made known to the world, and Estlin Godfry let loose a free and innocent man, or, in the terrible language of the sentence of the law, be condemned to be "hanged by the neck until he is dead."

Within the densely crowded Court suppressed excitement is at its height. Every inch of space is packed with a throng which holds its breath and strains every nerve so that not a single word shall be lost; while in the midst stands the prisoner, pale but collected, meeting his sentence before it is pronounced. He feels there is no escape, that he is doomed.

For five days the brilliant counsel for the Crown has examined and cross-examined, brought forward this witness and that, and bound a chain of damning guilt about the prisoner, every link solid, and ringing with truth, every link welded within another until there can be no escape, the perfect circle is formed. Day after day for five days has the council for the defence endeavoured without avail to find a flaw in even one of the links, only to be driven back by the inflexible action of the Crown, which "desires not to win a victory and mete out vengeance for the sake of public opinion, but simply to press the full weight of a crime upon the one who has committed it." Now the whole case is over, and as the shadows deepen the Judge arranges his robes about him, turns over the leaves of his notes, and leans forward to commence his summing-up.

Digitized by Google

There is a death-like hush, every eye turned to the man who is about to address them, every mind wondering what form this summing-up will take. In the popular language, will it be "for" or "against" the prisoner, the murderer! They already call him "the murderer." After all, a trial is a waste of time when an impartial British public can settle a case almost without troubling to hear the evidence. The Judge looks towards the jury, and commences; his first words, in the view of the public, settling the fate of the prisoner.

"Gentlemen," he says, "I am no upholder of a colourless summing-up. It is my duty to lay the complex details of this case before you, and without endeavouring in any way to sway your impartial judgment, yet to do so in a manner that you may find yourselves assisted in forming a clear opinion as to the value of the evidence which has been placed before you. Before all things I would urge you not to be led away by questions which do not immediately bear upon the case, but to judge the facts coldly and clearly according to the laws of the country and influenced in no respect by sentimental or emotional evidence. Though in the eyes of the world, in the emotions of the body, it may be infinitely more horrible for a man to take the life of one who has always been his benefactor, yet in the eyes of the law the question of murder is not affected by any such influences, and I would ask you, in dealing with this grave charge, to cast from you any thought of the relationship or connection between the man before you and Joseph Monro.

"Then again do not allow any anxiety to find the wretch who could have been so heartless as to wreak his vengeance upon such a day as the murder occurred, bear in the slightest degree with you, for it is better that many murderers should for ever escape earthly justice than that one innocent man should be done to death."

The judge pauses and a murmur of suppressed applause breaks the silence for a moment, and all eyes are turned towards Estlin Godfry who, with his hand resting upon the ledge of the dock, follows breathlessly every movement in the Court.

"The prisoner, Estlin Godfry," the Judge continues, "is charged with the murder of his uncle upon the morning of the Wednesday the nineteenth of August last by means of a poison quite unknown in England, and instantaneous in its effect. He was the last to leave his uncle, and the time that elapsed between his rejoining his friends below and the finding of the body of the deceased gentleman was, as far as can be ascertained, barely five minutes, so that the horrible suddenness of the calamity clearly pointed to a poison the effect of which was to cause death like a lightning stroke. A poison of this kind, we are informed by an expert upon this subject, is absolutely unknown in England, although reputed to be more or less common in Eastern countries. How such a poison was brought to this town has been fully placed before you by witnesses for the prosecution and admitted by the defence.

"The prisoner himself has stated that he purchased three bottles of this most virulent drug in India, and brought them back to England. Two of those bottles you have had placed before you, and the third, on the oath of a witness who was called for the prosecution, and not the defence, was utterly destroyed. It is for you, in the impartial carrying out of your duties, to come to a conclusion as to whether those three bottles were all that the prisoner brought home, or whether there were others, for unfortunately the defence has been unable to call a single witness to prove that those three bottles were all the prisoner ever possessed.

"That is a matter you must weigh fully in your minds, leaning neither to vengeance or to 'giving a man the benefit of the doubt,' for I would urge you as men of honour, to act only upon what you feel to be the facts, and not to assume or deduce upon so solemn a matter as life and death. There can be absolutely no doubt that the murdered man was killed by poison either from one of the two bottles before you, from the bottle that was destroyed, unfortunately by an avowed friend of the prisoner, or from a fourth, the existence of which can never be proved, for experts have given you full evidence that such a death could only be caused by the administration of that one drug. You must also decide whether in your honest opinion it is the act of an innocent man, and moreover one not particularly interested in scientific studies to be in possession of such a deadly poison.

"But again I would urge you not to be hasty in your conclusions, as a man may purchase a revolver or a rifle without meditating a crime, so too may a man be in possession of a deadlier weapon without evil intent. As for the motive to the crime, if we accept the view that one man will kill another for the greed of money, and unfortunately the annals of crime show only too many examples that such is the case, then a motive is put boldly and clearly before you by the prosecution. Had Joseph Monro lived another hour, the prospective income of the prisoner would have been reduced from ten thousand pounds a year to one. A great motive to many, but against this you have to consider one important fact that the prisoner, although he might have the love of money common to all mankind, was in no great straits for it. He had no financial difficulties to negotiate, no overwhelming burden of debt to conceal, no disgrace to fear. He lived well within his means, had a large sum to his credit, and if he committed the crime could only have done so through a cold-blooded desire for potential affluence. A great and terrible deed for the most sordid motive.

"Much has been made by the prosecution of a quarrel which occurred two years ago between the prisoner and his uncle. A quarrel in connection with a youthful entanglement which was the cause of the prisoner leaving England. This quarrel is frankly confessed by the defence, and treated as a matter long past and forgotten. It is for you to decide, gentlemen, whether this is so, or whether this quarrel had long rankled and become at last the incentive to the crime.

"A very large number of witnesses have been called by the prosecution, who have proved beyond doubt the fact that the prisoner was the last to leave his uncle, only a few moments before his death, that he had the poison in his possession, and that he was well aware of the provisions of his uncle's new and old wills, and all those facts are admitted by the defence.

"Experts' opinion, and even that of the prisoner's friend, Walter Shenfield, the chemist, place beyond doubt the fact that Joseph Monro was killed by this identical poison. That is practically the case for the prosecution, the possession of an almost unknown poison, which caused the death of the deceased man, and a strong motive for his death existing at that time. The defence on the other hand has scarcely called a witness, and certainly none other than to prove the cordial relations existing between the two men, and the financial position of the younger, and, contenting themselves with a slight cross-examination, have relied upon a series of cold arguments and statements. As a defence in such a case it seems perhaps peculiar, but admitting as they do the possession of the poison, then unless they could prove that the prisoner only purchased the three bottles, the line of defence adopted is the only course open, and although an absence of witnesses need not necessarily mean a weak case, it must be regarded as calamitous that nothing could be brought forward against the evidence of the prosecution beyond a series of deductions as to the probable action of a murderer under a given set of circumstances.

"The main point laid before you in the course of the defence is, that had the prisoner contemplated the committal of the deed he would not have taken poison, which no one was aware he had in his possession, and shown it to a friend; and the natural assumption is that unless he had some very special reason for doing so he would never have taken them from his room, and certainly never shown them to a living soul.

Digitized by Google

"Then again, the defence says, had he contemplated such a deed, would he not have carried it out when he was alone with his uncle, and not waited until discovery was almost certain? He was always with his uncle, the poison was to his hand. You are asked to discover why he waited until such a moment. Was it, as the Crown suggests, that it was only on that very day, in the private interview with his uncle, only then that he discovered his true position? And did he, as the prosecution suggests again, make a point of showing the poison in his possession as a daring plan of escaping suspicion? A plan daring even unto madness. It is for you, gentlemen, in the righteous and honourable discharge of your duties, to discover whether these rash, one might almost say insane, acts bear testimony for or against the prisoner.

"Whether the doings of Estlin Godfry in connection with this drug indicate criminal stupidity, an abnormally far-seeing vision, which even considered the probability of this trial, or an innocence of all intent to harm, are questions which can only be solved by you, and upon your decision rests the grave and fearful question of life and death. Then we have the opinion of the faculty that a death so sudden, so fearful, would have been put down at once by a physician as heart failure if it had not been for the fact that Doctor Hill, the medical attendant of the deceased man, whose evidence you have heard, was absolutely certain that such a death could not have taken place. But, gentlemen, was the prisoner unaware of that? Was it upon that idea that he based his action? Was it upon that assumption that he was so open in his doings in connection with the poison? Does this explain actions which have been characterised as insane?"

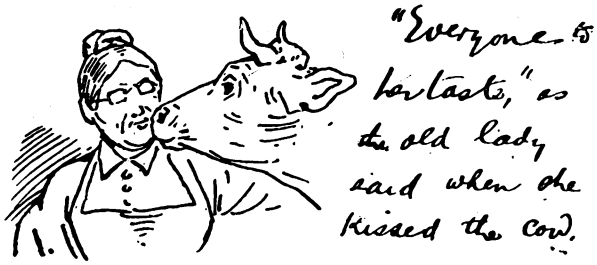
The Judge closes his book and leans back in his seat.

(To be concluded.)

RESULT OF THE BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

OF the hundreds of papers sent in for THE BRAIN GYMNASIUM, which closed on May the 25th, not one was wholly correct. Mr. R. M. Shipstone, of 126, Oakfield Road, Penge, S.E., headed the list with a total of 9½, and to him, therefore, has a prize of One Guinea been sent. Nine shillings has been added to the remaining prize of One Guinea, and this thirty shillings has been divided equally amongst the next ten competitors. The following are their names and addresses:

T. Gowland, 12, Tavistock Road, Harlesden, N.W.
L. W. Judd, 2, Alfred Villas, Stanton Road, Barnes.
F. Bessant, 15, Eton Place, Falmouth.
E. T. Goodson, 91, High Street, Standish, near Wigan.
T. Mason, Hawkhead Terrace, 31, Seedhill Road, Paisley, N.B.
G. M. Hollis, 47, Dartmouth Park Hill, N.W.
Miss Way, Curraghmore, Shanklin, Isle of Wight.
J. R. Trail Hill, 3, Merchant Street, Peterhead, N.B.
A. H. Hamilton, 43, Dalmeny Road, Tufnell Park, N.
Mrs. Witson, 482, Duke Street, Glasgow.



PEARSON'S MAGAZINE is to everyone's taste.

RESULT OF PICTURE PUZZLE COMPETITION.

No. 6.

54	20	7	84	25	72	33	38
35	14	18	57	49	86	41	39
31	5	55	73	8	80	50	43
13	62	10	66	36	23	28	68
3	53	88	82	19	42	40	6
45	59	71	63	48	15	19	22
78	70	34	30	46	60	83	11
51	16	87	28	17	12	26	74
24	2	37	81	29	77	44	56
58	29	75	9	09	4	02	27
76	12	1	47	64	69	32	52

A VERY large proportion of those readers who entered for the Picture Puzzle Competition (No. 6) announced in Short Stories for May 23rd succeeded in putting the squares together correctly. It has been decided to award the prize of £10 to the competitor who forwarded the neatest correct solution, and the fortunate person is L. Shead, 19, St. Thomas' Road, Finsbury Park, N.

The twenty readers whose names appear below have each been sent a gold-plated pencil-case as a consolation prize for the correctness and neatness of their attempt:

Miss A. Hughes, 86, Fairbridge Road, Upper Holloway, N.
E. E. Wilson, 37, York Road, Walthamstow, Essex.
A. E. Bowles, 35, Weston Street, Bradford.
J. St. Clair, 29, Shelgate Road, Wandsworth Common.
T. O. Perring, "Glencoe," 38, Brunswick Square, Herne Bay.
Mrs. E. Davis, 13, Barbican Terrace, Barnstable, North Devon.
M. G. Morgan, 2, Tan Terrace, Berriew Street, Welshpool, Montgomeryshire.
Miss E. Mee, Burlish House, Bendley Road, Stourport, Worcestershire.
Bertram Newcombe, Green Bank, Penketh, near Warrington.
A. Grigg, 23, Church Street, Edgware Road.
Mrs. Baird, 9, Bowhill Terrace, Edinburgh.
F. White, 1, Ludgate Hill, London.
M. Mungall, 1, Adelaide Street, Helensburgh.
J. Baker, 4, Argyle Street, Darwen, Lancashire.
J. Cooper, 50, Queen Street, Peterhead.
Miss Capner, 42, Frances Road, Handsworth Birmingham.
W. Binmore, The Cottage, Lyncombe, Torquay, Devon.
S. Small, 18, High Street, Cardiff.
J. Cross, 34, Bentley Road, Kingsland Road.
M. Macnab, Perthshire Club, George Street, Edinburgh.

OWING TO PRESSURE ON OUR SPACE THIS WEEK WE ARE UNABLE TO FIND ROOM FOR THE KEY TO THE BRAIN GYMNASIUM, THE RESULT OF WHICH IS ANNOUNCED ON COLUMN ONE. IT WILL APPEAR NEXT WEEK.

Digitized by Google

THE BRAIN GYMNASIUM

No. 6.—NEW SERIES.

TWO PRIZES OF A GUINEA EACH.

BELOW will be found the sixth batch of ten problems in the new series of THE BRAIN GYMNASIUM. Two prizes of a Guinea each are offered weekly to those competitors who answer correctly the greatest number of these problems.

Consolation Prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

RULES:

1. All solutions to be written clearly on one sheet of paper.
2. Do not write the questions; simply put the numbers and the answer against each.
3. Each set to contain the £100 coupon (found on second page of cover) for the current week.
4. All attempts to be in by Monday, June 15th.
5. Mark your envelope "GYMNASIUM, NUMBER 6."

(51.) WORD SQUARE.

1. Stern.
2. A particular breed.
3. An image.
4. To improve.

(52.) The first letter in the word forming the solution to this problem is found in "sock" but not in "shoe," the second in "brown" but not in "blue," and the remainder as follows:

In "rum" but not in "whisky."
In "prim" but not in "frisky."
In "order" but not in "neat."
In "arms" but not in "feet."
In "nation" but not in "crowd."
In "conceit" but not in "proud."
In "iron" but not in "slack."
In "opening" but not in "crack."
In "plunder" but not in "loot."
In "shout" but not in "hoot."

(53.) If A commences to write with an ordinary pen at the rate of 90 letters a minute, and B commences to write with a fountain pen at 103 letters a minute exactly 5min. 50secs. afterwards, what time will elapse before B has completed the same number of letters as A?

(54.) The following, when reconstructed, forms a readable sentence: The enemy of a broken ambulance abandoned by two waggons, halfway at an heap of spoils and its wheel the caisson are thrown up three dying waggons and the muskets and horses; for a hill at a crest two more weary knapsacks more men; with the foot off, or fearful and hill away

(55.) If H=7,
P=½,
O=2,
L=59,
What word on this page has the greatest numerical value?

(56.) MIXED VERSE.

Het oolepd si a uqderdaup 'stath racilypnilp riha,
It's wetvel ot rontefeu cinseh goln nda yevr yearnl ruaseq.
It merdins em fo a daly's fumf that's lobstered pu no geps,
It's revy englhty hirs'swe nda vitabrdebea gels.

(57.) The words defined below, when placed one on the other will form an hour glass, and the centre letters, read downwards, will spell a synonym for "settlement."

1. A botanical expression.
2. Burial.
3. Terrible.
4. Swindle.
5. Writing fluid.
6. G.
7. A beverage.
8. Full of lumps.
9. Deadly.
10. Totalling.
11. In a frightful manner.

(58.) DOUBLE ACROSTIC.

The initials read downwards
And finals read upwards,
Spell a word signifying,
"Particular stress of voice."

1. A Roman knight.
2. Plain clothes.
3. Sanctimonious.
4. A wild beast.

(59.) Make an anagram on the following sentence:
GYMNASTICS ARE GOOD.

(60.) How many (1) k's and (2) f's are there on this page.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS

IN THE

TREATMENT OF OBESITY.

"Our corpulent readers will be glad to learn how to positively lose two stone in about a month with the greatest possible benefit in health, strength and muscle by a comparatively new system. It is a singular paradox that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto, yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight 1lb. or 2lb. daily, as the weighing-machine will prove. Thus there is no suggestion of starvation. It is an absolute success, and the author, who has devoted years of study to the subject, absolutely guarantees a noticeable reduction within twenty-four hours of commencing the treatment. This is different with other diseases, for the patient in some cases may go for weeks without being able to test whether the Physician has rightly treated him, and may have derived no real or apparent improvement in health. Here, we repeat, the author guarantees it in twenty-four hours, the scale to be the unerring judge. The treatment aims at the actual root of the disease, so that the superfluous fat does not return when discontinuing the treatment. It is perfectly harmless. We advise our readers to call the attention of stout friends to this, because, sincerely, we think they ought to know. For this information, we may say that on sending two penny stamps a book 'Corpulency, and the Cure' (256 pages), containing a reprint of press notices from some hundreds of Medical and other journals (British and Foreign), and other interesting particulars, including the 'recipe,' can be had from a Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C."—Extract from The Belfast News Letter.

Curious Experiments

IN

CORPULENCY.

"A Mr. Russell, author and specialist in obesity, has experimentally tried the effect of administering large doses to moderate lean persons of his well-known herbal discovery, which is so marvellously effectual in reducing superfluous fat, with the result that there is not the slightest alteration or diminution of weight recorded, thereby proving conclusively to our minds that it is only the unhealthy adipose waste tissue which is destroyed, for after dispensing a few fluid ounces of his remarkable vegetable compounds he succeeds in destroying the diseased fatty mass at the rate of from 2lb. to even 12lb. in seven days. There can be no ambiguity about it, for any persons can test this for themselves by standing upon a weighing-machine. He explains that all lean persons carry a certain amount of fat necessary for the natural production of heat in the body, but Nature has only stored up her requisite stock in the healthy system, which she most zealously guards, and thus declines to part with an ounce to the persuasions of Mr. Russell's vegetable tonic, however immoderate the dose may be, which testifies abundantly to the fact that it is only a chemical solvent of insalubrious adipose tissue. There is no doubt that the inventor of the composition must have possessed a profound vegetal knowledge in selecting this simple but peculiar combination.

"Those who resort to the pernicious products of the mineral kingdom, or even the deleterious sections of the vegetable world, doubtless can decoct something powerful but injurious in its action; such, however, require no laudatory commendation; but Mr. Russell (we herewith append his address: Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., the author of 'Corpulency, and the Cure,' 256 pages, price 2d. stamps) makes no secret of the simplicity of his treatment, and avers that the decoction can be drunk as a refreshing summer drink, pleasant to the palate, yet having sufficient effect, although perfectly harmless, to remove generally 2lb. or more in twenty-four hours. We think stout persons would do well to send for his book, which can be obtained through booksellers, or at the address given above."—Leeds Times, December 1st, 1894.

Digitized by Google

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery. The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Send 4 Stamps and receive pair

FOLDING SCISSORS, PATENT PENKNIFE,

and Amusing Novelty Catalogue, post paid.

VARIETY COMPANY, DALSTON, LONDON.

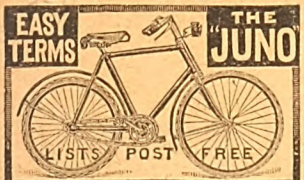
SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

"JUNO" CYCLES

Are the Very Best.



JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb.

JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

CASH OR CARRIAGE PAID

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London

---

Swift Gold Medal

KNITTER.

KNITS Stockings ribbed or plain, Gloves and Clothing in Wool, Silk, or Cotton. Instructions Free. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals, for the "Harrison" and "Sun" Machines.

Harrison Knitting Machine Co., Ltd. Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

7/6 SALOON GUN WITH 100 BALL CARTRIDGES. 7/6

TAKES BALL, SHOT, AND NOISELESS CARTRIDGES.

This gun is the cheapest in the world. It is not a toy, but a practical well-made Saloon Gun, 37in. long, weight about 4½lb. 100 Birds or Rabbits can be killed with it at cost of 1/6 only with shot cartridges, or 6/- per 500. Will penetrate a deal board 1in. at 50 yards. Can also be used in the house as a Target Rifle, with NOISELESS Cartridges at 1/- per 100, or 5/- per 1,000. This gun is fitted with a beautifully finished stock, nickel-plated fittings, etc., etc. Price 7/6 with 100 Ball Cartridges. Each gun is tested, regulated, and proved before sent to customer. The "Union Jack" Pistol (Registered), with 100 Ball Cartridges, price 4/6, or pair for 8/-. Block Action Saloon or Garden Guns (very superior manufacture) with 100 ball cartridges. No. 1 Bore, 12/6; No. 2 Bore, 13/6; No. 3 Bore, 15/6. No. 3 Bore at 15/6 will kill a bird on the wing at 35 to 45 yards. Send for Price Lists of Air Guns, Saloon Guns, sporting novelties and ammunition. If you cannot send to-day, cut this advertisement out, and write some other time. ADDRESS—W. R. JACKSON, Wholesale Arms and Ammunition Dealer, Tottenham, MIDDLESEX.

(Mention this Paper.)

ARE YOU FAT?

DR. GORDON'S Elegant Pills are the only Safe and Lasting Cure for Stoutness, Abdominal or General. State height, weight, and send 2/9, 4/6, or 11/- to Dr. Gordon, 24, Hart St., London, W.C.

READ! READ! READ!

Miss Roberts, "Brooklyn," Spotland Road, Rochdale, says: "I am 21in. round waist—before taking Your Pills, 27in." Mrs. Cox, "Hazelhurst," Brondesbury Road, N.W.: "The last supply reduced me 14lb. in month without change of diet." P. Bendelow, 59, Dorset Street, Bolton: "Your Pills greatly reduced my weight." H. I. Cooper, 97, Somers Road, Southsea, says: "Your Pills reduced me 2 stones." Mrs J. Maskery, of Shirley, Derby: "I have lost nearly 3 stones in weight." Miss Nappey, Wood Lane, Headingley: "I have lost 18lb."

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

ARMSTRONG'S

Lady's & Gentleman's, from £5 10s., carriage paid. Prompt delivery, lists free. SPORTING GUN DEPT., Collingwood Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

CAN YOU WRITE?

Of course you can! Why not then emboss your Notepaper, etc., with a pretty Monogram? using the

Patent Pocket Monopresse

Every Initial and Monogram of two letters kept in stock. Monogram of two letters, 1/1; Initials, 10d. each, post free. Apply—

CHAS. ROMPLER, 7, New Basinghall St., London, E.C. Agents wanted.

Every Young Man can positively and speedily cultivate a HEAVY, HANDSOME MOUSTACHE,

By a few applications of Knowles' "Esauline," the newly-discovered Hair-Forcing Specific. Success guaranteed. "ESAULINE" thickens the growth of the Moustache, is an infallible cure for falling off of the Hair, weak or thin Eyebrows, Premature Baldness, etc., and as a general Hair Producer and Restorer is absolutely unrivalled. Will not stain or injure the most delicate Skin. Highly recommended for Children's Hair. From all Chemists and Hair Dressers.

Post Free, Prices, 1s. 6d., 3s., or 5s.

T. KNOWLES & CO.,

330, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full natural perfect Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment, approved and recommended by the medical profession. Success guaranteed. For particulars free, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 183, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

PEOPLE WITH BRAINS SHOULD TURN TO PAGE 666.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 390. FOR WEEK ENDING JUNE 20TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

Worth a Guinea a Box

has passed into a proverb
expressive of universal approval
concerning a medicine of rare value.

This Notable Verdict,

justified by a sale of 6,000,000 boxes yearly,
must secure the confidence of sufferers
in all climes and countries,
and ever-widening fame
of

BEECHAM'S PILLS

of ever-widening fame
and
in all climes and countries
must secure the confidence of sufferers,
justified by a sale of 6,000,000 boxes yearly.

This Notable Verdict

concerning a medicine of rare value,
expressive of universal approval,
has passed into a proverb—

Worth a Guinea a Box.

Digitized by Google

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Absolutely the Best Value in the World.

Are supplied Direct from the Originators of the HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES for Ladies, viz., JOHN NOBLE Ltd., The Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in Existence, who consequently have the Best Facilities for producing Better Value than any other Firm of Costumiers.

TWO GOLD MEDALS AWARDED.

The John Noble Half-Guinea Costumes, ready made and to measure, are made in the World-famed John Noble Cheviot Serge.

COLOURS: Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Bronze-green, Electric Blue, Petunia, Ruby, Dark Cinnamon, Fawn or Grey.

Perfection of Material, Cut, Style, and Finish Guaranteed. Patterns and Illustrated "Book of Costumes" Post Free.

MODEL 458.

Model 458, as illustrated, is a charming mode in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, consisting of full wide Skir and smart Bodice, prettily trimmed with fine military braid and finished fancy buttons. Saddle and sleeves lined. Price 10/6 complete. Safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

MODEL 469.

Model 469 is a new Coat and Skirt Costume in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, consisting of wide Costume Skirt and latest shape Open Coat, with square corners and neat revers. Price 10/6. Carriage 9d. extra. 10/6

Sizes in stock of the above Costumes are 34, 36, or 38 in. round bust under arms, the skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front; larger or special sizes made to order for 1/6 extra, in ordering which please state measurement round bust under arms, size of waist, length from neck to waist at back, length of inside sleeve, and length of skirt in front.

Write for patterns, also "Illustrated Book of Costumes," containing numerous other Designs. Please mention Short Stories when writing.

Cheques, Postal Orders, etc., should be crossed "London and Midland Bank," and made payable to

JOHN NOBLE Ltd., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

MRS. LAWRENCE

A Farmer's Wife, writes from Mid-Rasen, Lincolnshire: "For a long time I suffered severely from

INDIGESTION

And Wind in the Stomach, and had to call in the doctor. Having prescribed for me some time he said, 'I can do nothing more for you.' My husband urged me to try your WIND PILLS; he brought me a box and I took them. In a few days I was quite well and able to get up, and now enjoy excellent health. Publish my name and address."

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills

Being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, Mild, and Tonic, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

ALL SUFFERERS from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND ON THE STOMACH, BILIOUSNESS, SICK HEADACHE, PALPITATION OF THE HEART, etc.,

should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

Of all Chemists, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for Price from PAGE WOODCOCK, Lincoln.

CAN YOU WRITE?

Of course you can! Why not then emboss your Notepaper, etc., with a pretty Monogram? using the

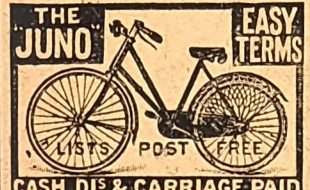
Patent Pocket Monopresse

Every Initial and Monogram of two letters kept in stock. Monogram of two letters, 1/1; Initials, 10d. each, post free. Apply—

CHAS. ROMPLER, 7, New Basinghall St., London, E.C. Agents wanted.

"JUNO" CYCLES

Are the very Best.



CASH DIS & CARRIAGE PAID

JUNO Safeties, Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb.

JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

ONE BOX

OF

Dr. Mackenzie's Improved Harmless Arsenic Complexion Wafers

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire; clear, fresh, free from blotch, blemish, coarseness, redness, freckles, or pimples. Post free for 4/6.—S. HARVEY, 5, Denman St., London Bridge, S.E. Half-boxes 2/9. Use Dr. MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL TOILET SOAP. 1s. per Tablet; No. 2, unscented, 6d. per Tablet. Made from Purest Ingredients and Absolutely Harmless.

Beware of the many imitations.

HAVE DR. MACKENZIE'S OR NONE.

ALPACAS.

Sicilian Alpaca Skirts ...	8s. 11d.
Costumes	13s. 9d.
Cycling Tweed Skirts ...	7s. 6d.
Coat and Skirt	14s. 9d.
Serge Skirts	4s. 11d.
Coat and Skirt	10s. 6d.

Write for Patterns and New Summer List.

J. H. KING & Co., Manufrs., 28, Barbican, Lond. E.C

HIGH-CLASS TAILORING

Every Garment cut to measure.

DIRECT from the Manufacturer, Saving all Middle Profits.

LADIES' TAILOR-MADE COSTUMES

In all the present Shades. From 10/6 to 70/-. Value Unequalled. Fit Guaranteed.

MEN'S SUITS 18/6

Better Qualities, 22/6, 25/6, 31/6, 37/6, 45/-, 52/6, 63/-.

Cycling Suits from 12/6.

BOYS' SUITS.

Pieces for mending sent with all Suits.

See our New Patterns before ordering. It will pay you to do so.

Hundreds to choose from. Fashion plates and measure forms free on application. All Goods Carriage Paid.

Factory Clothing Co.

Manufacturing and Ladies' Tailors,

117K, ALBION ST., LEEDS

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 25

June 20, 1896.

S.S. S.S.

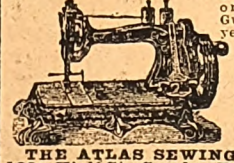
HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted, sending stamped envelope. Address, Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/-. P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 183B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn

SHORT STORIES

Edited by C. Arthur Pearson.

No. 390.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending June 20th, 1896.

A Strange Destiny.

I DIED twenty-five years ago, and, although my form is scarcely ethereal, I am as effectively non-existent as if I had been comfortably ferried over Styx and slumbered ten feet below the earth's surface. It will be necessary for me to explain that my name is, or was, Charles Conyngham, and my vocation that of a Continental messenger of Her Majesty's Foreign Office. In so remarkable a manner did I disappear, that in all probability the secretarial department at Downing Street, in conjunction with their neighbours over the way at Great Scotland Yard, still regard it as an unsolved mystery. In vain may they search, for I have ceased to exist; my personality has been lost for the past twenty-five years.

In 1871, England was obliged to exercise some ingenious diplomacy towards the newly-formed French Republic, and consequently in the middle of the year I was making two and even three journeys to Paris each week. Constant travelling like this soon wearies the most experienced, especially when arriving in London in the morning, only to return at night. The French, German, and Italian railways were to me as familiar as the Strand or Regent Street, for in ten years of Continent-trotting my brain had become a Bradshaw in itself, and I think I had seen all the so-called "sights," so delightful to the untravelled. A long journey to the Austrian or Turkish capital was very much more to my taste than the wearying monotony of the "Dover-Calais route," and I began to be heartily sick of it, as during the month I had been to Paris no fewer than thirteen times.

One August night, though excessively tired, I was compelled to set out again, and left Charing Cross by the mail train. Besides carrying important dispatches, a bag had been intrusted to my care which I knew contained a large sum in notes and gold, and which I had instructions to deliver to the British Ambassador. I was alone as far as Dover, but when I alighted on the pier the wind was blowing hard and the rain descending in torrents, indicative of "dirty" weather outside the harbour.

All Rights Reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"Calais boat this way, sir!" The words sounded above the disconsolate comments in English and the staccato sounds in objugatory French, so I retraversed the wet gangway, and soon had my precious bag placed in a position in the saloon where I could keep a watchful eye upon it.

Arriving at Calais soon after midnight, I entered the refreshment room and made a hearty meal, until the unwelcome words "En voiture pour Paris" were shouted. Then I went out, and selecting an empty first-class compartment, bade the porter deposit the bag, and, wrapping myself comfortably in my travelling rug, settled down for the remainder of the journey.

I dared not sleep whilst this quantity of gold was in my possession, and, fatigued as I was, I managed by dint of great effort to keep myself awake. It was always possible I might be watched and followed by thieves or emissaries of political societies; therefore, a loaded revolver reposed in my pocket ready for any emergency.

Few people were travelling that night, and I was fortunate enough to have the compartment to myself until we ran into Abbeville. Then there entered two well-dressed Frenchmen, who scrutinised me rather closely, and sank into the opposite corners of the carriage. Seldom I feel uneasy about my fellow passengers, but I confess that, as I regarded them, a shadow of distrust, of impending evil fell upon me. Instinctively I felt for my revolver, and assured myself it was in readiness if required, for somehow I was certain these men had been upon the channel boat, and were following me with an evil purpose.

But they sat opposite one another, smoking, and occasionally indulging in conversation, though never once turning towards me, and keeping their faces concealed as much as possible from the pale flickering ray of the carriage lamp.

As the train sped on, I became more fully convinced these men meant mischief. I looked at my watch, and found that in twenty minutes we should be due at Amiens, and determined to change into another carriage there. Patiently I sat gazing out of the window, watching the first grey streak of dawn break over the distant hills, and waiting for the next stoppage, when I suddenly felt a terrible blow upon the top of my skull. I remember no more! All was blank!

* * * * *

A burning, excruciating pain like the pricking of a thousand red-hot needles in my brain, a feeling that my eyes were being gouged out, and my temples beaten with hot irons. It was the most horrible torment I have ever experienced, yet I was gradually coming to, struggling out of what seemed to be a half dream, half stupor. Slowly the terrible throbbing in my head abated, and I found myself seated in an armchair in a handsomely furnished, but unfamiliar drawing-room. It was dimly lighted by tiny lamps, and gazing round in astonishment, I noticed a spacious fernery beyond, which looked like a mermaid's cave in the depths of the sea, so dense was the mass of greenery and so soft the splash of the miniature cascade.

My first thought was of my dispatches, and I felt for my pouch; but it was not there! Had I been robbed? Placing my hand on my chin, I was startled to find that I had a long beard plentifully besprinkled with grey, though yesterday I was cleanly shaved! And my bag of coin, where was that? I struggled to my feet, and, as I did so, my figure was reflected in a long mirror. I staggered backwards in amazement; for last night I saw a sprightly young man of thirty, but now I saw my hair was thin and grey, and my face so wrinkled and altered that I could not recognise it as my own.

Where was I? What could it all mean? Whilst these thoughts were passing through my mind, I espied a hand-bell, and tugged at the pull. My summons was quickly answered by a sharp-featured young man, who was evidently not a servant.

"Tell me, who brought me here? Whose house is this?" I asked impatiently.

The man gazed at me apparently in blank astonishment.

"I—er. You're not well, sir, I think. This is your own house."

"My house! And who are you, pray?"

"I am your secretary; but I—I'll return in a moment," he replied, and, evidently much terrified, he disappeared as quickly as if he had seen a phantom.

I had no time to reflect upon the mystery of the situation before there entered a tall, voluptuous looking woman, of what is called the Junoesque type, in evening dress, and ablaze with diamonds.

"Why, what have you said to Hallett? You've quite frightened him," she said, laughing. "How is it you are not dressed? You remember we promised to dine at Creswell's to-night."

"I—I don't understand you, madam," I gasped, for my brain was in a whirl.

"What's the matter with you? What has happened?" she cried in alarm. "Don't you know me, Rose, your wife?"

"My wife! No; I have never seen you before. This is some trick. Where is my bag of money?" I said in perplexity.

The look of distress deepened as she said:

"Calm yourself, my dear. You are not well, and must have advice."

"I want no advice," I replied. "I must resume my journey to Paris at once. Where are the clothes I wore, and the dispatches?"

"I do not know what you mean," exclaimed the woman who called herself my wife. "Your mind must be wandering, Frank."

"That is not my name. I am Charles Conyngham."

"No, you are under a delusion, dear," she replied in a softer tone, evidently intending to humour me. "You are Frank Godstone, and I am Rose Godstone, your wife."

"When and where did you marry me?"

"In Melbourne, eight years ago."

"In Melbourne. And where are we now?"

"This is our country home at St. Kilda, in Victoria. Is there anything else you would like to know?"

She said this with a smile, as if half inclined to believe I was joking.

"I married you eight years ago, you say. Then what year is this?"

She laughed mischievously as she replied:

"Come, Frank, this is not the first of April, so all this nonsense is out of place. You know well enough it is 1896——"

"What!" I cried, feeling myself growing rigid with amazement. "Yesterday was twenty-five years ago!"

I was certainly wide awake and sensible; but that I was myself I began to doubt, and at last came to the conclusion that I was not. I struggled to comprehend the situation, but utterly failed. How I came to be in Australia, the husband of such a wife, the owner of such a mansion, was a deep, inexplicable mystery. I felt light-headed, for this horrible suspense, and these unfamiliar surroundings were goading me to frenzy.

Digitized by Google

"There must be some serious misunderstanding between us, madam," I said earnestly. "I am not joking; for I certainly have not set eyes upon you before this evening, and am utterly at a loss to know who or what I am."

The woman who called me husband regarded me with a look of terror, as if she had suddenly become convinced of the truth of my words. Her face blanched, and she would have fallen had I not caught her and laid her upon a sofa. I rang the bell, and the maid-servant appeared.

"Your mistress has fainted; call someone to her assistance," I said, and, leaving the room, proceeded to explore the house from garret to basement. It was a splendid modern mansion, furnished with taste and elegance; and I found, on looking out of the windows, it was surrounded by well-kept lawns and clumps of fine old trees, now illumined by the pale moonlight, and transformed into a scene almost fairy-like.

Presently I was pacing the terrace, rapt in thought. The stars shone, the night wind sighed softly through the trees, and the air was filled with the subtle perfume of roses. How well I remember leaning upon the stone balustrade, gazing away to where the lurid reflection upon the sky denoted the distant city of Melbourne, and trying to account for my novel surroundings.

Utterly unable to realise the memorable journey to Paris had been made twenty-five years before, for it seemed but yesterday, though my aged appearance, my beard, the fact of my marriage, and my opulence, all combined to confirm the assertion the fainting woman had just made. But the thought of the lost money, and undelivered dispatches, troubled me most. In vain I tried to recount my actions on that night I left London; but, beyond the remembrance of the terrible blow I had sustained, I could recollect nothing. The anxiety was distracting, and as I paced the terrace with quick, impatient steps, I knew that if some solution of this horrible mystery did not soon present itself, I should go mad. I had a presentiment of insanity, and shuddered at the thought of the terrible derangement which hung over me as a Damoclean sword.

Suddenly I heard a footstep, and, turning, confronted the man who called himself my secretary.

"Layton, the manager of the Waljeers, has just arrived from Ballarat, and wishes to see you on important business, sir," he said.

"To see me! What for?"

"He desires instructions regarding the Waljeers claim. They have struck the lead at last, and the yield of gold is so rich that he advises you to float it as a company in the Melbourne market at once. Shall I bring him to you?"

"No," I replied. "Leave me to myself. I—I have not the slightest idea of your meaning."

"You must be unwell, sir," the man replied. "Surely you know Layton, who used to manage your mine at Poowong, and who is now in charge of the Waljeers?"

"I don't know him, and I have no desire to make his acquaintance. Send him away," cried I.

For a moment the man hesitated, then, muttering in an undertone, retired into the house.

It was not long before a maid-servant appeared, saying:

"Mistress would like to see you in the drawing-room, sir," and I obeyed the summons.

On entering I found the woman who called me husband seated upon a lounge chair, and near her stood a short stout old gentleman in a frock coat, and wearing pince-nez.

"Ah, my dear Godstone," exclaimed the latter, greeting me effusively, "how are you this evening?"

"I have not the pleasure of your acquaintance," I replied stiffly.

"Not know me? Come, come, think. Don't you remember Doctor Stanborough?"

"No, I don't."

The woman glanced significantly at him as he advanced towards me peering intently into my eyes.

"What have you been saying to your wife?" he asked abruptly.

"Saying? Why, the truth!" I replied. "She calls herself my wife; but I have never seen her before. Yesterday I was conveying some important dispatches between London and Paris, when—well I hardly know what happened; but I believe two ruffians stunned me, and I knew no more until I awoke this evening to find myself in a strange house, and claimed as husband by this lady. I believe there's some confounded trickery somewhere, and perhaps you can explain the whereabouts of the dispatches and money."

The doctor did not reply, but turning to her said gravely:

"Madam, this is very, very sad. I am afraid your husband's mind is affected."

"You are mistaken," I cried vehemently. "I am as sane as yourself; but if this horrible mystery is not soon elucidated, I feel I shall go mad."

"You are certainly not yourself to-night. We must see what treatment we can give you," said the doctor.

"I want none of your nostrums, sir. All I require are my dispatches and money. I am told I am in Australia; if so, I must return to England immediately and explain my absence."

"Doctor, my dear husband seems under the delusion he has been robbed of some important documents," explained she anxiously.

"I am under no delusion, madam," I said rather hotly. "All I desire explained is how I came to be here."

"Monomania, evidently," the doctor exclaimed in a low voice. "It develops frequently into the most violent forms of madness, and he will have to be kept in seclusion and closely watched."

"Understand me," I said angrily, "your fears as to my sanity are groundless. I believe I have fallen a victim to a vile plot; but I tell you I am being mistaken for some other man. I am Charles Conyngham of the Foreign Office, London."

"Very well, my dear fellow, very well," the doctor replied, placing his hand upon my shoulder. "We will believe it, if you wish. Calm yourself; remember your wife is weak and nervous."

I turned dejectedly away, for all my efforts to make myself understood had only been met with incredulity by the idiotic soft-spoken old doctor, who evidently believed that I was mad.

My position became more singular every moment, and in distraction I strode out into the grounds and plunged into a tall wood of dark gum-trees. On and on I walked, heedless of where my footsteps led me, until at last, tired out, I sank upon a felled trunk and gave myself up to another mental struggle.

All was silence, save for the weird croaks and screams of the night birds, and the faint rustle of the leaves overhead. The cool wind fanned my heated temples with such a soothing effect that I fell asleep. The morning sun was penetrating the thick foliage when I awoke and made my way out of the forest. Without much difficulty I retraced my steps to the house, only to become more intensely puzzled. My soi-disant wife was too unwell to leave her room, and I roamed aimlessly about the place, seeking to discover something—I knew not what.

Digitized by Google

One room I entered was evidently a study; my own den, possibly! Glancing at the books, a few choice paintings, and the row of telephones, I seated myself at the littered writing-table. Turning over the papers before me and examining them, I saw they related to mining enterprises and transactions involving large sums. Many of the letters and memoranda were unmistakably in my handwriting, but the signatures were "Frank Godstone," and the letter paper bore the heading "Great Poowong Gold Mines, Office, 296, Collins Street, Melbourne." My eyes fell upon a calendar and I saw I had not been deceived; it was the year 1896.

From the doctor's words on the previous night, it seemed clear that if I remained I should be placed under restraint as a lunatic, so what should hinder me from returning to Europe, and endeavouring to find out what befel me on that midnight journey? At the thought of funds I rose, and searching the drawers of the writing-table, discovered a cash-box. A bunch of keys was in my pocket, one of which opened the box, and eagerly counting the contents, I found nearly three hundred pounds in gold and notes. This would suffice for the journey and with great joy I transferred the money to my pocket.

In haste I wrote a few lines to my mysterious wife, informing her of my intentions, begging her not to follow me, and promising to return as soon as I obtained the information required to restore my peace of mind.

Calling Hallett, my secretary, I gave him the letter, with instructions not to deliver it at the sick woman's room until the evening; then gathering a few things into a hand-bag, I left the house. The next train bore me to Melbourne, and that same evening I was on board a P. and O. boat steaming out of Port Phillip.

From the first I was beset by terrible anxiety and fear lest I should be recognised, for though a victim to circumstances, I was, nevertheless, a delinquent, and I knew not into whose hands the undelivered dispatches had fallen, or what complications had ensued thereby.

On my return to London, however, I soon became assured that my appearance had changed beyond recognition, for on various pretexts I conversed with men who had been my intimate associates, none of whom now claimed my acquaintance.

The task of tracing my past career was fraught with many difficulties, and it was in Paris that I discovered a clue to the mystery. While searching the file of the Figaro for 1871, I found that on August the fifth, the night mail from Calais to Paris, while approaching Amiens, ran into some trucks, and was completely wrecked, seven persons being killed and twenty injured. But there was also enacted a terrible tragedy, for it appeared that in a first-class compartment were two men, one having among his baggage a strong leather bag, containing a large sum in English notes and gold. Both received severe blows about the head in the collision, but one, in order to obtain possession of the money, took advantage of the confusion immediately following the accident by shooting his fellow traveller dead. The murderer was making off with that portion of his booty that was portable when he was apprehended and conveyed to Paris.

Here was another complication! I could not be the murderer, neither could I be the murdered man, yet the bag of gold referred to was evidently the one intrusted to my care.

Eagerly I scanned the papers of the following days and found reports of the examination before the juge d'instruction, and subsequent trial of the accused for wilful murder. He was stated to be young and well dressed, though conducting himself strangely, refusing to give his name or any account of himself whatever, and preserving an immutable silence throughout the many days the proceedings lasted. The trial must have been a celebrated one, judging from the reports; and the prisoner, through a slight discrepancy in the corroborative evidence, escaped the guillotine, and was sentenced to transportation for life to the penal settlement of New Caledonia.

Here the information ended; and though I searched the copies of the papers for two years subsequently, I found nothing more. It was clear my only hope lay in an interview with this mysterious convict, who might enlighten me as to my connection with the tragic affair; and to this end I sought out an official in the Prisons Department, who was once well known to me. He had since retired into private life, and in common with others, did not remember me. Representing myself as an English solicitor endeavouring to trace a next of kin, and offering to pay handsomely for information, I prevailed upon him to seek an interview with the chief of the department, and ascertain where the man who had been sent to penal servitude could be found.

A few days later, when I called, a memorandum was placed in my hand certifying that after remaining five years at the settlement, prisoner No. 7,403, committed for life for murder, had escaped in company with Auguste Durand, another convict, by means of a boat. The supposition was that they were drowned at sea, if not, they must have landed on the Queensland coast.

To discover this man Durand was no easy matter; but, if successful, he might furnish me with the whereabouts of his whilom companion. I was dubious about the result of my search, for might I not be on the wrong track after all? Nevertheless I proceeded to Brisbane without delay, and in nearly all the chief newspapers in the Australian colonies caused to be inserted a brief paragraph to "Auguste Durand, late of Yengen," stating that his companion upon the voyage from the island to the mainland in 1876 wished particularly to meet him, as he had something important to communicate. This was the only means by which I could hope to find him, and congratulating myself upon having composed an artfully worded invitation, patiently awaited its result.

Several weeks passed without an answer, and I was vainly trying to devise some other method by which to reach the escaped convict, when one day I was informed by the hotel waiter that a gentleman desired to see me. I naturally concluded it was he, and expressed my willingness to receive him.

Judge my dismay however, when there was ushered in no less a person than my secretary!

"Well, old fellow," said he familiarly, offering his hand; "and why all this confounded mystery? I saw the advertisement in the Argus," he continued, "and, concluding something was up, left Melbourne at once. What is it?"

"The advertisement?" I gasped.

Digitized by Google

"Yes. You want to see me."

"You are mistaken; I do not."

"But your advertisement was addressed to Auguste Durand, your humble servant, who shared your lot in that living tomb at Yengen, and who escaped with you!"

"What? Is this true?" I asked in astonishment. "Was I convicted for murder?"

"Of course you were, and I for forgery. But you seem to be as insane as when you left St. Kilda so suddenly six months ago. What's the matter with you?"

"Are you Auguste Durand?" I asked.

"That's my baptismal cognomen, though John Hallett suits me better just now."

"Then hear me," I exclaimed. "Perhaps I am not quite myself, but I have forgotten all. Tell me how we escaped, why I am rich, and you my servant."

He gazed at me incredulously for a moment, and after reiterating his opinion that I had taken leave of my senses, related the story of our escape.

Narrated briefly, it seemed we were pals in the same labour gang, and had plotted our escape for many months, until one day, finding a boat in which a keg of water and some biscuits had been conveniently placed, we took advantage of the opportunity. After drifting countless days upon the Coral Sea under a burning sun, we landed at last, more dead than alive, near Port Curtis. Overjoyed at our freedom, we at once commenced to seek a livelihood, and at Walloon turned miners. Fortune smiled upon me. I prospered, bought claims, and profited largely by speculation, though my companion, always unlucky, existed upon my charity. After seven years at the diggings, I married a wealthy woman, and removed to Melbourne.

"And what is my present position?" I asked, when he had concluded.

"You are the owner of two of the richest gold mines in Victoria; and I, always a Lazarus, am your confidential secretary. Most confidential," he added, smiling: "the master convicted of murder, and the servant of forgery."

By this narrative the blank in my life had been filled, and I became aware it was myself, the mysterious convict, I had been endeavouring to trace.

Was I a murderer? That I was innocent seemed clear, for it was only reasonable to suppose that after the collision my fellow travellers attempted to rob me, and that in protecting my charge I fired the fatal shot. Seeing I had killed the thief, and fearing the consequences I filled my pockets with the money and was decamping when arrested. Why I refused to give any account of myself at the trial did not seem so obvious; but after much deliberation I became convinced of the fact, by no means unknown in medical science, that in the collision, the terrible blow I had sustained upon the head caused me to lose all consciousness of the past.

From that moment I commenced an entirely fresh existence, remembering nothing of what had occurred before, and was therefore unable to tell even my name and nationality at the trial. The Foreign Office was either in ignorance of my position, or refrained from interfering from some unexplained cause; and thus for twenty-five years I had lived totally oblivious to the events anterior to the blow which so strangely affected my brain. On that memorable night in my own drawing-room, I must have struck my head against some hard substance—the corner of the mantelpiece probably—and this, as a counteraction, restored me to consciousness, though obliterating the remembrance of the intervening years.

On my return to St. Kilda, my wife welcomed me warmly; and, after I had explained the cause of my sudden absence and apparent insanity, she went to her room, returning with a sealed official envelope.

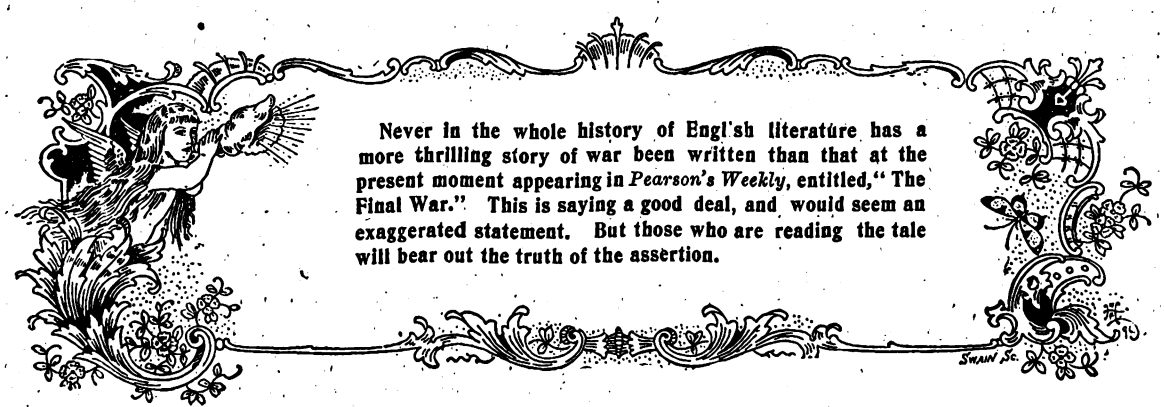
"This," she said, "you confided to my safe keeping after our marriage. It may be the lost dispatch."

It was. I grasped it eagerly, and read the superscription, then placed it on the fire and watched the flames consume it.

From that day I commenced life afresh, and can safely assert there is not a happier pair than Rose and I in all the colony.

Durand is no longer my secretary, but the keeper of a fashionable restaurant in Melbourne. I need scarcely add it was my money that purchased the business.

FRANCIS S. PALMER.



Digitized by Google

THE SALVATION LASS

CAPTAIN GRACE threw open the window of her tiny room and looked out at the bright sunshine, the blue sky, the drifting, fleecy clouds.

"Glory to God," she murmured; "what a perfect day!"

Then she set the coffee on to boil, toasted some bits of bread, and boiled an egg. Before partaking of this simple breakfast, she bent her shapely brown head and whispered:

"Give me strength, Father, for to-day."

That was Captain Grace's daily morning prayer. Strength to sustain her through each day's work, to help her bear the taunting words, the insulting laughs, the profanity and vile language hurled at her on her rounds; strength to uphold her in her visits to the slums, and to push open the swinging doors of public houses and attack the devil in his very stronghold.

Captain Grace was a beauty, and that fact made her life all the harder. The face that looked out from under the ugly army bonnet was the face of an angel, with its ivory-like complexion, in which roses came and went; with its clear, resolute, turquoise eyes, its dimpled chin, straight little nose, and soft red lips.

The plain uniform of the Salvation Army, which renders a homely woman an absolute fright by its very severity, only emphasised the loveliness of the girl's face and figure. Too well did the young warrior know her charms. She heard them discussed by men at street corners, in tram cars, and in the public restaurants.

"What a bloomin' little daisy," said a rowdy.

"What a little darling," said a man about town.

Captain Grace often wished she were as ugly as Ensign Jerusha, who was pock-marked and squint-eyed, and thus escaped many of Satan's javelins. But a regular life, constant exercise and occupation, and high, pure thought, combined to produce a beauty which grew from day to day and from which the earthly elements were fast being eliminated.

The girl was gentle, refined, and intelligent. She had sacrificed many of the sweets and joys of life to lead this curious existence. She was very reticent about her past, lived only for her work, and to lay up treasure where moth and rust do not corrupt.

In the slums she was known, loved and blessed. Her small hands had pressed the aching head of the suffering, and scrubbed the floors of the slatternly. Her smiles and tears had mingled with those of the unfortunates of earth. Her cheering words, gracious deeds and prayers, were a sweet savour in the nostrils of the despairing.

And yet Captain Grace was a girl with a girl's love of pleasure, pretty things, ease, and comfort. She battled fiercely at times with these temptations—faint and weary with warfare, longing to yield, to leave the strife, to taste happiness and human joy. But her conscience ever sounded a trumpet call, and Captain Grace, obeying, sprang again to the conflict.

Just as she took down her dark blue bonnet from the wall there came a knock at the door. She opened it.

Miss Francesca Fadd stood there.

Miss Francesca Fadd was rich, pretty, kind-hearted, generous, and always had a nice hobby horse for herself to ride.

Just now her hobby horse was the Salvation Army.

She had attended the meetings, wept in her lace handkerchief, subscribed liberally, and confided to her dear friends that she felt herself chastened and comforted. She had hunted up the pretty captain, whose face had attracted her, and had made as great a pet of the girl as the young devotee would permit.

"Good-morning, dearest," said the caller.

"Good-morning, dear Francesca," replied the captain. "Come in."

Francesca seated herself and took a long survey of her friend.

The two girls formed a curious contrast. Miss Fadd was a study in brown velvet and sable. Big diamonds quivered in her pink ears, and a huge cluster of violets shook out their perfume from her breast. Her great brown eyes flashed questioningly on the other, who stood pale, serious, a trifle sad, but resolute.

"Have you decided, Grace?"

"Yes, Francesca."

"Well, you will come with me—give over this hard life, live with me, be my companion and sister? You know I am alone, rich, my own mistress. You shall have every luxury. We will travel."

Captain Grace lifted her little red roughened hand.

"No more, no more, I beg," she said quietly; "it cannot be."

Miss Francesca Fadd burst into tears.

She was honestly disappointed. She was fond of the girl. And she fancied the idea of playing Lady Bountiful.

Moreover, she liked to have her own way.

But Captain Grace would not surrender. She had marked out her path in life, and though it was rough and stony and might lead to a place of skulls, yet would she follow it.

An hour after this little scene Captain Grace reported for duty at headquarters. Her sweet face was like a ray of sunshine in the gloomy barracks.

Digitized by Google

"Good-morning, Captain," said a black-eyed girl in a big gingham apron, grey shawl, and black hat—the regulation slum uniform.

"Good-morning, lieutenants," returning the salute; "do you feel like fighting to-day?"

"Yes, Captain," was the quick response. "I could down the devil and all his angels this morning."

"That's right," said Captain Grace cheerfully.

Lieutenant Sally was one of Captain Grace's protégés. She was a brand plucked from the burning. Captain Grace had rescued her from a life of frightful misery and sin, and Sally's devotion to her friend was unbounded.

The two received orders to sell the War Cry until two o'clock; after that they were to go about their regular slum duties. Up and down the streets, in and out of buildings, went the pair. They were repulsed and chaffed by turns. Doors were banged in their faces, and coarse jokes cracked at their expense.

But they did not appear to mind. They chatted animatedly, compared sales, encouraged each other; once Captain Grace helped a feeble tottering old woman across the street, under the very noses of the horses, and once Lieutenant Sally wiped the tears from a dirty little child's face and gave it a cake.

It was just as they were about to make their final call in a Chrystie Street public-house, that its doors were violently dashed open, and a dreadful old tramp, sodden, filthy, bedraggled, was kicked out on the pavement.

He was a pitiful sight. Shaking and trembling, he stood gazing vacantly about, then suddenly burst into tears.

Captain Grace hesitated one moment.

"Lieutenant," she said calmly, "I will meet you round at the Norfolk Street tenement as soon as possible. I have something to do here."

Lieutenant Sally saluted and departed. Then with a face pale as death, but inwardly glowing with a sublime passion, Captain Grace approached the poor old wayfarer standing there alone, and wiped the tears from his wrinkled cheeks with a trembling hand.

"Come, brother," she said gently; "come with me."

And holding him by his ragged sleeve, Captain Grace steered him along street after street, until she had landed him safely in one of the refuges established and maintained by the Army for such as he.

Then unwittingly she set her face towards her Golgotha.

It was nearly four o'clock when she entered the tenement. Up the black creaking stairs she picked her way to the fourth storey, pausing at a rickety door.

The room she entered was quite fresh and neat from its recent scrubbing. There was a pot of scraggly geranium in the window. A little boy of six was playing with some battered toys upon the floor. A pale face, white as the flabby pillow on which it lay, looked up with a wan smile as she entered.

"How are you to-day, my dear?" asked Captain Grace, as she bent over the sick woman. "Better? Ah! that's good. Has Lieutenant Sally been here?"

"Yes; she went downstairs about fifteen minutes since. See how nice she has made everything look."

"Yes, the Lieutenant is a hard worker," said Captain Grace, trying to mend a disjointed doll for the child, who exhibited his treasure with pride.

There were various other little services her quick eye noticed, and the time slipped away in their performance.

Suddenly there was a commotion. Sounds of hurrying feet and confused murmurs, deepening to a sullen swell of voices, were heard.

Across the threshold, in through the keyhole, in every cranny of the tumbledown door, something grey and ghastly came drifting and creeping in little wreaths and puffs.

And in an instant a terrible voice somewhere shrieked the awful word: "Fire!"

A terrible voice shrieked the awful word: "Fire!"

The engines came leaping like live things down the narrow street. There were frenzied shouts, cries, prayers, tumult, chaos.

Like flies, the wretched inhabitants of the wretched tenements clung to the walls, the windows, the narrow fire-escapes. There was the clatter of horses' hoofs, the bang of the ladders as the fireman flung them in place, and, above all, the heavy drone and hum of the ponderous engines.

"Take her first," said Captain Grace, indicating the sick woman, as a big brawny fireman, his eyes blazing with heroic excitement, plunged through the crashing window into the room. He gave the Salvation Army girl a look of sturdy admiration, and went down the ladder with the woman in his arms.

The child was clinging about Captain Grace's neck, his little face buried on her shoulder.

"Don't be frightened, darling," said the girl, patting him gently; "the good man will come back."

He came, stretching his arms out tenderly for the child.

"Keep a stiff upper lip," he shouted to her amid the smoke, the falling of timbers, the wavering of the floor under her feet.

It was just then that the billows of smoke rolled apart for a moment and the crowd saw the Salvation Army girl.

She was kneeling in prayer.

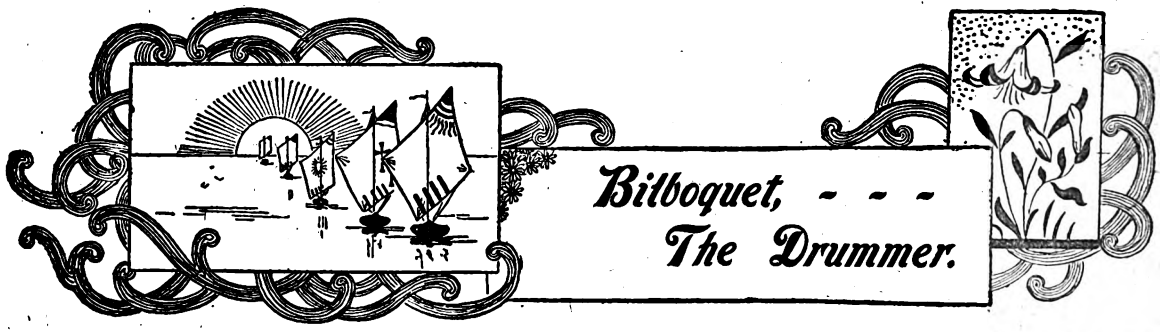
Through that maddened, cursing crowd, made up of roughs, loafers, and bruisers, ran a groan.

Men old in crime turned their hardened faces away the black smoke shut her again from sight.

Then came the last fearful crash, and Captain Grace—steadfast, brave, faithful unto death—was promoted.

ESTHER NOANES.

Digitized by Google



Bilboquet, - - - The Drummer.

In 1812, in the Ninth Regiment of the line, there was a drummer boy only thirteen years of age, a child of the troop, whose true name was Frolut, though the soldiers called him nothing but Bilboquet. Truly, with his tall thin body, surmounted by a big round head he certainly did resemble the object which had earned him the sobriquet.

One morning, the 12th of July, if I remember aright, the general in command received orders from the Emperor to take up his position on the other side of a narrow ravine, a dangerous place at the best of times, and now defended by a battery of six cannon commanding its approaches and our entire file of soldiers as well. To reach the place designated by the Emperor, it was necessary to take this battery on the banks of the Dwina, for the events that I am relating to you took place in the famous campaign against Russia.

All at once they see coming at full gallop an aide-de-camp of the general bearing the order for two companies of the sharpshooters to advance upon the battery. Three-fourths of them were bound to be killed, and the Voltigeurs, in spite of their intrepidity, point to the yawning cannon and grumble openly.

The captain had twice ordered the drum-major to call the tambours to the front to beat the charge, but he remained leaning upon his long staff, wagging his head, and little disposed to obey.

All this while Bilboquet was seated astraddle his drum, his eyes upon his chief, his lips whistling softly to himself an air of the fife, and his fingers tattooing the charge. As the command to forward comes again, and for the third time from the captain, he leaps to his feet, places his drum-sticks in position, passes under the nose of the drum-major, and with a scornful "Come on, old girl, come on!" pours out in a single phrase all the anger and insults that he has treasured in his heart.

The drum-major raises his cane, but it is too late, Bilboquet is at the head of the two companies, and beating the charge like a madman. The soldiers follow him and rush upon that terrible battery. The cannons roar, the Voltigeurs roll in the dust, many of them to rise on more; the smoke, blown by the wind, envelopes us like a cloud, the noise deafens us, but as it lifts a moment and floats away we can still see, upright before us, not twenty steps in advance, the dauntless figure of the little drummer beating the charge. We could even hear, feeble as it was, the sound of his instrument passionately bidding defiance to every Cossack in creation.

The Voltigeurs rush on, Bilboquet always ahead of them with his ceaseless rataplan. The battery roars again, a perfect storm of shot pouring upon the infuriated débris of our two beautiful companies—scarcely fifty men remain of the brave two hundred—and never had the drum-major sounded the charge as Bilboquet sounds it now—sternly, boldly, and, fired by the fever of vengeance, he plies his arms with the strength of twenty. When the smoke lifts anew the battery is taken.

In the meantime, Napoleon, mounted upon a knoll to the right, 10,000 soldiers of the Guard behind him, watches them as they execute his orders, and as the remnant of the Voltigeurs enters the battery, he signs to an aide-de-camp, who gallops away, to return almost immediately.

"How many?" the Emperor asks him, as he stops before him, "how many crosses will be needed to-morrow?"

"Forty," the officer replies, "forty—the rest are dead."

* * * * *

And the next day, as Napoleon had said, regiments were gathered together to see the distribution of the medals to the gallant handful who had executed so faithfully the Emperor's will. One by one the names of the survivors had been announced, and the cross of honour bestowed. The ceremony is ended, and all are about to retire, when suddenly there is a stir among the soldiers and a shrill voice sounds from the ranks:

"But me," it cries. "Me—you've given me nothing!" and General B——, who had charge of the distribution of the crosses, turns about to find planted before him our little friend Bilboquet, his cheeks as red as fire and his eyes full of tears.

"You!" cries the officer astounded; "you, my boy. Why, what do you want me to give you? What do you expect?"

"The cross like the others," Bilboquet promptly answered; "it was I who beat the charge on the battery—I was the first to enter!"

"And you thought we had forgotten you! But you are too young, my boy, to have the cross yet," said the general kindly, seeing that he was only a child; "we will give it to you when you've a beard on your chin like the others. Here's something to console you while waiting," and, dipping his hand into his pocket, he drew forth a twenty-franc piece and held it out to the little fellow.

Bilboquet looked at it, but without a thought of taking it, great tears rolling from his eyes and down his cheeks as, motionless as stone, he stood before the general. Even those who had teased him most, touched by his grief, were about to intercede for him. Bilboquet, however, did not give them time, and suddenly, as if seized with a new idea, reached out his hand, took the money from the general, and, without more ado, put it in his pocket, saying as he turned away:

"Thanks, my general; it will do another time."

* * * * *

Digitized by Google

Not long after the taking of the battery of the Dwina, the French troops entered Smolensk victorious and jubilant, Bilboquet with them, of course, and greatly pleased at the sights about the city, which he had asked to be allowed to visit almost at the moment of arrival. Yet, after all, it seemed to be the faces of the people in which he took the greatest interest, considering and examining them after the fashion of an amateur choosing merchandise.

I must admit, however, that it was not the peasants he regarded thus, with their long and bushy beards; doubtless they were well enough, and bountifully supplied, but of such an ugly, unpleasant red that Bilboquet, after a moment's scrutiny, turned away his eyes and continued his way.

At last, wandering along in this fashion, our petit tambour came to the Jewish quarter, for the Jews of Smolensk, like the rest of the Jews of Poland and Russia, confine themselves to a certain quarter.

When Bilboquet entered it you can imagine his delight, for of all the beards in the world the Jews assuredly have the loveliest, long, silky, and black as ebony, and it was beards the little drummer-boy was hunting. Some half way up the street he found the shop he wanted, the master of it bearded like a Turk.

"Vot vill you haf, my leetle sir?" cried the merchant civilly, as he crossed the threshold, "vot can I gif you?"

"Your beard," replied Bilboquet, without stopping to parley.

"My beard!" repeated the Jew, astonished, "you are joking!"

"I am not," said Bilboquet again, placing his hand upon the pocket where his money rested; "but do not think I want to rob you; here's a napoleon—you can give me change," and he threw it upon the counter between them.

In vain did the merchant endeavour to make Bilboquet hear reason. He was as obstinate as a blind horse, and engaged in such a wrangle that before long he attracted the attention of some soldiers passing in the street, who stopped to learn the motive of the quarrel. The notion of the little drummer boy struck them as so particularly funny that they sided with him, and compelled the unfortunate proprietor to give up his beard, one of them, the braggart as well as the barber of the regiment, drawing a razor from his pocket and shearing him without mercy or lather.

Having horribly skinned the Jew, he gave the shearing to the delighted Bilboquet, who carried it at once to the tailor of the regiment, and had it sewn up to a piece of sheep-skin taken from a broken drum. All this was the talk of the regiment for several days, but as no one could get from him what he intended to do with it, it was forgotten in other things, for we were now on the march again.

With the history of this campaign my story has nothing to do. I need only remind you that from the time of our arrival at Moscow misfortunes began, the cold and devastation depriving us of all our resources. Everyone returned as best he could, and it was with difficulty that a few regiments could be kept together to represent the body of the army and obey the orders of the general. Bilboquet's was one of these, and he was of the rear guard that prevented the thousands of Cossacks who followed the army from massacreing the unfortunate and solitary soldiers.

One day they had just retreated across a little river, and to retard the pursuit of the enemy the general had ordered the destruction of the bridge over which they had passed, a fragile wooden one; but the barrels of gunpowder hastily placed produced but little effect, and though the arches were displaced and thrown into the water, the framework caught and remained resting upon a single beam, which so held it that the enemy on arrival could easily secure and reconstruct it.

The general, knowing that the safety of the entire army depended upon the destruction of this bridge, ordered back the sappers to cut the beam and tear away the clinging framework.

As they were ready to embark, however, the enemy arrived on the other bank of the river and began such a rain of bullets that it seemed impossible for any sapper to reach it alive. They were about to give up and to defend themselves as best they could, when all at once they saw a soldier leap from the ranks into the river, his axe upon his shoulder.

The plunge carried him out of sight, of course, but soon he reappeared, his long flowing beard and peculiar cap showing him to be a sapper—thus offering himself as a sacrifice for the safety of others. That the water around him boiled with the bullets of the enemy you can be sure, nevertheless, he continued to advance bravely, vigorously, and five minutes later was at work upon the beam, sheltered behind the broken framework. A dozen blows and it crashed into the river, and the sapper was on his way to the bank again.

But picture our amazement, as mad with joy, we rushed to the edge to greet him, to find that it was the little Bilboquet, with a black and glossy beard suspended from the end of his chin.

"What does this mean? What is this masquerade?" cried the voice of the general behind us; "is it you again, giddy-head?"

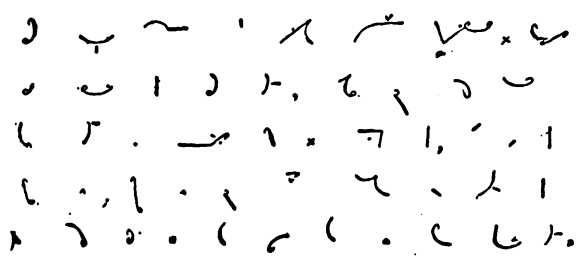
"Yes, my general, it is I, Bilboquet," answered the child; "you said you'd give me a cross when I'd a beard upon my chin. Here is a famous one, for I wasn't stingy, and spent the whole of the money you gave me for it!" and he drew himself up with an air of pride.

The general, thunderstruck at such bravery and shrewdness, held out his arms to Bilboquet as if he had been a man, and taking the cross from the lapel of his own coat, fastened it with his own hand in the buttonhole of his drummer's jacket.

It is upon the shoulders of the other petits tambours, you can rest assured, that the drum-major now establishes the time.

J. P.

Isn't This So?



Digitized by Google

THE WYTHECOMBE MYSTERY.

BY JOHN K. LEYS, author of "The Tenth of June," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

WHILE on a sketching tour in Wales, LAUNCELOT VERE gets into a dangerous position on the face of a precipice. His life is saved by WINIFRED DENVERS, to whom he becomes engaged. On the wedding morning LAUNCELOT disappears, and Miss UNWIN, the village schoolmistress, disappears at the same time. HAROLD KENYON, a friend of LAUNCELOT'S, leaves Wythecombe in search of his friend, and goes to London. He finds that the missing man has drawn £75 from his bank, and also discovers several sketches of Miss UNWIN in the artist's room. He interviews the guard of the train by which Miss UNWIN travelled to London, and finds that she was met by a man corresponding in description to VERE. On return to town he finds that Miss UNWIN has been murdered on Hampstead Heath. The trial reveals the fact that she and VERE were at one time very friendly, and that the revolver found by the deceased belongs to VERE.

KATHERINE DALE, a young lady with whom HAROLD KENYON is in love.

PAUL SHENSTONE, engaged to KATHERINE DALE.

REV. MARK DENVERS, Rector of Wythecombe, and WINIFRED'S father.

MR. BEAUMONT, a solicitor, and friendly with VERE.

MR. DAUNT, an old lawyer, and friendly with KENYON.

CHAPTER XII.

THE RIVALS.

PAUL SHENSTONE was one of those truly enviable persons who never allow their feelings to interfere with the carrying out of their resolutions. He had injured his cause with Kate by showing his jealousy of Harold Kenyon. That was clear enough. Therefore he at once resolved to make his peace with her; and he shrewdly suspected that he might possibly turn the blunder he had made to good account.

He called on Kate the very next morning, and with much apparent frankness apologised for what he called his abominable temper the night before.

Like all generous-minded people, Kate was averse to receive an apology, and inclined to believe, simply because it was offered, that she herself had been in some way to blame. She begged Paul to think no more of the matter, and began to think that she had judged him harshly the night before. And when he went on to say that she was, of course, a better judge than he could be as to what persons she should see, her heart fairly relented to him. She thought for the moment that he was more like what he used to be when they were first engaged, not the hard and cold being he had shown himself lately.

She smiled kindly on him; and after a little ordinary talk he rose to take his leave.

"Won't you stay to see mamma?" asked Kate; "she will be in in ten minutes."

"Not to-day, I think. But, Kate, before I go, would you mind telling me what day you would like fixed for the great event? We must settle it some time in advance, you know."

"You won't put me off again, Kate, will you?"

The smile died out of the poor girl's face; and the look which had become habitual to her during the last few weeks—the look of one who carries a bitter grief in silence, came back to her eyes.

"You said the first half of October, if you remember," added Paul.

"Did I?" she cried with a start. "That is very near now."

Shenstone could have stamped with impatience; but he held himself well in hand, and answered with a gentle, deprecatory smile:

"You won't put me off again, Kate, will you?"

"N—no. I don't mean that."

"Then let us say the twelfth, if that will suit you. I shall have time to give the necessary notices, and so on. May I fix it for the twelfth?"

Kate's reply was inaudible; but her lover took it for an assent. He thanked her, pressed her hand, and touched her cheek with his lips, knowing well enough that she would be better pleased with this perfunctory embrace than with a more fervent one. Then he left her at once, lest the tacit consent she had given should be recalled, and went along the Darnport road at a rapid pace. The road was empty, but for a farmer's man driving a cart of fodder. The man noticed and wondered at the gleam of triumph in Shenstone's eye, the suppressed smile of keen satisfaction that rested on his lips.

Digitized by Google

But Kate?

She threw herself on the sofa, and buried her face in the cushions. No sound of weeping was heard in the room; her grief was too bitter for tears.

"Oh God!" she cried suddenly, lifting her pale face heavenward. "Can it be that on account of a foolish promise, Thou dost demand this sacrifice at my hands?"

There was no answer. The girl had no one to give her counsel. Her mother, who was kindness itself, would feel distressed if she told her her trouble, and would probably advise her to break off the match, as the easiest thing to do under the circumstances. Kate did not want to be told what would be the easiest and pleasantest thing to do. She wanted to do what was right, let the cost to her personal inclinations be what it might. And there was no one to tell her what the right course was. The Rector? She smiled at the idea of laying a point of conscience before Mr. Denvers, good man though he was. There was no one who could speak to her with that authority which alone can give a sense of security to a perplexed conscience.

So far as she could see, she was bound by her promise, unless her lover chose to release her; and as he steadily refused to do this, there was no help for her.

Meanwhile Paul had arrived at his destination.

Darnport was a small, old-fashioned seaport, which some years before had fallen into a state of stagnation, but now seemed to be in a fair way of recovery. The London and Devonshire Bank, of which Harold Kenyon was the local manager, fronted the market-place; and thither Shenstone directed his steps.

"Mr. Kenyon in?" he asked the cashier; and without waiting for an answer, he passed into the bank parlour.

"How d'ye do, Kenyon? I just looked in to see what my balance may be at present," he said.

Harold begged his visitor to sit down, touched a bell, and asked the clerk who answered it to bring him the required information.

"Almost run out, I see," said Shenstone carelessly, when the slip of paper was handed to him. "I may overdraw a little, I suppose?"

"Certainly, but we should want something in the nature of security, or——"

"Oh, I can't be plagued with all those forms. If you can't oblige me, I can easily get the money elsewhere."

"Or a guarantee signed by some one we know," continued Harold.

"You don't always insist on that, do you?" asked Paul sharply.

"Not in the case of old customers whose circumstances are well known to us; but you have not been long in this neighbourhood, so you can't expect to be indulged like an old inhabitant."

Kenyon spoke in a light, pleasant tone; but Shenstone did not seem mollified by his manner. He reddened angrily, as he replied:

"You have not been long in this neighbourhood yourself, if it comes to that, Mr. Kenyon."

"Perfectly true, Mr. Shenstone. And I assure you I meant nothing offensive by my remark. Only, you must see that a customer of forty or fifty years' standing may reasonably expect——"

"Oh, yes, I know!" cried Shenstone impatiently.

"Have you settled about the purchase of your house?" asked Harold.

"Eh? My house? Fir Croft? Yes. I am going to buy it. I want a trifle—two or three hundred would be enough—to make up the purchase-money."

"Then it can easily be arranged by depositing the deeds."

"And I want a little for my wedding tour. You may have heard that I am to be married on the twelfth of next month?"

"N—no. I had not heard. That is, I had not heard it was so near," stammered Kenyon, who had turned very pale.

The other looked at him curiously, and gave a little laugh as he returned: "Yes; I am to be turned off that day, it seems. Shall we see you at the ceremony?"

"I haven't been asked, so I don't suppose you will," said the young man shortly.

"Don't say that. I should be pleased to see you; and I'm sure I can speak for Miss Dale too. But about the money—I may want to overdraw, perhaps two hundred pounds. I suppose if I get any of my friends here to guarantee the amount—Croft, or Blenkinsop, or old Matthew Rogers—that will do, eh?"

"Any one of these names will be perfectly satisfactory," returned Kenyon.

"Very good. I'll go and look one of them up, and send you the guarantee by post. Good-day."

"Good-afternoon."

"Oh, by the way," said Shenstone, turning back when he had reached the door, and closing it behind him. "I suppose you have quite given up your idea of hunting up that fellow Vere?"

"Thou dost demand this sacrifice at my hands?"

Kenyon reddened angrily, and paused for a moment to control himself before he answered.

"Practically I have. I don't know where to look for him."

"But would it not be highly inconvenient for him if you did find him? You could not deliver him up to justice, at least it would be most painful, of course, to do that; and yet you could not wish to become an accessory to the murder by concealing him."

"I don't believe my friend did commit the murder!" cried Kenyon, striking the writing-table with his fist.

Shenstone stared at him for a few seconds without speaking.

Then he went up to Kenyon and held out his hand.

"Forgive me, Kenyon," he said. "I see I have wounded you; I assure you nothing was farther from my intention. It does you honour to cling to the belief in your friend's innocence. I wish I could do the same. I do, indeed."

Kenyon took the offered hand not very willingly.

"And all I ask is this," continued Shenstone, "if I can be of any service in discovering Vere's whereabouts, or in proving his innocence, will you let me know at once?"

"Thanks; I will," said Harold. "But I confess I have little hope of that. Sometimes I fear that the poor fellow has destroyed himself."

"That possibility has been in my mind for some time," said Paul gravely. "But should you hear any news of him

Digitized by Google

you will let me know at once, and allow me to give you any help I can?"

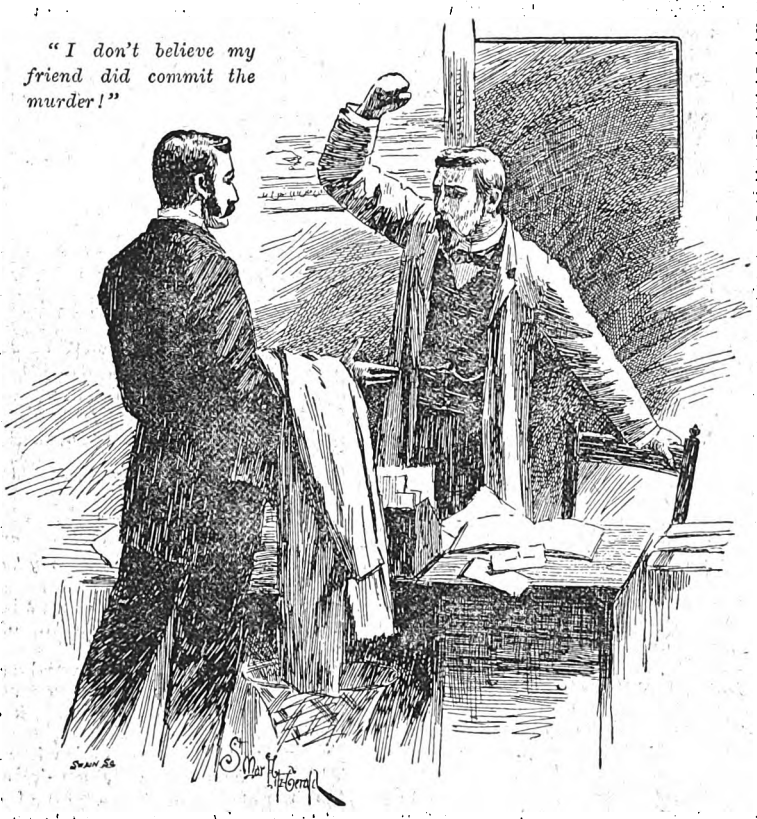
Kenyon promised that he would do so; and the two men parted.

CHAPTER XIII.

A FIRST AND LAST APPEAL.

IT was impossible for Kenyon to do any more work that day. One hateful thought was continually in his mind; despair was at his heart. Kate's wedding day! It was fixed at last. So many suns would rise, so many evenings close, and then Kate would be beyond his reach for ever.

Without his knowing it, those last interviews between her and himself had had the effect of inflaming his love for her. He could not reason down his passion now, as he had done a few weeks before. It cried aloud, and would not be silenced. The idea of Katherine Dale's passing into Paul Shenstone's keeping, to become his, in three short weeks was maddening to him. He wondered how he had been able to keep calm, and disregard Shenstone's tone of mockery, his triumphant smile.



"I don't believe my friend did commit the murder!"

He could not rest, could not stay indoors. Flinging on his hat, he told the cashier that he would not be back that afternoon, and hurried out into the street.

The sky was black, and some heavy drops were falling; but Harold cared nothing for the weather. He walked on, as fast as he could, towards Wythecombe. Perhaps, without intending it, he naturally turned in the direction in which her home lay.

Before he had cleared the town, the roll of thunder fell on his ears. But he scarcely noticed it. His only thought was to walk on, anywhere, faster and yet faster, vainly seeking relief from the torture that was gnawing at his heart.

Suddenly there came a blinding flash, which seemed to strike the earth at his very feet, and with it a crash as if all the artillery in the world had united in one terrific discharge. Instinctively Harold leaped backwards, hardly knowing whether he had been struck or not. Then a deluge of water came down, and he looked round for shelter.

The only house in sight was a ruined cottage that stood by the wayside a quarter of a mile further on; and he remembered that there was no other house nearer than Darnport. So he ran on to the cottage, and reached it just as another thunderclap pealed from the clouds.

The doors and windows were gone, but that mattered little. He sprang inside, and turned immediately to look back on the storm that was raging in the valley.

"Mr. Kenyon!"

The voice he knew so well thrilled through every nerve in his body. He startled violently, and threw a wild glance back into the desolate room, almost as if he expected to see the ghostly apparition of the woman he loved.

Katherine had just risen from a log, on which she had been seated; she stepped forward and held out her hand. Harold took it without speaking.

"I took shelter here a few minutes ago," said the girl in her clear musical tones. "Aren't we fortunate in finding a roof to cover us? Just see how it pours."

Harold continued to look at her, but made no reply.

"That was a grand roar, was it not? And it followed so close upon the flash. That shows that the discharge took place close by, doesn't it?"

She seemed unconscious that her companion was still steadily gazing at her, not rudely, but as if he had not yet recovered from his surprise at meeting her in that deserted cottage. At length his gaze wandered from her face to the scene without, while Kate continued to make commonplace remarks in a light and cheerful tone. Harold began to wonder whether he could have mistaken her sentiments altogether; it never occurred to him that she was talking merely to cover his confusion.

But a one-sided conversation cannot go on for ever.

Katherine paused, wondering at her companion's persistent silence.

The rolling of the thunder, and the noise of rushing water and boisterous wind filled the ear. Then she heard Harold's voice, so low and hoarse that it startled her.

"Miss Dale, I have heard that you are to be married on the twelfth of next month. May I ask you a question? Is it—is it true?"

"Yes, it is true."

Neither looked at the other while the question was put and answered.

"I am sorry to hear it."

Kate gave a slight start. Kenyon's voice was so hard and stern.

"Why?" She regretted the word the moment she uttered it. She ought to have said something very different.

"Why?" echoed Kenyon. "Because I believe it is not for your advantage or your happiness to marry Paul Shenstone. I distrust him. He has a cold, hard nature. He will not, he cannot, make you happy. Oh, Kate, if you value your life's happiness, if you want to escape perpetual misery, do not marry a man whom you do not love. Do take time to think——"

"Stop! Stop! Mr Kenyon. I cannot listen to you! What right have you to say such things to me?"

"What right? The right of one who sees a fellow creature

Digitized by Google

"Mr. Kenyon!"

slipping over a precipice, to warn him of his danger, and if possible pull him back! I know what I have said is most unconventional, highly improper, and all the rest of it. But when I think of the misery of a loveless marriage, the wretched make-believe of affection, the agony of the ever-returning thought that it might all have been so easily avoided—the sense that there is no escape, none while life lasts——"

"Mr. Kenyon, I will not endure this. I cannot bear it. I will run out into the rain."

But the words had hardly left her lips before he stood in the doorway, making escape impossible.

"All I implore of you is to delay a little," he said, "before taking the irrevocable step. Six or twelve months would make it plain whether your heart was——"

"Mr. Kenyon, again I tell you you are taking a most unwarrantable liberty. You are insulting me grossly. You——"

"I? I insult you?"

"You are insulting me, though you may not intend it. I am not acting without thought or deliberation."

"Miss Dale, only say that you love this man, and I will go away and not say another word."

"Again, I say, Mr. Kenyon, you are taking a most unwarrantable liberty. Is it kind or manly of you to keep me imprisoned here and force this conversation upon me?"

"Think Kate——" For the second time he had called her Kate that day, though he had never done so before. Neither of them noticed it.

"Think, you can never break the chain. Think how heavy it may be. Why be in such haste to rivet it round you?"

"I have thought of it. I have thought of it all!" cried Kate, weakly abandoning her former line of defence. "God help me, I cannot do otherwise. I must keep my pledged word."

"Then a betrothal is in your opinion as binding as a marriage?"

"No. An engagement may be broken for many good reasons; but merely changing one's mind is not one of them."

"Why not?"

"Because that would reduce a promise to marry to a sham, a nothing. If there were no faithful and honourable people in the world, no promises would be worth anything at all."

"But your life's happiness?"

"Was happiness, founded on dishonour, ever worth having?" asked Kate; and a melancholy smile stole over her features as she spoke.

"But you will delay a little? You will consult your friends?"

"No," said Kate gently. "My mind is fixed."

"And you would make us both miserable for ever sooner than——"

Kate blushed scarlet. Harold saw his blunder; but it was too late. He felt that he had lost the day.

"Mr Kenyon," said the girl in an authoritative tone, "you must not say one other word to me on this subject. You have said too much already. Think! If you had become engaged to a girl, and if, within a few weeks of the day fixed for the marriage, another man, an acquaintance of your own, should endeavour to persuade your fiancée to break off the match—how would you regard such conduct?"

Harold was silent, his eyes fixed gloomily on the ground.

"Let us forget this conversation," said Kate yet more gently, "and try to bear our burdens patiently. And now—the rain is nearly over—good-bye."

He fell on his knees, and covered his face with his hands, while a big tearless sob shook his breast. When he stretched out his hands to touch her dress as she passed him, they met the empty air.

She had gone. He could not see the look—a look of tender pity, of love, and of deep sadness with which she had bade him farewell. Nor could he guess at the pain that gnawed at her heart. For she was to be sacrificed upon what she believed to be the altar of duty. She was to be the victim.

It is always so. Unless the woman is one of those "Good-bye."

Digitized by Google

rare beings, a heartless coquette, she is the one who suffers.

* * * * *

Kenyon rose from his knees and went slowly back to Darnport. But he did not think it possible for him to remain in the neighbourhood of Wythecombe. Change of some sort he felt that he must have. That evening he made all the necessary preparations; and next day found him in London.

CHAPTER XIV.

Only a Scrap of Paper.

Kenyon went to London without any fixed purpose or intention. He longed to escape from the familiar surroundings of home, where at every turn his wound was chafed by some association or remembrance. He hardly reflected that he was neglecting his duty. When the thought of business did recur to him, it only gave rise to some half formed intention of asking Mr. Bonnington to grant him leave of absence, or, if that was impossible, to accept his resignation.

Yet the time hung heavily on his hands. He would wander about the streets for what seemed a long, long time, and then would pull out his watch, to find that an hour had scarcely flown.

One day he happened to pass an old-fashioned tavern, called the "Cock Pheasant," which he had once been in the habit of frequenting; and, rather because it was past his usual dinner time than from any desire to eat, he went in and sat down.

The hour for luncheon was long past, but the dinner hour (according to London ideas) had not nearly arrived; so that the dining-room was all but empty.

Harold took up a newspaper to pass away the time while his meal was being prepared; but he noticed that one of the waiters, a tall, stout, sandy-haired man, was regarding him from a little distance with a certain amount of interest.

The steak and potatoes were produced in due time, and as the waiter placed them before the solitary guest he said with a smile:

"Beg pardon, sir, but we don't see you as much as we used to do, do we, sir?"

It was pleasant to Harold in his lonely state to find that he was remembered by somebody, even if it were only a waiter; and he, too, smiled as he answered:

"I used to come here pretty often, I think."

"Yes, sir. With a gentl'man as is a hartist."

Harold looked up with a start, and he vividly remembered the days when he and Vere used to come to that very room and order their meal together. It seemed a long time ago.

"I live in the country now, a long way off," he remarked.

Harold got through his dinner, and called for his bill.

"That gentleman, sir, that used to dine here with you so frequent——" said the waiter as he pocketed the money.

"Yes; what about him?" asked Harold sharply. He expected to hear something that he would rather have remained ignorant of.

"He was dining here last week."

"Indeed? What day was it?"

"What day would it be? Tuesday, I should say. Yes, sir, it was Tuesday. But I was going to ask if you could give me the gentleman's address."

"What do you want that for?" cried Harold in surprise.

"It was this way, sir. The gentleman left his overcoat, seeing as he and his friend went away rather hurried, and I thought if I had his address I would take it round to him, as he might have forgot what he had done with it."

"Very true," answered Harold. "If you give me the coat I will leave it at the gentleman's rooms myself."

The waiter pocketed the five shillings Kenyon gave him, and in a few seconds returned with the coat.

The sight of it gave Harold a strange thrill. It reminded him so vividly of the man who had worn it.

Suddenly an idea occurred to him.

"You spoke of the gentleman who owns this coat coming here with a friend," he said. "Was his companion a lady?"

"I'll take my solemn affidavy."

"A lady? No, sir. Certingly not. He was a gentleman, young, and rather stout."

"On Tuesday evening?" asked Harold incredulously.

"On Tuesday evening last, sir. I'll take my solemn affidavy. I remember the day because I went to a meeting in the Agricultural Hall that same evening."

"Odd, surely," thought Harold, "for a man who has eloped with a young woman to come here and dine with a friend of his own sex on the very evening of the elopement!"

"This gentleman you speak of, who was with my friend," said Harold slowly, "I should like very much to know who he could have been."

Digitized by Google

"He's not one of our regular customers," answered the waiter; "I don't rec'lect that I ever seen him 'ere before."

"Short, you said he was, and stout?"

"Exactly, sir."

"Had he a short, thick moustache of light-coloured hair, and small brown eyes?"

"I think he had, sir," said the waiter in a hesitating way. "I should say that was the gen'lman's description; but I would rather see him fust."

"Do you think you would know him again if you saw him?"

"I'm certain I would, sir—certain of it."

This was an important point; for the man whom Kenyon had tried to describe was Arthur Beaumont, the young lawyer who had told Kenyon that Vere had not kept his appointment with him on that Tuesday evening.

But Kenyon thought it better to say no more just then. He was anxious that the waiter should not learn Vere's name, and thus discover that his friend, the owner of the overcoat, and the man who, by the verdict of the Coroner's jury, stood charged with the murder of Jane Unwin, were one and the same man. And he was not sure that he would take any more steps to penetrate the mystery. For aught he knew, Vere's one chance of safety might lie in concealment.

If at any future time he wished to ascertain whether Beaumont had lied to him when he denied that he had seen Vere on that Tuesday evening, he might devise some way of bringing him and the waiter together. He therefore asked the waiter his name, and having ascertained that it was Forbes, he assured him again that he would carry the overcoat to the house of the gentleman it belonged to, and went away.

Carrying the overcoat over his arm, Kenyon resumed his solitary ramble. He went down to the Embankment, crossed Waterloo Bridge, and walked on, vaguely wondering where he should get to if he kept on in that direction for five or six miles. Then he retraced his steps, re-crossed the bridge, and turned towards the Abbey. From Westminster he went to Hyde Park, and so to Kensington, still without the ghost of an object, still utterly careless where he went or what became of him.

At length he felt tired, and accordingly he turned and made for his hotel.

When he reached it the head-porter came forward to relieve him of the overcoat which still hung over his arm. He had forgotten that he was carrying it about with him; and it was too late to take it to Vere's rooms that night. So he told the servant that he would take it to his bedroom, and carried it upstairs.

As he hung the coat up behind the door, it occurred to Kenyon that if he searched the pockets of it he might find some letter, or bill, or other document, which might afford a clue to Vere's intentions on the night of his disappearance, and might lead to his being found. A few days before Harold would have had the pockets turned inside out in five seconds; but now he hesitated, asking himself what possible good it would do to lay bare Vere's secrets, since he had abandoned the search for him.

After a time, however, curiosity prevailed over indifference. Harold approached the coat, and plunged his hand into one of the outside pockets. His fingers touched a bit of flimsy paper. He drew it out—a telegram. Doubtless the telegram which Martin, the railway guard, had told him Jane Unwin had dispatched from Exeter, the telegram bidding the infatuated man meet her at Paddington, on that fatal Tuesday evening.

Half mechanically his eyes ran along the pencilled lines.

His hands shook.

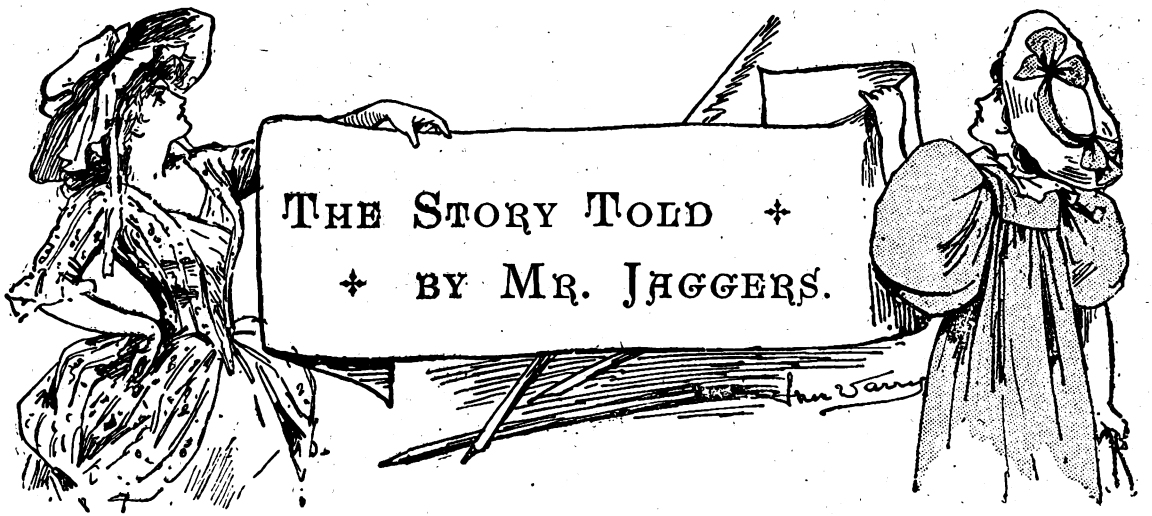
But when he reached the last word, he gave a hoarse shout, his eyes stared at the paper as if they were spell-bound; and his hands shook, so that the paper crackled.

This is what he read—

Must come up to London to-day. Am now en route. Meet me Paddington six-thirty.—Winifred.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google



Yes, my name's Jaggers—Signor Jager, the play-bills have it; and I'm the man that did it. And if you are particular about wanting to know the long and short of it, I'm hardened enough not to mind telling you, though I've never told the story straight out before, and, it is likely, never shall again.

"Terrible fatality!" the papers called it, and "shocking accident!" and all that. And so it was; and it was something more to me. A man does not find his life any lighter to bear when he has a stain of blood on his hands, and it's the blood, too, of the woman he——

But never mind that—that's over, like the rest of it.

She came to us in the early spring, nearly two years ago. I remember the time of the year well enough, and the night, too—a delicious, sweet-smelling, soft-blowing sort of a night, after a pretty heavy shower.

We had just come from a little town about twelve miles behind, and were going to give our first entertainment in the new place the next day. We had the tents ready, and the company had scattered themselves, as they always did when they had the time for a bit of a lark, for they were most of them young people, and given to that sort of thing. Fact is, I was the oldest performer among them, and I may as well own up that I wasn't a favourite, having the character of being a close, surly, sharp-tongued fellow, who didn't care to be sociable. And I dare say it was all true enough, it's a way of mine to like to be left alone, and people generally find it out.

So I was left alone that night, and was standing at the door of the big tent, looking up at the sky, and working out some notions of my own about the stars, when Leroy—that's the owner, you know—came up behind me, and touched me on the shoulder.

"Come in here, Jaggers," he says.

I turned half round, and saw he was smiling, as if something queer had happened.

"What's up?" I asked.

"Come into the back and see," said he. "I've got as fanciful a little fish there as ever you saw, and I want your opinion on her."

"Her?" said I.

"Yes," he answered. "A girl, as I'm a sinner!"

I did not care about girls, and I did not care about going, but I went, because it was easier to go than to refuse.

There was a kind of room at the back, curtained off from the rest of the tent. It was the owner's room—in fact, where all the business was done, and it was there Leroy led me.

"Come in," he said, lifting the curtain, "and prepare yourself for a sensation."

Now, I'm not a nervous fellow, or a susceptible one, and I was even cooler than usual that night, as I passed under the curtain; but I'll confess that when it fell behind me, and I saw her standing in the dim light, I gave a bit of a start.

She was not more than sixteen or seventeen, and she was dressed like any other little country lass just out of the hayfield or a dairy—short, coarse, blue petticoat, and print jacket, clumsy little shoes, and red handkerchief tied under her chin and over her curly hair—and yet I swear she was enough to make any man start at first sight of her.

If it was to come to comparing, I don't know anything I could compare her to but a rosebud, or perhaps a red-tipped daisy, just opened fresh to the morning sun and dew; she was so rosy, and dimpled, and pretty, and childish. That was it, you see; she was more a child than a woman, a lovely, pouting child, half frightened and half daring, and trying to look defiant from under her long, dark eyelashes, even while the hand holding her little bundle was trembling, as I saw.

"This is my friend, the illustrious Signor Jager, my dear," said Leroy in his joking way. "The gentleman you saw at Rossthorne, the only performer of the famous knife-trick in the world. Will you tell him why you came here?"

She gave me a shy little wilful look, and blushed and pouted more than ever, dropping her eyes the next minute, and working the toe of her stout little shoe into the sawdust.

"I ran away," she said at last.

"What for?" I asked, roughly enough. I had seen runaways before, and I knew faces like hers were better at home.

"I seen the show at Rossthorne," she answered, "and I want to be a lady, like them as acts, and rides the horses. I'm tired of farm work, and I won't stay at home no longer, and my aunt Jane needn't think I will. So I run away and came here, to see if I couldn't learn to be a actor."

Digitized by Google

I turned, and I looked at Leroy, and he looked at me, hiding his laugh as well as he could.

"Well?" says he.

"It isn't well," I says. "She had better take her bundle and go back."

She heard me, and turned on me all in a pet, her soft, round, baby face reddening and quivering, big angry tears springing to her eyes.

"I won't go back!" she cried. "I won't go back—never—to be laughed at, and made game of. I'm going to be a lady. If you won't take me, someone else will. They've said many a time that—that my face was my fortune."

There was a childish triumph and certainty, even in the hesitant drop of her voice. Any simpleton could have seen that, little fool as she was, she knew her power as well as many a wiser and worldlier woman.

Leroy shrugged his shoulders, and spoke to me in an undertone.

"Shall I take her or not?" he asked.

"I won't have anything to do with it," I said.

"It is just such a face as we want," said he. "Her clodhopper friends were not far wrong in saying it was her fortune. People will come just to have a glimpse at her."

Then he spoke to her.

"What is your name?"

"Susy," she answered. "I won't tell the other one. You can call me anything you like. I don't want my real name on the bills if I stay; and it isn't a pretty one either."

"Susy?" said Leroy. "Well, Susy is a nice little name enough; but it won't do for a play-bill. Suppose we call you Mademoiselle Suzette."

Her eyes sparkled, and she laughed, like a child pleased with a new toy.

"Then you will take me?" she cried eagerly.

"Yes," said he. "I'll take you, and we will see if we can't do something grand for you, though you have to learn a good many things first. I'll take you, Mademoiselle Suzette, because your friends were in the right."

So it was agreed that she should stay. And, when he was at leisure, Leroy took her to the women's lodgings, and handed her over to the oldest of them, a good-natured creature, who had charge of the wardrobe, and sometimes took parts that did not need good looks.

Julia Mouncey her name was, and a nice laugh Julia Mouncey had the next day, when she told us how Mademoiselle Suzette had conducted herself in her new rôle. We were not a grand company, and if there were any jokes, they were sure to be passed from one to the other freely enough.

"Bless you!" said the jolly soul, "it was as good as a comedy to hear her talk, and see her stand there with her eyes shining like a six-year-old's, just going with wild joy over the old things I showed her—tinselly rags, that wouldn't knock down for sixpence at auction. But I think the girls rather upset her when they came in, all in their common clothes. She thought they wore gauze and tights from morning till night, and she asked me afterwards how it was that they didn't look red and white, and handsome, as they did when they were acting."

If they had not been a good-natured lot altogether, there would have been envy among them; but, as it was, they took to the girl as a good joke, and even made a sort of pet of her. She was not quick at learning things, and gave plenty of trouble. But first one would give her a lesson, and then another, until she knew enough to go on and be looked at, if nothing else.

She was almost crazy with excitement the first night this happened, and the mixture of fright and ecstasy made her so pretty, that she was a sight to see!

Leroy had built so much on her beauty, that he even commissioned Julia Mouncey to buy a couple of new costumes for her; and when she went in the first—a page's dress, that she had to dance a simple little dance in—you may believe it or not, but the whole house burst out into a roar of applause at the sight of her, even before she could make her bow and begin.

It was her childish look that did it, as well as her loveliness. She had no stage air and grace, and could only stand behind the footlights, trembling with joy and fear; her immense liquid eyes dilated, and her cheeks, blooming with colour, not knowing whether to run away, or stay where she was.

Leroy stood at the side, in quite a fever of delight.

"Let her keep that baby look," he said, "and her fortune's made. How the public like a pretty little fool!"

The audience called her back again and again, but Leroy knew better than to let her go more than twice, though she was eager enough, and would have gone half-a-dozen times after the first, if she had been allowed.

When I came up, to be ready for my turn, she was standing at the left wing, panting like a bird in her triumph.

She had pulled off her little purple velvet, pearl-banded cap, and held it into her hand, and her hair lay in soft, moist, golden rings on her forehead. She looked as fresh as a baby just out of the cradle, and she gave me one of her shy looks, from under her eyelashes, and laughed and pouted.

"They liked me, you see," she said, "though you did say I'd better go back with my bundle."

"I didn't say they wouldn't like you," I answered.

She tossed her little head, and looked down at her cap.

"Then why did you say I had better go home?"

"Because I meant it," I said, and pushed by her without further parley.

I was a born fool. I knew it then, and I knew it all along, from first to last. There was not one thing about her that ought to have held a man's fancy for a minute. She was a vain, empty-headed little animal, and nothing more. She was ignorant for lack of opportunity; she was selfish, and had no more heart than a kitten. She cared for no human being but herself, and asked for nothing better than plenty of food, and idleness and fine clothes, and admiration; and yet I fell into her net in spite of every better feeling that held me back.

If I had not given way myself, and, standing coolly aloof, had seen another man drift into such a mad fancy, how I should have jeered at him. And for that matter I jeered at myself, and struggled hard enough; but it was no use.

Perhaps, however, I was a bit wrong in saying she had no other attraction than her baby bloom, and her big, dark eyes. There was something else about her, though it would be hard to describe what it was. It was a way she had, which took with women as well as with men, and made them wait on her, and treat her like a child; a sort of simple, helpless, careless fashion of seeming to expect petting and sacrifice from everybody.

She never did anything for herself, or gave thought for the future. So long as to-day brought comfort and sunshine, she never troubled herself about to-morrow. She would curl up in a warm corner, and watch Julia Mouncey sew for her until midnight, and then would turn in and fall asleep with a smile on her lips, never seeming to have a doubt that her costumes would be ready for her, though her own little bungling fingers had not been trusted with the work for a minute.

Digitized by Google

"I'm glad I ran away," she would say. "I wish I'd done it sooner. I'm happy here. But I hate my Aunt Jane!"

"Though her Aunt Jane," said Julia Mouncey, afterwards, a trifle out of patience, "has been a mother to her, as I have found out from what her own lips have told me."

And yet it was this very pretty, selfish helplessness that fascinated us. A different face would have made it a different thing, but that face of hers made fools of one and all. Her very vanity helped her, too, since it caused her to be eager for admiration, and anxious to please people where it might be done without self-sacrifice. What was it but vanity that made her make advances in her pouting, whimsical way, even to me? Being the madman I was, how could I help watching her in secret at all times, and, standing at the wings when she went on to sing her little idle songs, and dance her simple dances, which were mere nothings, and yet always brought down the house, as if they had been something wonderful?

I had been watching her so one night, when the public were more than usually wild over her, and, as she came running off, she saw me, and stopped suddenly, hanging her curly head, and pouting out her red lips petulantly.

"What do you look at me for?" she demanded. "You don't like me. Why should you stand there always—when you hate me so?"

I set my back against the wings, and folded my arms grimly.

"Do I hate you?" I answered.

"Yes, you do," she said.

"Then all the better for me," said I.

Most girls would have been rebuffed, but it was not her way to feel things deeply. She opened her eyes full upon me in an innocent, surprised fashion, but without a hint of real anger in her expression.

"I haven't ever done nothing to vex you," she said.

"No," answered I.

"Other people like me," with a fresh pout.

"I dare say," said I.

It was only her vanity that was stung, but, as I have said, her vanity was all that ever was touched by anything. To see even an ugly fellow like me, cold and unresponsive, was enough to upset her a bit. The dimples about her mouth began to work, and her eyes grew big and moist all at once. She dropped her little cap, and stopped to pick it up, and when she raised her head there were pettish tears on her lashes.

"I don't care," she said. "Everyone else——" And there she broke off, and tried to run past me.

It sounds like a poor business enough when it is told; but I swear to you, I lost all power over myself. Before I knew what I was doing I had caught her by the arm, and was holding her fast.

"Let me go!" she cried. "I—I hate you!"

"It was me that hated you a minute ago," I said, almost savagely. "Look at me, and see if I hate you."

I made her turn round in spite of her efforts, and I think my look frightened her, for the next instant she hid her face in her little hands.

"Do I hate you?" said I.

"I—don't know," she panted. "No—no—you don't. I want to go. They are calling me."

"May I stand here and watch you every night?" I asked, and yet not gently, either. I was wild with myself, even while I said the words.

Then she drew her hands away, and gave me a look—half triumph, half terror.

"Yes," she whispered, "if you like."

"I do like," I said, "or I shouldn't do it." And then I let her go.

Only the next morning Leroy came to me with a piece of news.

"The Wallers are going to-morrow," he said. "And we shall be in a nice fix if we can't get someone to take Lotta's place. We can do without the other one well enough, but it is very awkward to lose Lotta."

He was right there. The public liked the knife-trick principally, I used to think, because it was such a dangerous bit of business, and made them hold their breath until it was over, and I made my bow to them. And it was a dangerous business, too; as dangerous as it looked, which is saying a good deal.

This was how it was done, though I dare say you have heard of it, if you haven't seen it.

The girl Lotta, dressed in a boy's fancy costume, stood against a kind of screen, at which I threw a number of large, sharp knives, all escaping her by a hair's-breadth, until she was literally pinned, or penned in with them. They pierced the screen above her outstretched arms, and under them, down her sides, and round her hands; and often as I had practised, and old as the trick was to me, I can tell you I never did it without an uncomfortable feeling, and a wish that it was over.

But, as I have said, the public liked it, and it was so rare, that we could not dispense with it, and it was true enough that we should be in a tight place if we could not find someone willing to run the risk, and cool enough to do it safely.

"There's no one who can do it," I said.

Leroy laughed a dubious, uncomfortable sort of laugh.

"Well," said he. "It seems not; but I have an idea, if we can manage her—and there's nothing more sure than that—she would take wonderfully."

"Who?" I asked sharply.

He laughed again and twisted his moustache.

"Mademoiselle Suzette," he answered. "You know what a sensation she always makes; and she isn't nervous. She's a cold-blooded little animal, though one would scarcely fancy so to look at her. And she would do anything for a new costume, and I've promised her the prettiest dress she likes to choose for herself."

"What?" cried I. "Have you spoken to her about it?"

"Yes," said he, shrugging his shoulders, "and though she was more than half-frightened at first, I am not sure but the idea of a new triumph pleased her. The costume was the bait, however. She would sell her soul for a spangled petticoat, and would scarcely lose by the bargain."

"Leave her alone," I said. "Her soul is none of our business."

There was a moment's pause, in which he looked at me as if he was waiting to hear what else I was going to say. Men understand each other well enough as a rule, and he understood me.

"I won't do it," I said at last.

Digitized by Google

"You won't?"

"No," said I.

"Very well," said he, and walked away whistling.

He was sharp enough to know better than lose his temper, and argue the point. If he had done that, the end would only have been a row, and defeat for him; and, as I say, he knew better than to run any risk.

He managed the matter another way. He went and talked to Susy, and the consequence was that when next I saw her she was in a pet, and would scarcely look at me.

"What's the matter?" said I.

"Nothing," she answered, and looked crosser than ever.

In a minute, however, she took a new turn, as I knew she would.

"No one ever said they wouldn't act with me before," she broke out, tossing her head. "There's plenty as likes me well enough to wish they could."

"Who told you I wouldn't act with you?"

"Mr. Leroy." And then all at once she raised her eyes to mine.

"Why wouldn't you?" she asked.

"Because," said I, faltering like a fool, "because I wouldn't trust myself."

"I'd trust you," she said. "I'll trust myself with you—with you."

She had no more sentiment about the matter than Mouncey herself, but she blushed, a sudden lovely blush, and then tried to laugh it off in her foolish, pretty fashion.

"I wouldn't trust everybody," she added; "but I know you wouldn't trust me."

I had never known just how weak I was until then, when I found myself giving way to her, knowing it was madness.

"Do you want to take the place?" I asked her.

We were standing at the door of the tent, and she looked out at the blue sky far away, as if she saw Heaven, and nothing nearer.

"Leroy says I shall wear pink satin and black velvet and gold," she said. "And I do so like pink satin, when it's shaded with black velvet."

She made me feel rough and half-savage.

"Do you like it well enough to risk your life for it?" I said.

She gave me the usual pout, and a laugh like a bird's trill.

"You wouldn't hurt me," she answered. "Nobody would; but you less than anybody."

And that bit of daring, triumphant folly was harder on me than all the rest.

So, to make the story short, Leroy got his way, and I practised in secret for hours. I did not want everyone to know what an idiot I was, so I kept quiet, only telling Leroy that I would not try the trick in public until I had got used to the idea of doing it with a strange face before me.

It was even harder than I thought when it came to the point, and I had to practise with the child herself, shuddering at first at the whiz of the knives, and yet trying to laugh.

"Shut your eyes," I used to order her; "and keep them shut. I don't want to see them."

But, of course, we both got pretty well used to it in time. One thing is certain, she was the bolder of the two always, and at last could laugh and look her loveliest, from beginning to end of the business, and did not seem to care how long it lasted, if people only applauded; and many a little tiff we had, because I was so determined never to let any amount of clapping and calling make me go through it twice in a night.

I suppose I ought to know what I looked forward to in those days, but I must say I don't; I was oftener miserable than not, and always restless and ill at ease. She did not care for me, I know, nor for anybody else but herself for the matter of that, though she had more admirers than she could have counted on her fingers in half a day.

"I don't want to be married," she used to say to Mouncey. "I wouldn't be married," with a little shudder, "for anything in the world. I want to live this way always. Jennie Wyce, in Rossthorne, got married, and she used to have to nurse horrid little babies, and sew, and work. And she was pretty, too, once. I would rather die than live as she did. No one cared for her."

"Pooh!" said Mouncey, who was fond of joking her. "You must marry a lord."

"A lord!" she said eagerly, opening her eyes to their widest, as Mouncey told me afterwards. "Do lords ever marry girls like me?"

"I should think so," said Mouncey. "Read the penny novelettes, and see if they don't. They never marry anyone else. They like actresses the best, and flower-girls and milliners. I have read of one who took a little crossing-sweeper, broom and all, in preference to a beautiful young duchess with golden hair and a haughty way and a million a year, not to speak of the family diamonds."

"And," says the woman to me, when she told the joke, "she believed it, and coloured up her loveliest, and lay on the sofa thinking about it, with her eyes all in a shine. You mark my words, the innocent little fool will be on the look-out for a lord from this day forward."

There might have been a fate in it. It was not three days before Leroy came to me laughing.

"We are going up in the world, by Jove!" he said. "Ford tells me we had a live marquis among the audience last night, and he came to see Mademoiselle Suzette. Did you see that pale, handsome, long-legged fellow in the front row? That was he."

"He had better have stayed at home," I said savagely.

"I dare say," said Leroy, "for his own sake, as well as for Mademoiselle Suzette's. For my part, I should not care to be troubled with her, charming as she is."

That night, when I went to look at the audience, I found Mademoiselle Suzette peeping through a hole in the curtain, and when she heard me, she turned round, blushing like a frightened child.

"I was looking for the lord," she stammered. "I never saw a lord, and they say there is one in the audience. Do you know which one he is?"

"He's in the second row to-night," I answered, half sneering. "The third man—a swell, with lilies of the valley in his buttonhole. How do you like his looks? Different from the rest of us, isn't he?"

"Oh, yes!" she burst out, at her first glimpse of him. "He's handsome, and nice, and his clothes are so beautiful!"

"I wonder if he will like my singing," she said tremulously to me as she passed me. "I'm frightened." It was not her singing he had come to hear.

His cool, indifferent face brightened as soon as he caught sight of her, and he leant forward, not missing a gesture or expression, as she did her part. Sometimes he smiled a little, but oftener he simply watched her, as he might have watched a beautiful bird, and at the end of her song he detached the lilies of the valley from his coat and threw them lightly and deftly towards her, so that they fell at her feet.

Digitized by Google

She had never received such a tribute before. Ours were not swell performances, and the people who usually attended them thought more of getting their money's-worth than of paying compliments to actors. She came off with the flowers fastened in her bodice, and she was in a state of such ecstatic excitement that she ran by me without seeing me at all.

Well, the next night he was there again, and the next, and the next, and always, after the first time, he brought a bouquet with him, and threw it to her, and so it went on for a week. At the end of that time Mouncey came to me in a fret:

"It's time for you or Leroy to do something," she said.

"There's nothing to be done," I answered.

I hadn't been looking on without seeing things, but what right had I to interfere; I was wretched enough to be more than half mad.

"There was a ring in her bouquet last night," she went on, "and this morning she went out to meet him. Bessie Jones has written three notes for her already. I have found that out."

"Well," said I savagely, "stop it if you can."

"Don't be a fool," she replied. "It's not women who can stop women—women like her, at least. If Leroy can threaten her enough to frighten her, or if you give her a lecture—she is half afraid of you—she may be held in check until we go away from here; and then, if he does not follow her, she is safe enough. She would forget the Angel Gabriel a week after she lost sight of him."

"Leave her alone," I broke out. "You women have a spite against each other." But I knew I was giving way to wild folly, even as I spoke.

She only laughed, in a comfortable scorn of the implied accusation.

"What?" said she. "Am I young enough to be jealous? A woman whose pink and white days are as far behind as mine are, ought to have got over envy. Bless you, man, I'm nigh on to fifty, and as tough as you. Keep your temper, and don't be simple."

That night, after the great knife-trick, when the bouquet flew towards mademoiselle, a note fell out of it, and I picked it up and put it in my pocket. She coloured up furiously, but dared not speak until we left the stage, and then she turned on me, ruffled like an angry bird.

"Give me my letter!" she demanded.

I took it from my pocket, but held it fast.

"A nice fellow—my lord!" I said, trying to speak without raging. "A charming fellow!"

She stamped her little pink foot on the boards.

"Give me my letter!" she cried. "Quick, quick!"

"Why quick?" said I. "Is he waiting to know if you will come?"

She reddened to the very roots of her curly hair, in her pretty fury of impatience, and she struck her hands together.

"Give it me!" she said. "I will tell him. It is no business of yours. I hate you!"

And that was the truth, too. She would have hated the best friend she had if they had crossed her in the merest trifle of a whim. That was her way. And yet, while I knew this, I could not help feeling a horrible pang when she spoke the words. They seemed to drive me wild, after a manner.

"Do you know where you are going to?" I asked her.

"Do you think I shall tell you?" she answered.

"I don't mean that," I returned. "I mean, do you know that you are going to utter destruction—to wretchedness and despair?"

I might as well have talked to the wind. There was not a warning on earth that could have touched her ever so slightly. She broke into a shower of tears, but it was only because she was afraid of being kept from her lover, and because my interference irritated her.

"I want my letter!" she sobbed pettishly. "He—he will be gone!"

What seized hold of me I cannot tell. I seemed to burst into a rage of feeling, notwithstanding my better sense. I flung the note upon the floor, and staggered back against the rough wall, hiding my face in my hands. I must have been holding on to some hope before, without knowing it.

"Oh, Heaven!" I cried. "Why is it that you are not a good woman?"

I had not been in the habit of thinking about women, but just at that moment I seemed to be knocked down, all at once, with a sense of what my gloomy life might have been made, if she had had a pure, loving heart, and I might have won it. But she answered me like a spoiled child.

"I don't want to be what you call a good woman. I hate good women!" and stooping down she picked up her note, and was off like a flash.

Leroy was wiser than I was, however. We had been doing well enough, and making money since our arrival in the town; but in half-an-hour after this he came to me.

"We must leave here to-night."

"What?" I answered.

He produced his pocket-knife, and began to trim his nails composedly.

"I cannot afford to lose Mdlle. Suzette," he explained, in his coolest style. "And I don't intend to if it can be managed. I mean to checkmate my lord."

I understood clearly enough then, of course; but I made no comment.

"It is the only way," he went on. "I know the foolish girl. That business of the ring looks badly for us, and he has money enough to give her as much trumpery as she can stand up under. And he will do it. He is one of your indifferent, lavish kind."

It seemed nothing but natural that there should be some trouble with the girl when she was told the news. When she came in that night, she found Mouncey putting the last few things in the trunks, and, on hearing her explanation, the woman said she turned pale, and began to cry in an excited kind of way.

"I don't want to go," she said. "It's so sudden. What is it all for?"

"Business reasons of Leroy's," answered Mouncey. "What ails you?"

"Nothing; only—only I don't like to be worried so. Where are we going?"

"I don't know."

"I wasn't going to tell her," she added afterwards. "She was sharp enough, silly as she is, to slip out to him again, or, at least, to send him word."

She fretted and pouted all that night, and showed ill-humour through the whole of the journey, which Leroy had taken care should be a longer one than usual. Mouncey had a comfortless enough time with her; and when we reached our stopping-place, it was two days before she would take her usual place in the performance again.

Digitized by Google

"Says her head aches," said Mouncey. "And I dare say it does after all that temper."

"Pooh!" commented Leroy tolerantly. "Leave her alone. She will be eager enough to show herself in a day or so."

And so she was. Petulant as her humour was, she found it dull work playing the invalid, and the accounts the rest brought her of the enthusiasm of the audience stirred her vain little soul within her. On the fourth day her headache disappeared, and she was ready to appear.

"She's safe enough now," said Mouncey, in a week's time. "Safe until the next one comes on the boards. She has let my lord drift into the background, and is full of nothing but the blue satin and silver Leroy has half promised her for the knife-trick."

She even became as friendly as ever with me, and acted quite as if she had forgotten her anger. The fact was that the people admired her so much that she had quite enough to make her happy. And it was no wonder that they admired her, for she grew prettier every day; prettier in the rose on her cheeks, and the gold of her hair, and the softness of her dark, dewy eyes. There wasn't a man or woman living who could have looked at her for the first without being fairly startled by the sight of so much beauty.

But I may as well cut my story as short as possible.

Leroy gave her the new suit, and Mouncey made it for her—a page's costume of blue satin, slashed with silver, and ornamented with pearl tassels and fringe, dangling and swaying as she moved.

She came out of the dressing-room the first night she wore it, just before we were to do the knife-trick, ready to go on in all her bravery. Mouncey had dressed her, and I'll own it upset me a bit, right at the beginning, just to look at her—all gloss of satin, and glow of colour, her little head running over with short, soft, baby curls; a half-shy, half-triumphant pout on her lips, her eyes full of delight.

She saw me stand watching her, and she came and stopped before me.

"Is it as pretty as the pink?" she asked.

"Yes," I said.

"Is it—is it prettier?"

"Yes."

She laughed; a breath of a laugh, as if she was so pleased with herself that she could not help it, and then she stood pluming herself like a bird, turning her head over her shoulders, this way and that, and touching up her pearl fringes, and the white feather in her cap, and the studded belt at her tiny, lissom waist.

"I wish it was time for us to go on," she said. "I don't like to wait."

And those were the last words I ever heard her speak.

They called us almost the next instant, and on we went.

The very moment the audience caught sight of her, they broke loose. They clapped and shouted and stamped, they even waved their hats and rose in their seats, and for several minutes there seemed nothing but to let her stand there bowing and dimpling, their eyes feasting on her.

But, of course, it stopped at last, and we took our places, she in her usual position against the screen, and I myself at the other end of the stage. It isn't easy to tell, you may be sure—that's what shortens my breath, and makes me break down here and there.

I threw straight enough for a while, straight enough and cool enough. My hand was as steady as it had ever been, until near the end.

It was the last knife I was going to throw—the very last—and she moved! I swear she moved!

She turned her eyes towards something in the audience, not far from us—someone who had just come in, and somehow she drew my eyes with her, and I saw too. I saw him—her lover himself—sitting a few feet beyond the stage, watching us; watching her as he had always done, with a light, cool smile upon his fair face.

It was the last knife, and I held it balanced in my hand; and I threw it, and it struck!

And there was a strange, sharp cry, and her little hands were tossed up wildly in the air, and she fell!

Good heavens! do you think any man could ever picture the least thrill of the madness that fell upon me?

There was a roar of voices, and a rush, and a kind of horrible shriek among the people; and some mounted their seats and denounced me in their first tempest of excitement; and some climbed the stage, and those who were behind ran on, and the women wrung their hands and sobbed in hysterical fright, and the men crowded round; and the first among all was her lover, who came near but did not speak, only stood by, with a white face, trying to hold still the shaking hand which held a crushed bouquet of lilies of the valley.

I had caught her almost as she fell, and I held her crushed against my breast, almost as he held the flowers, but my hand was red with the little stream which trickled from the triangular mark upon the side of her white temple.

The medical man who was brought in only bent over her a moment, and then stood upright.

"Dead!" he said. "Penetrated the brain. Stand back, you men, and let them carry her away!"

And they took her away from me, and left me empty-handed and panting. And all the crowd fell away and stared at me as if I had been a strange wild animal loose among them.

I don't know what I thought of, or if I thought at all, I don't remember. I know I turned from right to left, and shook as if an ague had seized me, and then my eye caught a glimpse of one man again, and my blood seemed to rush and boil in my veins.

"You fiend!" I shouted. "You fiend—it was you—it was you—it was you!" And I sprang at his throat and clutched him, and so seemed to fall into black darkness.

That is how it was, and that is all. She was dead, and I had killed her. "Accidental death!" the jury brought it in, with a censure upon the dangerous nature of my performance. And there were plenty who were sorry for me, and who were kind to me during my illness. It was worse for me than for her, some said. A pretty, innocent creature like that, they always added, "so pretty, and innocent, and young!" But, as I say to my self often, there is only one thing for me to remember, and I am not the man to forget it. She is dead, and the hand which struck her deathblow was mine—MINE!

Reginald Baird.

Digitized by Google

RESULT OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

No. 4.

Although a large number of competitors entered for this competition, no one succeeded in solving all the problems. Mr. W. B. Early, 12, Willow Walk, Sydenham, solved 9¾, and Miss Elsie Daw, 6, Edith Road, St. Catherine's Park, S.E., solved 8½, to each of whom a guinea has been sent. Pencil-cases have been forwarded to the competitors whose names and addresses appear below, all of whom have solved over six problems out of the ten:

A. Trivess, 4, Graham Road, Southsea, Hants.
J. Moir, Blackhall, Pitmuxton, Aberdeen.
J. Trail Hill, 3, Merchant Street, Peterhead.
J. M. Ruddock, 2, Holt Hill Terrace, Birkenhead.
Mrs. M. E. Mennie, 99, Queen Street, Peterhead.
W. Almond, Mauldeth, Heaton Mersey, Manchester.
J. Read, 1, Florence Villas, Cavendish Road, Merton.
J. Gillispie, 105, St. Michael Street, Dumfries.
Mrs. A. Sellurs, 69, Clinton Road, Mile End Road.
B. H. Monnickendam, 175, Gloucester Road, Regent's Park.
C. B. Keston, 11, Queen's Road, Bayswater.
B. Crane, 183, Hollydale Road, Nunhead.
Miss M. Bennett, Steyne School, Worthing, Sussex.
W. Deeble, 25, Arwenach Street, Falmouth.
Miss E. Champs, 16, Prospect Hill, Walthamstow.
F. Bessant, 15, Eaton Place, Falmouth.
Miss M. Crockwell, The Convent, Adelphi House, Salford.
G. Russell, 68, Strahan Road, Bow.
A. James, Gorringe Park, Mitcham, Surrey.
W. C. Eyton, 80, Broad Street, Hanley, Staffs.
Mrs. Morrison, 31, Alexandra Road, Wimbledon.
W. S. Cool, 28, Thirsk Road, Lavender Hill.
T. H. Tripney, 50, Coniger Road, Fulham.
Miss B. Wood, Bower Lodge, Pyrland Road, Richmond.
W. Buchan, 9, Romford, Road, Stratford.
G. D. Taylor, 28, Ernest Street, Rhyl, North Wales.
W. Dawson, 23, Hewitt Street, Highton, Manchester.
J. H. Kidd, Mauldeth, Heaton Mersey, near Manchester.
Miss May, Curraghmore, Shanklin, Isle of Wight.
A. Whitworth, Manston, Mason's Avenue, Croydon.

KEY OF NO. 4 COMPETITION.

Key No. 31.

Mushroom.

Key No. 32.

Cone, ceil, cab, cable, one, once, co, cob, coca, coil, cove, coal, conceive, con, cole, coble, conceal, coeval, ob, on, ova, oval, oil, oca, nib, Nile, nil, neb, nab, eve, vale, able, ale, be, Eva, ab.

Key No. 33.

(a)
G OIN G.
A COR N.
B ABB I.
G BOW L.

(b)
G RAMPU S.
R ONDEA U.
A GITAT O.
M ACARON I.
I NAUGURA L.
N UNCI O.
I NTERLEA F.

Key No. 34.

1. Grim—y.
2. Thin—e.
3. O—s.
4. Olive—t.

Key No. 35.

£1 19s. 4$\frac{11}{11}$d.

Key No. 36.

MELODY.

Key No. 37.

a=b. e=f. i=j. o=p. u=v.

There is considerably less trouble in arranging a cypher sentence than there is in finding a solution to it.

Key No. 38.

Pearson's Weekly Cricket Club.
Dr. Jameson's Raid.
Home Notes, the ladies' favourite.

Key No. 39.

And he left with this one letter in his leather pouch, walking more quickly, for he had already been delayed too long, and the letter ought to be forwarded on by the first courier if it was to reach its destination early the next day.

Key No. 40.

Fjndjng. Value 147.

KEY OF NO. 3 COMPETITION.

RESULT PUBLISHED LAST WEEK.

Key No. 21.—$\frac{11}{11}$ths.

Key No. 22.

(1) 102 illustrations (2) 38 photographs.

Key No. 23.

"Heroes eventually find an opportunity for displaying their heroism."

Key No. 24.

G R A N T.
R A C E R.
A C A R A.
N E R V Y.
T R A Y S.

Key No. 25.

(a) 320. (b) £1 6s. 8d.

Key No. 26.

Gas.
Yet.
Mid.
Not.
Auf.
Son.
Ton.
Ion.
Cod.
Sod.

Key No. 27.

Mag—net—o—meter. Magnetometer.

Key No. 28.

(1) "Wisdom Let Loose." (2) "The Fresh Air Fund." (3) "The Liar."

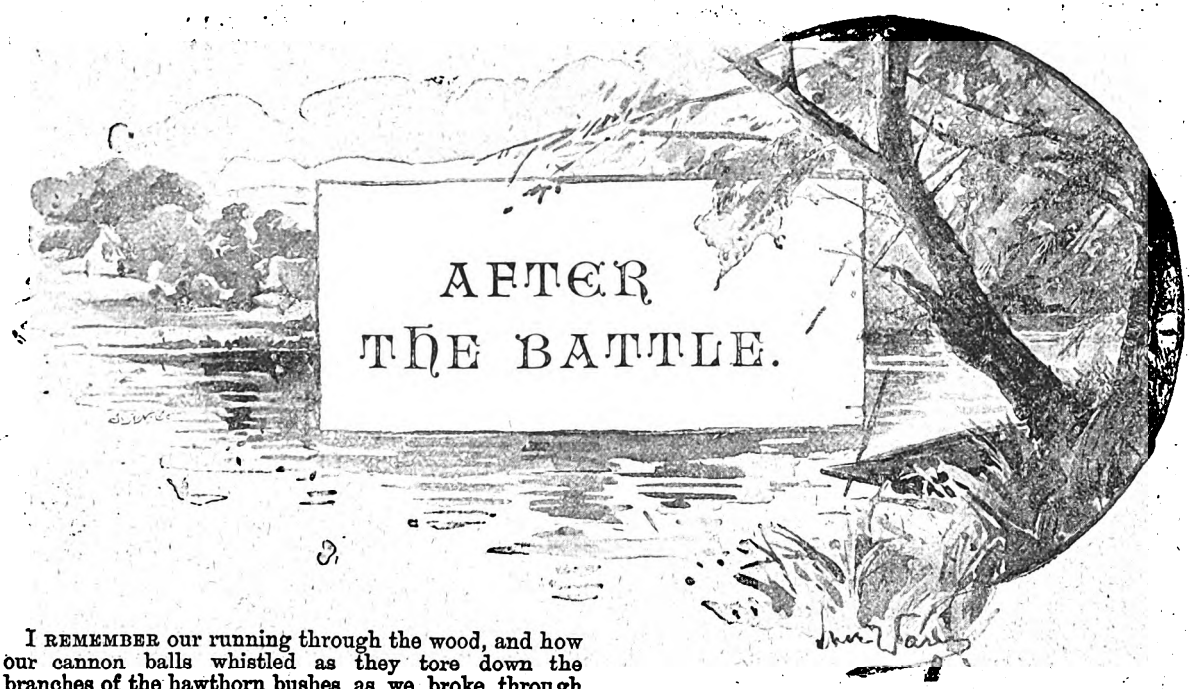
Key No. 29.

The, he, 36 times.	What, hat, 2 times.	Chatter, hatter.
Brain, rain, 2 times.	That, hat.	Gas, as.
Will, ill, 6 times.	Many, man.	Hat, at.
Those, hose, 2 times.	There, here.	Fred, red.
One, on, 3 times.	Placed, laced.	Away, way.
Number, umber, 5 times.	Dashes, ashes.	Tail, ail.
Awarded, warded.	Whole, hole, 3 times.	First, firs.
Write, rite.	This, his, 2 times.	Turn, urn.
Simply, imply.	Her, he, 2 times.	With, wit.
Page, age, 3 times.	Their, heir, 2 times.	Done, one.
Cover, over.	Stories, tories, 2 times.	Ever, eve.
For, or, 3 times.	Year, ear, 2 times.	Marks, arks.
Mark, mar.	Measurer, measure.	Any, an.
Tour, our.	Changed, hanged.	Lumber, umber.
Glass, lass.	Form, for.	Son, so.
When, hen, 4 times.	Male, ale.	And, an, 3 times.

Key No. 30.

"Let us have done with such expeditions for ever, and turn our attention to urging upon our undesirable neighbours the advantages of emigration to the most unhealthy regions of Africa."

Digitized by Google



I remember our running through the wood, and how our cannon balls whistled as they tore down the branches of the hawthorn bushes as we broke through them. Beyond the border of the forest we could see something red flashing here and there. Sidoroff, a young soldier from the first battalion, suddenly fell to the ground, and silently looked at me with big, frightened eyes. Yes, I remember it very well.

I also remember the Turk, I noticed when we reached the clearing. He was tall and stout, and I was short and thin. I ran straight towards him. Something snapped. Something huge, as it seemed to me, flew past me. I heard it whistle. "He has shot at me," I thought. But he, with a wail of pain, leant against the hawthorn bush. With a blow I knocked the musket out of his hands. I heard him moan, and then I rushed on.

Our men cried: "Hurrah!" Some fell. Some gave fire. When I had left the wood, I also fired several times right on the plain. Suddenly the "hurrah!" grew louder, and we all rushed on—that is, not we, but our men, for I remained. This seemed strange to me, and yet more strange, that everything had disappeared and the noise had stopped. I heard nothing, but I saw a bit of blue colour before me, very likely the sky. After awhile this also had vanished.

I was never in such a funny state before. I am lying, it seems, on my stomach, and I see before me a bit of ground. A few grasses, little broken pieces of last year's herbs, and some ants crawling over them—this is all my world. And all this I see with but one eye; the other is closed with something hard—perhaps a branch on which my head rests. I feel very uncomfortable, and I want to move, but I do not understand why I am not able to. Time passes. I hear the noise of the grasshopper, the buzzing of the bee. At last I made an effort to free my right hand from under my body, and leaning with both hands on the ground I try to stand on my knee. Something sharp and quick as lightning passes through my body, and once more I fall. Once more darkness and nothingness.

I awake. How is it that I now see the stars shining brightly on the dark blue Bulgarian sky? Am I not in my tent? Why am I not there? I try to move, but I feel a torturing pain in my leg. Yes, I have been wounded in the battle. Dangerously? I touch my leg where I feel the pain. Both legs are covered with blood. When I touch them, the pain grows stronger. There is a noise in my ears, and my head is heavy. In a confused way I understand that I am hurt in both legs.

How did it happen? Why did they not pick me up? Is it possible that the Turks have beaten us? I try to remember what has happened to me, first in a confused manner and afterwards more clearly. I remember now that we were not beaten at all but that we began to run and that I had to drop down on the plain near the hill. Our commander had pointed to the plain: "Boys, we shall be there," he had called out. And we were there; that proves that we are not beaten. But why did they leave me? This is an open place where they could have seen me. They fired so often, very likely I am not alone. I must turn my head and see. I can do it so easily as this time I had fallen on my back—this accounts for my seeing the stars instead of the ground.

I raise myself into a sitting position, but this is hard work when both legs are wounded. Several times I have to rest, and the pain brings tears into my eyes. At last I sit up. Above me are the dark blue sky and the twinkling stars; around me seems something dark and high. My hair stands on end. I have fallen into the bushes and they have not found me. But how did I get here, when they shot at me on the plain? Very likely, driven by pain, I had rushed on. Strange? Now I am not able to move, and then I could run so far.

The big stars have grown paler and the little ones have disappeared; the moon is rising. How good to be at home! I hear strange sounds. It seems that, after all, there is somebody. Yes, that was a groan. Is there somebody near me, also forgotten, with wounded legs or a ball in his stomach? No, the groans are too near, for there is nobody so close to me. Good heavens, it is myself! Slow, plaintive groans! Am I really so bad? Very likely. But I hardly realise the pain, because there is a mist in my head, it feels like lead. I had better lie down and sleep. Sleep? Shall I ever wake up again? I hardly care.

Digitized by Google

Suddenly a broad streak of moonlight illuminates the place where I am about to lie down, and I see something dark and big lying at a few steps from me. Something on it glistens in the light of the moon. I recognise a brass button. Very likely a dead body or a wounded man. All the same to me, I lie down.

No, it cannot be! Our men have not left the field. They have beaten the Turks and have remained in this position. But why do I not hear the sound of voices or the crackling of fire? But then I am so weak that I am not able to strain my ears. Surely they are here.

"Help, help!" I call out.

Wild, hoarse sounds burst from my chest. They remain unanswered. All is silent around me. The moon has a mournful expression on her round face. I remember the bright buttons. "If he were alive, he would have heard my call. He is dead. Is he ours or a Turk? Oh, God, if it were not, all the same!" And sleep closes my weary eyes.

I am lying with shut eyes, although I awoke long ago. Through the thick branches of the hawthorn I feel the heat of the sun, and I do not care to open them. It is better not to move at all. Yesterday—was it yesterday?—I was wounded. One day has passed, others will pass, and I shall die. How good it would be not to think, but this is impossible. Thoughts and remembrances come to my mind, and besides, it will soon be over. They will publish that our losses were of no consequence. "Wounded, so many; killed, Ivanoff, a private from the volunteers." Perhaps they will not put the name. Simply: "Killed, one." A private! as if they would say "a dog."

It was long ago. All my life—that is, the life when I was not lying here—seems so long ago. I walked in the street, where I saw a crowd of people looking at something white, covered with blood. It was a pretty little dog, which had been killed by the tramcar. A man came and carried it away.

Will they carry me away, too? Or shall I remain here to die? How sweet life seems to me! When I saw the little dog that day, I had felt happy. Remembrance, why do you torture me? The past is happiness; the present misery. Home-sickness, thou art worse than all the wounds!

It is growing warm, the sun is burning. I open my eyes and I see the same bushes, the same sky, but in broad daylight. And there is my neighbour. Yes, it is a dead Turk. What a giant! I remember him; he is the man I killed. Why did I kill him? Why did he come here? Who is he? Like myself, he may have an old mother looking out for him. And I? And I also. Yes, I should like to change with him. He does not hear; he does not feel the pain of his wounds, anguish or thirst. The bayonet pierced his heart right through.

There is a great black hole in his uniform. This was done by me. I did not want to do it. I did not wish to harm anybody when I went to the war. I did not expect to kill people. I had thought more of exposing my own breast to the enemy's balls. And then? Fool, fool! And this wretched fellah (he wears the Egyptian uniform), his fault it was still less. He had never heard of Russia or Bulgaria. He was told to go, and he went. We attacked, he defended himself. Where is his fault, and why did I kill him? Why does thirst torture me? Who knows what that means? Even when we march through Roumelia, under a glaring tropical sun, I did not feel the thirst as I feel it now. Oh, if someone would but come!

Great Heavens! In his flask there may still be some water, but how to reach it? It will cost me agonies, but I must try. I begin to crawl. My feet drag. My weakened hands are hardly able to move the lifeless body. There are but a few steps to the dead body, but for me the distance seems endless. I must. My throat is parched and burns like fire. I should die soon without water, but I go on. Every movement is agony. I scream—I scream with sobs. At last I reach the flask. There is water enough to last me till I die. He whom I have killed saves me now.

I try to open the flask, but the effort is too great. I lose balance and fall right on the body of the dead Turk. I could smell the odour of decay. I took a long draught. The water was warm, but fresh, and would last me several days. I had read somewhere that a man could live a week without food if he had water. What if I lived several days longer? Our men are gone, the Bulgarians dispersed. There are no roads. Die I must, but instead of three days' suffering I shall suffer a week. Perhaps it would be better to end directly.

Near my neighbour lies his gun. I have but to stretch out my arm. One moment and all is finished. Shall I do it, or shall I wait? Deliverance or death? No, I shall have courage. I shall struggle on to the last. If they find me, I am saved. Perhaps my bones are not touched, and then they will cure me. I shall once more see my home, mother and Mary.

Oh, Lord, never let them know the truth! Let them think I was killed at once.

I am beginning to feel dizzy. My visit to my neighbour has entirely exhausted me. He is growing black and beginning to decay. What will become of him later? I can hardly bear the odour, and I am not able to move. The sun scorches my face and my hands. Nothing to cover me. If night would but come! This will be the second, I think.

My thoughts are growing confused.

I must have slept long for when I awoke it was night. My condition is the same. My wounds hurt. My neighbour, huge and lifeless. is still there.

I cannot help thinking of him. Is it possible that I have left all that is dear and precious to me, that I have come thousands of versts, have starved and frozen, and been tormented by heat and thirst, and am now lying here in agony only in order to kill this miserable Turk? Did I accomplish anything else besides this murder?

Murder—murderer! And who? I!

When I longed to join the army, my mother and sister did not keep me back, although they grieved deeply. I was sorry for them, but, blinded, I refused to see their tears. I did not understand how much I hurt them. Now I do.

If I could but bring back the past! How strange my conduct seemed to our friends.

"Madman, you do not know what you are doing!" they had said. How could they talk like this when our country was in question? Where was the love and patriotism they were constantly extolling? When I aimed at all these lauded virtues, why did they call me madman? I went with thousands of others, some of them like myself, as volunteers. A sharp morning wind stirring the bushes reminds me that this is my third day of suffering. The third! How many more? I am too weak to move away from the dead body. We shall soon be equals. I am thirsty. I shall drink three times a day, morning, noon and night.

Digitized by Google

The sun has risen. Its great circle, crossed and divided by the bows of the hawthorn, is red as blood. It will surely be warm to-day. My neighbour—what will become of him? He is terrible now. His hair is beginning to fall off; his dark, Egyptian skin has become yellow. What will the sun do with him to-day? To lie near him is impossible. I must move farther, however I shall have to suffer for it. I must, if it should take me hours to make a step.

The whole morning passes in the effort. The pain is terrible, but what is that to me? I have forgotten how it is to feel well. I have succeeded in reaching the old place, but even here I have the terrible odour of the decaying body, carried to and fro by the wind. It makes me sick. My empty stomach is shrinking. I am beginning to feel spasms. My whole interior turns with the terrible odour, which does not leave me for a moment. I have reached despair, and I weep—weep like an infant. Exhausted, all torn by the thorns of the bush, I feel almost unconscious.

Suddenly—is this a mistake—I hear talking and the stamping of hoofs I was going to scream, but refrained. If these should be the Turks! Then, to my own suffering, others still greater would be added. I have heard and read how the Turks tear off the skin and burn the wounds. Nothing worse than brutish men! Will it be better to end life in the hands of the Turks or here? But if they should be our men? Oh, these bushes! Why are they so thick? I can hardly see through them! There is one little place like a window which enables me to see in the distance. There seems to be the little brook where we quenched our thirst in the battle, and there is the big stone which was our bridge across the brook. They will surely come this way!

My hearing has grown so weak that I cannot distinguish the language which they talk. Lord! if they should be ours! I shall call out! They will hear me from the brook. Why does it take them so long? Impatience tortures me. I do not even notice the odour, although it is increasing, and suddenly Cossacks appear on the other side of the brook. The blue coats, with red stripes on the trousers, the Lancers, a whole battalion! In front, on a beautiful horse, the dark officer. As soon as they had reached the brook he suddenly commanded:

"Turn—march!"

"For heaven's sake, stop! Help! Help!" I scream, but the stamping of the hoofs and the general noise drown my rattling cries, and I am not heard. Oh, God, in my helplessness I fell with my face to the ground and I sob. From the overturned flask flows the water—my life, my salvation from death. After this I lost consciousness, and must have lain for many hours in this state, till at last a gust of wind blowing the terrible odour over me brought me to my senses. I looked at my neighbour. He had changed beyond expression. The first look at him nearly frightened me to death. I began to shiver when I looked at the skeleton in the uniform with the bright buttons. "This is war," I thought; "the representation of it!"

Once more the burning sun scorches my face and hands and causes me to feel thirsty. Not a drop of water is left in the flask. Why did I not scream louder? The Cossacks might have heard me. Even the Turks would be better than these pangs. Mother, darling mother! You would tear your hair if you knew. Good-bye, mother, sister—all!

Once more the little white dog. Why did I come here? To-morrow is the fourth day. How many more? Death, where art thou? Come and take me.

But death does not come. I have still to live and suffer. I am here under the burning sun, without a drop of water, and the nearness of the dead body is poisoning me. The worms have nearly finished him, and then they will be ready for me. The day passes and the night. The same thing. Another morning and another night.

There is a stir in the branches, and a noise as if they were talking. "You will die, die, die!" they whisper. "Never see again!" answer the bushes from the other side.

"From here you can see them!" says a loud voice near me.

I start and gain consciousness at once. Through the bushes I can see the kind, blue eyes of Iakoyley, our corporal, looking at me.

"Shovels!" he cried. "Here are two more, ours and theirs."

"No shovels! I don't need to be buried! I am alive!" I want to call out, but my throat is parched, and the closed lips are unable to utter a sound.

"Heavens! He is alive! Mr. Ivanoff. Boys, come here! Our young carine (master) is alive. Quickly call the doctor!"

Although one of my legs had to be operated upon, I have lived to tell and write of the terrible days I passed on the field of war.

LE VIER.

"The Willow Song," from MELODY.

Digitized by Google

THE BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

No. 7.

Two Prizes of £1 1s. Each.

BELOW will be found the seventh batch of ten problems in the new series of "THE BRAIN GYMNASIUM." Two prizes of a guinea each is offered weekly to those competitors who answer correctly the greatest number of these problems. Consolation prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

RULES:

1. All solutions to be written on one sheet of paper.
2. Don't write the questions. Simply put the numbers and the answer against each.
3. Each set to contain the £100 coupon (found on second page of cover) for the current week.
4. All attempts to be in by Monday, June 22nd.
5. Mark your envelope "Gymnasium, Number 7."

(61.) The initials of the words defined below, when placed one on the other, form a word signifying "very fine."

Rhymes with "muff."
Rhymes with "wonder."
Rhymes with "nestle."
Rhymes with "clever."
Rhymes with "vane."
Rhymes with "cool."
Rhymes with "pink."
Rhymes with "hot."
Rhymes with "peel."

(62.) The verse given below is jumbled up in the following manner:

The letters of each word and the words of each line are transposed; each word and each line, however, is complete in itself.

Het rones osner noser oth eth fitalubeu
Morf lorof het ot gelinic lifigln sentcame
Rove het techs duner het ponteuancer
Yint her adeh morf tinyad teef reh ot.

(63.) The words defined below when placed one on the other read both across and downwards the same:

1. A part of the body.
2. Formerly.
3. Cooling dainties.
4. A resort.

(64.) The following sentence is written in cypher. Transcribe it.

Brfmthfu thfrf m mmn wlth snsa sn dfmd whn tn hlmsfaf hmth nnt smld "L dn fnjny rfmdlng Shnrt Stnrlfs."

(65.) A pianist commences at 10 a.m. on Monday, June 29th, 1896, to play the piano from 10 to 2 and 3 to 7 every day, and depresses the keys at the rate of 360 a minute. Another pianist commences at 47 minutes past 12 p.m., on the same day, and strikes the keys at the rate of 384 a minute. At what time on what day will the second player have struck a number of keys equal to that struck by the first player?

(66.) The initials and finals of the words defined below, read downwards and upwards, represent a word signifying "with many teeth."

1. To lessen.
2. Not reserved.
3. A South American quadruped.
4. A fish.
5. Want of religion.
6. Quarrel.

(67.) CHARADE.

My first is a parentless child.
My second an expression of surprise.
My third an evidence of victory.
My whole a commendable institution.

(68.) Let A=£1 2s. 7½d.; e=£2 0s. 1½d.; i=2s. 10d.; o=1s. 3¾d.; u=£3 17s. 9¼d. What word in the first column on this page has the greatest money value, and what is that value? State the position of the word.

(69.) Make an anagram from the sentence:
AFTER THE BATTLE.

70.) How many times is the word PEARSON'S quoted in the June number of Pearson's Magazine, including the advertisement pages and cover?

PICTURE ✣ PUZZLE ✣ PRIZE.

No. 8.

£10 TO BE GIVEN AWAY.

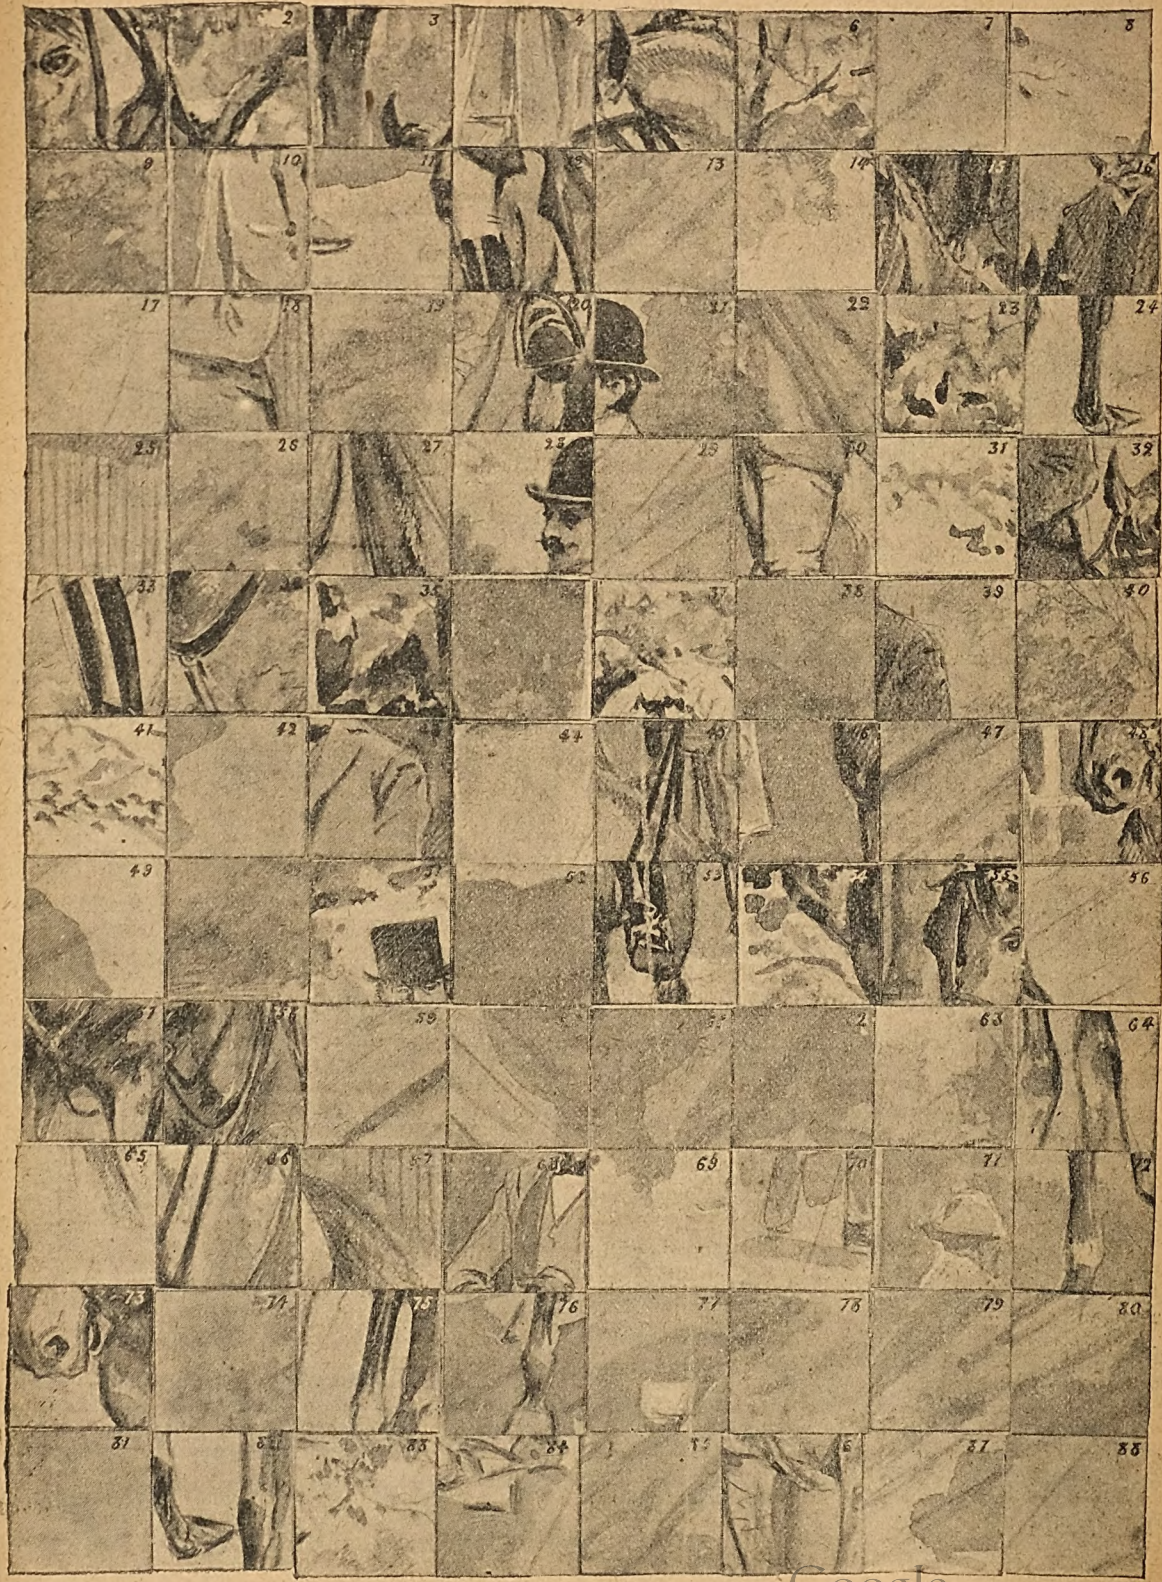
On the opposite page is a puzzle picture composed of 88 squares. If these squares be rearranged in a certain order they will form a real picture.

We offer a prize of £10 for the correct solution. In order to give readers in all parts of the United Kingdom as equal a chance as possible, none of the solutions received will be opened until Thursday, June 18th, when all those received will be considered together. In the event of two or more correct solutions being included up to this time, the prize will either be given to the sender of the neatest one, or will be divided amongst the correct competitors at the discretion of the Editor. Consolation Prizes will also be awarded.

If no correct solution be received on or before Tuesday, June 23rd, 1896, the Ten-Pound Prize will be given to the sender of the solution then to hand which is most nearly correct.

Pictures should be packed flat or folded, not rolled, and the outside wrapper must be marked "Puzzle Number 8."

Digitized by Google



Digitized by Google

A MODERN SATURNALIA.

A Story of the Moscow Tragedy.

"It has been like a scene in a fairy tale," sighed Lady Zoë, clasping her little white hands. "I shall never forget this, my first visit to Moscow!"

She spoke to a fair-haired boy of eighteen, slender in form, yet strong of feature.

He had the brow of a statesman, so his mother declared. He would live to be as great as his father, the celebrated Hamilton de Falbe.

"Yes," he replied, gazing at the lovely Lady Zoë. "One does not find oneself in a charmed city every spring; you do not see a coronation every day!"

The girl smiled.

"No, indeed. London is my home, but now that I have basked in the splendour of a Russian Court, I wonder that my mother could ever have left it to marry an English nobleman. My heart goes out to these people; I would I were a man and the Tsar!"

The youthful enthusiasm of the Lady Zoë seemed reflected in young De Falbe's eyes. Yet he drew a deep breath as he replied:

"It is not always fairyland. You little know what you say when you envy the ruler of a nation!"

"To-morrow," said Lady Zoë, "is the 'grand folks' festival.' What a glorious day for the people! We cannot realise it, who are feasted night after night. I wish just for twenty-four hours I could change places with one of the poorest waifs, and feel his joy when he presses forward in the crowd of humanity to receive his presentation cup—his bread and sausage! Has it ever struck you, Hamilton, that after all I am little better than a prisoner, always guarded by a watchful attendant. Sometimes I think I would give my right hand to know—if only for a day—what real liberty meant."

She stretched out her arms, and the gesture reminded the boy of a starling freshly entrapped in a cage, beating its wings against the bars.

He took her hand reverently, and raised it to his lips.

The young Lady Zoë drew closer to his side.

"You do love me!" she whispered, flashing at him one of her ravishing glances.

With all the energy of youth, her boyish admirer swore everlasting fidelity.

"Dearest, I would die for you!"

The high-flown sentiment amused the girl. She laughed merrily.

"I don't want you to die, but I have thought of a wonderful scheme in which you might help me. I want to know what real life means—to disguise myself as a peasant, and mingle in a Russian holiday for the million! Ah, you look startled; it needs some daring I know. The crowd will be gigantic, almost terrible! Every phase of the lowest life—the poorest possible moujiks and peasants—will be heart to heart with us in the crush. No state ball will have ever held such a splendid feast of novelty. Imagine, Hamilton, you and I, garbed as the lower classes like wild, mad merry-makers, let loose on the Khodynski Plain, amidst dancing shops, music booths, and acres of merry-go-rounds! All ceremony thrown aside, we shall see a spectacle that will serve us with thought till we are old and grey!"

In her craving for a new sensation, the reckless Lady Zoë imparted her daring thirst for adventure to the susceptible spirit of the boy—talking down his protestations, ridiculing his calmer judgment, till she fired it with her own enthusiasm.

"I have obtained the garments," she whispered, "in which we are to escape. My maid thinks I am taking them home for use in private theatricals. You are to be a brown bearded moujik in the national red blouse. Is it not an intoxicating plan?"

Half fearful of the enterprise, yet too proud to be outdone by a girl, Hamilton de Falbe flung himself into the scheme, the victim of her startling whim.

"I am named Zoë after my great aunt," she said, "and all the Zoës in our family have been half crazy creatures, and I must live up to their reputation." Her eyes sparkled as she spoke. "The last Zoë did an awful thing—she—but no, I must not tell you—you are too young!"

The boy bit his lip. Then she laid her hand caressingly upon his arm.

"I was only teasing," she whispered. "I will give you the whole story in detail after the fête on the Khodynski Plain."

No sleep that night for Lady Zoë or her bold cavalier.

With great dexterity they evaded their guardians and attendants, and garbed as a peasant maid, by five o'clock in the early morning, the only daughter of an English nobleman was struggling through a good-natured, happy crowd of merry-makers. Hamilton clasped her closely in his encircling arm, as with the whole vast concourse they made for the booths.

Digitized by Google

"I'll get my coronation package if I die for it," she murmured gaily, scanning in wonder the strange foreign visages around her. "What harm is there in becoming one of these inoffensive, pleasure-seeking people?"

"The populace of all the villages round Moscow are hemming us in," laughed the boy undaunted. "We are paying for our beer and honey!"

The pressure grew worse and worse as these veritable "babes in the wood" were hustled with the mob. Even the light-hearted Zoë felt her head reel, and her breathing break forth in laboured gasps, as she stumbled along over the irregular ground. The workmen were rushing in from the manufactories, and their violence awoke terror in the tenderly-nurtured English girl.

In the appalling crush they were being positively hurled towards the sheds where the presentation mugs and free meals awaited the greedy masses, while amidst the rush of the people, Zoë and her escort were in imminent danger of being trampled under foot.

On—on—pressed the seething congregation, ever faster, ever denser! Some were disputing and striking each other in hot rage, many faces blanched livid with fear, as cut and bleeding they hastened forward to the goal.

"Oh! take me home for the love of Heaven," pleaded Zoë suddenly. "Hamilton, I am frightened, let us go back—quick—quick!"

Rash as her request appeared, Zoë's word was law. Without questioning the inadvisability of the proceeding young De Falbe turned against the stream.

The utter impossibility of making their way back now broke upon the girl's strained nerves, and losing her head completely in the crowd, she battled against the burning breath of tens of thousands, uttering piercing shrieks that rent the air. Her hysterical cries were the signal for a panic, and those behind hearing her screams, pushed eagerly forward—a mighty wave of impulsive humanity!

The women took up Zoë's cries, and in a moment a scene, painted in all its gruesome horror by the papers of to-day, so terribly tragic in its frenzied realism—broke across that plain of death! The seething mass went mad, there on the battlefield of fate they were fighting in anguish for light, space, freedom—escape!

Hamilton, though sparely built, seemed in that dread moment endowed with superhuman strength. He raised Zoë half fainting on his shoulders, and as if the sight of her helpless frame and beautiful features involuntarily compelled them, the strongest men formed round her and the boy. Like lions they fought with those, who, regardless of death-groans, beat their way on to plunder the line of booths. One, taller than the rest, snatched the fair girl from the failing arms of the still undaunted youth and bore her away.

The red blouse of Hamilton de Falbe was torn in shreds from his body, which, bleeding and mangled, sank with a groan to the earth.

"Zoë!" he cried, "Zoë!"

In the midst of the uproar, through fevered dreams, she heard the name, and a moment later forty or more bodies had swelled the heap of slain beneath which he lay. It was not in vain he had pledged his word: "Dearest, I would die for you!"

Then came a series of confused visions in the girl's brain. She was still borne on by the arms of strong men; groans and shrieks rang in her ears. She opened her eyes and saw that troops of firemen were carrying the victims to transport waggons. After this came a brief spell of insensibility, and later on the jolting over stones back into the city.

When she fairly awoke from her faint, it was to find herself in St. Catherine's Hospital. The nurse bending over her appeared surprised when the poor peasant girl spoke in English.

"Where is Hamilton?" she asked, starting up—"Hamilton de Falbe?"

"I don't know. What is your name?" answered a soft voice in Lady Zoë's native tongue.

"Never mind. We went to the fête for a joke, Hamilton and I." The girl raised herself on her elbow as she spoke, her cheek flushed, her eyes bright. "What happened? Why am I here? It was only a joke—only a joke!"

She repeated the words vehemently, but the nurse, herself sick at heart, could hear nothing but the piteous cries in the streets without, of a distracted and mourning multitude calling aloud:

"Boje moi! Boje moi!" (My God! my God!) The girl leapt from her bed, the horror of memory rushing back.

"I led him to his death, I killed Hamilton!" she said, speaking firmly, "for the sake of a new sensation!"

Her words were bitter—all the youth in her eyes died, while the life-long misery of regret froze her heart. Wrapping the torn shreds of clothing round her, she swept past the nurse with steady tread, hands clasped, and lips compressed.

Her mind was no longer confused. "Hamilton's murderess," she thought with painful irony, "must go to Hamilton's mother, and tell her about the joke! Oh! those happy, happy dead! It is the living who are accursed, and the saved who must suffer!"

So Lady Zoë escaped again in her rags, draining to the dregs her coveted cup of liberty.

WINIFRED GRAHAM.

A new Serial Story will commence in an early number of Short Stories, entitled, "Pauper Blue Blood," from the pen of MISS WINIFRED GRAHAM, Author of "When the Birds Begin to Sing," "Through the Valley," "Six First-Class Passengers," etc., etc.

Digitized by Google

AN INDIAN DRUG.

BY HUAN MEE,

Author of "The Czar's Diamond," "In Masquerade," "Alan Lindow's Wife," "Philip St. Voullé's Understudy," etc., etc.

CHAPTER VIII. (continued.)

HE has finished the review of the evidence, and now the jury only await his final words, while the thought runs through every mind: "Will they be for or against the prisoner."

The silence is fearful, agonising to all. He waits so long that anxious eyes are turned towards him as he sits, weighing in the balance his concluding words.

At last he sits erect again, and, like one deep breath, a smothered sigh of boiling excitement escapes the crowd.

"Gentlemen," he says, "I have laid the conflicting features of this trial as clearly before you as my power will admit. I have endeavoured to act justly and nothing more, making neither too much of one point, or too little of another, but submitting in true and proper order the whole of the evidence for and against the prisoner. It is for you in the impartial carrying out of your duties as citizens, to say whether this evidence points to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner charged with the terrible crime of murder. Let your council be marked by an undisguised endeavour to do justice and nothing more. That the ancient punishment, 'a life for a life,' is still demanded to-day must not weigh for or against the accused, for it is only for you to decide 'guilty or not guilty,' and for the law of the land to mete out stern and unfaltering judgment. Gentlemen, it is in your hands this mighty decision is left. May your council be a true and righteous endeavour to arrive at a verdict which shall be the honest verdict of you all, neither influenced by extraneous matters or by the opinion of others.

"Let each man act and judge for himself, and return a verdict according to the dictates of his own conscience. Guilty or not guilty. There can be no other decision."

With faces grave and set the jury solemnly rise and file from the box, the Judge retires, the prisoner passes from the dock, and a babel of voices immediately rises from the body of the Court.

Slowly the clock ticks off the minutes—one hour, then thirty minutes more.

What has happened!

The crowd has finished its excited converse; there is dead silence; and then the Judge enters again, the prisoner takes his stand in the box, and the jury return.

Nothing yet.

The Foreman says the jury desire the Judge shall read certain portions of his notes, which is done, and again they retire.

Then another hour, an hour of leaden minutes, and the jury once more re-enter, while beside the Judge there stands the Chaplain.

The man who is to say "Amen," if the verdict should be against the prisoner.

The prisoner stands swaying from side to side as his hands grip the edge of the dock in front of him, his face pale and fixed, and his eyes glaring with fearful intensity at the twelve men who are to decide his fate.

For a moment there is silence, and then the formal question is put: "Gentlemen, have you agreed upon your verdict?"

Like a rifle bullet in the crowded court comes the answer "No."

The jury have disagreed, there is no hope of a verdict ever being arrived at by them, and a torrent of applause breaks loose.

Calmly the Judge asks if they desire additional information, if they will retire longer and further consider the matter; but the Foreman replies it is useless, utterly impossible that they can ever agree, and so the case for the present ends.

The prisoner falls back fainting and helpless, the jury are dismissed, the Judge retires, the crowd disperses, and for a time all is over, but the gloomy horror will have to be repeated, and perhaps repeated again, until twelve men, with one unanimous voice, can decide the question: "Guilty or not guilty?"

CHAPTER IX.

A DISCOVERY.

"THE Maythorn Murder" trial had become a thing of more than local interest now. Throughout the length and breadth of the land the telegraphic wires had flashed the evidence of the most sensational case of the decade. The local Press had filled column upon column with verbatim reports, and the big London dailies had given a comprehensive condensation of the proceedings. For a whole week the populace of Maythorn had been in a state of tension, and now that the result, and to nearly everyone the unexpected result, of a disagreement amongst the jury was known a revulsion of feeling had set in and there were not wanting those who, the day before the most determined in their belief and assertion of the prisoner's guilt, were now ready, since twelve of their fellow countrymen had failed to arrive at a unanimous verdict, to admit that "there might be doubts," and Estlin Godfry was entitled to the benefit of them.

Indeed there were a few, a very few, who were already indulging in the favourite weakness of the sensation-loving public and were following the reprehensible but not unfrequent custom of elevating a criminal into a hero, a murderer into a martyr, admiring with a warped species of admiration the man who they assumed was clever enough to commit such a crime and leave no positive trace behind. Let it be said in their excuse they were only those who had heard the evidence from third parties, for those who had patiently listened to the long trial, to the mass of evidence, to the speeches of the learned counsel for the prosecution, and the able advocate for the defence, and had heard the clear, impressive, and impartial summing-up of the Judge, were for the most part in accord with the jury's decision that an agreement was impossible. But a disagreement meant a new trial, and it behoved the defence to be more active still, and try and throw a few more grains into the scale in Estlin Godfry's favour.

From morning till night they laboured, every possible and impossible line of defence was considered, and the well-known ground gone over again and again, the same road trodden to the same end, disappointment, a long, long lane with no turning.

The best detectives that London possessed had been enlisted on the side of Estlin Godfry, and many an individual was "shadowed" unknown to himself, shadowed for days, in the vain hope that something might arise to throw light even at the eleventh hour upon the mystery.

Digitized by Google

But human patience and human skill were powerless, and the day of the new trial drew nearer with nothing further upon the side of the defence, and for all Estlin's friends knew, more powerful machinery still prepared for his destruction by the prosecutors of the State. The prosecutors of the State, who, acting under the authority of the Home Office, were no doubt instructed to obtain a verdict because in the minds of those in authority, murder had been committed and justice must be done. Who shall blame them? The administration of the law may be faulty, human intelligence has its limits, and in its short-sightedness may err, but for the safety of mankind the felon must be punished, the murderer must die. It is no vindictive action, it is the justice of man to man, the law of civilisation. Those who take life shall forfeit their own.

The coroner's jury who first inquired into the death of Joseph Monro had gone as far as their duty called them; they had found that he was poisoned, and in the further fulfilment of that duty had named who was, in their eyes, the murderer. The duty of the State was to give effect to their verdict, to accord a full and fair trial to the accused, and it had done so. The result so far had been a disagreement, then the dread horror must be gone through again and conviction or acquittal secured. Guilty or not guilty, there was no other way.

Once more, in the room behind the chemist's shop, Larrance and Shenfield sit opposite each other and discuss the painful story; once more they examine every link of the interminable chain that had been wound round and round Estlin Godfry, and, try as they will to put it from them, they cannot but fear that the new trial will result in his condemnation. Friends as they are of the accused, nay his partisans, the staunch believers in his innocence, they see how impossible it is to expect acquittal.

"I would give," Larrance is saying, "half what is left of my life to prove his innocence."

"And I would give every penny I possess, relinquish all my dreams of fame, my hopes of future recognition for my discoveries to see him free again."

A lad entering the shop at that instant, Larrance is left alone for a minute or so; he gazes through the glass door as Shenfield supplies the want of his customer. Shenfield is standing by the very spot where the poison was upset and as he turns to re-enter the room, the flash of inspiration, the gleam of intuition Larrance had waited and hoped for comes. Good God! could it be possible? They would, perhaps, hang Estlin on circumstantial evidence when here where they had strived so often to find the clue and failed, here, if his intuition were right, was a far wilder and more improbable circumstance that would save him and give him back, amid the cheering of his friends, to life and freedom.

The flush of excitement upon Larrance's face surprises Shenfield when he returns.

"Have you some idea?" he asks, "some hope at last?"

"Hope! more than hope; I think I see the truth. Shut the shop, there's not an instant to lose now."

The excitement of Larrance is contagious and in a few minutes the shutters have hidden the red flaring eye, and those who passed the door of Walter Shenfield's shop that night might, had they chosen to listen, have heard, not the secret of the Maythorn mystery, that Sidney Larrance had at last fathomed, but the sound of hammers and the sharp, shrill noise of a saw as its hungry teeth scrunched through woodwork.

Next morning a new sensation was afforded to the town, for the chemist's shop remained closed, its owner was not visible, and no legend upon the shutters acquainted the passer-by of the cause of this unprecedented occurrence.

While the wondering crowd stands gaping round the closed door of Walter Shenfield's establishment in Maythorn, the proprietor himself and Sidney Larrance are closeted in London with the solicitors for the defence, who listen with attentive ears to the astounding opinion that Sidney Larrance is enunciating.

Then cabs are requisitioned and they drive with all speed to the Home Office, carrying with them a bulky package, that Larrance never loses sight of. The urgency of their case obtains them an immediate audience with the constituted authorities, and little difficulty is experienced in securing permission to institute a thorough search through the contents of the writing-table in the study of the late Mr. Monro, which had been sealed by the police after the event, acting upon instructions communicated to them by the Treasury.

A messenger is dispatched to Scotland Yard for an able representative to be present at the investigation in the study. The Indian expert is telegraphed for, and arrives carrying a small square box with a perforated zinc top containing a couple of live rabbits, then the earliest possible train is taken to Maythorn, and the party drive from the station to Merton House, where already summoned by wire they find awaiting them the Inspector of the local police, Dr. Hill, and Mr. Grindley. They silently mount the stairs to the study, and the door is closed and locked, the detective taking the precaution to remove the key and block the keyhole from inquisitive eyes by covering the aperture with a square of black court-plaster which he takes from his pocket-book.

CHAPTER X.

THE TRUTH.

FROM the Maythorn Chronicle, Saturday, October 18th:

Truly the age of miracles is not yet past, for we have had one performed in our very midst, so astounding and so remarkable that all that is left us to do is to sit and wonder how so great a thing has come to pass. Inscrutable are the workings of Providence; we can only accept its decree with thankfulness that those who mete out the laws of this country have been saved from yet another judicial murder, stayed from doing yet another innocent man to death, by the accidental discovery of evidence sufficient to prove his entire innocence a thousand times over.

Why is it that the whole world does not shrink from capital punishment upon merely circumstantial evidence? Judicial murder simply for the love of vengeance? A month ago a jury disagreed, and failed to find a verdict at the first trial of Estlin Godfry, in what proportion we cannot say, but let those who pressed for a verdict of 'guilty' then, thank the more merciful of their body that they have saved them from the deliberate murder of a man for a crime of which he was completely innocent. We are abolitionists. We frankly avow it, and while such cases as these exist, can never alter our opinion.

Without recapitulating the evidence, well known doubtless to all, upon which this young man, Estlin Godfry, was placed upon trial for his life, let us review the one and only day of the second trial—the day which saw the man set free who might have been dead, hanged, murdered a week ago.

Never has the Court been so crowded as upon that day, never have we heard the whole mass of people rise upon the conclusion of a case, and unchecked, unawed by the ponderous majesty of the law, give vent to their feelings as only Englishmen can with one wild, hearty cheer of true enthusiasm, the enthusiasm of fair play, our ever cherished birthright. That a great and new point was to be put in evidence upon that morning was in some occult way known to all, but upon which side was unknown, and the crowd waited eagerly for the opening of the case.

One glance at the prisoner as he entered was sufficient; there was no doubt upon which side now. The sparkle of excitement glowed in his eyes, but his face had none of the drawn horror of the last terrible proceedings, and as though they had received an electric shock the onlookers thrilled as they wondered what had been discovered, and where was the false link in the extraordinary chain of circumstantial evidence which so tightly encompassed Estlin Godfry a month ago.

Excitement upon excitement, sensation upon sensation, the case is opened in a few words by the Judge, who speaks of new developments, and instead of the counsel for the Crown, the learned Q.C. for the defence rises and proposes to at once call a witness. There is no demur; the learned counsel for the Crown bows and smiles to his opponent, who bows again. As a lesson in legal deportment it is a pretty sight; in a murder trial it is unique. The counsel for the prisoner calls one witness, Sidney Larrance, and a tall broad shouldered fellow unceremoniously elbows the briefless striplings and enters the box. How we should like to pile up column after column in admiration of Sidney Larrance. A giant in form and intellect, a man who had worked untiringly and found nothing, and then, like a lightning flash, by a brilliant stroke of genius discovered a clue and worked it to a proof that had established the innocence of his friend before the Home Office had had time to gasp for breath. Hercules, we salute you; you have overthrown the slowest and most ponderous machine of modern times.

Digitized by Google

With the utmost straightforwardness, speaking in a calm steady voice, as though his story was of a most everyday character, he gives his evidence. He had worked hard for weeks to help his friend, but in vain. He had failed, and up to the very last moment of the trial had discovered nothing. After that trial, when the jury disagreed, he went again to the shop of chemist Shenfield, there to talk and further discuss with him, still looking for a loophole of escape for Estlin. He had always thought Estlin Godfry innocent, he says—never doubted it for a moment, and, strange to say, there is loud applause in Court! What a fickle thing is the great British Public! Led gently on by counsel, Sidney Larrance comes back to the point. He owns, does this giant, that he suffers from presentiments, and has a wonderful intuition, and, although we are prepared to hear his lordship say that neither of these gifts can be admitted as evidence, he makes no sign, but, more wonderful still, nods encouragingly towards the witness.

"While we were standing talking," the witness continues, "a boy entered the shop, and Shenfield left me for a moment to attend to him. The boy made a small purchase, handing a penny in payment, and as Shenfield left the counter to return to me, he dropped the coin through a slit into the till. A slit that had been cut in the mahogany top of the counter in order to avoid the necessity of opening the till drawer when change was not required. In that instant the whole solution of the mystery, like a flood of molten fire, surged upon my brain, and I stood breathless, flushed, astounded at the revelation."

With an inspired gleam of enthusiasm the witness gazes around the Court expecting to see every face brighten as at last the true explanation of the great mystery was put into their very hands, but desire as we may to say that frantic cheering echoed through the building, we must, with a due regard to veracity, state that only utter bewilderment was expressed on every countenance, and that our brains were unable to follow as yet the reasoning of him of gigantic frame and intellect.

A section cut from the counter of Walter Shenfield's shop was then brought into court and examined by the jury with perplexed interest, also a model of the shop showing the position of the counter and the till. Oh, the excitement of those few moments. What a new sensation for our worn-out lives. We felt we were on the eve of a grand discovery; we held our breath and hoped that the counsel for the defence would lay the case before us as gradually as possible, making the most of every point as it came along, until the light that we as yet were blind to, burst upon us in one glorious flood.

For a time at least the evidence of Sidney Larrance seemed to be over. The eminent Q.C. for the defence rose and impressively tapped the section of the counter.

"Gentlemen," he said, "in the model of the shop you will see a portion of the counter marked number one, that is the section you have examined, and it is upon that part that a bottle of deadly poison was upset upon the night previous to the sudden death of Mr. Joseph Monro, who died by poisoning by that identical drug. Upon the charge of murdering his uncle, Joseph Monro, my client, Mr. Estlin Godfry, is before you to-day, the chief evidence against him being the fact that that bottle, now destroyed, belonged to him, and that he had two other bottles containing more of this deadly extract. I shall now call witnesses necessary for the placing of sufficient evidence before you to enable you to at once acquit him."

What an assertion. Then an acquittal was certain. Excitement boiled faster than ever. The witnesses which followed, and their evidence point by point is laid before our readers in the full report of the proceedings in this issue, let us hasten to the dénoûment. At last it came. Weary, formal evidence was over, and again the counsel for the defence rose.

"Gentlemen," he said, "upon this identical spot the animal in its death struggle upset the unstoppered phial." He fumbled for a moment and then produced a tiny bottle from his vest pocket. "This phial," he continued, "is identical in size, the only difference being that it contains nothing more deadly than water from our local waterworks. It stood upon this spot," and he placed the bottle upon the section of the counter. "Gentlemen, carry your minds back to that night. The two men watch the animal to which the poison has been administered, it dies almost without a shiver, and shocked for the moment they place it down upon the counter. It is dead. But no, it convulsively rolls over once and—murders Joseph Monro. So!"

He unstoppered the phial and then deliberately tipped it over with his finger; it fell upon the counter, and the water was spilled. He paused for a moment and gazed at the bewildered faces in the Court, and then with a dramatic gesture suddenly dragged the till drawer open and held it towards the Court, showing where a few wet spots marked the descent of the fluid as it had trickled through the slit in the counter.

What a gasp of amazement. People were too far gone to applaud, they simply sat and gazed before them, wondering if it were not all a dream, a dream from a sensational novel.

"Gentlemen," the counsel continued, and his voice seemed to arouse to life the stunned faculties of the jury, "in that till upon that night lay half-a-dozen postage stamps face downwards, and as the poison trickled through the few drops fell upon the gum, dried during the night, and in the morning these very stamps were purchased from the chemist by the late Mr. Joseph Monro. There are now two remaining. Two were used by the deceased, two were experimented with by experts with fatal results upon the animals treated, and two we have here."

Why trouble our readers by further recapitulation of evidence or technical points? Let us leave that and speak of the wild scene which followed when the crowd without took up the cheers of those within. Deafening applause within the very precincts of the Court itself which a learned Judge showed no disposition to check. Let us speak of the intense excitement in the town when Estlin Godfry was a free man once more, of the crowd surging round and wringing his hand again and again. Let us write of the natural joy of the people that an innocent man had not suffered wrongly, but let us not forget amidst it all that surely such a case as this is the greatest argument of all against circumstantial evidence, for every innocent man does not have upon his behalf, as advocate, a friend inspired by Providence with an intuition so marvellous as to shatter to atoms the whole evidence of the Crown by one swinging blow from the sledge hammer of Truth.

THE END.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

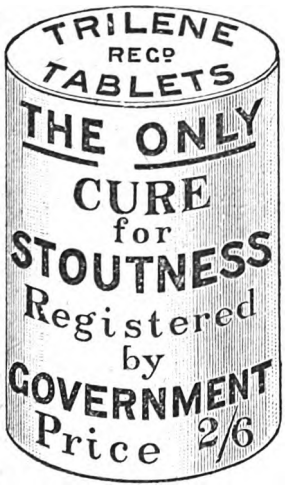
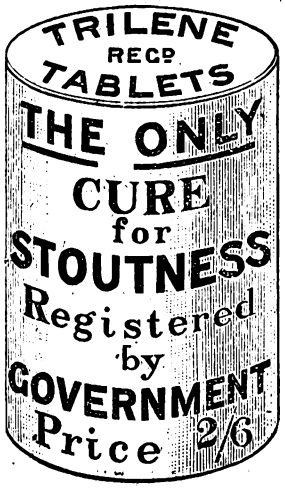
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 70, Finsbury Pavement, London.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87, Alexandra Road, Norwich.
"GENTLEMEN,—I have had some boxes of your Tablets for my wife, and she has derived great benefit from them.
"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Illustrated Family Novelist, November 30th, 1895, says: "A great many women who are plump by nature worry about their stoutness. However, there are some perfectly safe remedies for embonpoint, among them being the Trilene Tablets, which are not only safe, but absolutely beneficial to the general health, and speedily produce the desired effect."

"1, Letterstone Road, Fulham, S.W.
"SIRS,—I found myself decreased and better for your treatment, and can get about more freely.
"Yours sincerely, F. E. GODDEN."

"6, Brighton Terrace, Hull.
"MRS. JOHNSON has much pleasure in saying she has derived great benefit from your Tablets."

"3, Castle Road, Deal.
"MRS. J. PEARSON is glad to say she is much thinner."

Convalescent Home, New Brighton, Cheshire.
MISS S. J. PRITCHARD says: "They have done me good. I am 21lb. lighter already."

"Bretton West, near Wakefield.
"MISS L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of Tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

"Claremont House, Shrewsbury.
"DEAR SIRS,—I have nearly finished your Tablets, and cannot speak too highly of them. They do me good in many ways, being a valuable tonic and bracer up of the nervous system, and, being of a gouty tendency, they have also done me good in that way. I am very much thinner.
"Yours truly (MRS.) K. M. ANNAND."

25, Windsor Terrace, Penarth, Cardiff.
MISS M. FLAVELL says: "I have lost 2 stone, and am much better in health."

Extract from Bury and Suffolk Times, June 15th, 1894: "Miss Atherton sings and dances as piquantly as ever, and is a marvel of agility, considering how much flesh she has put on of late. Her friends should induce her to take a course of Trilene Tablets, about which I hear wonderful things. One portly acquaintance of my own by merely a few weeks' use of these little Tablets, has reduced his bulk perceptibly. I am assured the Tablets are harmless and tasteless, and that the Trilene Company in Finsbury Pavement, London, are doing an enormous and ever-increasing trade."

486, Market Street, Whitworth, near Rochdale.
MISS GRINDROD writes: "Have had one 2s. 6d. box of Trilene Tablets, and am 5lb. lighter."

2, Chariot Street, Hull.
MR. JUBB, Chemist, says: "My customers speak highly of your Tablets."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.
MR. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17½ stone, and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.
MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17 stone, was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15 stone."

Aspern, 29, King's Hall Road, Beckenham.
MISS S. WOODHOUSE writes: "I have much pleasure in stating that your Tablets are really a safe cure for stoutness; they have cured me, and I am a perfect figure now."

MRS. GIBBON, of Radford Cottage, Bitterne, says: "I have derived great benefit from your Tablets, especially abdominal."

131, Victoria Street, London, S.W.
MRS. ARTHUR WEGUELIN (the "Society" celebrity) writes: "By simply taking the Trilene regularly, and without change of diet, I have lost 1st. 4lb. in four weeks."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 70, FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

HIGH-CLASS CYCLES.

Ladies' and Gents'. Low Prices Best Materials. Finest Workmanship. Satisfaction Assured. Sent on Approval. Write for Lists.

J. LOFTUS, 58, Great George St., Liverpool.

HEADACHES, NEURALGIA, RHEUMATISM

CURED SPEEDILY with EVENIA CACHETS (Regd.). A Safe and Certain Remedy. Send 1/3 to-day for a box, post free. D. D. BUCHAN, Frjockheim, N.B.

London Agents: F. NEWBURY & SONS, 1, King Edward Street, E.C.

Send 4 Stamps and receive pair

FOLDING SCISSORS, PATENT PENKNIFE,

and Amusing Novelty Catalogue, post paid.

VARIETY COMPANY, DALSTON, LONDON.

7/6 SALOON GUN WITH 100 BALL CARTRIDGES. 7/6

TAKES BALL, SHOT, AND NOISELESS CARTRIDGES.

This gun is the cheapest in the world. It is not a toy, but a practical well-made Saloon Gun, 37in. long, weight about 4½lb. 100 Birds or Rabbits can be killed with it at cost of 1/6 only with shot cartridges, or 6/- per 500. Will penetrate a deal board 1in. at 50 yards. Can also be used in the house as a Target Rifle, with NOISELESS Cartridges at 1/- per 100, or 5/- per 1,000. This gun is fitted with a beautifully finished stock, nickel-plated fittings, etc., etc. Price 7/6 with 100 Ball Cartridges. Each gun is tested, regulated, and proved before sent to customer. The "Union Jack" Pistol (Registered), with 100 Ball Cartridges, price 4/6, or pair for 8/-. Block Action Saloon or Garden Guns (very superior manufacture) with 100 ball cartridges: No. 1 Bore, 12/6; No. 2 Bore, 13/6; No. 3 Bore, 15/6. No. 3 Bore at 15/6 will kill a bird on the wing at 35 to 45 yards. Send for Price Lists of Air Guns, Saloon Guns, sporting novelties and ammunition. If you cannot send to-day, cut this advertisment out, and write some other time. ADDRESS—W. R. JACKSON, Wholesale Arms and Ammunition Dealer, Tottenham, MIDDLESEX. (Mention this Paper.)

Every Young Man can positively and speedily cultivate a HEAVY, HANDSOME MOUSTACHE,

"I USED IT."

By a few applications of Knowles' "Esauline," the newly-discovered Hair-Forcing Specific. Success guaranteed. "ESAULINE" thickens the growth of the Moustache, is an infallible cure for falling off of the Hair, weak or thin Eyebrows, Premature Baldness, etc., and as a general Hair Producer and Restorer is absolutely unrivalled. Will not stain or injure the most delicate Skin. Highly recommended for Children's Hair. From all Chemists and Hair Dressers.

Post Free, Prices, 1s. 6d., 3s., or 5s.

T. KNOWLES & CO.,

330, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

ARE YOU FAT?

DR. GORDON'S Elegant Pills are the only Safe and Lasting Cure for Stoutness, Abdominal or General. State height, weight, and send 2/9, 4/6, or 11/- to Dr. Gordon, 24, Hart St., London, W.C.

READ! READ! READ!

Miss Roberts, "Brooklyn," Spotland Road, Rochdale, says: "I am 21in. round waist—before taking your Pills, 27in." Mrs. Cox, "Hazelhurst," Brondesbury Road, N.W.: "The last supply reduced me 14lb. in month without change of diet." P. Bendelow, 59, Dorset Street, Bolton: "Your Pills greatly reduced my weight." H. I. Cooper, 17, Somers Road, Southsea, says: "Your Pills reduced me 2 stones." Mrs J. Maskery, of Shirley, Derby: "I have lost nearly 3 stones in weight." Miss Nappey, Wood Lane, Headingley: "I have lost 18lb."

DEAFNESS

And Head Noises Relieved by Using Wilson's Common-Sense Ear Drums. A new scientific invention, entirely different in construction from all other devices. Assists the deaf when all other devices fail, and where medical skill has given no relief. They are safe, comfortable, and invisible; have no wire or string attachment. Write for Pamphlet. Mention this Paper.

Wilson Ear Drum Co. Agent: D. H. WILSON,

Drum in position, 7, Newington Road, Edinburgh.

NEW HARRISON Swift Gold Medal KNITTER.

KNITS Stockings ribbed or plain, Gloves and Clothing in Wool, Silk, or Cotton. Instructions Free. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals, for the "Harrison" and "Sun" Machines.

Harrison Knitting Machine Co., Ltd. Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6 May 1, £6, June 1, £5.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

AJAX CYCLES FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN

ARE RICH VALUE. 25 to 30 per cent. saved and carriage paid.

IMMENSE STOCK, NEW AND SECOND HAND.

Easy Terms from 10s. per Month. Lists free.

Now Open.—LARGE CYCLING SCHOOLS at LONDON and LIVERPOOL.

Addresses—

BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING COMPANY,

42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W., and 45, Everton Road, Liverpool.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20

See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (250 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £3,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

ARMSTRONG'S

Lady's & Gentleman's, from £5 10s., carriage paid. Prompt delivery, lists free. SPORTING GUN DEPT., Collingwood Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full natural perfect Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment, approved and recommended by the medical profession. Success guaranteed. For particulars free, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J." Oriental Toilet Co., 87 Strand, London.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

LOOK OUT FOR AN ENTIRELY NEW FORM OF COMPETITION NEXT WEEK.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 391. FOR WEEK ENDING JUNE 27TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

1896 PROCLAMATION.

Grand Pioneer Reduction Sale

By Messrs. F. HODGSON & SON, The Well-known Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds, will take effect on sight of this advertisement.

OUR NEW VENTURE! Yes, Two Different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright).

Whereas, in launching forth our New Production, THE "PRUDENTIAL" CARPETS AND HEARTHRUGS, we beg to state they will have a Rich Turkish and Persian Design on one side, and on the reverse the elegant and costly designs of Wilton make. The advantage thus gained is great, as they can be utilised in various rooms at one cost. This is a valuable step in economy.

PRODIGIOUS SALE OF THE

"PRUDENTIAL" Reversible CARPETS

(Registered.)

Reversible, with a different pattern on both sides, woven throughout with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in 10 sizes only. These carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian with the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

	Each.		Each.
6ft. by 9ft., Reduced Sale Price	4/9	9ft. by 15ft., Reduced Sale Price	12/6
7½ft. by 9ft. " " "	5/11.	12ft. by 12ft. " " "	12/9
9ft. by 9ft. " " "	7/6	12ft. by 13½ft. " " "	14/6
9ft. by 10½ft. " " "	8/6	12ft. by 15ft. " " "	15/9
8ft. by 12ft. " " "	9/6	12ft. by 18ft. " " "	19/6
10½ft. by 12ft. " " "	11/6	12ft. by 21ft. " " "	22/6

When ordering please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

"Neal Lodge, Upper Norwood, S.E., January 18th., 1896.
The Dowr. Lady Abercromby is pleased with the 'Prudential' Carpet she ordered."

"Blairquhan, Maybole, N.B., August 3rd.
Lady Hunter Blair writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son send her another 'Prudential' Carpet, same as before, crimson and gold, dimensions, 9ft. by 10½ft. Cheque inclosed."

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Reg)., to match above Carpets, sent for 1s. 6d. extra, size 2 yards long, and 1 yard wide.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Hearthrugs for 4s. 3d.; or 6 for 8s.; or 12 for 15s. 6d.

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ALARM" CARPETS

(Registered). GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Sale Price 2/11 EACH.

This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. We will forward direct from the looms to any address on receipt of amount, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, the largest ever sold at the Price.

Suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. A Rug sent with Carpet, 10d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER. 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs ... ... 7s. 3d.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly Examine and Compare these Carpets.

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON, 27/6/96.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

F. HODGSON AND SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants,

WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Telegraphic Address—"Eclipse, Leeds." Telephone No. 948.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

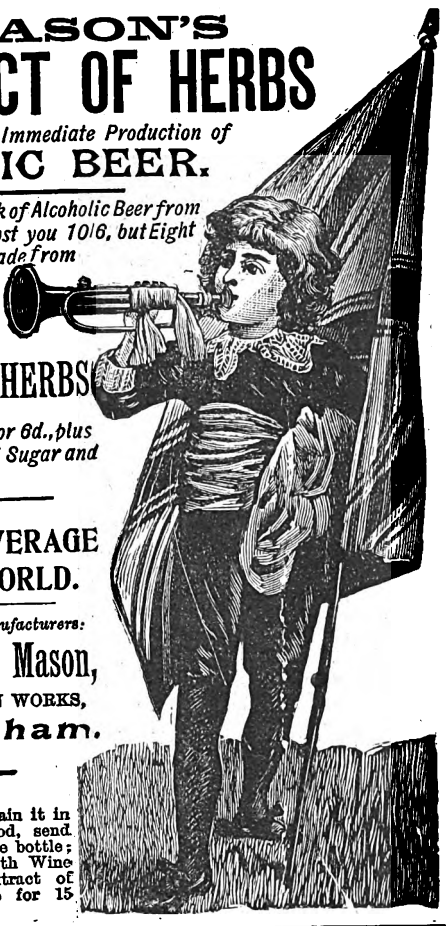
For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.



THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 2d.; 1lb., 2s.; 2lb., 3s. 6d., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

Digitized by Google

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lb.	30/-
No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 50lb.	37/6
No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 55lb.	41/3
No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lb.	48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

HIGH-CLASS CYCLES.

Ladies' and Gents'. Low Prices. Best Materials. Finest Workmanship. Satisfaction Assured. Sent on Approval. Write for Lists.

J. LOFTUS, 58, Great George St., Liverpool.

TRILENE REGd. TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

131, Victoria Street, London, S.W.—Mrs. ARTHUR WEGUELIN (the "Society" Celebrity) writes: "By simply taking the Trilene regularly, and without change of diet, I have lost 1st. 4lb. in 4 weeks."

Bretton West, near Wakefield.—"Miss L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.—Mr. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.—Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

127, Out Gang Lane, Old Radford, Notts.—Miss E. P. PARSONS says: "I was 16½st. before taking Tablets, and am now 15st.—going on nicely."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

ONE BOX
OF
Dr. Mackenzie's Improved
Harmless Arsenic Complexion Wafers

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire; clear, fresh, free from blotch, blemish, coarseness, redness, freckles, or pimples. Post free for 4/6.—S. HARVEY, 5 Denman St., London Bridge, S.E. Half-boxes 2/6. Use Dr. MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL TOILET SOAP. 1s. per Tablet; No. 2, unscented, 6d. per Tablet. Made from Purest Ingredients and Absolutely Harmless.

Beware of the many imitations.

HAVE DR. MACKENZIE'S OR NONE.

STOP

PAYING RENT, and go to the United States, where you can own a Five-acre Freehold Farm for occupation or investment, only £20. Beautifully situated, convenient to Philadelphia, close to railway station. To be sold on instalments of 4s. per week. New Settlement, Increasing Population, Capital Investment. Title insured. Send at once for full information to D. L. RISLEY, 63, Chancery Lane, London. Offices also in Philadelphia and New York.

HEADACHES, NEURALGIA, RHEUMATISM | CURED SPEEDILY with EVENIA CACHETS (Regd.). A Safe and Certain Remedy. Send 1/3 to-day for a box, post free. D. D. BUCHAN, Friockheim, N.B.

London Agents: F. NEWBURY & SONS, 1, King Edward Street, E.C.

HIGH-CLASS TAILORING

Every garment cut to measure, DIRECT from the Manufacturer, saving all Middle Profits.

MEN'S SUITS, 18/6

Better Qualities, 22/6, 25/6, 31/6, 37/6, 45/-, 52/6, 63/-.

CYCLING SUITS
From 15/-.
Value Unequalled.
Fit Guaranteed.

BOYS' SUITS
Pieces for Mending sent with all Suits.

LADIES' TAILOR-MADE COSTUMES
From 10/6 to 70/-
See our New Patterns before ordering.
It will pay you to do so.
(Hundreds to choose from), Post Free on Application.
All Goods Carriage Paid.

Factory Clothing Company,
Manufacturing and Ladies' Tailors,
117K, ALBION ST., LEEDS.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 26
June 27, 1896.
S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

SULPHOLINE LOTION.

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

Digitized by Google

No. 391.—One Penny. June 27, 1896.

SHORT STORIES

A STORY OF THE GOLDEN HORN.

Winter in Constantinople wears, for the most part, anything but a smiling face. It has nothing of the splendour of a northern climate, and lacks altogether the exalted stillness of snow-covered fields, creamy hills, and deeply-buried forests. It has the character of an abortive spring that can scarcely resist the temptation to relapse into wet winter. But there are occasional intervals, during which a mild blue firmament covers the residence of the sultans, the minarets and mosque-domes glitter and sparkle, and the waters of the Golden Horn ripple lovingly at the feet of evergreen hills, reflecting with dazzling effect the lovely blue overhead.

It was such a day, in the middle of December, 1879, while lounging in the reading-room of the German Club at Pera, that I met a former acquaintance, a young physician of whom I had for some time lost sight, though I knew that he had not left Constantinople.

Dr. Otto Franzeen was an interesting man. Tall and slender of stature, his rosy face was remarkable for a pair of large, calm brown eyes that contrasted surprisingly with his light blonde hair and golden blonde beard. But what characterised the man was the mystic calm of his manner and the paucity of his words. He spoke but little, went about alone, and his social relations with the foreign residents of the capital of the Ottoman Empire were as limited as courtesy would permit.

I saw him first in the reading-room in Pera, which he frequented, and we entered into conversation. The talk rambled through a variety of topics, but presently it became more personal.

"It is singular," he continued, after we had exchanged a few confidences, "that people here look on a man as though he were a child. They would guide each of my steps, and would absolutely lead me in the path to fortune and happiness. I am under surveillance by day and by night, and I believe the colony enters all my movements in a ledger. In this respect the Turks are different," he continued, after a few seconds; "they call for my services; but as soon as I am out of their houses I am dead as far as they are concerned."

"Then you also have practice among the Mohammedans?" I asked, somewhat surprised, knowing that foreign doctors are only called to attend Turkish families in very exceptional cases, and then generally only very old men, and such as have lived in Constantinople many years and are married.

"Yes," he replied, "I have more calls to Turks than to others. My practice is extending with the former."

"No doubt a paying practice?" I ventured.

"Very, but difficult," he replied, in his uncommunicative manner; "the women I am expected to treat when covered by the veil, and that is impossible. I declare my inability to help them under such circumstances, and that is generally effective. With groans and sighs the veil is removed, and what it had hidden would, in most cases, better have remained covered."

"In most cases, but not in all?" I interrupted.

"No, not in all," he said pensively; "for the greatest beauty here I saw unveiled. She was a slave," he added, and into his eyes there came a peculiar light.

He fixed his eyes thoughtfully on the ground, and his slender, nervous hand played excitedly with a paper-cutter. The expression of his face had suddenly become so singular that I felt a great desire to hear more of that slave girl. But from this time he relapsed into his wonted thoughtful silence.

After that meeting, weeks passed without my seeing the singular man again. Then we met again on several occasions, but I took care not to put any questions to him, or to exhibit a desire to learn anything he did not volunteer to impart, and by degrees we became excellent acquaintances.

One day Dr. Franzeen asked me whether I knew where he could obtain a Spinoza translated into German. I happened to have the volume he needed, and gave him the book. After a few days he confided to me that the book was destined to be read by a lady, a highly cultivated widow who now desired to form my acquaintance, and had commissioned him to present me to her.

In a house fitted up in the Pompeiian style, with the finest taste, though plainly, and with a certain colourless severity, I found a magnificently formed woman, with an intellectual face and great black eyes, clear, dark, fiery, and deep, that possessed rare powers of fascination. I envied my friend, and feared for him at the same time, for this was a woman who might bring the most exquisite joy or the most exquisite pain to the man who falls within her magic sphere.

She greeted me simply and cordially. We talked on a wide variety of topics, and I admired the profound knowledge and the conversational powers she displayed.

"I hate blue-stockings," she remarked, "who only study in order to boast of their knowledge. As for me, I want to be able to analyse the phenomena of life, and to this end I need science and art. My past life, which was a glittering desert, and my present status, confirmed me in this predilection—I might say they compel it. What else shall I do? How utilise my leisure? I have nothing to care for, and live isolated from all mankind mostly by my own choice. Were I a woman who was loved, and returned that love, then probably I should live only for my husband as wife and housekeeper, which I regard as the highest and noblest destiny of woman." And with these words she gave my friend a quick glance, full of fire.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

My visit came to an end all too soon. I parted from this extraordinary woman with feelings of admiration, and the relations of my friend to her began to burden my heart. She loved him—but he? Silently he took his leave of her that evening, apparently lost in deep and heavy thought. We took the road leading to the city, and wandered along the gently murmuring ripples of the Bosphorus, which, languidly illumined by the glittering stars overhead, sought sportively to leap up on the quay.

After that evening he disappeared, as was occasionally his custom. The lady, it is true, answered my inquiries after our mutual friend with a calm voice and careless manner, but her face was more pale than usual; her eyes were surrounded by dark rings, and her features bore the expression of suffering. For over a month I could not get sight of my friend. He developed a really wonderful talent to avoid meeting me, for he still went his professional rounds with regularity; but, despite all my pains and artifices, I failed to meet him either in the street or in places he was wont to frequent.

Nevertheless, the air was full of rumours about him, one of which was to the effect that he was a frequent visitor at the house of a pasha's widow, and that he was infatuated with one of her slaves. Although the institution of slavery, and, above all, the slave trade, is officially abolished in Constantinople, in reality slavery exists to-day just as it did a hundred years since; but it must not show itself in public. For this there is good reason, since the Turkish household could not exist without female slaves.

No Turkish woman, no Turkish girl, who would pass for respectable, may appear unveiled before a man; even the lord of the household must, when he enters his house, give the warning cry "desdur!" (take care), that all women present, not his wives or daughters, may take refuge behind the veil and leave the house. Beings thus encumbered cannot, however, perform the household work; hence the slave is a necessity, for she is a non-Mohammedan—a mere thing—and may appear before any man without the veil. Should she rise to the dignity of a wife, she is at once invested with the veil, and she is thenceforward governed by the same moral and social code as the others.

The education of those slaves who are only luxuries constitutes a profession that is exercised chiefly by widows, but often also by the wives of high officials. The children are purchased from people of Caucassian blood; high prices are paid for a five-year-old handsome and intelligent girl.

She receives a careful education and instruction in the languages, music and dancing as well as in some of the arts, if she displays any talent in that direction.

Arrived at a proper age, the girl is sold into a rich and aristocratic family, in which the virtuous, highly educated, physically and intellectually-developed girl occupies a most anomalous position. She waits upon visitors, entertains them, and is an article of luxury—just as are in our elegant drawing-rooms the paintings of celebrated masters. Such a slave cannot be bought for less than £1,700. Not infrequently these young women marry men of high station, and some have even become the mothers of sultans.

Such a speculative educational institution was possessed by the widow of Essouf Pasha, and Dr. Franzeen had been selected by her as physician to the house. This was unusual, but of five of her pupils who had lain prostrate with typhus fever he had saved all. From that time the Turkish lady placed visits in a house which otherwise was open only to the richest Mohammedan buyers.

The rumours led me to think. Why did he hide himself from me? Why avoid the handsome widow, who, he must have known, loved him? There might be some truth in the rumour, although in one respect it must needs be false—one cannot court a slave.

It is an impossibility for such a girl to follow the bent of her inclinations, for she is the property of her educator, and should she attempt flight, the authorities would come to the aid of her owner, would find, and return her to slavery, and should her lover be a foreigner, whose legal punishment might cause diplomatic trouble, he would surely and silently disappear, never to be seen again.

Hence, there could be no thought of courtship in this case. But one way of getting possession of such a girl was open to a foreigner—to buy her, and as he is not permitted to keep a slave, to marry her.

I knew my friend to be without means, nor had he been able to accumulate much money during his one year's sojourn in Pera. How then could he indulge such idle fancies? It is true Dr. Franzeen was a peculiar man, that I knew right well; but foolish he was not. In all his undertakings he had a clear, attainable end in view; and yet I was much disturbed by his conduct for the past few weeks.

One day—I was reading my home-paper in the German club-room—a hand was laid upon my shoulder, and looking up I was surprised to see the lost one standing by my side. He looked thin and worn, and his attitude was less elastic than formerly.

"Shall we take a walk?" he asked, in a rather tremulous voice. I declared my willingness, and we took the road to the old bridge. For some time he walked silently by my side, and I followed his example, when presently he exclaimed excitedly:

"You are well-known in financial circles here, do you know anyone who would lend me fifteen thousand francs for a year? I would like to borrow that sum, and pay the usual interest."

"Then, after all, the rumour is correct?" I could not help saying.

"What rumour?" he asked excitedly.

"That you are in love with a slave-girl."

"And if it were so?"

"I thought you had other aims and ambitions."

"I had deceived myself," he replied, without looking up; "I was blinded by the soul, the originality, the depth, and the importance of the lady—I was fascinated by her individuality. But now a great passion has taken possession of the whole man in me—it is true love itself. I am infatuated with a charming being full of youth and fragrance; a being like a May flower; the personification of youth; spring with all its spiritual and material charms. She is a slave-girl, it is true, a pupil of the widow of Essouf Pasha, but I am determined to buy this girl, and make her my wife."

"Are you certain your love is returned?" I asked.

"I fancy I can read love in her eyes—to speak of love I have as yet been unable, under the peculiar conditions that obtain in Turkish households. She casts down her eyes when I accost her, while the others look at me calmly; she blushes when I approach, and her breathing is hurried; she trembles when I take her hand to feel her pulse, and she is always the first I see when I enter the house. If I discontinue my visits for a little while, she perceptibly revives on my return—that I have noticed."

Digitized by Google

"Have you, then, had an understanding with Mrs. Carlson?," I felt myself called upon to ask.

"That is impossible," he exclaimed excitedly. "What shall I tell her? What can I tell her? We are as good as betrothed. She is an extraordinary woman; remarkably handsome, rich, highly cultivated—but a certain something she lacked always. She never bewitched me; never drew me into such a delicious whirlpool of all my senses as does this quiet, youthful creature whom I have before my mind's eye wherever I am; who has taken possession of my entire being. With that lady I still possessed the power of thinking; here I am entirely without will."

"But, as a man of honour, you owe that lady an explanation," I ventured to remind him. "Go bravely to Mrs. Carlson and tell her all."

"I cannot do it," he groaned.

"Then write to her, at least."

"That would be cowardly; I could not bring myself to do it."

"Then you will come to grief, and you may besides bring ruin to two good, noble beings," said I, and parted in very bad humour from a man who could allow passion thus to unman him.

A few days after this meeting I received a letter from Mrs. Carlson which ran as follows:

"I am in need of a friendly service, and have no one to whom I can apply to help me. Your manner, your face, inspire me with the courage to address you. Will you have the goodness to call on me at an early date? I rely on your knightliness.—Flora Carlson."

I hesitated not a moment to place myself at the disposition of the lady, took a carriage, and drove to her villa.

I found the beautiful widow looking yet more pale, and her eyes had a fixed, far-off expression, as though she had no concern with her immediate surroundings, but with something far, far away.

"Do not be surprised," said the lady, after she had thanked me for my readiness to serve her, and my quick response to her call, "if I demand something unusual of you. Were it an ordinary matter I had not troubled you. You are the only friend of Doctor Franzeen, perhaps his confidant—then you know more than I can tell you. In that case you are also a dear confidant to me. I take that for granted, and in this capacity I invoke your good offices. Please"—and she made an heroic effort to maintain her composure, but her voice became almost inaudible—"go to the widow of Essouf Pasha, and tell her you come as the messenger of Affarid Pasha—here is his card—and you wish to see Tenzilé. You are a judge of men and women, I know. Observe the girl carefully, and report to me what you think of her appearance and how she impressed you. I need not tell you more," she concluded, giving utterance to the words with apparent effort. "I only wish to know how the girl looks, and have not the courage or the strength to confront her."

This commission took me aghast. It seemed that she knew all. What was her object in sending me on this mission? Did she wish to become acquainted with her rival? How would that serve her? Did she desire to institute comparisons between that person and herself, and did she wish to be convinced of the possession of such superior charms on the side of the slave-girl, that the hope of successful rivalry would be vain; or did she hope that if the opposite were the case, the man, charmed only by external appearances, would see his error, and return to her? But the lady's character forbade her entertaining such thoughts, or meditating such deeds. What, then, was her motive for this curious mission? Her feelings were too deeply involved for the gratification of ordinary curiosity—that was proved by the emotion and excitement she displayed when acquainting me with her wishes; still, she was a woman, and possibly these motives, connected, would guide her actions.

These thoughts ran through my brain while she was speaking to me.

"I shall endeavour to carry out your wishes," I replied, "though their fulfilment is not without difficulty, for one cannot well so describe a person that a third party shall see that person as she really is."

"You are a man and an artist," she replied, "and I shall hear the truth from you. With a woman, if she were the nicest judge of human nature in the world, and an artist besides, I should have my doubts. Beings of our sex judge only men rightly—at least as far as they affect—" She seemed to want to say something more, but broke off. "I can depend on you," she concluded abruptly.

Full of conflicting emotions, I returned to the city—to the Mohammedan quarters.

The house of the pasha's widow I found east of the Atmeidan, in one of the small side streets that branch out from that place; it differed in no respect from the rest of the Turkish houses—the same irregularly situated windows, with wooden bars, and the same red-painted oaken doors, studded with great nails, with a massive knocker. I set the latter in motion, and the portal opened after some delay. I stepped into a small vestibule, which was partitioned in the middle by a wooden grating extending from floor to ceiling. Behind this wooden grating stood a black female servant, who demanded my business.

I explained to her my mission, and the negress disappeared. Presently she returned with a second, then came a third, and finally an elderly French woman, evidently a governess. Then ensued a long parley. The four ambassadresses came and went. At last a lady in European costume, with yellow, Turkish face, and sharp black eyes, appeared behind the grating, subjected me to a searching scrutiny from between the bars, heard my mention of the pasha's name, which was on the card I carried, looked at the Turkish words written on the card, and retired, after saying a few (to me) unintelligible words to one of the black servants.

The wooden grating opened, and, beckoning me to follow, the old negress ascended a narrow, dark, stone stairway. I groped my way up the steps, and again found myself before a wooden grating. This was opened by the negress with a key that hung from a steel chain around her neck, and, crossing a grotesquely-decorated dark hall, following on the heels of my black guard, I reached a large room, also dark. The negress went to a window, lifted a heavy curtain to admit light, and invited me by a gesture to wait there.

I now had leisure to look round in the large space. It was impressive in its baldness. The walls were painted in a bluish oil-colour, upon which were sketched, at regular distances, gaudy birds of Paradise, rocking themselves on chains of roses. On the walls hung a few oil-paintings, portraits of the Sultan, and of the German and Austrian Emperors; three quite modern Parisian sofas, a grand piano, and an enormous, gailycoloured paper lantern, suspended from the ceiling, completed the furniture of the room.

Digitized by Google

The Turkish lady presently returned, accompanied by the Frenchwoman, and introduced herself as the mistress of the house. She spoke very faulty French, and the governess was probably to act as interpreter. I signified to the widow that I could speak Turkish quite passably. She smiled pleasantly, scrutinised me still more critically out of her coal-black eyes, and pointed to a sofa opposite her.

"You wish to see Tenzilé?" began the widow, when we were seated.

"On commission," I hastened to say.

"Affarid Pasha wishes you to paint her portrait for a European lady, who is much interested in the excellent girl."

I was somewhat taken aback over my unexpected investment with the painter's skill—I am a sculptor—but quickly adapted myself to the situation, and said: "I believe such is the fact."

"Well," resumed the Turkish widow, "Affarid Pasha has opened negotiations with me for Tenzilé, whom he has known since her childhood. He is, as you are aware, thrifty; the sum for reimbursement of the outlays for her education seems to him too large, and he cannot make up his mind. It is quite contrary to our customs to paint the portrait of a young lady, unless it be destined for our most exalted lord, the sultan. However, I will make a special exception in favour of Affarid Pasha and his lady client. You shall be allowed to paint Tenzilé's portrait, but I cannot permit you to set foot in our house, be it for ever so brief a period, more than twice."

She made a sign to the French woman, who left the room and returned with a girl in Turkish dress.

"This is Tenzilé," said the widow.

The girl was loveliness itself—the incorporation of youth and beauty. There was in her personality something that moved the heart, yet ravished the senses; a slender, neat, yet full figure—such a figure as only an ancient Greek sculptor would succeed in copying and displaying as the apotheosis of the loveliest budding womanhood. The curly, undulating, golden-blonde hair; great, dreamy, black eyes; the finely-curved, gently-sloping nose; the oval face, with the faintest suspicion of yellow, with the full, sweet mouth, together completes the singular witchery of her appearance.

I now realised how my friend could have become intoxicated by the beauty of this child of a southern sun.

"The gentleman is to paint you, little daughter," explained the widow.

Tenzilé made a graceful courtesy, and a lovely blush spread over her cheek.

"I am not very pretty," she began in good French. "I have a yellow face; my friends, Serbe and Darie, are much prettier."

Her voice was wonderfully elastic and sweet.

"The gentleman has a commission to paint you for a Frankish lady, Tenzilé," the widow said; "he will only come twice, and you must, therefore, sit quite still," she added.

Tenzilé bent her head in assent.

"It will not trouble you long," I said, addressing myself to the beautiful slave; "I shall only make a flying sketch to-day, however," I continued, turning to the widow again, "it is necessary that I should converse with the young lady, for thus the soul, which must speak out of the face, reveals itself to us, and I beg your consent to that end."

The Pasha's widow consented.

Taking out my note-book, which for the nonce served as sketch-book, I sketched the outlines of the girl's face, meanwhile conversing with her on various topics. She showed a sharp intelligence and not uncommon knowledge, after the fashion of young, refined Frenchwomen, brought up in convents, and a childlike, affectionate heart. She observed me thoughtfully and with curiosity. Her puzzled, earnest, innocent expression filled me with sadness—almost with pain.

I could not bear to prolong the sitting. With deepest sympathy I took my leave of this girl, created to obey, unquestioning, the will of others.

I showed Mrs. Carlson—who, to judge from her expression, had waited for me impatiently—the sketch, and reported what I had seen, learned, felt, and thought, as calmly, dispassionately, and objectively as possible. She remained speechless while I spoke, then suddenly caught my hand, bent over it, and kissed it before I could draw it away—hot tears were on it when I did—then burying her face in her handkerchief she hurried from the room.

Sad at heart, I left the villa and walked home, wondering what was to come out of all this chaos.

I turned my steps towards the house of my friend. He was out; he had left his lodgings a few minutes before. But I found there a note addressed to me that was just to have been sent to me—its contents suited my plans and purposes.

"Dear friend," wrote Dr. Franzeen, "I feel very lonely. Will you come to-morrow? I hope you also have no engagement for the day. Shall we two forsaken ones spend the evening together in my quarters? I shall expect you if you do not at once decline the invitation."

The next day proved to be charming; it is true the heavens were overcast, but through the enveloping fog there shone a gentle sunlight that invested everything with a dreary aspect, the cupola-crowned houses of the great city, as well as the faded green hills and the gently murmuring waters.

I found my friend sitting at the piano, and was just in time to hear the last tones of a Beethoven sonata—he was a brilliant performer. Hearing me, he sprang up and greeted me, entirely unlike himself, with excitement and passionate warmth.

"If I had not that," and he pointed to his music, "I should have lost my reason ere this."

"Because you are parted from Flora?" I asked.

"Because I feel that I am acting irresponsibly towards that lady, and am facing an Oriental happiness—perhaps," he replied, half-musingly, half-inquiringly.

"It is not too late to call a halt and atone for your fault."

"I cannot tear myself away from the dream," he said, with a heavy breath; "it is only a dream that I realise, for I shall be unable to raise the sum demanded in the short time left me, and I have found out from the pasha's widow herself, that various grandees of the city, among them Affarid Pasha, are suitors for the girl. She will be taken from me, my hopes and wishes are as naught, and yet I cannot give her up. But do you imagine," he continued painfully, "that the lady would hail me as a prodigal son? Then you have but a poor insight into her character; it is pure, refined, and beaming like a diamond, but, in ethical matter, hard as that stone."

"The lady loves you," I asserted, "with the whole power of her noble, passionate soul."

Digitized by Google

"The less likely that she will lower herself by descending to my level."

"Do you believe you will be happy with the slave?" I now asked involuntarily, in an earnest, weighty tone.

"If for ever—that I do not know. But it would be an almost crushing happiness for years, and such years count a hundredfold," he replied passionately. "And you cannot count the greatest happiness by years; they are really only moments—continuous happiness would kill. But I shall never be able to call this girl my own—and I have lost a noble heart."

It had become dark while we talked, though we had not noticed it. It had seemed to me that I heard wheels halt before the house, and steps in the ante-room. Then all was still again. My friend was just going to his writing-table to fetch a light, when the door flew open, and a flood of light streamed into the room. Was it a fairy scene that met my eyes? Did our excited phantasies deceive us? Or were we dreaming with eyes wide open? In the open doorway, carrying a letter in her hand, stood Tenzilé.

I sprang to my feet, and Doctor Franzeen stood as though transfixed, with staring eyes, pale and trembling, with his hands raised as though to ward off an apparition.

At this moment an elderly woman, whom I recognised as the housekeeper of Mrs. Carlson, stepped from behind the girl, took from her the letter, and with the words: "From my mistress, for the Herr doctor," laid it in Franzeen's hand.

He looked at the letter, and opened it as if in a dream. For a long time he read, nor seemed to know what he was reading. Again and again he read. His pale face took on some colour, the light returned to his eyes, and sinking into a chair, he wept aloud.

The beautiful girl looked with affright at this singular man, and trembled perceptibly.

I did not deem it an indiscretion to pick up and read the letter. It was from Mrs. Carlson.

"Dearly Beloved Friend" (it ran),—"I have learned that you turned for happiness elsewhere than to me.

"My life-aim is your happiness, hence I have bought the girl that is to bring you this message to day in order that you may be reminded that I have loved you truly, deeply, and sincerely, and that I have placed your happiness above my own. My only wish is that you may make the lovely being happy, and that you may be made happy in your choice. Tenzilé will return with my servant to her former mistress, and will remain with her as your betrothed until the necessary formalities for the wedding have been arranged.—FLORA CARLSON."

While I was reading the letter, Dr. Franzeen had risen, and now stood calmly before the beautiful slave.

"You know what is contained in this letter?" he quietly asked.

"Yes," answered the girl; but with blushes suffusing her cheeks.

"You are satisfied with the destination the European lady has in view for you?"

"My duty is to obey," Tenzilé answered tremblingly.

"Do you follow duty's call in this case with love—with your heart?" Dr. Franzeen questioned further.

Tenzilé raised her eyes to his for a moment, fully and calmly, and said:

"Why should I not? I shall be to you a faithful servant."

"Not servant—my wife you are to be. Know you that?"

"It has been told me," came from her full, fine lips.

"And does not your heart leap with joy at the thought?" questioned Dr. Franzeen; "do you not feel a nameless happiness because of this?"

"I am rejoiced," said the girl.

"And if you had to belong to another man, would that make you unhappy?" the young physician continued slowly.

"Then I would serve him, as it is my duty to do."

"Gladly?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then you would not be unhappy if you could not belong to me?"

Tenzilé smiled. "I would gladly see in you my lord."

"You would not, however, feel unhappy, disconsolate, sad, if you could not belong to me?" persevered the young man.

"No," said Tenzilé, with the same smile.

The conversation had been carried on in the Turkish language. My friend now turned to me.

"The dream is over," he said. "I thought myself beloved. The girl belongs to another world than the one in which we live. She is a beautiful image, a beautiful plaything, but no wife for a Christian. Even if the letter and the mode of action of Mrs. Carlson had not already opened my eyes to a revelation, what nobility there may be in a woman, what she may be capable of, the purity of her love, the last few moments have torn from my eyes the veil that passion and intoxication of the senses wove over them. I go to throw myself at the feet of that woman, and to beg her forgiveness. This is the second time she has proved my saviour."

"Josepha," he continued, addressing the elderly companion of the girl, "do you go back to your mistress, conduct this pretty child to her, and tell her that I shall be with her in a few minutes to express my thanks."

Smiling sweetly, Tenzilé took her leave and disappeared with the housekeeper. Darkness again fell upon the room.

"You will excuse me?" asked Doctor Franzeen; "I shall attempt to obtain forgiveness," he added simply.

"I know that you will find it."

We parted with a long pressure of the hands, that said more than words could have expressed, and I returned to my lodgings.

I might have been at home an hour when I heard a carriage stop before the house, and in a few minutes Mrs. Carlson's little grey-headed English servant stood before me with an invitation to come to the villa as quickly as possible, and to make use of the carriage she had sent.

I ran down to the carriage in such haste that the old fellow could scarcely keep up with me.

Stepping into the drawing-room I found Mrs. Carlson and Dr. Franzeen standing, hand in hand, with that bliss shining from their eyes that only such moments can bring forth; bliss such as probably no human twain experience a second time in this life. On the table was the letter that Tenzilé had borne. The young girl had already returned to her former mistress.

How the reconciliation took place I never had a precise account. Dr. Franzeen merely hinted that he had said about the same thing to her that he had in the room to me—for that was all that at the moment he could think of. When he stepped into the lady's room and exclaimed: "Forgive me! forgive me! I have dreamed a hasheesh dream, but am now awake, and see but you alone in this world!" Mrs. Carlson fainted and lay senseless in his arms. At last she opened her eyes wide, looked deeply and gravely into his, lovingly put her arms about his neck and pressed her lips to his.

T. E.

Digitized by Google

THIS is in the nature of a personal explanation. A long time ago I wrote a story which met with a certain degree of success; my friends and the reading public who greeted that so kindly have often asked why my pen has since been silent, and to them I make this confession—that the success of that story was equivocal. There was an under side to it, and an aftermath, and lines written between the lines, and parts of it were written with invisible, but indelible characters on the tablets of my heart.

Have you ever written a story? But of course you have—everyone has, nowadays; so you know, each of you, the swelling of the mind, gestant with great thoughts—how certain you were, when you began, that you had something to say, and how feeble our poor vehicle of expression seemed before the importance of it. Then, when finally written out in our common everyday phraseology, that glimmering of doubt: perhaps it was not the very first time that the same thing had been said: perhaps—but perish the thought!—it has been even better said before. Never mind. Though, poor thing, it is thine own now, and none else will ever know how you yearn over that bantling of your brain.

Thus with my story, as I thought it and planned it. Then, when circumstances compelled the changing of it all—but I anticipate.

My most intimate friend at that time was Fred Phillips, a young physician of much talent, but few patients. That is how my desk happened to be in his office, and how I chanced to allow him to work out some of the minor details of my story.

In the beginning, I had determined that my work should be of the realistic school. So, in order that all my portraiture should be true to life, after the heroine was fashioned "fair and so slenderly." Fred's professional knowledge was availed of to carry her through a long and interesting illness, and at the last to allow her to die in a rational and logical manner.

"I do not quite like the idea," he had said. "I see enough of that sort of thing"—the fact was, Fred's patients did die, mostly—"and I would much rather show how our art can be employed in assisting Nature at the last ditch."

"No, that won't do; this is to be a model of realism, and I don't want any fiction in it, except so much as is necessary to carry the idea," I replied.

"All right," replied Fred; "I will do the best I can for you. I won't draw a case from real life—from my own practice—for that would be unprofessional, but I will diagnose a case as it might be, and kill the patient off in a manner with which no one can find fault." I did not like his flippancy of tone very well, but I knew Fred could be of real use to me if he would, so I overlooked it.

My story was published in the Family Omnibus, as a serial. The publication had finally reached that point, where, after sundry convalescences and relapses, it could be clearly seen that the heroine was on the final down-grade.

On the evening of the day upon which the instalment appeared that settled this, Fred came into the office in a state of great excitement. Thinking it possible that he had been called to attend a patient, I congratulated him upon his change of luck, and quoted a certain proverb, to the effect that, "patient waiters, etc."

"Hang your proverbs!" he cried, rudely interrupting before I had finished. "This matter concerns yourself, as well as me. You must change that confounded story."

"Change our story?" I asked in astonishment.

"Our story?" he retorted. "I wash my hands of it. I shall be lucky if I can undo the harm that you have already done by it."

Harm! The story was as wholesome in tone as any combination of words that could possibly be formed. It could not harm even the most unsophisticated of novel-readers. I began to wonder if Fred's mind were not unsettled by his long waiting for the practice that never came. Yet I was too incensed to waste much sympathy on him.

"Will you be good enough to explain?" I asked icily. "That is, provided you are sane enough to know what you are talking about."

"Sane?" he answered. "I am sane enough now. I wish I had been as much so when you persuaded me to join in your confounded plot. But we must not quarrel, old fellow," he said, with some show of contrition. "I did not mean to use big words, but this matter is of the utmost importance; we must work together in it."

Digitized by Google

His matter impressed me with the genuineness of his own emotion, if not with the importance of his case, whatever that might prove to be; so I sat down again and made ready to listen to him.

He took a chair opposite, with his arms spread out on the table between us, as if mutely imploring my aid and forbearance. After a moment's silence, which he evidently thought to make impressive, he began:

"She is the most beautiful creature!"

"Who is the most beautiful creature?" I asked impatiently, as he came to a full stop.

"Ah! I forgot. You don't know her. Madge Wilmerdale."

Madge Wilmerdale! I fairly sprang from my chair in amazement. Clearly, the fellow was crazy. Madge Wilmerdale was the name of my heroine. It flashed upon me that the glorious creation of my imagination had in some curious manner become endowed to him with a corporeal being. How grand, yet how sad a testimony, to the skill with which I had wrought! I gazed upon my friend with eyes moist with sympathy for his misfortune, while yet my heart bounded with exaltation. Fred glanced up and divined the meaning of my look.

"Pshaw!" he exclaimed pettishly. "Don't stare at me in that way. I don't mean your pen-and-ink Madge, but the real flesh-and-blood one."

Poor boy! he really believed in her. I would humour his hallucination, and thus gain time to determine what was best to do.

"Is there a flesh-and-blood one?" I asked, feigning amazement as best I could.

"Yes; but I can't say how long there will be if this goes on."

"Can't say how long there will be?" I echced.

"Man alive," he cried excitedly, "can't you do something besides repeat my words? Yes—I don't know how long there will be, if this goes on."

"If what goes on?" I asked, with a show of submission.

"That confounded story!"

"But what can I do about it?"

"Burn the thing."

"Why?"

"Because you are killing the real Madge with your outrageous details of the approaching death of the fictitious one."

Really, I thought, his hallucination is wonderfully complete; but I answered:

"Oh! you are giving me too much credit. I may say, with becoming modesty, that I know the story is a strong one; but that it can excite such emotions as will endanger life——"

"Emotions be hanged! Miss Wilmerdale is impressed with the belief that this story is drawn from life. The diagnosis that I was fool enough to invent for you happens to be exactly the same as that made in her own case. In watching the progress of the story, she fancies that she sees her own fate foreshadowed. It is a pathological curiosity—or would be, if it were not so wretchedly sad—that her condition grows better or worse in exact correspondence with that of the fictitious Madge."

Fred said all this with such quiet seriousness that I began to doubt the correctness of my first suspicions. Could it be that he had accidentally run across such a curious parallel?

"How did you happen to become cognisant of this precious analogy?" I asked.

"I was summoned by Mrs. Wilmerdale this morning, to consult regarding her daughter's condition. She had already been to the editor of the Omnibus, to discover the address of the author of the story. Denman refused to give that without your authority; but, knowing our relations, he advised her to consult me. I found that the daughter is firmly convinced that, whatever the fate of your Madge shall be, hers will be the same. I have pledged myself that the closing chapters find the heroine restored to health. You must help me make that pledge good."

After all, Fred was not crazy—only Quixotic. I was glad to know that, but of course my story could not be mutilated just for a girl's whim.

"It is all nonsense," I said, "to talk about changing the entire plot, just to humour a sick girl's fancy."

"It is not a mere fancy. I have long been satisfied that the mental condition often exerts a vast influence over the physical condition of a patient. Of course, I have not told Miss Wilmerdale that the death of this fictitious Madge is already arranged; but I have said to her mother that if I found it to be so it should be changed."

"It strikes me," I answered warmly, "that you have taken an unwarranted liberty in doing so. Even though the story is having this effect upon one susceptible reader, of which I am not wholly sure, I cannot see that I am responsible."

"Then you refuse to do anything? You will risk becoming a murderer for the sake of your own petty ambition?" Fred was losing his temper again.

"I have not said that; but I want time to investigate."

"There is no time to lose. The next number of the Omnibus will be issued the day after to-morrow. If you do not agree to change the story, I must take the other alternative and enjoin its further publication."

Now I knew that Fred was just foolish and hot-headed enough to take such a step as that, so I began to use diplomacy.

"Well, I will see Denman to-night and consult with him about the matter. I will make no promise yet; and it seems worth while——"

* * * * *

But the matter-of-fact editor put the affair in a new light.

"Says he will serve an injunction, does he? That would be the very best thing that could happen for us. Of course the injunction would not hold; it might cause a delay of a few weeks before we could resume publication of the story. If it did, I should report the matter fully in our columns and comment on it editorially. When we resumed the thing, it would sell like wild-fire."

After a moment, he continued: "I think, Mr. Morton, we had better get the M.S. all ready to issue in book form. Write a new preface, and we will put it on the market the day we print the last instalment. Such an opportunity must not be neglected. This affair is going to be a huge advertisement for you and for the Omnibus."

He rubbed his hands gleefully at the thought of the shekels that would soon be flowing through them.

I left the editorial room in a most uncertain frame of mind. I could not well afford to lose this chance of literary fame and fortune. I knew only too well how difficult it was to strike the tide at its flood, and had been working a long while to get my foot firmly on even the lowest round of the ladder. Now that I found myself ready to climb, must I kick the ladder from under me?

Digitized by Google

The matter-of-fact editor.

Just then a brilliant thought struck me. From Denman I had learned Mrs. Wilmerdale's address. I would call upon her.

I found her, with her daughter, occupying a handsome house in the western suburbs. My card requested that I might see Mrs. Wilmerdale alone. I did not care to reveal myself to the living Madge until I had resolved upon my line of action.

A graceful, pretty little old lady came forward to welcome me, asking, with an air that betrayed little interest, to what she was indebted for the honour of my visit. But the lack of interest in voice and manner vanished completely when I made myself known.

"Ah, sir, you are so good to come!" said she. "Dr. Phillips told us that he would use his influence. I know you have come to give us some hope."

I might have yielded at once, if it had not been for that unfortunate reference to Phillips. I had not yet forgiven him for his high-handed interferences, so, manlike, I retaliated upon this woman.

"I don't know, Mrs. Wilmerdale. You have asked something that is very difficult. If none of the story had been printed, it would be very different; and, you know, I have not any evidence that the matter is so important as you seem——"

"Ah," she interrupted, "you have not seen Madge. But you will see her? Then you will know." She clasped her hands appealingly before me, as if I held the balance of life and death.

And so I saw Madge Wilmerdale.

If ever, in all this world, a young girl—but what is the use of repeating? You remember the description of the other Madge as she was upon her eighteenth birthday?

Well, here was the creature of my fancy—the real rivalling the ideal.

At that moment I felt some genuine respect for the genius that had enabled me to limn so perfect a portrait from the mere filaments of my brain. But, on the instant, I was stricken to the heart that it should have been so true; for here was not only the perfect physical beauty that I had portrayed, and the beauty of soul as well, showing through those blue soul's windows, but here, too, were that hectic flush, and the sharp, quick cough that were the precursors of the inevitable end, when this beauty must perish, and be as dust.

When we were again alone I turned to Mrs. Wilmerdale.

"Is there no hope?" I asked.

"No one can help her but you, Mr. Morton. The physician can do nothing further."

The answer brought me back to myself.

"You fully believe, then, that she follows the course of the other—the fictitious Miss Wilmerdale?"

"As surely as night follows day."

"Then I can make but one answer. All that lies in my power shall be done. But—may I ask a favour, Mrs. Wilmerdale?"

"You cannot ask any that I shall not grant joyfully, if you do this thing."

"Then may I read the conclusion of my story to your daughter in advance of its publication?"

The lady gave me a quick glance—I fancied to see if she could discover my purpose, and if she might trust me—and nodded her assent.

That night I worked hard. I cut and hewed and hacked at that story. I ransacked Fred's library to make myself more familiar with the pathology of the dread disease. In an hour my heroine was convalescing—on paper. By daybreak she was well.

I was asleep on the office lounge when Fred came in and awakened me.

"So you have changed your mind," he said sneeringly. "I was up there last night after you left. You were easily converted."

"Who would not be, at the sight of that glorious creature?" I retorted.

"You have been at work already," he said, glancing about at my disordered papers.

"Yes; I am going up this afternoon to read the M.S. to them."

"Don't you think I had better go over it first, and see that you maintain some semblance of logic? You will have the critics down on you, if you are not careful."

"That for the critics now!" I cried, snapping my fingers.

"Well, as Miss Wilmerdale's physician, I warn you to be careful. Any undue excitement, sudden or false hopes held out, might prove very disastrous."

This was a change of tune, but I said nothing. It was part of my plain to be careful. I had as good an excuse now as had Fred for being admitted to the society of the Wilmerdales, and I did not propose to throw away my season-ticket for a single entertainment.

That afternoon I took with me a single chapter of the revised M.S.

Digitized by Google

Madge was half reclining upon an easy lounge as I entered.

"Your mother tells me," I began, "that you are good enough to be interested in the story that I am publishing in the Omnibus, and I have thought it might amuse you to hear a portion of it in advance of publication; especially as my heroine has borrowed your name."

"You are the author, then, of the tale?" she asked sadly. "I would indeed be glad to hear the rest of the story, if I may. Because," she added, in a lower tone, that her mother might not hear, "because I doubt if I shall be able to read the finish when it is published."

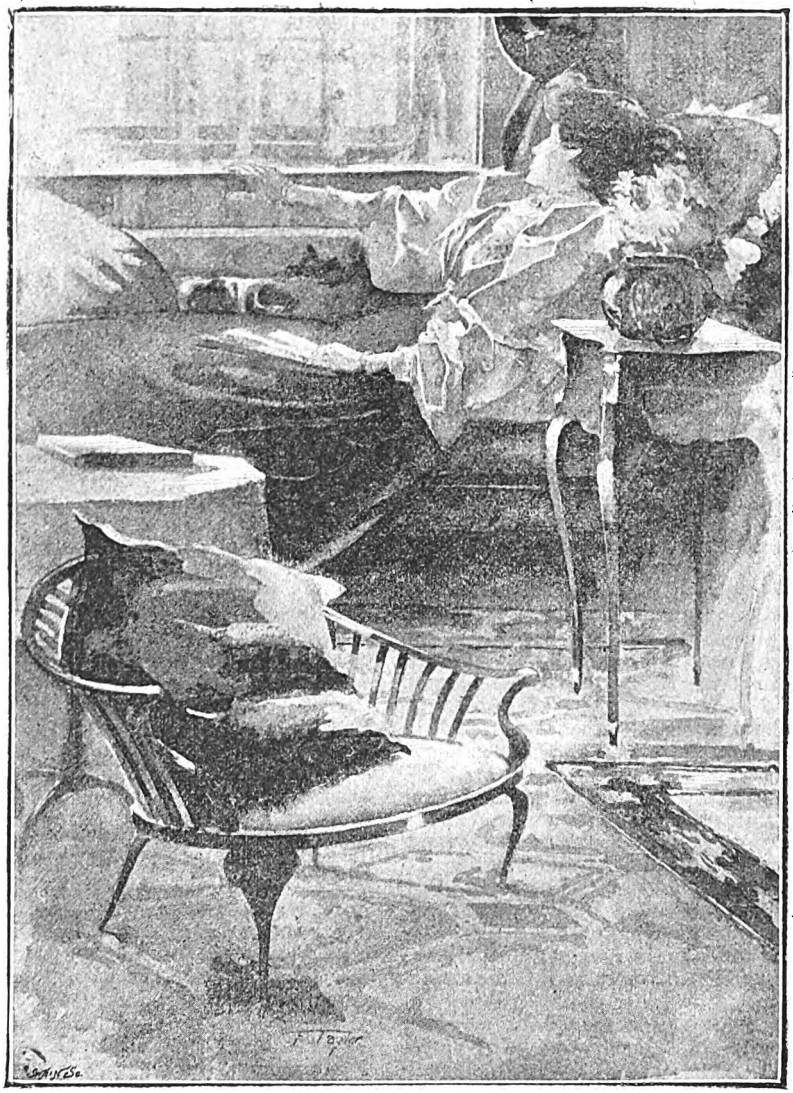
I sat beside her for half-an-hour and read, and when I had finished, there was a new light in her face. I fancied it was the light of renewed hope.

"Will the heroine live or die, Mr. Morton?" she asked.

"I wish I could tell you," I answered. "An author is sometimes as much in doubt as anyone regarding the future of his characters. But while there is life there is hope," I added lightly, "and because she is your namesake, Miss Wilmerdale, I hope her story may have a happy ending."

"I hope so, too," she said, with a most pathetic eagerness.

I controlled myself, and did not allow the story to progress too rapidly. At the end of a month, I went to her with the last chapters. Both the real and the fictitious Madge had improved wonderfully in that time. and the real one met me at the door, with a light step and merry laugh.



Madge was half reclining upon an easy lounge as I entered.

Fred Phillips was there, too, and he came forward and nodded to me more pleasantly than had lately been his habit. He was a frequent visitor at the house, keeping up the pretence of medical counsel; but it happened that we rarely met there.

He asked permission to remain and hear the final chapters read, and while I was not glad to have him, I could not well refuse.

With my audience of Madge, Fred, and Mrs. Wilmerdale, I read to the close. When I had finished, all joined in congratulating me; and Madge, with moist eyes, especially thanked me for what I had done for her. There was never any direct allusion between us as to just what that was, but of course it was perfectly understood.

I had meant to ask Madge a question at the close. That was, what reward should my heroine give to the man who had saved her life? I thought that I might, perhaps, make another chapter to the story if her answer suited me. But, with the others about, of course I did not ask it.

Mrs. Wilmerdale seemed to divine the situation, and put the question to me.

"Marry him," spoke up Fred, before anyone else could reply.

Surprised at finding an ally in such an unexpected quarter, I turned to thank him with a look, at the same time putting out a hand towards Madge to draw her to me, determined to tell her now how much I loved her.

Somehow, Fred seemed to guess my intention; he put himself between us and looked up at me laughingly.

"She has already consented," he said. "Congratulate us, Bob; we have been engaged for an hour." J. K. R.

Digitized by Google

LABBY BOY'S WIN.

THE TRUE STORY OF A HORSERACE.

SURELY I had been dreaming! That prawn curry cooked à la Madrossi—"all same Madras boberchie cooking, sahib," as my Kitmutghar used to say—had made me drowsy. That's the way with these seductive curries; first one does not care for them overmuch, then one can eat curry three times a day and feel none the worse; next comes the time when they send one to sleep as though he had been poppy fed. This was the poppy time with me, and the whisky and soda at tiffin had not bettered it much.

Yes, just in the middle of my cheroot I had dropped off, sitting there in an easy-chair. The cheroot had cheerfully dived its red nose into my jarahm coat, and a hole like a bullet puncture bore testimony to the efficacy of the prawn curry and whisky-soda tiffin as a sedative.

Ye gods! how cool the verandah was to be sure; and how hot the bleaching sun over there against the white walls of the other hotel.

No man wakes under these circumstances without a cause; and so it must have been something unusual that did rouse me.

Ah! there it was again—there could be no doubt about that—my sporting ear had caught a low-toned conversation anent the pony races which were on.

I closed my eyes and went right on sleeping. I knew that I was asleep, for I heard one of the men say so presently.

"Don't talk so loud, Gomez," I heard an English voice say; "that fellow in the chair will hear you if you keep on talking like that."

"He is too far that side," replied Gomez in his best chee-chee baht (half-caste talk).

I was sleeping more soundly than ever now—I snored.

"Now don't you make any mistake about getting the money on," continued the English voice. "Labby Boy is fit to do the trick hands down, and, besides, I ride him, you see, and I'll take care that they never get near me. I've been put in to make the runnin', and I'll make it, and don't you forget it," and he chuckled like a cockatoo over thick cream.

The Lucknow Spring Races were on, albeit it was early for spring as understood of this country, being as yet February.

Labby Boy—and by the same token his name wasn't Labby Boy at all, though it began with an "L;" but even after nine years it is better that he read his history through another halter, and ditto the jockey, and ditto the owner, Lord George—was in the big handicap for Arabs, and had a rank outsider's chance.

I was a long way from being on velvet myself, in fact, I was on the commonest kind of cotton as far as having any of the bookies' money to go on with. They had cleared me out, and I was in no end of a hole. We had brought down a flyer from Migabad, and he had left us all stone broke. He was no good in the company he met at Lucknow.

Now I saw my way to getting some of it back, for I knew the speaker, "Tim" Doyle, was one of the best riders and judges in India.

So I slept hard and prayed that I might not sneeze or cough.

"Just keep your eye open and your mouth shut," he continued, "and when you see it say 20 to 1, you just nibble a little here and there, and don't give it away by being too anxious. Get the money all on and sit tight."

A gharry crawled up to the door, and the strong-voiced driver ceased to urge the ponies, which were not strong, and they stopped. "Tim," and his friend Gomez, the half-caste, got in; the variously dished wheels meandering in and out; the gharry wallah poured a volley of chronological abuse into the flapping ears of the hide-bound rats harnessed to the old trap upon which he sat; there was the flack, flack, of the whip, and they disappeared in the white heat out on the roadway.

Then I woke up.

I, too, took a gharry to the racecourse. I was in no hurry, so it did not matter; besides it was too hot to walk.

Ordinarily I should have been able to describe the races—how the game little Arab ponies, silver, golden, chesnut and blood bays fought it out on that beautiful green sward track, with its three-quarter mile straight run in; but that day my business was with the bookies.

I had received a providential tip, and if I played it well—as well as I had often played a horse I knew nothing about—I should not have to hand in my papers. I watched three races in the paddock and the stand inclosure. The bookies had won about a flour bag full of money each, which was about their usual form on an Indian course, where everybody plays his money on the horse and the bookmakers play theirs on the owner.

I made no move about Labby Boy. I knew better than to try and forestall Tim and his friend. When I saw the money going on from the right quarter, it would be quite time enough for mine, I knew.

The next race was the Bagdad Plate. That was Labby Boy's race. There were a half-dozen other Arabs in it. Problem and Young Jawan were about equal favourites, and the race was thought to be between them. They had met before down at the Calcutta meet, and Young Jawan had beaten Problem.

Problem was Labby Boy's stable companion, both being in Lord George's stable. So I knew that Tim was speaking from the book when he said that Labby Boy could do the trick.

"Six to four the field!" yelled "Parson" Britton, the tall, sanctimonious-faced bookmaker.

There was a rush among the betters to "get on." In a minute the cry all down the line of bookmakers was: "Five to four Problem, two to one Young Jawan!" They were backing Problem.

Digitized by Google

Then I saw Lord George go down the line, notebook in hand. Then Problem was cut again; six to four on now, and I knew that Lord George was having a plunge.

There was a small army of small betters following Lord George up, and soon Problem was backed off the boards. All the money was for these two, Problem and Young Jawan, so the others travelled out in the betting; it was 20 to 1 the others and take your pick, Labby Boy, Silver Tail, Shahbaz, and the lot.

I was standing close to Millar and Britton's stand, for I knew that Gomez would make his first play to get the money on there, as they were the big bookmakers.

But I could not understand it at all. If Labby Boy was fit to do the trick, why did not Lord George know it? He and his friends were simply piling their money on Problem. Problem was always supposed to be a better horse than Labby Boy, too. But it was just this sort of reasoning that had nearly broken me already at the meeting. So I determined to follow this strong lead if I caught it in time, and let reason go to the dogs. I meant taking a regular flyer; if it came off, I should be able to pay up all round; if not—well, other men have had to send in their papers before.

Presently I saw Gomez edge up to where Britton was laying the odds.

I did not catch what Gomez said, but I heard Britton say: "Yes, 20 to 1, and he's a dead sure winner; 2,000 to 100; I'll lay you twice," and he looked as solemn as a judge, thinking how he would like to scoop in a couple of hundred from this innocent looking half-caste.

I saw Gomez shove up a couple of crisp bank-notes, and I didn't wait for anything further.

I went over to my friend Little Archer, who had bested me all through the meeting, and I made glad his heart with the money I piled on this "dead-un," as he called it. He laid me the odds freely, and chaffed me more freely still. "Did Lord George tell you," he said, "or did your dhoby (washerwoman)?"

He was happy, for Lord George had backed the other with him, and he looked on my investment as just so much money found.

"Don't put your friends on to it, or they'll break me," he laughed, as I started off, and then I went back and booked him another 1,000 to 50, just to teach him manners.

The betting was pretty well over by this time, for the horses were down at the post. I could see that Gomez had been down along the line of bookies, for Labby Boy had been cut a few points with some of them.

I went up in the grand stand, for I thought I should like to see this sort of thing of which I had no understanding.

"They're off!" cried someone, and a dozen voices repeated it.

It was two miles, so there would be plenty of time for observation.

At the start Silver Tail cut out the space at a clinking gait. He opened up a gap between himself and the others, and Lord George smiled.

This was as he had ordered it. Silver Tail was also in the same interest, a subsidised interest, being owned by a brother officer in the 101st Lancers, Lord Clapperton.

I could see Labby Boy lying next, and then came Problem and Young Jawan together.

Silver Tail had cut it out so lively that at the three-quarters he was done. Then Labby Boy went on, and took up the running. This also was as Lord George had ordered it, and Problem was keeping his place back with Young Jawan.

That was the programme just as it was being carried out, and Problem was to come away at the finish and win.

Lord George looked round and saw me standing just behind him.

"Have you got anything on him?" he asked.

"Yes, quite a lot," I replied discreetly.

He smiled approvingly. "You're all right," he said, "he'll win it hands down," thinking of Problem.

"I hope so," I added, thinking of Labby Boy.

At the mile Labby Boy had a long lead; at the mile and a half it was longer.

People began to look grave.

Why didn't Bung shake Problem up? Why didn't he come away? But those were his orders—to stay behind with Young Jawan.

When they turned into the straight, Labby Boy still had a tremendous lead. The others were coming now, fast, fast, and faster. Problem and Young Jawan were racing neck and neck. The jockeys were straining every nerve. The beautiful Arabs, dark bays both of them, were galloping side by side like two brothers—like the two horses of a matched pair; a blanket would have covered them both.

It was the race of a lifetime. Nose and nose they raced; low to the ground they thundered along. But the other, Labby Boy—would they catch him?

Lord George's face was serious enough now. I heard him say softly behind his blonde moustache: "Good heavens; look at Labby Boy. The very devil's in the horse. He's running away with Tim."

And so it seemed. It looked as though Tim were trying to come back to his horses now. Of course he could not take a direct pull at him, for Labby Boy and Problem were running under different owners' names, though they were really in the same interest—Lord George's.

Nine out of every ten of the men in that stand had their money either on Problem or Young Jawan. They were running neck and neck still, but here was this outsider, Labby Boy, who had made all the running and should have been beaten off by this time, according to all the ethics of racing, still in the lead—many lengths in the lead.

And so they flashed by the stand, Labby Boy lasting out to get home in front, with Problem drawing into second place, a length ahead of Young Jawan.

Then a great silence fell on the stand. Only the bookies had won and two others. But that was Gomez's secret and mine.

Anger and consternation made a racecourse of Lord George's face. He stood on the steps of the stand, just by the weighing scales, and said in a loud voice, with plenty of passion in it; "No more Tim Doyle for me!" But that was his way.

When Tim came in to weigh, there was a scene, for Lord George was the last man in the world to pocket anything like that quietly.

"I only obeyed orders, my lord," said Tim. "My orders were to take up the running from Silver Tail, and make it as far and as strong as I could, and I did so, and Labby Boy got home first; and that's all I know about it."

And I'm wondering if it was. Perhaps Gomez could say.

H. SADLER.

Digitized by Google

The Traitor.

IN the little village of Padron, in Galicia, during the French invasion, lived Garcia de Paredes, a crabbed old bachelor and licensed apothecary. It was on a cold and unpleasant night in autumn, about ten o'clock, that a silent group of shadows came into the square known to-day as the Plaza de la Constitution. They were going towards Garcia de Paredes' apothecary shop, which had been securely closed since nine.

"What are we going to do?" asked one of the shadows.

"Break in the door," suggested a woman.

"And kill them," growled many voices.

"I will take care of the apothecary," said a little fellow.

"They say that more than twenty Frenchmen are taking supper with him to-night."

"Ah, if it were in my house! Three, billeted upon me, I have thrown into the well."

"And I," said a monk, in a flute-like voice, "have smothered two captains by leaving burning charcoal in their cell, which was mine before."

"And that wretch of an apothecary protects them!"

"Who would have thought it of Garcia de Paredes? It is not a month since he was the most valiant, the most patriotic, the most loyal man in the town."

"And to-night he is going to the French officers."

"Let us wait awhile," suggested an old man; "then we will enter, and not one of them shall be left alive."

While these manifestations were occurring at the door of the pharmacy, Garcia de Paredes and his guests pursued the god of pleasure with ardour.

Garcia de Paredes was about forty-five years of age. He was tall and as yellow as a mummy. His bald head shone with a phosphorescent lustre, and his black eyes, deep sunken under shaggy brows, were like mountain-imprisoned lakes that threaten sullenly.

The food was abundant, the wine good, the conversation animated. The Frenchmen laughed, sang, smoked, ate and drank at the same time. Garcia de Paredes joked, perhaps, even more than anyone else, and so eloquent had he been in favour of the imperial cause, that the soldiers of Napoleon had embraced him, praised him, and improvised songs in his honour.

"Señors," the apothecary had said, "the war that we Spaniards are waging is as stupid as needless. You sons of the Revolution came to rescue Spain from her traditional lethargy; to dissipate her religious shadows; to reconcile her ancient customs; and to teach her those useful truths that there is no God and no other life, and that penitence, abstinence, chastity, and other Catholic virtues are but Quixotic absurdities, improper and unnecessary for a civilised people; that Napoleon is the true Messiah, the redeemer of the people, the friend of humanity. Señors, may the Emperor live as long as I have to live!"

"Hurrah! Bravo!" cried the Frenchmen.

The apothecary bowed his head with an expression of unspeakable pain. Quickly he raised it as firm as before. He drank a glass of wine, and went on:

"An ancestor of mine, Garcia de Paredes, a barbarous fellow, a Samson, a Hercules, killed two hundred Frenchmen in one day. I think it was in Italy. You see he was not so fond of the French as I am. The King himself made him a knight, and he was more than once on guard at the Quirinal, when Alexander Borgia was Pope. Ha! ha! You didn't think I came of such distinguished ancestors. Well, this Diego Garcia de Paredes, this ancestor of mine, who has an apothecary for a descendant, captured Coszenza and Manfredonia, took Cerinolia by assault, and fought honourably at the battle of Pavia. There we made a King of France prisoner, and his sword has been in Madrid nearly three centuries, until we were robbed of it nearly three months ago by that son of an innkeeper, Murat, who is in command of your army."

Here the apothecary made another pause. Some of the Frenchmen were going to reply to him; but he, rising, and enforcing silence by his gesture, seized a glass convulsively and exclaimed, in a voice of thunder:

"I give you a toast, gentlemen: Hurrah for the Frenchmen of Francis the First and of Napoleon Bonaparte!"

"Hurrah!" cried the invaders, acknowledging their satisfaction. All drained their glasses.

About that time a noise was heard in the street, or, rather, at the shop door.

"Did you hear that?" asked the Frenchmen.

Garcia de Paredes smiled.

"They are coming to kill me," he said.

"Who?"

"My neighbours."

"What for?"

Digitized by Google

"Because I am a French sympathiser. Several nights ago they surrounded my house. But what difference does that make to us? On with the feast!"

"Yes, on with it!" exclaimed the guests. "We are here to defend you." And, clinking the bottles and glasses, they shouted together: "Hurrah for Napoleon! Death to Ferdinand! Death to Castile!"

Garcia de Paredes waited till the toast was drunk, and then said in a mournful tone:

"Celedonio!"

The shop boy thrust his head through a small door. He dared not enter that inner room.

"Celedonio, bring some ink and paper," said the apothecary calmly.

The boy soon returned with the writing materials.

"Sit down," said the master, "and write the figures I will give you. Make two columns. At the head of the column at the right place, Debit, and at the head of the other, Credit."

"Señor," stammered the boy, "there is a mob at the door, crying 'Kill the apothecary!'"

"Be quiet. Leave them alone, and write what I tell you."

The Frenchmen laughed with admiration to see the pharmacist occupied in adjusting his accounts even while surrounded by death and ruin.

"Let us see, señors," said Garcia de Paredes. "We will finish our feast with a single toast. You—Captain—tell me—how many Spaniards have you killed since crossing the Pyrenees?"

"I," replied the Captain, arrogantly, twirling his moustache—— "I have killed—personally—with my sword—ten or perhaps twelve."

"Eleven, at the right," cried the apothecary, speaking to the boy.

The boy repeated, after writing:

"Debit, eleven."

"And you?" continued Garcia de Paredes, "I speak to you, Señor Julio."

"I—six."

"And you, Commandant?"

"I—twenty." "I—eight." "I—fourteen." "I—none." "I—don't know. I fired with my eyes shut." And so on, each one in his turn.

"Let me see, now, Captain," continued Garcia de Paredes. "We will begin again with you. How many Spaniards do you expect to kill during the remainder of the war, supposing it to last—say three years?"

"Oh—well, call it eleven."

"Eleven to the left!" dictated Garcia de Paredes, and Celedonio repeated:

"Credit, eleven!"

"And you?" inquired the apothecary, in the same order as before.

"I—fifteen." "I—twenty." "I—one hundred." "I—one thousand." And so on replied the Frenchmen.

"Divide them by ten, Celedonio," murmured the apothecary ironically, "and add each column separately."

At the end of a breathless silence, Celedonio, turning towards his master, read as follows:

"Debit, two hundred and eighty-five; credit, two hundred."

"That is to say," said Garcia de Paredes, "two hundred and eighty-five killed and two hundred sentenced to death. Total, four hundred and eighty-five victims."

At this moment the outer door of the shop was broken in.

"What time is it?" asked the apothecary, with the greatest composure.

"Eleven o'clock. But don't you hear them coming?"

"Let them come; it is time."

"Time!—for what?" murmured the Frenchmen, trying to rise. But they were so intoxicated they were unable to leave their chairs. "Let them come!" they cried, however, grasping their sabres with great difficulty and vainly endeavouring to get upon their feet.

Below in the shop was heard the noise of the crowd, and above the clamour rang out the unanimous and terrible cry:

"Death to the traitor!"

Garcia de Paredes, hearing that cry, sprang up as though electrified.

"Let them enter!" he shouted. "Open the door! Let them all come and see how a descendant of a soldier of Pavia can die."

The Frenchmen, terrified, stupefied, riveted to their chairs by an unconquerable lethargy, believing that the death of which the Spaniards spoke was about to enter the room, made desperate efforts to lift their sabres, which were lying on the table; but their fingers were unable to grasp the hilts.

At this moment the crowd poured into the room. There were more than fifty men and women armed with cudgels, daggers, and pistols, and all uttering wild cries.

"Kill them all!" shouted some of the women.

"Hold!" thundered Garcia de Paredes, with such a tone, such an attitude, such a look, that his cry, combined with the immovability and silence of the Frenchmen, infused a cold terror in the crowd.

"Put up your daggers," continued the apothecary, with a failing voice. "I have done more than you for my country. I have played the traitor—and—now you see the twenty officers of the invaders. Don't touch them; they are poisoned."

A cry of terror and admiration issued from the breasts of the Spaniards. They moved a step nearer to the guests, the greater part of whom were already dead, with their heads fallen forward, their arms outstretched upon the table, and their hands yet on the hilts of their swords.

"Hurrah for Garcia de Paredes!" then shouted the Spaniards, surrounding the dying hero.

"Celedonio," murmured the pharmacist, "the opium is all gone. Send to Corunna for opium."

Then he fell upon his knees.

Only at that did the neighbours perceive that the apothecary was also poisoned.

Then you might have seen a picture as impressive as it was dreadful. Women, sitting on the floor, were supporting in their arms the expiring patriot. The men had caught up the candles from the tables, and, on their knees, were lighting up that group of patriotism and affection. Twenty dead or dying were in the shadow, some of whom were falling to the floor, with horrifying thuds.

And at each dying gasp that he heard, at the fall of each Frenchman to the floor, a smile of glory illumined the face of Garcia de Paredes. A little later his spirit took flight.

PEDRO DE ALARCON.

Digitized by Google

The Cardinal's Watch.

In Rome, my performances created a great sensation. His Holiness himself, on hearing of me, did me the signal honour of requesting a performance, at which I was advised all the dignitaries of the church would form my audience.

You can fancy with what eagerness I acquiesced in his wish, and what care I devoted to my preparations. After selecting all my best tricks, I ransacked my brains to invent one worthy of my illustrious spectators. But I had no need to search long, for chance, that most ingenious of inventors, came to my aid.

On the day prior to the performance, I was in the shop of one of the finest watchmakers of Rome, when a servant came in to ask if His Eminence the Cardinal de ———'s watch was repaired.

"It will not be ready till this evening," the watchmaker replied, "and I will do myself the honour of carrying it to your master myself." When the servant had retired, the tradesman said to me:

"This is a handsome and costly watch. The Cardinal to whom it belongs values it at more than ten thousand francs, for, as he ordered it himself of the celebrated Breguet, he fancies it must be unique of its kind. Strangely enough, though, only two days ago, a young scamp belonging to the city offered me a precisely similar watch, made by the same artist, for one thousand francs."

"Do you think," I said to him, "that this person is still inclined to dispose of his watch?"

"Certainly," the watchmaker replied. "This young prodigal, who has spent all his fortune, is now reduced to sell his family jewels."

"Well, I am anxious to purchase the watch, but it must be to-day. Have the kindness, then, to buy it for me. After that, you will engrave on it His Eminence's arms, so that the two watches may be perfectly similar, and on your discretion the profit you make by the transaction will depend."

The watchmaker knew me. He said:

"I only require a quarter of an hour to find him, and I am confident your offer will be accepted."

That same evening the watchmaker brought me two chronometers and handed me one. On comparing them it was impossible to detect the slightest difference. It cost me dear, but I was now certain of performing a trick which must produce a decided effect.

The next day I proceeded to the Pontiff's palace, and, at six o'clock, upon a signal given by the Holy Father, I stepped on the stage. I never had appeared before such an imposing assembly. Pius the Seventh, seated in a large arm-chair on a daïs, occupied the foreground; near him were seated the cardinals, and behind them were the different prelates and dignitaries of the church.

I could not describe to you all the pleasure I felt on this evening; and the spectators seemed to take such lively interest in all they saw, that I felt myself in unusual spirits. The Pope himself was delighted.

"But, M. Torrini," he continually said, with charming simplicity, "how can you do that? I shall be quite ill with merely trying to guess your secrets."

After the "blind man's game of piquet," which literally astounded the audience, I performed the trick of the "burnt writing," in which I received an autograph I set great store by. This is how the trick is done:

A person writes a sentence or two; he is then requested to burn the paper, which must be found afterwards intact in a sealed envelope. I begged His Holiness to write a sentence; he consented, and wrote as follows:

"I have much pleasure in stating that M. Torrini is an amiable sorcerer."

The paper was burned, and nothing could depict the Pope's astonishment on finding it in the centre of a large number of sealed envelopes. I received his permission to keep this autograph.

To end my performance and set the crown on my exploits, I now proceeded to the trick I had invented for the occasion.

Here I had several difficulties to contend with; the greatest was certainly to induce Cardinal de—— to lend me his watch, and that without asking him directly for it, and to succeed I must have recourse to a ruse. At my request several watches were offered me, but I returned them with the excuse, more or less true, that as they had no peculiarity of shape, it would be difficult to prove the identity of the one I chose.

"If any gentleman among you," I added, "has a watch of rather large size—this was a peculiarity of the Cardinal's—and would kindly lend it to me, I should prefer it as better suited for the experiment. I need not say I will take the greatest care of it. I only wish to prove its superiority, if it really possess it, or, on the other hand, to marvellously improve it."

All eyes were naturally turned on the Cardinal, who, it was known, set great value on the exaggerated size of his chronometer. He asserted, with some show of reason, perhaps, that the works acted more freely in a large case. However, he hesitated to lend me his beloved watch till Pius the Seventh said to him:

"Cardinal, I fancy your watch will suit exactly; oblige me by handing it to M. Torrini."

His Eminence assented, though not without numberless precautions, and when I had the chronometer in my hands, I drew the attention of the Pope and the cardinals to it, while pretending to admire the works and handsome chasing.

Digitized by Google

"Is your watch a repeater?" I then said to the Cardinal.

"No, sir, it is a chronometer, and watches of that degree of accuracy are not usually incumbered with unnecessary machinery."

"Indeed! a chronometer; then it must be English," I said, with apparent simplicity.

"What, sir," the Cardinal replied, as if stung by my remark, "do you think chronometers are made only in England? On the contrary, the best specimens have always been made in France. What English maker can be compared with Pierre Leroy, Ferdinand Berthoud, or Breguet, above all, who made that chronometer for me?"

The Pope began to smile at the Cardinal's energy.

"Well, then, we will select this chronometer," I said, putting a stop to the conversation I had purposely started. "I have then, gentlemen, to prove to you its solidity and excellent qualities. Now for the first trial."

And I let the watch fall to the floor. A cry of terror rose on all sides. while the Cardinal, pale and trembling, bounded from his seat, saying, with ill-suppressed wrath:

"You are playing a very sorry jest, sir."

"But, monseigneur," I said, with the greatest calmness, "you have no occasion to be frightened, I merely wish to prove to the gentlemen the perfection of your watch. I beg you not to be alarmed; it will escape scathless from all the trials I subject it to."

With these words, I stamped on the case, which broke, flattened, and soon presented but a shapeless mass. At first I really fancied the Cardinal was going into a fit; he could scarcely restrain his passion; but the Pope then turned to him:

"Come, Cardinal, have you no confidence in our sorcerer? For my part, I laugh like a child at it, being convinced there has been some clever substitution."

"Will your Holiness permit me to remark," I said, respectfully, "that there has been no substitution? I appeal to His Eminence, who will recognise his own watch."

And I offered the Cardinal the shapeless relics of his watch. He examined them anxiously, and finding his arms engraved inside the case, said, with a deep sigh:

"Yes, that is certainly my watch. But," he added drily, "I know not how you will escape, sir; at any rate, you should have played this unjustifiable trick on some other object that might be replaced, for my chronometer is unique."

"Well, your excellency, I am enchanted at that circumstance, for it must enhance the credit of my experiment."

The identity of the Cardinal's watch thus proved, I wished to pass into the Pope's pocket the remaining one of the pair. But I could not dream of this so long as His Holiness remained seated. Hence I sought some pretext to make him rise, and soon found one.

A brass mortar with an enormous pestle was now brought in. I placed it on the table, threw in the fragments of the chronometer, and began pounding furiously. Suddenly a slight detonation was heard, and a vivid light came from the vessel, which cast a ruddy hue over the spectators, and produced a magical appearance. All this while, bending over the mortar, I pretended to see something that filled me with the liveliest astonishment.

Through respect for the Pope, no one ventured to rise, but the Pontiff, yielding to his curiosity, approached the table, followed by a portion of the audience. They might look and look; nothing was to be seen but flame.

"I know not whether I must attribute it to the dazed state of my brain," said His Holiness, passing his hand over his eyes, "but I can distinguish nothing."

"I only require a quarter of an hour to find him."

I, too, had much the same idea; but far from confessing it, I begged the Pope to come round the table and choose a more favourable spot. During this time I had slipped my reserve watch into the Pope's pocket. The experiment was certain, and the "Cardinal's watch" was by this time reduced to a small ingot which I held up to the spectators.

"Now," I said, "I will restore this ingot to its original shape, and the transformation shall be performed during its passage to the pocket of a person who cannot be suspected of complicity."

"Aha!" the Pope said in a jocular tone, "that is becoming a little too strong. But what would you do, my good sorcerer, if I asked you to chose my pocket?"

"Your Holiness need only order for me to obey."

"Well, M. Torrini, let it be so," was the Pope's ready reply.

I took the ingot in my hands, showed it to the company, and it disappeared on my uttering the word "Pass!"

The Pope, with manifestations of utter incredulity, thrust his hand in his pocket. I soon saw him blush with confusion and draw out the watch, which he handed to the Cardinal as if afraid of burning his fingers.

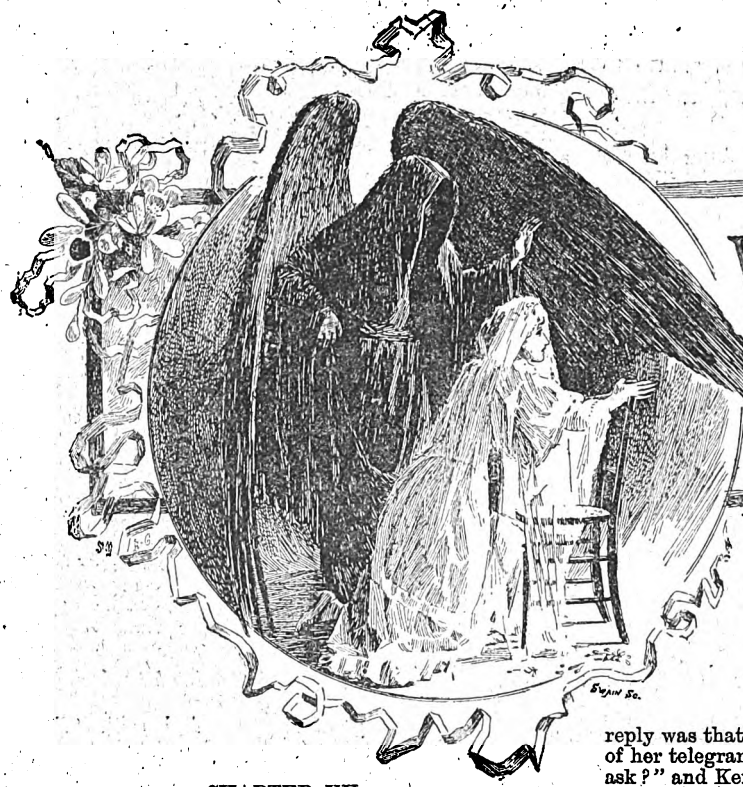
When my audience were assured that I had fulfilled my promise, I received the applause so successful a trick deserved.

The next day the Pope sent me a rich diamond snuff-box, while thanking me for all the pleasure I had occasioned him.

This performance created a great sensation in Rome, and everyone flocked to see my marvels. Perhaps they hoped to witness the famous trick of the "broken watch," which I had performed at the Vatican. But, though I was then very extravagant, I was not so mad as to spend ten hundred francs a night in a trick.

Percy Windred.

Digitized by Google



THE WYTHECOMBE MYSTERY: A ROMANCE.

By J. K. Leys.
Illustrated by S. Mar. Fitz-Gerald.

CHAPTER XV.

A RAY of light, sudden and keen as a lightning-flash, darted into Kenyon's mind from the last word of that message.

Some one, poor Jane Unwin most likely, had used Miss Denver's name to bring Vere to Paddington terminus that Tuesday afternoon. It was Winnie, his affianced bride, he went to meet. Nay more, if it was Jane Unwin who sent the telegram, she must have known that if she had telegraphed in her own name Vere would not have come to the railway-station to meet her. Therefore it was impossible that the relations between them could then have been of a very intimate character, whatever they might have been in the past.

For a long time Kenyon stood with the bit of paper in his hand, trying to realise what were the features of the landscape which this new light revealed to him.

First of all, it was clear that Vere must be acquitted of anything like double dealing. He might be ill, or wounded, or dead, or he might be in danger from the law. Any one of these causes might account for his strange silence. But the odious suspicion that he had kept up an intrigue with Jane Unwin during his courtship, and had at the last moment preferred to wound and insult his bride, and efface himself from the world, rather than give up the dishonourable connection, must be abandoned. So far, at least, Vere's character was cleared.

But what use could be made of this discovery?

That was a question Kenyon could not answer; and though he pondered over it for the greater part of the night he could find no way of turning the telegram to any good account.

Next morning he dispatched a message by wire, not to the Rector as he had at first intended, but to Katherine Dale, asking her to inquire of Winifred Denvers whether she or anyone acting for her had sent a telegram to Vere on the Tuesday on which he disappeared. As he expected, the reply was that no such message had been sent. At the end of her telegram Kate had added the words: "Why do you ask?" and Kenyon answered them by letter, pointing out the significance of what he had found.

That day Kenyon spent in the City, where business connected with the bank detained him till a late hour in the evening.

Next morning before he left his hotel a card was brought to him. He started and frowned as he read the name inscribed on it—Paul Shenstone.

Harold had hoped that Shenstone and he would never meet again; and here, already, the man was dogging his footsteps! But Kenyon felt that he had no sufficient excuse for refusing to see him.

"Show the gentleman in," he said to the waiter.

"You are surprised to see me, I dare say," said Paul, coming forward with outstretched hand; "but I had to come up to town last night on some rather important business; and I thought I would look in upon you to ask about that telegram you sent to Miss Dale yesterday. I happened to be with her when she received it, and we speculated a good deal as to what you could mean by it. I fancy you must have discovered something new."

"It is very good of you to take so much interest in the matter," said Harold drily, but politely. And indeed Shenstone's tone was that of serious concern.

"Personally, I have nothing to do with Vere's fate," returned Shenstone; "but, of course, I am naturally curious about the poor fellow; and I would be very glad if I could be of any use to you. Miss Dale seemed to think that I might be of some service."

Kenyon muttered a few civil words, and briefly told how and where he had found the telegram which was virtually a forgery.

Shenstone kept his eyes fixed on Harold's face while he was speaking, and when he had ended, dropped them towards the floor.

"Don't you think this changes the situation very much?" asked Kenyon.

Shenstone shook his head.

Digitized by Google

"If you ask me," said he, "I confess that I don't think it does. You see, we have the fact of the poor girl's death to account for. What I am afraid of is, that if we stir in the matter we shall do your friend great and irreparable injury."

"You mean by discovering his retreat?"

Shenstone nodded.

"Then you think still that he—that Launcelot Vere, who never to my knowledge injured a living creature—shot, deliberately murdered, that poor girl?"

Shenstone opened his eyes in surprise.

"I thought no one doubted that," he said.

"You did not know him as I did," said Harold. Shenstone's cool manner, his quiet assumption of the guilt of the missing man, irritated him.

"True," said Paul. "I look at the case simply as an outsider."

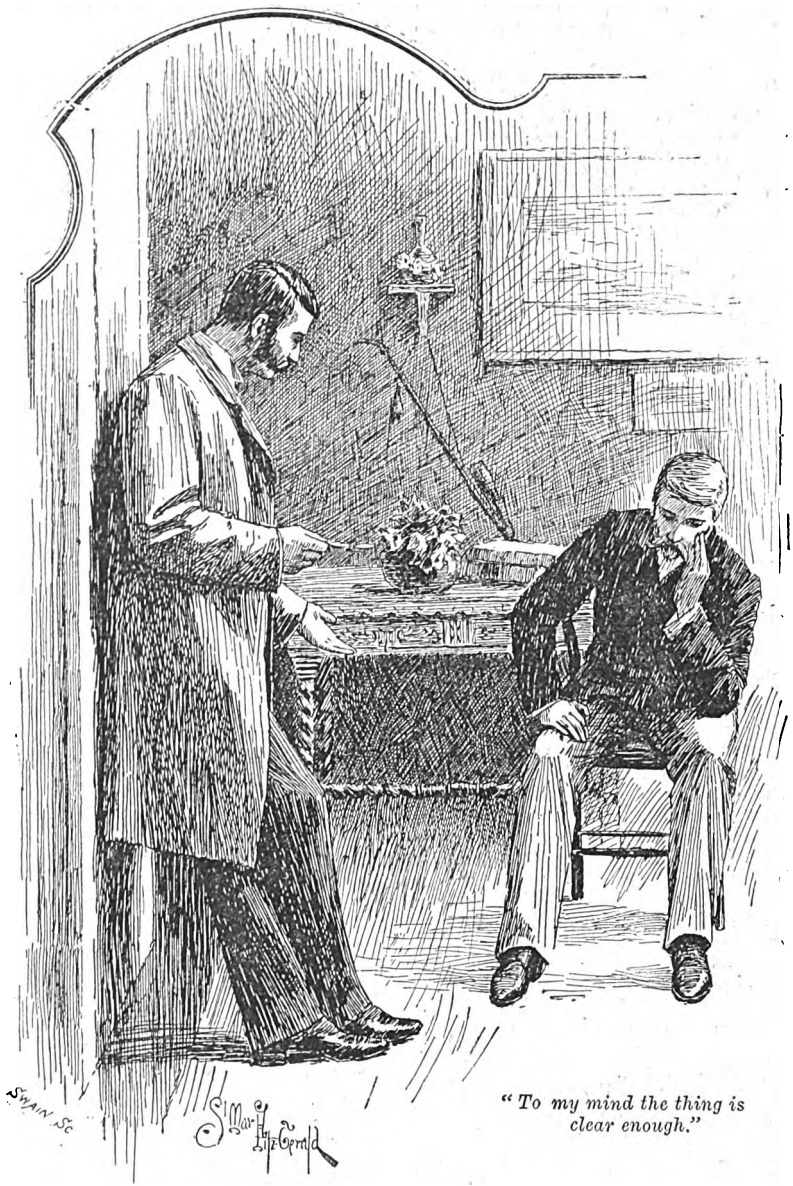
"And how does it strike you? How would you explain the facts?"

"To my mind the thing is clear enough," answered Paul. "Here is an amiable, but perhaps rather weak young man, who has a love affair with a young woman of stronger will than himself. Perhaps she thought he had used her badly. She hears that he is going to marry another, and she is torn by various passions—love, jealousy, wounded self-esteem, and the rest. She determines that she will make a last attempt to regain what she has lost.

"She knows that Vere will not attend to a message sent in her own name. Therefore she uses her rival's name, and by that means (as the railway guard told you) obtains an interview with Vere. He left the station in her company, and no doubt she succeeded in establishing her old influence over him. She works on his pity, perhaps, or his admiration for her beauty—we know by the sketches you found in his studio that he did admire her greatly.

"Well, next day he realises what he has done—that he has made a return to his old honourable life impossible, that all his old friends will look on him with scorn, that Winifred Denvers is lost to him for ever. He makes no sign, simply because he cannot face his disgrace. He hates himself, and loathes the sight of the woman who has been his ruin.

"They are out walking together in the quietest neighbourhood they can find, when they have a quarrel. Each reproaches the other, until Vere, maddened by the sharp stings of the woman's tongue, and by the sharper stings of remorse, threatens her with the revolver. Perhaps she retorts by some cruel taunt; and then either by accident, or carried away by a gust of passion, he fires. She falls, and he finds that she is dead.



"To my mind the thing is clear enough."

"Concealment or flight is now his only thought. Probably he went back to his lodgings, invented some plausible story to account for his companion's disappearance, and then immediately changed his quarters. Don't you think the course of events must have been something like that?"

Kenyon sighed deeply.

"It seems only too probable," he answered.

"Then, if we search for the poor, unhappy man, and let the light in upon the dark corner where he is hiding, we may simply be handing him over to justice. We must not forget the verdict of the Coroner's jury."

"I don't forget it," said Harold, "but I am more anxious than ever to discover the truth about my old friend; and I can keep his secret if I find it out. There is one man who can throw some light on the matter—the man who dined with Vere at the 'Cock Pheasant' that Tuesday evening. I have a fancy—it is only a fancy, of course—that that man was Arthur Beaumont. Somehow, I was not favourably impressed with that fellow. I shall call on him, and ask him point blank whether he was at the 'Cock Pheasant' with Vere that evening."

"And how will you know whether he tells you the truth?"

"I shall see it in his face."

Shenstone smiled as he answered. "But, my dear fellow,

Digitized by Google

supposing that your penetration is equal to that strain upon it, you won't be able to prove that he is lying, even though you may feel sure that he is. If you like to leave him to me, I should take a different course with him altogether."

"Why can't I do myself what you advise?" asked Harold quickly.

Shenstone hesitated just a second before he replied.

"Why, you see, you have been at him already about this business, and he knows that you are trying to find Vere. Besides, he may resent your questioning him so much, even if he has nothing to conceal. Now, if it were my place, I should go to him as a client, and ask his advice on some imaginary point. Then I would ask him to lunch. Of course, from obvious motives, he would accept my invitation. I should take him to the 'Cock Pheasant,' and take the waiter aside—stout, sandy-haired man, I think you said——?"

"Capital!" he cried. "You ought to have been a detective."

Kenyon nodded.

"Under pretence of consulting him about the wine. Then I would recall the incident of the overcoat to his mind, point out Beaumont, and ask him if he was the gentleman who was Vere's companion that Tuesday evening. If he said 'No,' I should order some light claret. If he said 'Yes,' I should order a magnum of champagne; and before that lunch was ended I should know all that Beaumont knew about Launcelot Vere."

Kenyon laughed aloud.

"Capital!" he cried. "You ought to have been a detective. I should be really very much obliged if you will call on Beaumont for me, and get the necessary information out of him, particularly as I have to be in the City nearly the whole day. I won't dream of suggesting ways and means to you, for you are evidently much better up to this sort of work than I am. Only let me know the result of your investigations, and I shall be infinitely obliged to you."

Shenstone readily undertook to do what was asked of him, and promised to call at the hotel that evening, and let Kenyon know what he had done and how much he had learned.

CHAPTER XVI.

A STAB IN THE DARK.

ON the evening of the next day Shenstone drove up to the hotel at which Kenyon was staying.

"I'm in a dreadful hurry," he said, the moment Harold made his appearance. "I am going home to-night, and I have barely time to catch the night express. I just looked in for a moment, as I said I would come and tell you the result of my interview with Beaumont."

"Have you seen him?" interrupted Harold.

"Yes, I have; and I find you are entirely wrong in your idea that he was in Vere's company that Tuesday. The waiter failed to recognise him—said, in fact, he wasn't the man."

Kenyon's face fell.

"Now, my dear fellow, I must be off. I suppose I shall see you down in Darnport to-morrow or next day?"

"No," said Harold abruptly, "I mean to stay here until I ferret out something satisfactory about Vere. It is quite clear that he never expected to see Miss Unwin when he went to Paddington that Tuesday evening, and much less did he intend to elope with her. I want to know how it was that (if your theory is the true one) he came to be dining, not in her company, but with some stranger, within an hour of his meeting her. I want to discover who that stranger was, and when and where he last saw Launcelot Vere. And, in short, I want to find Vere; and I shall not rest until I do find him."

"I thought you had agreed with me that it might be better, for your friend's own sake, not to try to discover his place of concealment," said Shenstone.

"Not exactly," said Kenyon. "You suggested that it might be so; and the point had occurred to me before; but I don't think there is any real danger to Vere in my seeking for him. The police need not know anything of my actions. And he may be in need of my help. At any rate, I mean to find him."

"Well," said Shenstone after a pause, "I can only say again, that if I can aid you in any way you have only to say the word. You will keep me informed of what steps you take, and I can come up again if necessary. I suppose you must go back to Darnport before long."

"I mean to stay in London till this mystery is cleared up," said Harold.

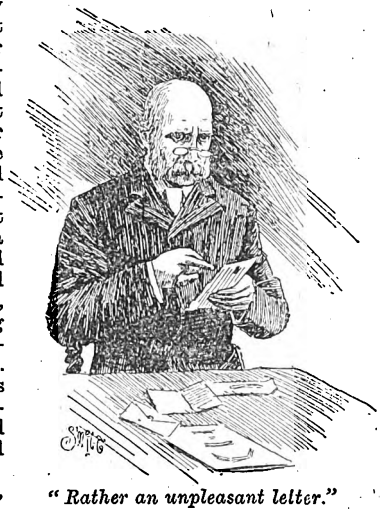
"And what will——"

Shenstone checked himself suddenly and looked at his watch.

"By Jove!" he exclaimed, "I must be off at once if I mean to catch my train. Good-bye again. Be sure to wire me if anything turns up."

In less than a minute Shenstone was driving away from the hotel at a rapid rate.

Besides his old friendship with Vere, Kenyon had another reason for determining to prosecute his search for the missing man. He had had a letter from Winnie Denvers, telling him, in answer to the telegram he had sent to Kate, that she had never telegraphed to Vere that she was going to London. And in this letter the poor girl's anxiety as to her lover's fate was so pathetically revealed, that Kenyon's heart was touched; and he swore to himself that, if patience and determination could accomplish the task, Vere should be found. That is, if he were still alive; for Harold had often wondered sadly if his friend had not been murdered, or killed in some accident. But it seemed very unlikely that Vere, who had never been known to take too much liquor, had fallen into bad company; he was not known to have a single enemy; and as for accident, had his body been found, the fact must long ago have been reported to the police. Whether he was dead or alive, Kenyon was resolved that he would find out the truth.



"Rather an unpleasant letter."

For some days, however, he was unable to make any progress in his quest. The greater part of his time was necessarily spent in the City, for he was now employed in business connected with the bank. But his chief difficulty was to know how he could take the first step towards the accomplishment of the task he had set himself. There seemed to be an impenetrable darkness on every side. Jane Unwin had been buried, but no one had come forward to say where she had been living these last few days of her life. Kenyon sometimes thought with a shudder that Shenstone's theory of what must have happened seemed by far the most likely one.

Digitized by Google

One morning, when Kenyon went down to the bank in Threadneedle Street, he was told that Mr. Bonnington had returned, and shortly afterwards he was asked to step into the partners' private room.

As soon as he entered the apartment, he saw that something was amiss. The three partners were seated round a large table, and they looked at their district manager coldly. Even Mr. Bonnington, Harold's friend, merely nodded towards him, and did not offer him his hand as usual.

"Take a seat, Mr. Kenyon," said Mr. Carr, the senior partner.

"We have had rather an unpleasant letter this morning," he continued after a short pause, "from a solicitor in your part of the world. He complains that he had a client who wished to transact some important business with us, and that he called at the branch bank at Darnport several times, three or four weeks ago, and did not succeed in finding anyone capable of attending to it. He also says that he called several times lately about the same matter, but found you were still from home, and that his client, being annoyed at the delay, has determined to go elsewhere for the money he wanted. Now, we know that you have been in town attending to our affairs for the last few days; but your earlier absence without leave requires to be explained. You can see for yourself that it is a serious matter. We are newly established in Darnport, and cannot afford to lose business. Still less can we afford to have it said that our manager does not care to get customers. What have you to say?"

Kenyon's face had alternately reddened and grown pale while Mr. Carr was speaking. The only days he had been absent from business had been those he had spent in London making inquiries about Vere; and he bitterly regretted that he had not asked leave, or at least mentioned the fact, without waiting for Mr. Bonnington's return. It was too late now to rectify the error.

"It is quite true," he said, "that a short time ago I was absent from my post for two or three days, perhaps three or four days, on urgent business of a private nature." He paused for a moment, asking himself whether he should be more explicit; and then remembering the terrible charge that was hanging over Vere's head, he thought it wiser not to enter into details. "I admit that it was an irregularity, and that I ought to have asked leave; but the matter was so urgent that, to tell the truth, it did not occur to me to do so."

No one made any reply to this apology; and Kenyon understood that his explanation was not deemed quite satisfactory.

"I am afraid," he said, drawing himself up, "that I can offer no better excuse for my conduct; but if you wish it I am ready to tender my resignation."

"You are going too fast, Mr. Kenyon," said the senior partner. "We have been perfectly well satisfied with your conduct hitherto; and we should not think of asking you to resign for a matter which, in itself, is not of very great importance. But we cannot help blaming you for being absent without leave, and we must insist that it shall not occur again. On that understanding we are willing that, as soon as the business you have now on hand is finished, you should go back to Darnport and resume your duties."

With these words Mr. Carr turned to his desk as if no more need be said on the subject.

Harold accepted the reproof in silence. He rose from his chair, bowed, and turned to leave the room.

But before reaching the door he stopped short.

"It seems very extraordinary to me," he said, "that anyone should have called at the bank at Darnport, even once, not to say several times, without my being informed of it. I don't understand how it can have happened."

"Well, you see it has happened," said Mr. Carr; "all I ask is, don't let it happen again."

"May I ask the name of your correspondent, sir?"

"Certainly not," returned the banker with some asperity. "The business he came to introduce to our firm has gone elsewhere, so it would be useless to follow it up. Our correspondent asks us not to mention his name; and I consider that it would be a breach of confidence to do so."

Harold bowed a second time, and left the room.

As he passed through the public part of the establishment Kenyon saw his old friend Mr. Daunt standing at the "Heard any news of your mysterious friend?"

counter. He stopped a moment on his way out to ask after the old lawyer's health.

"Well? Never was better in my life," responded Mr. Daunt. "Just wait till I get this cheque cashed, and I will go along the street with you. Heard any news of your mysterious friend?" he asked.

"Not exactly, but I picked up a bit of information about him in rather a curious way," answered Kenyon; and he told his companion of the telegram he had found.

"And now," he continued, "the provoking part of it is that just when I had resolved to throw my whole energy into the search for Vere, I am ordered back to Darnport, where I shan't be able to do anything. I have a great mind to throw up my post rather than consent to return at this juncture. I had intended to ask for a month's leave of absence; but, after what happened this morning, it would be useless to make a request of that sort."

Mr. Daunt threw a glance at Harold which said: "What happened this morning?" and Harold told him what had transpired in the partners' private room.

"Humph!" said the old lawyer. "Very careless of your subordinates, I must say, not to tell you of these visits on your return."

"That's the strange part of it," said Kenyon. "Green, my cashier, is a most careful man. It is inconceivable that he should have allowed any one, especially a solicitor, to call several times without putting the visits down in the call-book."

"Indeed?" queried the lawyer, with a quick look at his friend.

"He is a model of carefulness," said Kenyon.

"Then I should telegraph to him and make inquiries," said Mr. Daunt. "Come up to my office and tell me what reply you get; I am curious to know what it is."

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER XVII.

IN WHICH KENYON DOES A LITTLE DETECTIVE WORK ON HIS OWN ACCOUNT.

Two hours later Harold burst into Mr. Daunt's room in a state of considerable excitement.

"Green assures me positively," he cried, "that no such

'Then you think——?" he began.

visits as Mr. Carr told me of were paid at our bank while I was away. Here is his telegram. He says: 'I know all solicitors within fifty miles. No one called in your absence except the three I mentioned to you.' Isn't that rather singular?"

"Some people might think so," said the lawyer with one of his peculiar smiles.

"What do you mean?" asked Harold.

"Only that I am not very much surprised at the reply you have got. I should have been surprised if it had been the other way."

"Why? How on earth——?"

"Didn't it strike you that that was an odd sort of letter for a solicitor to write?"

"Well, yes; I thought some spiteful fellow had done it."

"Have you an enemy among the members of our fraternity down there?"

"Not one, that I am aware of."

"Humph! Have you a friend among them, then? Anyone you could count on to do you a service?"

"Certainly. There's young Cresswell, a better fellow never lived. He would do anything for me."

Mr. Daunt went to a bookcase and took down a law list.

"Here is a list of the attorneys practising in Darnport and the surrounding district," he said. "You will be able, I suppose, to tell offhand that some of them could not have written that letter?"

"Certainly."

"Just make me out a list of those who might possibly, so far as you know, have done such a thing."

In ten minutes the list was ready.

"Now," said Mr. Daunt, "you had better telegraph to your friend Cresswell, and ask him to see every one of those men, and ask whether he called on you at such and such a time. You can write by to-night's post and explain more fully."

"Mr. Daunt," said Harold, in a hesitating way, "you are very kind indeed to interest yourself so much about my affairs; but it seems to me a pity to waste my friend's time and my own in following this thing up. Someone has played me a shabby trick; but I am not particularly anxious to find out who did it."

The old lawyer looked down and smiled.

"I think you ought to sift this matter to the bottom," said he.

"Why?"

"Because, when you find out the man who wrote that letter to your employers——" Mr. Daunt paused and looked his visitor full in the face.

"Yes?" asked Harold with a smile. "When I find him out, what then?"

The lawyer put his arms on the table, leant forward, and looked with his glittering blue eyes into Harold's face.

"Then," he said, "then, perhaps, you will put your finger on the secret of your friend Vere's disappearance."

Kenyon started violently, and drew back in his chair.

"Then you think——?" he began.

"I think that somebody is very anxious that you should give up this quest, and go back to your quiet life at Darnport. And I think, too, that he has taken a tolerably effectual way of securing his object."

Harold jumped to his feet, struck the table with his fist so that a cloud of dust rose from the bundles of papers lying on it, seized the list of names which he had written, wrung his friend's hand, and hurried out of the office.

Next day he received the following telegram:

"Have seen all whose names you wired, except three who were on holiday all last month and have not returned, and other two. All deny calling on you, I have no doubt sincerely. The other two are Williams, very unlikely, and Simpson. Simpson now in London. Can't get his town address, but agents, Clover and Fry, Newgate Street. Better try to find him."

Kenyon immediately acted on his friend's advice.

He went to Messrs. Clover and Fry's; and though they had not seen Mr. Simpson lately, they were able to tell him that that gentleman, when he came to town, usually stayed at Duncannon's Hotel in Holborn.

A gentleman who had evidently been dining freely.

To Duncannon's Hotel Kenyon betook himself, and learnt to his great satisfaction, that Mr. Simpson was actually staying there. He was not in, however, and it was impossible to tell when he would return. This, Kenyon thought, mattered little. It was already late in the afternoon; and he decided to dine at the hotel and wait there till Simpson should turn up.

Harold lingered over his dinner as long as he could, and, then adjourned to the smoking-room. He did not give his name to the "lady manager," but tipped one of the waiters, and obtained from him a promise that he would let him know the moment Mr. Simpson returned. It was part of Kenyon's plan that Simpson should believe that his presence at the hotel was purely accidental.

Digitized by Google

Hour after hour went by, and Harold had perused (often with hardly an idea of what he was reading) every paper in the establishment, and yet the solicitor did not make his appearance.

At last, about half-past ten, the friendly waiter ushered into the smoking-room a gentleman who had evidently been dining freely. A glance told Harold that it was Simpson. He remembered having seen his face—the face of a cunning and unscrupulous man — in the streets of Darnport.

At the sight of Kenyon, the lawyer dropped on a lounge, and then, hastily rising, seemed about to leave the room.

But Kenyon rose and went up to him.

"How d'ye do, Mr. Simpson?" he said. "Don't you remember me? My name's Kenyon. I'm manager of the bank at Darnport, you know."

"Mr. Kenyon! To be sure, sir! I hope I see you well, Mr. Kenyon."

"Very well, thanks. May I offer you a cigar?"

To Harold's great satisfaction Simpson accepted the cigar and sat down, calling at the same time for whisky and soda.

After a little talk about nothing in particular, Kenyon thought it was time to open fire.

"I was sorry I was out when you called the other day at the bank," he said. "You came two or three times, I believe, without finding me in."

If the lawyer had had his wits about him he might perhaps have been ready with some lie that would have served his purpose for the moment; but taken unawares as he was, he allowed his face to betray him.

He looked surprised, afraid, bewildered, all at the same moment. It was all he could do to mutter something about "a mistake."

"Then you have not been calling at the bank at Darnfort lately?"

"No—not for some time."

"Why, then, did you write to my principals and pretend that you had tried to see me several times in vain, and had been forced to take your business elsewhere? Don't deny the fact, Mr. Simpson! I know you wrote that letter," said Kenyon firmly. There was evidence enough in the lawyer's face that the accusation brought against him was just.

He muttered something that was quite inaudible.

"You are a solicitor," continued Harold. "Did it not strike you that it might be rather a dangerous thing to slander a man to his employers in that way? If I lose my post an action would lie, eh? No doubt of that I imagine."

"Upon my word, Mr.—a—Mr. Kenyon, I admit nothing, you understand; but speaking strictly in confidence, and without prejudice, you understand, I am certain that it was a mere joke."

"Pretty kind of joke—rather an expensive one for some people, perhaps. But who got you to do it? Who asked you to write that letter to my principals?"

"Me, Mr. Kenyon! I never wrote any letter!"

"Oh, very well, we must prove the handwriting, that's all."

The solicitor turned greenish, and Harold went on.

"But if you choose to tell who played this trick on me, I will promise you that he shall never find out that you informed against him, and also that you shall hear no more of this matter."

The promise of indemnity broke down the attorney's last scruples.

"I'm a poor man, Mr. Kenyon," he said; "and twenty pounds aren't to be come by every day. It was only a harmless jest, he said, or I'd never have consented to do it. But I think you said that no harm had been done?"

"That has to be seen," said Harold. "But I promise you that if you give me the true name, you shall not suffer. Now, who is it?"

The frightened little man glanced around, as if fearful that some one should overhear him; then, bending over, he put his lips to Kenyon's ear and whispered the name "Paul Shenstone."

Whispered the name "Paul Shenstone."

(To be continued.)

THE FRESH AIR FUND

was started by the editor of Pearson's Weekly and Short Stories in 1892. During the summer of 1892 20,600 poor children enjoyed a day in the country through its agency; in 1893, 40,230; in 1894, 74,074; and last summer, 92,061.

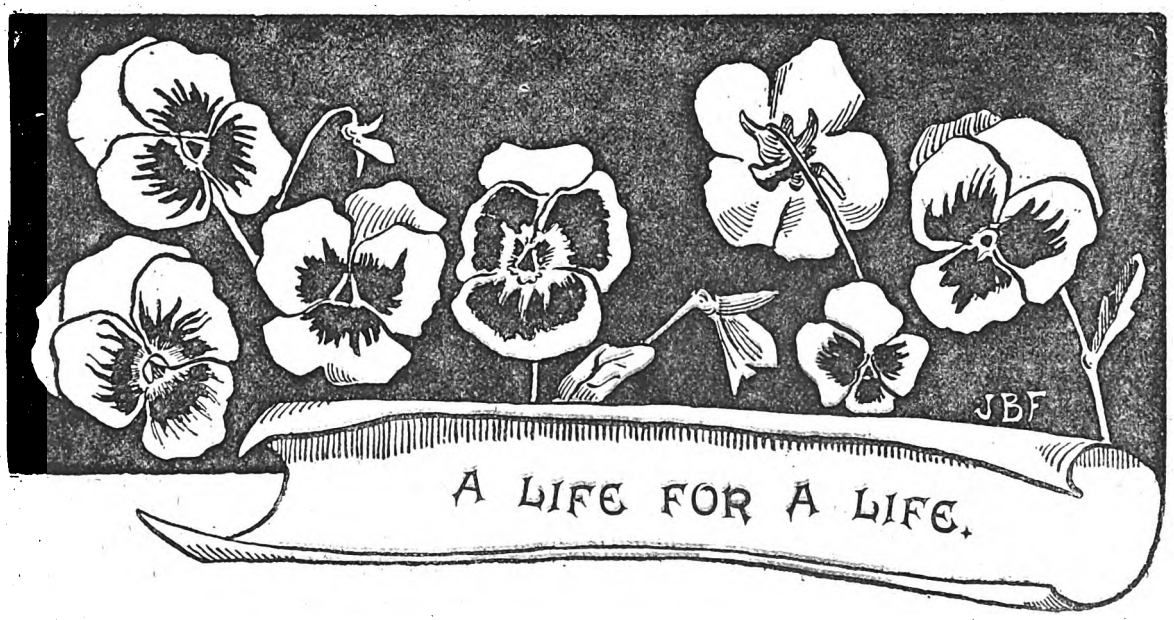
The total expenses for travelling and two splendid meals amount to ninepence only per day for each child. All the expenses of management are defrayed by the promoters of the F.A.F. Each ninepence, therefore, contributed by a reader of Short Stories gives to one child a day's complete happiness.

This year we hope to send more than 100,000 children for a day in the country. And to do this we shall require all the assistance that our readers can give us.

In past years the subscribers to Short Stories have been most generous in helping to swell the Fresh Air Fund total. We are looking towards them to help us still more this summer.

All subscriptions will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly.

Digitized by Google



I AM going to give the history of the whole affair to the world. I am perfectly calm and reasonable as I sit down to write, though my head is burning, and my hands are icy cold. And I think that people ought to know the truth; for the way that things have turned out with me may serve as a warning to others who may be tempted hereafter, as I was so many years ago.

I was Dr. Sennet's only child; and, after the death of my mother, though I was still a mere girl, I was given full authority to rule over his shoulders. I was, too, almost his sole companion, as he was mine.

He was a very studious man, much absorbed in the theoretical part of his profession, and greatly given to trying new drugs, and to seeking for remedies as yet undiscovered. All the time that he could spare from the active practice of medicine he devoted for years to experiments and researches as to the curative properties of all sorts and substances, herbs and minerals forming the chief.

He had a theory that the healing as well as the destructive properties of certain poisons only lacked careful study and development to become of vast practical value, and he devoted a great deal of time to this branch of his researches.

Serpent venom was one of the forms of deadly product on which he based some of his most novel theories. He maintained that a substance of such terrific power for slaying must have equal power as a remedy, if only one could find out for what disease it was to be used, and in what manner it was to be employed.

But what discoveries he made in this direction died with him. He made me always his companion and his confidante in the more important of his researches.

Some months before his death, he placed in my hands a large, old-fashioned pocket-book, bidding me lock it up and keep it safely for him.

"I do not like," he went on to say, "to keep it in my consulting room, or even in my safe; for its contents are so powerful for mischief, that accident on my part, or design on that of some evil-doer, might bring about a terrible catastrophe."

Then he made me sit down beside him and showed me what it was that the pocket-book contained.

It was a series of little packets, of the shape and size of an ordinary teething powder, each neatly folded in white paper, and inscribed with the name and properties of the contents.

My good father had every reason to surround this one of his scientific possessions with unusual care and watchfulness, for each one of these harmless looking little packets contained some dried specimens of the venom of a deadly serpent, the poison that renders the puncture of a snake's fang as deadly as a dagger thrust to the heart, or as a bullet through the brain.

There, in little yellowish, semi-transparent scales, looking like chips of horn, were samples of the venom of the cobra-di-capello, and the krait, and the coral snake, and the lemon snake of India, of the dreaded lance-head of the West India Islands, and of the copper-head spread-adder and rattlesnake of America, besides specimens from other deadly reptiles whose names I had never even heard.

"In their present form, Hester, these specimens are harmless," said my father, as he replaced the papers in the pocket-book; "but a drop or two of warm water, let fall on those innocent looking little scales, would prepare it to mingle with the blood of any living creature, and would suffice to call forth in full power all its fatal properties. Therefore, once more I beg of you to guard very carefully this pocket-book. Its contents are invaluable to me, as I mean to use them in a series of experiments that I am now making on the effects of poisons that act through the blood; so I am anxious, also, not to have them mislaid."

"Come with me, father," I said, "and I will show you where and how safely I will keep this precious deposit."

So I took him to my own room, and unlocked an old-fashioned desk that had belonged to my mother, and revealed to him, concealed in its inmost depths, a secret drawer, the existence of which had never been known to its original owner, but which I had found out one day when I had overturned the desk by accident.

Digitized by Google

He was perfectly satisfied with this place of deposit for his precious collection; so I put it in the drawer and locked the desk again, and never saw or touched the pocket-book any more for many a long day.

Some little time afterwards my father showed me a clipping from an old newspaper—a genuine snake story of the old-fashioned kind. It was the account of a farmer in America who owned a pair of strong leather boots, in which he went one day to inspect a distant pasture. That night, on pulling them off, he remarked to his wife that there must have been a thorn in the leather, as something had scratched his leg. He was taken ill that night and died mysteriously after a very brief illness. His eldest son took possession of the boots, and wore them at the funeral; he, too, died as suddenly and strangely as his father had done. Next, his brother wore the boots, and he, too, fell a victim to some mysterious ailment. The boots were then cut open and examined. Inside the leg of one of them was found protruding the fang of a rattlesnake, the reptile having evidently essayed to bite, and the tooth having broken off in the leather.

"I rather doubt the truth of this story," said my father, when he had finished reading it to me. "The fang of a rattlesnake is hardly strong enough to pierce through leather and, presumably, through a stocking underneath. A metal point dipped in the poison might probably work as much mischief in that way, as its penetrating powers would be so much greater; but scarcely the snake's tooth itself."

But I forgot all about these things when, a few weeks later, my father died very suddenly from an attack of pneumonia, caught by returning through a drenching rain from the bedside of a patient who was dangerously ill; and I was left alone in the world.

I was a little over eighteen when his death took place, and, in accordance with a wish expressed by him on his death-bed, and embodied in the last letter that he ever wrote, my aunt, Mrs. Forbes—my father's widowed sister—came, with her only child, a daughter a year younger than myself, to take up her residence with me.

I fretted greatly against this arrangement, for I felt myself fully capable of looking after my own affairs. And, moreover, I was not very fond either of my aunt or of my cousin Laura. I was a reserved, self-contained young woman, older than my years, both in aspect and character, and devoted to the study of science and to scientific pursuits. My Aunt Caroline and my cousin spent their time in fancy-work and novel reading, to my infinite if concealed disdain. To be sure, my aunt was fond of pottering about the kitchen, and of making pastry and preserves and all sorts of delicate dishes; and Laura contrived to accomplish a great deal of sewing, besides studying French and music. She had, I must confess, a very sweet voice, and sang like a bird. But they were neither of them congenial to me; and, though we got along fairly together, I never ceased to miss the father whose constant companion I had been from my childhood, nor to mourn for his loss.

My aunt, on the day of her arrival, had folded me in her arms and had begged me to consider her as a mother and Laura as a sister; but I could not persuade myself into such a comfortable state of feeling. We were none of us quarrelsome, and so we never quarrelled, and that was the best that could be said of our intercourse.

I spent most of my time, as I had done during my father's lifetime, in chemical experiments, the most practical and least peculiar of which were my attempts at photography.

But I liked to try to carry out some of his unfinished researches into the nature and effects of certain poisons. That branch of medical study possessed for me a singular fascination, though I cannot say that my experiments ever resulted in any startling discoveries.

In the meantime, my aunt and cousin were happy after their own fashion. They made gowns, and wore them, they went out to pay calls as soon as their mourning was laid aside, and they received callers on one day in the week, and they had a deal of talk together over their sewing in their sitting-room upstairs.

Then, too, Laura pursued her studies, as she called them, in a very persevering fashion. She pored over French grammars and dictionaries, and translated passages from the works of Victor Hugo, and practised two hours a day at little foolish songs all about dreaming and dying, so far as I could make out the words. And that was what she called study!

There have been people who said that I never liked Laura because she was so much prettier than I was. But that was all nonsense; I never cared about my own looks.

I knew that my tall, spare figure, deep set, dark grey eyes, very marked features and sallow complexion were all of too masculine a type to attract much admiration; so I never troubled my head as to how I looked or what I wore, and used to turn a deaf ear to all my aunt's mild remonstrances on the subject of the stains left by chemicals or acids upon my luckless figure, and would resist all Laura's playful efforts to remove them. What did it matter if my strong, bony hands were dyed copper-colour one day, and streaked with black the next? They were not handsome at any time. If they had been little and white, and delicately formed like Laura's, they might have been worth taking care of. But I never was jealous of Laura's charms—no, not for a single moment, until—well, I shall tell you about that later.

And yet she was the prettiest creature I had ever seen in all my life—tall and slender, with a swaying, lily-like grace in all her movements, and a transparent complexion whose wild-rose tints varied with every breath that she drew, and great, soft brown eyes with a look like that of a startled fawn in their depths. She had, too, such lovely golden hair, that curled over her brow in little silken rings like those of a baby. Then she had a deep dimple in each cheek, and a long, delicate throat, with a way of carrying her head like that of a young deer. So, altogether, she was very lovely. I never denied the fact—never!

And she was very good-tempered, too. I really think we never had a quarrel but once, and that was when I tried some experiments on her dog, a cur that she had taken charge of because it followed her home one day when she was returning from a walk, and because it looked cold and starved. The dog died, it is true, and Laura cried for two days about it, and would not speak to me for a week afterwards. However, we made it all up, on my promise never to meddle again with any of her pets.

But to this day I cannot understand why she cared so much for a common, ugly creature like that. And my experiment had a wholly satisfactory result. It proved to me that the little yellowish scales contained in the packet marked "Rattlesnake Venom," from the old pocket-book, had lost none of their power. Just a drop of warm water on one of them, and the point of a penknife-blade dipped in the viscous fluid thus produced, and a scratch across the animal's quivering, black nose as he was jumping up on my lap—a practice he had, which I much disliked—and good-bye, Tray!

Digitized by Google

It was more than a year after my father's death that Dr. Adrian Trent first came to take up his residence in our little town of Upton.

Till that time there had been some talk of a successor to Dr. Sennet's practice, but no competitor had presented himself before who had been considered satisfactory. But Dr. Trent had studied in Paris and Berlin after taking his degree, and, but for a constitutional delicacy of health which caused him to avoid the fatigue incidental to a physician's life in a large town, he might readily, with his talent and his engaging address, have made his way to the first rank of his profession. But he preferred the quiet, semi-rural life of a small town like ours.

He had known my father well by reputation, and had often corresponded with him on professional subjects, so he was quite prepared to accept us all as acquaintances. He was a noble looking man, tall and straight of figure, with a countenance that was at once winning and intellectual.

He was unmarried, and his mother had gone to live with his married sister in Ireland; so he was left, so to speak, alone in the world. And, as we were almost the only persons that he knew when he first came to Upton, we naturally saw a good deal of him.

He used to drop in very often of an evening, to talk about my scientific experiments and the medical discoveries of the day with me, and to look over some of my father's notes in manuscript, which I was very glad to show him; and to listen to Laura's music when the talk about new remedies and curious cases became wearisome to him.

It never tired me. I was born, I think, with a genuine talent for the study of medicine, and it was my sole passion till the love that comes to every woman's nature, either as a curse or a blessing, awoke to life in my heart.

I do not know when it was that I first began to love Adrian Trent. He had not been visiting very long at our house before the gossips of the neighbourhood got talking about the fitness of a match between the new doctor and the daughter of the old one; what a good thing it would be for Dr. Trent to marry a girl with a comfortable fortune like myself—for I had been left an heiress in a small way—and how congenial such a marriage would be between the rising physician and myself, my scientific tastes and pursuits being well known.

Of course, this chit-chat could not fail to reach my ears, and I listened to it at first incredulously, and then with a secret delight. For Dr. Trent did assuredly single me out to talk to, and even to consult concerning certain vexed questions in his profession. And then, everybody was exhorting him to take a wife. "You will never get on till you are married, doctor—never! A single man may make his way in other professions, but never in that of medicine!" And, strong-minded and self-contained as I had always been, I suffered myself to yield my whole soul up to the intoxicating dream of loving, and of being loved.

In proportion to the delight and the absorbing nature of the vision was the pang of my awakening.

I shall never forget the evening when my delusion was dispelled.

It was a warm night in June, and I had been suffering all day from a violent headache, which had kept me a prisoner in my own room, and had baffled all my efforts to relieve it. I was particularly anxious to go downstairs, as Dr. Trent had informed me that he meant to call; but the pain and its accompanying sickness had prevented me from even leaving my bed.

I heard the door-bell ring, and the little bustle that announced the arrival of the expected visitor, with a dull feeling of regret; and then I think I must have fallen asleep, for the next thing that I knew was Laura's presence beside my bed, and her tears and kisses on my cheeks, as she whispered:

"Hester! dear Hester! I wanted to be the first to tell you—Dr. Trent and I are engaged to be married. Wish me joy, will you not? I am so happy!"

Well, I congratulated her in due, set terms, my illness serving as an excuse for any coldness or lack of enthusiasm in my words, and also for the wan visage wherewith I presented myself at the breakfast table the next morning, after a sleepless night, filled with bitter repinings, and a fierce struggle against what then seemed to me to be inevitable.

I could not for a moment imagine that a frivolous piano-playing, novel-reading girl like my cousin really could care for an intellectual man like Dr. Trent, or would make him a good wife. But he loved Laura, and he meant to marry Laura, and what was I to do? I could only rage against the decrees of destiny, for as yet I saw no way of setting aside those decrees.

My Aunt Caroline was in the seventh heaven of delight and joyful anticipation, and her raptures, which were openly and continually expressed, nearly deprived me of my senses. She could talk of nothing, all day long, but Laura's engagement, and Laura's approaching marriage, of the little house that Dr. Trent meant to take near the post-office, and of the furniture that his mother was going to give him, and of all the details of the trousseau, till, sometimes, I fairly left the house to escape from these endless talks upon the one recurrent theme.

But worse even than my aunt's chatter was the spectacle that I had continually before my eyes, of the mutual love and happiness of the engaged couple.

If I had not had Dr. Trent's betrothed bride as an inmate of my own home, I think I might in time have grown used to the mental contemplation of his future marriage. But I was forced to witness daily the passionate devotion of the man, that I loved with such fervour and concentration of feeling, bestowed upon another woman.

Often and often I have stolen to my own room with clenched hands, and eyes from which the tears were all scorched away by the fever of my torment, only to pace the floor unceasingly, and to ask from Providence for an escape from my jealous misery. For I grudged every glance, every word, every caress that Adrian bestowed upon Laura. And yet, let me do him justice now if never before; he had not once, in the slightest degree, given me any cause to fancy that he loved me. I was a congenial companion to him, a good comrade, and nothing more.

But time went on, as it always does, even though, like the wheel of Juggernaut's car, it crushes out life, or peace, or human happiness in its pitiless progress.

The wedding-day was fixed for the tenth of September, and that date drew near; and nothing happened to prevent or even to postpone the marriage, as I, in my wild, impotent despair, had prayed that there would.

A week earlier the bridal dress arrived from London. It was simple and inexpensive, as suited the limited means of my aunt; but it was very dainty and aerial, being all in soft clouds of transparent muslin, profusely trimmed with some exquisitely fine Valenciennes lace which Mrs. Forbes had kept amongst her treasures for many years.

Digitized by Google

All the accessories of the dress, such as the orange-blossom wreath, the ample veil of tulle, the white gloves, etc., had been forwarded with it. Also, there came a pair of white silk stockings, of cobweb fineness, and a pair of white satin slippers. These last were the only unsatisfactory adjuncts of the toilette. They fitted perfectly, and were of Parisian make and style; but the shoemaker had neglected to place a bow or rosette of ribbon on the instep, and both Mrs. Forbes and Laura disliked the untrimmed looks of the delicate little shoes.

"I have an idea, Laura," suddenly exclaimed my aunt; "suppose you wear those pretty shoe-buckles that belonged to my grandmother. Such things are all the fashion now, I believe; and they are as pretty as possible, and genuine antiques as well. I'll get them out, and will polish them up, and then we will try their effect."

So the buckles were produced, and were cleaned with whitening, and then rubbed into brightness with a bit of chamois leather, and were pronounced perfectly lovely, and just the thing, by both the mother and the daughter.

Laura's deft fingers soon fastened them into place, and then she put on the shoes to see how the new adornment looked.

"Ah-h-h!" she cried, with a little grimace, "how I have pricked my foot! One of the teeth of the left-hand buckle must be bent out of place. Yes, I see. I must straighten it out before the day comes for me to wear the shoes."

And actually, when she took off the shoe, there was a tiny drop of blood visible on her white-thread stocking.

I once heard a very pious lady remark that she fully believed in the existence of a personal devil. If there was any truth in her belief, the fiend assuredly stood behind me at that moment, whispering suggestions of wickedness in my ear. For, as Laura spoke, and laughingly showed me the little puncture in her white skin as she drew off her stocking, it seemed to me as though something or somebody said to me, distinctly, if inaudibly:

"Anoint the sharp protruding point with the serpent's venom, and Adrian Trent will be free almost as soon as he is fettered."

I started, and shrank away in horror from the very idea; but the whisper went on and on, and pursued me to my own room, and haunted me in my dreams, till I found myself caressing the thought as one might fondle a dangerous animal that had come to crouch at one's feet, and was ready to tear and slay at the word of command.

Even before I had decided to yield to the hideous temptation, I had taken the old pocket-book from its hiding place in my mother's desk, and had chosen out and concealed the paper marked "Rattlesnake Venom," so as to have it already for use in case I made up my mind to use it. Of course, to such mental yieldings and toyings with a criminal intent, there could be but one ending.

The night before the wedding, I rose from my bed about midnight, and stole softly into the next room to mine—our spare-room, where all the bridal finery was spread out all ready for her use.

On the bed lay the dress, with the filmy, vaporous veil falling beside it like a streak of mist, and the gloves and fan in close proximity; and on the dressing-table stood the satin slippers, with their jewelled buckles sparkling in the moonlight.

One of these, the shoe for the left foot, I carried off to my own room. Just a touch, to bend out a little further the sharp tooth of the buckle, and then a coating of yellow, viscous fluid, applied freely with a camel's-hair brush from the hollow of an old pomatum-pot that stood on my chest of drawers, and my work was done. Death, as well as the bride, would stand erect in those dainty shoes on the wedding day.

I went back and replaced the shoe, and I carried the brush and the gallipot to the kitchen, where I thrust them deep down into the smouldering hollows of the range fire. Then I went upstairs, to watch the slow hours of the night in a sort of exultation that left no room for wavering in my purpose, or for repentance.

The wedding was a very brilliant affair. Laura looked lovely in her white dress and aerial veil and wreath of orange blossoms, and Dr Trent was the very realisation of a novel writer's ideal of a handsome, happy bridegroom.

They were married by old Dr Crosland, who had presided at my baptism and at the funerals of my parents, and who wound up his few words of exhortation to the young couple by the wish that they might pass together many happy years.

But, before the breakfast that followed the ceremony was at an end, the young bride was taken alarmingly ill. I had heard her whisper to her mother that she must have hurt her foot in some way, as it was paining her acutely; so I was not altogether surprised when, after growing paler and paler, and evidently struggling against her rapidly increasing indisposition, she finally fell back insensible, and was carried from the room by her husband.

He caused her to be taken at once to his new home, the pretty house that he had taken such pleasure in preparing for her reception, as he declared that he wanted to watch over her every hour and every moment of the day till his darling was restored to health.

But she never rallied from the mysterious stupor that had invaded all her being, and she breathed her last before the noon of the day succeeding her marriage day.

I never saw despair comparable to that of Dr. Trent. When his bride of a few hours was hidden from his sight in the grave, he retired to his desolate home and shut himself up to abandon himself to his grief. Weeks passed before he would resume his professional duties.

My aunt, in the first sharp anguish of her bereavement, insisted upon leaving Upton and going to take up her abode with some relatives in Canada. She could not remain, she said, in a place where everything reminded her of her lost darling.

And it was then that I conceived a project eminently fitted, as it seemed to me, to further the purpose which had become the dominant idea of my life—namely, to induce Doctor Trent to make me his wife. I was to invite his mother to make me a visit of indeterminate length which might be indefinitely prolonged. Doctor Trent and I would thus be brought together in a natural, unforced way, for he could hardly help calling to see his mother after her arrival, and I trusted to the influence of time, to our congeniality of tastes and pursuits, and, above all, to the impression that my fortune might create on Mrs. Trent, to bring about the result that I so passionately desired.

Digitized by Google

Everything worked as smoothly as I could have wished. Mrs. Trent accepted my invitation, and her presence had the desired effect of luring her son to my house. Very soon our old terms of comradeship were renewed, and we held many discussions over medical books and periodicals; for the doctor had resumed the practice of his profession with an ardour born of the very blackness of desolation that surrounded him.

I did not fail to set forth, indirectly, to his mother the extent of my fortune, and the details interested her deeply. Not that she was mercenary or grasping—she had consented readily to the marriage of her son with my penniless cousin; but, when so many hundreds per year, and so much solid property in the way of houses and farms, were to be had for the asking—for I made no effort to conceal from her the extent of my interest in Dr. Trent—it was hardly to be imagined that she would not influence him to ask for it.

And then I think that I was really the only person in whose society and conversation he found the slightest pleasure, after the death of Laura. Not that he ever talked to me about her—her name never was mentioned by him to anybody—but we had many subjects in common and I had, moreover, become a great favourite with his mother, whose tastes and peculiarities I studied as I had never done those of anyone since my father's death.

And so it came to pass that, two years after that tragic wedding-day, Dr. Trent asked me, in a calm, business-like manner, if I would consent to become his wife.

Even as I listened to the words, for the hearing of which I had sinned so deeply, I could not but contrast his wooing with the love-making between Laura and himself—all tenderness and blissful folly, and stolen caresses, and sweet, foolish little speeches. But I had gained my point; the one great object of my existence was attained at last.

We were married very quietly, and, after a brief wedding tour, settled down to our home life.

Old Mrs. Trent did not long survive our marriage. She lived just long enough to be made very happy by the birth of a little granddaughter. I gave her name of Elizabeth to my baby. I did not dare to ask my husband what he would like to have the little one called, for I knew very well that his answer would be "Laura."

We had not been married a month before I realised the fact that the image of his dead wife was still enshrined in the very core of his heart, and that all my love and devotion were powerless to dislodge it.

Even the advent of our little Bessie could not lure him to forget the fair creature that he had called his own for a few tragic hours only. Often he would lock himself in his own room for a period of unbroken soltitude, and he would come forth from those lonely musings pale and haggard, as one under the spell of some fatal disease.

I tried to break in upon these dreary self-communings more than once, but was soon made to comprehend, strong-minded and resolute though I am, that there were certain points concerning which Adrian Trent would brook no interference. Otherwise, he was always kind and gentle—in a languid, indifferent way—to me, as well as to the rest of the world. His little daughter was the only being that ever seemed to arouse in him a spark of genuine interest or affection.

I had won my point it is true. I was his wife, and was called by his name, and ruled over his household; but, as for the rest, the dead woman in her grave possessed his heart and soul—not I. Often, in my bitter realisation of the truth, I had been forced to ask myself if it was indeed worth while to have stained my soul with such blackest guilt, to have gained only the dry husks of what had once been the golden grain of love's richest harvest.

When we had been married a little over nine years, even these were taken from me—Adrian died! His illness was typhoid fever, with all its distressing train of symptoms, and alternations of hope and fear, the latter crystallising finally into the fixedness of despair.

I watched over him faithfully, disregarding fatigue, or the fear of infection, to the very last. And yet his last look, his last word, were not given to me. Just before he died, he turned his head from me, and gazed at a vacant space on the other side of the bed; and, with a smile such as I had not seen on his lips through all the years of our wedded life, he sighed: "Laura! Laura!" and so passed away.

And when I came to set my desolate home in order, I found hidden away in the depths of a great closet in the room that my father, and afterwards my husband had used as a study, a small black trunk, whose only contents were the white dress and tulle veil that Laura had worn on the last day of her life—her wedding-day.

With barely a glance at the contents of the trunk, I closed it once more, and locked it, leaving the key tied to one of the handles at the ends. I knew then over what relics, what reminders of dead happiness, my husband had spent so many hours of mournful meditation, and I did not care to disturb them; for, in truth, I could not endure to look again on the garments that for me were fraught with such terrible associations.

It was long before I rallied from the effects of my bereavement; nor do I think I ever should have done so, had it not been for the presence of my little girl. I had something to live for, since Bessie was left to me. She was a winning, bright-eyed, intelligent little creature, full of caresses and pretty ways, and my all-absorbing devotion to my husband found a renewal in the love that I gave to my only child.

I was born to bestow my affections upon few people. Only three persons had ever really taken possession of my heart; my father, Adrian, and now Bessie. And in her growth, and prettiness, and expanding intellect I found consolation for all my sorrows, except that sometimes a sharp thrill of anguish would remind me of that other mother, whose only child—and she, too, a daughter—I had been the means of snatching from her.

Strangely enough, I had been able to stifle all thoughts of the hand I had had in bringing about Laura's death, so long as my husband lived. But when once I had lost him, and was no longer anything in this world except a mother—wifehood and daughterhood both being past—I was haunted by continual reminiscences, not of the woman who had been my rival, and who had won the chief place in the affections of Adrian Trent, but of the fair-haired girl clinging to her mother's neck, with the faint moan: "Oh, mother, mother, I am so very ill! Cannot Adrian save me? Oh, mother, is this death?"

* * * * *

Yesterday was Bessie's birthday. How long ago that seems. Yes, the twelfth of July—a day always to be marked with presents and pleasures. Just thirteen—almost a woman grown. We were more like sisters than mother and daughter. I had always taught her myself, from the alphabet up to history and geography, and the higher mathematics. But yesterday was a holiday, because it was her birthday. It was an intensely hot day, and she was suffering from a headache. I was obliged to go out to see my lawyer on important business, so I made her lie down on the sofa in the disused study, as that was a cool and quiet room; and I bade her good-bye with a kiss, and left her with one of her new books—to occupy her, should she feel disinclined to sleep.

Digitized by Google

I was gone a long time—a very long time—for some hours, in fact. There were deeds to be signed, and new leases to be made out, and papers to be read over, and directions to be given concerning various pieces of property, and I was thoroughly weary before the whole was brought to a satisfactory conclusion. But the lawyer would not listen to my petitions for a postponement of, at least, part of the business.

"It is so seldom that we get hold of you, Mrs. Trent," he said in a laughing way, "that now you are here you must finish up all your affairs."

At last I was released, and I hastened to return home. The sun was setting, and a cool breeze was springing up, so I promised myself the pleasure of taking Bessie for a drive, if her head were no worse. I threw open the door of the old study gaily calling: "Bessie! Bessie!" as I did so.

But the sight that I beheld there froze the words upon my lips, and the life-blood at my heart.

In the centre of the room stood a vision of Laura Forbes as I had last seen her, clad in her bridal array—a white figure, in filmy robes of yellowish lace and crumpled muslin, and on her feet—oh, Heaven! on Bessie's feet, for I recognised the child at a second glance—were the satin slippers, with their glistening buckles. And she tottered forward, and fell into my arms, with just such a weak, hoarse cry as that which had rung in my ears for sixteen years! "Oh, mother, mother!"

I snatched the slippers from her feet. There, on the instep of her left foot, was a drop or two of blood, and a tiny tear in the lace-worked thread stocking, and underneath just a deep scratch, not half an inch in length, with a livid line running upwards towards the ankle. And that was all—and it was death!

I had come too late. The poison had worked its insidious way throughout her system—aided, doubtless, by the heat of the weather—and all my boasted science, with that of the doctors I summoned, was of no avail.

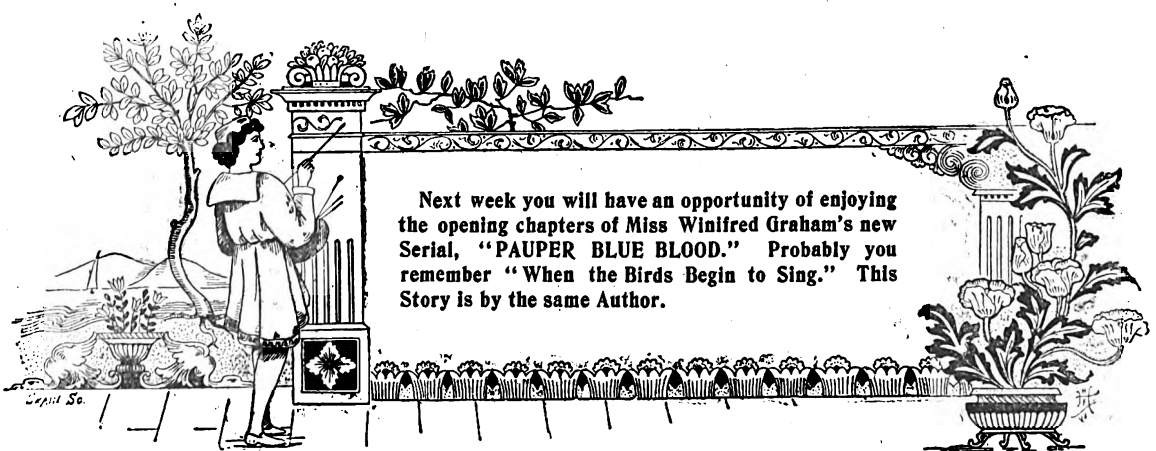
The child, relieved of her headache by rest and slumber, had grown tired of reading, had gone rummaging in the closet, had found the old trunk, with its carefully cherished contents, and had amused herself by dressing up in the garments she had discovered. And so my sin came to find me out, and to exact from me full retribution, for Bessie died last night, and with her departed the last tie that bound me to life.

* * * * *

It is written in the Scriptures. "A life for a life," and also: "He that smiteth with the sword, shall perish by the sword." I mean to do justice on myself, the murderess, and to make use of the same means by which I sent my cousin to an untimely grave. I have set my house in order. I have destroyed the shoe buckles; and I have burned the pocket book, with its death-dealing contents, leaving out only one scale from the paper marked "Rattlesnake Venom." Now for a drop or two of warm water on the little yellowish fragment, and I dip into the solution the point of one of my husband's lancets. So—a mere touch, a puncture of the vein in the hollow of my arm—and my work is done. The lancet is very sharp—it gave me no pain.

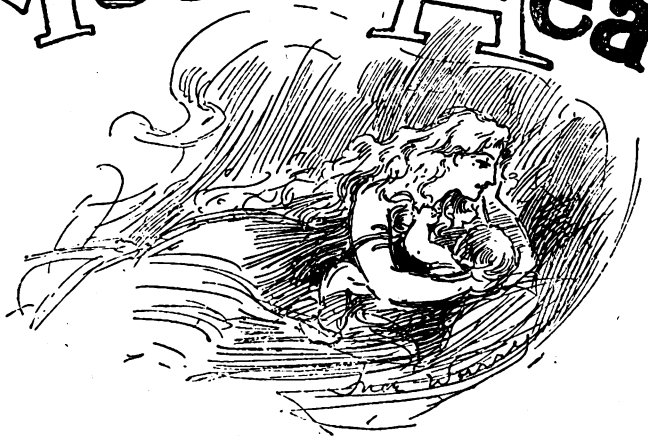
I wonder why I am haunted, not by a vision of Bessie's face nor yet of Laura's, but by the remembrance of the wistful brown eyes of the dog that I killed so long ago. I am growing stupid, I think. I will creep into the next room, and take my seat beside the bed where Bessie lies, looking so calm and fair. Is it Bessie, or is it Laura that I see before me, in that crushed wedding dress? Bessie—Laura—Laura—Bessie—you both seem very near to me to-day. And what are those words from Shakespeare that keep ringing in my ears? "Sharper than a serpent's tooth"—sharp as a serpent's tooth—sharp——

Arnold Weevil.



Digitized by Google

The Moor's Head



"CURSES are nonsensical at all times, Thorndyke, and to talk of them descending from generation to generation—bah!" and the speaker flipped the ashes from his cigar and curled his lip scornfully.

The younger man changed his easy position and smiled.

"Of course," said he, "except in this single case. But because it is in my own single family; and because I have the written record of it—not relying upon 'old woman tales,' as you express it—I'm afraid I do rather put faith in that wretched curse, much as I would like not to."

"Then I say you are an ass. Any man would be an ass to believe such a lot of pure——"

"Tommy-rot?" suggested Thorndyke. "That is what you'd like to say if you were not so elegant, I know—so I'll say it for you. Yes, it looks very much like that, I know, but there's no help for it—I do believe in this particular curse, as I said—and no amount of ridicule can change it. I've tried to change my mind, but—well, perhaps, I haven't such small change with me," and he smiled again at the little pleasantry.

Carwin picked up the sword which lay upon the table, and which had brought up the whole subject, and looked at it curiously. It was a heavy old weapon, with jewelled handle and guard, and though the blade was rusty and nicked now, one could see it had been used in more than one deadly conflict, and had seen hard service and years of use in the dim past. It had belonged to a very ancient ancestor of Thorndyke's, and had been handed down to him, with the few other family relics that his father had managed to collect the last time he had been abroad. Beside the sword lay a yellow old paper, from which Thorndyke had been reading when Carwin, his best friend, dropped in for the evening.

"Then what I gather from your narrative," said the latter, after turning the weapon about in his hands a few moments, "is, that this is the very sword that did the deed. Am I right?"

"You are."

"And the story is, that away back in the dark ages, before people found that killing every man who crossed you was not the shortest way to heaven, one of your respected forefathers"—nodding to the row of dim old portraits which ran around the cosy room above the bookshelves—"owned this sword and was a knight. When the Crusades got to be the fashion, he was seized with a desire to wear a cross upon his shoulder—and also cross his feet when he was buried—and girding this self-same weapon about him, he gat himself unto the wars and whooping it up, as it were, racing off like the rest of humanity to fight with the Saracens and have a good time generally. And as he had a daughter—a young and pretty daughter—whom he could not take along with the rest of his impedimenta, he left her at home. How do I come on?"

"Finely; proceed," said Thorndyke, twirling the sword about his head and showing himself no mean fencer as he did so.

"Before leaving, this charmingly dull-witted individual—pardon me for calling him names, Thorndyke, but he was a chump—called all the servants up and made them a speech, in which he told of the great things he intended to do while away, and instructed them to be good boys and girls and mind their mistress's slightest wish, or prepare to hunt for other places when he returned from his little jaunt. Then he turned over the keys to her and left.

"When he got to the wars, he did some big fighting and distinguished himself, as you Thorndykes have a faculty of doing, and though he did not write home every week, as you do, he picked up a young Moor and shipped him back with letters and money for household expenses for the castle. The Moor was a slave, of course, but a handsome fellow—quiet, grave, and intelligent, and he made a great impression on everyone connected with the castle, the mistress included. He got there about Christmas time, and settled down as if he had intended coming all his life, but only just found the opportunity. For a while the other servants liked him; but as soon as they found he was fast becoming a favourite with the daughter of the house, their mistress, they veered round and took to despising him in good old English fashion, and proceeded to make things as hot for his Moorship as possible. Naturally enough, this had the effect of making the mistress like him all the more—no, I did not say all the Moor—and to show them she was the head of the house while papa was away, she took the Moor as her constant attendant. He waited upon her everywhere, excepting in her boudoir, and was with her constantly whenever she drove or walked about the grounds of that palatial pile.

"The Moor, being with her so much, very naturally, too, fell in love with her, and, as girls then were no more proof against the wiles of foreigners than they are in this matter-of-fact century, she succumbed to his dusky charms, and one morning, bright and early, they slipped across the great lawn and into the little chapel in the edge of the woods, where, by alternately brow-beating and cajoling the deaf and blind old parson, they were married. Am I not interesting, old man?"

Digitized by Google

"Very," said Thorndyke, laughing at his friend's frank manner: "there is added charm to the tale when 'tis told by you."

"Thank you. Well, they were good and married, and all went well——"

"Until a year had passed," put in Thorndyke.

"Until a year had passed. Then a little one was born—a tiny, light-skinned Moor, with blue eyes like its mother, and other features copied in miniature from its proud father. Of course there was a great stir when the youngster came, and the truth leaked out; but it was almost forgotten in the additional excitement caused by the return of my lady's father. An uninformed servant who had heard only half of the truth met him at the draw-bridge, and told him of the supposed-to-be-sad news of his daughter's marriage; and the old gentleman still with the blood of war in his nostrils and heeding nothing else but the fact, as he thought it was, that his name had been dragged in the dust by his child, dashed into the castle and pushed his way unceremoniously into her room, where she lay a sweet picture upon her bed, the child in her young arms, the sunlight streaming through the open window over her and the little one.

"Without a word, the half-crazed Crusader snatched the baby from its mother's arms and, swinging it about his head, he dashed it down to the courtyard below, where it lay dead almost before it had breathed the breath of life. Then, before the terrified stricken young mother could realise what had happened, the Moor appeared in the doorway, his dark face wreathed in a Christian-like smile, waiting to greet the father. With an imprecation, the Crusader sprang at him, and ere the Moor could draw and defend himself, he was run through by the sword that had been the death of many a Saracen before him, and lay weltering in his own blood at his father-in-law's feet. Then the girl-widow understood, and mad with grief and horror at the terrible deed, she pulled herself to her knees, and stretching her white arms out, her yellow hair glistening like burnished gold in the sunlight, she cursed the wretched man—cursed him as only a woman of that day and age could curse one. As the last awful word dropped from her lips, she sank back upon the bed unconscious, and a few hours after she was dead.

"From that hour the knight was a changed man. Serious and grave, with a haunted, frightened look upon his hitherto rugged countenance, he went about his estate, a broken, decrepit old man, hardly a shadow of his former self. A few years later he, too, died, but—but—I believe that is as far as I can go unaided, old man," concluded Carwin abruptly, turning to Thorndyke.

"Why—why—you leave off in the most interesting part, Carwin," said the other, resting from his exercise, which he had kept up in a lazy way, while the other talked. "The old knight died, to be sure, but have you forgotten how? Well, he got into trouble with another old fellow over some land, and the other chap fell upon him, unarmed though my forefather was, and slew him. As he fell, he turned his head and gazed on the wound, which was in his right side, and which he tore the clothing from, and after one glance he covered his eyes with one hand, shrieking out something about the Moor's head as he did so.

"There, in the shadow of his castle, he died a few moments later, and when the servants came running to find him—having heard his death screams—they knew the first curse had fallen, for from the gaping wound in their master's side a clot of blood had risen and taken the form of a head. And to their excited imagination, and from the colour of the dark fluid, it took upon itself the resemblance to the Moor whom the knight had slain as unmercifully as his enemy had just put an end to his life.

"Then they remembered the curse, and looked at each other frightened and awed. The old knight's only son lived to be thirty, when one day he wounded himself in the arm. He thought nothing of it until the Moor's head appeared, when he lost his nerve, too, and died the next day. And so for generations it ran, and never once has the eldest son of the eldest son died naught but a violent death, and his death has always been preceded by the appearance of this silent messenger, who has never given a false warning. That is the legend, and I'm sorry to say I sometimes feel as if my death would have to be a violent one to carry out the wretched curse. Being the eldest son of my father, it would end with me were I to die now."

"I trust so; but pray be a little more cheerful, and talk of something else besides dying just to accommodate this charming malediction. You are good for many years yet, and—be careful, Thorndyke!"

The other man was lunging at a heavy old bronze plaque which hung on the wall opposite him as Carwin spoke, and the sword bent and snapped back again at each thrust in a manner unpleasant to the latter's ears, as if foreboding some evil. Indeed, hardly had he spoken, when there was a sharp crack of breaking steel, and the point of the weapon whistled back from the wall. Thorndyke sprang aside, but too late; the rusty tip of the sword—broken only an inch or two from the point—had already reached him, and sank deep into his breast, just below the heart, and with a suppressed groan of pain he tumbled into his friend's outstretched arms.

Carrying him to the cushioned seat near the fireplace, Carwin tore the coat and shirt from about the wound, and, taking a firm grip upon the bit of steel, which just showed itself above the wound, he withdrew it slowly with his muscular fingers and hurled it into the glowing fire.

As he did so, Thorndyke opened his eyes and struggled to a sitting position, though the other strove to keep him upon the pillows.

"Oh, Heavens!" screamed the wounded man wildly. "Look, Carwin, look! It is—it is the Moor's head! And I—I——" He stopped, a shiver passed over his now damp body, and he swayed against the wall, and from there slid down to the couch, dead.

Carwin, with a curious light in his eyes, glanced about the room as an animal might, and then back at the Moor's head. Then he swept one hand down over his friend's bare breast and tore the clot from the wound, squeezing it viciously in his hand as he did so.

A moment passed during which there was no sound save the deep and nervous breathing of the man crouching beside the dead body of Thorndyke. Then slowly the head appeared again, and again he swept it off and crushed it in his hand.

A third time the head came, and Carwin, with staring eyes and chalk-like face, staggered to his feet. Then, with one mad look at the horrible thing, he rushed to the door, and, wrenching it open, screamed for help.

HARRY ROGERS.

Digitized by Google

The Carriage will Call at Half-past Seven.

"BY Jove, old man, this is luck! I haven't seen you for a long time, though I met your ex-fidus Achates, Jack Olmsted, often enough. What is the trouble between you two, anyways?"

"Do you mean to say that you've never heard about the little unpleasantness, Dick?" asked Bob Ferrers.

"Never. Girl in the case, I suppose. Tell me about it, won't you? That is if you may. No—I've nothing to do. How could I be occupied here? For unparalleled loneliness, commend me to a summer hotel, where one is a stranger to all the other people, and the other people are all intimate."

"But you know some of the crowd here; in fact the leading characters of my story, Ellen Barton and Olmsted."

"Olmsted is well enough, but he's with the Thorpes all the time, and I don't like them! As for the little Barton girl, ugh! she'd take first prize in an ugly woman show."

"She isn't good-looking, I'll admit; but she's a good little soul, retiring, modest, and all that. My chief objection to her is that she is a Barton, and the Bartons are such uncommonly vulgar upstarts."

Personal gossip in public places is something worse than folly; it is a crime. While Dick Vane and Ferrers were discussing her affairs, Ellen Barton sat in a vine-clad summer-house within ten feet of them. Supposing that the men would walk on, she kept perfectly quiet; their words hurt her. The truth is apt to hurt. It was small comfort to be called a "good little soul." She knew that she was homely and her heart ached at the knowledge.

Pretty women cannot sympathise with her. They do not know what it is to be shunned by men, or accorded a word, now and then, too obviously from pity. They cannot realise that to the poor "wallflower," a ball-room is a place of humiliation and torture.

Had Ellen Barton pleased herself, she would have lived the life of a recluse; but her family could not understand her distaste for society. She was the only child, and to them her lack of beauty was not apparent. The Bartons lived in a small house, and dined in the front room of the basement. They had risen above horse-hair sofas, but they had succumbed to the evil influence of figured cotton-back plush.

Any and every form of entertainment was a "party" to them. They had heard of "five o'clock teas," but disapproved of such functions. "Tea at six o'clock, as we always have it, is early enough for me," Mr. Barton was wont to say. Ellen went to the church sociables with her father or her uncle. Other girls went with young men. Ellen eyed them enviously. The young men never invited her.

Every summer the Bartons spend four weeks at the seaside, and every summer, when they were ready to start, Mr. Barton made the same remark: "Now, Ellen, keep your eyes open. You might make a catch while you're away. Who knows!"

Ellen almost hated her uncle when he said that. She had heard it ever since she left school at sixteen, and now she was twenty-five.

At first she, too, had had vague ideas of someone who was to come and rescue her from the sociables and the other things she hated. Then to hope succeeded bitterness. She saw that men did not even dislike her; they were absolutely indifferent. She realised that the longing for love—that is the curse or the blessing of a woman's heart—was destined to be unfulfilled, and she hated other happier, prettier girls.

She was at the Brastead Hotel because her family liked the place. It was noisy and vulgar, but that they did not know. To them it was the abode of all that was fashionable and magnificent. Their names were copied from the hotel register into local papers, and Mrs. Barton bought numbers of these precious papers and sent some to friends: others she kept in a desk with her love-letters from Mr. Barton, Ellen's first shoes, and similar treasures.

Ellen sitting in the summer-house, had been thinking over these things. The conversation she overheard was but a crowning torture.

A convenient bench tempted Vane and Ferrers. They sat down, lit their cigars, and continued their criticism of the Bartons. It was too late to retreat, so Ellen was forced to listen.

"Those Bartons are worse than stupid," said Ferrers; "but, to do them justice, if they are insufferably aggressive, it's all for Ellen. How they push that girl forward! Throw her at a fellow's head, you know. That's why Olmsted and I are out."

"Great Scott! You don't mean to say you quarrelled about Ellen Barton?"

Vane laughed as he spoke, and to Ellen the laugh seemed infinitely worse than words. It was so scornful and contemptuous.

"Yes, it was about Ellen indirectly. You remember May Seymour's wedding? You know that everyone in our church knew it was to take place Tuesday, the 9th of February, long before the cards were out. Well, early in January Mrs. Barton wrote to Olmsted saying that she wished to see him about something particular. Of course he went, and what do you suppose the something was? She wanted him to escort Ellen to May's wedding. She told him she would engage a carriage which would call for him on the evening in question. How was that for an ambitious mamma? Jack is quite the bright, particular star of our church, and he's pretty well fixed financially. All the mothers run after him, but no one had ever been quite so open about it as Mrs. Barton. Jack was taken by surprise and could think of no excuse; and, anyway, he's an awfully good chap, so he said he'd be delighted to oblige her. Then he went out and kicked himself.

"The day Miss Seymour's invitations came out Jack received a second note from Mrs. Barton reminding him of his engagement to accompany Ellen. Poor boy, he wasn't likely to forget it! She added a postscript to say that a carriage had been ordered and that it would call for him at half-past seven.

Digitized by Google

"Jack wrote and thanked her.

"The Saturday preceding the ninth of February Jack met Mr. Barton in the city. You know old Barton, pompous and condescending to everyone, including his superiors. He shook hands with Jack. 'By-the-way,' said he, 'my wife has to dme to tell you, if I saw you, that a carriage has been ordered to take you and Ellen to Miss Seymour's wedding. It will call for you at half-past seven. Be punctual.'

"Sunday morning on his way to church Ellen herself stopped him. She seemed embarrassed. Finally she blurted out that Jack was very kind to act as her escort, and that if he did not wish to he need not. She said that she felt mortified that her mother should have asked him. Jack is a gentleman, so he told a lie. He said that, even if Mrs. Barton had not suggested it, he had intended asking her to go with him. The ugly duckling turned the colour of a boiled lobster, and thanked him so gratefully that he in turn thanked heaven that he had fibbed. Then Ellen went on:

"'Mamma told me to tell you that she'd send a carriage for you and then you're to come for me. The carriage will call at half-past seven.' Jack kept his face straight, but fled as soon as possible. After church he saw Ellen's uncle bearing down on him. Perhaps you've met her uncle? No? Well, he's a genial, jovial old person, illiterate and vulgar. He slapped Olmsted on the back and chuckled. He's particularly awful when he chuckles.

"'Well, my boy, going to take the little girl out, eh? Sly dog! Young folks will be young folks. Te!—he—he—he.' With one of his maddening chuckles he poked Jack in the ribs. 'There's a carriage been ordered,' said he; 'mind you behave now, you and the girl in the carriage. Te—he—he! No nonsense, eh? The carriage'll call at half-past seven.' Another poke in the ribs, another chuckle, and he waddled away.

"Poor Jack waited for the other Bartons to get away before he left the church. Mrs. Barton saw him, but was too far away to speak, so she motioned with her lips, and Jack knew what she was saying; 'Don't forget; the carriage will call at half-past seven.'

"When she had disappeared Jack turned to go, but he saw the sexton coming towards him. Ever see our sexton? He shuffles and talks in a whisper, and he'd make you think of funerals even if he didn't combine an undertaking establishment with the livery stables he runs. He seemed to have some weighty matter on his mind as he approached. He was more mysterious than usual. He looked round suspiciously to see if anyone was watching or listening. Then he put one finger on his lips and winked at Jack.

"'Perhaps you know why I want to see you, sir?' said he.

"'No, I don't,' said Jack.

"'Well, it's just this way, sir. A certain lady—to speak plainly, it's Mrs. Barton, sir—has engaged a carriage of me, for next Tuesday evening. She's going to send it for you at half-past seven. She feared she might not see you herself, so asked me to tell you. The carriage will call at half-past seven. Good-day, sir.'

"Jack felt like cursing the carriage, but he didn't. A lot of us fellows were in his room that evening, and he was so annoyed at the Barton tactics that he told us the whole story. He didn't realise that he was doing a foolish thing then, but he did the next Tuesday morning, for when he entered his office over a hundred post-cards lay on his desk. On every card he read the hated words: 'The carriage will call at half-past seven.'

"Then there were pictures of a couple, presumably Ellen and himself, getting into a carriage or getting out. One card was labelled 'The Result,' and there was again Ellen with her hand in Jack's, and her uncle Joe, as a fat cherub, hovering over them and saying: 'Bless you, my children.'

"There's nothing more to tell; except that he took Ellen to the wedding, and was as kind and attentive as possible to her. But he has avoided the Bartons ever since, and he'll kill the man that says to him: 'The carriage will call at half-past seven.'"

"But, Bob, in spite of the length of your story, you haven't explained why you and Olmsted quarreled," said Vane.

"Oh, it was a mere trifle. I sent the post-cards and he found it out."

"Is that all? The ending is commonplace. You led me to expect a tragic dénoûment. Hullo! it's almost dinner time. We may as well go back to the hotel."

The two men strolled away, quite unconscious that in the summer-house homely little Ellen Barton was crying as though her heart would break. So, this was the way men spoke of her! What hurt her most was to know that Olmsted had lied to her. It had always been a comfort to think that once one had actually wanted to take her out. Without realising it, she had made a hero of the only man that had ever shown her any attention. She felt that she could never again face him, or any of the men that knew the story. She had received the most crushing blow ever dealt her in her life, that had been made up of slights and humiliation. The intensity of shame overpowered her. She could not reason calmly. What was the use of living at all when there was nothing to live for? She wasn't merely lonely, she was stupid, she had no talents, nothing to atone for her lack of beauty. People ridiculed her. Ridicule is harder to bear than anything else. The world was harsh and cruel. She hated everyone, and most of all herself.

"I wonder if homely people go to heaven?" she murmured.

* * * * *

That night Dick Vane came up to Ferrers, in the smoking-room of the —— hotel.

"Say, old man, where's Olmsted?" said he; "I want to chaff him about that story you told me."

"For Heaven's sake, hold your infernal tongue! Haven't you heard? Miss Barton was in the summer-house this afternoon. She heard every word we said, and——"

"And what?" asked Vane, thoroughly shocked at the news.

"And someone saw her leave the summer-house and—and go towards the lake. And they have only just recovered her dead body."

Ferrers' voice rose as he spoke; his face was ghastly in its pallor. He paused a moment, then cried fiercely: "Confound you, is the dénoûment tragic enough, now?"

JULIA SCHLOMM.

This is a sad little story, isn't it? But cheer up! The second volume of PEARSON'S MAGAZINE begins with the July number, published next Wednesday.

Digitized by Google

THE BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

No. 8.

TWO PRIZES OF £1 1s. EACH.

BELOW will be found the eighth batch of ten problems in the new series of "THE BRAIN GYMNASIUM." Two prizes of a Guinea each are offered weekly to those competitors who answer correctly the greatest number of these problems. Consolation prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

RULES:

1. All solutions to be written on one sheet of paper.
2. Don't write the questions. Simply put the numbers and the answer against each.
3. Each set to contain the £100 coupon (found on second page of cover) for the current week.
4. All attempts to be in by Monday, June 29th.
5. Mark your envelope "Gymnasium, Number 8."

(71.) The initials read downwards and finals read upwards of the words defined below signify "violent."

1. A vehicle.
2. The two-toed sloth.
3. A violent tropical wind.
4. Repeat.
5. Paining.

(72.) The following is a cypher sentence. Transcribe it.

84m2 m4n0h8 62f4r2 h38 9210h, h2 pl1729 3n my h1n98 1 l1rg2, 4l9-f18h34n29 p47k20-b44k, b3993ng m2 147k 30 5p 1n9 k22p 30 81f2ly f4r h3m.

(73.) WORD SQUARES.

1. Belonging to you.
   A monster.
   To incite.
   River growth.
2. Mental power.
   A notion.
   Did lend.
   Behind time.

(74.) The following letters and words placed one on the other will form a diamond shape, the central letters spelling a word signifying "finished."

One of the first six letters of the alphabet, a species of deer, crystallised sugar, a university magistrate, young ducks, formed by work, covered in mud, a meadow, in "end."

(75.) If i=37½, e=2½, u=21½, z=59, t=47, what word on this page has the highest numerical value?

(76.) The British Footguards, numbering, say, 5,249 men armed with the Lee-Metford rifle are placed on a plain 1,500 yards long, at the other end of which are the Footguards of the German army, numbering, say, 6,464 men, armed with the Mannlicher rifle. The Germans advance to the attack, and at 1,300 yards both sides open fire, with the result that in the first three minutes the Germans lose 72 men and the British 57. During the next eight minutes the superior shooting of the British continues to tell, and 27 Germans fall every minute to 15 Britons. At 1,000 yards the proportion has increased by 16 British to 32 Germans per minute, and this average is maintained till the end. How long will it be before the Germans are annihilated, and how many British guardsmen, if any, will remain alive.

(77.) The following sentence when rearranged will spell a readable sentence.

He is ambiguously tender that speaks up his language in bashful confidences, not when a precise man would draw his own word he hints, to the preoccupied subject every preoccupation of will the wherewith in assimilates he spoken enters (78.) My first is to encircle.

My second is an adjective.
My third is a "turn."
My whole is "indirect."

(79.) If you paid 6d. for every word of eight letters and over on this page, what is the total amount you would pay?

(80.) How many words are there on this page? Do not count figures or punctuation marks.

RESULT OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM COMPETITION.—No. 5.

MOST of the competitors in this competition stumbled over the mathematical problem No. 44, while many who sent this in correctly, forwarded a very feeble anagram for No. 48. The work of adjudicating has therefore been an exceptionally delicate one. The result arrived at awards one of the guineas to Miss Margaret Hellfarth, Bower Lodge, Pyrland Road, Richmond, and the other to Mr. Geo. Humphreys, 19, Colville Street, Nottingham.

Consolation prizes in the form of pencil-cases have been sent to the competitors whose names appears below.

Miss D. Gordon, The Courtyard, Altham; Mrs. Somerville, 14, Musard Road, W.; S. T. Green, Well Close House, Fenton, Staffordshire; T. G. Ushers, Baltinglass, co. Wicklow; Miss S. T. Jones, 37, Aberfeldy Street, Poplar, E.; Miss G. Goldsmith, 56, Campbell Road, Southsea; T. W. Harrison, 27, Queen Street, North Ormesby, Middlesbrough; Mrs. M. E. Mennie, 99, Queen Street, Peterhead; R Trail Hill, 3, Merchant Street, Peterhead; T. Mason, Hawkhead Terrace, 31, Seedhill Road, Paisley; H. St. George, 37, Lawrence Road, Southsea; A. H. Hamilton, 43, Dalmeney Road, Tufnell Park; C. B. Keston, 11, Queen's Road, Bayswater, W.; B. M. Perks, 97, Burlington Street, Greenheys, Manchester; C. Willoughby, 48, Benedict Street, Stanley Road, Bootle; J. Tanner, 74, Hampton Park, Bristol; W. A. Breffitt, 139, Duke Street, Brooks Bar, Manchester; G. Russell, 68, Strahan Road, Bow; E. Friend, Eastern Road, Romford; A. James, Gorringe Park, Mitcham, Surrey; W. C. Caird, 12, Franklin Street, South Tottenham; F. P. Whiteside, 24, Bowden Street, Glodwick, Oldham; W. H. Page, H.M.S. Hero, Portsmouth; Mrs. A. Sellurs, 69, Clinton Road, Mile End Road, E.; C. Holligan, Ashton House, Hampton Hill, Middlesex; Miss A. Vincent, 16, Crowhurst Road, Brixton, S.W.; W. H. Deeble, 25, Arwenack Street, Falmouth; P. Sweeney, 124, Hartnup Street, Anfield, Liverpool; W. S. Cool, 28, Thirsk Road, Lavender Hill; Miss L. M. Searle, Woodside Court, Croydon; A. Dawson, Sunny Bank, Frodsham, Cheshire; Miss M. Joseph, 88, Hyde Park Mansions, N.W.; J. Rawling, 3, Ingram Street, Huntingdon; J. H. Kidd, "Mauldeth," Heaton Mersey, near Manchester; A. H. Barlow, 115, Walmer Road, Notting Hill, W.; J. Manby, 1, Upper Bow, Edinburgh; Miss B. Wood, Bower Lodge, Pyrland Road, Richmond.

KEY TO NO. 5 COMPETITION.

KEY No. 41.—Inspection.

KEY No. 42.—Excellent.

KEY No. 43.—There are several words value 75, such as paragraph, properties, appears, prepaid, approach, etc., all of which have been counted correct.

KEY No. 44.—16⅔ miles.

KEY No. 45.

R	E	A	P.
E	L	S	E.
A	S	P	S.
P	E	S	T.

KEY No. 46.

F	lounde	R	P icaroo N
O	bsolet	E	L obeli A
L	ongbo	W	A nagra M
L	ibrett	O	C ingales E

KEY No. 47.—He scanned the yawl, as he stood there, and his keen and practised eye took in and fully appreciated the beauty of her lines.

KEY No. 48.—The following anagrams, sent in answer to this problem, are above the average:

Bag the dread spy. Spread thy badge. G. B. Hay's departed.

KEY No. 49.—At the commencement a physical impression was sufficient to dissipate this hallucination. Without attracting attention I arose and went to my chamber. A dash of cold water on the forehead restored calm. The spectre disappeared and I returned smiling.

KEY No. 50.—Examination.

RESULT OF PICTURE PUZZLE COMPETITION.—No. 7.

09	5	56	2	8	41	35	6
22	18	45	19	71	61	9	50
16	46	30	21	28	43	26	49
62	64	33	7	78	40	38	17
12	69	57	36	3	74	58	79
67	55	27	23	88	13	53	48
47	61	99	37	24	73	54	70
15	94	89	72	42	25	20	87
32	01	78	76	18	85	14	69
4	63	29	83	11	68	31	77
34	99	1	98	52	08	82	44

No competitor succeeded in correctly putting together all the squares in this puzzle picture. The £10 prize has therefore been divided between the two competitors who were only one square wrong, Mr. J. Hughes, 15, Royal Name Place, New Cross, and Miss A. Beer, 2, Keppel Terrace, Stoke, Devonport, to each of whom a cheque of £5 has been sent. Consolation prizes have been sent to the following:

G. D. Taylor, 23, Ernest Street, Rhyl; Miss B. Keeley, "Eastgate," Ashford Road, Maidstone; J. Hughes, 15, Royal Naval Place, New Cross; A. Hook, 9, Canterbury Place, Lambeth Road; J. A. Rigg, 14, Newport Road, Manningham, Bradford; W. Kay, junr., 56, Lady Lawson Street, Edinburgh; Miss Cox, 2, Claremont Villas, Tudor Road, Norbiton; J. T. Roberts, 3, Sand Street, Pwllheli, North Wales; T. N. Sheehan, Dining Rooms, High Street, Tunbridge Wells; Arthur Hook, 9, Canterbury Place, Lambeth Road, S.E.

POSTAL RATES.

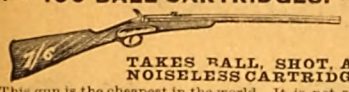
SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

7/6 SALOON GUN WITH 100 BALL CARTRIDGES. 7/6



TAKES BALL, SHOT, AND NOISELESS CARTRIDGES.

This gun is the cheapest in the world. It is not a toy, but a practical well-made Saloon Gun, 37½in. long, weight about 4lb. 100 Birds or Rabbits can be killed with it at cost of 1/6 only with shot cartridges, or 6/- per 500. Will penetrate a deal board 1in. at 50 yards. Can also be used in the house as a Target Rifle, with NOISELESS Cartridges at 1/- per 100, or 5/- per 1,000. This gun is fitted with a beautifully finished stock, nickel-plated fittings, etc., etc. Price 7/6 with 100 Ball Cartridges. Each gun is tested, regulated, and proved before sent to customer. The "Union Jack" Pistol (Registered), with 100 Ball Cartridges, price 4/6, or pair for 8/-. Block Action Saloon or Garden Guns (very superior manufacture) with 100 ball cartridges, No. 1 Bore, 12/6; No. 2 Bore, 13/6; No. 3 Bore, 15/6. No. 3 Bore at 15/6 will kill a bird on the wing at 35 to 45 yards. Send for Price Lists of Air Guns, Saloon Guns, sporting novelties and ammunition. If you cannot send to-day, cut this advertisment out, and write some other time. ADDRESS—W. R. JACKSON, Wholesale Arms and Ammunition Dealer, Tottenham, MIDDLESEX.
(Mention this Paper.)

"JUNO" CYCLES Are the Very Best.

JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb.

JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.
N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

ARMSTRONG'S

Lady's & Gentleman's, from £5 10s., carriage paid. Prompt delivery, lists free. SPORTING GUN DEPT., Collingwood Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Swift Gold Medal

KNITTER.

KNITS Stockings ribbed or plain, Gloves and Clothing in Wool, Silk, or Cotton. Instructions Free. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals, for the "Harrison" and "Sun" Machines.
Harrison Knitting Machine Co., Ltd. Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free.—Address, H. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20

See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (59 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Store, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 183, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

"WY-LING"

The Simplest and Best ERASER on the market. Post Free 1/1.

"WY-LING," 10, Ranelagh Rd., Ealing, W.

DR. WARNER'S CORALINE CORSETS
DR. WARNER'S CORALINE CORSETS
DR. WARNER'S CORALINE CORSETS
DR. WARNER'S CORALINE CORSETS

A lady in Truro writes: 'I have never had corsets to last me so long as these.' A lady in Camberwell writes: 'I have worn a pair of Coraline Corsets for over three years, and never wish for better.' A lady near Leicester writes: 'I cannot speak too highly of your Corsets. I consider they are unequalled for wear and comfort.' We could fill columns with similar letters all unsolicited. We will readily give names and addresses if asked for.

DR. WARNER'S CORALINE CORSETS
DR. WARNER'S CORALINE CORSETS
DR. WARNER'S CORALINE CORSETS
DR. WARNER'S CORALINE CORSETS

No need to send to us if you can obtain the Coraline Corsets from your draper, but if you cannot, we will send you, post free, illustrated Catalogue and Price List of the various shapes and styles and tell you how to obtain the goods. Twenty million pairs already sold. In any case do not be persuaded to try any substitute. Coraline is also obtainable for use in Dresses. Address W. Pretty and Son, Ipswich. A post-card will do. Prices from 4s. 6d.

DR. WARNER'S CORALINE CORSETS
DR. WARNER'S CORALINE CORSETS
DR. WARNER'S CORALINE CORSETS
DR. WARNER'S CORALINE CORSETS

Send 4 Stamps and receive pair FOLDING SCISSORS, PATENT PENKNIFE, and Amusing Novelty Catalogue, post paid. VARIETY COMPANY, DALSTON, LONDON.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.
We have not a dissatisfied Client.
DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

ORGAN 4s. Monthly.

WALNUT CASE. KNEE SWELL. SPLENDID TONE.
10 Years' Warranty. 72 Page List Post Free.
ALPHONSE CARY, NEWBURY, BERKS.

ARE YOU FAT?

DR. GORDON'S Elegant Pills are the only Safe and Lasting Cure for Stoutness, Abdominal or General. State height, weight, and send 2/9, 4/6, or 11/- to Dr. Gordon, 24, Hart St., London, W.C.

READ! READ! READ!

Miss Roberts, "Brooklyn," Spotland Road, Rochdale, says: "I am 21in. round waist—before taking your Pills, 27in." Mrs. Cox, "Hazelhurst," Brondesbury Road, N.W.: "The last supply reduced me 14lb. in month without change of diet." P. Bendelow, 59, Dorset Street, Bolton: "Your Pills greatly reduced my weight." H. I. Cooper, 97, Somers Road, Southsea, says: "Your Pills reduced me 2 stones." Mrs. J. Maskery, of Shirley, Derby: "I have lost nearly 3 stones in weight." Miss Nappey, Wood Lane, Headingley: "I have lost 18lb."

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full natural perfect Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment, approved and recommended by the medical profession. Success guaranteed. For particulars free, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

FREEHOLD LAND.

PLOTS or ACRES. Sales Every Week. LEIGH, SOUTHEND, RAYLEIGH, ROCHFORD, HERNE BAY, and MEDSTEAD. Shoebury & Goring Land Co., 67 & 68, Cheapside, are always selling good cheap land. Easy terms. Deeds free. Plans post free.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

HOW TO PATENT AN INVENTION.

Book giving full particulars as to Cost, Forms, &c. Post Free. CASSELL & CO. (Patent Agents), 22, Glasshouse Street, Piccadilly Circus, London. Inventors assisted. Consultation and Advice Free.

SIMPLEX TYPEWRITER.

Prices 12/6 and 14/6 delivered free. 84 letters and business signs. Type equal to that of a £20 machine. Illustrated particulars on receipt of addressed envelope.
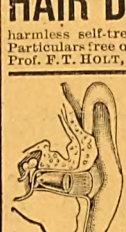
ATKINSON & Co., 17, Elmwood St., Leeds.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.



DEAFNESS

And Head Noises Relieved by Using Wilson's Common-Sense Ear Drums. A new scientific invention, entirely different in construction from all other devices. Assist the deaf when all other devices fail, and where medical skill has given no relief. They are safe, comfortable, and invisible; have no wire or string attachment. Write for Pamphlet. Mention this Paper.
Wilson Ear Drum Co. Agent: D. H. WILSON,
Drum in position. 7, Newington Road, Edinburgh.

Digitized by Google

GIVEN AWAY £5,000!

GRAHAM & CO.'S

MONSTER GIFTS.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—Messrs. GRAHAM & CO. intend to present their Customers with a Monster Parcel as a means of advertising their celebrated

EGYPTIAN GOLD JEWELLERY.

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

For the small sum of 6s. 6d. we will send as follows:—

NOT A TOY

WE GIVE YOU A WATCH.

	Our Price.
One Gent's Egyptian Gold Albert, or one Lady's Egyptian Gold Albert	2s. 6d.	FOR
One Seal or Locket for Chain	1s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Ring, or one Lady's 5-stone Diamond Ring	3s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Scarfpin, or one Lady's Fashionable Brooch	2s. 6d.	6s. 6d.
One Pair of Cuff Links, or one Carbon Diamond Bracelet ...	2s. 6d.
Total	12s. 6d.

In addition to the above Every Purchaser will be Presented Free of Charge with one of our handsome

KEYLESS WATCHES.

USUALLY SOLD AT HALF-A-GUINEA.

Read what is said by those who have purchased.

WANTS A SECOND PARCEL.

Lowick-by-Neale, Northumberland, August 17.

GENTLEMEN,—Received to-day your second parcel of jewellery, with which we are immensely pleased. We really wonder how you can do it. The watch itself is worth more than the money charged for the whole. Many thanks for punctuality.—Very truly yours, WILLIAM McISAAC.

GOES BETTER THAN HIS £15 WATCH.

11, North Street, St. Peters, Tunbridge Wells.

GENTLEMEN,—Some few weeks ago I sent to your firm for the jewellery and advertised watch, of which I am surprised; the watch is a beautiful timist. I must admit, in fact, it goes better than my £15 gold watch; and for the jewellery it is astonishing value. I think you must lose money over such gifts, as I term it. The watch alone is worth double the 7s. I enclosed. I have shown it to several of my friends, and they were astonished. You can add this to your testimonials if it will be of any service.—I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully, LEWIS C. RHODES.

GUARANTEED TO KEEP CORRECT TIME.

Any Watch not received in going order will be exchanged.

Every Watch is Carefully Examined, Timed, and Guaranteed a Correct Timekeeper. Call and see them.

We do this to save the enormous cost of advertising, preferring to give our customers the benefit. As we lose money on each parcel we cannot supply more than two parcels to one person. If you cannot call get a P.O. at once, and send for this wonderful parcel. Orders will be executed in Rotation. MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

NOTE.—The entire parcel will be sent for 6s. 6d. (post free, registered, 7s.). Each customer will receive gratis one of our HANDSOMELY ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES. Be sure and call or send to-day for the

6s. 6d. Monster Presentation Parcel including the Handsome Keyless Watch.

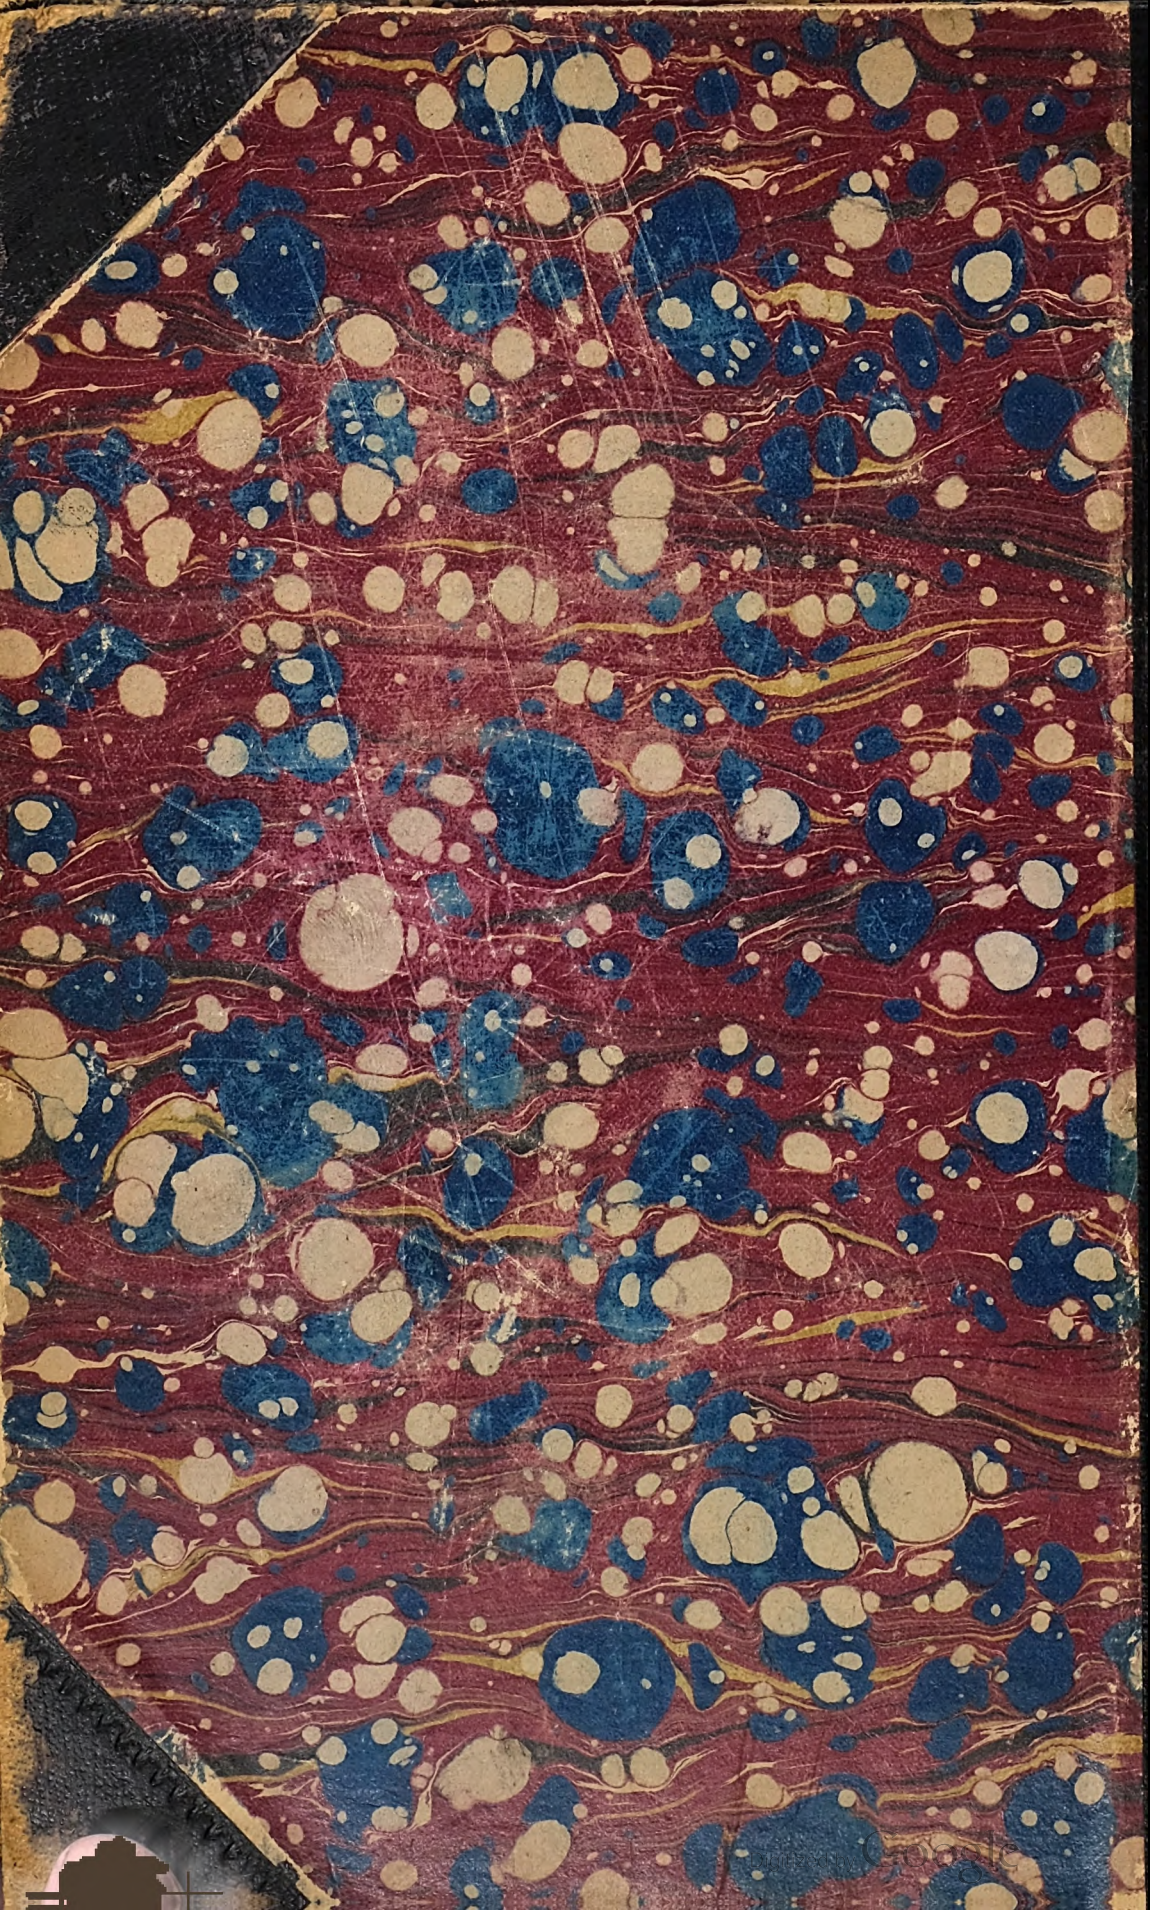
S. S. GRAHAM & CO., 277, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google


Digitized by Google